The protector was no ſooner arrived at London, than he found that his brother Thomas, who had been lately created by patent lord high-admiral of England, had not only caballed with his enemies, but had made vigorous efforts to ſupplant him in his high poſt, having gained ſuch an aſcendancy over Edward, that he had perſuaded him to write, with his own hand, a letter to the houſe of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of the king's perſon, a poſt to which he ſaid he was intitled by the former uſages of parliaments, as being uncle to the king. This pretenſion ſtruck at the root of all the protector's greatneſs, but ſtill he endeavoured to reclaim his brother by methods of gentleneſs and munificence; but finding him ſtill determined to puſh his point, the duke ſaw that nothing but a parliament could either ſave or ſerve him. Summons were therefore iſſued for holding a ſeſſion on the fourth of the following month.

In the mean time he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and that he propoſed to offer the ſame to the houſe at its meeting; whereupon ſeveral lords were ſent by the council to diſſuade the admiral from ſo groſs a proceeding: and when they returned with a report of his confirmed reſolution to carry the letter, they next day ſent an order to him to appear before them in council, which he at firſt refuſed to comply with, till they threatened to deprive him of all his offices, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the ſtatute which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe menaces brought him a little to conſider the danger he ſhould run by diſobeying the council, and at laſt to pretend a reconciliation with his brother, and ſubmiſſion to the regency; I ſay to pretend a reconciliation, for he never ceaſed privately to incenſe the king againſt the protector and his other miniſters, which was diligently obſerved by the ſpies ſet over him, and made the protector ever after look upon him as a very dangerous enemy.

The chancellorſhip being at this time vacant, ſince the diſgrace of Wriotheſley, a few days before the parliament met, the privy-counſellor lord Rich was made chancellor. He was grand-ſon to Richard Rich, a wealthy mercer, and ſheriff of London; this gentleman had been bred a lawyer, and, by his pliant temper, raiſed himſelf to the pinnacle of the law. On the third of November, the day before the meeting of the parliament, the council ordered the great-ſeal to be fixed to a patent, to warrant the protector "to ſit in parliament upon a ſtool under the cloth of ſtate, on the right hand of the throne, whether the king was preſent or not." The duke, by the ſame patent, was intitled "to all privileges and pre-eminences ever enjoyed by any former uncle, either by father's or mother's ſide, to a king of England, or by any protector of the kingdom during the minority, with a Non obſtante to all ſtatutes to the contrary*." Theſe honours were not ſo neceſſary as they were invidious, particularly to the old nobility, and created the duke a great many enemies, who ſcrupled not to take occaſion from hence to accuſe him of aſpiring too high, and of an intention to deſtroy the form of government eſtabliſhed by the late king.

But if Somerſet diſcovered his vanity and weakneſe in aſſuming ſo much ſtate and grandeur, he merits the higheſt praiſe on account of the laws enacted, through his influence, in the ſeſſion of parliament, which now met on the fourth of November, and by whom the rigour of former ſtatutes was greatly ſoftened, and ſome ſecurity given to the privileges of the people. The firſt act was to repeal all laws which extended the crime of treaſon beyond the ſtatute of 28 Edw. III. All laws paſſed during the late reign extending the crime of felony; all the former laws againſt Lollards, or heretics, together with the bloody ſtatute of the Six Articles; no perſon was to be accuſed of words but within a month after they were ſpoken. By theſe repeals ſome of the moſt ſevere laws that ever were enacted in England were annulled, and the people began to have the happy proſpect of enjoying ſome ſhare of civil and religious liberty. Hereſy, however, was ſtill a capital crime by the common law, and was liable to the penalty of burning; but there was no preciſe ſtandard by which that crime could be aſcertained, a circumſtance which might either be advantageous or prejudicial to the public ſecurity, according to the rigour or lenity of the judges.

The parliament alſo repealed that law, the deſtruction of all laws, by which the king's proclamation was made equal to a ſtatute; they likewiſe mitigated that other law, paſſed in the twenty-eighth of the late reign, by which the king was empowered to annul all laws enacted before he had attained his twenty-fourth year: at the ſame time they left him at liberty, after he ſhould come to the ſaid age, to annul them for the future by his letters patent; but he could not reverſe any effects which had already enſued from them.

There were likewiſe ſeveral laws enacted, which contributed greatly to promote the reformation; the cup was reſtored to the laity; private maſſes were aboliſhed; the king was inveſted with a power of creating biſhops, without any election of the chapter; and all proceſſes in the biſhops courts (thoſe of Canterbury excepted) were to be carried on in the king's name, and ſealed by his ſeal, as in courts of common law.

In this parliament a ſtatute was made againſt vagrants, by which it was enacted, "That any man or woman not being diſabled by age, accident, or ſickneſs, and not having lands or other means ſufficient to maintain them, that wandered up and down idly for three days together, without employment, ſuch perſons, being brought before two juſtices of the peace, were to be ſlaves two years to the perſon that brought them, and marked with the letter V."

It appears upon the face of this act, that it was chiefly levelled againſt the ouſted monks, and other religious perſons, who being deſtitute of all proviſions, except a ſmall ill-paid penſion, which ſome of them had, were obliged to go about the country for ſubſiſtance, and, it ſeems, gave the people unfavourable impreſſions of the reformation.

But the bill, which made the greateſt noiſe in this parliament, was that which gave chantries and colleges to the crown. The pretext for puſhing this bill, was to enable the king to pay part of his debts; the reaſon was, the hopes which the courtiers had, by ſales or gifts of them, to enlarge their own eſtates. Cranmer and ſeveral biſhops were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the impropriation of the tythes, and other methods of alienation were already too much reduced; he therefore ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the bill, and was joined by the biſhops of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Wincheſter, and Chicheſter: but it paſſed the houſe of peers; and, notwithſtanding ſome oppoſition, that of the commons likewiſe. An act had paſſed in the late reign, granting thoſe chantries to the crown; but, it ſeems, the commiſſioners entruſted with this act had neglected to take poſſeſſion of them, and therefore this new act became neceſſary. By this act no fewer than two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chantries and other religious foundations fell to the crown, with a few reſerves of penſions to be paid to the ouſted incumbents.

It was likewiſe decreed, that all who denied the ſupremacy of the king, or maintained that of the pope, ſhould, for their firſt offence, forfeit their goods and chattels, and be impriſoned during pleaſure; for the ſecond offence, ſhould be ſubject to Præmunire; and for the third offence, be attainted of high-treaſon.

The penalties of this laſt crime were denounced againſt all who ſhould endeavour, by writing, printing, or any overt-act or deed, to deprive the king of his eſtate or titles, particularly of his ſupremacy, or to beſtow them on any other, as well as againſt the heirs of the crown who ſhould attempt to uſurp upon one another, and to break the eſtabliſhed order of ſucceſſion.

The convocation aſſembled at the ſame time with the parliament; and as it appeared the freedom of their debates were greatly hampered by the rigour of the Six Articles, the king indulged them with a diſpenſation from that ſtatute, before it was annulled by parliament.

The lower houſe of convocation preſented a petition, deſiring that they might have the liberty of ſitting with the commons in parliament; or, if this privilege, which they pretended to claim by ancient right, was denied them, they required that no law concerning religion might be enacted in parliament without their conſent and approbation.

But the principles of that age were more favourble to the civil than the eccleſiaſtical power; and, though it is probable that the lower clergy had a right of ſending repreſentatives to the houſe of commons, yet that practice had been diſcontinued for above two centuries, and the preſent juncture was by no means a proper ſeaſon for endeavouring to revive it.

This parliament, having gone through its buſineſs, broke up on the twenty-fourth of December, after having granted the king a ſubſidy, and paſſed an act of grace, by which biſhop Gardiner and Bonner were diſcharged from the Fleet, none being excepted but ſuch priſoners as were confined in the Tower of London.

In the courſe of this year the face of affairs in Germany was entirely changed; the emperor defeated and took priſoner John Frederick, elector of Saxony, and declared his couſin Maurice elector, who at the ſame time took poſſeſſion of the electoral dominions. After this diſaſter, the landgrave of Heſſe, finding himſelf unable to maintain the war, made the beſt terms he could with the emperor, and came to him upon the faith of a ſafe-conduct, which expreſly ran, that he ſhould not be liable to any impriſonment; but, by a groſs fraud, inſtead of the German word einig, which ſignifies any, the word eunig, which ſignifies perpetual, was inſerted; by this baſe artifice he was detained a priſoner, to be releaſed at the emperor's pleaſure. The impriſonment of the two heads rendered the proteſtant party very weak, and the emperor's triumphant, who now made ſundry alterations, tending to deſtroy the reformation in Germany *.

In the beginning of the year 1548, the council made ſeveral alterations in the ceremonies of religion: it forbad the ſuperſtitious bleſſing of candles on the day of the Purification (February 2, thence called Candlemas-day), the bleſſing of aſhes on the firſt day of Lent (Aſh Wedneſday), and of palms on the Sunday next before Eaſter (or Palm Sunday); all Wakes and Plough-Monday days were forbidden, and ordered to be ſuppreſſed. A few days after, they approved of the people's zeal in pulling down images, and ordered that they ſhould be removed out of all churches. They alſo did what lay in their power to aboliſh auricular confeſſion, that badge of popiſh ſlavery which kept the deluded people in eternal ſubjection to the tricks and impoſitions of the prieſts. But theſe great points againſt popery were not carried without ſome oppoſition, though confirmed by the king's proclamation, in virtue of his ſupremacy: Gardiner, though ſo lately releaſed from confinement, once more attempted to obſtruct the great work of reformation, by publicly proteſting againſt all changes in religion during the king's minority. This drew upon him the reſentment of the adminiſtration a ſecond time, who ſent him to the Tower; and this act of ſeverity to their head intimidated the popiſh party to ſuch a degree, that they conformed to the new ordinances without heſitation.

The lord high-admiral Seymour had for ſome time continued pretty quiet; but now he returned to his former practices of caballing with the ſervants about the king's perſon. As the public had a very indifferent opinion of his morals, it was ſuſpected that the death of his wife (Catherine Parr, the queen-dowager), which happened about this time, in child-bed, was haſtened by his arts, that he might be at liberty to renew his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth. It is certain that he was charged with this courtſhip before the council, and that it was afterwards made an article againſt him; nor did he deny it. But we are now to attend the affairs of Scotland.

Upon the return of the protector-duke laſt year from that country, he received a letter from the earl of Arran, in Stirling, begging he might be allowed to ſend commiſſioners to treat of an accommodation; on which Somerſet, who was very deſirous of terminating matters with the Scots in an amicable manner, named Berwick as the place of meeting, and inveſted the earl of Warwick with full powers to ſettle the preliminaries; but no com-miſſioners from Scotland ever appeared, this propoſal of the Scots being only an artifice to gain time, until they could receive aſſiſtance from France, whoſe miniſtry had given them the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of a powerful ſupport; and in the mean time they laid ſiege to Broughty caſtle, which the Engliſh had garriſoned. This obliged the protector, contrary to his inclination, to continue the war, and to ſend Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, againſt the Scots, in the character of his lieutenant-general, having granted him a commiſſion for this purpoſe by the authority of a new patent, which was afterwards urged as an article of accuſation againſt him. In the mean time the lord Grey of Wilton took and fortified Haddington, which gave him the command of the moſt fruitful part of Scotland, and from whence he made excurſions to the very gates of Edinburgh, from which it was diſtant not above twelve miles. Soon after he took the fort of Lauder alſo, without the Scots thinking proper to attempt the retaking either till they heard of the French ſuccours landing at Leith, about the beginning of June.

Theſe ſuccours conſiſted of ſix thouſand men, the beſt troops, and commanded by d'Eſſe, one of the beſt officers in France; they would not, however, act offenſively againſt England till the young queen of Scotland was put into their hands, and ſent into France: ſhe was accordingly committed to the care of Mr. de Villegagnon, the French admiral, who conducted her north-about, in order to avoid the Engliſh fleet, under the lord-admiral Seymour, who made ſeveral fruitleſs deſcents upon the coaſt; but having miſſed the chief object of his expedition, he returned home, after doing very little damage to the enemy.

The French having thus obtained their ends, joined the Scots in forming the ſiege of Haddington, which was nobly defended by Wilford, whom the lord Grey had made its governor. While they were before the place, they had the good fortune to ſurprize and cut off a party of thirteen hundred men, ſent under ſir Robert Bowes and ſir Thomas Palmer to its relief; but were themſelves forced to raiſe the ſiege at the approach of the earl of Shrewſbury, with twenty-two thouſand men, among whom were three thouſand Germans, hired of the princes of the league. With ſuch a force it would ſeem that the earl had it in his power greatly to diſtreſs the enemy; but, by an infatuation not to be accounted for, after having ſupplied the caſtle with proviſions, he retired abruptly into England, which gave the French ſo much ſpirits, that they made an inroad into England as far as Newcaſtle, and, meeting with no reſiſtance, returned laden with ſpoil. The French general, d'Eſſe, flushed with this ſucceſs, began to behave with ſo much imperiouſneſs towards the Scots, that the queen-dowager wrote over to his court to deſire he might be recalled; but the French miniſtry, though they granted her requeſt in this particular, gave her and the Scots much greater reaſon of complaint, by forcing upon them Mr. Montluc, biſhop of Valence, to be chancellor of Scotland, who was ſent over, under the protection of a new general, Mr. de Thermes.

While the war was thus carrying on in Scotland, the protector was indefatigable in puſhing the progreſs of the reformation. The public offices in the church were reviewed; a new Catechiſm was publiſhed by Cranmer; and a new Liturgy, drawn up after a long conſideration and debate. The protector, to take off as much as poſſible, all oppoſition to theſe proceedings, affected an extraordinary regard for the princeſs Mary, and procured for her a grant from the crown of lands to the amount of three thouſand five hundred pounds a year; but we do not find that all thoſe extraordinary indulgences made any impreſſion on her in favour of the reformation, on the contray, ſhe both ſpoke and wrote publicly againſt the late innovations. All this ſummer the plague raged in London and Weſtminſter, ſo that the court removed, in September, to Hatfield, from which place a proclamation was publiſhed for adjourning the term on the ſame account; and another was ſoon after publiſhed for preventing the exportation of all corn and other victuals, on account of the prevailing ſcarcity.

About this time the emperor, on occaſion of a diſpute between him and the pope, to ſhew his independence, propoſed articles of accommodation to the Proteſtants: theſe were known by the appellation of his Interim, becauſe they were no other than expedients to be uſed until a council ſhould be held in ſome town of Germany. Though the expreſſions were ſoftened, they at bottom contained almoſt all the doctrines of the Romiſh church; yet they allowed that a man's marriage ſhould be no objection to his receiving the order of prieſthood; and that the communion in both kinds ſhould be allowed to thoſe who might demand it in that manner. This interim was preſented in a a diet convoked at Augſburg, and enacted into a decree, notwithſtanding the proteſts of ſeveral towns of the empire. But all this while the emperor behaved with the greateſt complaiſance to Hoby, the Engliſh ambaſſador at his court, in hopes that by their means he might prevail on the Germans to accept his Interim; but, after repeated trials, finding he had nothing to hope for from England, he began to act with great haughtineſs. A tariff had been ſettled in the beginning of Edward's reign, which was to continue during all his minority, with regard to the Engliſh commerce in the Low Countries: this tariff was now broken, higher duties were exacted from the Engliſh than what had been ſtipulated, and they, receiving no redreſs for their complaints tranſmitted over to the council here, withdrew from Antwerp with all their effects.

As the proceedings of the French with regard to Scotland, and other matters, ſince the acceſſion of Edward, had greatly diſguſted the court of England, it was thought that a war between the two nations would ſoon be the conſequence of their mutual reſentments; hereupon the Danes offered their mediation between England and France, a motion which the protector was far from diſcouraging. Several ſteps were taken towards maturating this project, but in the end it proved abortive. Such were the ſtate of affairs at home and abroad, when the parliament met, on the twenty-fourth of November. This parliament diſtinguiſhed itſelf by confirming all the orders of council concerning the reformation in religion; and farther, allowed prieſts to marry, and confirmed the new Liturgy, in compiling which commiſſioners had been employed the preceding ſummer. This is nearly the ſame liturgy which is now uſed in the church of England.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting in parliament, to the no ſmall ſatisfaction of the friends of the Reformation, the protector found himſelf called upon to exert all his power and abilities to counteract the attempts of his enemies, and to ſecure the king's perſon againſt the violent projects of the admiral, his brother, who, finding every other ſtep to the ſupreme power ſufficiently guarded againſt his deſigns, had determined to convey away the perſon of the young king to his houſe at Holt, in Denbighſhire, to diſplace the protector, and ſeize the government into his own hands, with the aſſiſtance of ten thouſand men which he had privately inliſted into his ſervice in divers places.

The council having gotten information of theſe his factious and treaſonable deſigns, iſſued a warrant, on January 19, 1549, for the apprehending Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley, lord high-admiral, and confining him priſoner in the Tower. They next iſſued a joint commiſſion to the earl of Southampton, the lord Ruſſel, and ſecretary Petre, to receive the depoſition of witneſſes againſt him; when, after having proceeded upon the matter, they reported to the council, on the twenty ſecond of February, that the admiral was accuſed "of committing many miſdemeanors in the diſcharge of his office of lord high-admiral; of protecting and taking a ſhare with pirates in their robberies, and of refuſing juſtice to thoſe that demanded it; of having obſtinately perſiſted in his courtſhip with the lady Elizabeth (notwithſtanding the admonitions of the lord-protector and the council), whom he deſigned privately to marry, as he had done the deceaſed queen-dowager; and laſtly (which ſerved to ſtamp his offence the deeper), his having engaged in a confederacy with one Sharrington, who had put the Mint of Briſtol into the admiral's hands, and had ſupplied him, by defrauding the king and kingdom, with vaſt ſums of money, to enable him to carry on his treaſonable purpoſes †."

Matters being carried to this length, the protector made another attempt to bring the admiral to a ſuitable temper, offering to ſtop all proceedings, if he would make a ſubmiſſion and retire from court and all public buſineſs: but nothing could cure his ambition, or moderate the hatred he bore to his brother. This unexpected ſtubbornneſs proved fatal to him; for the examinations being laid before the council, as has been already ſaid, a charge was drawn up againſt the admiral in thirty-three articles, the particulars whereof, (as they are entered in the council-book) were ſo manifeſtly proved by witneſſes, and by letters under his own hand, as not to admit of a denial. The chancellor and ſeveral members of the council went to him the next day, read the charge, and preſſed him for an anſwer thereto, either excuſatory or confeſſional; but he refuſed to make any anſwer, and demanded an open trial, and to be brought face to face before his accuſers: yet, though he was a peer of the realm, lord high-admiral of England, and uncle to the king, this point of juſtice was denied him, and a bill of attainder was ordered into the houſe of lords, which was read on the twenty-fifth and twenty-ſixth of February, and paſſed on the twenty-ſeventh.

This bill being ſent down to the commons, met with ſtrong oppoſition there, on account of paſſing an attainder in the abſence of the condemned party, and it was deſired that the admiral might be brought to the bar, and plead for himſelf: but, on the fourth of March, a meſſage came from the king to the houſe, importing, "that it was not neceſſary for the admiral to appear before them; but that, if the houſe required it, the lords ſhould attend to affirm their evidence*: upon this the bill was read the third time, and paſſed, in the fulleſt houſe known in thoſe days (upwards of four hundred members being preſent, and only ten or twelve voting in the negative); and the royal aſſent being given to the bill, the admiral was beheaded on the twentieth of the ſame month, by warrant from the regency, to which were ſet the hands of Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of his brother the protector. On the ſcaffold his behaviour was very undaunted, and he perſiſted with his dying breath in declaring, that he had never committed, or intended, any treaſon againſt the king or kingdom. Thus fell Thomas Seymour, baron of Sudley, contrary to the moſt eſſential rules of juſtice, without being heard in his own defence. And here let every Briton congratulate himſelf on the invaluable acceſſion our liberties have obtained ſince that period, inaſmuch as the proceeding which was then held legal in the caſe of the greateſt ſubject, would now be deemed infamous in that of the meaneſt felon. We are told by Strype, that indefatigable collector of hiſtorical anecdotes, that the admiral's hatred to his brother was carried even beyond his life, for he left behind him two letters for the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth, calculated to incenſe them againſt the protector, whom he charged with endeavouring to alienate the king's affection from them, and to deprive them of their right of ſucceſſion.

Somerſet, when he ſigned the warrant for cutting off his brother's head, did in effect lay his own down upon the block; for they who had been moſt forward in puſhing the admiral to his fall, were the firſt to charge the protector with his blood. The nobility hated both, but thought it moſt prudent to attack them ſeparately; they received but too good encouragement from the protector's unguarded conduct: he had begun a magnificent palace, ſince called Somerſet-houſe, in the Strand; the aſhes of the dead were diſturbed that its foundations might be laid, and churches robbed of their ſacred ornaments to decorate the riſing pile. Whatever private ſentiments the protector might entertain of thoſe matters, it was certainly impolitic at ſo critical a juncture for him to give ſo fair a handle to his enemies; but he truſted to the popularity he had acquired, and in that to a broken reed, as the ſequel will ſhew.

In the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, the lords paſſed an act, giving licence to every one to incloſe his own grounds, if he pleaſed; but the bill was thrown out by the commons: nevertheleſs the lords and great men went on incloſing their lands. This bred an univerſal diſcontent among the lower people, who imagined that a ſcheme had been formed to ruin them, and reduce them to ſlavery; and their diſcontents now broke out into a ſtorm of civil commotion, ſhort indeed, but violent. The populace firſt took up arms in Wiltſhire and Somerſetſhire; but ſir William Herbert diſperſed them, and cauſed ſome to be hanged. Soon after there were the like inſurrections in Suſſex, Hampſhire, Kent, Gloceſterſhire, Suffolk, Warwickſhire, Eſſex, Hertfordſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, and Worceſterſhire.

The protector, perceiving the flame was kindling all over the kingdom, ſought to prevent the direful conſequences of its ſpreading: pardons upon pardons, and proclamations upon proclamations, were iſſued in favour of the diſcontented, even after they had in many places committed overt-acts of rebeilion. This lenity, inſtead of curing, fed the diſeaſe; the people thought the protector to be on their ſide; that both the king and he were under awe of the great men; and that it was the buſineſs of the commonalty to give liberty to them, and relief to themſelves.

The chief inſurrections were in Devonſhire and Norfolk; in the former the people aſſembled in an armed body of fifteen thouſand ſtout able bodied men, under ſeveral leaders, the chief of whom was Humphrey Arundel, eſq. It was hoped at court, that this might as eaſily be diſperſed as the other riſings; and the protector, being averſe to extremities, ſent the lord Ruſſel, with a ſmall force, to ſtop their proceedings. This nobleman being too weak to encounter them in the field, treated with them at a diſtance, and encouraged them to make known their complaints, offering to ſend the ſame to the council. He hoped by this condeſcenſion to prevent the flames of rebellion from encreaſing to a rage too formidable; but the rebels, who in this county were more united than in other counties, being moſtly papiſts, and the prieſts having gotten in amongſt them, had the inſolence to inſiſt on the following articles, without which they declared they would not lay down their arms. They demanded,

"I. That all the general councils, and the ancient canons of the church, ſhould be obſerved.

"II. That the act of the Six Articles ſhould be again in force.

"III. That the maſs ſhould be in Latin, and the prieſt alone ſhould receive.

"IV. That the ſacrament ſhould be lifted up and worſhipped, and thoſe who ſhould refuſe to do it, ſhould ſuffer as heretics.

"V. That the ſacrament ſhould be only given to the people at Eaſter, in one kind.

"VI. That baptiſm ſhould be adminiſtered at any hour, and at all times.

"VII. That holy bread, holy water, and palms, be again uſed, and images ſet up, with all the other ancient ceremonies.

"VIII. That the new liturgy ſhould be laid aſide; and the old offices, as well as the proceſſions, be reſtored.

"IX. That all preachers, before their ſermons, and prieſts in their maſs, ſhould pray for the ſouls in purgatory.

"X. That the people ſhould be forbid to read the Bible.

"XI. That Dr. Moreman and Mr. Criſpin ſhould be reſtored to their livings.

"XII. That cardinal Pole ſhould be reſtored.

"XIII. That every gentleman might have only one ſervant for every hundred marks of yearly rent belonging to him.

"XIV. That half of the abbey-lands ſhould be taken from poſſeſſors, and adjudged to two of the chief abbeys in every county; and all the church-boxes for ſeven years ſhould be given to the ſaid houſes, that devout perſons might live in them, who ſhould pray for the king and commonwealth.

"XV. That for their particular grievances, they ſhould be redreſſed, as Humphrey Arundel and the mayor of Bodmyn ſhould inform the king and council."

The regency received theſe articles with that indignation they merited; and when the rebels found they were entirely rejected by the council, and ſolidly refuted by archbiſhop Cranmer, they reduced their demands to eight articles; but, as theſe were as intolerable as the former, the court broke off all manner of negociation with the Devonſhire rebels, who, on the ſecond of July, laid ſiege to Exeter, and reduced the citizens, who alone defended it, to ſuch extremities, that they were obliged to live on horſe-fleſh and every kind of vermin. They were chiefly encouraged to the noble defence they made by an aged citizen, who, in the beginning of the ſiege, brought forth all his ſtock of proviſion into the market-place, and openly declared, "that he would feed with one arm and fight with the other, before he would conſent to ſurrender the city to a rebel army." Which declaration ſo animated the proteſtants, that they held out till the lord Grey of Wilton joined the lord Ruſſel with a large body of forces, and giving the rebels battle on the ſixth of Auguſt, put them to a total rout, numbers of whom ſuffered by martial law; and Arundel with ſome of the chiefs were executed at London; while the citizens of Exeter, being relieved, experienced the gratitude of the king by grants of new privileges, and of their country by an univerſal applauſe of that loyalty which they inherited from their anceſtors.

This, and the* other inſurrections above-mentioned, and not yet entirely ſuppreſſed, made it neceſſary for the government to put each county into the beſt poſture of defence human policy and the preſent exigence of affairs required and ſuggeſted; and as the number of the king's forces were unequal to the ſervice they were daily called upon, it was prudently reſolved in a council to conſtitute and appoint lords lieutenants of counties, whoſe commiſſions are dated July 24, and are therein ſtyled the king's juſtices as well as lieutenants. They were, amongſt other very extenſive powers, commiſſioned to ſuppreſs all riots, routs, and rebellions, and to exerciſe martial law. Theſe commiſſions were to be renewed every year*.

The Devonſhire inſurrection was hardly quelled when another broke out in Norfolk, under the direction of of one Ket, a tanner, one Flowerden, a gentleman of fortune, and others. There, incloſures were firſt adopted as the chief grievance, as religion had been in Devonſhire; but when their numbers increaſed to twenty thouſand, nothing would ſerve them but the ſuppreſſion of the gentry, placing new counſellors about the king during his minority, and that ſomething ſhould be done in favour of what they called the old religion. The government rejecting theſe inſolent demands, the inſurgents marched to Norwich, their leader, Ket, aſſuming the title of Maſter and King of Norfolk and Suffolk, forcing all perſons to follow his camp, and loading with irons all ſuch as made any oppoſition to his will. The rebels took poſt at Menſhold-hill, which overlooks the whole city, and which being deſtitute of all fortifications, they entered at pleaſure. Their leader, Ket, affecting great auſterity and regularity of conduct, held a court of judicature under a great oak (called the Tree of Reformation) on the top of the hill, forcing the neighbouring gentry to obey his lawleſs ordinances, and committing a thouſand enormities, under the pretence of redreſſing ſome abuſes.

Suffolk,

The lord-protector ſought to heal up theſe ſores of the commonweal by gentle applications: but the rebels having refuſed, with aggravating inſolence, a pardon that was offered them, the marquis of Northampton, a better courtier than a ſoldier, was ſent againſt them, with about a thouſand Engliſh, and a body of Italian horſe, under Malateſta, an experienced officer; but the marquis advancing, contrary to his orders, to Norwich, he was routed, with the loſs of an hundred men ſlain (among whom was John lord Sheffield, anceſtor of the late duke of Buckingham), and about forty taken priſoners. The king then propoſed to ſend his uncle Somerſet, with a royal army, to put an effectual ſtop to theſe outrages, and, by letters under his royal ſignet, ordered all the gentry of Eſſex to join him, on an appointed day: but whether the duke was afraid of loſing his popularity, or was ſwayed by any other motive, he very impoliticly declined going on the ſervice, and ſuffered the command of ſix thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe to be given to his enemy the earl of Warwick; who marched with great expedition againſt the rebels, came up with them at Duſſingdale, and, after a bloody engagement, put them to flight, killing upwards of two thouſand: their chieftains being taken, Ket was hanged on the walls of Norwich caſtle, his brother William on the top of Windham ſteeple, and nine of his principal followers on as many branches of the oak where Ket had exerciſed his arbitrary judicature.

At the ſame time that the malecontents of Norfolk began to riſe, thoſe of Yorkſhire alſo took arms, but their numbers never exceeded three thouſand. They aſſembled at Semor in the North Riding, and committed ſeveral outrages at firſt; but the victorious Warwick, after ſuppreſſing the Norfolk rebellion, marched againſt, and quickly defeated them. Their ringleaders, Dare and Ambler, being taken, were hanged at York, on the twenty-firſt of September.

But whatever acceſſion of ſtrength accrued to the royal authority within the realm by the cruſhing of theſe rebellions, the raiſing of them was a great diſadvantage to the king's affairs in other countries. It had diverted the forces deſigned for Scotland; and Mr. de Thermes landing there, with freſh ſuccours from France, endeavoured to ſtarve the gallant garriſon of Haddington into a ſurrender. The place, however, was ſupplied, from time to time, during the ſummer, with proviſions, though with great hazard and difficulty; but it being thought impracticable to ſupply it in the winter, the earl of Rutland, lately made warden of the Eaſt Marches, in the room of lord Grey, marched thither with a ſtrong body of forces; and having demoliſhed the fortifications, on the firſt of October brought off the garriſon. De Thermes ſoon after took Broughty caſtle by ſtorm, putting all the defendants to the ſword, except the governor: ſo that nothing was left to the Engliſh of their conqueſts in that country, beſides the caſtles of Lauder, Douglas, Eymouth, and Roxburgh.

Nor were theſe all the ill conſequences of the late commotions. Henry II. of France, encouraged by the inteſtine troubles in England, made an effort to execute his favourite ſcheme of recovering Boulogne to his crown. The court had been for ſome time apprehenſive that he had ſuch a deſign, and had employed ſir William Paget, ambaſſador at the Imperial court, to renew the alliance between the late king and Charles V. and to engage that prince to join in the defence of Boulogne; but Charles being now at peace with France, and not thinking it convenient for his affairs to be involved in a new war with that crown, rejected the propoſal. In the mean time Henry, like a good French politician, entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of an army, took ſeveral caſtles, equipped a powerful fleet, and attempted a deſcent on the iſles of Guernſey and Jerſey; but a ſtout fleet of Engliſh men of war being ſent to ſea, attacked the French near Jerſey, and obliged Leo Strozzi, the French admiral (though an Italian by birth), to retire, with the loſs of a thouſand men ſlain in the action; and Boulogne was defended againſt the whole power of France for a conſiderable time.

But now Somerſet finding himſelf diſappointed in the wiſhed-for alliance with the emperor, began ſeriouſly to think of concluding a peace with France and Scotland: he not only found himſelf unable to ſupport ſuch ruinous and expenſive wars, but he alſo knew that he could not cope with the enemies of the ſtate without money, and had experienced the difficulties and dangers that attend miniſters in demanding and raiſing new ſubſidies; again, he was fully bent to fulfil the great work of reformation, which had been carrying on from the beginning; and in fine, a war gave the enemies of a prime miniſter too great an advantage over him, on account of the ill accidents it may produce; whereas a peace enables him to guard againſt their attacks; and he had received certain information, that the earls of Warwick and Southampton, his mortal enemies, were forming ſchemes deſtructive of his authority. In this ſituation then he reſolved to ſacrifice Boulogne, and to gain Henry to his aſſiſtance: but when he came to propoſe the reſtitution of that place in the council, though he backed his propoſal with the beſt arguments he could, it was rejected by the board with indignation; and ſeeing him unable to continue the war, they reſolved for that very reaſon to thwart his meaſures for an accommodation, and to embrace the firſt favourable opportunity that ſhould offer for depriving him of his dignity.

The preſent diſpoſition of the nation ſeemed to promiſe them great ſucceſs in the execution of their deſigns. The nobility and gentry were highly chagrined at the preference the protector ſeemed to have given the people in the affair of the incloſures, and the commotions conſequent thereupon; and as they imputed all the inſults they had lately received from the multitude, to his dilatory meaſures, and the countenance he had ſhewn the populace, ſo they dreaded a renewal of the ſame diſorders from his preſent affectation of popularity. He had erected a court of requeſts in his own houſe, for the the benefit of the poorer people; and he readily embraced every other meaſure, by which he could promote their ſafety and welfare. But though Somerſet courted, and thought he had acquired (as he moſt certainly deſerved), the affections of the people, the intereſt which he had amongſt them was far from being conſiderable; the popiſh party, which ſtill made a great part of the vulgar illiterate commonalty, were his inveterate enemies, and greedily laid hold of every opportunity to condemn his conduct: the proſecution of his own brother, and the ſigning the warrant for his execution, appeared in the eye of the world ſo unnatural, that they exceedingly hurt his character; and the parade he ſhewed of his wealth in erecting that magnificent palace in the Strand, which ſtill bears his name, and the havock he made of ſacred edifices on that occaſion, gave great offence to all degrees of men. Theſe imprudent and impolitic actions had given Somerſet's enemies but too great advantages, and they were reſolved to make uſe of them as a plauſible pretext for effecting his ruin.

After ſeveral complaints, diſputes, and fruitleſs treaties for an accommodation, the lord St. John, preſident of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five other counſellors, met on Sunday, the ſixth of October, at Ely-houſe, in Holborn, where the earl of Warwick then reſided; and, aſſuming to themſelves the whole power of the council, ſent for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and, after arraigning the protector's conduct in every point for which they had the leaſt pretence, required them to obey no orders but ſuch as ſhould be iſſued by themſelves. The king being informed of this ſeparate meeting of his counſellors, ſent ſecretary Petre to demand the reaſon thereof; but the junto forced him to ſtay with them till they deliberated on the ſtate of the nation; when, after having laid all the troubles and miſcarriages in the affairs of the ſtate to the charge of the protector, they ſent orders to the lieutenant of the Tower and the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, expreſly forbidding them any longer to acknowlege Edward, duke of Somerſet, for protector*.

The protector, upon the news of this proceeding, removed the king to Windſor, and armed ſuch as he could aſſemble at that place and Hampton-court. This ſtep, by giving the diſcontented party an additional and plauſible pretext for complaint, added ſtrength to the council; for the lord-chancellor Rich, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewſbury, ſir Thomas Cheney, ſir John Gage, ſir Ralph Sadler, and the lord chief-juſtice Montagu, pretending to dread the fatal conſequences of ſuch a violence on the perſon of their ſovereign, joined the other counſellors the very next day after their meeting; and they then wrote a moſt dutiful letter to the king, ſetting forth, that they meant not in any wiſe to behave as undutiful or contumacious ſubjects, but that they were diſguſted with the conduct of the duke of Somerſet and his malverſation, particularly for his having gathered an armed force about the royal perſon of their ſovereign, and requeſted that the duke might be ordered to appear and give the council ſatisfaction.

Somerſet, having the perſon of the king in his power, was inclined to ſet all the attempts of the council at defiance, and it was even reported that he ſhould ſay, "the king ſhould die firſt, if they proceeded to extremities againſt him." This ſpirit, however, was but of ſhort duration; for, upon finding that the city and Tower had declared for his enemies, and that even his beſt friends and confederates had abandoned him, he laid aſide all thoughts of reſiſtance, and offered to ſubmit himſelf to the council, on condition they would promiſe to treat him gently; with the hopes of which he was for the preſent indulged: nevertheleſs, on the twelfth of October, he was committed to the Tower, with ſome of his friends and adherents, among whom was Cecil, who afterwards made ſuch a conſiderable figure at the court of Elizabeth. On the fourteenth, the duke was brought before the council, when they read to him his impeachment, which conſiſted of the following articles.

"I. That he had not obſerved the conditions on which he had been made protector.

"II. That he had treated with ambaſſadors, without notifying it to the council; and by his own authority had diſpoſed of governments and biſhoprics.

"III. That he had held a court of requeſts in his own houſe." The intent of this court was to hear poor men's petitions and ſuits; and upon hearing them he either decided their buſineſs, or ſent his letters to the Chancery in their favour: which was reckoned a ſtopping the proceedings of the court, or influencing the judges.

"IV. That he had embaſed the coin.

"V. That he had iſſued out proclamations in the affair of incloſures, againſt the mind of the whole council.

"VI. That he had not taken care to ſuppreſs the late inſurrections, but had even ſupported and encouraged them.

"VII. That he had occaſioned the loſs of the forts in the territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furniſh them with proviſion and ammunition.

"VIII. That he had endeavoured to inſtil into the king a bad opinion of his counſellors, by perſuading him they intended to deſtroy him; and had even ordered ſome perſons to put the king continually in mind of it, leſt he ſhould forget it.

"IX. That he had cauſed the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors.

"X. That he had maliciouſly not only put the king in great fear, by carrying him ſo ſuddenly to Windſor, but caſt him into a dangerous diſeaſe.

"XI. That he had armed himſelf and ſervants, and left the king's ſervants unarmed; and that he intended to fly to Jerſey or Guernſey."

The duke not being prepared with an anſwer, was remanded back to the Tower, and the king was the ſame day carried back to Hampton-court; the marquis of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Southampton, with the lords St. John, Ruſſel, and Wentworth, being appointed governors of his perſon, while the principal adminiſtration of the government was tacitly depoſited in the hands of the earl of Warwick, without any title that might give him a particular authority. In the mean time a revocation was publiſhed, by letters patent, of the authority of the governor of the king's perſon and protector of the realm, granted to the duke of Somerſet: the cauſe of this revocation was expreſſed to be, "becauſe of the ill government, rule, and direction of the king's perſon, whereby it was brought into great danger; the ſubjects, by civil diſſention, much annoyed; the laws ſubverted, and the king's realms brought into peril of utter ruin." But all the arts of the earl of Warwick, and his other enemies, could not bring the wiſer and the well-meaning part of the council to believe the duke guilty of any thing that was intentionally bad againſt the king or the conſtitution: they indeed thought him too obnoxious to the landed intereſt of England, to continue longer at the head of affairs, and therefore willingly engaged in meaſures that were taken for removing him, as well as for excluding him from ever returning to the ſame.

The diſgrace of the protector-duke, and the change in the adminiſtration filled the papiſts with the moſt pleaſing hopes, on the preſumption that the earl of Warwick, whoſe religious principles were thoſe of the popiſh communion, would reſtore the ancient faith and mode of worſhip; but herein they were miſerably miſtaken, for Warwick had no religion but ambition, and, finding the king had imbibed a ſtrong attachment to the proteſtant doctrines, he was reſolved to humour his inclinations, and not to run the riſque of loſing his point (which was to ſucceed Somerſet in his title and power) by any violent meaſures. With this view he publicly declared his intention to promote the reformation; and he threw ſuch diſcouragements on Southampton (who thought, by his intereſt, to have recovered the great-ſeal, and) who was the chief ſupport of the Romaniſts, and regarded by Warwick as a dangerous rival, that he withdrew from court, and ſoon after died of chagrin. Several other changes were alſo made, all tending to ſhew the popiſh party that they were to expect no merit from their being inſtrumental in the downfal of the duke of Somerſet. The earl of Warwick was made lord high-admiral of England, which office had been vacant ever ſince the execution of Seymour, the protector's brother; the lord St. John was created earl of Wiltſhire, and made treaſurer in the room of the duke of Somerſet; Wootton was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of ſecretary Smith; and Bonner, biſhop of London, was committed to the Marſhalſea, for refuſing to comply with the late alterations and amendments made in the rites of the Engliſh church: and an attempt was made to oblige the princeſs Mary to diſmiſs certain prieſts ſhe kept to celebrate maſs in her houſe, and to conform herſelf to the new-eſtabliſhed liturgy; but the princeſs having gotten the emperor to intercede powerfully, that ſhe might be indulged in theſe reſpects, the court who did not chuſe to offend him at this juncture, winked at her conduct, and a ſtop was put to ſome proceedings that had been actually begun againſt her upon this head.

On the fourteenth of November the parliament ſat, agreeable to its prorogation in the beginning of the year. It was the ſame parliament that had been called together by the duke of Somerſet, and which had been ſo pliable to his will. We meet with but few acts of civil import paſſed in this ſeſſion: among the private acts, there was one for reſtoring Mary, daughter of the late lord-admiral Seymour, to her blood; and another for pardoning Sharrington, who had been concerned with that nobleman in ſeveral dangerous and infamous practices.

On the twenty-third of December, the late protector-duke of Somerſet was brought to ſubſcribe the articles againſt himſelf, and to petition the lords for their interceſſion for the king's pardon to himſelf and family: this being read in the houſe of lords, it was looked upon as ſo abject a ſtep, that they could not help ſuſpecting it had been extorted from him, and therefore four temporal lords and as many biſhops were deputed to know the truth from the duke's own mouth, who reported from him, that he had voluntarily ſigned the confeſſion. Upon this a bill was brought into parliament againſt him, upon the articles above-recited, and his ſigned confeſſion was urged as a proof of the charge: the bill went through the houſe; the duke was turned out of all his places, he was ſtripped of all his goods, and fined in two thouſand pounds a year in lands. That we may finiſh the period of this great man's fall, we ſhall obſerve, that, on the ſixth of February following, he was ſet at liberty from the Tower, but confined to live within four miles of his own houſe at Sion; nor was he to come to court or council, without being ſummoned: and for the performance of all this, he was obliged to give bond for ten thouſand pounds; after which he received the king's full pardon for all treaſons, offences, miſdemeanors, &c.

After this the parliament, which was truly proteſtant, to ſtem the current that was likely to run through the nation in favour of popery, upon the diſgrace of the duke of Somerſet, thought proper to take ſuch meaſures as might guard the infant church from any attacks: thus we find they confirmed the new Liturgy; ordered all the prayers to ſaints to be ſtruck out of the primers publiſhed by the late king, and all miſſals, breviaries, &c. to be delivered up to ſuch perſons as ſhould be appointed for that purpoſe; and commanded that they who had preſerved any images taken out of churches, ſhould burn or deface them by a day fixed: they then granted the king a ſubſidy, after which they were prorogued, on the firſt of February. It was during this ſeſſion that the eldeſt ſons of peers were firſt permitted to ſit in the houſe of commons, in the perſon of ſir Francis Ruſſel, who, by the death of his brother, becoming heir-apparent to the lord Ruſſel, it was carried, after a debate, that he ſhould abide in the houſe as he was before: ſo it is entered in the original journal of the houſe of commons, which is the firſt journal that was ever taken in that houſe *.

On the ſecond of February, 1550, the day after the riſing of the parliament, William Parr, marquis of Northampton, was made lord high-chamberlain of England; the lord Wentworth, lord-chamberlain of the houſhold; ſir Thomas Dacre, vice-chamberlain and captain of the king's guard; and ſir Anthony Wingfield, comptroller †.

The beginning of the year 1550 was taken up in negociations for a peace between France and England; for, notwithſtanding the violent clamours which Warwick and his party had raiſed againſt the adminiſtration of Somerſet, they found themſelves obliged, now that they were inveſted with the ſupreme authority, to purſue the ſame, or rather worſe meaſures than that nobleman had adopted; but as Warwick had particularly ſignalized himſelf againſt the propoſal for giving up Boulogne, he was forced to contrive to have it delivered up in ſuch a manner, that it might appear to be the act of the council, without himſelf being liable to the imputations he had ſo laviſhly caſt upon another on the ſame occaſion. For this end he employed one Guidotti, an Italian merchant of Southampton, to engage the French miniſtry to propoſe a treaty, upon aſſurances that they might obtain Boulogne, upon which their king had ſo much ſet his heart.

The artful Italian performed his commiſſion ſo well, that he prevailed on the French court to offer to make peace upon equitable terms, and to give a ſum of money in conſideration of the redelivery of Boulogne; which propoſal being laid before the Engliſh council, then entirely under the influence of Warwick, it was reſolved to ſend plenipotentiaries to treat with thoſe of France, at a certain place in Picardy. Monſieur de la Rochepot, of the houſe of Montmorency, Gaſpar de Coligny, afterwards the famous admiral de Coligny, and two more, were appointed by France; and the court of England made choice of Paget, lately created baron of Beaudeſert, the lord Ruſſel, ſecretary Petre, and ſir John Maſon: and in ſuch a hurry were the new miniſtry to have a peace at any rate, that by the end of February the treaty was concluded, the Engliſh being obliged to give up many of their ſtrongeſt demands. The terms of the treaty were as follow.

"I. All claims of either party to ſtand as they were. That the acts of private perſons, if not unpuniſhed by the maſters, ſhould not affect the peace: that there ſhould be on both ſides a general releaſe of priſoners, and commerce between the two crowns reſtored, and all ſhips of war to be recalled on either ſide.

"II. Boulogne, with the new conqueſts, to be reſtored to the French, with all the ordnance in it, which had belonged to the French, and that within ſix months.

"III. The French to pay four hundred thouſand crowns, each crown ſix ſhillings and eight pence (or one hundred and thirty-three thouſand three hundred and thirty three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight pence ſterling), for the charges and expence the Engliſh had been at upon the place; one half upon the delivery, the other ſix months after; and either ſide to give ſix hoſtages for due performance.

"IV. That the forts of Douglas and Lauder, built by the Engliſh, with all the cannon, &c. be delivered to the Scots, except the cannon that was brought from Haddington: but if theſe two forts be not in the hands of the Engliſh in the event, the king of England ſhall be obliged to demoliſh the towns and caſtle of Roxburgh and Eymouth; nor ſhall it be lawful for the Engliſh, French, or Scots to rebuild them.

"V. Though the king of England ſhall reſtore Douglas and Lauder, yet he ſhall demoliſh Roxburgh and Eymouth, provided the queen of Scotland do the ſame with the caſtles of Douglas and Lauder; in which caſe it ſhall not be lawful for the ſovereigns of France, Scotland, or England, nor their ſucceſſors, ever to rebuild Roxburgh or Eymouth.

"VI. The kingdom of Scotland ſhall be comprehended in this peace; and the Engliſh muſt not invade Scotland without a new and juſt offence given; and the queen of Scotland is obliged, within forty days after the date of this treaty, to certify to the king of England, under her great ſeal, that ſhe accepts the ſaid comprehenſion."

Thus, ſays Mr. de Rapin, all the pains taken by Henry VIII. to ſecure a penſion, or rather a tribute, in lieu of the title he pretended to have to the crown of France, were rendered fruitleſs by this treaty, which contained in favour of England only one indeterminate reſervation of the claim, which had occaſioned the effuſion of much blood ſince the reign of Edward III. There remains to the kings of England only the empty title of king of France; none of Edward VI's ſucceſſors having ever ſeriouſly thought of proſecuting their pretended right. This treaty, ſigned on the twenty-fourth of March, was duly executed by the contracting parties; and Boulogne being delivered on the twenty-fifth of April, lord Clinton, the governor, was made high-admiral, the arrears of the garriſon were paid, the foreign ſoldiers diſmiſſed, and the Engliſh well rewarded for their gallant defence: Guidotti had a preſent of a thouſand crowns, with a penſion of the ſame value for life to himſelf, and two hundred and fifty to his ſon, for the pains he had taken in accompliſhing the treaty. It doth not appear whether mention was made therein of a match between Edward and the French king's eldeſt daughter Elizabeth, which Henry offered the Engliſh monarch as a ſort of amends for diſappointing him of the queen of Scotland; but it became next year a ſerious affair. It ſeems, that when the treaty was brought to London to be ratified, the earl of Warwick feigned ſickneſs, not to be obliged to ſign a peace he had ſo much exclaimed againſt; but this was only to impoſe on the public, ſince it is notorious that he ſigned all the orders and inſtructions, in in virtue whereof the plenipotentiaries had concluded it.

Great were the rejoicings ordered by the government for the celebration of this peace, but the nation in general was far for being pleaſed with it; the reſtitution of Boulogne, the propoſal of which had been made ſuch a fault in the duke of Somerſet, opened the eyes of the people, who began to be ſenſible that the king's glory and the good of the ſtate are but too often made uſe of by thoſe at the helm to cover their own private ſchemes, without any regard to the public welfare. The murmurs on this occaſion ſoon reached the ears of the attentive and politic Warwick, who, to divert any bad conſequences that the public reſentment might bring againſt the adminiſtration, undertook the popular office of enquiring into certain miſdemeanors of thoſe who had been entruſted with the management of the public money, many of whom he brought to a ſevere account. He alſo thought it neceſſary to make all the friends and well-wiſhers of the duke of Somerſet eaſy, rather than to provoke them; the lord Ruſſel was made earl of Bedford; Cecil had a promiſe to be made ſecretary of ſtate; the duke of Somerſet had hopes given him of being reſtored to his ſeat in the council; and, as a mark of ſincere reconciliation, Warwick's ſon, the lord Liſle, was contracted to a daughter of the duke's, and ſeveral of that nobleman's friends, who had been impriſoned on his account, were diſcharged upon their own recognizances. All the church-preferments at this time went likewiſe in the channel of the reformation, as we ſhall have occaſion to obſerve elſewhere.

This year the famous Polydore Virgil, an Italian, who had been now forty years in England, had leave to go and ſpend the reſidue of his days in his own country, the king at the ſame time permitting him to enjoy his preferments here (viz. the archdeaconry of Wells and a prebend of Hereford), in conſideration of his having employed the beſt part of his life in writing an hiſtory of England.

This year likewiſe the city of London purchaſed of the king all the liberties of the borough of Southwark, for the ſum of one thouſand marks.

Little more remains of a domeſtic nature, deſerving the notice of this part of our hiſtory for the year 1550: however, before we proceed to the next, it will not be improper to mention what had paſſed in foreign countries, connected with this kingdom.

Paul III. dying on the thirteenth of November, 1549, the cardinals, who entered the conclave the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, agreed in a few days to raiſe cardinal Pole to the papal throne, and even came in the night to his chamber to adore him, according to cuſtom; but he deſired them to defer the ceremony till it was day, telling them it ought not to be a work of darkneſs. This ſcruple, unheard of till then, ſeemed to them ſo extraordinary, that ſome imputed it to ſtupidity; others were afraid, if Pole was pope, he would reform the court of Rome, and the college of cardinals in particular; however this might be, from that moment they thought of electing another pope. After which, being divided into three factions, they could not agree upon the perſon till the February following, when they choſe the cardinal de Monte, who took the name of Julius III. He gave a ſtrange omen of what advancements he intended to make, when he gave his own hat (according to the cuſtom of the popes, who beſtow their hats before they go out of the conclave) on a mean ſervant of his, who had the charge of his money; and being aſked, what he ſaw in him to make him a cardinal? He anſwered, as much as the cardinals had ſeen in him, to make him pope. But it was commonly ſaid, that the ſecret of this promotion was an unnatural affection to him*.

In Germany, the emperor, having opened the diet of the empire about the end of July, would have obliged all the proteſtants to ſubmit to the determinations of the council, now removed back to Trent. Maurice, elector of Saxony, ſtrongly oppoſed it, but with ſo much caution and regard to the emperor, that he did not loſe his favour; on the contrary, the emperor agreed that the diet ſhould declare him general of the army of the empire, to end the war by the ſiege of Magdeburg, the only proteſtant town which yet held out. Maurice had great deſigns which the emperor knew not, till it was too late to hinder the execution.

Scotland enjoyed great tranquility after the concluſion of the peace. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, in Scotland, and duke of Chatelereault, in France, ſtill governed the kingdom as regent; but he was himſelf governed by the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, his natural brother, a man of a very lewd and infamous life. Let us return now to England, and ſee what paſſed during the year 1551.

As ſoon as the king found himſelf diſembarraſſed from the war in Scotland, by that kingdom being included in the late peace with France, and that all foreign alarms were at an end, he followed the dictates of archbiſhop Cranmer, to promote the great work of reformation; and as the earl of Warwick was determined to preſerve the king's favour, he appeared very forward in aſſiſting therein. On the twenty-eighth of January a commiſſion paſſed, for certain biſhops, laity, and clergy, to enquire after, repreſs, and extirpate the errors of the anabaptiſts, libertines, and heretics. On the thirteenth of February, Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, and Bonner, biſhop of London, were deprived of their ſees for attempting to obſtruct the reformation; as were likewiſe Day, biſhop of Chicheſter, Heath, biſhop of Worceſter, and Veſſey, biſhop of Exeter; who, though they had ever complied with the new doctrine in ſome particulars, were yet unwilling to embrace it in its full extent, and were known to have a ſtrong attachment to the old ſuperſtition, and had even done their utmoſt to reſtore it. By theſe ſevere, but neceſſary, proceedings, the whole nation was ſoon brought to an uniformity of worſhip.

The princeſs Mary alone continued to adhere to the maſs, and to reject the new liturgy: ſeveral attempts were made, both by the king and council, to perſuade her to embrace the principles of the reformation, but to no purpoſe, ſhe perſiſting in her declaration of abiding by the religion of her forefathers. This ſubjected her to ſeveral mortifications, and ſhe was at length ſo apprehenſive of the effects of her brother's diſpleaſure, that ſhe actually reſolved to quit the kingdom, and had even concerted a ſcheme for that purpoſe with the governante of the Low Countries; but her deſign was diſcovered, and meaſures taken to prevent its execution. Her obſtinacy greatly incenſed the king, who had conceived an inveterate averſion to the errors of popery, and, in all probability, gave occaſion to the earl of Warwick's ſcheme to exclude her from the ſucceſſion, by ſetting up the lady Jane Grey upon the Engliſh throne at the demiſe of Edward, as will be more particularly related hereafter.

In April this year, the kingdom was viſited with the ſweating ſickneſs. It firſt began at Shrewſbury, and ſpread towards the North, continuing till the month of October. Whoever was ſeized with it, died or recovered within ten hours: if the patient took cold, death enſued in leſs than three; if he ſlept, he expired raving mad within ſix: and this peſtilence raged chiefly amongſt young men of robuſt conſtitutions: and as it did not affect foreigners in England, ſo it ſpread amongſt the Engliſh alone reſiding in foreign countries. This ſickneſs carried off ſeveral of the nobility alſo, amongſt whom was the duke of Suffolk, ſon of Charles Brandon by his ſecond wife; as alſo, four days after him, his brother, who had ſucceeded him, by which means the title of Suffolk became extinct in the family of Brandon, which was next in ſucceſſion to the crown, after the two daughters of Henry VIII. The earl of Warwick, who had already formed a deſign upon the crown in favour of his own family, cauſed Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet to be created duke of Suffolk, and himſelf duke of Northumberland, a title then alſo extinct by the death of Henry Piercy, the laſt earl of Northumberland: and he promoted his intimate friends, William Pawlet, lord St. John and earl of Wiltſhire, lord high-treaſurer, to the dignity of marquis of Wincheſter, and ſir William Herbert was created earl of Pembroke: at the ſame time William Cecil was made ſecretary of ſtate, and knighted; and ſir Robert Dudley, one of the duke of Northumberland's ſons (the ſame who was afterwards the great earl of Leiceſter), was ſworn one of the ſix ordinary gentlemen of the king's chamber, which perhaps (ſays ſir Richard Baker, in his Chronicle) had better never been, for after his coming into a place ſo near about him, the king enjoyed his health but a ſhort time: and indeed, by Warwick's forming his projects for the advancement of his family ſo early, it looked as if he knew that the king had not long to live.

Soon after theſe promotions, the marquis of Northampton, the biſhop of Ely, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction, to the number of twenty-ſix, were ſent in embaſſy to the court of France, to carry over to Henry the order of the Garter, and to deſire, in Edward's name, that commiſſioners might be appointed, on the part of France, to treat of ſome matters of high importance which they had in charge: hereupon the cardinal of Lorraine, the duke of Guiſe, and admiral Chatillon, were appointed to confer with the Engliſh ambaſſadors, who opened the conference by demanding that the young queen of Scots might be ſent over to England, in order to perfect the marriage between king Edward and her; but to this the French anſwered, that this could not be, it having been long ſince determined that the young queen ſhould eſpouſe the dauphin of France. Then the Engliſh propoſed a marriage between Edward and the lady Elizabeth, the French king's eldeſt daughter, which propoſal was very cordially received by the French commiſſioners; but when they came to treat of the portion to be given with the lady, the Engliſh demanded at firſt a million and half of crowns, then fell to fourteen, and at laſt to eight hundred thouſand. The French, on their part offered at firſt one hundred thouſand crowns, then roſe to two hundred thouſand, and higher they would not go, alleging it was more than had been given with a daughter of France. Upon this the conferences were broke up: however, Henry returned his brother of England's compliment, by ſending the marſhal de Montmorency, at the head of a ſplendid embaſſy, with the order of St. Michael to Edward. After this the affair of the marriage was again reſumed, the two hundred thouſand crowns were at laſt accepted, and the treaty of alliance and marriage actually ſigned at Angers; but the death of Edward happening before the princeſs Elizabeth was of age, prevented the conſummation of their nuptials.

During theſe tranſactions, the queen dowager, who had been on a viſit to her daughter and her own relations at the court of France, took England in her way back to Scotland, having obtained a ſafe-conduct from Edward, and landing at Portſmouth, was there met by ſeveral of the Engliſh nobility, who conducted her to London, where ſhe took up her lodgings in the biſhop's palace: after a ſtay of near a week, during which time ſhe was magnificently entertained by Edward at Whitehall, ſhe departed, being attended by the ſheriffs of all the counties, till ſhe arrived on the borders of Scotland. One Stuart, a Scotchman, being apprehended in England about the latter end of the ſummer, on a charge for intending to poiſon the young queen of Scots, was impriſoned, and afterwards ſent over to France, to be there dealt with according to juſtice. This ſummer likewiſe a treaty was ſet on foot for the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth, the king's youngeſt ſiſter, with the king of Denmark's eldeſt ſon; but the negociation was rendered fruitleſs by the lady's poſitively declaring ſhe would not entertain thoughts of marriage with any one.

Very many excellent regulations were, in the courſe of this ſummer, ſet on foot for the furtherance of commerce, the meliorating the coin, and other purpoſes of national import: but all theſe uſeful ſchemes were likely to be interrupted, if not entirely defeated, by the civil commotions ariſing from the unbounded ambition of the earl of Warwick, now duke of Northumberland, who conſidered all increaſe of titles or poſſeſſions, either to himſelf or his adherents, only as ſteps to farther acquiſitions; and finding that the duke of Somerſet, though deprived of his dignity, and even leſſened in the public opinion by his late puſillanimous conduct, ſtill poſſeſſed a conſiderable degree of popularity, he reſolved to ruin a man whom he regarded as the chief obſtacle to the accompliſhment of his towering projects.

The alliance which had been ſo lately concluded between their families, had not been productive of any cordial union, and only afforded Northumberland the means of effecting with more eaſe the deſtruction of his rival. He began his infamous deſign by alienating the affections of the young king from his uncle, whom he repreſented as a moſt dangerous ſubject: he cauſed a report to be ſpread abroad, that the duke of Somerſet had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king in ſeveral counties, and that he was endeavouring to raiſe an armed force in order to poſſeſs himſelf of the king's perſon. His doors were watched, and notice given of all that went in or out; new inſults were every day offered him, in order to drive him into action. Thus beſet, the unwary Somerſet often let fall ſome menacing expreſſions againſt Northumberland; ſometimes he formed the raſh deſign of waſhing out the indignities offered him in the blood of his perſecutor; and at others reſolved to wait with patience till the king, being of age, ſhould be able to do him juſtice.

In the mean time his treacherous confidents, who had been placed as ſpies about him by Northumberland, informed his enemy of every paſſionate word which he uttered; they diſcovered the projects which they themſelves had ſuggeſted to him: and all this being made known to the king, who too readily believed the infamous tale, he abandoned his unfortunate uncle, and agreed to a motion which Northumberland made, to have him put under arreſt.

Accordingly, on the ſeventeenth of October, at night, the duke of Somerſet, the lord Grey, David and John Seymour, Hammond and Newdigate, two of the duke's ſervants, ſir Ralph Vane, and ſir Thomas Palmer, were apprehended and committed to priſon: next day the ducheſs of Somerſet, with her favourites, Crane and his wife, ſir Miles Partridge, ſir Michael Stanhope, Banniſter, and others, were taken into cuſtody. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had all along acted the part of a ſpy upon the unfortunate duke, charged him, upon oath, with a deſign "to excite a rebellion in the North; to attack the horſe-guards on a muſter-day; to take poſſeſſion of the Tower; and to raiſe an inſurrection in London." But the accuſation which ſeemed to be beſt founded was, that Somerſet had formed a project to murder the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, at an entertainment which was to be made for them at lord Paget's. Crane and his wife corroborated Palmer's evidence with regard to this laſt deſign; and it appears that ſome raſh ſcheme of that nature had been propoſed, though no regular plot had been formed, nor any meaſures taken for its execution; and Hammond acknowleged that the duke had armed men to guard him one night in his houſe at Greenwich.

and

Upon theſe depoſitions, the duke was brought to his trial before his peers in Weſtminſter-hall, on the firſt day of December. He pleaded, "Not guilty," and deſired he might be confronted with his accuſers: but the meaſure he had given to his own brother was now returned into his breaſt; he was denied this reaſonable requeſt, and the court proceeded to trial, when the duke was acquitted of treaſon, but condemned to death for felony, on a ſtatute paſſed in the reign of Henry VII. declaring it felony for any perſon to harbour the thought of killing a privy-counſellor. And here we muſt obſerve, that among the peers who conſtituted his jury were Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, whom decency as well as juſtice ſhould have reſtrained from ſitting as judges on the trial of a man, againſt whom they had declared an open enmity: add to this, that the marquis of Wincheſter, another of his ſevere enemies, was appointed high ſteward on the occaſion.

After the court had paſſed ſentence, the duke fell on his knees, thanked them for the fair and open trial they had given him, and aſked pardon of the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, &c. for the enmity he bore them; but plainly declared that he never intended the leaſt act of rebellion againſt the crown or perſon of the king his nephew. The people, who ſincerely loved the duke of Somerſet, hearing the firſt part of his ſentence, by which he was declared "Not guilty of the treaſon," and ſeeing the axe thereupon turned from him, (becauſe he was condemned to be hanged), imagined he had been entirely acquitted, and manifeſted their joy by repeated ſhouts and acclamations, which was ſoon converted into ſorrow when they were fully informed of his doom.

We are now to attend the duke of Somerſet from the priſon to the block. From the time that he received ſentence his behaviour was calm, reſigned, and unaffected: he employed himſelf in reading and compoſing exerciſes of devotion. He made decent applications to the king for favour to his wife and family; and on the twenty-ſecond of January, 1552, he was brought to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, where he was to ſuffer. He was attended by Dr. Cox; and, after performing ſome devotions, he addreſſed himſelf in a ſpeech to the people, in which he declared his innocence towards the king, and his fidelity towards his country, both in words and deeds: he ſubmitted to his ſentence becauſe it was awarded by the law: he profeſſed his zeal and affection for the proteſtant religion, and a great ſatisfaction in what he had done to promote it.

When he had proceeded thus far in his ſpeech, a kind of panic all at once ſeized the people. Great precautions had been taken by the council for keeping the citizens of London within doors, until the execution ſhould be over; and its hour, which was ſeven in the morning, was ſo carefully kept a ſecret, that ſome of the inhabitants of the Tower Hamlets were not ſufficiently apprized of it, though it was their turn of duty to have aſſiſted in guarding the ſcaffold at the time of execution: when they heard that the duke was brought out, they came in great confuſion towards Tower-hill; and in preſſing through a poſtern-gate, through which they were to paſs, the confuſion increaſed ſo much, that the ſpectators at the execution were ſeized with a ſudden panic, as thinking ſome dreadful event to be at hand. Upon this every man began to ſhift for himſelf, and in the hurry ſeveral fell into Tower-ditch, and ſome were hurt otherwiſe. During the conſternation, which was increaſed by ſtill ſeeing the people running up to the ſcaffold, with arms in their hands, ſir Anthony Brown came up on horſeback, through curioſity probably; but the few who remained about the ſcaffold imagined he brought a pardon, and the air was filled with a general cry of "God ſave the king!" By this time the tumult ſomewhat abated, the guards took their poſts, and the people recovered from their fright: Brown declared he brought no pardon, and a mournful ſilence enſued. The duke, who well knew that his fate was determined, remained all this time unmoved upon the ſcaffold; but by his actions endeavoured to appeaſe the tumult, and then proceeded in his ſpeech.

He profeſſed all kind of regard for the perſon of the king; he exhorted the people to obedience, both to him and the council; he begged they would compoſe themſelves until he had received the penalty of the law; he declared that he died in peace with all mankind; he aſked pardon of all whom he had offended; and beſought the prayers of all preſent.

Having finiſhed his ſpeech, he adjuſted himſelf with the utmoſt calmneſs to the block, on which he received the blow which finiſhed his life.

Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old ſoldier, and ſir Miles Partridge, were hanged; and ſir Michael Stanhope with ſir Thomas Arundel beheaded, as the duke's confederates: they all died as Chriſtians, but denying to the laſt the crimes for which they were ſuffered. Arundel, Stanhope, and Partridge, ſeem to have died proteſtants, for there is an order in the council-book, dated the eleventh of February, for allowing them three proteſtant divines to attend them in their laſt moments. The lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Somerſet, and known to be in the intereſt of the duke, was, on ſome frivolous pretence, tried in the Star Chamber, and condemned in a fine of ſix thouſand pounds, with the loſs of his office: to render his puniſhment the more ſevere, he was degraded from the order of the Garter, being deemed unworthy to enjoy that honour, on account of the meanneſs of his birth. Lord Rich, chancellor of the kingdom, was alſo deprived of his office, for having ſent a letter to Somerſet, warning him of the deſigns of the council: and it is remarkable that this lord, though a peer, and one of the higheſt officers of the ſtate, was not ſummoned to ſit upon the trial. The ſeals were given to Goodrich, biſhop of Ely, with the title of lord-keeper.

The day after the execution of Somerſet (January 23), the king convoked a parliament, in which ſeveral laws were enacted, as well of a civil as of a religious nature. A bill was brought in and paſſed, for authorizing a new Common Prayer Book, according to the alterations which had been agreed upon laſt year. Another act was made for the people's more regularly frequenting divine ſervice. Another bill paſſed, concerning treaſon; and to this bill the commons annexed a clauſe, which was of infinitely more conſequence than the bill itſelf, viz. "That none ſhould be attainted of treaſon on this act, unleſs two witneſſes ſhould come and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except ſuch as ſhould make a voluntary confeſſion; and that none ſhould be queſtioned (i. e. ſued) for any thing ſaid or written (againſt the king or government) but within three months after it was done*." This equitable and conſtitutional bill was ſtrongly oppoſed by all Northumberland's faction, as it carried on the face of it a direct condemnation of their late proceedings in the caſe of the unhappy duke of Somerſet: but, notwithſtanding all their arts, the bill paſſed both houſes, and has remained ever ſince one of the chief bulwarks of Engliſh liberty.

In this parliament the caſe of Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, made a great noiſe: he was one of the moſt eminent prelates of the age, as well on account of his learning and abilities, as of the unblemiſhed integrity of his life and manners. Though he had oppoſed, by his vote and influence, all the late innovations in religion, yet they were no ſooner paſſed into laws than he had always ſubmitted, and conformed himſelf to every ſyſtem of doctrine which was eſtabliſhed by authority: but not all his obedient and tractable conduct, or the unimpeached rectitude of his life and morals, could ſecure him againſt the rapacious Northumberland, who, having fixed his eyes on the rich revenues of the ſee of Durham, determined to get it into his hands, and to erect to himſelf a principality in the northern counties. To effect this ſcheme it was neceſſary to deprive Tonſtal of his ſee.

With this view he cauſed a bill to be brought into the houſe of lords, charging that prelate with miſpriſion of treaſon, in having neglected to give information of a deſign for raiſing a rebellion in the North, in the year 1548, which had been communicated to him. Northumberland had intereſt enough to carry the bill through two readings in the houſe of peers; but when it was ſent down to the commons, they inſiſted that witneſſes ſhould be examined; that the biſhop ſhould be confronted with his accuſers, and be permitted to ſpeak in his own defence: and that not being complied with, the bill was dropped. Nor was this the only mortification Northumberland met with from this parliament; for a bill ratifying the attainder of the duke of Somerſet and his confederates was likewiſe thrown out by the commons, though it had paſſed the upper houſe: the miniſter therefore determined to part with this parliament, and get one to his mind; accordingly it was diſſolved on the fifteenth of April, after having ſat near four years. Juſt before the breaking up of the ſeſſion, Northumberland procured the vacant Garter, which had been Paget's, for his own ſon, the earl of Warwick.

The affairs of Scotland underwent ſome alterations this year: the queen-dowager, on her return home from France, perſuaded Hamilton, earl of Arran, to reſign the regency, agreeable to the deſire of Henry II. and his miniſters, who, to lure him into a compliance, granted him a patent, by which he was created duke of Chatelerault in France, with a penſion to ſupport that dignity: and the earl, ſenſible that he could not hold his office againſt their will, acquieſced in the propoſal, notwithſtanding all the remonſtrances of his brother, the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, againſt his reſigning his dignity. The prelate then entered into a powerful league againſt the queen-regent; but ſhe having had the addreſs to promiſe the reformed a free exerciſe of their religion in their own houſes, found herſelf ſo ſtrengthened by their aſſiſtance, that ſhe eſtabliſhed herſelf in the government, in ſpite of the archbiſhop's attempts.

The revolution in the affairs of Germany, in the courſe of this year, was much more conſiderable. The emperor's detaining the landgrave of Heſſe in priſon, contrary to his word of honour given to Maurice, duke of Saxony, and the marquis John of Brandenburgh, had extremely irritated thoſe two princes; and neither they nor the other potentates and ſtates of the empire could ſee with patience the liberties of Germany invaded, and the freedom of religion deſtroyed. There was no way of procuring redreſs of theſe grievances, but by force; and making a league with the king of France, they reſolved to take this method, and made preparations for war with all poſſible ſecrecy. The emperor had entertained ſome ſuſpicions of Maurice's deſigns, but was outdone by him in his own talent of diſſimulation; this prince's apparent frankneſs, and the artful management of one of his chief counſellors, whom he knew to be in the emperor's pay, ſerving to diſpel all his jealouſy. Thus were matters carried on for ſome months, till Maurice and the marquis of Brandenburgh, having on a ſudden aſſembled their forces, came, on the firſt of April before Augſburg, and in two days time made themſelves maſters of that city. Then the confederates, ſeizing the paſſes of the Alps, to ſtop the march of foreign troops into Germany, forced the paſs de l'Ecluſe; and their way thus being opened into Tirol, they advanced with ſo much diligence thither, that the emperor, who, in order to be near the council, had reſided there for ſome months paſt, had only a few hours time to fly thence with his court into the mountains of Trente, and, after wandering there all night, got to Viſtach, a town of Carinthia, on the borders of the Venetian territories.

He was ſtill averſe to an accommodation, in which his brother Ferdinand acted as mediator; but the king of France having at the ſame time advanced into Lorraine, with a ſtrong army, and declaring that his only deſign was to aſſert the liberties of Germany, which the emperor meant to enſlave, found admittance into the cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and advanced as far as Straſburgh. Charles V. ſeeing no remedy, was obliged to enter into a treaty. The confederates hereupon put a ſtop to the king of France's farther advance into the empire: but this prince, though he complied with their requeſt, yet, not caring to loſe ſo fine an opportunity for conqueſt, fell with an army into the county of Luxemburg, took Damvillers and Stenay, and inveſted Iſoy. This progreſs of the French determined the emperor to ſubmit to the neceſſity of his affairs, and conſent to the famous pacification made at Paſſau, in the beginning of Auguſt. The chief conditions were, "That a diet ſhould be aſſembled in ſix months, to conſider the moſt eaſy and proper means for appeaſing all diſputes about religion, for which an equal number of pious, prudent, and pacific perſons on both ſides ſhould be choſen: that, in the mean time the emperor, nor any other perſon, ſhould force the conſcience, or put a conſtraint upon the will, of any body, in point of religion; nor, by any act of violence, or under pretence of inſtruction, do any thing to the prejudice or ſlight of any perſon whatſoever on the ſubject; but ſuffer all the world to live in peace and tranquility: that the princes of the Augſburg Confeſſion ſhould not moleſt the Romiſh eccleſiaſtics or ſeculars, but let them enjoy their eſtates and revenues, and exerciſe their juriſdictions and ceremonies: that the Imperial chamber ſhould do juſtice to all, without regarding their religion; and the proteſtants, having in it the number of ſeats belonging to them, ſhould, as well as the parties who had ſuits in the court, be at liberty to ſwear by "God and the ſaints," or by "God and the goſpels," at their option: and, in fine, that if they could come to no agreement in articles of religion, this agreement ſhould ſtill continue for ever in its full force and vigour." Thus was the Interim, which had been executed only in very few places, entirely annulled; the landgrave of Heſſe was ſet at liberty, as John Frederick, the deprived elector of Saxony, had been a little before; and all differences with the emperor in Germany were terminated.

This prince had ſtill a war on his hands with France, and applied to the court of England, purſuant to his treaty with Henry VIII. A. D. 1542, for a ſuccour of five thouſand foot, or ſeven hundred crowns a day for four months, and for a declaration of war againſt France, within a month after making the requeſt, according to the articles of that treaty, in caſe the Low Countries, in which Luxemburgh was deemed a province, was invaded. It was not proper for a king, during his minority, to be involved in an expenſive war, or to break with the crown of France after an amity ſo lately contracted and ſworn on both ſides; and the Imperial miniſter was told, "That Edward was not bound by his father's treaty againſt the intereſt of the realm; that the emperor, being preſſed to a new treaty, had declined the overture; that he had not performed the articles of that in queſtion, ſtopping the horſes, arms, and ammunition which the king had provided in the Low Countries for his late war with France; and not ſending him ſuccours againſt the French ravages about Calais, ſo that Edward was under no obligation to comply with his demands, though he was willing to aſſiſt him againſt the Turks, and ready to uſe his good offices for a peace with France, in quality of a mediator." Of all the powers in Europe, the king had certainly the moſt reaſon to be jealous of the emperor, whoſe projects for getting the princeſs Mary out of England were not calculated for his advantage, or for furthering his deſigns of a reformation in his dominions, for the better carrying on of which it was very convenient that he ſhould have no diſputes with any of his neighbours; and accordingly thoſe debatable lands on the borders of Scotland, were ſettled on the twenty-fourth of September, by the lords Wharton and Conyers, ſir Thomas Wharton, and ſir Thomas Chaloner, in conjunction with the Scottiſh commiſſioners.

Thus, at peace with all the world, he was not diverted from attending to the work he had moſt at heart, and cauſed the Common Prayer to be tranſlated into the French language, for the uſe of the inhabitants of the iſles of Jerſey and Guernſey. It was probably not ſo eaſy to find proper perſons capable of tranſlating it either into the Welſh or Iriſh languages, ſo that it did not appear in the former till the fifth of queen Elizabeth; and if it hath not been tranſlated ſince into the latter language, it had been chiefly owing to the power which the Romiſh prieſts had over the ignorant, and conſequently bigotted, people, for whoſe uſe it muſt have been intended, who would never ſuffer a book to remain in their hands, ſo uſeful for their inſtruction, and ſo proper to bring them to a conformity in religious worſhip.

The acts for aboliſhing the papal ſupremacy and aſſerting the regal, for ſuppreſſing monaſteries, levying the twentieth of eccleſiaſtical preferments, and appointing the order of conſecrating biſhops, with ſome other of the late king's regulations, had paſſed in the parliament of Ireland; but the council of England did not think it prudent, during Edward's minority, to puſh matters farther among a people ſo tenaciouſly addicted to the ſuperſtitions of the church of Rome, and of a nature not ſo tractable as the Engliſh: their chief concern was to keep that realm quiet; with the additional force of four hundred men they attained their end to a ſurprizing degree, there not being the leaſt diſturbance there during all this reign; a ſtrong argument of the prudence, integrity, care, and vigilance of thoſe entruſted with the government. Notwithſtanding this extraordinary precaution, the Engliſh liturgy was carried over thither, and, without any law of their own parliament to impoſe it, was uſed in moſt churches of the Engliſh plantations. John Bale was made biſhop of Oſſory; Goodacre, primate of Armagh; and other vacant ſees filled with perſons zealous for the reformation, which gained ground continually among the Engliſh, though, for want of inſtructors, the Iriſh ſepts remained in their wonted ignorance.

It was likewiſe about this time that Thomas Sternhold, a groom of the privy-chamber, tranſlated ſome of the Pſalms into a barbarous Engliſh metre, and the reſt being ſoon after put into verſe by John Hopkins and others, in imitation of what had been done abroad by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, people, fond of foreign cuſtoms, eſpecially of the Geneva faſhion, began to ſing them in their private houſes: the practice ſpreading from thence thence to the churches, they ſang them there, without any authority or licence, before and after the liturgy and ſermon; ſo that not interfering with the eſtabliſhed worſhip, it grew into a cuſtom by connivance, and hath continued ever ſince, without any expreſs allowance.

About this time the corporation of German merchants, who lived in the Steel-yard, was diſſolved, becauſe it was become detrimental to England, by engroſſing the whole woollen trade. The regent of Flanders and the city of Hamburgh earneſtly ſolicited to have the company reſtored, but it was to no purpoſe. The court alſo ſet on foot a project for the advancement of the trade of England, by opening the two ports of Hull and Southampton, as free ports: but the execution of this project was defeated by the king's death.

In the courſe of this year three great ſhips were fitted out, at the king's charge, for diſcovering a paſſage to the Eaſt Indies by the north ſeas: the chief pilot and director in this voyage was Sebaſtian Cabot. Theſe ſhips ſailed as far north as the confines of Ruſſia; but they loſt their commander, ſir Hugh Willoughby, who, with all his ſhip's crew, were frozen to death.

On the twenty-fourth of April this year, ſir Andrew Dudley and the earl of Weſtmoreland were elected knights companions of the order of St. George. Some time before this, Edward had felt ſome ſcruples in countenancing this order upon the legendary footing on which it then ſtood, and at laſt reſolved entirely to alter it. A commiſſion had been accordingly iſſued to the duke of Somerſet, and ſome other noblemen, for that effect; and, after mature deliberation, the popiſh ſtory of St. George was totally eraſed from the jewels and inſtitution of the order; and it was appointed that, inſtead of a George, the jewel pendant to the collar ſhould contain the figure of a knight, carrying a book upon the point of a ſword; the book to be intitled "VERBVM DEI (the word of God)," the ſword, "PROTECTIO (protection)." Some other ſtiff doctrinal alterations took place: and biſhop Burnet has, amongſt Edward's remains, publiſhed a paper, containing the whole. But thoſe alterations were diſuſed under queen Mary, and the old forms took place and ſtill continue.

The king had been at no extraordinary expence ſince the treaty of Boulogne, and had received four hundred thouſand crowns for the reſtoring of that place; and the companies of London had paid him twenty thouſand pounds by way of compoſition for the annuities charged upon their lands by donors thereof, to defray the charges of their obits, and the chantries they had endowed: immenſe treaſure had been brought into his Exchequer, by the ſpoil of images and ſhrines, and the ſale of lands belonging to chantries, colleges, and free chapels; yet he was plunged in a debt of two hundred and fifty-one thouſand pounds; which he was the leſs able to diſcharge, becauſe the old revenue ariſing from the crown-lands had been much impaired ſince his acceſſion. In this ſituation it was thought proper to reduce the expences of his houſhold, by ſuppreſſing the tables that uſed to be kept for young noblemen, the maſters of requeſts, the ſerjeants at arms, and others; and to call ſuch officers to account as had either fraudulently gotten any of his lands, or diverted any of his money to their private uſes. John Beaumont, maſter of the Rolls, was convicted of having defrauded the king to the amount of twenty thouſand pounds, beſides other crimes; and, confeſſing his guilt, forfeited all his offices, goods, and eſtate; but very little to the king's benefit, all his lands being immediately granted to the earl of Huntingdon, whoſe eldeſt ſon Henry, lord Haſtings, was on the point of being married to Catherine, the duke of Northumberland's daughter. Whatley, one of the receivers for Yorkſhire, was fined two thouſand pounds, and deprived of his office; he fared the worſe probably becauſe he had been a zealous partizan of the late duke of Somerſet, the proſecutions chiefly falling upon ſuch as lay under that imputation. It was not, perhaps, mere reſentment that put Northumberland upon exerciſing theſe ſeverities; his buſineſs was to force them by terror to be ſubſervient to his purpoſes, and particularly in the choice of a new parliament, that would be more compliant than the laſt was with his meaſures; a point in which he got the king to interpoſe by letters to the ſheriffs, recommending particular perſons by name, all courtiers, to be choſen for certain counties.

The new parliament, thus modelled, met on the firſt of March, 1553, and, by their proceedings, gave evident proofs of their attachment to Northumberland. They gave the king a very conſiderable ſubſidy, with two tenths and two fifteenths, to be paid in two years. This act of benevolence was introduced by a long preamble, inveighing againſt the late duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration and oppreſſions, &c. this was inſerted by Northumberland, to let the king ſee how acceptable he and his party were, and how hateful the duke of Somerſet had been. The houſe next proceeded to gratify Northumberland with an act for ſuppreſſing the biſhopric of Durham, Tonſtal having been previouſly deprived, on the fourteenth of Auguſt the preceding year. The king immediately diſpoſed of the ſaid biſhopric in this manner; he founded a biſhopric at Durham, with a revenue of two thouſand marks per annum; and another at Newcaſtle, with one thouſand; and its temporalities, being erected into a county-palatine, were beſtowed upon Northumberland; who, having got all that he wanted of the parliament, and having ſome deſigns that were not ſo proper for their notice, cauſed the two houſes to be prorogued on the thirty-firſt of March, after ſitting only one month.

Edward had, in the ſpring of the foregoing year, been ſeized with the meaſles, and then the ſmall-pox, and had got very well over both theſe diſtempers; but in the beginning of this year he had been attacked by a very bad cough, which ended at laſt in a conſumption. The original of this illneſs was imputed to his having over-heated himſelf in ſports and exerciſes, during a progreſs that he had made in the preceding ſummer: but ſome, who pretended to have looked more narrowly into the matter, would have it, that they had obſerved a viſible decay in his health from the time that ſir Robert Dudley (one of Northumberland's ſons) had been made one of the grooms of his chamber, and who was afterwards appointed his carver. It was hoped, however, that the king's youth, the approach of ſpring, and the medicines adminiſtered by his phyſicians, might by degrees get the better of his diſorder; but it proved of too malignant a nature, and increaſed ſo faſt, that when the parliament met in the beginning of March, the lords and commons commons were obliged to attend him at Whitehall, to hear the reaſons of their being convened.

Every degree of decay in the king's health was a ſpur to Northumberland, who had for ſome time formed a deſign for raiſing his family to the throne upon Edward's deceaſe. He ſuffered none but his own confidents to approach the royal perſon; he affected the moſt anxious concern for the young king's health and recovery; and by theſe hypocritical expreſſions of duty, he quickly got the firſt place in his affections as well as confidence.

The reader may remember, that Henry VII. had two daughters; the eldeſt married the king of Scotland; the younger, who was queen-dowager of France, married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk; and both left iſſue: but Henry VIII. who was by act of parliament enabled to ſettle the ſucceſſion to the crown, had entirely omitted all mention of the deſcendants from his ſiſter the queen of Scotland, and, failing heirs of his own body, and their deſcendants, had limited the ſucceſſion to the heirs of the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his ſiſter the queen-dowager of France, by her ſecond huſband, the duke of Suffolk, and wife to Grey, marquis of Dorſet. The duke of Suffolk, by another wife, left two ſons, who were youths of great expectation; but both of them dying of the ſweating ſickneſs, the marquis of Dorſet, as we have already ſeen *, was created duke of Suffolk in right of his wife (Frances Brandon), who had borne him three daughters, the ladies Jane, Catherine, and Mary: thus the lady Jane Grey, the eldeſt of thoſe daughters, ſtood next in the parliamentary right of ſucceſſion by Henry VIII's will, to the crown, failing the iſſue of Henry, who were king Edward and the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth: and Northumberland ſeeing that the king was faſt approaching to his grave, reſolved to put the project he had formed for the aggrandizement of his family into immediate execution.

With this view he prevailed on the new duke of Suffolk, who was a good-natured eaſy man, and owed his advancement (of which he was not a little fond) wholly to his intereſt, to conſent to marry his daughter, the lady Jane Grey, to his (Northumberland's) fourth ſon, the lord Guildford Dudley; at the ſame time he ſo worked on the maternal tenderneſs of the ducheſs of Suffolk, the young lady's mother, that, though ſhe ſtood in the order of ſucceſſion before her daughter, ſhe not only conſented to give her the preference to herſelf, but alſo to give the ſame preference to any heirs male that might afterwards come of the ſaid lady Jane's body. But Northumberland thought it proper to ſtrengthen himſelf by other alliances, and therefore effected a match between the lady Catherine Grey, ſecond daughter to Suffolk, and lord Herbert, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Pembroke; at the ſame time he beſtowed his own daughter Catherine upon lord Haſtings, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Huntingdon. Theſe marriages were celebrated about the middle of May, this year, and with ſo great pomp and magnificence that the people, who hated the perſon and ſuſpected the deſigns of Northumberland, could not forbear expreſſing in the warmeſt terms their indignation at ſeeing ſuch public demonſtrations of joy, while the health of their beloved ſovereign was in ſuch a languiſhing condition.

Theſe previous ſteps taken, the crafty Northumberland prepared to put the finiſhing hand to the completion of his ambitious project, by perſuading the dying king to alter the ſucceſſion. For this purpoſe he took occaſion to repreſent to Edward, whoſe youth and bodily infirmities made him eaſily ſuſceptible of any impreſſion, and whoſe zealous attachment to the proteſtant religion made him dread and expreſs the moſt fatal conſequences to its profeſſors, ſhould ſo bigotted a papiſt as his ſiſter Mary aſcend the throne, that the only way of preventing the misfortunes which threatened his people and the new religion, was by excluding the princeſs Mary from the ſucceſſion, and transferring the crown to lady Jane Grey, a power with which he was inveſted equally with his father; he repreſented that the princeſs Elizabeth could not help ſharing her ſiſter's fate, becauſe the only pretence they could uſe againſt Mary was her illegitimacy, and that equally affected Elizabeth, as the marriages of both their mothers had been declared unlawful by act of parliament.

This expedient was well reliſhed by Edward; the intereſt of his religion was his prevailing care, which on this occaſion ſurmounted every other conſideration: he knew the lady Jane Grey to be a lady not more diſtinguiſhed by the accompliſhments of her perſon, than by the endowments of her mind, and that, moreover, ſhe was ſtrongly attached to the proteſtant religion, and every way worthy of a throne, and he therefore determined to leave her the crown; but it was neceſſary for his chief officers of ſtate and his judges to ſign his will.

On the eleventh of June, therefore, Montagu, the chief-juſtice of the Common Pleas, Baker and Bromley, two of the judges, the king's attorney and ſolicitor-general, attended the king and council, by order, when Edward gave them a ſcheme of what he deſigned concerning the ſucceſſion, which he ordered them to extend and engroſs in a proper form. After ſome debate, they refuſed to comply with this order, alleging, that in framing ſuch an act they ſhould render themſelves liable to the pains and penalties of high-treaſon, according to act of parliament. The duke of Northumberland was ſo incenſed at their refuſal, that he behaved in the moſt indecent manner, inſomuch that the lawyers were afraid of his proceeding to ſome perſonal violence againſt them. Edward himſelf ſeverely reprimanded them for their refractorineſs: in a word, partly by threats, and partly by letters of pardon granted in their favour by anticipation, they were prevailed upon to draw up the act of conveyance, which was ſigned by all the other judges, except ſir James Hales, who, though a friend to the Reformation even to a degree of enthuſiaſm, continued obſtinately to refuſe ſetting his hand thereto. Of the officers of ſtate Cranmer alone oppoſed this ſcheme, and endeavoured to diſſuade Edward from altering the ſucceſſion: he alleged that his hand could not without perjury go to Edward's deſtination of the crown, becauſe he had ſworn to the obſervation of Henry's will: nevertheleſs this great man ſuffered his hand to belie his conſcience; for, at Edward's earneſt intreaty, and Northumberland's authoritative inſtances, he ſigned this unjuſt will.

It was remarked, that after this ſettlement was made, Edward's diſeaſe grew daily worſe, and all hopes of his recovery vaniſhed: to render the matter ſtill worſe, the phyſicians were diſcharged by Northumberland's advice, and he was committed to the care of an ignorant old woman, who engaged by her noſtrums to reſtore the king in a ſhort time to his former health and vigour. The conſequence of which was what may eaſily be ſuppoſed; every bad ſymptom was inflamed; his cough increaſed, and the putrefaction of his lungs daily got ground, till at length he reſigned his breath at Greenwich, on the ſixth day of July, 1553, in the ſixteenth year of his age, and after he had reigned ſix years, five months, and nine days. He died in the arms of ſir Henry Sidney, ſon-in-law to the duke of Northumberland. It has been already obſerved, that Edward, before his death, acquired a character, which the moſt accurate and faithful hiſtorians have thus handed down to us.

King Edward was in his perſon beautiful, of a ſweet aſpect, and eſpecially in his eyes, which ſeemed to have a ſtarry livelineſs and luſtre in them. He kept a book, in which he wrote the characters of all the chief men of the nation, all the judges, lord lieutenants, and juſtices of the peace throughout England, marking down their way of living and their zeal for religion. He had ſtudied the buſineſs of the mint, with the exchange and value of money: he alſo underſtood fortification, and deſigned well: he knew all the harbours and ports in his own dominions, as alſo in Scotland and France, with the depth of water, and way of coming into them. He had acquired ſo great knowlege in foreign affairs, that the ambaſſadors who were ſent into England, publiſhed very extraordinary things of him in all the courts of Europe. He took notes of almoſt every thing he heard, which he firſt wrote in Greek characters, that thoſe about him might not underſtand them; and afterwards copied out in the journal, or diary, that he kept: this journal, written with his own hand, is ſtill preſerved in ſir John Cotton's famous library, from whence the learned biſhop Burnet tranſcribed and publiſhed it, in his ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of the Reformation. In it the moſt conſiderable tranſactions in this reign are, perhaps, as well regiſtered (ſays biſhop Nicolſon) by the young king himſelf, as by any other hiſtorian.

Hieronymus Cardanus, the famous Italian philoſopher, as he paſſed through England, waited on young Edward, and was ſo charmed with him, that he every where ſpoke of him with the higheſt encomiums; and even after the king's death, when nothing was to be got by flattering, he wrote the following character of him.

"All the graces were in him: he had many tongues; when he was yet but a child, together with the Engliſh, his natural tongue, he had both Latin and French; nor was he ignorant of the Greek, Italian, and Spaniſh, and perhaps ſome more; but for the Engliſh, French, and Latin, he was perfect in them, and was apt to learn every thing: nor was he ignorant of logic, of the principles of natural philoſophy, nor of muſic. The ſweetneſs of his temper was ſuch as became a mortal; his gravity becoming the majeſty of a king; and his diſpoſition was ſuitable to his high degree. In ſhort, that child was ſo bred, had ſuch parts, and was of ſuch expectation, that he looked like a miracle of a man." Afterwards he adds, "He was a marvellous boy: when I was with him, he was in his fifteenth year of his age, in which he ſpoke Latin as politely and readily as I did. He began to love the liberal arts before he knew them, and to know them before he could uſe them; and in him there was ſuch an attempt of nature, that not only England, but the world, had reaſon to lament his being ſo early ſnatched away. When the gravity of a king was needful, he carried himſelf like an old man; and yet he was always affable and gentle, as became his age. He played on the lute; he meddled in ſtate-affairs; and in bounty, he did in that imitate his father; though his father, even when he endeavoured to be good, might have appeared to have been bad; but there was no ground of ſuſpecting any ſuch thing in the ſon, whoſe mind was cultivated by the ſtudy of philoſophy*."

But notwithſtanding theſe encomiums, we cannot help confeſſing, with a modern hiſtorian, that it is difficult to reconcile either to his boaſted humanity or penetration, his conſenting to the death of his uncle Somerſet, who had ſerved him faithfully, unleſs we ſuppoſe that he wanted reſolution to withſtand the importunities of his miniſters, and was deficient in that vigour of mind, which often exiſts independent of learning and culture.

Edward, before he died, had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his pious deſign of beſtowing a magnificent charity upon the city of London fully executed. There were vaſt ſwarms of beggars and poor people ſtrolling about the city of London; and biſhop Ridley, in a ſermon, the laſt year, before the king, had earneſtly recommended the ſettling ſome conſtant method for their relief: Edward, much affected with what he had heard, ſent for the biſhop; gave him great thanks for his good exhortation; and, diſcourſing with him about the proper means of bringing about ſo good a work, it was thought adviſeable to conſult the lord-mayor and aldermen on the ſubject. In conſequence hereof, a general contribution was made in the city, towards preparing and furniſhing the hoſpitals of Chriſt-church, and of St. Thomas, in Southwark; the ſcites whereof, with the lands and revenues of the diſſolved priories of Little St. Bartholomew and St. Thomas, had been given by Henry VIII. about a fortnight before his death to the city, but nothing had been done to fit them up for the purpoſe deſigned: a ſubſcription was likewiſe ſet on foot for a weekly contribution towards the maintenance of thoſe hoſpitals, till they ſhould be better endowed; and the citizens contributed very generouſly to both theſe charitable undertakings. The decayed buildings in both places were thereupon repaired, and the work carried on with ſo much diligence, that on the twenty-third of November, a great number of ſick and maimed people were taken into the hoſpital of St. Thomas, and no leſs than four hundred children put into Chriſt's hoſpital, all of them to be cloathed, lodged, and ſubſiſted at the charge of the city, till other means could be provided for their future maintenance. The king, delighted with the forwardneſs and liberality of the citizens, ſent for the lord-mayor and aldermen on the tenth of April, and gave for ever his palace of Bridewell to the city, to be employed for the relief of ſuch vagabonds and thriftleſs poor, as ſhould be ſent thither to receive chaſtiſement and be kept to labour. The hoſpital founded in the Savoy, by Henry VII. for the relief of pilgrims and travellers, had of late been made an harbour of idle fellows, vagabonds, and ſtrumpets; and the maſter and brethren being ſent for to the king, were perſuaded to reſign it into his hands, with all its goods, lands, and revenues. His majeſty, immediately upon this ſurrender, aſſigned a yearly rent of ſeven hundred marks, with all the beds, bedding, and other furniture, towards the maintenance of the work-houſe of Bridewell, and the hoſpital of St. Thomas. The letters patent confirming this grant, with a licence of mortmain for enabling the city to purchaſe lands to the value of four thouſand marks a year, for the better ſupporting thoſe other hoſpitals, were paſſed on the twenty-ſixth of June, about ten days before he died.

The remains of this young monarch were depoſited in the chapel of St. Peter's church Weſtminſter, near the body of king Henry VII. his grandfather, with great funeral pomp, and the unfeigned mournings of an affectionate people.

The INTERREGNUM between the Death of King EDWARD VI. and the Proclaiming the Lady MARY Queen.

THERE hath hardly ever been a breach in the order of ſucceſſion to the crown of any country, but it hath proved the ſource of a civil war; and England would at this time have been involved in that calamity, had not the general bent of the nation diſcovered itſelf ſo fully in favour of the true lineal heir.

Northumberland, by whoſe intereſt with the deceaſed king the ſettlement on lady Jane had been made, reſolved at all events to ſupport her right; but, conſcious of his own unpopularity, and abundantly ſenſible of the oppoſition he had reaſon to expect, he thought it neceſſary to proceed with the utmoſt caution. And firſt he concealed the king's death as well as he could for ſome days; and, in order to get the two diſinherited princeſſes into his power, perſuaded the council to write to them in their brother's name, deſiring their attendance, under pretext that his bad ſtate of health required the aſſiſtance of their counſel, and the conſolation of their company.

Mary readily accepted the invitation, and was actually come as far as Hunſdon, in Hertfordſhire, before ſhe diſcovered the ſnare laid for her. At this place ſhe received a letter from the earl of Arundel, acquainting her of the death of the king, of the ſettlement of the crown on the lady Jane Grey, and of the deſign to ſeize on her perſon. Theſe tidings convinced her of the neceſſity of immediately providing for her own ſafety; the ſudden death of a ſervant furniſhing her with a pretence that he died of the plague, ſhe returned back with ſo much haſte that ſhe travelled near fourſcore miles without ſtopping, and retired to Kenninghall, in Norfolk, from whence ſhe wrote, on the eighth of July, to ſir George Somerſet, ſir William Drury, ſir William Waldegrave, Clement Higham, and other gentlemen of that neighbourhood in her intereſt, ſignifying to them the king's death, and her right to the crown, and requiring them to attend her there without a moment's delay, and with all the power they could get in readineſs. Circular letters were ſent the next day to the principal nobility and gentry in every county of England, requiring them to aſſiſt her in the defence of her crown and perſon.

The ſame day (the ninth of July) ſhe likewiſe wrote to the council, upbraiding them with keeping her brother's death ſo long a ſecret from her, whom they knew to be the next heir to the crown; "and although (ſhe ſaid) ſuch a proceeding plainly indicated their having formed ſome undutiful deſign againſt her; yet ſhe promiſed to receive them into her favour, and to pardon what had been done amiſs, provided they would forthwith proclaim her queen." To which letter the council returned the following anſwer, ſigned by twenty-one of its members: "That ſhe could not pretend to the crown, ſince ſhe was born of an unlawful marriage, diſſolved by a legal ſentence, confirmed by more than one parliament: that ſhe ought to give over her pretenſions, and acknowlege queen Jane for her ſovereign, who was now in poſſeſſion of the throne, by virtue of the late king's letters patent, under the great-ſeal of England: they therefore ſtrictly charged her not to diſturb the peace of the nation, aſſuring her that, in caſe ſhe ſhewed herſelf obedient, they were ready to do her all the ſervice they could in duty; and at the ſame time threatening her with the evil conſequences of her non-acquieſcence *."

Mary, on receiving this letter, not thinking her perſon ſufficiently ſecure where ſhe then was, withdrew to Framlingham caſtle, on the coaſt of Suffolk, that ſhe might, if the ſituation of her affairs obliged her to it, have an opportunity to eſcape with more eaſe into Flanders. And here ſhe not only aſſumed the title of queen, but found many friends hearty enough to proclaim her title in the city of Norwich; and ſhe was daily joined by others, with all their followers.

And now Northumberland, finding that he could no longer diſſemble, reſolved to throw off the maſk, and act in a more open and undiſguiſed manner; he therefore engaged the council to depute him and the duke of Suffolk to Sion-houſe, a pleaſant ſeat on the banks of the Thames, where the lady Jane then was, to give her notice of being appointed by the deceaſed king to aſcend the throne. The young lady, though only ſixteen years of age, had a moſt accompliſhed perſon, the moſt amiable diſpoſition, and the moſt diſtinguiſhed parts: beſide the knowlege of the modern tongues, ſhe was thoroughly verſed in the Greek and Roman languages; wholly taken up in literary reſearches, her heart was a ſtranger to the calls of ambition: ſhe had been educated with the late king, for whom ſhe had a moſt ſincere affection, ſo that ſhe received the news of his death with tokens of unfeigned concern: and as ſhe had never been conſulted about the ſettlement, or informed that his death was to ſet the crown upon her head, the notice now given her, that ſhe was called to the throne filled her with the utmoſt ſurprize. She was ſo far from receiving theſe tidings with joy, that ſhe even told the two dukes that ſhe would not accept of the crown, alleging the preferable rights of the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth, and warning them of the fatal conſequences that muſt neceſſarily attend ſuch a hazardous, and, in her opinion, criminal enterprize, earneſtly beſeeching them to let her continue in the private ſtation in which ſhe was born.

Overcome at laſt by the importunities, rather than reaſons, of her father and father-in-law, and, what had ſtill more weight with her, thoſe of the lord Guildford Dudley, her huſband, whom ſhe paſſionately loved, and who was indeed worthy of her affection, ſhe was perſuaded to give up her own ſentiments, and to regulate herſelf by their advice and direction: but this ſhe did with ſo much reluctance, that it might truly be ſaid her conſent was rather extorted than given. The kings of England were, at that time, wont to paſs the firſt days after their acceſſion in the Tower of London, and thither Northumberland immediately conducted the new ſovereign, the lovely victim of her family's ambition.

The next day, being the tenth of July, lady Jane Grey was proclaimed queen of England, with the uſual formalities, in the city of London; which being ſo contrary to the expectation of the people, who had not the leaſt notion of this lady's immediate acceſſion to the throne, they received the news with ſilent ſurprize, nor were any of thoſe acclamations heard, which are uſual on ſuch occaſions; even the heralds ſeemed to do their office unwillingly; and though orders were ſent for her being proclaimed throughout the realm, they were not obſerved farther than ten miles from London. The diſcontent of the people, which aroſe from their hatred to the duke of Northumberland, and his arbitrary meaſures, was not a little increaſed by an ill-timed act of ſeverity in the government, who ordered one Gilbert Pot, a vintner's ſervant, to be ſet on the pillory, with his ears cut off and nailed to it, on the very day the lady Jane was proclaimed, only for expreſſing himſelf in a ſlighting manner of the new queen.

As the council expected that Mary would exert all her intereſt to oppoſe their proceedings, it was thought neceſſary to notify queen Jane's acceſſion to the crown by proper ambaſſadors to foreign courts, and to the emperor in particular, to whom Richard Shelley, eſq. was immediately diſpatched, with inſtructions to omit nothing to ſecure the friendſhip of Charles, which would neceſſarily influence other courts in favour of the new ſettlement, and diſcourage the party of the princeſs Mary, which muſt chiefly rely on the emperor's aſſiſtance. Shelley left London indeed, but judging that the preſent ſtate of affairs muſt ſoon undergo an alteration, he waited in England to ſee what the alteration might be.

In the mean time Mary neglected nothing on her part to aſſert her title to the crown; and ſhe ſo managed, by poſitively promiſing to leave religion in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it, reſerving to herſelf no more than a liberty to profeſs her own faith, that ſhe engaged the people of Suffolk and Norfolk, though ſtrongly attached to the Reformation, to hazard their lives and eſtates in her quarrel. Theſe her promiſes being ſpread abroad, ſhe was joined by numbers of the nobility and gentry; in particular Bourchier, earl of Bath, and Ratcliffe, earl of Suſſex, ſir Thomas Mordaunt, ſir John Wharton, ſir William Drury, ſir Henry Bedingfield, and ſir Henry Jernegan, perſons whoſe intereſts lay in the adjacent counties, repaired to her ſtandard, and brought her a ſtrong reinforcement. Sir Edward Haſtings, brother to the earl of Huntingdon, having been ordered by the council to levy troops for the ſervice of lady Jane, carried over to Mary all the forces he had aſſembled, amounting to no leſs than four thouſand men; even a fleet which had been ſent by Northumberland to cruize on the coaſt of Suffolk, and prevent the eſcape of Mary, or the landing of foreign forces to her aſſiſtance, being driven by a ſtorm into Yarmouth, put themſelves and their crews under her command.

Northumberland receiving advice of this unexpected event, ordered an army which was in readineſs in the neighbourhood of London, to march immediately towards Newmarket, appointing the duke of Suffolk for their general, being determined to remain himſelf with the lady Jane; but the counſellors, who wanted to remove him out of the way, repreſented to Jane the imminent danger to which her father would be expoſed, and at the ſame time perſuaded Northumberland to take upon him the command, extolling his known valour, his ſuperior military ſkill, and the dread which his name, already terrible in Norfolk, by his victory in the late reign, would ſtrike into the inſurgents.

The duke could have wiſhed to have been excuſed this ſervice, well knowing the neceſſity of his preſence in the council, of whoſe ſteadineſs he was not well aſſured; but as it was not entirely in his choice to accept or refuſe the command, he yielded to the entreaties of his daughter and the remonſtrances of the council, and made preparations for his departure the next day, ſending his ſon, the earl of Warwick, before him, with five hundred horſe, to Bury; and, having taken a ſolemn leave of the lords, none of whom embraced him with greater marks of affection, or more cordial wiſhes for his ſucceſs, than the earl of Arundel, he ſet out on Friday the fourteenth of July, towards Cambridge, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Huntingdon, the lord Grey of Wilton, with other noblemen, and a gallant troop of ſix hundred horſe, attending him thither; and having paſſed the Sunday in that place, he put himſelf the next morning, July 17, at the head of the army, which had rendezvouſed at Newmarket, and amounted to ſix thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, with which he advanced the next day to Bury.

Upon the news of his march, ſome of Mary's friends adviſed her to retire abroad; and had the duke advanced with an expedition proper to expreſs the reſolution of an intrepid and enterprizing general, ſhe might have perhaps taken that ſtep; but, inſtead of acting with the vigour the exigence of the caſe required, he made but very ſlow marches, and ſo gave Mary's friends an opportunity of coming and ſwelling the number of thoſe who had embarked in her intereſt. QUEEN MARY.

rived at Bury, he found that great numbers of his men had deſerted, ſo that he was under a neceſſity of ſending to London for farther ſuccours; and he wrote in ſharp terms to the council upon the ſubject: but he ſoon found that perſons who govern by terror, are always hated; and whatever obſequiouſneſs is paid them, during their proſperity, they are ſure to be deſerted in their greateſt need, when that terror is removed by the diſturbed ſtate of their circumſtances.

The council conſiſted of the following perſons, viz. the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, the dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, the marquiſſes of Wincheſter and Northampton, the earls of Arundel, Shrewſbury, Huntingdon, Bedford, and Pembroke, the lords Cobham and Darcy, ſir Thomas Cheney, ſir Robert Cotton, ſir William Petre, ſir William Cecil, ſir John Cheeke, ſir John Maſon, ſir Edward North, and ſir Robert Bowes: theſe were divided into three parties; the one ſecret papiſts, headed by the earl of Arundel; another, true proteſtants, headed by archbiſhop Cranmer; the third, and indeed the greateſt part, were of no religion, but blindly followed that which was uppermoſt, who, after having embraced the eſtabliſhment of Henry VIII. with the ſame eaſe had followed that of Edward VI. and were ready to reſume the Romiſh religion, whenever it ſhould ſuit beſt with their temporal intereſt. This may probably be ſaid to be the character of Northumberland himſelf, for though he profeſſed the reformed religion, the proteſtants had a very bad opinion of his integrity; ſo that, notwithſtanding Jane was a true proteſtant, it plainly appears that religious zeal alone was not ſufficient to keep the counſellors in her intereſt; on the contrary, they were diſpoſed to forſake her rather than remain under the ſlaviſh ſubjection of that duke, whoſe pride could bear no contradiction, and whoſe tyranny had brought upon him their almoſt unanimous hatred.

Pleaſed therefore with this opportunity, which Northumberland's letter gave them, to get out of the Tower, in which place they had all been as it were confined by the crafty miniſter, on the pretence of attending upon the perſon of Jane till her coronation, they left the place as if they intended to ſet about making levies to reinforce the duke; but, having aſſembled in Baynard's caſtle, a houſe belonging to the earl of Pembroke, they invited thither all the noblemen in town whom they conceived to be well affected to queen Mary; and when they were met, the earl of Arundel opened the conference by a ſpeech, in which he inveighed in the ſtrongeſt terms againſt "the cruelty and injuſtice of Northumberland, his inſatiable avarice and unbounded ambition, the criminal project which he was engaged in for altering the ſucceſſion, and the great wickedneſs in which he had involved the whole council; and concluded with moving, that they might return immediately to their duty and allegiance which they owed to their lawful ſovereign, by proclaiming Mary queen, as the only way left them to preſerve the ſtate, and recover their own loſt honours."

This propoſal was ſeconded by the earl of Pembroke, who, laying his hand on his ſword, ſwore he was ready to fight with any man who ſhould preſume to oppoſe ſo ſalutary a meaſure: but indeed, there appears to have been little occaſion for this bravado of his lordſhip; for, after a very ſhort debate, the majority expreſſed their approbation of the propoſal, and the lord-mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend immediately; when the council declaring their reſolution to have the princeſs Mary proclaimed, theſe venal magiſtrates diſcovered the greateſt alacrity and chearfulneſs in executing their orders for that purpoſe; ſo, mounting their horſes, they rode in a body to the Croſs in Cheapſide, where Mary was proclaimed queen of England by ſir Chriſtopher Barker, principal king of arms, on the nineteenth of July, about four o'clock in the afternoon: Te Deum was ſung in the cathedral of St. Paul's, and the event was celebrated with great rejoicings on the part of the populace: even the duke of Suffolk, who commanded in the Tower, finding that all reſiſtance would be in vain, ordered the gates to be thrown open, and immediately declared for queen Mary. Then repairing to his daughter's chamber, he told her that ſhe muſt now put off her royal robes, and be contented with a private life; to which ſhe replied, as with great truth ſhe might, that ſhe would put them off with infinitely more pleaſure than ſhe had put them on; which ſhe would never have done but in obedience to him and the reſt of her relations. And thus the lady Jane, after ſhe had enjoyed, or rather ſuffered, the vain pageantry of royalty for the ſpace of ten days, reſigned it into the hands of thoſe who had loaded her with it.

MARY. The fourth Sovereign of ENGLAND of the Houſe of TUDOR. A. D. 1553.

THE firſt ſtep taken by the council, after proclaiming the lady Mary queen, was to diſpatch the earl of Arundel and lord Paget to Framlingham caſtle, to give that princeſs an account of what had been tranſacted in her favour; and the next day they ſigned an order to the duke of Northumberland to diſband his forces, and behave himſelf as became a dutiful ſubject.

The proceedings of the council not only influenced the city of London, but ſtrengthened the intereſt of Mary throughout the nation; and ſo terrified Northumberland, that, before the orders for diſbanding the army could reach him, being preinformed of the revolution at court, and plainly perceiving that he could not keep a ſufficient force together, he obeyed before-hand, and, it is ſaid, meditated his own ſafety by flying out of the kingdom; but being prevented in this ſcheme by his own guards, he endeavoured to gain Mary's favour by an early ſubmiſſion and teſtimonies of zeal for her ſervice: he not only diſbanded his army, with a profeſſion of his own voluntary regard for the public good and peace of the nation, and the moſt ſincere affection for the queen, but aſſembled as many as would attend him on the occaſion, and proclaimed his new ſovereign, flinging up his hat in a tranſport of joy, and crying, "God ſave queen Mary!"

Mary, however, was not to be deceived by this hypocritical behaviour in one whom ſhe knew to be a moſt inveterate enemy to herſelf and family, and acted as he did only becauſe it was not longer in his power to play any other part; and therefore ſhe committed to the earl of Arundel the agreeable charge of departing immediately and arreſting the duke of Northumberland, with his ſons and chief accomplices. When that proud and haughty man learned from Arundel the purport of his viſit, he, who in his proſperity had tyrannized over this very earl and the reſt of the council, fell at his feet in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, and implored his favour. Arundel, enjoying that abject behaviour which is ſo peculiar to fallen inſolence, told the duke he muſt obey the queen's orders; and he took into cuſtody at the ſame time the earl of Warwick and the lord Henry Dudley (Northumberland's ſons), ſir Andrew Dudley, his brother, the earl of Huntingdon, the lord Haſtings, ſir John Gates, ſir Henry Gates, ſir Thomas Palmer, and Dr. Sandys, who, by Northumberland's order, had preached up lady Jane's title at Cambridge. All theſe were ſent up to London, and committed to the Tower, on the twenty-fifth of July. Soon after, the duke of Suffolk, lady Jane Grey, and lord Guildford Dudley, her huſband, were, by Mary's orders, taken into cuſtody: but Mary being deſirous, in the beginning of her reign, to render herſelf popular by the appearance of clemency, and as the counſellors alleged, in excuſe of their conduct, that they had acted from fear and compulſion, ſhe indulged moſt of them with a pardon. Much about the ſame time Ridley, biſhop of London, and the marquis of Northampton, were arreſted and ſent to the Tower.

On the thirtieth of July, Mary ſet out, with a large train, from the caſtle of Framlingham for London, where ſhe was met by the princeſs Elizabeth, with a body of two thouſand men. That lady, though ſhe was far from aſpiring to the throne by force of arms and the effuſion of her country's blood, thought it not prudent to remain an idle ſpectator of the tranſactions conſequent upon the death of Edward, and, to defend her own perſon, had raiſed the above body of men from the neighbouring country, who readily came in to protect her, and to obey her orders during the troubles that ſeemed to threaten the kingdom; but her highneſs being informed of her ſiſter's ſucceſs, and the entire ſubmiſſion of lady Jane's party, marched with her little army to join Mary, and had the addreſs to gain her confidence for the preſent, pretending that thoſe men had been raiſed for her ſervice.

On the third of Auguſt Mary made a very pompous entry into London, and riding through the city to the Tower, ſhe, at her entrance, called for and had preſented to her the old duke of Norfolk, who had been under ſentence of death there, ever ſince the laſt year of her father's reign, the lord Courtney, ſon to the marquis of Exeter, and a priſoner likewiſe ever ſince his father's attainder, the ducheſs of Somerſet, and Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, who all kneeling down, ſhe embraced them in the moſt affectionate manner, ſaying, "Theſe are my priſoners," and ordered them inſtantly to be ſet at liberty. The next day, the lord Courtney was created earl of Devonſhire; ſhe reſtored Stephen Gardiner to his biſhopric of Wincheſter, and a few days after made him high-chancellor of England; yet this was the very man who had ſubſcribed to her mother's divorce, and even written publicly againſt the lawfulneſs of her marriage with Henry VIII.

On the fifth of Auguſt, Edmund Bonner, late biſhop of London, priſoner in the Marſhalſea, and Cuthbert Tonſtal, the old biſhop of Durham, a priſoner in the King's Bench, had their pardons, and were reinſtated in their ſees. Shortly after, all the biſhops who had been deprived during the reign of Edward VI. were reſtored to their biſhoprics, and the new ones removed; as Ridley from London, and Bonner replaced in his room; Story from Chicheſter, and Day reinſtated; Miles Coverdale, of Exeter, went out to make room for Weſt; and John Hooper was outed from Worceſter, which was filled by Heath. Likewiſe all beneficed clergymen that were married, or would not renounce the reformed religion, were put out of their livings, and others of the popiſh communion put in their rooms.

On the tenth of Auguſt, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Shrewſbury, and Stephen Gardiner, were ſworn of the privy-council; and that ſame day the earl of Arundel, for his good offices, received the order of the Garter: and the late king's obſequies were performed, with this remarkable circumſtance, that though Day preached the funeral ſermon, Cranmer adminiſtered the ſacraments, and performed the ſervice of the dead, according to the rites of the reformed church of England: but a maſs of Requiem, at which the queen aſſiſted, with all the ceremonies of the popiſh church, was that ſame day publicly ſaid for him in the Tower.

The ſucceſs which Mary had met with in aſſerting her right to the crown, had been chiefly owing to the reſolution of the Suffolk men, who, upon Mary's promiſe to continue the laws and the religion eſtabliſhed by king Edward in the manner ſhe found it, had riſqued their lives and fortunes in her cauſe, and enabled her to ſurmount the greateſt difficulties that obſtructed her advancement to the throne, without bloodſhed: but it is very certain that Mary was determined to make promiſes, oaths, juſtice, and even intereſt itſelf give way to her favourite project of reſtoring the religion of the church of Rome.

Her firſt care, after ſecuring the perſons of thoſe from whom ſhe expected the greateſt oppoſition, was to conſult her truſty friends how beſt to effect the intended overthrow of the reformed religion; and ſhe was diſpoſed to keep no meaſures, but to force the kingdom to turn immediately to what ſhe called the union of the catholic church; and had it not been for the more artful counſels of the emperor and biſhop Gardiner, ſhe had ſent directly for cardinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to the pope: but they diſapproving ſo hazardous a ſtep, it was deferred by Mary for the preſent, who contented herſelf with publiſhing a liberty of conſcience in affairs of religion.

This declaration was made by the queen in council, on the twelfth of Auguſt, and great care was taken to render it as public as poſſible, and to magnify it as a great inſtance of the queen's generoſity, Mean Submission of the Duke of Northumberland to the Earl of Arundel.

To His Grace George Montagu,

Duke of Manchester,

This Plate is most humbly Inscribed.

of the lawful queen of the realm, but of an uſurper, and therefore could be no warrant for him: and that any perſons againſt whom there was nothing upon record were deemed innocent in the eye of the law, and might be admitted on any jury." From this laſt anſwer the duke foreſaw that any objection he could make would be over-ruled; he therefore confeſſed the indictement, and referred himſelf to the queen's mercy. His example in this particular was followed by the earl of Warwick and the marquis of Northampton, who were tried at the ſame tribunal, and all three condemned to death as traitors. Sir John and ſir Henry Gates, ſir Andrew Dudley, and ſir Thomas Palmer pleaded guilty, and underwent the ſame ſentence.

The duke of Northumberland, with his two confederates, ſir John Gates and ſir Thomas Palmer, who had aſſiſted him with their evidence to take away the life of the duke of Somerſet in the late reign, were particularly marked out as perſons againſt whom the people were moſt clamorous, and had but two days allowed them to prepare for execution on Tower hill. Biſhop Gardiner, indeed, who was, the day after his condemnation, made lord high-chancellor, is ſaid to have interceded for him; but Northumberland was found to be a man ſo utterly void of principles, and at that time ſo obnoxious to all parties, that his life might be of diſſervice, and therefore it was reſolved to ſhew him no mercy. Accordingly, on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, he was conducted to the ſcaffold, where he confeſſed that he had always been a Roman catholic in his heart, and expreſſed great ſorrow for having plundered the effects of the church, eſpecially as he could not now make reſtitution; but whether theſe were his real ſentiments, which he formerly concealed from intereſt or ambition, or whether he hoped by this declaration to render the queen more favourable to his family, no one can pretend to determine. His head being ſtruck off, it was with his body interred in the ſame vault where Henry VIII's two beheaded queens and the late duke of Somerſet lay. Sir John Gates and ſir Thomas Palmer ſuffered the ſame day: the reſt of the condemned priſoners were firſt reprieved, and afterwards pardoned.

The queen having, by her laſt proclamation, and her other acts, evinced her affection to popery, now added a ſtronger proof of her reſolution to extirpate the Reformation; for being informed that the people of Norfolk and Suffolk (who had proved ſuch faithful friends to her and her cauſe) relying upon the virtue of her promiſe to protect them in the exerciſe of the reformed religion, had tranſgreſſed the prohibitions contained in her proclamation, ſhe ordered the magiſtrates of the county to puniſh ſeverely the delinquents; and Mr. Dobbs, one of the members for thoſe parts, preſuming to put the queen in mind of the ſervices thoſe counties had rendered her, and the promiſes ſhe had made to them, was ſet in the pillory for three days.

And now the miniſtry being reſolved to execute the queen's plan for reſtoring the old religion, began with the removing thoſe who ſeemed to have the moſt credit with the people: they therefore ordered Mr. Bradford, one of the two proteſtant miniſters who had reſcued Bourne in the late tumult at St. Paul's, to be ſent to priſon; and confined his companion Rogers to his own houſe, from whence he was afterwards removed to gaol. Judge Hales, who alone of all his brethren had refuſed to ſign the inſtrument which had transferred the crown to lady Jane Gray, was impriſoned in the Marſhalſea, for charging the juſtices of Kent to conform to the laws of Edward VI. not yet repealed: but the truth ſeems to have been, that he was obnoxious as being a proteſtant. He was removed to the Compter, and afterwards to the Fleet, where he was ſo affected at the report of the calamities that the warden told him were contriving againſt thoſe who would not change their religion, that it turned his brain; and he ſeveral times attempted, and at laſt perpetrated, his own death.

Judge Montagu, who was alſo a proteſtant, was turned out of his place, and fined a thouſand pounds for only having aſſiſted in drawing up the ſettlement of the crown in favour of lady Jane; and Bromley, a bigotted papiſt, was put in his room, though this latter had not only aſſiſted in drawing up the ſame deed, but had likewiſe readily agreed to ſign it. Hooper, biſhop of Gloceſter, and Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, were impriſoned for not ſubmitting to the queen's order, by which ſhe had empowered the chancellor, biſhop Gardiner, ſingly to grant licences to preachers; and Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter, was confined to his own houſe on the ſame account. Peter Martyr, profeſſor of divinity at Oxford, ſuffered ſo many inſults and indignities from the enemies of the Reformation, that he was obliged to take refuge in Cranmer's houſe at Lambeth, though that prelate was in no condition to protect himſelf, for the court had already devoted him to deſtruction.

Bonner, who was his ſworn foe, had ſome time before induſtriouſly given out, that Cranmer had engaged to the queen to make a public recantation of his errors, and to return into the boſom of the Romiſh church. This report ſo exaſperated the good old prelate, who ſaw that Bonner's ſcheme was to delude the people into a compliance with popery under the ſanction of his name, that he thought it incumbent on him to draw up ſome public teſtimony againſt this aſperſion; and he drew up a declaration, in which he called the queen herſelf to witneſs, that he never made her any ſuch promiſe, as his enemies had alleged; and offered, with Peter Martyr and four or five others whom he would chuſe, to defend, in a public diſputation, the liturgy, doctrines, and every part of the Reformation and the late king, as agreeable to thoſe of the primitive church, and warranted by the holy Scriptures. This declaration he propoſed to reviſe, enlarge, and put his own ſeal to it, and then have it affixed to the doors of St. Paul's and other churches in London; but a rough draught thereof getting abroad, ſo many copies were taken, that ſome of them were brought to the council, who conſtrued the paper into a libel, upon Cranmer's owning it, and made this an aggravation of his former offence of ſigning Edward's will, and thereupon committed him, on the fourteenth of September, to the Tower.

Biſhop Latimer was committed at the ſame time; and ſcarcely any biſhop or preacher who had ſignalized himſelf for the Reformation, and did not either recant or fly beyond ſea, eſcaped either deprivation, impriſonment, or both. Peter Martyr, and John a Laſco, a Pruſſian nobleman, and miniſter of the German proteſtant church in Auſtin-friars, with all the other reformed preachers who were foreigners, were baniſhed out of the kingdom; and a great number of Engliſh, who had embraced the reformed religion, foreſeeing a perſecution, retired into foreign parts, on pretence of being natives of France, until orders were diſpatched to all the ſea-ports, that no perſon ſhould be allowed to quit the kingdom on that pretence, without being furniſhed with a warrant ſigned by the French ambaſſador.

The queen, having now ſecured the chief perſons from whom ſhe and her council might expect any oppoſition in their grand ſcheme to revive the pope's authority and religion in England and its dependencies, now reſolved to recompenſe thoſe noblemen who had exerted themſelves vigorouſly in her favour. The earl of Arundel was appointed lord-ſteward of the houſhold; ſir Edward Haſtings was made maſter of the horſe, and afterwards created a baron; the earl of Suſſex was created a knight of the Garter, with the particular privilege of appearing covered in the queen's preſence. But the beſt placed piece of gratitude the queen ſhewed on this occaſion, was with regard to the lord Paget, whom ſhe reſtored to the honour of the Garter, which was buckled on his leg, and the collar again put round his neck, by two knights companions; at the ſame time Garter king at arms was ordered to ſet up his atchievement anew in Windſor; and the ſovereign, who was in the chapter when his act of reſtitution was paſſed, ordered it to be inſerted therein, "that he had highly deſerved of the nation by his prudence and council." At the ſame time ſir John Williams was made a peer, and afterwards chamberlain of the houſhold; ſir Henry Jernegan was conſtituted captain of the queen's guard, which was encreaſed with the number of four hundred men; and ſir Thomas Treſham was created lord-prior of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem, which was revived, conſequently he took rank as the firſt baron of England: Thomas lord Delawar, ſir William Drury, and ſir Richard Southwell were gratified with penſions. The queen promoted her chaplain, Hopton, to the ſee of Norwich; appointed Englefield maſter of the wards; Rocheſter, comptroller of the houſhold; and Waldgrave, maſter of the wardrobe: and the council having received ſome hints of intended commotions in the north, and that the Scots ſeemed ready to aſſiſt the diſaffected, the earl of Shrewſbury, who had great intereſt in thoſe parts, was made lord-warden of the Marches, and ſent down in great haſte to his poſt: but the diſturbances were ſoon quelled.

Every thing was now ready for the queen's coronation; but the Exchequer being very bare of money, ſhe borrowed twenty thouſand pounds of the city of London, which enabled her to go through all the ſplendor of her coronation, on the firſt of October. Gardiner had the honour to perform the ceremony, aſſiſted by Bonner, biſhop of London, Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, and eight other prelates: the young earl of Surry, ſon to him who was beheaded, had been ſent for by the queen's order, and he acted as deputy-marſhal under his grand-father, the duke of Norfolk: Courtney, the new earl of Devonſhire, had the honour to bear the ſword; the earl of Weſtmoreland, the cap of maintainance; and the earl of Shrewſbury, the crown: the earl of Worceſter ſerved as carver, ſir John Gage aſſiſted the old ducheſs of Norfolk in bearing the queen's train; the lady Elizabeth and the lady Anne of Cleves graced the ceremony; and the whole was conducted with the utmoſt magnificence. Nor were there wanting numerous creations of knights of all denominations, that of the Garter excepted; and, that her reign might begin at leaſt with the appearance of lenity and mercy? the ſame day was publiſhed what, in its title, was called a general pardon; which, as it could not efface the terror the dreadful examples of her cruelty had already ſpread over the nation, ſo it came out loaded with ſuch a number of exceptions, that few perſons could receive any benefit from it, for all thoſe who had been arreſted before September were excepted by name.

However, in order to gain the good will of the people, a proclamation was iſſued on the fourth of October, which remitted to the ſubject the ſubſidy of four ſhillings on lands, and two ſhillings and eight pence on goods and chattels, granted by the laſt parliament to Edward VI. to enable him to pay his debts: but in a very little time after we find ſeveral ſevere commiſſions iſſued. Holgate archbiſhop of York, not ſhewing himſelf ſatisfied with the court-politics, was ſent priſoner to the Tower on a general accuſation of ſeveral capital crimes; the lords Clinton and Cobham, ſir John York, ſir Richard Cotton, and the biſhop of Ely, were added to the number of ſtate priſoners. Cecil ſeems not to have come near the court, nor to have taken any concern in public affairs; as Petre was the elder ſecretary, and remarkably active in the atrocious tranſaction of Edward's will, it was, perhaps, thought imprudent to attack Cecil while Petre eſcaped; and he took cauſe to give them no other handle: however, it appears by the minutes in the council-book, that he was ordered to ſurrender the ſeal of chancellor of the order of the Garter, though Edward, juſt before his death, had conferred that office on Cecil for life.

But the ſucceſs of all the queen's meaſures depending upon the compliance of the approaching parliament, all manner of illegal and arbitrary practices had been made uſe of to influence elections, and obtain favourable returns. Arts, frauds, and even violence were made uſe of to gain this great point, as the government well knew that without the concurrence and ſanction of a popiſh parliament, the people would never be awed into a compliance with thoſe reſolutions which had been taken to abrogate all the laws made in favour of the Reformation, and to reſtore the popiſh faith. Emiſſaries were diſpatched to every borough, and ſuch returning magiſtrates as were not papiſts, or did not promiſe to conform to the will and commands of the queen, were diſplaced, and their offices filled up by others more devoted to popery: and where a reſolution appeared to oppoſe the court-ſchemes, and to chuſe proteſtant repreſentatives, the electors were threatened, and their bodies frequently impriſoned by falſe actions and other frivolous pretences. In ſome places, where the reformed had ſo great a ſuperiority, that it made it too hazardous to uſe ſuch direct means, the ſheriffs, named by, and devoted to, the court, would return none but ſuch as they were ſure would comply with all the directions of the court. Thus did Mary ſecure a houſe of commons to her mind.

As for the houſe of lords, it might have been imagined, from the majority which, only a few months before, in Edward's reign, appeared ſo ſtrenuouſly to forward the Reformation, that there would have been great difficulty to model them according to the popiſh ſcheme; but, to the amazement of every thinking perſon, thoſe men of honour were all converted to the queen's religion by the mere waving of her royal ſceptre. It may not, perhaps, be very eaſy to determine in which reign the peers diſſembled their ſentiments; but it is evident that they, through fear, avarice, or ambition, were guilty of the moſt baſe and ſcandalous prevarications, as ſoon as the pope's alarm-bell was rung in St. Stephen's chapel. However, to make them more ſecure, we have ſeen that the court beforehand took care to remove ſuch biſhops as might have had courage enough to upbraid their inſincerity; and to replace ſix of them with men who preferred their fees to their religion, which, we are ſorry to ſay, appears to have been the foible of the whole bench, except Dr. Taylor, biſhop of Lincoln, and Dr. Harley, biſhop of Hereford, who therefore were excluded the houſe on the firſt day of the ſeſſion, for refuſing to kneel at the maſs, which, in open defiance of the laws then exiſting, was celebrated before the two houſes in the Latin tongue, accompanied with all the ancient rites and ceremonies of the popiſh church.

Both houſes thus new-modelled by the miniſterial arts, the parliament met on the fifth of October, 1553, and was opened with a ſpeech by Gardiner; but ſat only eight days, to paſs an act declaring nothing to be judged treaſon but what was in the ſtatute of Edward III. and, leſt the perſons then in priſon ſhould take the advantage thereof, all thoſe were excepted who had been committed before the laſt day of the preceding September. Two private acts now paſſed: one for the reſtitution of Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, to his blood; and the other for the reſtitution of his mother, Gertrude Courtney, widow to the marquis of Exeter, his father: after which the parliament, without touching the leaſt on religion, was prorogued to the twenty-fourth of the month.

At the ſecond meeting, after the uſual formalities, they proceeded to buſineſs, and in three days time paſſed a bill that repealed the divorce of the queen's mother, for which they aſſigned the following reaſons: "That no man ought to put aſunder whom God hath joined together. That king Henry's ſcruples had been ſuggeſted by malicious perſons, and ſupported by the deciſions of ſome univerſities, the members of which had been previouſly ſecured by bribery and corruption. Laſtly, That archbiſhop Cranmer, thinking himſelf more wiſe than all the other doctors, had raſhly pronounced the ſaid ſentence of divorce." As this act was neceſſary to eſtabliſh the queen's legitimacy, ſo it had another tendency of great ſervice to Mary, as it at the ſame time declared the princeſs Elizabeth to be illegitimate, and conſequently from this time we find Mary's behaviour towards that princeſs very much changed for the worſe.

This point being ſettled, Gardiner, who had planned out the buſineſs to be done by this parliament, and was the chief manager therein, engaged the lords, on the thirty-firſt, to ſend a bill down to the commons, to reſtore the maſs, or form of public worſhip uſed in the laſt year of Henry VIII. which was ſent back by the commons, with their approbation, ſix days after. The parliament then proceeded to the repeal of nine laws made in the late reign, in favour of the reformation, and in contradiction to the authority and uſages of the Romiſh church. Another act paſſed againſt inſulting prieſts, and another againſt unlawful aſſemblies and riots. Then they reverſed the attainder of the duke of Norfolk, and confirmed thoſe of the duke of Northumberland, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Warwick, the lord Ambroſe Dudley, ſir Henry Dudley, ſir John Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer. Beſides the acts here mentioned, ſeveral others were paſſed, which would have done honour to better times and a more virtuous reign; but all were calculated as gildings to the pill of popery, which, by the ſtatute already mentioned, was to be thruſt down the throats of the people.

On the thirteenth of November, the parliament being ſtill ſitting, lady Jane Grey, lord Guildford Dudley, her huſband, the two other ſons of the duke of Northumberland, and Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, were brought to their trials; who all confeſſing their indictments, received ſentence of death as traitors. When the priſoners were remanded back to the Tower, they met with ſuch unuſual indulgences, that they had reaſon to think the bitterneſs of death to be over-paſt; but, in my opinion, the event clearly ſhewed that the queen and her miniſtry had, from the very beginning, marked out Cranmer, together with the lady Jane Grey and her huſband, for death.

However readily the parliament gratified the queen in ſome points ſhe had ſet her heart upon, they were yet determined to follow their own judgments in other articles, and in particular that of the queen's marriage, which was now brought before them. Upon the death of Edward, cardinal Dandini, the pope's legate at Bruſſels, had ſent over an agent, whoſe name was Commendani, to ſound the inclinations of Mary, who told him that her intention was to re-eſtabliſh the papal authority in England, and deſired that his holineſs would ſend over cardinal Pole as his legate; at the ſame time ſhe exhorted Commendani to continue the diſguiſe in which he had come to England, that her deſigns might not be too precipitately divulged. The pope being made acquainted with her deſire, adviſed with his conſiſtory, who declared it would not be for the honour of the holy ſee to ſend over a legate until one ſhould be demanded in form; but the pope giving them to underſtand, that he knew more than he thought proper to diſcloſe on that ſubject, they aſſented to the propoſal.

The nomination of Pole to this office was equally diſagreeable to the emperor and biſhop Gardiner. Charles had projected a match between his ſon Philip and Mary, and was apprehenſive of the ſcheme's miſcarrying by the interpoſition of Pole, whom it was reported the queen intended to take for her huſband; as was alſo ſaid in relation to Courtney, earl of Devonſhire: but neither of theſe reports ſeem to have had any foundation in truth. Gardiner, on the other hand, foreſaw that the legate would ſlip between him and the archbiſhopric of Canterbury (which he hoped to obtain on the deprivation of Cranmer), and deſtroy all his influence at court.

Accordingly, as Pole was haſting for England through the emperor's dominions, that prince, as had been preconcerted between him and Gardiner, ordered ordered him to be detained at Dilling, a town of Germany, on the Danube, under pretexts that Pole did not ſee into: in the mean time Gardiner was inceſſantly repreſenting to the queen, that Pole would ruin her intentions in favour of the Roman catholic religion, by his untimely and furious zeal; and the emperor wrote to her on the ſame ſubject, in the moſt earneſt manner. D'Aumont, the emperor's reſident at London, had orders to propoſe to the queen a match between her and Philip, prince of Spain, eldeſt ſon of Charles; and at the ſame time begged her to open to his ambaſſador her mind fully upon that head, and to enter with him (Charles) into an unreſerved correſpondence, without uſing any of thoſe troubleſome formalities ſo common amongſt crowned heads.

Mary, who was highly pleaſed with the ſupport of ſo powerful an alliance, and deſirous of uniting herſelf more intimately with her mother's family, embraced the propoſal with the utmoſt alacrity. This match was alſo ſtrongly recommended by Norfolk, Arundel, and Paget; and Gardiner, who was now prime miniſter, cloſed in entirely with the emperor, whoſe confidence he had won, and whoſe friendſhip he thought more neceſſary, as he plainly ſaw he was not truſted by the court of Rome, who had never acquainted him with the private negociation ſet on foot with Mary, through the means of Commendani. In a word, Mary was perſuaded to write to cardinal Pole, that the intereſt of religion would not permit him to come over immediately to England, where the people were not yet properly diſpoſed to acknowledge the pope's authority.

Mean while the negociation for the marriage was conducted with equal diligence and ſucceſs, and Mary's intentions in this parliament were ſoon known to the whole nation, who were greatly alarmed with the thoughts of ſuch an alliance, and could not brook a Spaniſh king to rule over them, eſpecially one who had already patronized the inquiſition in his own dominions, and recorded his cruelty with the blood he had moſt tyranically ſhed ſo lately in the Low Countries, Naples, Sicily, and Milan; but matters were ſo far advanced that the houſe of commons took it into conſideration, being equally ſurprized and enraged to hear that the queen was determined to contract a foreign alliance; and, after ſome debate, in which the popiſh party in the houſe was entirely ſilenced, they ſent their ſpeaker, ſir John Pollard, an eminent lawyer, with a deputation of twenty members with an addreſs to the queen againſt the marriage; which ſhe ſo ill received, that, notwithſtanding their former obſequiouſneſs, the parliament was diſſolved the very next day, the ſixth of December, in order to be rid of their importunities.

During this ſeſſion, the convocation, ſitting as uſual, re-eſtabliſhed the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the reformers, of whom but few divines attended; the chief of thoſe who did were Aylmer, Cheney (afterwards a biſhop), Philpot (who, in this reign, was burned), Hatton, dean of Exeter, and Philips, dean of Rocheſter. Theſe, notwithſtanding the violence of the popiſh party, attempted to juſtify the Reformation; and Philpot in particular behaved with great dignity and ſpirit in the ridiculous debate which was held on the ſubject of tranſubſtantiation, the particulars of which may be found in Fox, who publiſhed them while moſt of the members were alive, who would not have failed to have treated him ſeverely, had his veracity been queſtionable. By his account, theſe champions for the true faith were reviled, threatened, inſulted, and interrupted in all their arguments, and the victory was forcibly adjudged to their adverſaries; for by this time no leſs than one hundred and ſixty benefices had been beſtowed on the creatures of the court, and of conſequence there were very few proteſtants in the lower houſe of convocation. It is remarkable, that notwithſtanding all that Mary was doing to introduce the papal authority into her dominions, ſhe, in the writ of ſummons to this convocation, aſſumed the title of "Supreme Head of the Churches of England and Ireland."

By this time every thing was agreed upon between the Engliſh and Imperial courts, and, about the middle of December, the emperor ſent over the (afterwards famous) count Egmont, at the head of a magnificent embaſſy, to regulate the conditions of the marriage; and the queen entruſted Gardiner with the care of the whole negociation. This prelate had already received one million two hundred thouſand crowns from the emperor, to render certain individuals of the council propitious to the match; and now he affected to inſiſt upon conditions that ſhould be very advantageous to England. The Imperial ambaſſadors arriving on the ſecond of January, 1554*, were conducted to court, where their entertainment was extremely magnificent; and in a few days the articles of the marriage were ſigned at London, after all poſſible care being taken to ſweeten them for the palate of the people: the ſubſtance of them was as follows.

"I. That Philip ſhould enjoy the title of king of the realms and dominions belonging to his wife, and aſſiſt her in the government thereof, the queen alone having the free diſpoſition of biſhoprics, benefices, revenues, offices, and favours, to be given only to natives (who were alſo to have the ſole management of affairs) and the laws, cuſtoms, and privileges of the nation being preſerved inviolate.

"II. That the queen ſhould likewiſe bear the titles of all her huſband's realms, with which he was at preſent or ſhould be afterwards inveſted.

"III. That a jointure of ſixty thouſand pounds a year ſhould be ſettled on her; forty thouſand pounds thereof in Spain, and the reſt in the Low Countries.

"IV. That the queen's iſſue by this marriage ſhould inherit her realms according to the Engliſh conſtitution.

"V. That if don Carlos, Philip's ſon by his firſt wife (all whoſe rights in Spain, the two Sicilies, and Lombardy, were reſerved to him) ſhould die without iſſue, or his line be extinct, the eldeſt ſon by this marriage ſhould inherit thoſe territories, as well as Burgundy and the Low Countries, to which laſt his ſucceſſion was abſolutely aſſured: the younger children to have portions aſſigned them here and in England.

* When the ambaſſadors landed in Kent, they were both ſurprized and terrified with the reception they met with from the people, who thought that the prince of Spain was in their company, and therefore attacked them ſo furiouſly, that (as count Egmont himſelf wrote over to his court) they were obliged to fly for their lives.

"VI. That neither don Carlos nor any deſcendant of his ſhould lay any claim to Burgundy and the Low Countries, if there was any male iſſue by this marriage, nor were theſe laſt to pretend any right to Spain, or that prince's other dominions, if he left any children.

"VII. That if only females ſhould be born by this matrimony, the eldeſt ſhould ſucceed to the Low Countries, but not to marry a foreigner without don Carlos's conſent: if ſhe did, her right was forfeited and reverted to don Carlos and his heirs, till the extinction of his line; after which ſhe and her ſiſter (no males remaining) were again intitled to the ſucceſſion.

"VIII. That the line of don Carlos being extinct, and none left of this but women, the eldeſt daughter ſhould ſucceed, not only in the Low Countries and Burgundy, but alſo in England and Spain, and the other dominions, according to the cuſtoms of thoſe countries; all the rights, privileges, and uſages whereof were to be maintained, and the adminiſtration kept in the hands of natives.

"IX. That the treaty for mutual aſſiſtance made A.D. 1542, and declared at Utrecht, on the ſixteenth of January, 1546, ſhould be faithfully obſerved by the queen, the emperor, the prince, and his ſucceſſors, and their reſpective realms and dominions*."

Theſe are ſome of the principal articles of this treaty of marriage, to which a clauſe was annexed, by which it was expreſly covenanted, that, before the conſummation of the marriage, Philip ſhould ſolemnly ſwear to the obſervation of the following articles.

"I. That he would not promote or admit any foreigners into any place of truſt or office in England.

"II. That he would take a convenient number of Engliſh into his houſhold, and not ſuffer them to receive any diſpleaſure from ſuch as he brought with him in his retinue.

"III. That he would make no innovation in the ſtate, laws, and cuſtoms of England; but maintain all orders of men in their rights and privileges.

"IV. That he ſhould not carry the queen abroad, unleſs at her own requeſt; nor ſend any of her children by him out of England (where they were to be educated) without the conſent of the nobility; and that in caſe ſhe died before him, without iſſue, he would not challenge any right at all in the kingdom, but permit the ſucceſſion to deſcend to the right heir, according to the conſtitution.

"V. That he would take care that all the forts and places of the realm ſhould be kept by natives; that he would not alienate any of its appurtenances, nor ſuffer them to be uſurped; and would not carry away any jewels, nor convey ſhips, guns, or ordnance for war or defence, out of the kingdom, but keep them in good repair.

"And laſtly, that he would do his utmoſt to maintain the peace between France and England; but without derogating from the treaty of 1542: and he was to be at liberty to aſſiſt his father in the defence of his realms and dominions, and in revenging the injuries he had received."

Theſe articles were well enough calculated for the advantage of England, had there been any ſecurity for their being obſerved, or any means of redreſs left the Engliſh in caſe of a violation, which they had much reaſon to expect from the ill faith and immeaſurable ambition of the emperor. The whole was ſigned on Friday the twelfth of January, by the Imperial ambaſſadors, and by Gardiner, lord-chancellor, the earl of Arundel, the lord Paget, ſir Robert Rocheſter, and ſir William Petre, the queen's commiſſioners; and on the Sunday and Monday following, were communicated by Gardiner to the nobility at court, and to the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, with a pompous account of the advantages thereof to the realm, and an high encomium of Philip.

This declaration, however, did not cure the jealouſies of the people, who feared that the Spaniards would now become abſolute lords of the kingdom, and have the management of all affairs; and that, aboliſhing the ancient laws, they would eſtabliſh an inſupportable ſlavery in the land as a conquered country; and their diſcontents flamed out in ſuch a manner, as threatened a ſudden and fierce rebellion; and had the malecontents been ſupported by any foreign power, or headed by any great man of abilities of their own country, the authority of the queen would have been expoſed to the moſt imminent danger; for ſcarcely were the marriage-articles ſigned, when news came to court that the people of ſeveral counties had taken up arms, reſolving to oppoſe with all their might the queen's intended marriage with Philip.

It ſeems that ſir Thomas Wyat, a gentleman of Kent, very conſiderable on account of his great fortune, and ſtill more ſo by the opinion the world had of his virtues and abilities, believing it would be much better to prevent than to remedy evils, had engaged to arm the men of Kent, as ſir Peter Carew, a gentleman of great intereſt in the Weſt of England, did to aſſemble the inhabitants of Devonſhire; and theſe two had perſuaded the duke of Suffolk to engage with them, by the hopes of reſtoring his daughter, the lady Jane Grey, to the throne, and he had promiſed to attempt to raiſe the Midland counties. Carew, however, prompted either by his impetuoſity, or his apprehenſions, took up arms before the day appointed; but his troops were ſoon diſperſed by a body of the queen's forces, and he himſelf was forced to take refuge in France, but was ſoon after taken at Bruſſels, and brought over priſoner to England, where he made his peace with the government, and died quietly in 1577. The duke of Suffolk had a harder deſtiny: he left London on the twenty-fifth of January, and went to his own houſe at Sheen, from whence he fled with his two brothers towards Leiceſterſhire, inviting the people by placards all the way to join him in his endeavours to reſcue the nation from a foreign yoke; but he could only get fifty horſe about his perſon, when he was informed that the earl of Huntingdon was advancing, at the head of ſome hundreds, to ſeize him. Upon this intelligence, which proved true, he diſmiſſed his followers, and committed himſelf to the care of a ſervant, who betrayed him to that nobleman, by whom he was brought up to London, and his brothers were taken ſoon after.

Wyat's attempt was at firſt more ſucceſsful, and ſeemed to threaten more fatal conſequences; for, having got out of London, he ſummoned his friends into the field on the twenty-fifth of January, and was immediately joined by ſir Henry Iſley, ſir George Harper, the two Knevets, ſir Thomas Colepepper, the two ſons of the lord Cobham, and many gentlemen of the firſt diſtinction in Kent. The firſt meaſure after this, was to diſpatch through the county proper perſons to raiſe the people, and he, with ſome of his moſt truſty followers, retired to Rocheſter, where he took poſſeſſion of the bridge, and fortified the eaſt part of the city, which he intended as the rendezvous for his party; at the ſame time he ordered a manifeſto to be publiſhed at Maidſtone, and other places of the county, againſt the queen's marriage, and invited all Engliſhmen to join him in his endeavours to defend England from the inſolent and tyrannical rule of a foreigner. Theſe proclamations were in ſome places oppoſed by the government; but the people in general inclined to flock to his ſtandard.

Certain advice of this rebellion being brought to court, it threw the queen and her council into great conſternation, as they were at preſent quite unprepared to ſtem any vigorous efforts from a diſcontented people, the forces that uſhered Mary up to the throne having been diſbanded: it was therefore reſolved to ſend a herald to Wyatt with aſſurance of a full pardon, provided he would lay down his arms in twenty-four hours; but the herald not being ſuffered to deliver his commiſſion, the duke of Norfolk was hurried away with no more than ſix hundred of the city trained-bands and the queen's guards, who ſoon came up with the rebels; but at the very inſtant that the duke of Norfolk ordered his batteries to play upon them, he ſaw the London forces wave their hats, and, calling out, "A Wyatt! a Wyatt! we are all Engliſhmen!" appeared advancing againſt himſelf, to attack him. This piece of treachery threw the duke into ſuch a conſternation, that he, with the earl of Arundel, and ſir Henry Jernegan, captain of the queen's guard, ſought for ſafety in a precipitate flight, nor was it without great difficulty that they eſcaped with their perſons, leaving the rebels maſters of the field, of the duke's baggage, and eight pieces of braſs cannon. This diſgrace is ſaid to have broke the duke of Norfolk's heart. The deſertion of the Londoners appears to have been owing to the perſuaſion of Brett, one of their captains, who was wrought upon by ſir Thomas Harper, who had the night before, with that purpoſe, left Wyatt, and pretended to ſurrender himſelf to the duke of Norfolk.

Wyatt finding himſelf now reinforced to the number of four thouſand men, and fully perſuaded that the Londoners would open their gates to him, and declare in his favour, advanced, on the thirty-firſt of January, towards the metropolis, and was got as far as Dartford with his artillery, when he was again met by two meſſengers from the queen (the lord Haſtings and ſir Thomas Cornwallis) who offered to confer with him, and, in the queen's name, promiſed him every reaſonable ſatisfaction he ſhould demand. This conceſſion ſeems to have turned the weak head of Wyatt; he already thought himſelf invincible, and had the inſolence to demand poſſeſſion of the Tower and of the queen's perſon, and that the council ſhould be changed at his pleaſure. Haſtings, who was a paſſionate but honeſt man, could not bear this traiterous demand with any patience, and, bidding Wyatt defiance, he and Cornwallis returned to court.

The next day, being the ſecond of February, the queen went to Guildhall, where, in a ſpeech to the citizens, ſhe acquainted them with Wyatt's treaſonable demands, telling them ſhe had done nothing in her marriage without the advice of her council, and declared her reſolution to ſtay and throw herſelf upon the protection of her faithful city of London; though at the ſame time ſhe had taken care to poſt five hundred foreign troops well armed in ſeveral parts thereof.

This ſpeech at Guildhall, from a ſovereign, ſo tickled the ears of the city council, that they ordered the bridge to be ſtrongly barricadoed and guarded, ſo that, on the third of February, when Wyatt was advanced as far as Southwark, and thought to paſs over the bridge into the city, he found himſelf ſhut out; and therefore, after a ſhort conſultation, he reſolved to croſs the Thames at Kingſton; accordingly marching thither with all expedition, to his great diſappointment found the bridge there broken down. This obliged him to halt for ſome time, in order to repair it, which being done, he paſſed it with his army, being now increaſed to ſix thouſand men, with whom he arrived in Hyde Park about nine o'clock of the morning of the ſeventh of February; but here being detained ſome hours by the breaking down of one of the cannon, which he, contrary to the advice of all about him, would ſtay to repair, ſir Thomas Harper, who had been ſo ſerviceable in bringing over the London troops, deſerted him, and, poſting to the court at Whitehall, diſcovered Wyatt's intention to march through Weſtminſter, and enter the city at Ludgate.

However, this would not have fruſtrated his ſcheme, had he not been ſtill poſſeſſed with a belief that the citizens would favour his undertaking: on which preſumption, leaving his cannon, under a guard, on that ſpot now called Conſtitution Hill, he marched down directly towards Charing-croſs; but on his way was attacked in flank by a party of light horſe, under the earl of Pembroke, about the ſpot where St. James's ſtreet is now built, and a ſkirmiſh enſued, by which one part of Wyatt's men was cut off from the other. This attack ruined Wyatt, for in it he loſt the beſt part of his followers: nevertheleſs, he ſtill continued his march leiſurely along the Strand, expecting to be rejoined by his diſperſed followers.

In his way he was oppoſed by ſir John Gage, the lord-chamberlain, at the head of a thouſand men, but thoſe he quickly put to flight: and, perſuing his march, came before Ludgate, where he demanded admiſſion, but in vain, all the poſts of importance at the gate and elſewhere being ſtrongly guarded by lord William Howard, and other friends of government; Wyatt therefore, inſtead of admiſſion at Ludgate, received nothing but reproaches, and finding himſelf in no condition to force the gate (ſo many of his followers having ſlunk away, that he had not above a thouſand men about him), he was obliged to return; but being informed that his retreat was cut off by barricadoes, and the earl of Pembroke's troops at Temple-bar, he diſcovered his danger, and gave all over for loſt. At that inſtant, Clarencieux, king of arms, was ſent in the queen's name, to require him to ſurrender, with a promiſe of pardon for him and his men if they would lay down their arms: while Wyatt was pauſing on this ſummons, ſir Maurice Berkeley happening to paſs on horſeback, Wyatt called out to him, as knowing him to be a gentleman, and delivering up his ſword, Berkeley carried him along with him, on the ſame horſe, priſoner to Whitehall. Knevet, Cobham, and the reſt of Wyatt's followers, likewiſe ſubmitted; and the queen in a few minutes, from her own palace-windows, beheld thoſe led captives from whom ſhe had expected in a ſhort time to receive laws; for ſo great had been the conſternation at court, that Weſton, who ſaid maſs the day of Wyatt's defeat, which was Aſh Wedneſday, wore armour under his clerical habit.

Such was the event of this conſpiracy: and if it had only drawn vengeance on the heads of the principal actors, they might have been ſaid to meet the juſt reward of their folly. But it produced two conſiderable effects; the one fatal to an illuſtrious innocent perſon, and the other to all proteſtants, though religion had no ſhare in this inſurrection: but, as the queen's darling point was to reſtore popery, and finding her power ſtrengthened by the ill ſucceſs of the conſpirators, ſhe made an handle of the affair to ruin the reformed and their religion.

As the duke of Suffolk was concerned in the conſpiracy, the court eaſily conceived his deſign was to replace his daughter, the lady Jane, on the throne; and this determined the queen to ſacrifice her to her own ſafety, whom ſhe had before only hated on account of her religion. Accordingly Fakenham, abbot of Weſtminſter, was ſent, two days after the ſurrender of Wyatt, to announce the fatal meſſage of death to the lady Jane and her huſband, who were ſtill priſoners in the Tower, under ſentence of death. This meſſage was received by Jane with great compoſure, it being what ſhe had long expected, and which the innocence of her life, as well as the long train of calamities which ſhe had ſuffered, made her conſider as no unwelcome tidings. Dr. Fakenham, who brought them, informed her he had obtained a reſpite of three days for her, in which time he tried all his endeavours to make her change her religion: but Jane, even in theſe her mournful circumſtances, had preſence of mind ſufficient not only to defend her faith with equal learning and eloquence, but alſo to write a letter in the Greek language to her ſiſter Catherine, in which, beſides ſending her a copy of the New Teſtament, ſhe exhorted her in the moſt preſſing manner to maintain, in every condition of life, a like ſteady and unſhaken perſeverance with herſelf.

On the twelfth of February, the day appointed for her execution, her huſband the lord Guilford, who was doomed to ſuffer at the ſame time, deſired he might be allowed to ſee her, but ſhe refuſed to comply with his requeſt, and ſent him word that the tenderneſs of a parting interview would, ſhe feared, too much affect their ſpirits, and render them unable to meet their approaching fate with that magnanimity which befitted their condition; the wretched huſband acquieſced, and from the window of her priſon ſhe beheld him carried to execution, and from the ſame window ſaw his body and head return in a cart. It had been propoſed to execute them both together; but the council fearing that the compaſſion of the people for their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, might excite ſome dangerous commotion, thought proper to alter their reſolution, and gave orders that ſhe ſhould ſuffer on a ſcaffold within the Tower: accordingly ſhe was led forth from her apartment to the block, where, to the laſt moment, ſhe ſhewed great conſtancy and piety, and an immoveable adherence to the proteſtant faith; yet acknowleged that ſhe thought herſelf culpable in ſuffering herſelf to be perſuaded to accept a crown that did not belong to her; and then ſubmitting her neck to the ſtroke of the executioner, her head was ſevered from her body. Thus fell the lady Jane Grey, before ſhe had attained the ſeventeenth year of her age.

On the fourteenth and fifteenth of February, Bret, the commander of the city trained-bands, who had deſerted to Wyatt, and fifty-eight more, were hanged: Wyatt, indeed, was reſpited for two months, in hopes he would make ſome conſiderable diſcoveries, having already unjuſtly accuſed the earl of Devonſhire and the princeſs Elizabeth, and promiſed to give information againſt other great perſonages, of being concerned with him in the late conſpiracy. How improbable ſoever his accuſations might ſeem to the unprejudiced, the queen, Gardiner, and Arundel were willing to believe any thing that might affect the princeſs, or any others that were ſuſpected to be friends to the Reformation; therefore the earl of Devonſhire was committed to the Tower, and Elizabeth, though at that time much indiſpoſed, was brought to London, and cloſely confined at Whitehall for a fortnight, without liberty of ſpeaking to any perſon; and after that committed to the Tower.

On the ſeventeenth, the duke of Suffolk was tried by his peers, the earl of Arundel acting as high-ſteward, and found guilty, in conſequence of which he ſuffered death on the twenty-third, on Tower-hill. In the courſe of the ſame month, ſir James Crofts, ſir Edward Warner, Thomas, late clerk of the council, and ſir Nicholas Throgmorton, were committed to priſon, upon ſome hints dropped by Wyatt. The lord Grey, the duke of Suffolk's brother, was executed, with about two-and-twenty of his followers and friends. But a little to qualify theſe ſeverities the marquis of Northampton, the lord Cobham, ſir William Cobham, Colepepper, Vane, and ſome other gentlemen, were, on the fourth of March, releaſed out of the Tower of London; and about ſix hundred of the common men concerned in the late rebellion, being brought before the palace at Whitehall, with halters about their necks, upon making the proper ſubmiſſion, received their pardon from the queen in perſon. Of all who were tried, none appear to have eſcaped being condemned, except ſir Nicholas Throgmorton; and his deliverance was owing to the amazing ſpirit and abilities he diſcovered upon his trial. He called upon the court to produce any one overt-act of the treaſon of which he had been indicted; and no ſolid proofs appearing againſt him, the jury, after a long trial, brought him in Not Guilty: for which, upon the attorney-general's motion, they were bound over, and afterwards committed, proſecuted, and ſeverely fined. Thus did the iniquitous judges of theſe days endeavour to convince the juries, that they were no longer to have the liberty of judging according to their conſciences; but that, inſtead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the queen and her council ſtood affected to the priſoner, and by that to determine their verdict.

The government had, for ſome time, delayed the execution of Wyatt, that they might make all the advantage they could of his diſcoveries. Ever ſince his confinement he had acted with a puſillanimity as unavailing to himſelf as dangerous to others; but having now no longer hopes of ſaving his own life by drawing the innocent into condemnation, he, upon his trial, fully cleared the princeſs Elizabeth, the earl of Devonſhire, and others, by retracting all he had ſaid to their prejudice; and, being brought to execution on the eleventh of April, acquitted them to the public, with his dying breath: yet Elizabeth was not only kept confined in the Tower, but, to deprive her even of that little comfort ſhe received from the humanity and diſtinction with which the conſtable, the lord Chandois, treated her, ſhe was, on the ſixteenth of May, committed to the cuſtody of lord Williams. But there being no longer any pretence to retain her or the earl of Devonſhire priſoners in that place, ſhe was removed to Woodſtock, and he to Fotheringay caſtle, both of them ſtill under a guard. In this condition the princeſs Elizabeth continued for near two years, when ſhe was ſo far indulged to live at her own houſe; but even then ſhe was beſet by the queen's ſpies and guards.

The queen no ſooner found herſelf delivered from the danger apprehended from Wyatt's conſpiracy, than ſhe, with redoubled vigour, reſumed her deſign of an entire deſtruction of the Reformation in England, in which ſhe was not a little aſſiſted by Gardiner, who now bore all the ſway. Sir John Williams, on the eighth of March, by order of the council, received from the Tower of London Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and carried them down to Oxford, there to diſpute concerning their faith. It is eaſy to conceive that thoſe in power aſſumed the victory: on the third of May, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, were adjudged obſtinate heretics. As for Cranmer, he being already attainted of treaſon, was pardoned of that, that he might die the more painful death of an heretic. The maſs was every where reſtored; the marriage of prieſts was ſtrictly forbidden; and all thoſe who had already taken wives, amounting, as is ſuppoſed, to no leſs than three fourths of the Engliſh clergy, were inſtantly deprived of their livings. A viſitation was appointed, to enforce a ſpeedy and general compliance with theſe orders. Among other articles the commiſſioners were enjoined to forbid the clergy to take the oath of ſupremacy, on their receiving any benefice. It is remarkable that this oath had been eſtabliſhed by the laws of king Henry VIII. which were ſtill unrepealed. But the ſtorm did not end here, it fell with greater force upon many of the ſuperior clergy; for a ſpecial commiſſion was given to Gardiner, Tonſtal, Bonner, Parſen, biſhop of St. Aſaph, Day of Chicheſter, and Kitchin of Llandaff, to deprive Holgate, archbiſhop of York, Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, Bird of Cheſter, and Buſh of Briſtol, then under confinement as recuſants. Two days after, Taylor, biſhop Lincoln, Hooper of Gloceſter, and Harley of Hereford, underwent the like ſentence of deprivation, on an accuſation of having behaved themſelves ill and preached erroneous doctrines. In the room of the deprived biſhops were placed others, who were known to be ſtaunch friends to the papiſtical doctrine and ſuperſtition.

Theſe violent and arbitrary proceedings could not fail to inflame the reſentment of the proteſtants, who inveighed with great acrimony againſt the preſent government: nevertheleſs, the miniſtry, knowing them to be neceſſary to ſecure an intereſt in the houſe of lords and in the convocation, ſupported them with an air of juſtice, founded upon a clauſe in the letters patent of Edward VI. in which it was provided that biſhops ſhould hold their biſhoprics ſo long as they behaved themſelves well ("quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint,") and therefore it was alledged, the queen did them no injuſtice by depriving them, when their conduct was ſuch as proved diſpleaſing to her. Such was the conſtitution of the ſtate and church when the new parliament met on the ſecond of April, 1554.

Before this time Gardiner had received vaſt remittances from the emperor, which he had employed in corrupting the members to a degree till then unprecedented in England. Gardener, as chancellor, opened the ſeſſion by a ſpeech; in which he maintained the queen's hereditary title to the crown; affirmed ſhe had a right to chuſe a huſband for herſelf; obſerved the good uſe ſhe had made of that right, by preferring an old ally, ſprung from the houſe of Burgundy; and mentioned the failure of Henry VIII's poſterity, of whom there were none ſurviving but the queen and the lady Elizabeth.

He ſubjoined, that, in order to prevent the calamities which might be occaſioned by different pretenders, it was neceſſary to grant the queen a power of diſpoſing of the crown, and of naming her ſucceſſor: a power, he ſaid, which ought not to be conſidered as a new thing in England, ſince it had been formerly beſtowed upon Henry VIII.

The parliament were ſufficiently inclined to gratify the queen in all her deſires; but when the liberty, independency, and even the very being of the nation, were expoſed to ſuch imminent danger, they could not by any means be perſuaded to comply.

They were acquainted with the inveterate hatred which ſhe bore to the lady Elizabeth, and with her ſtrong attachment to the houſe of Auſtria: they remembered her bigotry and ſuperſtition, which would prompt her to prefer the eſtabliſhment of the catholic religion to all conſiderations of juſtice and national intereſt: they obſerved that Gardiner, in his ſpeech, had carefully avoided the giving Elizabeth the title of the queen's ſiſter; and they thence inferred, that a deſign was formed of declaring her illegitimate: they apprehended, that Mary, if inveſted with ſuch a power as ſhe demanded, would bequeath the crown to her huſband, and, by that means, make England a province of the Spaniſh monarchy: and they were the more inclined to entertain theſe ſuſpicions, when they heard, that Philip's deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter was carefully traced and explained, and that he was publicly repreſented as the true and only heir by right of inheritance.

The parliament, therefore, ſenſible of their danger, was reſolved to keep at a diſtance from the precipice, on the brink of which they ſtood. They could not help confirming the articles of marriage, which were extremely advantageous to England; but they refuſed to agree to any ſuch law as the chancellor recommended: they would not ſo much much as declare it treaſon to imagine or attempt the death of the queen's huſband, while ſhe was alive; and a bill brought in for that purpoſe was rejected at its firſt reading.

In order to deprive Philip of all hopes of ever being able to exerciſe any authority in England, they enacted a law, importing, "that her majeſty, as their only queen, ſhould ſolely, and as ſole queen, enjoy the crown and ſovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courteſy of the realm, or by any other means."

This parliament paſſed a law for erecting anew the biſhopric of Durham, which had been diſſolved by the laſt parliament of Edward. The queen had already, by virtue of her prerogative, reſtored Tonſtal to the poſſeſſion of that ſee; but, though the crown was, at that time, accuſtomed to exerciſe authority which might ſeem entirely legiſlative, it was always deemed more ſafe and ſatisfactory to obtain the conſent of parliament.

Bills were brought in for ſuppreſſing the many erroneous opinions contained in books, as well as for reviving the law of the Six Articles, together with thoſe againſt the Lollards, againſt hereſy and erroneous preaching; but all theſe bills were rejected by the two houſes: a proof, that however inclinable the parliament might be to gratify the court in ſome points, they were yet determined to follow their own judgment in other particulars. The queen, therefore, finding that they would not pay an implicit obedience to her will, thought proper to put an end to the ſeſſion by diſſolving them on the fifth of May.

The parliament having confirmed the articles of marriage between the queen and the prince of Spain, and Mary being impatient to be more nearly connected with her young conſort, the earl of Suſſex was ſent over, immediately after the breaking up of the parliament, with a ſtrong ſquadron under admiral Winter, to bring the prince of Spain to England, where he actually arrived, at Southampton, on the nineteenth of July. On his firſt ſetting foot on ſhore, Philip drew his ſword, and carried it naked for ſome time; and when the magiſtrates of that port preſented him with the keys of that town, he returned them without vouchſafing to ſpeak a ſingle word; both which circumſtances cauſed various reflections in the minds of the ſpectators, not greatly to the advantage of his Spaniſh highneſs. The queen had ſet out on a progreſs to the Weſt, that ſhe might meet her bridegroom at Wincheſter, where ſhe intended to be married, and where the ceremony was accordingly performed by Gardiner, with great magnificence, on Wedneſday the twenty-fifth of July, being the feaſt of St. James, the tutelar ſaint of Spain, Mary being in her thirty-ninth year, and older than Philip by eleven years and three months; the marquis of Wincheſter, with the earls of Arundel, Derby, Bedford, and Pembroke, performing the ceremony of giving her away in the name of the kingdom. The Imperial ambaſſador had, before the ſolemnity, preſented Philip with an inſtrument, containing the emperor's reſignation and ceſſion to him of the two Sicilies; and, as ſoon as it was over, Garter king at arms, attended by the heralds, publiſhed the ſtyles of the royal pair, in Latin, French, and Engliſh, proclaiming "Philip and Mary, king and queen of England, Ireland, and France, Naples and Jeruſalem, defenders of the faith, princes of Spain and Sicily, archdukes of Auſtria, dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant, counts of Hapſburg, Flanders, and Tyrol."

The marriage being conſummated, Philip ordered his treaſure to be landed, conſiſting of twenty-ſeven cheſts, each a yard and four inches long, filled with bullion, with ninety-nine horſe-loads and two cart-loads of gold and ſilver coin; which infuſed freſh zeal for the queen's intereſt into thoſe who had been before retained by Gardiner. In the beginning of Auguſt, the court removed for London; ſtopping at Windſor, Philip was there inſtalled a knight of the Garter: at length, on the eighteenth of the ſame month, they made a pompous entry into London, where pageants and triumphal arches had been erected, and other marks of rejoicing were exhibited, at a vaſt expence, the obſequious city-council having taxed the citizens at the rate of a fifteenth and a half to provide for the magnificent reception of the queen and her new conſort. After a ſhort ſtay at Whitehall, they diſmiſſed their train of nobility, and then returning to Hampton-court, made that palace their ordinary reſidence. But Philip's grave manner and reſerved air gave great diſguſt to the Engliſh: none were ſuffered to come into either his or the queen's preſence without a formal demand of an audience, as is practiſed by ambaſſadors. This rendered the court entirely unfrequented, the Engliſh nobility not enduring to conform to a cuſtom ſo oppoſite to their own.

The reſt of this ſummer was ſpent in the election of proper members to conſtitute the next parliament, under the influence of the prime miniſter, Gardiner, and his emiſſaries, in which no endeavours, by bribery, corruption, ſoothing, or menacing, were omitted to gain their ends. About the latter end of September died, full of years, the old duke of Norfolk, about twelve months after he had received his liberty; and was ſucceeded in his titles and honours by his grand-ſon, Thomas Howard, ſon to the earl of Surry, beheaded in the laſt year of the reign of Henry VIII.

The parliament, which met on the eleventh of November, was ſo well ſecured to the court principles and intereſt by Philip's money, that they wanted only an opportunity to ſignalize their zeal. At its firſt meeting, the king and queen rode together on horſeback, in their robes, to the parliament-houſe, with two ſwords and two caps of maintenance borne before them. And now the court was ſo well aſſured of the parliament's concurrence with, and confirmation of, all their actions, that they diſpatched the lords Paget and Haſtings, with Cecil, the late ſecretary, in their train, to bring over cardinal Pole, in the character of the pope's legate, before any law was paſſed to reſtore the papal authority: indeed the parliament made it one of their firſt acts, on ſitting down, to take off the cardinal's attainder, which had paſſed upon him in the reign of Henry VIII. and by which he remained liable to a ſentence of death. The ambaſſadors arrived at Bruſſels on the eleventh of November; and having, to the no ſmall ſatisfaction of the cardinal, delivered their commiſſion, they landed with his eminence on the twenty-fourth at the Tower.

A guardian-angel could not have been received with more pomp and greater reſpect than he was by the king and queen. Mary, in particular, was ſo over-joyed at ſeeing him enter the preſence-chamber to pay his reſpects to her, that ſhe declared aloud ſhe felt the child leap in her womb on the occaſion: ſome of the ſervile herd of flatterers who were about her caught the hint, and ſcrupled not to declare that as John the Baptiſt leaped in his mother's womb at the ſalutation of the Virgin, ſo here the queen's child leaped at the ſalutation of Chriſt's vicar, ſpeaking by the mouth of his legate: Mary herſelf carried on this farce ſo far, that ſhe declared her pregnancy to all the foreign ambaſſadors; and we find an order in council, dated the twenty-ſeventh of this month, for Te Deum to be ſung at St. Paul's and a form of prayer was ordered to be compoſed and uſed by all the prieſts, &c. in which was this remarkable petition, that God would pleaſe "to give the queen a male infant, in faſhion and body comely and beautiful, and in pregnant wit notable and excellent*." But, after all, this proved to be no other than a political trick; for the queen's boaſted pregnancy turned to a dropſy. But to return.

Pole arriving on the twenty-fourth of November, as we have already obſerved, the queen laid the mask quite aſide, and no longer paying any regard to her oath and promiſes not to alter the national religion, ſhe determined to precipitate matters as much as poſſible; and two days after the legate's arrival, the two houſes were ſummoned to Whitehall, and the cardinal having returned his thanks for their late favour to him in reverſing his attainder, exhorted them to be reconciled to the church of Rome, into whoſe boſom he was ready to receive them, and grant them abſolution from all ſpiritual cenſures. This produced a conference the next day between the lords and commons; and an addreſs being drawn up in the name of both houſes, expreſſing a deſire of their reunion, and preſented to the king and queen, the legate, at their majeſties interceſſion, on the thirtieth of November, proceeded to reſtore the nation to an union with the church of Rome, and abſolved it with all the ſpells of prieſtly jargon. The ceremony was followed by ringing of bells and bonfires, by the king and queen's expreſs orders.

The legate having enjoined the parliament, by way of penance, to repeal all the laws made againſt papal authority, both houſes ſet about the ſaid repeal with an unprecedented degree of infamous and ſervile compliance, but the Chriſtmas holidays interpoſing, the bill could not be got ready before the beginning of January. By this act (the title of which was "An act for repealing all the ſtatutes againſt the pope, and for eſtabliſhing eccleſiaſtical poſſeſſions granted to the laity,") the papal ſupremacy, the juriſdiction of biſhops and eccleſiaſtical courts, and the prerogative of the crown, were put on the ſame footing as they ſtood in the twentieth year of Henry VIII. All ſees, colleges, hoſpitals, ſchools, and other foundations, erected; all legal marriages, though within the degrees prohibited by the canon law, contracted; all inſtitutions to benefices granted; and all proceſſes carried on, and all church-lands conveyed to laymen, according to the late laws in being, ſince the ſeparation from Rome, were not confirmed.

The very title of this act is ſufficient to inform the reader of its tendency. It was the indiſpenſible preliminary which the great men of England required for reſettling the power of the pope: "Secure but to us (ſaid they) the poſſeſſion of the church-lands, and we are willing to embrace all your doctrines, or otherwiſe to reject them: let us enjoy our revenues, we will readily accept your religion; confirm but our poſſeſſions, and we will not heſitate to make a ſacrifice of revelation, liberty, conſcience and the exerciſe of our reaſon." The conduct of this parliament will ſecure us from the charge of too much ſeverity in what we have here ſaid; for having thus ſecured their poſſeſſions, they ſhewed the utmoſt indifference to the religion, or even the lives of their fellow-ſubjects; and they renewed the old ſanguinary laws againſt heretics, which had been aboliſhed in the reign of Edward VI. and the revival of which had been rejected in the former parliament. They likewiſe paſſed ſeveral new laws againſt ſeditious words and rumours; and they declared it treaſon to imagine or attempt the death of Philip, during his marriage with the queen.

Each parliament had hitherto been more complaiſant to the court than their predeceſſors, but none of them had laid aſide their long-conceived hatred and averſion to the Spaniards; and now, though the queen endeavoured to get her huſband appointed preſumptive heir to the crown, and inveſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs, ſhe failed in both theſe attempts, and could not ſo much as perſuade the parliament to agree to his coronation, a thing which he had greatly at heart: nor was ſhe more ſucceſsful in her endeavours to obtain a ſubſidy from the commons, in order to aſſiſt the emperor in a war he was anew engaged in with France. In ſhort, the Engliſh at this period ſeem to have conceived the ſame jealouſy againſt the houſe of Auſtria, which they had formerly entertained againſt France.

Philip, conſcious of the general odium under which he laboured, endeavoured to recommend himſelf to the favour of the public by procuring the enlargement of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction who had been confined from the jealouſy or reſentment of the court; but nothing was more acceptable to the nation than his protecting the lady Elizabeth from the malice and cruelty of her ſiſter and that fell demon Gardiner, and obtaining for her the enjoyment of her liberty. Though it is unfair to put unfavourable conſtructions upon virtuous actions, yet the whole tenor of Philip's conduct and character leaves no room to doubt, that all his clemency on this occaſion had very ſelfiſh and intereſted motives, particularly with regard to the lady Elizabeth; for he very juſtly concluded, that if ſhe was put to death, the next lawful heir was the queen of Scots, and wife to the dauphin of France, whoſe ſucceſſion would for ever unite England to the crown of France. The earl of Devonſhire likewiſe derived ſome advantage from the affected popularity of Philip, and received his liberty; but finding that the court looked upon him with an evil eye, he begged permiſſion to travel, and ſoon after died at Padua, from poiſon, as is ſuppoſed, given him by the Imperialiſts. He was the eleventh earl of Devonſhire of the name of Courtney, one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed families in hiſtory, and nearly allied to the royal family of France.

Notwithſtanding that the nation in general was little diſpoſed to credit the report of the queen's pregnancy, and that it was thought, by perſons the moſt knowing in thoſe matters, that ſhe laboured under infirmities that rendered her incapable of bearing children, the belief of her pregnancy was ſtill propagated with all poſſible care, and was one artifice by which Philip endeavoured to maintain his authority in the kingdom; and this pretext was ſo effectually handled, that the parliament were brought to enact a law, declaring, "that if the queen died before her iſſue came of age, the government of the kingdom ſhould be in the king's hands during the minority, which was fixed till eighteen for a ſon and fifteen for a daughter." And now Philip and Mary, finding they could extort no farther conceſſions, came unexpectedly to Weſtminſter, and diſſolved the parliament on the twelfth of January, 1555.

Soon after the riſing of the parliament, Thirlby, who was now biſhop of Ely, and ſir Anthony Brown, lately created viſcount Montacute, were ſent ambaſſadors, with a ſplendid retinue to Rome, to notify to his holineſs all that had been done in parliament, and to make tenders of ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee in the name of the king, queen, and three eſtates of England. But before they could arrive, pope Julius III. died; and his ſucceſſor, Marcellus II. who reigned but twenty-two days, was dead alſo; and cardinal Caraffa, an haughty proud man, was elected, and aſſumed the name of Paul IV. When the Engliſh ambaſſadors arrived, this haughty pontiff refuſed them audience, becauſe their powers ran from Mary as queen of Ireland as well as England, a title which had not been given her or her predeceſſors by the holy ſee: they were therefore tame enough to wait till a bull was made out, inveſting Mary with that title, and then they had their audience.

The uſual formalities being paſſed, they laid before his holineſs all that had been done in the late parliament, hoping that he would confirm to the laity the poſſeſſion of church-lands; but the pope flatly refuſed to do that: he ſeemed to blame Pole for exceeding his commiſſion, and to wonder how any one could preſume to harbour a thought, that he would grant any confirmation to acts that were in themſelves iniquitous and ſacrilegious. To explain himſelf more fully on this head, a bull was iſſued, denouncing the moſt ſevere anathemas upon all who ſhould keep from the church or religious orders any part of their property. Upon this the queen was weak enough to ſend for the marquis of Wincheſter, lord treaſurer, ſir Robert Rocheſter, comptroller of the houſhold, ſecretary Petre, and ſir Francis Inglefield, maſter of the wards, acquainting them that her conſcience did not ſuffer her any longer to keep in her hands any part of the church's property, deſiring them immediately to repair to Gardiner, to conſult in what manner they ſhould be reſtored; and this declaration was attended by ſuch expreſſions as ſufficiently proved the deluded queen to ſpeak from the deepeſt conviction of conſcience.

But the attention of the miniſtry was chiefly engaged about the conduct proper to be obſerved with regard to matters of a religious nature; and a very important queſtion was frequently debated, before the queen and council, by cardinal Pole and biſhop Gardiner, namely, whether the laws lately revived againſt heretics ſhould be executed in their full extent and rigour, or ſhould only be employed to prevent the reformers from making any farther innovations?

Pole was very ſincere in his religious principles; and though while at Rome he had incurred, by his lenity, the ſuſpicion of a ſtrong tendency towards Lutheraniſm, he was fully convinced of the truth of the catholic doctrines, and believed that thoſe great and important intereſts ought never to be ſacrificed to any conſideration of human policy.

Gardiner, on the other hand, had always made his religion ſubſervient to his temporal concerns, and, by his unlimited complaiſance to Henry, he had ſhewn, that, had he not been driven to extremities during the late minority, he was ſufficiently inclined to alter his opinion, and embrace the eſtabliſhed theology.

This is generally allowed to have been the real character of thoſe two counſellers; yet, ſuch is the prevalence of temper above principle, that the humane diſpoſition of Pole led him to recommend a toleration of thoſe heretical tenets which he highly condemned; while the cruel heart of Gardiner prompted him to ſupport by perſecution that religion, which, at the bottom, he regarded with the utmoſt indifference.

Unhappily for the nation, the queen, who was a flaming bigot, reliſhed the counſels of Gardiner beſt; but, willing at the ſame time to pay ſome regard to the character of Pole, ſhe ordered him to take upon himſelf the reformation of the clergy, and charged Gardiner with the work of extirpating hereſy.

Gardiner, thus empowered, and fluſhed with his ſucceſs in bringing about the queen's marriage, in diſpoſing the parliament to favour their ſovereign's religious principles, and in reſtoring the Roman catholic religion and the pope's authority, was determined to crown his zeal, and complete his glory, by forcing the proteſtants into the pale of the church, or at leaſt to an outward conformity to the new laws. And here a regard to truth, which ought ever to guide the hiſtorian's pen, and animate his reflections on the incidents he relates, obliges me to confeſs, that the imprudence of ſome weak perſons among the reformed, contributed not a little to fix the diabolical reſolutions now taken againſt them. It had been induſtriouſly given out by their party, that the queen was with child by Gardiner; and the court and the nation were filled with libels againſt her and the Spaniards. One Bradford, a virulent writer (not the ſame who ſuffered for religion), had publiſhed in print the moſt ſcurrilous abuſes of the king's perſon; and the manners and religion of the court had been every where very indecently, however juſtly, laſhed: Bonner and Gardiner had many private piques to revenge, while the treatment which ſome of the popiſh preachers had met with from ſeveral hot-headed proteſtants was made uſe of as a handle, that the whole party was made up of traitors as well as heretics.

But

But all these provocations and allegations fall infinitely short of an excuse for the infernal proceedings of the government and clergy against the protestants. England was now filled with scenes of horror and barbarity, which have justly rendered the catholic religion the object of universal hatred and abhorrence, and which prove that no human depravity can equal revenge and cruelty, concealed under the specious guise of religion.

The two first victims of this persecuting spirit were Dr. Hooper, late bishop of Gloucester, and Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's, who had both eminently distinguished themselves, the one by his loyalty in supporting the queen's title against Northumberland, and the other by his pacific temper, in saving, at the hazard of his own life, Bourne the papist-preacher at St. Paul's: but, as if the government had intended to give the nation a specimen of their impartial cruelty, Rogers, after repeated attempts to bring him to recant, was condemned to the stake; and so ingenious were his butchers in their barbarity, that, perceiving they could not shake his manly resolution to suffer, they attacked him where virtue is most tender, by denying him the sight of his wife or children, and hurrying him into the flames in Smithfield, on the fourth of February.

The two bloody bishops had a personal hatred against Hooper, who behaved with all the constancy of a primitive martyr. He had kept up a correspondence with Bulenger, and others of the reformed abroad, to whom he sent his wife, who was herself a foreigner; and he was at very little pains to conceal his sentiments, none having been more active or more successful than he was in the cause of reformation. He shewed a noble contempt for all the insults he received; and, being given over to the secular arm by the bishops of Winchester, London, Durham, Salisbury, Norwich, and Carlisle, who sat in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, Southwark, was impolitically sent by the government to die at Gloucester, that the hearers of his doctrine might be the witnesses of his sufferings.

This circumstance was intended to strike terror into his flock; but it was a source of joy and satisfaction to Hooper, who gladly embraced the opportunity of confirming by his death that doctrine which he had formerly taught them. When he was fixed to the stake, a stool was set before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it, by accepting of which he might still have saved his life; but he ordered it to be taken away, and chearfully prepared himself for that dreadful punishment to which he was doomed.

His death was attended by every circumstance that could heighten its severity; the wind, which was vehement, blew the flames of the reeds from his body; the faggots were green, and did not take fire; all his lower parts were consumed before his vitals were affected; one hand dropped off, with the other he continued to beat his breast: he was heard to pray, and exhort the people to adhere to their religion, until his tongue, swolen with the violence of his agony, was rendered incapable of motion. He was no less than three quarters of an hour in torture, which he bore with the most surprizing and inflexible constancy.

About the same time Laurence Saunders, minister of Allhallows, Bread-street, and Mr. Rowland Taylor, rector of Hadley, in Suffolk, were delivered over to the secular power, and sealed their doctrine by their death.

Saunders suffered at Coventry: he was also indulged with the offer of pardon; but he rejected it with disdain, and embraced the stake, saying, "Welcome the cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life."

Taylor, parson of Hadley, was on the nineteenth of February, burned in that place, amidst his ancient friends and parishoners. When he was brought to the stake, and began to harangue the by-standers, one of the guards struck him on the head: then he was placed in a barrel of pitch; and one of the spectators throwing a faggot at the good old man, which wounded him so severely, that his visage was besmeared with blood, he replied, "Oh friend! I have harm enough, what need of that?"

When he repeated a Psalm in English one of the guards struck him on the mouth, and bid him speak Latin: and while he was employed in pious ejaculations, another cleft his head with an halbert, in such a manner that his brains came out, and he expired immediately.

So many inhuman executions, merely for the sake of principle, threw the nation into an universal consternation, insomuch that the subtle Gardiner, who had vainly imagined that a few examples would affrighten the reformers into a compliance, finding the work now grow daily upon him, thought proper to devolve his odious commission on others, but chiefly on Bonner, bishop of London, a man of the most profligate and abandoned manners, and of such a savage and cruel disposition, that he seemed to delight in the torments of the unhappy wretches his iniquitous sentence committed to the flames.

And now, not only Gardiner, but all the bishops, in a solemn assembly, endeavoured to clear themselves of being in any wise concerned in these barbarities, and sought by artful insinuations to cast the whole blame upon the king and the Spaniards: but Philip being informed of the infamous policy of the clergy, and being well apprized, that, should such an opinion of his cruelty be suffered to prevail, he must entirely lose all interest with the English, ordered friar Alphonso, his confessor, to disclaim those sanguinary proceedings from the pulpit, and very roundly to charge them upon the bishops: an unusual spectacle! a priest of the Inquisition blaming Englishmen for religious cruelties! The bishops, amazed at this, began to check their hands, and there were no more executions till the middle of March.

But the fires which had been thus damped, were in a short time rekindled by the breath of the gloomy queen, while Bonner's furious zeal spread the flames. He, in conjunction with some other bishops, and assisted by the earl of Oxford and lord Rich, condemned without mercy all that came before them, amongst whom was Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, who was burned at Caermarthen, on the thirtieth of March. To recount all the particulars of the other executions, which now became so numerous, that the whole kingdom seemed to be in a blaze from persecution, would only shock the humanity of the reader, and they may all be found faithfully recorded in other historians. Three martyrdoms, however, deserve peculiar mention, those of Latimer, Ridley, and Cranmer.

They were ſtill in priſon at Oxford, and commiſſions for trying them were directed to Brooks, biſhop of Gloceſter, White, biſhop of Lincoln, Holman, biſhop of Briſtol, and ſeveral others. The three prelates, at their different appearances, refuſed to acknowlege the pope's authority. Latimer and Ridley, after refuſing to recant their doctrine, or to acknowlege the real preſence in the euchariſt, which was now become the watch-word for murders, were delivered over to the ſecular arm, and carried to be burned on the north ſide of the city of Oxford, in the ditch over-againſt Baliol college, on the ſixteenth of October; and both, in their laſt moments, gave teſtimony of the faith with their blood, and a behaviour nothing inferior to what we read of the primitive martyrs. But thoſe two great men deſerve ſome farther mention.

Ridley was born of a good family in Northumberland. He went to ſchool at Newcaſtle, and was ſent to Pembroke hall in Cambridge, of which he became maſter. King Henry VIII. made him firſt his chaplain, and promoted him to the ſee of Rocheſter, from whence king Edward VI. tranſlated him to London. He was certainly one of the ableſt champions of the Reformation; pious, learned, ſolid in judgment, conſtant, admired by his friends, and dreaded of his enemies; which were ſufficient reaſons for the popiſh counſellors to put him to death. The night immediately before his execution, biſhop Ridley invited the mayor of Oxford and his wife to ſee him die; and the good woman melting into tears, he ſpoke to her with an aſſurance which baniſhed her ſorrow, and convinced her that ſo much firmneſs on ſo melancholy an occaſion could only be the gift from Heaven, inſpiring and animating him againſt his approaching agony. He alſo comforted Latimer at the ſtake, who was ready to return him the kind office. He was ſo little ſhocked with the terrors before him, that he not only gave a ſerious attention to the furious bigot that preached at his execution, but calmly propoſed to anſwer the exceptionable parts of his ſermon, which was not permitted, leſt his eloquence and reaſon ſhould biaſs his hearers and ſpectators too much in his favour; and he left the world with an act of juſtice, for he ſent a petition to the queen, praying that either the tenants of the biſhopric of London might be confirmed in their leaſes, or that their fines might be reſtored out of his goods, ſeized when he was impriſoned. But he paid dearly for his courage; the faggots were ordered to be placed in ſuch a manner as to torment him as much as poſſible; he was rather roaſted than burned, for his legs were almoſt conſumed before the fire was permitted to reach his vitals.

Biſhop Latimer was born at Thurcaſton, in Leiceſterſhire, and brought up alſo at Cambridge. Henry VIII. promoted him to the ſee of Worceſter, which he reſigned becauſe he would not ſubſcribe to what were called king Henry's Six bloody Articles. He was remarkable for his ſimplicity, freedom, and plainneſs, with which he arraigned great ſinners, and which, without the ornament of human eloquence, found a way to their hearts, and made them humble, though ever ſo exalted. One of his converts, a notorious robber, who had been perſuaded by him to reſtore his ill-gotten money, gave teſtimony of it at his execution, and comforted him at the ſtake; and deſiring to accompany ſo righteous a man in ſo good a cauſe, propheſied with unſhaken zeal, in the midſt of reigning popery, "that thoſe two biſhops and martyrs ſhould light up ſuch a candle in England, as, by God's grace, ſhould never be extinguiſhed." Latimer's age, who was upwards of eighty, made him ſoon yield up his ſoul in the flames, without undergoing much pain, and he died with the character of having preſerved the piety, ſimplicity, and integrity of the firſt, in the corruptions of the laſt, ages.

We wiſh we could throw a veil over the next martyr who ſuffered at the ſame place; we mean Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury. He had been long confined in priſon, but the queen was now reſolved to bring him to puniſhment; and the more fully to glut her revenge, ſhe determined to puniſh him for hereſy rather than for treaſon, and in September, 1555, he was tried by Brooks, biſhop of Gloceſter, a commiſſioner from the pope, and by Dr. Martin and Dr. Godwin, commiſſioners from the queen, who accuſed him of having been twice married, of keeping a wife ſecretly in king Henry VIII's time, and openly in the reign of king Edward VI. of publiſhing books againſt, and forſaking, the Romiſh church; and of denying the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament. He owned all theſe facts, upon which the commiſſioners cited him to appear before the pope in eight days, which they knew was impoſſible, ſince he was their priſoner. Bonner and Thirlby were ordered to degrade him at Oxford, on the fourteenth of February, which Bonner performed with his uſual inſolence, and with bitter railleries and invectives againſt the priſoner during the ceremony, while Thirlby melted into tears. They, on this occaſion, put him on pontifical robes made of canvas, to make him more ridiculous, and then ſtripped him of that ludicrous attire, piece by piece, according to the bull and ceremonies of degradation ſent from Rome: during which ceremony the good archbiſhop's behaviour was uniform and becoming. He was not ſorry, he ſaid, to be thus cut off with all his pageantry from any relation to the church of Rome; but declared it to be great injuſtice to condemn him for not going to Rome, when they kept him cloſe confined in priſon; and, denying the pope's authority over him, appealed from his ſentence to a free general council.

The revenge of the queen, not content with the eternal damnation of Cranmer, which ſhe believed to be certain, and the execution of that dreadful ſentence to which he was doomed, incited her alſo to ſeek the ruin of his honour and infamy of his name: perſons were employed to attack him, not in the way of argumentation and reaſoning, againſt which they knew he was ſufficiently prepared, but by policy, inſinuation, and addreſs, by repreſenting the dignities and honours to which his character gave him a claim, if he would deſerve them by a recantation; and by flattering him with the hopes of long enjoying thoſe powerful friends whom his humanity and beneficence had procured him during the courſe of his proſperity.

Influenced by that love of life which is in inſeparable from the human heart, and terrified at the proſpect of thoſe dreadful torments to which he was condemned, he ſuffered, in an unguarded

The burning Archbishop Cranmer.

To His Grace George Hamilton,

Duke! of. Brandon.

This Plate is most humbly Inscribed.

hour, the feelings of nature to over-power his reſolution; and he agreed to ſign a paper, acknowledging the doctrine of the papal ſupremacy and of the real preſence.

The queen, whoſe perfidy was only exceeded by her cruelty, reſolved that this recantation ſhould not ſave his life; and ſhe ſent orders that he ſhould be commanded to own his errors in church, before the whole people; and that he ſhould from thence be immediately conducted to execution.

Cranmer, whether it was that he had received ſome notice of their intention, or that he had repented of his weakneſs and apoſtacy, ſurprized the audience by a contrary declaration: he ſaid, that he was ſufficiently acquainted with the obedience which he owed to his ſovereign, and the laws of the land; but this duty extended no farther than to ſubmit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without reſiſtance, whatever puniſhments they ſhould inflict upon him; that a ſuperior duty, the duty which he owed his Maker, obliged him to remain in the truth on all occaſions, and not to abandon, by a baſe denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had imparted to mankind: that there was one error of his life, which, above all others, filled him with the moſt unfeigned ſorrow and repentance, the inſincere declaration of faith to which he had unhappily been induced to agree, and which nothing but the fear of death could have extorted from him; that he chearfully embraced the preſent opportunity of atoning for his crime, by a ſincere and open recantation, and was willing to ſeal with his blood that doctrine which he firmly believed to be revealed from Heaven; and that as his hand had erred by betraying his heart, it ſhould firſt be puniſhed, and, by a ſevere but juſt doom, firſt expiate the guilt of that crime which it had been the inſtrument of committing.

He was thence conducted to the ſtake amidſt the ſhouts and inſults of the catholics: and having now collected all the force and vigour of his mind, he bore their ſcorn, as well as the torture of his puniſhment, with ſurprizing courage: he ſtretched out his hand, and without diſcovering the leaſt ſign of weakneſs, or even of feeling, held it in the flames until it dropped off. His mind ſeemed to be wholly poſſeſſed with reflections of his former fault, and he was heard to exclaim ſeveral times "This unworthy hand has offended!"

Satisfied with that atonement, he re-aſſumed a wonderful compoſure and ſerenity of countenance: and when the fire ſurrounded his body, he ſeemed to be entirely inſenſible of all his outward ſufferings, and, by the force of hope and Chriſtian fortitude, to have raiſed himſelf above all bodily ſenſations, and to triumph over the fury of the flames.

It is pretended, that after his body was conſumed, his heart was found entire among the aſhes, a circumſtance which however improbable, yet, being conſidered as an emblem of his conſtancy, was fondly believed by the zealous proteſtants.

He was certainly a man of the moſt amiable character; alike diſtinguiſhed by his piety and learning, and poſſeſſed of candour, ſincerity, benevolence, and indeed of almoſt every virtue that could render him the object of public eſteem and veneration.

Though Cranmer's death happened in the year 1556, yet I have kept his ſtory entire, that I may the better attend the affairs of ſtate.

The Spaniards, by affecting to throw upon the Engliſh biſhops all the blame of the bloody ſeverities practiſed at this time, thought to conciliate the affections of that part of the nation who were moſt diſguſted with thoſe proceedings; but finding that the people of England were not ſo eaſily to be impoſed upon, and that Bonner, though loſt to all ſenſe of ſhame and humanity, could not be brought to brave the whole load of public hatred, the court ſoon pulled off the mask; the bloody bigotry of the Spaniſh character now ſtood confeſſed in every action, and it was now apparent that a ſcheme was fixed for introducing into England the Spaniſh Inquiſition.

As it appeared the biſhops courts, though extremely arbitrary, and not confined to the ordinary forms of law, were not poſſeſſed with ſufficient authority, a commiſſion was appointed, by virtue of the queen's prerogative, more effectually to exterminate hereſy: Bonner, and twenty unmerciful fiends like himſelf, were nominated; but any three of them were inveſted with the powers of the whole.

This commiſſion, which ſpeaks the very ſoul of the Inquiſition, was conceived in theſe terms: "That, ſince many falſe reports were publiſhed among the ſubjects, and many heretical opinions were propagated among them; therefore they were to enquire into thoſe, either by preſentments, by witneſſes, or any other political way they ſhould think proper; and to ſearch after all hereſies; the importers, the ſellers, and the readers of all heretical books: they were to puniſh all miſbehaviours and all negligences in any church or chapel, and to try all prieſts that did not preach the ſacrament of the altar; all perſons that did not hear maſs, or go to their pariſh-church to ſervice; that refuſed to go in proceſſions, or did not take holy bread and holy water; and if they found any that did obſtinately perſevere in ſuch hereſies, they were to deliver them into the hands of their ordinaries, to be puniſhed according to the ſpiritual laws: giving the commiſſioners full power to proceed as their diſcretion and conſciences ſhould direct them; and to employ all ſuch means as they ſhould judge neceſſary for the ſearching of the premiſſes; empowering them alſo to ſummon before them ſuch witneſſes as they pleaſe, and to compel them to make oath of ſuch things as might diſcover the matter which they wanted to find out."

To reduce the methods of proceeding in England to a greater ſimilarity with thoſe of the Inquiſition, letters were ſent to the lord North, and others, commanding them "to put to the torture ſuch obſtinate perſons as would not confeſs, and there to order them at their diſcretion." Secret ſpies likewiſe and informers were ſcattered over the whole kingdom, in imitation of the practice of that infernal tribunal.

Orders were given to the juſtices of the peace, "that they ſhould call before them one or two honeſt perſons, within their limits, or more, at their diſcretion, and command them, by oath or otherwiſe, that they ſhall ſecretly learn or ſearch out ſuch perſons as ſhall ill-behave themſelves in church, or idly, or ſhall deſpiſe openly by words the king's or queen's proceedings; or endeavour to excite any commotion, or tell any ſeditious tales or news. And alſo, that the ſame perſon, ſo to be appointed, ſhall declare to the ſame juſtices of peace, the ill behaviour of lewd diſorderly perſons, whether it ſhall be for uſing unlawful games, and ſuch other light behaviour of ſuch ſuſpected perſons: and that the ſame information ſhould be given ſecretly to the ſame juſtices; and the ſame juſtices ſhall ſummon ſuch accuſed perſons before them, and examine them, without declaring by whom they were accuſed: and that the juſtices ſhall, upon their examination, puniſh the offenders according as their offences ſhall appear upon the accuſation and examination, by their diſcretion, either by open puniſhment or by good abearings."

This tyrannical edict was in ſome reſpects even more oppreſſive than the Inquiſition, as it introduced into every part of government the ſame iniquitous proceedings which that tribunal employs only for the extirpation of hereſy. But the court had invented a more expeditious method of ſuppreſſing hereſy than even the Inquiſition itſelf: they publiſhed a proclamation againſt books of hereſy, treaſon, and ſedition, importing, "that whoſoever had any of theſe books, and did not immediately burn them without reading them, or ſhewing them to any other perſon, ſhould be deemed rebels, and, without any farther proceſs, be executed by martial law." To ſuch an intolerable and diſgraceful ſlavery were the free born natives of England at that time reduced, by the tyranny of Mary and her Spaniſh conſort!

We have thrown in one groupe almoſt all the tranſactions againſt the reformers, though carried on during the ſpace of three years; not ſo much as the reader may be affected with the horrors of the ſcene, as that we may be obliged as little as poſſible to return to the mention of ſuch ſhocking and inhuman barbarities.

It is computed, that in that time two hundred and ſeventy-ſeven perſons were committed to the flames, beſides thoſe who were puniſhed by impriſonment and confiſcations. Among thoſe who ſuffered by fire were five biſhops, twenty-one clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four huſbandmen, ſervants, and labourers, forty-five women, and four children.

That Mary ſhould be guilty of ſuch ſhocking cruelties is not to be wondered at (for what is there ſo ſhocking and cruel, of which a weak, peeviſh, and bigotted woman may not be guilty?) but it is really ſurprizing, that, conſidering the ſtate of the kingdom at that period, when the number of proteſtants greatly exceeded that of the papiſts, ſhe was ſuffered to ſurvive one moment the commiſſion of ſuch horrid barbarities.

The queen having thus, as ſhe probably thought, recommended herſelf to the favour of Heaven, by the deſtruction of ſo many heretics, hoped that Bonner's prayers for the heavenly wit and vigour of her child would happily prove effectual. In theſe hopes ſhe fondly imagined that ſhe was ſeized with the pains of child-bed, and couriers were prepared to carry the joyful news of her delivery into foreign countries.

Bonner attributed this happy event, in a great meaſure, to the influence of his own prayers; cauſed Te Deum to be ſung in his own cathedral; and the curate of St. Anne's, Alderſgate, went ſo far as to deſcribe from the pulpit the features and lineaments of the young prince, whom he repreſented as the fineſt child that was ever born.

But unluckily, the biſhop's prayers had not been heard; the queen's zeal for the advancement of popery had not been able to ſecure the bleſſings of Heaven; and the curate's deſcription of the infant happened to be a little premature. The queen, after ſome violent throes, was delivered on the thirteenth of April, not of a child, but of a ſubſtance known by the name of a Mole, to her own unſpeakable grief as well as to the aſtoniſhment of the whole court, and the confuſion of Philip, who had flattered himſelf with the agreeable hopes of uniting England and Spain by the iſſue of this marriage. This diſappointment ſo ſoured the minds of Philip and Mary, that they ſought to vent their ſpleen by lighting up anew the flames of perſecution, which continued to rage all this ſummer and autumn, while the king and queen remained at Hampton-court. But let us leave this barbarous ſcene for a while, to attend foreign affairs.

The emperor Charles V. now broken with infirmities and ill ſucceſs, had for ſome time formed the reſolution of reſigning the cares of his mighty dominions to his ſon and his brother, but would not hear of any terms of giving peace to Europe at the expence of reſigning any of them to the French. He was, however, very ready to hearken to all propoſitions for peace, and England, never having declared in form for either party, offered her mediation. The court of France did not at this time conſider England as indifferent concerning the event of the quarrel, but Henry dreaded nothing ſo much as to afford any pretext to Mary for openly taking part with her huſband in the diſpute; he therefore, as the emperor did, accepted the offered mediation, and, though no formal ceſſation of arms was ſtipulated, the war this ſummer went on very languidly in the Low Countries.

Cardinal Pole was glad of this opportunity to exerciſe his powers in the double capacity of a plenipotentiary from England, and legate from the pope; and having entertained an high opinion of ſecretary Cecil, he prevailed on him to attend him at the conferences for a peace between the emperor and the French, which were opened on the twenty-third of May, this year, at Merc, a place lying between Ardres, Calais, and Guiſnes. Pole was indefatigable in his endeavours to bring about the peace; but both parties inſiſting obſtinately on their own preliminaries, the conferences broke up without any effect.

Philip, diſappointed in his hopes of an heir, and conceiving a diſguſt to the perſon of his queen, which was by no means agreeable, being, moreover, ſent for by his father, who declared his intention of reſigning to him his dominions, laid hold of this event to quit the kingdom, and, on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, ſet ſail for Flanders, to the infinite diſſatisfaction of the queen, who doated on him to a degree of ridiculous fondneſs. The emperor, on his ſon's arrival at Bruſſels, inſtructed him every day, for ſix or ſeven weeks ſucceſſively, in the art of government, and adviſing him to a peace with France, recommended to him ſeveral maxims for his conduct, which he afterwards took no care to obſerve *; by which neglect he, in a few years, loſt the beſt part of thoſe provinces, the ſovereignty of which the emperor, in a general aſſembly ſembly of the ſtates, ſurrendered to him on the twenty-fifth of October.

The unparalleled barbarities which had been exerciſed againſt the proteſtants, had rendered the miniſtry extremely unpopular, and the effects of the public diſcontent appeared in the new parliament, which was convoked at Weſtminſter on the twenty-firſt of October, who, though they confirmed the queen's reſignation of the firſt-fruits and tenths, yet were ſo much afraid of reſtoring to the clergy an authority ſo odious to the nation, ſo much out of humour at the queen's reſtitution of church-lands, that they were hardly perſuaded to grant a moderate ſupply; and having, beſides, in the courſe of their proceedings, given many ſtrong tokens of their diſlike to the court-meaſures, the queen thought proper to diſſolve them on the ninth of December, but not till they had paſſed ſome memorable acts, which will be noticed in their proper place.

Thoſe who ſeem to judge moſt rationally upon this ſudden change of temper in the houſe of commons, who had ſo blindly run into all the ſchemes of the court, in their preceding ſeſſions, in favour of popery, attribute it to the death of Gardiner, which happened during this ſeſſions, and to the withdrawing of their penſions, which the queen was no longer in a capacity to advance for their votes, ſhe having given up the church-lands, and king Philip's treaſures being pretty well exhauſted, or appropriated to his own uſe.

Gardiner, lord biſhop of Wincheſter, and lord-chancellor of England, was the natural ſon of ſir Richard Woodville, brother to Elizabeth, conſort of king Edward IV. and it was on account of this conſanguinity that Henry VIII. promoted him to the biſhopric of Wincheſter. He is ſaid to have felt ſome remorſe in his laſt moments, and to have exclaimed, "I have ſinned with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter!" He died at Whitehall, of a ſuppreſſion of urine, on the twelfth of November, at midnight, to the no ſmall grief of the queen, who loſt in him her ableſt counſellor, and one that had more influence than all the reſt on the parliament: but his death was matter of great joy to the people, eſpecially the proteſtants, of whoſe perſecution he had been the adviſer and promoter. He was certainly a prieſt of a ſelfiſh character; a profound diſſembler, and of a proud, vindictive, cruel diſpoſition. Burnet ſays he underſtood the canon and civil law as well as moſt of his time: he wrote Latin with eaſe and purity; and few of his cotemporaries excelled him in the knowlege of the Greek language. As to his perſon, biſhop Poinet, his ſucceſſor, deſcribes it thus: "He was of a ſwarthy colour, downcaſt look, overwhelming brows; his eyes were deep ſunk in his head, his noſe hooked, wide noſtrils and mouth, large hands, and long talons rather than nails on his toes, which made his gait awkuard and ſhuffling, from the uneaſineſs they gave him in walking. He was buried in the cathedral at Wincheſter, where his effigies upon his monument is yet to be ſeen, though ſomewhat defaced.

Upon Gardiner's death, the great-ſeal was given to Nicholas Hall, maſter of the Rolls, who kept it however not quite two months; for on the firſt of January, 1556, Heath, archbiſhop of York, was made lord-chancellor of England, and Paget lord privy-ſeal: and as the king was now daily expected to return to England, the court, by way of preparation for his reception, reſolved, if poſſible, to put a ſtop, by the moſt cruel puniſhments, to thoſe expreſſions of pity which people of all ranks and denominations diſcovered towards the ſuffering heretics; even the magiſtrates, to whom the cruel orders were directed, were ſometimes known to be leſs brutal than the queen and her government wiſhed for. On January 14, therefore, a letter was written to the lord-mayor and ſheriffs of London, "requiring them to give ſuch ſubſtantial order therein, when any obſtinate men, condemned by the order of the laws, ſhould be delivered to be puniſhed for hereſy, that there be a great number of officers and other men appointed to be at the execution, who may be charged to ſee ſuch as ſhall miſuſe themſelves, either by comforting, aiding, or praiſing the offenders, or otherwiſe uſe themſelves to the ill example of others, to be apprehended, and committed to ward; and beſides, to give commandment, that no houſholder ſhould ſuffer any of his apprentices, or other ſervants, to be abroad, other than ſuch as their maſter will anſwer for: and that this order be always obſerved in like cauſes hereafter."

Upon Cranmer's execution, which happened on the twenty-firſt of March, cardinal Pole, who had now taken prieſt's orders, was promoted to the ſee of Canterbury, and by this office, as well as his legatine authority, he was naturally placed at the head of the Engliſh church; but, though he had always diſapproved the ſanguinary method of converting heretics, and conſidered the reformation of the clergy as the more commendable and even more effectual method for that purpoſe, he found his authority too weak to withſtand the cruel and barbarous zeal of the queen and her counſellors: which has occaſioned ſome writers to brand his memory with a cruelty which does not ſeem to have made any part of his character.

Philip was now become maſter of all the treaſures of the Indies, and of the moſt fertile and extenſive dominions in Europe, by the voluntary reſignation of the emperor Charles V. That prince had, in the beginning of his reign, found it extremely difficult, if not impoſſible, to govern with proper care his very diſtant and extenſive dominions; and, in order to eaſe himſelf of part of the burthen, he had procured his brother Ferdinand to be elected king of the Romans, with a proſpect of his ſucceeding to the Imperial dignity as well as his other German dominions. But having afterwards extended his views, and formed deſigns of aggrandizing his family, he could not, without uneaſineſs, bear the thoughts of diſmembering ſuch conſiderable ſtates, and endeavoured to perſuade Ferdinand, by the moſt tempting offers and moſt preſſing importunities, to give up his pretenſions in favour of Philip. Finding his brother lent a deaf ear to all his remonſtrances, he reſigned the Imperial crown, with his other dignities, and Ferdinand, according to the uſual cuſtom, applied to the pope for his coronation; but the haughty pontiff refuſed to comply with his requeſt, and alleged, that though on the death of an emperor he was bound in duty to crown the prince elected, yet in caſe of a reſignation the right devolved to the holy ſee, and it belonged to the pope alone to name an emperor.

The truth is, pope Paul IV. had conceived the moſt implacable hatred to the houſe of Auſtria; and though a truce of five years had been concluded between France and Spain, on the fifth of February this year, he perſuaded Henry to break it, and engaged to aſſiſt him in re-conquering the kingdom of Naples and the other territories to which the crown of France laid claim in Italy. With this view he himſelf had actually commenced hoſtilities againſt the duke of Alva, viceroy of Naples; and the duke of Guiſe being ſent by the French king with forces to ſecond his holineſs's operations, the renewal of the war between the two crowns ſeemed unavoidable. Philip, though not ſo warlike, was full as ambitious, as his father, and he hoped that, by his artifice, policy, and addreſs, he ſhould get the better of all his enemies, and extend his authority and dominion: for this reaſon, as well as from a deſire of ſettling his new domains, he was deſirous of living on good terms with France; but when he found that Henry had attacked him in ſuch an open and unprovoked manner, that he could not, conſiſtent with his own honour, put up with the affront, he began to prepare for war with equal diligence and ſucceſs.

In order to ſtrengthen himſelf with a reſpectable aid, Philip tried to engage the queen and the Engliſh nation in his cauſe againſt the French king. Had the matter, indeed, ſolely depended upon Mary, ſhe was incapable of refuſing the demand of a huſband ſhe ſo tenderly loved; but ſhe had little influence in the council, and ſtill leſs among her people; and her government, which was daily growing more unpopular, ſeemed unable to ſupport itſelf even during a profound peace, much leſs if a war was kindled againſt France, and (which appeared to be a neceſſary conſequence) with Scotland alſo, aſſiſted by that powerful kingdom.

The king had ſhewn ſo apparent a contempt for the queen, that her government became not only deteſtable, but diſagreeable: but, however, the neglect of her huſband tended only to inflame the love of the doating Mary, and ſhe ſpent the greateſt part of her time in ſolitude, where ſhe gave vent to her paſſion, either in tears, or in writing fond epiſtles to Philip, who ſeldom obliged her with any anſwer, and ſcarce condeſcended to aſſume the appearance of love, or gratitude, towards her. The chief part of the government which employed her attention, was to ſqueze money from her ſubjects, in order to ſupply his wants; and as ſhe had received but a ſmall ſubſidy from the parliament, ſhe had now recourſe to methods the moſt arbitrary and illegal. She demanded a loan of ſixty thouſand pounds from one thouſand perſons, whom ſhe thought, from their attachment to her, would readily comply; ſhe exacted a general loan of one hundred pounds from every perſon poſſeſſed of twenty pounds per annum; ſhe extorted ſixty thouſand marks from ſeven thouſand yeomen, who had not contributed to the former loans; and ſhe exacted thirty-ſix thouſand pounds more from the cloth-merchants of London trading to Antwerp, which they refuſed, having advanced her great ſums already. Upon this refuſal, and having received advice that they had ſhipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp fair, ſhe ſeized upon the ſhips and cargoes, laying upon them a new ſubſidy of twenty ſhillings a-piece, by an arbitrary ſtretch of royal authority: to get this impoſition aboliſhed, the merchants were forced to advance forty thouſand pounds, and to engage for two thouſand more, payable the next month at fartheſt.

All theſe violent and oppreſſive meaſures were purſued at a time when England enjoyed a profound tranquility, and when Mary herſelf had no other occaſion for money but to ſatisfy the exorbitant demands of a huſband, who was equally regardleſs of her love and her generoſity, and attended to nothing but his own intereſt.

While theſe things were tranſacting a plot was diſcovered for robbing the Exchequer, and raiſing a rebellion againſt the queen. It was ſaid to have been diſcovered by one White, an accomplice. On the eighteenth of March, the queen's guards conducted to the Tower John Throgmorton, Henry Peckham, Woodhouſe Bethel, and about twelve or thirteen perſons more, of inferior note, whoſe impriſonment occaſioned ſeveral others to fly. A warrant was likewiſe iſſued out for apprehending ſir Anthony Kingſton, but he died as the guards were bringing him up to London. The April following, Throgmorton and Woodhouſe, who been governor of the Iſle of Wight, were tried, condemned, and executed. Henry Peckham, ſon of ſir Edward Peckham, and John Daniel, were tried and condemned on the ſeventh of May, but not executed till the ſeventh of July following. One Stanton, who was called a captain, was arraigned and executed for the ſame plot, on the twelfth of May. It ſeems the deſign was deeper laid, than the government at firſt apprehended; for, on the fourth of April, a proclamation was iſſued againſt the lord Henry Dudley, two gentlemen of the name of Aſhton, two of the name of Horſey, two of the name of Tremain, and ſeven other gentlemen of fortune, for having fled beyond ſea on account of the ſaid plot. On the twenty-ninth of April, ſir William Courtney, ſir John Perrot, ſir John Pollard, ſir Nicholas Arnold (the ſame who had given evidence againſt ſir Nicholas Throgmorton), and ſir John Chicheſter, were brought priſoners from the weſtern counties, and ſent to the Tower. It afterwards appeared that the French agents had been tampering with the gentlemen who had been executed, and that ſome moved by avarice, others by deteſtation of the government's cruelty, and ſome from an opinion of its weakneſs, had entered into dangerous meaſures.

The news of the death of Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, which arrived about this time, filled the queen with ſo much pleaſure, that ſhe could not refrain from expreſſing her joy in public: and being now grown leſs jealous of the princeſs Elizabeth, ſhe began to treat her with leſs ſeverity; the guard was taken off her, and the princeſs, being invited to court, came to Somerſet-houſe in November.

vember. The particular reaſon of this invitation was to propoſe a match to her with the duke of Savoy, which the princeſs declined with the better grace, as ſhe had, a little before, abſolutely refuſed Eric, king of Sweden, whoſe ambaſſador had made the overture in his maſter's behalf. As this was done without the queen's knowlege, Elizabeth very prudently gave a flat denial; and Mary, being acquainted with it, approved her ſiſter's conduct: however, ſir Thomas Pope, one of her keepers, was ordered to feel her pulſe how ſhe ſtood affected to the duke of Savoy; and upon his intimating that it could not be thought her highneſs would be averſe to marrying, if an honourable match was offered by the queen, or ſuch an one could be brought about with her majeſty's conſent, ſhe told him very ſeriouſly, and a with a ſolemn profeſſion of ſpeaking truth from her heart, that ſhe would not change her condition though ſhe were offered the greateſt prince in Europe. This refuſal, and the great court that was paid to Elizabeth during her ſtay in London, ſo nettled the queen, that, though the princeſs had been invited to paſs the whole winter about court, ſhe was ſent away in a great hurry, a little before Chriſtmas, under a guard to her houſe at Hatfield, and Mary not only renewed her ill treatment, but even reſumed her deſign of getting her declared a baſtard, and excluded from the ſucceſſion; but happily this diabolical ſcheme was defeated.

The queen in the mean time was much puzzled to find a pretext for a quarrel with France. She had tried her council on this head, but they were plainly againſt it; they ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the marriage-articles between her and Philip; they repreſented the unſettled ſtate of the Engliſh government, the domeſtic factions which divided the kingdom, and the low condition of the public revenues, and they ſignified their apprehenſions, that the natural tendency of all theſe meaſures was to bring the nation into a total dependence on Spaniſh councils: they ſaid they were willing to give their conſent for aſſiſting Philip with ſix thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, for the defence of the Low Countries, according to the treaty with the late emperor, but were abſolutely againſt a war.

Mary, reſtrained by no faith of treaties nor ſcruple of conſcience, and burning with a deſire to ſatisfy her huſband, uſed all her endeavours to conquer the obſtinacy of her council: after employing other menaces of a more violent nature, ſhe threatened to diſcard them all from the board, and to chuſe counſellors who would be more obedient to her will; but all to no purpoſe, for ſhe could not procure a ſingle vote for declaring war againſt France. To add to her vexation, ſhe received a letter from Philip, in which he told her plainly, that he would not ſet foot in England till ſhe had declared war againſt France, and brought about the marriage between the duke of Savoy and her ſiſter Elizabeth, as his honour and intereſt were concerned in carrying theſe two points. This was a terrible declaration to a woman of Mary's diſpoſition; ſhe renewed her inſtances for his coming over, aſſuring him that his preſence would procure him whatever he pleaſed. Thus ſtood matters at the cloſe of this year.

Towards the beginning of the ſucceeding one, 1557, the queen, to divert her impatience for her huſband's abſence, had retired to Greenwich; in the mean time Philip did all he could to entrap her into a declaration of war againſt France; but neither he nor his emiſſaries could carry their point without ſome difficulty and a pretty deal of art. A perſon was employed to make a private overture to the French miniſtry on the part of the proteſtant inhabitants of Calais, to betray the town into the hands of their king, if he would receive and protect them; Henry ſeemed to lend a favourable ear to the propoſal, and actually entered into a negociation upon the ſubject. Wootton, Philip's agent, ſent his nephew over to England with an account of the whole to the queen, who took fire at it, and became, or pretended to become, entirely ſatisfied of the ill deſigns of the French againſt her dominions. Accordingly, on the nineteenth of February, ſhe ordered forces to be levied, as if open war had been proclaimed againſt that crown, and nominated the earl of Pembroke to command the Engliſh troops abroad, and he actually went over to Calais with a vaſt attendance of noblemen and gentlemen. From that time the court of France entertained no doubt of the queen's intending to take part with her huſband in the war, and from thence omitted no opportunity, even before the ſame was declared, to diſtreſs her.

It was the twentieth of March before the long-expected Philip came to Greenwich, from whence he and the queen proceeded with great pomp to Weſtminſter, where they were ſoon alarmed by dreadful apprehenſions from the North, which, however, turned out to be the means of procuring them their ardent deſire of coming to an open rupture with France. Thomas Stafford, who was the lineal deſcendant of the late duke of Buckingham, and conſequently bore no remote relation to the crown, had been for ſome time a refugee at the court of France, being joined by ſeveral other diſaffected perſons there, and, unhappily for themſelves, miſtaking the diſcontent of the people for a general diſaffection to the government, they attempted to ſtir up an inſurrection; and, landing, in Scotland towards the end of April, marched directly to Scarborough, and ſeized the caſtle, when Stafford aſſumed the title of Protector of the kingdom, and publiſhed a manifeſto, pretending that the queen had forfeited her right to the crown by introducing Spaniards into England: but the enterprize, which ſeems to have been too romantic for any to embark in but men of the moſt deſperate fortunes, proved fatal to Stafford and his followers, for he was ſoon defeated and taken priſoner by the earl of Weſtmoreland, and ſent up to London, where he was executed, on the twenty-eighth of May. This affair, with the repeated inſtances of Mary, and the perſonal application of Philip, or, what is ſtill more probable, the ſums of money they laviſhed on this occaſion, got the better of the council's reſiſtance, and they reſolved to declare war againſt France, which was accordingly done in the month of June; and the late invaſion, which Stafford and his accomplices declared to have been promoted and aſſiſted by king Henry, was urged as one of the reaſons for breaking with that monarch; and eight thouſand men were ſent over to the earl of Pembroke, to be by him marched into the Low Countries, to join Philibert, duke of Savoy, Philip's general.

Philip, having gained his point, could not be retained an inſtant by all the tears and intreaties of his love-love-ſick wife, but haſtened over, in the following month, to Bruſſels; while the duke of Savoy, ſtrengthened by the junction of the Engliſh troops with his army, entered Picardy, and inveſted St. Quintin† with all his forces; and as the place was poorly fortified, and defended only by a weak garriſon, he hoped that in a few days he ſhould compel it to ſurrender: but admiral Coligny, the governor, thinking it his duty to ſave ſo important a fortreſs, threw himſelf into St. Quintin with ſome battalions of French and Scots, and, by his exhortation and example, encouraged the ſoldiers to make a bold and vigorous defence. In the mean time he diſpatched an expreſs to his uncle, the conſtable de Montmorency, who headed the French army, deſiring a ſupply of men; and that general advanced to the place with his whole army, in order to facilitate the entrance of thoſe ſuccours.

The duke of Savoy, who was one of the greateſt generals of the age, being informed of the deſign of the French, fell upon the reinforcement with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that not above five hundred men got into the place; then attacking the conſtable, he routed his army, took him priſoner, and killed two thouſand five hundred of his men, amongſt whom were many princes and noblemen, beſides a much greater number made priſoners.

The event of this battle, which was fought on the tenth of Auguſt, St. Laurence's day, filled the whole kingdom of France with the utmoſt conſternation: and the duke of Savoy, to improve it more to his advantage, detached the earl of Bedford, immediately after the battle, with two thouſand Engliſh, and two thouſand Spaniards under the count of Egmont, to make an inroad into France, which they now ravaged for two-and-twenty miles without meeting the leaſt reſiſtance. The Pariſians, in their firſt fright, began to fortify their capital with the utmoſt hurry and expedition; and had the Spaniards immediately advanced thither, they would certainty have made themſelves maſters of the place; but they proceeded with the ſiege of St. Quintin, which held out by the bravery of the admiral for ſeventeen days, when it was taken by aſſault, and that brave officer, with his brother and all thoſe that ſurvived of the garriſon, were made priſoners. In the mean time the French miniſtry diſpatched courier after courier to recall the duke of Guiſe and his army from Italy. As for Philip, after reducing Ham and Chatillet, finding the ſeaſon ſo far advanced that he could not think of proſecuting his conqueſts, he broke up his camp, and diſperſed his troops in winter-quarters about the middle of October.

The victory of St. Quintin was celebrated in England with extravagant demonſtrations of joy: but when pope Paul firſt underſtood that Mary had declared war againſt France, he was violently exaſperated againſt cardinal Pole, as if he had adopted that meaſure, and would have recalled him immediately, had not ſir Edward Carne, the Engliſh ambaſſador at his court, repreſented the injury he would do to religion by ſuch a proceeding; but when the news of the battle arrived, he was ſeized with a tranſport of rage, and reſolved to ſacrifice Pole to his revenge. He ſent for Peyton, the queen's confeſſor, to Rome, where he beſtowed upon him a cardinal's hat, appointed him his legate in England, and charged him with a decree, by which Pole was recalled: but the queen, being informed of this mandate, gave notice to Peyton, that ſhould he attempt to ſet foot in England, ſhe would cauſe him to be puniſhed with all the rigour of the Præmunire. This letter ſtopped the new cardinal in his journey; and the pope, finding himſelf unable to cope with the duke of Alva, concluded a peace with Spain, and, by an article of the treaty, Pole was re-eſtabliſhed in his legatine functions.

While theſe things were tranſacting the flames of perſecution ſtill continued to blaze with unremitting fury, and numbers were almoſt daily burned at Smithfield, and at different places in the ſeveral counties. The queen, not contented with the endeavours of her miniſtry to extirpate the proteſtant religion, had reſolved to ſtrengthen the intereſt of the Roman catholicks by reſtoring ſome old, and founding ſome new, monaſteries: ſhe certainly would have re-eſtabliſhed all the religious houſes which had been ſuppreſſed, if the fear of diſobliging the nobility had not deterred her from the execution of her deſign. Several members of the houſe of commons, in the laſt ſeſſion, hearing ſuch a propoſal mentioned, laid their hands upon their ſwords, ſaying, they knew how to defend their property. Mary, being informed of this oppoſition, poſtponed her ſcheme to a more favourable opportunity: in the mean time ſhe commiſſioned Bonner, and others, to eraſe from the public records all the tranſactions againſt the pope and the monks, during the latter part of the reign of her father, Henry VIII. particularly an account of the viſitations and renunciation of the papal authority made by the monks and abbots: and this year the abbey and ſanctuary of Weſtminſter were revived; and a felon having eſcaped out of jail and taken refuge there, the monks refuſed to deliver him up to the civil authority, and when the magiſtrates would have forcibly dragged him from thence, the queen interpoſed her authority, and obliged them to deſiſt. The melancholy apprehenſions riſing from ſuch proceedings were vaſtly increaſed by the formidable diſpoſition which the Scots were now making for invading England: this naturally leads me to deſcribe the ſituation of affairs in Scotland at this time *.

The reader may remember, that when the queen-dowager of Scotland returned to that kingdom from France, ſhe had gotten herſelf declared regent during the minority of her daughter, in the room of Hamilton, earl of Arran, afterwards created duke of Chatelerault, in France, and thenceforth aſſumed the name and exerciſed the authority of regent.

Hoſtilities had no ſooner commenced between France and England, than Henry applied to the regent of Scotland, requiring her to take part in the quarrel; and ſhe, having convened the ſtates

On the thirtieth of April, Thomas Piercy was created baron Piercy, and, on the firſt of May, earl of Northumberland; from whom were deſcended the late dukes of Somerſet, as is Elizabeth, baroneſs Piercy, lady of the right honourable Hugh, earl of Northumberland. of the kingdom, at Newbottle, deſired them to agree to a declaration of war againſt England. But the Scottiſh nobility, who were as jealous of the French, as the Engliſh were of Spaniſh influence, flatly refuſed to grant her requeſt; and ſhe was obliged to make uſe of a ſtratagem, in order to accompliſh her aim.

She ordered one d'Oiſel, a Frenchman, who had attended her in Scotland as ambaſſador from Henry, to begin ſome fortifications at Eyemouth, a place which had been demoliſhed by the laſt treaty with Edward; and when the garriſon of Berwick, as might naturally be ſuppoſed, made an inroad to defeat the undertaking, ſhe artfully employed this pretence to inflame the reſentment of the Scottiſh nation, and to make them embark in a war with England.

The animoſity of the Scots, however, was carried no farther than by committing ſome depredations on the northern counties: and when d'Oiſel, of his own accord, undertook the ſiege of Werk caſtle, he was inſtantly ordered to deſiſt, and was ſeverely reprimanded by the council.

In order to ſtrengthen the alliance between France and Scotland, and to augment the influence of the former kingdom, Henry II. thought proper to finiſh the marriage between the young queen and the dauphin; and commiſſioners were appointed by the Scottiſh parliament to aſſiſt at this ceremony, and to regulate the terms of the contract.

Theſe commiſſioners were the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, the biſhops of Roſs and the Orkneys, the earls of Rothes and Caſſils, the lords Fleming and Seton, James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, natural brother to the queen, and Erſkine of Dun. The inſtructions given to theſe deputies imported, that they ſhould obtain a ſolemn engagement from the queen and dauphin, obliging them to maintain the laws and privileges of Scotland; and they ſhould procure a renewal of the French king's promiſe, to ſupport, in caſe of the queen's death, the ſucceſſion of the earl of Arran, now dignified with the title of duke of Chatelereault.

Both theſe conditions were readily granted; but the court of France employed a very baſe and perfidious artifice to defeat theſe ſtipulations: they ſecretly perſuaded the young queen, whoſe tender age and inexperience may well free her from any ſhare of the guilt, to ſubſcribe three papers; by one of which ſhe made over the kingdom of Scotland in gift to the king of France, in the event of her dying without children; by another ſhe mortgaged it to him for a million of crowns of gold, or ſuch greater ſum as he ſhould have expended in her maintenance and ſupport; and by a third, ſhe declared, that whatever will or deed ſhe had been obliged, or ſhould hereafter be obliged to ſign, concerning the ſucceſſion of the crown, it ſhould be entirely void and of no effect, and that her real ſenſe and intention was expreſſed in the firſt paper.

The marriage was celebrated at Paris, in the ſpring of the enſuing year; the deputies, in the name of the ſtates of Scotland, ſwore allegiance to the queen, and (during the continuance of the marriage) to the king-dauphin, as he was now called; and every thing ſeemed to be conducted with the greateſt harmony and concord. But when the commiſſioners were deſired to deliver up the crown and other enſigns of royalty, they replied, that they had no power to take ſuch a ſtep; and they ſoon after ſet out on their return for Scotland. Before they embarked, however, no leſs than four of them died within a few days of each other; and as the queen's uncles were known to be highly incenſed at them, on account of their late refuſal, they were commonly ſuppoſed to have been poiſoned by orders from theſe noblemen.

In the latter end of this year Philip ſent intimation to Mary, that, by papers taken among the baggage of the admiral de Coligny, there was great reaſon to believe that the court of France had projected ſome ſcheme againſt Calais, and offered to ſupply her with troops for the guard of that fortreſs, which was in a defenceleſs condition. The council looked upon this intimation as a ſtratagem of Philip, to gain poſſeſſion of Calais, and the queen not only declined accepting his offer, but alſo neglected to put the place in a poſture of defence, notwithſtanding the repeated ſolicitations of the lord Wentworth, the governor.

The French king had created the duke of Guiſe his lieutenant-general for the whole kingdom of France, on his return from Italy: but that general, not content with defending the frontiers, reſolved, even in the depth of winter, to undertake an enterprize which France, during her greateſt ſucceſſes, had always conſidered as impoſſible, and had ſeldom preſumed to attempt; this was no leſs than the reduction of Calais. In fine, all the neceſſary arrangements being taken for that purpoſe, he ſat down before the place on the firſt of January, 1558, to the amazement of all Europe, but of none more than the Engliſh nation, who were wrapped up in full ſecurity of the French being unable to attempt any enterprize of conſequence ſo ſoon after the dreadful defeat at St. Quintin.

The place was commanded by the lord Wentworth, a brave and experienced officer, whoſe garriſon conſiſted only of five hundred ſoldiers and about two hundred townſmen. It was ſurrounded by moraſſes on the land ſide, by which it could only be approached by a dyke, in the middle of a moraſs, at the head of which was a bridge, defended by a fort called Newenham, and being upwards of a quarter of a mile from the town: near this fort there was another, called St. Agatha, of leſs importance; and the entrance into the haven was defended, as it is now, by the caſtle of Ryſbank.

At the time the duke of Guiſe began his march for Calais, a fleet of French ſhips were ſent into the Channel, under colour of cruizing upon the Engliſh trading veſſels, but with orders to hold themſelves in readineſs upon the coaſt for an important ſervice: and theſe were afterwards made uſe of in attacking the fortifications by ſea. The firſt operation of the duke of Guiſe was againſt fort Agatha, which the Engliſh, after a gallant defence, were forced to abandon; and they then threw themſelves into fort Newenham, which was immediately inveſted by the enemy; and at the ſame time the fleet cannonaded the Ryſbank, which, as has been ſaid, ſecured the entrance of the harbour; and both theſe caſtles ſeemed to be altogether untenable. Lord Wentworth finding that the greater part of his weak garriſon was ſhut up in theſe two forts, ſent them orders to capitulate, and join him in Calais, which, without their aſſiſtance, he was totally incapable of defending. The garriſon of Newenham were ſo fortunate as to accompliſh this junction; but that of Ryſbank could not procure ſuch honourable terms, and were compelled to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

All the avenues to the palace being now ſecured, the duke of Guiſe, with inexpreſſible labour, by the help of hurdles, pitched over, formed a road through the moraſs, by which a large detachment of his army lodged themſelves behind ſome heights, where they could not be annoyed from the town, and from whence they directed a battery of fifteen large cannon againſt the caſtle, in which he preſently made a large breach, ſo as to render it practicable to be ſtormed. He then ordered d'Andelot, brother of the admiral de Coligny, to draw the waters off from the ditch. This was effected with ſurprizing diſpatch in one night's time. The next day the duke ordered a general aſſault, which was made with ſuch fury, that the breach was carried by ſtorm, and the French effected a lodgment in the caſtle. On the enſuing night, Wentworth endeavoured to regain this poſt; but having loſt two hundred men in the attempt, and the duke of Guiſe pouring ſuch numbers into the caſtle, as made any further reſiſtance a madneſs, the lord Wentworth, on the ſeventeenth, capitulated on the following terms, the beſt he could obtain in his diſtreſſed ſituation, namely, "That he himſelf was to remain priſoner, with fifty of the chief of the garriſon: that the reſt ſhould have liberty to retire to England or Flanders: and that the place, with all its proviſions, ammunition, furniture, and riches, ſhould be immediately delivered up to the French."

Ham and Guiſnes were both reduced by the twenty-ſecond, and thus the duke of Guiſe, in leſs than a month, in the depth of winter, reconquered this important place, which had coſt Edward III. a ſiege of eleven months, at the head of a numerous army, flushed with the glory they had lately gained in the plains of Creſſy; and the Engliſh now ſaw themſelves ſtripped of all they had held for two hundred and ten years in France. The people of England, inſtead of expreſſing rage, ſhewed deſpondency, under ſo many diſgraces and calamities. As for Mary, ſhe was ſo ſenſibly affected with the loſs, that ſhe abandoned herſelf to deſpair, and repeatedly declared to thoſe about her, "that her end was near at hand, though they were ſtrangers to the cauſe of her death; but if they would know it hereafter, they muſt diſſect her, and ſhould find Calais engraven on her heart."

The laſt parliament of this reign ſat on the twentieth of January, 1558; but as the miniſtry were more intent upon perſecution at home than how to recover their loſſes abroad, they rejected a propoſal made by Philip of aſſiſting them to the utmoſt of his power to recover Calais, before the ſeaſon would permit the French to repair its works. In ſhort, the parliament was prorogued, on the ſeventh of March to the ſeventh of November following. This quick diſmiſſion ſeems to have been occaſioned by the great complaints that were made all over the nation of the pernicious councils of the miniſtry, and of the queen's reſtitution of church-lands and foundation of monaſteries: however, before its riſing, The parliament voted a ſufficient ſubſidy for the defence of the kingdom againſt all invaſions. In this ſeſſions Ambroſe and Robert Dudley, ſons of the late duke Northumberland, were reſtored in blood.

About the end of March, the perſecution againſt the proteſtants was renewed with greater fury than ever; the queen, though ſenſibly drooping to her grave (ſo greatly was her dropſy increaſed), iſſued a proclamation, "That whoever were poſſeſſed of any heretical books, and did not preſently burn them, without reading, ſhould be eſteemed rebels, and be executed without delay by the martial law:" and five perſons were burned at Canterbury, part of thirty-nine that ſuffered for religion in ſeveral places during this year.

All the ſpring of this year was taken up in refitting the navy; and the money granted by the parliament enabled the government to equip one hundred and forty ſail; which being reinforced by thirty Flemiſh ſhips, with a body of ſix thouſand land forces, were ſent to make a deſcent on the coaſt of France, near Breſt: but the preparations for this ſurprize were conducted with ſo little ſecrecy and diſpatch, that the French got intelligence of the deſign, and put all their ſea-ports in a poſture of defence, ſo that the Engliſh were obliged to reimbark with conſiderable loſs, after they had burnt the ſmall town of Conquet, where they landed.

But a ſmall ſquadron of ten Engliſh ſhips had ſoon after an opportunity of retorting upon the French this damage and diſgrace. The marſhal de Thermes, the new governor of Calais, had invaded Flanders with an army of fourteen thouſand men; and having croſſed the Aa (a river of France, in the province of Picardy), had reduced Dunkirk and Berg St. Winoc, and proceeded ſo far as Nieuport; but being overtaken by the Spaniards, under count Egmont, Philip's general, near Gravelines, the French marſhal was defeated, with great ſlaughter, and himſelf, with his principal officers, taken priſoner. This victory was entirely owing to the Engliſh men of war, who, chancing to come up the harbour while the battle was maintained with equal fury on both ſides, charged the French in flank with their great guns, inſomuch that the rout began from that quarter.

As the French army, thus ruined, had been drawn out of Calais and other neighbouring garriſons, a fair opportunity was now offered for the recovery of that place, in which the fleet and forces that plundered Conquet might have proved very uſeful, and were ready for the ſervice; the queen had likewiſe another army on foot, for her huſband's ſervice; but her council had no vigour, and Philip was too indifferent about every thing that regarded the intereſt of England; and, notwithſtanding the two ſignal victories he had ſo lately obtained, he was diſpoſed to conclude the war by a treaty, which was accordingly ſet on foot at the abbey of Cercamp, being managed by the conſtable de Montmorency, the marſhal de St. André, the cardinal of Lorraine (brother to the duke of Guiſe), Morvilliers, biſhop of Orleans, and l'Aubeſpine, ſecretary of ſtate, on the part of France; and on that of Spain, by the duke of Alva, the prince of Orange, and Granville, biſhop of Arras. Theſe plenipotentiaries agreed readily to a ſuſpenſion of arms on the frontiers till the twenty-eighth of October, which was afterwards prolonged, and both armies were put into winter-quarters.

In the mean while Mary received overtures for a peace between England, France, and Spain; and being broken both in health and ſpirit, ſhe readily readily liſtened to the advice of her counſellors, who were for having peace at any rate; ſhe therefore named the earl of Arundel, the biſhop of Ely, and Dr. Wootton, for her plenipotentiaries to aſſiſt at the future conferences, which were to be renewed in October, and Cambray was the place appointed for the congreſs.

The Engliſh parliament meeting on the fifth of November, the queen demanded aſſiſtance to continue the war, in caſe the negociation ſhould miſcarry. The houſe of commons, however, were ſo little inclined to grant her requeſt, that ſhe was obliged, on the fourteenth, to ſend the chancellor and ten other lords to lay the ill ſtate of her affairs before them, and pray them to haſten the neceſſary ſupplies. This ſolicitation producing ſome effect, the commons took the matter into conſideration, and debated, that and the two following days, upon a ſubſidy: but the queen's death put an end to the conſultation. She had been ſome time afflicted with a dropſy, the conſequence of her falſe conception, and having purſued an improper regimen, her diſtemper became every day more inveterate; her malady was ſtill farther inflamed by the anxiety of her mind, which was now tormented with the moſt painful reflections: the conſciouſneſs of being deteſted by her ſubjects; the proſpect of Elizabeth's ſucceſſion to the throne; the overthrow of the catholic religion; grief for the loſs of Calais; and, above all, the diſtracting thought of ſoon ſeeing herſelf bereft for ever of the company of her huſband Philip, who, on the death of his father, the late emperor, Charles V. (which happened in September this year) had determined to ſettle in Spain, during the remainder of his life: all theſe diſagreeable reflections preyed upon her mind, and threw her into a lingering fever, of which ſhe died, on the ſeventeenth of November, a little before day-break, in the forty-third year of her age, after a reign of five years, four months and eleven days. Cardinal Pole, who was ill at the ſame time, did not ſurvive her ſixteen hours.

No nation had ever a more ſignal deliverance than the divine Providence now wrought for England, by taking off Mary in ſo critical a juncture, on the eve of a peace, which would have enabled her and Philip to purſue their deteſtable ſcheme for ſubverting the conſtitution of the kingdom and enſlaving a diſunited people, hopeleſs of any foreign ſuccour, and which had been long fixed for the time of its execution. Her funeral was ſolemnized on the fourteenth of December, at Weſtminſter, with a maſs of Requiem, in the uſual form of the Romiſh church, and her body was interred in the chapel of Henry VII. her grand-father.

Mary's character is ſo ſtrongly marked in every action of her bloody and inglorious reign, that we may well ſpare ourſelves the diſagreeable task of a recapitulation; we ſhall therefore only obſerve, with one of our old hiſtorians, that of all the ſovereigns of England ſince the conqueſt, her reign was the ſhorteſt, excepting only that of the tyrant Richard III. but much more bloody than his was; a greater number of perſons having been put to death for religion's ſake, during the ſhort time of her reign, than in any king's time ſince Lucius, the firſt eſtabliſher of the Goſpel in this realm.

ELIZABETH. The fifth Sovereign of ENGLAND of the Houſe of TUDOR. A. D. 1558.

THE death of queen Mary at a time when the popiſh faction ran ſo high and tyrannized over the proteſtants, threw her arbitrary council into the utmoſt conſternation; but as the parliament was then ſitting, and in a very bad humour with the miniſtry, this latter, not daring to act of their own authority, after a few hours concealment of her death, informed the houſe of lords of this event, who, without much conſultation concerning the rights of the other claimants of the crown, declared unanimouſly for the princeſs Elizabeth; and ſending for the commons, acquainted them, by the mouth of Heath, lord high-chancellor, with their reſolution. The commons concurred with the lords, and Elizabeth was the ſame day (November 17) proclaimed at the uſual places, while the proteſtants and papiſts ſeemed to vie with each other in their demonſtrations of joy.

The princeſs Elizabeth was not then in the Tower of London, as ſome hiſtorians have aſſerted, but at Biſhop's Hatfield, in Hertfordſhire, where ſhe received information of the ſteps taken in her favour by the parliament, and was there alſo proclaimed; and the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, the lord Clinton, ſir Ralph Sadler, ſir Richard Sackville, ſir Ambroſe Cave, ſir Edward Rogers, ſir Thomas Parry, and ſir William Cecil repairing thither, ſhe formed of them a ſmall privy-council, for the ordering of ſuch matters as required an immediate diſpatch.

The firſt ſtep of her government was to iſſue proclamations all over the kingdom, ſtrictly enjoining "all her ſubjects to keep the peace, forbear all attempts, upon any pretence whatever, to break or alter any order or uſage at that time eſtabliſhed." This prudent charge was given to prevent ſuch diſorders as there was reaſon to apprehend from the intemperate zeal of ſome of the reformed, who, following the precedent ſet them by the popiſh party in the late reign, and preſuming upon the queen's ſuppoſed affection to the proteſtant religion, might, without waiting for her royal warrant, proceed, in an illegal and riotous manner, to demoliſh images, and reſtore the ſervice uſed in the days of Edward VI.

In the preſent ſituation of affairs a ſudden tranſition would have been highly impolitic, and even indecent; and the happy effect of her prudent temporizing, was her indiſputed acceſſion to the throne. Her compliances during the late reign had given the papiſts hopes that ſhe was not ſo much an enemy to their religion, as to the cruel and bloody methods made uſe of to enforce it; while the proteſtants, on ſurer foundations, knew her to be truly a friend to their more humane and enlightened doctrine: to keep fair with all parties therefore, ſhe ſuffered men of both denominations to find alike ſeats in the council of ſtate, which had in her ſiſter's time been compoſed entirely of Roman catholics; and although the moſt obnoxious of them, on account of their bloody proceedings, were excluded, the queen ſtill retained ſuch of the old counſellors as were moſt eminent for their quality, talents, wiſdom, reputation, and experience. Theſe were,

Heath, archbiſhop of York and lord-chancellor.
William Pawlet, marquis of Wincheſter and lord high-treaſurer.
Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel.
Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury.
Edward Stanley, earl of Derby.
William Herbert, earl of Pembroke.
Edward Fiennes, lord Clinton and lord high-admiral.
William, lord Howard, afterwards earl of Effingham, lord-chamberlain.
Sir Thomas Cheney.
Sir William Petre.
Sir John Maſon.
Sir Richard Sackville. And
Dr. Wootton, dean of Canterbury.

But it is to be obſerved, that in admitting theſe reputed zealous Roman catholics, Elizabeth thought herſelf pretty ſure of their compliance with her intentions in favouring the reformation in the church, who had complied with all the changes of religion, backward and forward, ever ſince latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. and done it ſo artfully in all thoſe revolutions as to be conſtantly employed. However, ſhe thought proper to join with them a certain number of proteſtants, on whom ſhe was certain ſhe could rely: theſe were,

William Parr, marquis of Northampton, whom ſhe reſtored to all his honours.
Francis Ruſſel, earl of Bedford.
Sir Thomas Parry, made comptroller of the houſhold.
Sir Edward Rogers, made vice-chamberlain and captain of the body-guards.
Sir William Cecil, principal ſecretary of ſtate.
Sir Robert Dudley, made maſter of the horſe.
Sir Ambroſe Cave. And
Sir Nicholas Bacon: which laſt had, ſome little time afterwards, the cuſtody of the great-ſeal given him, with the title of lord-keeper.

The like judicious blending was made among the ſubordinate miniſters, particularly the juſtices of the peace: a new ſet of gentlemen, known to be of the reformed religion, or well affected to it, being added to the former commiſſion for each county, who were all papiſts. She alſo joined lord Howard of Effingham to Mary's plenipotentiaries for negociating a peace with France.

We ſhall omit all the particulars of Elizabeth's progreſs from Hatfield to the Tower, which ſhe entered on the twenty-eighth of November; but are to obſerve, that no day paſſed without a council, in which every thing was conducted with that order and œconomy which ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed her perſon and government.

The uſual compliments on her acceſſion to the throne being over, the queen gave orders for ſecuring all the ſea-ports of the kingdom. She ſent a new commiſſion to ſir Thomas Radcliffe (brother to the earl of Suſſex), lord-lieutenant of Ireland; renewed the judges patents; ſent an agent to aſſure the German proteſtants of her affections, and miniſters to notify her acceſſion to all the principal courts in Europe; and ſhe wrote to ſir Edward Carne, her ambaſſador at Rome, to notify the death of her ſiſter, and her own acceſſion, to the pope; a meſſage which Paul IV. received in the moſt haughty manner, and anſwered in terms leſs agreeable to the politics of his court than to the arrogance of his nature: he told the Engliſh miniſter, "that the kingdom of England was held as a fief of the ſee of Rome; that Elizabeth could not ſucceed to it, being illegitimate; that he could not annul the declarations of his predeceſſors, Clement VII. and Paul III. that it was a great preſumption in Elizabeth to aſſume the ſtyle of Queen, and the government of the realm, without his conſent; yet, being deſirous to ſhew a fatherly affection towards her, he would do whatever was conſiſtent with the honour of his ſee in her favour, provided ſhe would renounce her pretenſions, and refer herſelf entirely to his diſpoſition*." Elizabeth was neither ſurprized nor affected with this anſwer of his holineſs; it only afforded a good reaſon for recalling Carne: but he, being a rigid papiſt, did not care to return, eſpecially as he had been offered by Paul the maſterſhip of an hoſpital at Rome, which had fallen vacant by the death of cardinal Pole.

King Philip received the news of Elizabeth's acceſſion to the throne of England with great ſurprize; but, in order to ſecure his intereſt in that crown, he ordered his miniſter to pay his compliments to her on that occaſion, to propoſe a marriage between him and her, and, in caſe of any ſcruple in regard to their affinity, to tell her that Philip would procure the pope's diſpenſation. Elizabeth received the propoſal with great tokens of eſteem for king Philip, but had the addreſs to poſtpone her final anſwer, with great civility, in order to preſerve a good underſtanding between England and Spain till ſhe could conclude an advantageous peace with France: but the Spaniſh miniſter's importunities increaſed ſo much upon this head, that ſhe, unwilling to give a flat denial, reſolved to make him deſiſt from his ſolicitations about marriage, by haſtening the execution of her deſign to make a change in religion, in which ſhe was not a little ſeconded by the ready compliance of the ſucceeding parliament.

But though the queen was induced by intereſt, by education, and her own principles, to favour the Reformation, yet ſhe determined to introduce it gradually, thinking by that means to eſtabliſh it more ſecurely, and to avoid the inconveniencies to which her ſiſter had been expoſed by an inſtantaneous alteration of worſhip and a violent invaſion of the eſtabliſhed religion. With this view, finding that the proteſtant teachers broke out into a furious attack on the ancient ſuperſtition, and that the Romaniſts retorted upon them with equal acrimony, ſhe publiſhed, on the twenty-ſeventh of December, a proclamation, by which ſhe prohibited all preaching without ſpecial licence; and ordered the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Goſpel, to be read in Engliſh. She at the ſame time employed Dr. Matthew Parker, in conjunction with ſix other divines, to review the Liturgy of Edward VI. and to prepare the nation for its introduction into publiſh worſhip. She publiſhed injunctions, that all churches ſhould conform themſelves to the practice of her own chapel, and forbad the hoſt to be elevated in her preſence.

Theſe ſteps towards a reformation gave ſuch an alarm to the popiſh biſhops, that, apprehending a total abolition of the papal power and uſages of the church of Rome would ſoon follow, or perhaps fearing to offend the pope, who had ſcrupled to acknowlege the queen's title, and denied her legitimacy, they generally reſolved not to officiate at her coronation; and none but Oglethorp, biſhop of Carliſle, could be perſuaded to do the office.

He agreeing to crown the queen, ſhe removed from the Tower on the fourteenth of January, 1559, in grand proceſſion through the ſtreets of London to Weſtminſter, amidſt the acclamations of an infinite number of perſons aſſembled on the occaſion, which ſhe returned with ſuch a modeſt affability and ſo winning a grace, as charmed the hearts of all beholders. But nothing ſhewed more the ſentiments of the citizens in point of religion, or endeared their new ſovereign more to them than the accepting of an Engliſh Bible, richly gilt, which was let down from a pageant, in Cheapſide, by a child repreſenting Truth, who made her a ſpeech on the occaſion. The queen received the book with both her hands, and, having kiſſed it, held it up, then laid it to her breaſt, promiſing to be diligent in reading it, and aſſuring the city that ſhe eſteemed that gift more than all the ſumptuous preſents they had made her. The next day, being Sunday, January 15, the queen was crowned in Weſtminſter abbey, and the two days following were diſtinguiſhed by juſts and tournaments, in honour of her coronation.

On this occaſion a patent was granted to Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, to perform the office of high-conſtable on the day before the coronation, and the office of high-ſteward on the cornation-day. Several knights of the Bath were likewiſe created; and the queen, willing to diſtinguiſh ſome of her moſt particular friends, reſtored the lord Edward Seymour, eldeſt ſon of the late duke of Somerſet, by a ſecond wife *, to the titles of viſcount Beauchamp and earl of Hertford; created the lord Thomas Howard, ſecond ſon of the duke of Norfolk, viſcount Howard of Binden; and advanced ſir Oliver St. John, and Henry Cary, ſon to ſir William Cary, by her aunt Mary Boleyn, to the dignities of barons, by the titles of lord St. John of Bletſho, and lord Hunſdon.

The parliament meeting on the twenty-fifth of January, ſir Nicholas Bacon, who, on the twenty-ſecond of December the laſt year, had been made keeper of the great-ſeal †, on the reſignation of Heath, archbiſhop of York, the lord-chancellor, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he diſplayed the merits of the new queen, with ſevere reflections on the loſs of Calais: he told them, that the queen deſired an immediate application to the affairs of religion; that a diſunion in that reſpect was one of the evils which called for the moſt ſpeedy redreſs: he exhorted the parliament to proceed between the two extremes of ſuperſtition and religion, which might unite the adherents of both religions in one and the ſame mode of public worſhip.

Then, to try the diſpoſition of the parliament, a motion was made in the houſe of commons for reſtoring to the crown the tenths, firſt-fruits, and impropriations, which had been given up by queen Mary: this motion was immediately approved, and the bill for ſuch reſtoration being paſſed notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the biſhops ‡, on the fourth of February, the commons, in an humble addreſs, adviſed the queen to marry, in order to perpetuate their felicity, by having ſome of her royal iſſue to reign over them. After a few days taken to conſider of the matter, her majeſty returned them for anſwer, that "as the addreſs was expreſſed in general terms, without pretending to fix her choice, ſhe could not be any ways offended; that, notwithſtanding her youth might render her veracity ſuſpected, ſhe had always declined the marriage-ſtate as an incumbrance; that as England was her huſband, wedded to her by this pledge (and here ſhewed her finger with the gold ring upon it, with which ſhe had ſolemnly betrothed herſelf to the kingdom at her inauguration), ſo all Engliſhmen were her children, and while ſhe was employed in rearing and governing ſuch a family, ſhe could not eſteem herſelf barren, or her life uſeleſs or unfruitful ‖; that ſhe doubted not of her ſubjects finding a ſucceſſor at her death; and that, as to her own part, her greateſt pride would be to have her monument declare that ſhe had reigned and died a virgin-queen."

The parliament now proceeding in buſineſs, their next act was to recognize Elizabeth by a bill, importing that ſhe was, and might be as well by the word of God as the common and ſtatute laws of the realm, the lawful, undoubted, and true heir of the crown, lawfully deſcended from the blood royal according to the order of ſucceſſion ſettled in the thirty-fifth year of Henry VIII.

This was immediately followed by an act appointing the public worſhip to be performed in Engliſh.

Another, reſtoring the queen to her right of ſupremacy in the church of England.

* The lady Anne Stanhope; on whoſe iſſue he procured an act to ſettle the titles and eſtate; and not Edward Seymour, his ſurviving eldeſt ſon by his firſt wife, Catherine Fittol, who was diſinherited to gratify the pride and ambition of his laſt wife, and never enjoyed any title. It is not unworthy notice, that upon the extinction of the youngeſt line of this family by the ſecond marriage in 1750, the eldeſt branch, ſeated at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, deſcended from the laſt-mentioned Edward, ſo diſinherited, ſucceeded to the dukedom of Somerſet, after having been excluded full two hundred years.

† He was the firſt that was by patent created lord-keeper. Formerly, thoſe that were keepers of the ſeal had no dignity or authority annexed to their office; they did not hear cauſes nor preſide in the houſe of lords; but only to put the ſeals to ſuch writs or patents as went in courſe: and ſo the ſeal was only put in the hands of the keeper but for ſome ſhort interval. But now Bacon was the firſt lord-keeper that had all the dignity and authority of lord-chancellor conferred upon him. He was father to the great ſir Francis Bacon, viſcount of St. Alban's, and was one of the moſt learned, moſt pious, and wiſeſt men of the nation. Burnet, vol. ii. p. 380.

‡ The biſhops who oppoſed it were Heath, archbiſhop of York; Bonner, biſhop of London, Pates of Worceſter, Kitching of Llandaff, Bayne of Coventry, Tuberville of Exeter, Scot of Cheſter, and Oglethorpe of Carliſle. Sir S. d'Ewe's Journal, p. 19.

Another,

Another reviving and confirming all the acts made in the reign of Edward VI. concerning religion: and in this many others were included.

Another restored to the queen the nomination of bishops; reconfirmed many of Henry VIII's statutes against the papal authority; empowered the queen to put the exercise of her supremacy into what hands she pleased; and obliged all persons in public employments to swear "that they acknowleged the queen to be supreme governess in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as temporal; that they renounced all foreign jurisdiction; and should bear to the queen true allegiance," under pain of being declared incapable of holding any public office. And lastly, divers other penalties were enacted against those who, by word or writing, should set forth or advance any foreign authority in the kingdom.

Another act was passed to establish uniformity in public worship, against which the archbishop of York, the bishops of London, Ely, Worcester, Llandaff, Coventry, Exeter, and Chester, the marquis of Winchester, the earl of Shrewsbury, the viscount Montagu, and the lords Morley, Stafford, Dudley, Wharton, Rich, and North, entered their protests as dissentients.

By a sixth act the parliament empowered the queen to resume herself to the lands belonging to the bishoprics, as they became vacant, giving in lieu of them their full value, and impropriated tythes.

By a seventh, all religious houses were annexed to the crown.

By an eighth, the deprivation of popish bishops, in king Edward's reign, was declared valid.

In a word this parliament restored religion to the same state as in the reign of Edward VI. and, after a grant of a subsidy, two tenths and two fifteenths, with tonnage and poundage for the queen's life, it was dissolved on the eighth of May.

The supremacy with which the queen was lately invested, with power to depute any person to exercise it in her name, gave rise to a new court, called the High Commission Court. It was composed of a certain number of commissioners, which exercised the same power that had been formerly lodged by Henry VIII. in the single person of his minister, Cromwell, under the title of Vicegerent.

The zeal of the parliament alarmed the zealots of the popish faction so much, that they attempted, even during the session, to oppose their proceedings, and to preach from the pulpit doctrines that tended to overthrow their grand intention of a reformation; wherefore Elizabeth, after the example of her predecessors, Edward and Mary, forbad all preaching without a special licence under the great seal, which so exasperated the lower house of convocation, that they boldly asserted the doctrines of the church of Rome in a petition to the queen; whereupon she ordered the divines on both sides to meet, and, in open dispute, to consider and determine upon those doctrines. Accordingly it was agreed that nine divines of each side should hold a conference, which began on the thirty-first of March, in Westminster abbey: but the bishops of Winchester and Lincoln, seeing the cause in great danger, said that the faith of the church ought not to be examined but by a synod of divines; that the queen and council ought to be excommunicated for suffering the catholic faith to be argued before an unlearned multitude; and so departed from the conference, leaving the protestants to enjoy their triumph. However it produced this good effect, that out of nine thousand four hundred beneficed clergymen then in the nation, only fourteen bishops, twelve archdeacons, fifteen heads of colleges, fifty canons, and about eighty parochial priests, chose to quit their preferments rather than take the oath of supremacy and change their religion: and the places of these being filled up with protestants, England became entirely reformed in a short space, after having seen the advocates for reformation mercilessly delivered up to the flames. But the severity shewn to the popish clergy, whether legal or illegal we shall not take upon us to determine, was far from partaking of the cruelty practised under the late reign: some of them had liberty to retire to their own houses; some were admitted to an easy and social restraint in the houses of their friends, or of protestant bishops; and some were suffered to go abroad. It was, however, thought proper to commit Bonner to the Marshalsea, where he died under confinement, which, with his deprivation, was the only evil he experienced of the many which his cruelty had inflicted upon others. As to the vacant sees, Parker, after great reluctance on his part, was made archbishop of Canterbury; Jewell was made bishop of Salisbury: Barlow, Scory, and Coverdale, bishops under Edward, had sees given them; and the other bishoprics were filled up with men of piety and learning for the times. Soon after, May, dean of St. Paul's was nominated to the archbishopric of York; but he dying before confirmation, Young was translated to that see from St. David's. It is now time to return to political affairs.

While the queen and the parliament were employed in settling the public religion, the negociations for peace were still carried on on the continent, first at Cercamp, and afterwards at Chateau Cambresis. Philip employed his utmost efforts to procure the restitution of Calais; and so long as he entertained hopes of espousing Elizabeth, delayed concluding a peace with the French monarch: nay, even after he found all his expectations frustrated, by the alterations she had made in religion, he seemed willing to continue the war till she obtained satisfaction, on condition she would promise to adhere to the Spanish alliance, and continue hostilities against France for the space of six years: but when Elizabeth had consulted with her ministers, and had taken into consideration the low state of her finances, the great debts contracted by her father, brother, and sister; the disorders introduced into every part of the administration, and the divisions which agitated her subjects, she plainly saw that a state of public tranquility was the only means of putting her kingdom into a respectable condition, and prudently rejected the proposal, and quickened in her advances towards France, whose monarch, Henry II. was so apprehensive of Elizabeth having any connections with Spain, that he had sent Cavalcante, a Florentine, with a letter full of regard for the queen, and expressing his desire of accommodating matters between the two crowns.

At last the English plenipotentiaries having received letters from Elizabeth and her council, empowering them to conclude a peace on any reasonable terms, on the second of April this year, a treaty was concluded between Elizabeth and Henry on the following conditions.

"That

"That France ſhould retain Calais, and the other places in Picardy conquered from the Engliſh, only eight years; and after that to reſtore them to the queen of England.

"That, within the ſpace of ſix months, ſeven foreign merchants, not ſubjects of the French king, ſhould engage for the payment of five hundred thouſand crowns of gold to Elizabeth, as a penal fine in caſe the reſtitution of the places, within the time limited, was either refuſed or delayed by Henry or his ſucceſſors.

And, "That, notwithſtanding whether the ſaid ſum was paid or not paid, the king of France, and his ſucceſſors, ſhould remain under the obligation to reſtore Calais, and the other places, as they engaged in this treaty.

Moreover, "That the king of France ſhould deliver to the queen, as hoſtages, till the promiſed ſecurity was given, Ferry de Foix, count of Caudale and captal of Buche; Lewis de St. Maure, marquis of Neſle and count of Laval; Gaſton de Foix, marquis of Trans Antoine; du Prat, preſident of the parliament of Paris; and the lord Nantouillet."

Another article of this treaty with France ran in this form: "That neither the king of France nor the king and queen of Scotland ſhould attempt any thing againſt one another, directly or indirectly, in prejudice of this treaty. That if the queen of England violated this article, the king of France and the king and queen of Scotland ſhould be freed from their engagements, and their hoſtages and ſecurities be diſcharged. In like manner, if the violation came from the king of France, he ſhould be obliged to reſtore Calais and the other places, as if the eight years were expired: and if he refuſed to make the reſtitution, the ſecurities and hoſtages ſhould ſtill remain bound," &c.

On the ſame day a treaty was ſigned between England and Scotland, which contained the following articles.

"I. That neither of the parties ſhould attack the dominions now poſſeſſed by the other, either in perſon or otherwiſe.

"II. That they ſhould give no aid to attack the dominions of one another, to any perſon, in whatſoever degree of conſanguinity or affinity he might be related to them, or whatever might be his quality.

"III. That they ſhould not receive or maintain rebels, fugitives, malefactors, &c.

"IV. That in three months the fortifications of Eyemouth, and all others erected in Scotland ſince the treaty of 1549, ſhould be razed.

"V. That all other mutual claims and pretenſions ſhould remain entire.

"VI. That in two months commiſſioners ſhould be appointed on both ſides, to ſettle certain articles, concerning which the ambaſſadors of France were not ſufficiently inſtructed."

Francis and Mary ratified the treaty on the eighteenth of April; and on the thirty-firſt of May the commiſſioners of the two kingdoms, at Upſalinton, ſigned a ſecond treaty upon the articles left undecided in the firſt.

By theſe treaties tranquility ſeemed, but indeed only ſeemed, to be eſtabliſhed between England and its neighbours; for Henry II. ſoon pulled off the mask, and ſhewed, by his actions, that he never intended to fulfil his words and agreements. His firſt act was to order the dauphin his ſon, who had married the young queen of Scotland, to aſſume the title of king of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and to quarter the arms of England in their ſeal, and on their plate and furniture, by which the court of France endeavoured to prefer the title of the queen of Scots to the crown of England to that of Elizabeth, whom they took all occaſions to treat as illegitimate. Elizabeth complained loudly of this ill treatment by her ambaſſador (Throgmorton) at Paris, but was always ſhuffled off with evaſive excuſes; and therefore ſhe from this time conſidered Mary as her moſt dangerous rival, and the Guiſes, princes of Lorrain, her uncles, the authors of this uſurpation, as her moſt mortal enemies; the truth of which was ſoon confirmed.

At the ſame time that the peace between France and England was concluded at Chateau Cambreſis, a treaty of pacification had alſo been ſigned between the courts of France and Spain; to ſtrengthen which, it was agreed that the French king ſhould give his eldeſt daughter in marriage to the king of Spain; and that Philibert, duke of Savoy, ſhould marry the French king's ſiſter. Theſe marriages were accordingly ſolemnized about Midſummer this year, when Henry II. was accidentally killed by a wound he received in his eye by the ſplinter of a lance, at a tournament held in honour of the nuptials. His ſon and ſucceſſor, Francis II. being a prince void of genius and experience, was an abſolute tool in the hands of the houſe of Guiſe, who hurried him into meaſures which correſponded with their ambition and vanity. Thinking that the acceſſion of England to France, in right of their niece, would aggrandize them in the eyes of the French, they had perſuaded Henry II. under various pretences, foreign to their point in view, to keep up an army in Scotland, as the only avenue by which the Engliſh dominions were acceſſible; and this army they now conſiderably augmented, having gotten the government of France into their own hands, under the name of their nephew the young king Francis, who was incapable of managing public affairs. But as their projects were founded upon the ſituation of affairs in Scotland at that juncture, it is neceſſary to give a brief recital of the ſtate of matters in that kingdom.

During the queen-regent's competition with the earl of Arran, now duke of Chatelerault, for the regency, ſhe had favoured the proteſtants of Scotland, and exaſperated the catholic party, who, under the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, oppoſed her with the greateſt animoſity; but having carried her point, ſhe changed ſides, regained the eſteem of the catholics, and openly approved the decrees of the convocation which condemned all the principles of the reformers; and, inſtigated by her brothers, the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal of Lorrain, ſhe determined to ſuppreſs proteſtantiſm in Scotland, in which work ſhe was encouraged to perſevere by the aſſurance her brother gave her of a conſiderable reinforcement to the French army already in Scotland.

The principal nobility and others of the reformed religion in that kingdom being adviſed of the preparations of the French, and that the pope, the emperor Ferdinand, and the king of Spain had entered into a combination to reduce again the moſt part of Europe to the popiſh faith, and to purſue all oppoſers and diſſenters with fire and ſword; and to begin with Scotland, as being convenient for their maſter-ſtroke meditated upon England, they reſolved to divert the ſtorm which threatened them; and being convinced that their ſecurity depended on their unanimity, and the vigour of their reſolutions, they endeavoured to cement their union by entering into a ſtricter bond of mutual defence. The duke of Chatelerault, and his eldeſt ſon, the earl of Arran, acceded to this aſſociation, and inſpired the confederates with reſolution, at the ſame time that they added reputation to their cauſe.

The earl of Arran had reſided in France, where he commanded the Scottiſh guards; but having embraced the proteſtant religion, was marked out by the princes of Lorrain as a victim, to intimidate the reſt of that perſuaſion, and to prevent the growth of their principles: but the cardinal of Lorrain having let fall ſome expreſſions which diſcovered his intentions, the earl avoided the intended blow by a ſudden flight, and, after infinite labour and danger, getting to Geneva, he from thence came over to England, about the end of July this year. Elizabeth gave this young nobleman a moſt cordial reception; and, during his ſtay here, which was very ſhort, failed not to inflame his reſentment againſt the court of France: ſo that when the earl returned to Scotland, he communicated his ſentiments to his father, and induced him to join the lords of the congregation, as the heads of the reformed party were called.

About the ſame time one Knox, a famous preacher, who had been perſecuted for his religion, and obliged to fly to Geneva, having lately returned home, by his preaching ſoon worked up the Scottiſh reformed to ſuch frenzy, that they took up arms, and for ſome time carried every thing before them, under their two chief leaders, the earl of Argyll, and James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, a natural ſon of James V. by a daughter of the lord Erskine. This nobleman being deſigned for the church, had the priory of St. Andrew's conferred upon him; but being diſguſted with the inactivity of a monaſtic life, he left the cloiſter, and appeared at the head of the reformed, who had already ſent ſeveral reſpectful meſſages to the queen-regent, for evacuating the nation of French ſoldiers, but without any other effect than her threatening that ſhe would denounce them rebels, if they did not inſtantly lay down their arms.

This produced a numerous meeting of the lords of the congregation, on the twenty-firſt of October, at Edinburgh, when they immediately aſſembled a parliament, conſiſting of the peers, barons, and repreſentatives of the boroughs, before whom they repreſented their grievances; and an act was paſſed, whereby the authority of the queen-regent was declared to be ſuſpended. But now the lords finding themſelves under the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of money, and dreading to be cruſhed by the more powerful army of the French and the queen-regent, they had recourſe to Elizabeth, with whom ſome of the party had already entered into a ſecret correſpondence.

Elizabeth, willing to counterbalance the French intereſt in Scotland, and to prevent that kingdom being united to France, by iſſue which Mary, queen of Scotland, might have by her huſband Francis II. received their propoſal with great ſhew of friendſhip, and diſpatched Randolph into Scotland, with aſſurances of ſupport, and to animate the leaders of the congregation in their deſign.

Mean while the French army in Scotland had been reinforced with a thouſand men, under the command of Martigues, and a more conſiderable ſupply was expected under the marquis of Elbeuf. Elizabeth therefore, who conſidered her own intereſt as intimately connected with that of the Scottiſh proteſtants, reſolved to exert her utmoſt efforts in order to ſupport their declining affairs. With this view ſhe fitted out a fleet, conſiſting of thirteen ſhips of war, and beſtowing the command of it on vice-admiral William Winter, ſhe ſent it into the Firth of Forth, in the beginning of January, 1560; at the ſame time ſhe appointed the young duke of Norfolk her lieutenant in the northern counties, and ordered an army of eight thouſand men to rendezvouſe at Berwick, on the thirtieth of January, under the conduct of the lord Grey of Wilton, warden of the Eaſt and Middle Marches.

The appearance of Winter with his ſhips in the Forth gave a new face to the affairs of the congregation. The French army, terrified at the loſs of ſome of their ſhips, which the Engliſh admiral had burned in his paſſage up the river, retired to Leith, to wait the expected reinforcements, with which they were immediately to invade England; but the troubles of France, which began at this time to demand all the power and attention of that miniſtry, obliged them to lay aſide all thoughts of this expedition: nay, the French court, dreading the conſequence of Elizabeth's interfering in the affairs of Scotland, and thereby cutting them out work at ſuch a diſtance from home, endeavoured to divert her from her purpoſe by offering to reſtore Calais, and all its dependencies, provided ſhe would draw her forces out of Scotland; but ſhe nobly rejected the offer, telling the ambaſſador, that ſhe did not value a paltry fiſhing-town ſo much as the peace and quiet of her own kingdom; and diſpatched the lord Montagu to inform Philip of Spain of the reaſons of her refuſal, which, ſhe ſaid, was from the certain knowlege ſhe had that the Guiſes had projected an union of France with Scotland, and concerted the murder of the earl of Arran, who, failing Mary's iſſue, would be the next heir to the Scottiſh crown.

By this time, the duke of Norfolk being joined by commiſſioners from the congregation, at Berwick, all the operations for the enſuing campaign were digeſted, and a formal treaty between queen Elizabeth and them was ſigned. As this treaty was attended with great conſequences, we ſhall inſert the whole of it from the records.

"At Berwick, the twenty-ſeventh day of February, the year of our Lord God 1559, it is agreed, contracted, and finally appointed, between the noble mighty prince Thomas, duke of Norfolk, earl-marſhal of England, lieutenant for the queen's moſt excellent majeſty of England in the North, on the name and behalf of her highneſs, of the one party; and the right honourable lord James Stuart, Patrick lord Ruthven, ſir John Maxwell, of Terreglos, knight, William Maitland, of Lethington, younger, John Wiſhart, of Pettarhow, and Mr. Henry Balnaves, of Halhill, in the name and behalf of the moſt mighty prince James, duke of Chatelerault, ſecond perſon of the realm of Scotland, and the remnant of the reſt of the lords of his party, joined with him in this cauſe, for maintenance tenance and defence of the ancient rights and liberties of their country, on the other party, in form as hereafter followeth, that is to say: That the queen's majesty having sufficiently understood, as well by information sent from the nobility of Scotland, as by the manifest proceedings of the French, that they intend to conquer the realm of Scotland, suppress the liberties thereof, and unite the same unto the crown of France perpetually, contrary to the laws of the said realm, and to the pactions, oaths, and promises of France; and being thereto most humbly and earnestly required by the said nobility, for and in the name of the whole realm, shall accept the said realm of Scotland, and the said duke of Chatelerault, being declared by act of parliament to be heir apparent to the crown thereof, and the nobility and subjects of the same, in her majesty's protection and maintenance, only for preservation of them in their old freedoms and liberties and from conquest, during the time the marriage shall continue between the queen of Scots and the French king, and one year after; and for expelling out of the same realm all such as presently goeth about to practise the said conquest."

Elizabeth having thus taken every precaution which could insure success, and received from the Scots hostages for the performance of the articles, she commanded her fleet and army to begin their operations, and the confederates assembling from all parts, to the number of six thousand foot and two thousand horse, were joined by the English forces, under the lord Grey of Wilton, at Haddington, in the month of April, and marched together to Leith, publishing as they went a manifesto, in which Elizabeth complained of "the injury done her by the king and queen of France in assuming her titles and arms, and in plain terms charged the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorrain with being authors of the troubles in Scotland, in order to effect more easily their designs against England."

The combined army having now formed the siege of Leith, the queen-regent retired from the French army into the castle of Edinburgh, commanded by John Erskine, who had express orders from the states not to deliver it up without their direction. The siege of Leith was carried on for some time with various success; but as the place was defended by the whole French army, the English found great difficulty in their operations; and, after several unsuccessful storms, were ready to relinquish their enterprize, when, in the beginning of May, they were strengthened by a powerful reinforcement under the duke of Norfolk, which accession of force on the part of the English, and the conspiracy of Amboise in the heart of France, inspired the princes of Lorrain with more pacific sentiments, and it was resolved to recall their forces out of Scotland.

Accordingly Francis II. sent Monluc, bishop of Valence, and the count de Randan, into Scotland, with full powers to conclude a peace. Their proposals being transmitted to Elizabeth, she appointed secretary Cecil and Dr. Wootton her plenipotentiaries to treat with the French commissioners, at Newcastle. The death of the queen-regent, which happened at the castle of Edinburgh, on the eighth of June, not a little facilitated the negociations. The conferences were now transferred to Edinburgh, a truce being agreed to in the mean time; and in the beginning of July the peace was finally concluded. Most historians confound in this treaty two things, which however ought to be distinguished, namely, the concessions of Francis and Mary to their Scottish subjects, and the treaty between France and England. As of these two treaties one was observed, the other not, it is necessary to have a distinct idea of them. We find from Buchanan and Keith, that the concessions made to the Scots were as follow:

"I. That the French forces should leave Scotland in twenty-four days, and return to France in ships to be furnished by Elizabeth.

"II. That the town of Leith should be restored to Scotland, and the fortifications demolished.

"III. That the works made by the French at Dunbar, should be razed.

"IV. That the king and queen of France and Scotland should grant an act of oblivion to the confederates for every thing done from the tenth of March, 1559, to the first of August, 1560; and that this act should be approved and confirmed by the states of Scotland, to be assembled in the following August, with the consent of the king and queen.

"That the French should have liberty to leave sixty men in the isle of Leith."

But with regard to the interests of Elizabeth, a real treaty was concluded between her and the crown of France, which will be often mentioned hereafter by the name of the Treaty of Edinburgh, and, according to our public records, contained the following articles.

"I. That for the future, the king and queen of Scotland should not assume the title of king and queen of England or Ireland; nor bear the arms of those kingdoms.

"II. That the patents and other acts, which had been dispatched with that title, should be altered, or remain of no force.

"III. That the farther satisfaction required by the queen of England, for the injury done her, should be referred to a conference at London, between the commissioners of the two crowns.

"IV. That if the commissioners could not agree, the decision should be left to the king of Spain.

"V. That the king and queen of France and Scotland should perform the promises made to the Scots at Edinburgh by the plenipotentiaries of France."

In perusing the last of the articles granted to the confederate Scots, the reader may be at a loss to conceive what service it would be to Francis and Mary, to have only sixty men of their French subjects left in Scotland: Buchanan gives this reason; that the queen of Scots might not seem to be thrown out of the entire possession of Scotland.

After the conclusion of the above treaty the French and English withdrew out of Scotland, the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar were demolished, and the amnesty was confirmed by the Scottish parliament, which enacted several laws in favour of the Reformation. As for Francis and Mary, though they confirmed those laws, they flatly refused to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, on pretence that Elizabeth had treated with their rebellious subjects as if they had composed an independent state; but the real intention of the princes of Lorrain was to deprive Elizabeth of the English crown, and place it on the head of their young niece. This was a ſcheme, however, which, happily for England, they were never able to effect: for the troubles they brought upon themſelves, by their perſecutions againſt the Hugonots (a name given to the proteſtants) in France, the murder of twelve hundred for a pretended conſpiracy at Amboiſe, the ſeizing and unjuſt condemnation of the prince of Condé, which ſo deſperately exaſperated the French nation, and the death of Francis II. on the twenty-fifth of September this year, defended Elizabeth from all their machinations from that quarter.

It will not be impertinent to the purpoſe in hand, to take a ſhort view of Elizabeth's ſituation in regard to her own ſubjects and to foreign princes. It may truly be ſaid, that ſhe had ſcarcely any foreign ally, to whom ſhe could truſt, and had every thing to fear from the moſt powerful of her neighbours; and though ſhe could not be apprehenſive of an invaſion from Scotland, or a new war with that kingdom, yet ſhe, in caſe of an invaſion by any other enemy, could not expect any ſort of aſſiſtance from them; on the contrary, ſhe ſaw herſelf under an indiſpenſible neceſſity to ſupport the proteſtant party there, well knowing Scotland to be the inlet into her country from France, whenever the domeſtic troubles of that kingdom could be ſurmounted. Elizabeth had alſo great reaſon to doubt of the fidelity and loyalty of the Iriſh, many of whoſe nobles held themſelves, and acted on many occaſions, as independent of England; and the whole nation, being extremely attached to the popiſh ſuperſtition, which worſhop beſt ſuited their extreme ignorance, were ready to revolt and inliſt under the banner of the firſt invader in the pope's name, on account of the innovations which they thought Elizabeth was about to introduce into their favourite religion.

Pope Paul IV. dying in the laſt month of the preceding year, was ſucceeded by cardinal Angelo de Medici, a Milaneſe, who aſſumed the name of Pius IV. The family of Lorrain eargerly laid hold of this opportunity to ſolicit the new pontiff to enter heartily into the ſchemes of his predeceſſor, and compel the heretics by force to re-enter the pale of the church, pointing out to him England as the moſt proper place to begin with, as its queen was become the nurſing mother of the enemies of the papal ſee and authority. But Pius being reſolved to try all means rather than extremities to reclaim England to his obedience, ſent, in the ſummer of this year, Vincenzo Parpaglia, abbot of St. Sauveur, with certain inſtructions, and a letter to the queen, exhorting her to return to his communion, and promiſing to continue the general council of Trent, which had, under many interruptions, been ſitting ſeveral years; and with an offer, in his holineſs's name, to repeal the ſentence of divorce of Henry VIII. from Anne Boleyn; as alſo to confirm the Engliſh Liturgy, and to permit the Engliſh to communicate in both kinds: the nuncio was alſo ordered to invite the queen to ſend ſome Engliſh biſhops to the council of Trent. But Elizabeth, not to be moved by all theſe artifices, returned for anſwer, that though ſhe heartily deſired a general council, yet ſhe would never honour a popiſh one with an ambaſſador repreſenting her perſon; and that ſhe deſired no connections with the biſhop of Rome, who ſhe ſaid had no more power than other biſhops.

As for Philip II. king of Spain, her ambaſſador brought ſuch a report of his behaviour, that ſhe could expect no other than an enemy in him: he even returned with contempt the collar of the order of the Garter, which had been ſent him by Elizabeth. It was only at home then, in England, that the queen could hope for help or ſafety, in the affections of her ſubjects, by whom ſhe was beloved to a degree of adoration, for the noble ſpirit which ſhe had ſhewn in defence of their freedom and independence, and the reſolution with which ſhe had baffled the united attempts of France, Spain, and the court of Rome.

Elizabeth was now in the very bloom of life, being twenty-five years of age, and her alliance by marriage had been coveted by moſt of the chief princes of Europe. The duke of Finland, brother to Eric, king of Sweden, had for ſome time reſided in London, and courted her for his brother. The duke of Holſtein, nephew to the king of Denmark, was likewiſe in England, and addreſſed her in behalf of his uncle. The German proteſtants earneſtly preſſed her to marry Charles, archduke of Auſtria, ſecond ſon to the late emperor, and a known favourer of proteſtantiſm; and the Scottiſh parliament had preferred a ſolemn addreſs to her, for leave to ſend commiſſioners to treat concerning a marriage between her and the earl of Arran, ſon to the duke of Chatelerault, and preſumptive heir to the crown, which would afford a probable proſpect of uniting the two kingdoms: but Elizabeth, for reaſons of her own, had declined all theſe offers.

Several of her own ſubjects were not with hopes of obtaining her in marriage: of all theſe, the lord Robert Dudley ſeemed to bid faireſt for ſucceſs. He was fifth ſon of the late duke of Northumberland, whom he reſembled in the gracefulneſs of his perſon, and in the ambition of his heart. Taking part with his father in raiſing the lady Jane Grey to the throne, he was involved in her misfortune, taken priſoner, committed to the Tower, and condemned to die the death of a traitor; but was pardoned at the interceſſion of the courtiers, and afterwards queen Mary reſtored him in blood, received him into favour, and made him maſter of the Engliſh ordnance at the ſiege of St. Quintin. What endeared him ſo much to Elizabeth is not very clear; but, as ſoon as ſhe aſcended the Engliſh throne, ſhe gave him the earlieſt marks of her favour, by making him maſter of the horſe, and dignifying him with the order of the Garter: and, indeed, truth obliges us to confeſs that Elizabeth was rather too much above the delicacies of virgin-conduct with regard to Dudley; and that the public, both at home and abroad, knew of no other way to reconcile it to virtue, or indeed to prudence, but by ſuppoſing ſhe would marry him: but then, on ſome occaſions, ſhe would expreſs herſelf ſo far as to ſignify, that ſhe could never reſolve to give her hand to a ſubject, after having refuſed the firſt princes of Europe who ſought her in marriage.

The perſon who, next to Dudley, was thought to ſtand faireſt in Elizabeth's eſteem, was ſir William Pickering. He was a gentleman of private fortune, but of great reputation for wiſdom, hoſpitality, and every quality that could entitle him to the higheſt diſtinction. He declined all public employments, and ſeldom came to court; and his great intereſt in the nation lay amongſt thoſe who wiſhed wiſhed well to the Reformation eſtabliſhed by Edward VI.

Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, was another ſuitor to the queen. He was a nobleman of high birth, and had always behaved with vaſt ſpirit, but had gone too far into the violent meaſures of the late reign, but ſtill he flattered himſelf with the agreeable hopes of procuring his ſovereign in marriage. The cloſeneſs of Elizabeth, whenever applied to on any ſubject of this nature, and the different conjectures which the public formed concerning their ſovereign's marriage, either at home or abroad, was of the utmoſt ſervice to her affairs; all parties were obſequious to her command, and ready to execute her orders. She improved this their diſpoſition to the advantage of her favourite ſcheme of ſettling the Reformation on a firm baſis in England, and thereby freeing herſelf and people for ever from that ſtate of ſlaviſh dependence in which they had formerly been held by the Roman pontiffs.

The queen, by her letters patent, had already recommended to the eccleſiaſtical bodies of the kingdom, king Edward's Book of Common Prayer: the eccleſiaſtical livings all over England were filled with men who hated popery; and a form of belief was publiſhed by the biſhops to juſtify the Reformation: the parliament which was now ſitting in Scotland, in like manner proceeded by Elizabeth's advice, and under her protection, to extirpate popery. Weſtminſter abbey was, from a monaſtery, converted into a collegiate church: the queen received a public addreſs from the biſhops againſt the uſe of images: and Elizabeth, to ſhew how ſteadily ſhe meant to proceed, ordered the numerous tribes of proteſtant ſectaries, who, under pretext of ſeeking protection on account of religion, were now ſwarming all over the kingdom, to leave the realm. At the ſame time, in order to bring her civil and eccleſiaſtical government as near as poſſible to an equality, the queen ſet about reforming the coin, which had been greatly debaſed in the late reign. In a word, Elizabeth applied herſelf with the utmoſt aſſiduity to all affairs of government, in conjunction with thoſe two excellent ſtateſmen, and her great favourites, ſecretary Cecil and ſir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great-ſeal, being reſolved to leave nothing undone to render her ſubjects as happy as poſſible; well knowing her chief aſſiſtance muſt flow from them in caſe of an invaſion, which ſhe had reaſon to expect. And thus ſtood matters in church and ſtate in this kingdom at the end of the year 1560.

On the fifteenth of January, 1561, the queen-mother of France, the famous Catherine de Medici, was appointed regent during the minority of her ſon Charles IX. who, at the age only of ten years, ſucceeded to his brother Francis II. who was not eighteen when he died. The king of Navarre, the firſt prince of the blood, was conſtituted lieutenant-general of the kingdom; the ſentence which had paſſed againſt the prince of Condé, was reverſed; the conſtable de Montmorency, another chief of the Hugonots, who had been baniſhed, was recalled to court; and the princes of Lorraine, though they ſtill poſſeſſed the higheſt poſts and offices, now found their authority greatly diminiſhed.

Elizabeth was overjoyed to hear that her declared enemies had been ſo ſeverely humbled; and ſhe was reſolved to avail herſelf of the preſent conjuncture to compel the Scottiſh queen to renounce her pretenſions to the Engliſh crown: ſhe accordingly ſent orders to Throgmorton, her ambaſſador in France, a very faithful and able miniſter, to make application to Mary for that purpoſe, and to demand her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh; for though, by the advice of her uncles, the princes of Lorraine, Mary had, immediately upon the death of her huſband Francis II. laid aſide the arms and title of England, yet Elizabeth was not to be ſatisfied with a bare relinquiſhing of them, but inſiſted upon a formal renunciation of her titles and arms, and an acknowlegement that ſhe never had any right to aſſume them; that in caſe Mary, who was very young, ſhould marry a powerful prince, he might have no pretence to renew the claim. Mary, however, was upon her guard: ſhe ſaw ſufficiently into the ſpirit of this demand; ſhe declined giving any direct anſwer to the Engliſh ambaſſador, before ſhe had conſulted her friends in France and Scotland: and Throgmorton renewing his inſtances ſhe told him, that ſhe was reſolved to entruſt the whole management of her concerns with the lord James (ſo the prior of St. Andrew's was commonly called); but that nobleman was too deeply engaged with queen Elizabeth, for Mary to continue long in that mind. Both ſhe and her uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, believed him to have no other principle but intereſt; while he thought that they had no other view but revenge. They tempted him with all they thought could bribe his ambition to break his own connections, and that of his party, with Elizabeth; but he continued conſiſtent, notwithſtanding all their efforts. It was this ſteadineſs that firſt rivetted him in the eſteem of Elizabeth, and was the foundation of his future fortune. In the mean time Elizabeth, deſirous of keeping her footing in Scotland, and ſtill apprehenſive of an invaſion there, ſent Randolph, one of her truſty agents, about the middle of March, to Scotland, whoſe ſtates, or parliament, was then ſitting; and gave him in charge to engage the Scots, if poſſible, to enter into a proteſtant league, in the ſame manner as the proteſtants in Germany had done, for the defence of religion. Mary, who was informed by her friends in Scotland of all theſe practices, could not fail of being highly incenſed at this ungenerous behaviour of Elizabeth, and hinted to Throgmorton, that ſhe was not ignorant of his miſtreſs's dealings with her rebellious ſubjects; and that, for her own part, ſhe was reſolved not to receive any laws from them.

In the mean time, a miſunderſtanding having ariſen between the queen-dowager of France and the Scottiſh princeſs, this latter, unable to brook the ſlights and indignities to which ſhe found herſelf expoſed, in conſequence of this rupture, reſolved to liſten to the invitation of the ſtates of Scotland, who had ſent the lord James over to requeſt her return to her native country and her faithful ſubjects. Accordingly ſhe ſent d'Oyſell over to England, about Midſummer this year, to demand from Elizabeth a ſafe conduct for herſelf and the ſhips that were to attend her. Elizabeth who had been extremely nettled by Mary's refuſing to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, returned for anſwer, that "ſhe hoped the queen of Scots would firſt ratify that treaty; after which ſhe ſhould not only have a ſafe-conduct, but alſo, without being expoſed to the fatigues and dangers of the ſea, might paſs through England, where ſhe ſhould be received with all the marks of affection ſhe could expect from a ſiſter."

Upon d'Oyſell's return to France with this anſwer from Elizabeth, Mary could not contain her reſentment: ſhe ſent for Throgmorton, and asked him, what offence ſhe had given his miſtreſs, that ſhe ſhould act thus towards her? She ſaid, that ſhe was very ſorry ſhe had ſubjected herſelf to the mortification of being publicly refuſed a favour, which ſhe had no need to ask, being her equal in degree: that Elizabeth, by ſuch a proceeding, ſubjected her own character to ſevere cenſure; "for (added ſhe) it will be thought very ſtrange by all princes and countries, that your miſtreſs ſhould firſt animate my ſubjects againſt me, and now, being a widow, impede my going into my own country: I ask nothing of her but friendſhip; I do not trouble her ſtate, or practiſe with her ſubjects; and yet (continued this ſpirited princeſs) I know there be in her realm that be inclined enough to hear offers: I know alſo they be not of the mind ſhe is of, neither in religion or other things." In fine, ſhe concluded by telling Throgmorton, that as ſhe came into France in ſpite of Edward*, ſhe could return into Scotland notwithſtanding Elizabeth's oppoſition†.

Accordingly ſhe did not delay her departure from France an inſtant on account of Elizabeth's refuſal of a ſafe-conduct; and being attended by all her uncles, and ſeveral noblemen of the firſt rank in France, to Calais, ſhe ſet ſail from thence in the beginning of Auguſt; and on the eighteenth of that month arrived ſafe at Leith, in her native kingdom, after having been abſent thirteen years. She was received by her ſubjects with every poſſible mark of eſteem and regard. It is ſaid that Elizabeth gave orders to intercept Mary in her paſſage from France to Scotland; but no evidence has been brought to ſupport ſuch an aſſertion: queen Elizabeth had always a fleet at ſea, for the guard of the Engliſh coaſt and the ſecurity of commerce; but we cannot find that ſhe had any deſign, or gave any orders, for intercepting her rival; and ſhe expreſly diſavowed the having made any attempt for that purpoſe.

Mary, in purſuance of the plan which ſhe had concerted in France, entruſted the whole management of public affairs to proteſtants: her council was compoſed of the moſt eminent perſons of that party, and not a ſingle papiſt was admitted into any office of truſt or confidence. She alſo acquieſced in the regulations made by the ſtates in favour of the Reformation. The prior of St. Andrew's, and Maitland, of Ledington, ſeemed to poſſeſs the firſt place in the queen's favour, and enjoyed all the credit and reputation of favourite miniſters. This choice was univerſally acceptable to the people, who now ſeemed to vie with each other in their expreſſions of zeal and loyalty. Theſe happy omens, notwithſtanding the unfavourable aſpect of affairs juſt before Mary's arrival in Scotland, ſeemed to foretel a very different iſſue of her reign; and though ſome ſudden guſts of faction and popular diſcontents might have been expected from the diverſity in religious opinions, yet there was no appearance of the deſtructive violence of that ſtorm which ſoon after burſt on the kingdom of Scotland.

Soon after the arrival of Mary in her kingdom, ſhe diſpatched Maitland of Lethinton, her ſecretary, to London, to pay her reſpects to Elizabeth, and to ſignify her deſire of cultivating a friendſhip and good correſpondence with that princeſs: the ſecretary was alſo charged with letters from the Scottiſh nobility, recommending ſuch an union as their earneſt requeſt, "ſince ſay they, in caſe of a miſunderſtanding we are obliged to ſerve our ſovereign." But Maitland was charged likewiſe with a farther commiſſion, which could not be well received: this was, "to move, as the beſt and moſt certain method for maintaining peace and amity between the two queens and their realms, that Elizabeth ſhould declare Mary her heir and ſucceſſor in the kingdom of England, in caſe ſhe ſhould die without iſſue; and this to be done by act of parliament."

No requeſt could be more unreaſonable, or made at a more improper juncture. Elizabeth was extremely nettled at it: ſhe anſwered the ambaſſador with great warmth, "That ſhe would not ſuffer the queen of Scotland to rob her of the crown during her life; neither did ſhe intend to do any thing that might tend to prejudice that queen after her death; nevertheleſs ſhe was determined not to run the hazard of ſeeing her ſubjects adore the riſing ſun: that to deſign a ſucceſſor was to expoſe her own life to danger; to deſtroy the ſecurity of her government, to ſet a winding-ſheet continually before her eyes, and to bury herſelf alive." After this ſhe put Maitland in mind of his miſtreſs's refuſing to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh: "ſhe deſired nothing of Mary but what was in her power as queen of Scotland; what her own nobility had known and approved; and what was abſolutely neceſſary for the continuance of their amity."

There had paſſed nothing but acts of unkindneſs, reſentment, and animoſity between the two queens whilſt Mary was in France; and the making of the demand above-mentioned the moment of her return to Scotland, before any ſtep taken for a reconciliation, for removing ſuſpicions, or creating a friendſhip, could not but inflame the jealouſy which Elizabeth had already entertained of Mary's deſigns againſt her crown and dignity. It did not however hinder Elizabeth from ſending ſir Peter Meutas with compliments to Mary on her ſafe return to her kingdom, and to inſiſt on her ratification of the treaty: but Mary ſtill eluded the demand, pretending that ſhe could not conveniently do it till the affairs of Scotland were more firmly ſettled. At the ſame time ſhe propoſed to Meutas, in ſome conferences ſhe had with him, to have the treaty of Edinburgh reviewed by commiſſioners, and to have the article obliging her to abſtain from uſing the arms and title of England "in all times to come," retouched in ſuch a manner, as to guard againſt its being interpreted to the prejudice of her ſucceſſion: and, after repeating her demand to have the ſucceſſion ſettled, and diſmiſſing Meutas without the ratification, ſhe wrote a long letter to Elizabeth, in which ſhe propoſed the reviewing and remodelling the treaty; offered to engage herſelf to guarantee the ſucceſſion to the crown of England to the perſon of Elizabeth, and the lawful iſſue of her body: and laſtly, ſhe offered a meeting to Elizabeth, in order to compoſe all differences the more readily. In this ſituation were matters between England and Scotland at the cloſe of the year 1561;

but the obſtinate refuſal of the queen of Scots (whether the effect of her uncle's advice or her own ambition) to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, giving Elizabeth juſt reaſon to ſuſpect that a deſign was formed to dethrone her whenever an opportunity offered; and this latter rejecting with contempt the demand of ſettling the ſucceſſion, rivetted that jealouſy and animoſity between the two princeſſes, which at laſt proved ſo fatal to Mary.

We muſt not forget to mention, that about the end of the year Mary gave the lord James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's the title of earl of Murray; and created John Erſkine earl of Marr.

Elizabeth all this while was indefatigably applying herſelf to the affairs of government. Her firſt care was to put the navy in a better condition than it had ever been known in the time of her anceſtors; ſhe augmented the pay of her ſailors; ſhe ſtored her magazines with arms; ſhe introduced the manufacture of gunpowder into England; ſhe ordered a great number of iron and braſs pieces of Engliſh metal* to be caſt; ſhe reinforced the garriſon of Berwick; ſhe fortified the borders towards Scotland; ſhe introduced and encouraged great improvements in agriculture, and ordered her people to attend the exerciſe of arms at ſtated times.

Her late refuſal to have any communication on any terms with the ſee of Rome, had exaſperated the papiſts to the utmoſt; and there is extant a minute under Cecil's hand †, of certain cautions ſhe was to take with regard to her own perſon, as alſo for her apparel and diet; by which it ſhould ſeem that ſhe was apprehenſive of being taken off either by aſſaſſination or poiſon: and we find that ſome ſeverities about this time were ſhewn to the papiſts, ſeveral of their biſhops and clergy being deprived of their liberty. Sir Edward Wagrave, who was a leading man in the late reign, and his lady, were committed to the Tower, as was the lord Haſtings, another of Mary's chief favourits, for no other crime (that appears) than being preſent at the maſs, and having prieſts in their houſes.

Though this ſeverity was, perhaps, neceſſary, yet Elizabeth is not ſo defenſible in her conduct to the lady Catherine Grey, the younger ſiſter to the lady Jane Grey, who loſt her head in the late reign: this lady had the ſame right to royalty as her ſiſter had; and Elizabeth was ſo extremely tenacious of her power and authority, that ſhe could not forbear looking on her with a jealous eye: ſhe knew not what party might be formed in favour of the lady Catherine, upon the plan of Edward's will; and ſhe foreſaw what a handle the Scots might make, by ſetting aſide the will of Henry VIII. by which their queen was deprived of the ſucceſſion in the ſame manner as ſhe herſelf, after the example of her ſiſter Mary, ſet aſide the will of Edward VI.

The lady Catherine had been married to the earl of Pembroke's ſon, but had been lawfully divorced; and afterwards ſhe privately married the earl of Hertford, ſon to the regent-duke of Somerſet, a young nobleman of a bold, reſtleſs, aſpiring diſpoſition. The marriage was ſoon diſcovered by the lady's pregnancy, and Elizabeth committed her to the Tower; and her huſband, the earl of Hertford, being ſent for out of France, and, upon examination, owning his marriage, was likewiſe committed to the Tower, where the lady Catherine was ſoon after delivered of a ſon. This event inflamed ſtill farther the indignation of Elizabeth, who appointed a court of delegates, with the archbiſhop of Canterbury at their head, to enquire into the validity of the marriage; and they found their cohabitation to be unlawful. Not content with this, Elizabeth cauſed a fine of fifteen thouſand pounds to be impoſed upon Hertford, and ordered the confinement of both him and his wife to be more rigid and ſevere. They remained in this condition for the ſpace of nine years, till at laſt the lady Catherine dying, the queen was freed from all apprehenſions, and again reſtored the earl to his liberty.

Elizabeth behaved with more generoſity, in an affair of another and even more dangerous nature. Arthur Pole and his brother, nephews to the late cardinal of that name, and great-grand-children of George, duke of Clarence, brother to king Edward IV. together with one Forteſcue, a gentleman who had married a ſiſter of their's, and ſome other perſons, had formed a deſign of retiring into France, in order to procure ſuccours from the duke of Guiſe; to return thence into Wales; that Arthur Pole ſhould then aſſume the title of duke of Clarence, and as ſuch ſhould treat of a marriage between his brother and Mary, queen of Scotland, whom they were then to proclaim queen of England ‡. This conſpiracy being diſcovered, they were brought to their trials, and owned the fact, but declared at the ſame time, that they never meant to execute theſe projects till the queen's death, which ſome pretenders to judicial aſtrology had aſſured them would certainly happen before the end of the year. They were condemned to death by the jury, but the queen was pleaſed to indulge them with a pardon: the exceſſive rigour therefore ſhewn to Catherine Grey throws a great blemiſh on Elizabeth's character, ſince it is plain that unhappy lady's right to the crown, whether well or ill grounded, was her only offence.

We have nothing farther to add to the tranſactions of this year, than that Elizabeth ſtill farther endeared herſelf to her ſubjects by revoking all warrants granted to the purveyors for victualling the fleet, which were generally executed in a very oppreſſive manner, and ordered the people to be paid in money for whatever proviſions they furniſhed. The impoſitions of the Exchequer were now by her reformed; and the popiſh clergy, to whom penſions had been aſſigned for the loſs of their livings now in the hands of the crown, were punctually paid. The queen alſo increaſed the ſalary of the judges, and firſt allowed them a proviſion for their reſpective circuits. Camden, who has furniſhed us with theſe anecdotes of Elizabeth's government, obſerves, that her œconomy always went hand in hand with her liberality, inſomuch that ſhe gave very little out of her own demeſnes, but on condition it ſhould, on default of male iſſue, revert to the crown. It would have been happy, perhaps, if her ſucceſſors had always obſerved this rule!

It was not without reaſon that Elizabeth was thus ſtudious to gain the love of her ſubjects by the good order ſhe introduced into the kingdom, ſince many endeavours were uſed at this time to corrupt and draw them into rebellion. The catholics began to meet and plot to reſtore their religion by arms. Beſides the deſign of Arthur Pole and his accomplices above related, Elizabeth, in the beginning of the year 1562, found out that the earl of Lenox and his counteſs (daughter to Margaret, queen of Scotland, eldeſt daughter to Henry VII. by the earl of Angus) held a ſecret unlawful correſpondence in Scotland, the plan of which was to aſſert Mary's prior right to the crown of England, and raiſe a party to defend the ſame. This correſpondence being diſcovered, the earl was committed to the cuſtody of the maſter of the Rolls, and the counteſs to the care of ſir Richard Sackville.

Mary, from what reaſons may eaſily be gueſſed, did not ſhew the leaſt reſentment at this uſage of the earl of Lenox, though he was her own ſubject; on the contrary, ſhe affected to ſhew great complaiſance to Elizabeth's reſident, Randolph; and the queen of England was not behind her in thoſe diſſembled marks of a good underſtanding. The propoſal of an interview was again revived, but did not take place this year.

Elizabeth's attention was now called towards the affairs of the continent, particularly thoſe of France, which were now involved in the utmoſt confuſion and diſorder. The duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine, ſtill pregnant with deſign upon England, had endeavoured to gain Anthony de Bourbon, king of Navarre, over to their ſcheme, by promiſing him their niece, Mary of Scotland, in marriage, and, by the aſſiſtance of the pope and Philip of Spain, to put him in poſſeſſion of the throne of England. Elizabeth, coming to the knowlege of this ſcheme, diſpatched ſir Henry Sidney into France, under pretence of complaining of ſome acts of piracy committed by certain French freebooters on the Engliſh merchantmen, but in fact to inform himſelf exactly of the affairs of the French, and of what was contriving againſt her, that ſhe might take her meaſures accordingly.

Catherine de Medici, the queen-mother and regent, ſtill continued to foment the differences between the two factions, and ſeemed to incline to the ſide of the Huguenots, who were the weakeſt. As the Guiſes had artfully perſuaded the catholics to compromiſe their differences with the chiefs of the proteſtant league, ſhe feared to ſee herſelf once more left to their mercy, as ſhe had been in the laſt reign, if the Huguenots were oppreſſed. For this reaſon ſhe ſupported them, and procured them a favourable edict, called the Edict of January, becauſe publiſhed in that month this year: it permitted the proteſtants to have preaching places without the city. But though the intent of this edict was to quiet matters in the kingdom, it proved the ſource of the civil wars which ſoon after deſolated France. The duke of Guiſe, though removed from his poſt of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, ſtill wanted to be its maſter. He was already looked upon by the people as the protector of the catholic religion. As he was going through Vaſſi, a town on the borders of Champagne, he fell in with a body of Huguenots, who in conſequence of the privilege granted them, were ſinging Pſalms, after their manner, in a barn: he gave orders to his ſervants to fall upon theſe poor defenceleſs people, of whom upwards of ſixty were killed by them, and the reſt, being wounded, fled to the woods for ſhelter from the murderous cruelty of their own countrymen. Upon this there was a general riſing of the proteſtants in almoſt every part of the kingdom, and the nation became divided between the duke of Guiſe and the prince of Condé: Catherine de Medici fluctuated between both; nothing was ſeen on all ſides but bloodſhed and pillage. The queen was then at Paris, with the young king her ſon, where finding herſelf deprived of all authority, ſhe wrote to the prince of Condé, to come to her deliverance. The fatal letter was as a mandate for continuing the civil war, which was carried on with the greateſt inhumanity: every town was a fortified poſt, every ſtreet a field of battle. Anthony, king of Navarre, the firſt prince of the blood, a weak and irreſolute man, who knew not of what religion or party he was, jealous of his brother Condé, and obliged againſt his will to ſerve the duke of Guiſe, was dragged to the ſiege of Rouen, together with the queen-mother: he was killed at this ſiege, and deſerves a place in hiſtory on no other account than that of being the father of the great Henry IV.

Philip II. who was uneaſy at the progreſs which the Huguenots made in France, and who apprehended that the contagion might ſpread into the Low Country provinces under his dominion, who had already given ſtrong intimations of their affection to the reformed religion, had engaged in a ſecret alliance with the duke of Guiſe, for the defence of the ancient faith, and the extirpation of hereſy. He now ſent ſix thouſand men with a ſupply of money to ſtrengthen the catholic party. The firſt pitched battle between the catholics and the reformed was fought near Dreux: the battle was remarkable by both generals being made priſoners; de Montmorency, who commanded the king's army, in quality of conſtable of France, and the prince of Condé, who was at the head of the reformed army. The duke of Guiſe, who was ſecond in command to the conſtable, gained the battle, and after his victory went and laid ſiege to Orleans, of which the reformed had poſſeſſed themſelves at their firſt taking up arms.

The Huguenots, unable to reſiſt ſuch a powerful confederacy formed againſt them, ſupported by the royal authority, were obliged to diſpatch the vidame of Chartres and de la Haye, with ſome other agents, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth for preventing the total ruin of the proteſtant cauſe in France. The vidame and his colleagues arrived at London in the latter end of June this year (1562), and, having obtained an audience of the queen, demanded, in the name of the prince of Condé, and the proteſtant league in France, a ſupply of ten thouſand men, and a conſiderable ſum of money; but the politic Elizabeth, though inclined to aſſiſt the prince, would not agree to ſend either, unleſs ſome ſtrong places were delivered to her, for the ſafety of her troops, and to remain in her hands till Calais was reſtored to the crown of England. This demand proved very diſagreeable to the French; but Condé and his party were in too much diſtreſs to reject any terms that ſhould be inſiſted on, and a treaty in his name, and that of queen Elizabeth, was ſigned on the twentieth of September, at Hampton-court, by which the prince engaged "to put Havre de Grace into the queen's hands, to be kept by a garriſon of three thouſand Engliſh, till the reſtitution of Calais." Elizabeth on her part undertook "to ſend three thouſand men to aſſiſt in the defence of Rouen and Dieppe, and to ſupply them with one hundred thouſand crowns, beſides forty thouſand for the garriſons ſhe ſhould put into theſe two laſt places: and both of the contracting powers obliged themſelves not to treat with the adverſe party, but by common conſent*."

Theſe were the principal articles of the treaty, in conſequence whereof Elizabeth immediately ſent over Ambroſe Dudley (one of the ſons of the late duke of Northumberland, whom ſhe had the year before created baron Liſle and earl of Warwick) to France, with ſix thouſand men, part whereof were landed at Dieppe, and the reſt took poſſeſſion of Havre. The queen publiſhed at the ſame time a manifeſto, declaring, "that ſhe did not ſend troops into Normandy with a deſign to recover that province, the ancient patrimony of her anceſtors, and unjuſtly wreſted from them; but to preſerve it for the king of France, during his minority, and to reſcue it from the ambition and tyranny of the princes of Lorraine: that ſhe was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that province falling into their hands, as it was manifeſt their deſign was to ſeize the ports of Normandy, and from thence to invade her dominions, after the extirpation of the reformed in France: that for theſe reaſons ſhe thought herſelf obliged to aſſiſt the young king, hinder his ſubjects from being oppreſſed by the Guiſes, protect the profeſſors of the reformed religion, and provide for her own ſafety."

Immediately upon this manifeſto being publiſhed, and that the Engliſh troops had landed in France, a proclamation was iſſued by the faction of Lorraine in Paris, in which queen Elizabeth being charged "with breach of faith, ſeizing the king's fortreſſes, and aiding his rebels, war was declared againſt her, her dominions, and ſubjects†." This haſty ſtep, which was taken by the advice of the cardinal of Lorraine, and was followed by a ſeizure of all the Engliſh ſhips at Bourdeaux, and the impriſonment of her ambaſſador's courier at Boulogne, ſoon appeared to be impolitic. The Engliſh began to fit out privateers to make repriſals on the French; and at the ſame time the queen required the court of France to declare plainly their reſolution, whether they would have peace or war with England. The court was reſident at Paris at the very time the proclamation abovementioned had been made, but, not being prepared for an open war, thought fit to diſavow any knowlege thereof, hoping thus to elude Elizabeth's demands: but that princeſs, not ſatisfied with a verbal diſclaiming of the proclamation, inſiſted that the king and queen-regent ſhould, either by ſome public act, notify to the world that no proclamation of war had been made againſt England in Paris, with their knowlege, or by their orders; or elſe write her a letter, under the king's hand, to the ſame effect. This being complied with by the court of France, Elizabeth declared herſelf ſatisfied, and hereupon declined following the advice of Throgmorton, that ſhe would take advantage of the proclamation for the recovery of Calais, which he repreſented as an eaſy enterprize. The beſt ſoldiers it ſeems had been drawn out of the place to join the army, inſomuch that there were not left in it two hundred fighting men; and if ſix thouſand men were landed from Havre, in a moonlight night, on the ſands about it, they might eaſily make themſelves maſters of Newenham bridge, and of Calais itſelf before it could be relieved. What were the queen's reaſons, or thoſe of her council, for neglecting ſo favourable an opportunity of recovering this place, we have no authorities to declare from: thus much, however, is certain, that the parliament, which met in January following, offered to grant the ſupplies neceſſary for the recovery of Calais. Such was the ſtate of the French affairs at the end of the year 1562.

In Scotland, the family of the Gordons, of which the earl of Huntley was the chief, being privately countenanced by the houſe of Guiſe, endeavoured to take queen Mary out of the hands of her brother James Stuart, earl of Murray. The proceedings in this affair not having any immediate connection with England's concerns, we ſhall not ſtop to relate them, but only obſerve that the attempt proved fatal to the enterprizers, the earl of Huntley being defeated by the earl of Murray, in a battle fought near Inverneſs, and himſelf, with his eldeſt ſon George, taken priſoner, and conducted to Dunbar, where they were tried, and ſentenced to die; but the ſentence was not executed. While theſe things were tranſacting in that kingdom, James Melvill, author of the Memoirs that bear his name, was employed at Inſpruck (in Germany) to ſound the inclination of the Imperial court concerning the marriage of Mary with the archduke Charles of Auſtria, one of the ſons of the emperor Ferdinand. The firſt overture of this deſign had been made by the cardinal of Lorraine, in his way through Inſpruck to the council of Trent, with the offer of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland for his niece's portion, whom her uncles were ready to diſpoſe of to any powerful prince who would aſſiſt them with his forces in their unremitted plots againſt England, eſpecially as their project had been lately in part ſpoiled by the death of the king of Navarre.

Elizabeth at this time lived in ſo good correſpondence with Mary, that ſhe made her boaſt of it in all the courts of Europe, to prove that all their miſunderſtandings had been owing to the practices of the Guiſes alone; but when this negociation came to her knowlege, ſhe could not bear the thoughts of Mary's matching with any foreign prince, as being extremely jealous of every acceſſion of power to one whom ſhe on all occaſions had diſcovered to be her chief rival to the crown of England: ſhe therefore ordered Randolph, her ambaſſador at the Scottiſh court, to acquaint that queen, "that if ſhe encouraged any notion of the marriage, it would put an end to their friendſhip, and to all Mary's hopes of ſucceeding to the crown of England, ſince the Engliſh would never run the hazard of falling under the dominion of the houſe of Auſtria." She added, "that Mary's only way to remove all jealouſies betwixt them, was for her to marry ſome Engliſh nobleman, to be recommended by Elizabeth." So far the ambaſſador was ordered to repreſent to queen Mary, and then to intimate to the earl of Murray and ſecretary Maitland, that he believed Elizabeth had intentions to recommend Robert, lord Dudley, whose lady was lately dead. Mary, on the other hand, thought (and indeed not without some justice) that she had a right to chuse a husband for herself, and had already entertained some notions of giving her hand to Henry Stuart, lord Darnley, a handsome young nobleman, and eldest son to the earl of Lenox: however, she thought it politic for the present to reject all farther treaty with the archduke.

This year Shan O Neil earl of Tyr Oen, in Ireland, who had, in 1560, broke out into rebellion, came and made his submission to queen Elizabeth, and received her pardon.

On the eleventh of January, 1563, the parliament of England sat down, and Mr. Thomas Williams was chosen speaker of the house of commons. The chief intention of the members in this parliament was to second Elizabeth's laudable zeal for the improvement of trade and manufactures, for the increase of her navy, for the suppression of vice, and the more effectual curbing of popery. She had done the greatest things, with the least burden to her subjects that had ever been known, and it was thought reasonable that she should be supported; it was therefore voted, that the clergy should grant one subsidy, and the laity another, besides two fifteenths and tenths. "A fifteenth and tenth (says Camden) is a certain tax on every city, borough, and town; not upon every man in particular, but a general sum, in proportion to the fifteenth part of the wealth of the respective places. A subsidy, we call that which is imposed on every single person, as they were assessed by poll, according to the value of his goods or lands."

A little before the meeting of this parliament, the queen had been seized with the small-pox; and as her life had, for some time, been in great danger, the commons presented an address to her majesty, entreating her to fix the succession in such a clear and explicit manner, as might prevent the calamities to which the neglect of so important a point would certainly expose the nation. But Elizabeth found means to elude their application, by alleging the same reasons which she had formerly given to the queen of Scots.

The bill that made the greatest noise, and was most vigorously opposed in this parliament, was "An act for assurance of the queen's power over all estates," which was levelled against the usurped jurisdiction of the Romish see within England. By this act all who maintained, by printing, preaching, or teaching, the pope's authority within Elizabeth's dominions, were made, by the first offence, liable to the penalties of Præmunire. The oath appointed by the statute which revived the supremacy, in the first year of this reign, was by this act, "extended to all who have been, or shall be admitted to holy orders, or to any degree in the universities, and to all school-masters and lawyers almost of any denomination." But if it was tendered and refused a second time, the penalty was then the same as in the cases of high-treason, only the blood was not to be corrupted, nor the heir disinherited, nor the dower forfeited. It is farther enacted, "that all members of the house of commons are to take this oath, or to lose their seats in parliament. But it was provided, that the oath should not be pressed the second time upon any but ecclesiastics, or notorious recusants, who are to take it, or become liable to the penalties of treason. All persons of or above the degree of a baron, are exempted from this oath. Mr. Atkinson, in the house of commons, and the lord Mountagu (who was now returned from Spain) in the house of lords, made strong speeches against the tyranny of this bill; nor do their adversaries seem to have answered some of the arguments urged against it.

The other acts of this parliament chiefly related to the discouragement of prophesies, magical practices, and sorceries, to which the ignorant were much addicted. A celebrated convocation sat at the same time with the parliament; and, after many altercations, published the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the Church of England, in the same form we now have them. The parliament continued sitting till the tenth of April, and the queen, after passing an act of general pardon, with some exceptions, ordered the same to be prorogued till the second of October.

While Elizabeth thus regulated her domestic concerns, the duke of Guise was carrying on with great vigour the siege of Orleans, which was defended by d'Andelot, brother of the admiral, who marched into Normandy to make a diversion in favour of the besieged, and receive supplies of men and money, which he expected from the queen of England. Orleans was almost reduced to extremity, when the duke of Guise was mortally wounded with a pistol-bullet, by a young enthusiast of the protestant party, named Poltrot de Mere, who, pretending to be a deserter from the town, had been received into the camp of the royalists, and watched an opportunity to shoot the duke in the back. The duke, finding his end approaching, expressed a deep-felt remorse at the remembrance of his having excited a civil war, and exhorted the queen-regent to conclude a peace with all possible expedition.

The death of the duke of Guise, which happened on the twenty-fourth of February, 1563, rendered the queen-mother mistress of the court and army of France, and the imprisonment of the prince of Condé had disposed him to an accommodation. The queen-mother, alarmed by the accounts of the English preparations, sought nothing so much as to unite the kingdom against the English. The progress of this accommodation amongst the French is foreign to our history: suffice it to say, that both parties being heartily tired of the war, they soon agreed to the conditions of a pacification, the chief articles being the extension of the Edict of January, with a few qualifications for the Huguenots free exercise of their religion, the repeal of all the decrees and sentences against them, the release of prisoners on both sides, and that all the parliaments in France should publish and register the edict to be issued for the observation of the treaty. This edict was passed on the nineteenth of March, at Amboise, and, being approved by the parliament, was executed without any difficulty or delay. Orleans, Caen, Lyons, and other cities in the hands of the Huguenots, returned to the king's obedience.

In this treaty, however, neither Condé nor his party paid the least regard to that generous friend, the queen of England; on the contrary, the Huguenots, impatient to see the English in possession of any part of their country, joined the army of the royalists in laying siege to Havre de Grace, garrisoned by the English troops under the earl of Warwick, and diſtinguiſhed themſelves in driving the Engliſh out of a place which themſelves had put into their hands, when their caſe was deſperate and they could not have been ſupported without their aſſiſtance; a conduct which, though it might ſhew them to be good Frenchmen, proved them bad friends and perfidious allies. In this change of ſides and diſtreſs, the earl of Warwick defended the town with great bravery and intrepidity, and it was verily believed would have baffled their united force, had he not been obliged to a capitulation by the plague breaking out among his garriſon, which ſwept off fifty of his ſoldiers in a day, among whom were his chief officers.

The queen, hearing of the diſtreſs of her gallant ſoldier, ſent a commiſſion to the earl to yield up the place, and at the ſame time diſpatched admiral Winter and another ſea-officer, with a ſquadron of ſhips and tranſports to bring off the garriſon. The earl, having obtained honourable conditions, delivered up the place on the thirty-firſt of July; but the moſt fatal event of all was, that the Engliſh garriſon, which arrived in England in the beginning of Auguſt, brought with them a peſtilence ſo raging, that it ſwept off upwards of twenty-thouſand perſons in and about London alone, amongſt whom were the following great perſonages: firſt died William, lord Grey of Wilton, governor of Berwick, a man famous for his great military talents; then William, lord Paget, who had been equally ſerviceable in the cabinet, and, though he had always ſhewn himſelf a zealous patron of the Romiſh religion, yet was held in great eſtimation by queen Elizabeth; Henry Manners, earl of Rutland, deſcended by his mother's ſide from king Edward IV. fell likewiſe a prey to this raging deſtroyer; as did Frances, ducheſs of Suffolk, mother to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, and daughter to the unfortunate ladies Jane and Catherine Grey.

The intereſt of the queen of Scots was very much reduced in France by the death of the duke of Guiſe, eſpecially as Charles IX. who had declared himſelf of age to govern, was wholly under the influence of his mother, who ſought all opportunities to mortify Mary, her daughter-in-law: the Scottiſh guards were diſmiſſed; the duke of Chatelerault was denied his revenues; and the payment of Mary's dowry was diſcontinued, notwithſtanding the warm repreſentations of the cardinal of Lorraine, whoſe credit ſunk at court with the death of the duke his brother. This made him more anxious than ever to bring his niece to conſent to give her hand to the archduke Charles; but Mary, after a mature examination of what had been offered on both ſides, reſolved to perſiſt in her refuſal of that prince, for fear of doing herſelf a prejudice in England; but withal ſhe determined to evade the propoſal Elizabeth intended to make her concerning the lord Dudley, without breaking however with her. It was abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew a regard for Elizabeth, in order to continue with more eaſe her intrigues in England, and increaſe there the number of her friends, which was become very conſiderable ſince the death of the ducheſs of Suffolk, who was the only competitor with her for the crown, after the death of Elizabeth without iſſue.

In a word, both queens profeſſed the moſt ſincere affection for each other, and adopted, in all appearance, the ſentiments as well as ſtyle of ſiſters. In September this year, a new border-treaty was made between them, in which the ſtipulations are much more explicit than any of the preceding; but they are too minute to have a place here. In the beginning of December Elizabeth ſent to Mary, as a token of her affection, the famous ring which we ſhall ſo often have occaſion to mention, and which Mary received with great demonſtrations of kindneſs. Elizabeth alſo inflicted a ſevere puniſhment on one Hales, who had compoſed a book againſt Mary's title; and the lord-keeper Bacon being ſuppoſed to have prompted Hales to this undertaking, he incurred her majeſty's diſpleaſure, and it was not without extreme difficulty that he could recover her good opinion.

Queen Elizabeth, having found by experience how fickle the French proteſtants had carried themſelves towards her, reſolved to embarraſs herſelf no longer with their affairs, but to make peace with the court of France, if the ſame might be obtained upon honourable terms. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1564, negociations were ſet on foot for that purpoſe, and a treaty was finally concluded at Troye, in Champagne, on the eleventh of April, by which each crown preſerved entire all their pretenſions; and Elizabeth agreed, by a ſeparate article, to releaſe the French hoſtages, on conſideration of one hundred and twenty thouſand crowns of gold. Throgmorton, who had been detained priſoner in France, was ſet at liberty; and Elizabeth nominated the lord Hunſdon, her kinſman, to carry the Garter over to the French king, who was ſo well pleaſed with the compliment that he offered to give the order of St. Michael to any two Engliſhmen the queen ſhould name. England at this juncture enjoyed the moſt profound tranquility: her trade with the Low Countries had been interrupted by the intrigues of cardinal Granville, who, foreſeeing a war in the Netherlands, wanted to remove the Engliſh, and perſuaded the government to prohibit the importation of Engliſh cloth, a branch of traffic which was carried on to a prodigious extent; but Philip perceiving this prohibition was in all reſpects as detrimental to his own ſubjects as to thoſe of England, deſired the old treaty, called Magnus Intercurſus, made in the reign of Maximilian I. might be renewed; and the affair was determined to the ſatisfaction of both nations.

The queen, no longer taken up with foreign cares, made a progreſs this ſummer to the univerſity of Cambridge, where ſhe was received with great pomp and magnificence. She teſtified her ſatisfaction in an elegant Latin oration, wherein ſhe aſſured the univerſity of her protection and intention to encourage learning to the utmoſt of her power. It was on her return from this progreſs that ſhe, on the thirtieth of September, created the lord Robert Dudley baron of Denbigh, with a grant of that caſtle and honour, and the next day advanced him to the higher title of earl of Leiceſter, the caſtle and manor of Kenelworth, which had belonged to the ancient earls of Leiceſter, being given him for the better ſupport of that dignity. He was ſoon after choſen chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford; and (at the queen's recommendation) received from Charles IX. of France the order of St. Michael. In a word, Elizabeth ſeemed to ſet no bounds to her favours in behalf of a perſon who, according to her own declaration to Melvill, vill, envoy to her from the queen of Scots, "ſhe eſteemed as her brother and beſt friend, and whom ſhe would herſelf have married, had ſhe not determined to live and die a virgin *."

This nobleman did not want talents and qualities to recommend him to a lady's good graces: he had great accompliſhments of mind and body, an open countenance, a graceful addreſs, a courteous and winning behaviour, and ſuch an abſolute command of his temper, that he could ſuit himſelf to all humours: but with all this he had great vices; he was void of all ſenſe of honour, juſtice, or religion; his boundleſs ambition put him upon aſpiring to the marriage of his own ſovereign, and, in deſpair thereof, to that of the queen of Scotland, one of the fineſt and moſt accompliſhed princeſſes of her age. Such was the man recommended by Elizabeth as the fitteſt huſband for queen Mary; and accordingly, in the month of May this year, ſhe wrote a letter to her, wherein ſhe laid before her many arguments, ſhewing the dangerous conſequence of matching herſelf to a foreigner, and concluded with promiſing her, that if ſhe would conſent to marry the earl of Leiceſter, (then only lord Dudley) Elizabeth would, in the next parliament, acknowlege Mary as the ſucceſſor to her crown and dignity; but that if ſhe married without her conſent, ſhe muſt look on her affairs in England as ruined.

This liberty taken by Elizabeth to adviſe a queen, her equal, with ſuch an air of ſuperiority, ſo exaſperated Mary, who was naturally warm and haughty, that, forgetful of her political maxim, not to quarrel with Elizabeth, ſhe returned ſuch an anſwer as greatly offended the Engliſh queen. However, Mary, when grown cool, reflecting how much it was her intereſt to maintain an intercourſe with Elizabeth, ſent ſir James Melvill to London, with a letter containing ſome conceſſions, and a propoſal of renewing their former friendſhip. The queen of England, who was a perfect miſtreſs of the art of diſſimulation, admitted her rival's excuſes with great good-humour, expreſſed the warmeſt affection for her royal kinſwoman, and concluded with ſeveral reaſons why Mary ſhould be convinced it was her intereſt to take Dudley as the moſt ſuitable perſon for her. Not that Elizabeth ever wiſhed this match might really take effect: ſhe loved Dudley too well to part with him to a deteſted rival; but her aim was to detach the queen of Scotland from the alliance with the houſe of Auſtria, and amuſe her with a treaty which would never be brought to perfection.

In the mean time the court of France was greatly alarmed at the proſpect of Mary's marrying an Engliſh nobleman. The queen-mother and the cardinal of Lorraine ſent orders to de Foix, the French ambaſſador at the Scottiſh court, to offer Mary, if ſhe would refuſe the propoſed match with Dudley, and adhere to her connections with France, that they would pay her dower-money that was in arrears, continue it punctually for the time to come, and reſtore the Scots to all their former liberties in France. They obſerved, that, beſide the injury offered to Mary's royal dignity, Elizabeth never could be ſincere in propoſing to match her with a man who was ſo dear to herſelf: that as to the bait of declaring Mary her ſucceſſor to the crown of England, ſhe could have no ſecurity for the performance, even though it could be done by parliamentary authority, ſince it was no uncommon thing for one parliament to repeal the acts of another.

Theſe ſuggeſtions had their effect upon Mary: but, willing to keep fair with Elizabeth, ſhe conſented that a conference (at that queen's deſire) ſhould be held upon the ſubject of her marriage with the earl of Leiceſter, at Berwick; that the earl of Bedford ſhould be one of the commiſſioners on the part of England, and that the earl of Argyll ſhould, with Murray and ſecretary Maitland, be for Scotland. This conference was accordingly held in the month of November this year; but as both parties were inſincere, Mary never intending to take a huſband upon Elizabeth's recommendation, and Elizabeth's ſole view being to amuſe the queen of Scotland, or, as it was ſuſpected in that kingdom, only propoſing the earl of Leiceſter to Mary that ſhe herſelf might marry him with leſs diſhonour, after his having been encouraged by an abſolute queen; nothing paſſed in the conferences but what was trifling, dark, and general. Leiceſter himſelf ſeems to have thought himſelf ſo ſure of Elizabeth, that he was not only cold in his addreſſes to the queen of Scotland, but ſecretly warned the earl of Bedford, the firſt commiſſioner on the part of England, not to be too eager in the affair. The Scottiſh commiſſioners, on their part, were ſo well inſtructed, that they rather outdid the Engliſh in their cold reception of the propoſals made in Leiceſter's favour. Thus the affair hung for ſome time, till at length, as the conferences were going to break up, the earl of Murray frankly declared to the Engliſh commiſſioners, that the ſituation of his miſtreſs's affairs would not ſuffer her longer to live ſingle, and that if ſhe did not match in England, ſhe would with ſome other foreign prince. Mary, however, had other views, as we ſhall ſoon ſee. Thus ſtood affairs between England and Scotland in 1564. This year died the emperor Ferdinand I. leaving the Imperial dignity and his hereditary dominions to his eldeſt ſon Maximilian.

The year 1565 opened a new ſcene of diſcontent and troubles between the two queens, and between Mary and her ſubjects. We have already obſerved, that ſhe had for ſome time fixed her mind on marrying the lord Darnley, ſon to the earl of Lenox: ſhe was firſt inſpired with this deſign by one David Rizzio, a muſician, whom ſhe employed in her ſervice. He had come to Scotland in the ambaſſador of Savoy's train, and his parts far exceeding his ſtation, it is no wonder that, in a country rude like that of Scotland in the times we are deſcribing, a princeſs, who had neceſſarily ſo great a foreign correſpondence as Mary had, put him in a ſtation about her perſon beyond what he could claim from his excellency in his profeſſion. His perſon was mean, ſhrivelled, and deformed: he was advanced in age, ſo that it ſeems the pure invention of ſcandal and malice to repreſent him as poſſeſſing from Mary other favours but thoſe to which he was entitled by his ſuperior capacity in her ſervice as ſecretary for the foreign tongues. However, the queen at length diſtinguiſhed him ſo much by her favours, that almoſt every one who had any thing to ask of the court applied to him, ſo that in a ſhort time he amaſſed a handſome fortune: but as he was ſuſpected to be a penſioner of the pope, it gave grounds of ſuſpicion that he would find means to ſet the queen againſt thoſe of the reformed religion; and the lord Darnley being a papiſt, and Rizzio the pope's emiſſary, it is generally believed that Mary was determined on this match by her favourite's advice: but, indeed, there appears to have been very many reaſons in ſound policy why Mary ſhould have liſtened to ſuch an alliance.

Young Darnley was her couſin-german by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII. and daughter to the earl of Angus, by Margaret, queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where his father had conſtantly lived ever ſince he had been expelled his native country by the ſuperior intereſt of the Hamiltons. Darnley was likewiſe by his father deſcended from the ſame family with Mary, and would, by marrying her, preſerve the royal dignity in the houſe of Stuart. He was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and thoſe who affected to deny her title on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to maintain his claim, and gave it the preference. It was, moreover, deemed no inconſiderable advantage, that ſhe could by eſpouſing him, unite both their titles; and as he was an Engliſhman by birth, and could not, by his power and alliances, give any cauſe of ſuſpicion to Elizabeth, it was preſumed that the propoſal of this marriage would not be diſagreeable to her.

But that jealous princeſs preſently dived into Mary's politics; and as her drift was always to keep the royal widow in a ſtate of ſubmiſſion to her will, ſhe ſtrove all in her power to prevent this marriage alſo, by which the titles of the two families to both crowns would be united, and the queen of Scotland become independent upon her as to the ſucceſſion; ſhe therefore became now more urgent than ever for Mary to give her hand to the earl of Leiceſter: and ſo intricate and unaccountable was the conduct of each of theſe princeſſes at this juncture, that, by by one of Randolph's diſpatches to Cecil, it appears that ſo late as the fifth of February this year, Mary ſhewed ſome compliance to this match, provided ſhe was gratified in her demands of a large penſion from England, and being declared next heir to the crown; though but a very little time before ſhe had ſent for the earl of Lenox into Scotland, by the advice of the counteſs of Lenox, her aunt, under pretence of reſtoring him to his ancient inheritance, from which he had been baniſhed twenty years; but in reality to conſult with him about her marriage with his ſon; and Elizabeth had not only agreed to the earl's departure, but actually wrote to Mary, earneſtly recommending that nobleman to her favour, and thanking her for her kind intentions towards him: and the earl accordingly went into Scotland.

But as Darnley was yet in England, ſome way was to be found to get him clear of Elizabeth's power, before the intended match could be made public: this was effected on pretence of his preſence being neceſſary in the aſſembly of the Scottiſh ſtates, ſummoned to reſtore his father to his honours and eſtates. Accordingly leave was asked and obtained of the Engliſh court for his abſence for three months on that buſineſs, Elizabeth and her council not ſuppoſing that this young lord would dare to marry Mary without the queen of England's conſent.

Darnley arrived in Scotland in the month of March this year, and by his preſence completed the conqueſt he had made by his fame: Mary, forgetting all her ideas of grandeur, and all her ſchemes of policy, liſtened only to the dictates of her growing love; and ſecretary Maitland was named ambaſſador to go into England, and from thence to France, to notify and excuſe her marriage with Darnley. Rizzio ſoon found means by his addreſs to win the confidence of this young nobleman, who made him his friend and companion. This gave great umbrage to the Engliſh party, who, with Randolph, immediately doomed Darnley and him to the fate they afterwards experienced.

In the mean time Murray, perceiving his credit daily decline, and foreſeeing the difficulties and dangers ſuch a match, with a popiſh lord and contrary to the advice of the queen of England, would precipitate the reformed religion and ſtate into, withdrew from court, and was ſoon joined by the duke of Chatelerault, the earl of Argyll, and others of the nobility, who thought it time to apply effectual remedies to the impending miſchiefs; and their party being ſtrengthened by ſeveral who oppoſed the advancement of the houſe of Lenox from private views, they ſet about means to overturn that by force, which could not be otherwiſe prevented.

On the other hand, Mary, who had intelligence of their deſigns, endeavoured to ſtrengthen herſelf by taking into favour all the enemies of the oppoſition. She recalled the earl of Bothwell from France, and the earl of Sutherland from Flanders; and ſhe not only releaſed George Gordon from the caſtle of Dunbar, then under ſentence of death, but pardoned him, and permitted him to aſſume the title of earl of Huntley. Theſe nobles and their party were now the only attendants at court, and theſe the queen aſſembled as ſoon as notice arrived of the pope's diſpenſation for her marriage with Darnley being granted, and asking their advice concerning her intended eſpouſals, obtained their unanimous conſent. Buchanan ſays that even the earl of Murray, when he perceived there was no hindering it, propoſed to gain Elizabeth's conſent, provided the proteſtant religion could be ſecured.

Secretary Maitland, who had been ſent to England, executed his commiſſion to Elizabeth, who referred him to her privy-council, where the thing was for ſome days very ſeriouſly debated. At laſt, on the firſt of May, they came to a reſolution, "That ſuch a marriage would be dangerous to religion and to the kingdom of England, and therefore that the queen of England could not give her conſent thereto." And Throgmorton was immediately ordered to repair to Scotland with a copy of the ſaid reſolution, and with inſtructions for diſſuading queen Mary from marrying the lord Darnley: at the ſame time letters were ſent to Randolph, to be delivered from Elizabeth to Lenox and Darnley, ordering them, upon the expiration of their leave of abſence, to return home, under the higheſt pains and penalties the law of England could inflict: and the counteſs of Lenox and her ſecond ſon, who were then in England, were committed to cloſe confinement in the Tower.

The conduct of Elizabeth, though usually judicious, was always full of duplicity and deceit; but never did she behave with greater insincerity than in her transactions with the queen of Scotland. Notwithstanding that she at this time expressed so violent a resentment against the projected match with Darnley, she was in her heart not averse to it: she would rather have wished indeed that Mary had remained for ever in a single state; but finding that her sister (as she always affected to call her) had less ambition, or at least less continence, than herself, she did not dislike a choice which delivered her at once from the fear of a foreign alliance, and the necessity of yielding up her favourite Leicester: but she had strong reasons of a political nature for affecting displeasure on the present occasion, it furnished her with a plausible pretext for refusing to declare Mary her successor to the English crown, a point which she had always laboured to evade; and it likewise served her for another purpose, still more unjust and dangerous, namely the fomenting a spirit of discontent and rebellion among the Scottish nobility and clergy; a scheme which, unhappily for the peace of Scotland, she succeeded but too well in.

As to Mary, when the resolution of the English council was notified by Throgmorton, she very properly observed, that as Elizabeth had already signified her inclination for her marrying an English subject, to avoid the umbrage her matching into any foreign great family might give her, she was in effect following her advice. She promised however, that, to give time for Elizabeth seriously to weigh the matter, she would defer her marriage for three months. Elizabeth, not contented with this concession, directed Throgmorton and Randolph to encourage the malecontents of Scotland with the promise of her assistance and protection. Accordingly the noblemen began to enter into association, the townsmen of her capital to raise tumults, and all the Scottish nation appeared under a panic, on account of the queen's marriage. But Mary, whatever representations had been made to the contrary, was still dear to her people: Edinburgh was in an instant reduced to her obedience; and the traitors found themselves so warmly pushed, that they actually applied to Elizabeth for support, in order immediately to take arms against their prince, who had not yet done one public act to justify resistance, much less rebellion. Mary however, notwithstanding all opposition, married the lord Darnley, about the middle of July; and drove the malecontents to such a brink of despair, that they were obliged to take refuge in England about the beginning of November. In this distress they nominated the earl of Murray their deputy to Elizabeth, and he repaired to London to solicit her protection: but the subtle princess gave them to understand, that he had nothing to expect from her, unless he would publicly own that she had no concern in their revolt. Having extorted such a confession from the mean-spirited nobleman, in the presence of the French and Spanish ambassadors, she reviled the Scottish lords as rebels and traitors, and forbad them to appear in her presence. Nevertheless they found protection in her dominions; and the earl of Bedford, by her private orders, supplied them with money for their subsistence. Mean while Mary convoked an assembly of the estates of her kingdom, that the fugitives might, by an act, be degraded and banished.

The transactions of this year between England and France carry with them nothing particular. The proposal of Elizabeth marrying the archduke of Austria had been lately revived, but, on the accession of Maximilian to the Imperial dignity, a new difficulty started; the Imperial court pretended that they could not in honour suffer the archduke to match with a princess, who had given such extravagant marks of affection to a man, as Elizabeth had to Leicester: even the English council could not reconcile to their own judgments the enigmatical behaviour of their queen; and Elizabeth went so far as to have it debated at the council-board, whether she should marry the earl of Leicester or the archduke of Austria. There is extant, in lord Burleigh's papers, a curious abstract of this debate, which we shall give to the reader, on account of the instructive matter it contains.

The reasons which ought to move the queen to marry the arch-duke, besides his person, his birth, his alliance, were as follow: "I. She shall not diminish the honour of a prince, to match with a prince. II. When she shall receive messages from kings, her husband shall have of himself by birth a countenance to receive them. III. Whatsoever he shall bring into the realm, he shall spend it here in the realm. IV. He shall have no regard for any person, but to please the queen. V. He shall have no opportunity nor occasion to tempt him to seek the crown after the queen, because he is a stranger, and hath no friends in the realm to assist him. VI. By marriage with him the queen shall have the friendship of king Philip, which is necessary, considering the likelihood of falling out with France. VII. No prince of England ever remained without good amity with the house of Burgundy; and no prince had ever less alliance than the queen of England hath, nor any prince ever had more cause to have friendship and power to assist her estate. VIII. The French king will keep Calais against his pact. IX. The queen of Scots pretendeth title to the crown of England; and so did never foreign prince since the conquest. X. The pope also, and all his parties are watching adversaries to the crown."

The reasons against the queen's marrying the earl of Leicester were as follow: I. Nothing is increased by marrying him, either in riches, estimation, or power. II. It will be thought that the slanderous speeches of the queen with the earl have been true. III. He shall study nothing but to enhance his own particular friends to wealth, to offices, to lands, and to offend others: sir Henry Sidney, earl of Warwick, Sir James Crofts, Henry Dudley, sir Francis Jobson, Appleyard, Horsey, Leyghton, Molineux, Middlemore, Colshil, Westman, Killigrew, John Dudley, Christmas, Foster, Ellys, Middleton. IV. He is infamed by the death of his wife. V. He is far in debt. VI. He is like to prove unkind or jealous of the queen's majesty."

Leicester, who was of an haughty impatient temper, could not brook the freedoms that were taken with his character; and, depending on his interest with Elizabeth, he created some of his enemies with great indecencies; but Elizabeth soon convinced him that he was but the second idol of her heart, and that she was resolved to suffer no affection to come into competition with her power: for even at the time when she suffered the expediency of his becoming her husband to be debated, she ordered him not to appear in her presence.

This

This ſevere mortification, joined to the marriage of the queen of Scots, which Leiceſter always believed to be effected by Elizabeth's private intrigues, ſoon convinced him, that obedience was his beſt courſe, and zeal his ſtrongeſt recommendation to the favour of his miſtreſs.

Pope Pius IV. dying in September this year, his ſucceſſior took the name of Pius V. We return now to the affairs of Scotland, which are very material to clear the hiſtory of Elizabeth.

After the diſſolution of the council of Trent, the pope had endeavoured to form a league with the courts of France, Spain, and the empire, for the extirpation of the reformed religion: at length, in a conference between the queen of Spain and her brother, the French king, who met on the frontiers, and by means of a correſpondence between the queen-mother of France and the duke of Alva, a reſolution was taken, and meaſures concerted, for cruſhing the Huguenots in France, the proteſtants in the Low Countries, and the Reformation in all parts of Europe. This league, thus formed at Bayonne, was ſent over to Scotland, and ſubſcribed by Mary; and the cardinal of Lorraine preſſed her, by Rambouillet, the French ambaſſador, to proceed with the utmoſt vigour againſt the proteſtant leaders, who had preſumed to take arms againſt her: and the cardinal had gained ſuch an aſcendancy over the mind of his royal niece, that he diverted her from the more mild and moderate courſe which ſhe intended to have purſued, and made her reſolve on the total ruin of the fugitive lords.

A parliament was ſummoned to meet at Edinburgh in the beginning of the year 1566, for their trial; and as the crime of which they had been guilty was notorious to all the world, it was generally believed that ſentence would be given againſt them, notwithſtanding the warm inſtances of the Engliſh ambaſſador, who conjured the queen to pardon them, or at leaſt delay their ſentence: they were, however, preſerved by a ſudden an unforeſeen accident, which brought Mary herſelf to utter and irretrievable ruin.

The fugitive lords had many friends in Scotland, and amongſt them the lord Darnley himſelf, now conſort to the queen, to whom he had been married but a very ſhort time before there appeared viſible marks of diſcord between them. Mary had been ſo captivated with the external charms of this young nobleman, that ſhe had entirely overlooked the imperfections of his mind, which little correſponded with the fair form ſet forth to the eye of the world. He was of a weak underſtanding, but of an inſatiable ambition and intolerable pride; he was mean, looſe, and diſſolute in his manners; and ſo little regard had he to gratitude, or the common laws of decency and honour, that he is ſaid to have brought to the arms of his royal bride, the moſt lovely of her ſex, a diſeaſe that ſhould never be known out of the confines of a brothel. Not content with theſe domeſtic injuries, he demanded from her the matrimonial crown in ſuch a manner as ſhewed him to be determined to ſtrip her of her own, and he openly put himſelf at the head of a party that wanted to deprive her of all authority, that they might engroſs it to themſelves under his weak management. His unhappy wife in vain attempted to reclaim him by every effort of conjugal tenderneſs, but, finding her endeavours fruitleſs, her former love ſunk into indifference, and from thence ſoon to averſion.

The diſcontented faction, who looked upon Darnley, from his diſpoſition, as a proper tool for ambition and treaſon, ſpared no pains to improve the viſible diſcord between him and the queen to their own advantage. Rizzio, Mary's ſecretary and favourite, had at firſt exerted his utmoſt endeavours to forward the marriage of Darnley, and a firm friendſhip ſeemed to be eſtabliſhed between them; but in the following change of the queen's ſentiments, it was eaſy for Henry's companions to make him believe that Rizzio was the real cauſe of the queen's coldneſs towards him, and even to infuſe into his mind jealouſies of the moſt unjuſt as well as of the moſt dangerous nature.

The earl of Morton, the lord-chancellor, was the chief of thoſe, who, under pretence of religion, ſet themſelves up as oppoſers of Mary's government: with him were joined George Douglas, natural brother to the counteſs of Lenox, and the lords Ruthven and Lindſey. Theſe had the ear of the weak Darnley, and moulded his mind to their own purpoſes. They perſuaded him to expoſtulate with the queen on her too great intimacy, as it was called, with David Rizzio; and the queen, ſecure in conſcious innocence, treated theſe inſinuations with the indignation they merited; and, in order to let her conſort ſee, that in exalting him ſhe meant not to diveſt herſelf of all authority, ſhe ordered his name to be omitted on the coin, and to be ſet after her own in public acts, which at firſt ſhe had ordered to be ſet before; and, perhaps, from a ſpark of female pride and reſentment, might ſhew more countenance to Rizzio after this inſult ſhe had received on his account, than ſhe otherwiſe would have done. The event, however, was what the incendiaries had well foreſeen: the hot-headed Darnley, inflamed with rage, reſolved to make the favourite fall a victim to his reſentment, hoping by his death to remove the cauſe of his royal conſort's coldneſs and averſion to himſelf; and, conſulting with Morton and his other friends on the occaſion, they not only encouraged him in his deſign, but alſo adviſed him to recall the exiled lords, and by their means form a balance of power in his favour, ſufficient to ſuperſede the authority of Mary; promiſing him in that caſe not only to fix the matrimonial crown on his head, but alſo to get an act of parliament paſſed for continuing the ſucceſſion in his perſon, ſhould he ſurvive his queen. But as they knew that Henry was no leſs fickle than raſh, they perſuaded him to ſign a paper, in which he engaged to ſcreen them from any danger to which the aſſaſſination of Rizzio, now reſolved upon by the junto, might poſſibly expoſe them, avowing that undertaking, and declaring it to be done in conſequence of his deſire. Theſe neceſſary precautions taken, a meſſenger was diſpatched, in Henry's name, to the baniſhed lords, who were lurking about the borders (all but the duke of Chatelerault, who had been permitted by Mary to return, on his humble conceſſions, and promiſes of future peaceable behaviour), inviting them to return to their own country, and binding himſelf to obtain their remiſſion, reſtore them to their eſtates, eſpouſe their quarrels, and concur with them in ſupporting and eſtabliſhing the proteſtant religion.

However, Darnley could not conceal his intention ſo cloſely, but ſome of his domeſtics, whom he had endeavoured to gain over to his aſſiſtance in the projected murder, diſcovered it to the queen, who expreſſed herſelf with ſo much reſentment againſt Darnley for his baſe deſign, and vindicated her favourite with ſo great warmth, that Henry began to fear for his own liberty, and therefore was eaſily perſuaded by his adviſers to have the fact perpetrated without farther delay. That Mary was blameable in giving Rizzio ſo great aſcendancy at her court, is indeed paſt diſpute; and, perhaps, her favour had rendered him inſolent; but he might have been removed by legal methods, while Darnley had recourſe to ruffian force; and his deſign, ſo deteſtable in itſelf, was rendered ſtill more odious by the circumſtances which attended the execution. A full account of the whole barbarity was drawn up by the lord Ruthven, the principal actor, and is now in print, by which it appears in worſe colours for the conſpirators than any hiſtorian has repreſented it; we ſhall therefore give it in that lord's own words.

"Upon Saturday, the ninth day of March, the earl of Morton, lord Ruthven, and lord Lindſey, with their accomplices, paſſed up to the queen's outer chamber; and the ſaid lord Ruthven paſſed in, through the king's chamber, and up through the privy way to the queen's chamber, as the king had learned him, and through the chamber to the cabinet, where he found the queen's majeſty ſitting at her ſupper at the middle of a little table, lady Argyll ſitting at one end, and David Rizzio at the head of the table, the king ſpeaking with the queen's majeſty, and his hand about her waiſt. The lord Ruthven, at his coming in, ſaid to the queen's majeſty, "It would pleaſe your majeſty to let yonder man, Davie, come forth of your preſence, for he hath been over-long here." Her majeſty anſwered, "What offence hath he made?" The ſaid lord replied again, "That he had made great offence to her majeſty's honour, the king her huſband, the nobility, and commonweal of the realm." "And how?" ſaith ſhe. "It will pleaſe your majeſty (ſaid the lord), he hath offended your majeſty's honour, which I dare not be ſo bold to ſpeak of: as to the king your huſband's honour, he hath hindered him of the crown matrimonial, which your grace promiſed; beſides many other things, which are not neceſſary to be expreſſed: and as to the nobility, he hath cauſed your majeſty to baniſh great part, and moſt chief thereof, in ſo far as he ſuffered not your majeſty to grant or give any thing but that which paſſed through his hands, by taking of bribes and goods for the ſame; beſides many other inconveniences that he ſolicited your majeſty to do." Then the ſaid lord Ruthven ſaid to the king, "Sir, take the queen's majeſty, your ſovereign and wife, to you," who ſtood all amazed, and whiſt not what to do. Then her majeſty roſe, on her feet, and ſtood before Davie, he holding her majeſty by the plait of her gown, leaning back over in the window, his whyniard drawn in his hand. And then Erſkine and the abbot of Holy-rood-houſe, and others began to lay hands on the ſaid lord Ruthven, none of the king's party being preſent: then the ſaid lord pulled out his whyniard, and freed himſelf while more came in, and ſaid to them, "lay not hands on me, for I will not be handled." And at the incoming of others in the cabinet, the ſaid lord Ruthven put up his whyniard; and, with the ruſhing in of men, the board fell to the wall wards, and the meat and candles being thereon, the lady Argyll took up one of the candles in her hand, and in the ſame inſtant the ſaid lord Ruthven took the queen in his arms, and put her into the king's arms, beſeeching her majeſty not to be afraid, for there was no man there that would do her majeſty's body more harm than their own hearts, and aſſured her majeſty all that was done was the king's own deed and action. Then the remanent gentlemen being in the cabinet, took Davie out of the window, and, after they had him out of the queen's chamber the ſaid lord Ruthven followed, and bade take him down the privy way to the king's chamber: and the ſaid lord returned to the cabinet again believing that the ſaid Davie had been had down to the king's chamber, as ſaid; but the preſs of the people purſued him forth to the outer chamber, where there was a great number ſtanding, who were ſo ſtrenuouſly moved againſt the ſaid Davie, that they could not abide any longer, but ſlew him at the queen's far-door, in the outer chamber *."

The queen was then above five months gone with child, and it may be eaſily judged what an effect the committing ſuch a deed in her preſence was likely to have on a perſon in her condition. Melvill (and truly I think not without ſome reaſon) ſays it appeared to be done to deſtroy both her and her child; for they might have kill Rizzio in any other place and at any other time. Ruthven tells us, that the lords concerned in this murder were for diſpatching him in his own chamber in a morning, or elſewhere; but the king inſiſted it ſhould be done in the manner it was. However, it muſt be confeſſed that Mary, on this occaſion, behaved with admirable prudence: after having paid a decent tribute of grief to the cruel fate of a man ſhe had honoured with her confidence, ſhe dried up her tears, and ſaid ſhe would weep no more, ſhe would now ſeek revenge; while the aſſaſſins, conſcious of their own guilt, and dreading the reſentment of their ſovereign, detained her a priſoner in the palace, diſmiſſing all who might attempt her delivery. But, notwithſtanding all their precautions, ſhe found means to ſend her commands to the provoſt of Edinburgh to aſſemble the people, and come to her relief. But when the tumultuous rabble appeared before the palace, the king told them, from a window, that Rizzio had been ſlain by his command, upon which, and at his requeſt, they diſperſed and returned home.

Mean while Mary, who had very juſtly conjectured that the return of the baniſhed lords would be the ſpeedy reſult of the late rebellious proceedings againſt her authority, determined to ſecure herſelf againſt the malice of her inveterate enemies, by a coalition with thoſe who had been at the worſt but inſolent oppoſers. With this view ſhe found means to diſpatch her truſty ſervant, Melvill, to confer with the earl of Murray, and endeavour to gain him over from the rebel party, by the warmeſt promiſes of her future affection and favour. Murray, who knew enough of the parties concerned in the late aſſaſſination, and of the treaſonable force put upon the royal perſon, to be ſenſible that they had acted only for themſelves, and had made overtures to him and his fellow exiles, not out of any real friendſhip to them, but only to ſecure themſelves a party, readily liſtened to the propoſals Melvill made him from his ſiſter; and being returned to court with the other baniſhed lords, he gained admiſſion to the queen, when a perfect reconciliation was effected between them; and himſelf, with the other lords his companions, were indulged with a free pardon, and reſtored to the poſſeſſion of their honours and eſtates.

The perpetrators of Rizzio's murder applied to her for the ſame favour, but ſhe artfully eluded their application, by telling them, that while ſhe was confined in cuſtody and ſurrounded by guards, any deed which ſhe ſhould ſign would be conſidered as null and void: but finding that they ſtill preſſed her to an acquieſcence, ſhe had recourſe to managing her huſband ſo as to detach him from the conſpirators; and this ſhe did ſo effectually, that Darnley's weak head was brought to deny all that his heart had contrived, or his hand had executed: and having, by the help and policy of Murray, got her guards diſmiſſed, ſhe even perſuaded the king to eſcape with her in the night, and take refuge in Dunbar. Here ſhe was joined by ſo many of her ſubjects, that ſhe ſoon aſſembled an army which the conſpirators were unable to reſiſt; and advancing to Edinburgh, ſhe compelled them to fly into England, where they got leave from Elizabeth to reſide: two of them only, who were left behind, were proceeded againſt in the way of juſtice, and executed. Darnley, by a proclamation, declared himſelf innocent of the murder of Rizzio, and declared that he repented having given any countenance either to the conſpirators or the baniſhed lords.

Mary in a ſhort time reconciled herſelf to all the nobility about her court, and them to each other, and Murray once more appeared to be the moſt zealous of her friends. But Randolph, the Engliſh envoy, had by this time fallen into great diſgrace with Mary, who accuſed him of having not only privately given three thouſand crowns to the conſpirators, but of being the author of a ſcurrilous pamphlet againſt her perſon and government; and ſent Robert Melvill to the Engliſh court, to have that miniſter recalled. Elizabeth was not at a little loſs how to behave on this occaſion; however, after mature reflection, ſhe ordered Randolph home, who had been forbidden to appear at Mary's court, and named Henry Killigrew to ſucceed him: at the ſame time ſhe, at Mary's earneſt inſtances, gave orders to Morton, Lindſey, Ruthven, and others of the conſpirators, to withdraw out of her dominions; but Ruthven dying at Newcaſtle on the thirteenth of May, Mary, out of her own good-nature, gave, before the end of the year, a remiſſion to the reſt, at the interceſſion of ſome of the nobility. Murray, Argyll, and Glencairn, were ſoon after ſworn of the privy-council, and the earl of Huntley was made chancellor in Morton's ſtead. As for the king, he made but a very indifferent figure at this time, being univerſally deſpiſed for his late behaviour, even by the murderers of Rizzio, for diſowning the part he acted in that affair, and every one ſhunned his company. The queen now effected a formal reconciliation between the fugitive lords and the earls of Huntley and Bothwell, though it does not ſeem to have been ſincere on the part of the latter, who utterly hated the earl of Murray; and being by this time become a favourite with Mary, he ſoon involved her in freſh troubles.

All this time the two queens were each of them labouring in private, by their emiſſaries, to corrupt each other's ſubjects, and inſpire them with a ſpirit of rebellion againſt their lawful ſovereign, in order to turn their diſſenſions to their own advantage. Theſe proceedings, however, they pretended to conceal under the mask of regard and deference for each other. Elizabeth had her ſpies about Mary; and when ſhe ſent the fugitive lords out of England, it was with aſſurance of her protection in time of need, in order to retain them as inſtruments of diſturbance in their own country when time ſerved. Mary kept her ambaſſadors at the Engliſh court to ſpirit up a faction: and, if we may believe Melvill, that miniſter executed his inſtructions ſo well, that at the birth of the young prince James, many whole ſhires were ready to inliſt, and their leaders already named by ſome of the nobility.

During theſe tranſactions, Mary, on the nineteenth of June, 1566, was delivered of a ſon, afterwards James I. of England, in the caſtle of Edinburgh, and ſir James Melvill was forthwith ſent to impart the news to Elizabeth, and deſire her to ſtand god-mother to the new-born prince. Melvill acquaints us, that this princeſs, the evening of his arrival at London, had given a ball to her court at Greenwich, were ſhe appeared in high good-humour and gaiety; but that when the birth of the prince of Scotland was communicated to her, ſhe threw herſelf into a chair, leaning her head upon her hand, without ſpeaking a word; upon which one of her ladies taking the freedom to aſk the reaſon of her ſudden melancholy, ſhe replied, "Know ye not that the queen of Scots is mother of a fair ſon, while I am no better than a barren ſtock?" Next day, however, at the audience of the Scottiſh ambaſſador, ſhe reaſſumed her uſual diſſimulation, put on a chearful countenance, thanked Melvill for the diſpatch he had made in bringing her the agreeable news, and expreſſed the moſt cordial friendſhip for her dear ſiſter of Scotland. Soon after ſhe ſent the earl of Bedford, with his relation George Carey, ſon to the lord Hunſdon, in order to aſſiſt at the baptiſm of the young prince, and charged them with ſeveral magnificent preſents for the queen of Scots.

The birth of a ſon contributed greatly to encourage the zeal of Mary's partizans in England; and even men of all parties began to cry aloud for ſome ſettlement of the ſucceſſion; but Elizabeth, whenever ſhe was preſſed on this point, put off the matter by pretending an inclination to match with the archduke Charles. However, the duke of Norfolk, the earls of Pembroke and Leiceſter, with ſeveral others, imagining that the prince's birth, which had encouraged them to declare openly their ſentiments in Mary's favour, might have a like effect upon their miſtreſs, and engage her to declare that princeſs her ſucceſſor, adviſed Melvill to make the propoſal. This he did, but with great circumſpection, telling her "he was aſſured ſhe formerly delayed declaring his miſtreſs preſumptive heir of the crown of England, only till ſhe might ſee ſome iſſue of her body; and this being now the caſe, he hoped her majeſty would no longer defer gratifying the the deſires of her ſubjects, who wiſhed to ſee one point ſettled, in doing juſtice to the title of his ſovereign, who would never ſeek any place or right in England, but by her favour and furtherance." To this Elizabeth replied, "that the prince's birth was a ſtrong inducement to her uſing greater diligence in making an inquiſition into that matter; and that ſhe thought the right belonged to her good ſiſter, in whoſe favour ſhe heartily wiſhed it might be decided; but waved making the declaration till the young prince was baptized, when ſhe ſaid ſhe would certainly ſatisfy the queen of Scotland in that matter." The ambaſſador took this to be a mere evaſion, and ſo it proved.

About the beginning of December. the earl of Bedford, by Elizabeth's order, aſſiſted at the ceremony of baptizing the prince of Scotland, which was performed in preſence of the ambaſſadors from France, England, and Savoy. After the ceremony, the earl of Bedford preſſed the queen of Scotland to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh; but Mary declined complying with this requeſt. Nevertheleſs ſhe offered to ſign a new treaty, importing that ſhe ſhould not aſſume the title or arms of the queen of England during the life of Elizabeth and her poſterity. Before Bedford's departure from the Scottiſh court, ſir James Melvill acquaints us, that he was very earneſt with Mary for her receiving Darnley again into her good graces; but that princeſs would by no means liſten to any propoſal of the kind; and, indeed, the affront he had cauſed to be offered to her perſon (excluſive of his domeſtic ill treatment of her) in the affair of Rizzio's murder, the blemiſh he had endeavoured to throw upon her character, the danger to which her life had been expoſed by his brutal behaviour, on account of her pregnancy, were injuries ſo great and intolerable, that they ſeemed entirely to preclude him from all hopes of overcoming her juſt indignation.

The earl of Bothwell was now in great credit with Mary. He had been always ſincerely attached to her family and perſon, and had performed ſignal ſervices to both. His courage and conduct, as a ſoldier, were unqueſtionable, and he had a moſt cordial hatred of the Engliſh, againſt whom he had been a great and ſucceſsful commander upon the Borders, where his eſtates lay. He had been for ſome years before baniſhed, through the influence of the earls of Arran and Murray, but had been recalled by Mary, and pardoned. In his private life he was completely profligate; he had, by his intemperance, diſſipated a large eſtate, but he ſtill retained all the means of miſchief except money, and all manner of vice but hypocriſy. His appearance, however, was manly, though now advancing to the decline of life; he was equally gallant in the court as in the field; and he had that openneſs of manners that, with his experience in life, rendered him to both ſexes an agreeable companion. Such a man could not but be ill reliſhed by the gloomy reformers of Scotland; and this very circumſtance, perhaps, ſerved to rivet him in Mary's eſteem. But, notwithſtanding all the malicious ſuggeſtions of Buchanan of a criminal converſation between Mary and Bothwell, we ſhould be careful how we too lightly give our aſſent to charges unſupported by authentic documents.

As the knowlege of the affairs of Scotland is abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the motives of queen Elizabeth's conduct and politics, we have therefore thrown together, without interruption, whatever paſſed of moment in that kingdom in the year 1566, but ſhall now proceed to other matters.

In England, this year, Elizabeth was not without both her pleaſures and perplexities. The troubles of Ireland gave her ſome concern; but it was allayed by the ſubmiſſion of Donald M'Carty More, an Iriſh nobleman of great power, who, upon his knees, made a ſurrender to her of his eſtate, which was returned him with the title of Glencairn. But her chief vexation proceeded from the manifeſt affection which many of her great men diſcovered for Mary's title, which was more ſtrengthened than ever, ſince the birth of her ſon. She was likewiſe not a little embarraſſed by the preſſing inſtances the Imperial ambaſſador made for her anſwer as to her marriage, which ſhe continued ſtill to evade with great dexterity. But her reputation abroad was now ſo high, that the marquis of Baden, with his wife the princeſs Cecilia, came to England with no other apparent deſign than to gratify a violent curioſity the lady had to ſee Elizabeth, the female Solomon of her age. This compliment pleaſed Elizabeth exceſſively; ſhe gave a penſion of a thouſand crowns a year to the marquis, and prevailed with him to leave his wife in England till ſhe ſhould be delivered, as ſhe ſoon afterwards was, of a boy, to whom Elizabeth ſtood god-mother. About autumn, Elizabeth, who had great pleaſure in diſplaying her learning, made a progreſs to Oxford, where ſhe harangued the univerſity in Latin, to the no ſmall admiration of the ſtudents and the foreign ambaſſadors who attended. During her ſtay ſhe affected great concern for the proſperity of literature, and the welfare of the univerſity, which ſo endeared the members to her government, that ſhe became ever after the arbiter of all their diſputes. She had paid the like compliment two years before, but not with the like ſucceſs, to the univerſity of Cambridge.

Upon her return from Oxford, on the thirtieth of September, the parliament, which had, for various reaſons, been prorogued from time to time, ſat at Weſtminſter. The friends of Mary in England had now raiſed a powerful party in her favour, and it was reſolved to leave nothing undone that might induce Elizabeth at length to recognize her right to the crown after her own deceaſe. With this view the houſe of peers, which had hitherto declined touching on the delicate point of the ſucceſſion, now led the way, and the commons ſoon followed the example of the lords.

For Mr. Molyneux made a motion, that the affair of the ſubſidy (which had been moved at the opening of the ſeſſion, by ſir Francis Knolles and ſecretary Cecil) might go hand in hand with that of the ſucceſſion. The houſe in general expreſſed great ſatisfaction in the motion; but ſome of the privy counſellors, who knew how diſagreeable a ſubject it was to Elizabeth, ſought to divert it. They told the houſe, that ſhe pledged to them the word of a queen, that ſhe would marry as ſoon as ſhe could find a perſon to her liking; that the appointment of a ſucceſſor would expoſe her perſon to great danger; and that ſhe was determined to delay to a more proper opportunity the deciſion of that important queſtion. The houſe, not ſatisfied with theſe reaſons, and reſuming the ſubject with ſome warmth, Elizabeth, on the ninth of November, ſent a meſſage by ſir Francis Knolles, expreſly commanding them to meddle no farther in the matter of the ſucceſſion, but to be contented with her promiſe to marry.

Upon this Paul Wentworth, a ſpirited member, made a motion that the queſtion ſhould be put, "Whether that meſſage was not a breach of privilege?" This brought on very warm debates; and, on the twelfth of the ſame month, the ſpeaker was ſent for, and ordered by Elizabeth to repeat to the houſe her commands againſt their meddling any farther in that matter. This threw the whole houſe into a flame; and ſuch ſtrong ſymptoms of diſcontent began to appear, that, on the twenty-fifth, ſhe found herſelf under a kind of neceſſity to revoke, by the mouth of the ſpeaker, her two former orders, by which ſhe had impoſed ſilence on the houſe in the affair of the ſucceſſion, and to allow the houſe liberty of debate.

They were ſo mollified by this gracious condeſcenſion, that they thenceforth conducted the matter with more calmneſs and temper, and they even voted her a ſupply, to be levied at three payments, of a ſubſidy and a fifteenth, without annexing any condition to it. But Elizabeth, thinking this was only meant as a ſweetener, to bring her to comply with their deſires, remitted a third part of the ſum, declaring, that ſhe looked upon money in her ſubjects purſe to be the ſame as if it were in her own Exchequer. Nevertheleſs, ſeveral very ſevere reflections were thrown out by ſome of the members againſt Cecil, on a ſuppoſition that he had the chief hand in adviſing Elizabeth to decline ſettling the ſucceſſion. Her phyſician Dr. Huick, who was a member of the houſe, had his ſhare likewiſe of cenſure, being charged with having frightened the queen from marriage, by perſuading her that it would be hurtful to the conſtitution and frame of her body. Theſe indecencies ruffled the queen ſo much, that, on the ſecond of January, ſhe put an end to the ſeſſion with a very ſmart ſpeech, reprimanding the members of both houſes for their eager meddling in the point of the ſucceſſion, and adviſing them not to try her patience for the future; declared ſhe knew how to diſtinguiſh the principal offenders from the reſt; and that the greateſt part of the members departed in her good graces. To ſhew, however, to the nation her own opinion as to the ſucceſſor, whoſe right there was no reaſon to doubt, ſhe impriſoned Thornton, reader of the law in Lincoln's Inn, upon a complaint from the queen of Scots that he had written and publiſhed a book againſt her right. It is not improbable that this affair would have been debated again in the next parliament, if, in the mean while, the queen of Scotland had not loſt herſelf by her ill conduct, and viſibly leſſened her party in England. But before we proceed to ſhew in what manner this happened, we ſhall cloſe the year 1566 with a brief account of the affairs of the Netherlands.

After Philip had quitted theſe provinces, in 1559, in order to reſide in Spain, the diſcontent of the nobles and people was grown to that height, that it was impoſſible for the affairs of that country to remain any longer in their preſent ſituation. This univerſal diſſatisfaction flowed from ſeveral cauſes: I. The people's belief that the king had formed a deſign to aboliſh their liberties and privileges, and eſtabliſh an arbitrary power. II. The erection of biſhoprics, which greatly leſſened the juriſdiction and revenues of the abbeys, in which many families were concerned. III. The Inquiſition, which was intended to be ſet up in theſe provinces, and which was little leſs abhorred by the catholics than by the proteſtants themſelves. IV. The prohibition to aſſemble the ſtates. V. The king's project to extirpate the heretics, who were now very numerous in that country. VI. And laſtly, the intereſt of the great men, who plainly ſaw how fatal to them the execution of the king's deſign would be. They had in vain, for ſeveral years, beſought their governeſs to aſſemble the ſtates, and prevent the calamities with which they foreſaw their country was ſoon going to be afflicted. Their requeſt was conſtantly rejected: this rigour had at length obliged the prince of Orange, count d'Egmont, count Horne, and ſeveral other lords, to withdraw from the council of ſtate, and write to the king. The cardinal de Granville had rendered himſelf ſo odious, that the worſt was to be feared if he continued any longer in the Low Countries: Philip not thinking proper to recal the cardinal directly, adviſed him however to withdraw. As ſoon as Granville was gone, the great men went and reſumed their places in the council.

Mean while the Inquiſition being univerſally abhorred, the people began to ſtir, and ſhew their reſolution to free themſelves from that yoke. The great men ſupported this reſolution, and with two motives; firſt, becauſe they perceived the Inquiſition muſt prove deſtructive of liberty: in the ſecond place, becauſe they were informed the king had taken terrible reſolutions againſt them, on account of what had paſſed about cardinal Granville: whereupon they formed a confederacy againſt the Inquiſition, and Lewis, count of Naſſau, brother to the prince of Orange, with four hundred attendants, preſented a petition to the governeſs. On this occaſion it was that the proteſtants received the name of Gueux, or Beggars. The governeſs not having the power to grant their requeſt, the proteſtants, of their own accord, took the liberty to preach publicly, and the governeſs was forced to ſuffer it, and at length expreſly to allow it. From that time Philip conſidered the people of the Low Countries as rebels; and they, for the moſt part, looked upon him as an unjuſt and cruel ſovereign, who required to be abſolute maſter of their eſtates, their bodies, and their ſouls. I ſhall enter no farther into theſe affairs: it ſuffices to have briefly ſhewn the ſpring of the troubles of the Netherlands, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of ſometimes in the ſequel. I now return to the affairs of Scotland, which more nearly relate to England.

The earl of Bothwell, whoſe character we have already given, had by this time acquired the entire confidence of Mary, and all her meaſures were directed by his advice and authority. Reports were ſpread of more particular intimacies and familiarities between them, and theſe reports gained ground from the continuance, or rather increaſe, of Mary's hatred to her huſband. The queen ſeems to have been ſtung with theſe reproaches; for, on Darnley's falling ſick, about the middle of January, 1567, at Glaſgow, where he had for ſome time reſided, ſhe, in defiance of the inclemency of the ſeaſon, the badneſs of the roads, and her own weakneſs ſo ſoon after lying-in, made a journey from Edinburgh

Edinburgh on purpoſe to viſit him, and behaved to him on this occaſion with the greateſt tenderneſs, forgetting in the duty ſhe owed him as a wife, the cauſes of reſentment he had given her as his ſovereign. This ſtep gave great pleaſure to all thoſe who wiſhed well to her character, and they flattered themſelves with the hopes of a ſpeedy reconciliation, eſpecially when it was found that ſhe had brought the king along with her to Edinburgh, and ſeemed diſpoſed to live with him on terms more ſuitable to the connexions between them: but theſe hopes were ſoon overturned by a fatal accident, which was the aſtoniſhment of every one, and which brought upon Mary a load of blackeſt infamy; with what juſtice will beſt appear when we come in a few years to treat of this event, as becoming an Engliſh concern.

The queen lived in the palace of Holyrood houſe, but as the ſituation of that place was low and unhealthy, and the concourſe of perſons about the court was neceſſarily attended with noiſe, Darnley was lodged in a houſe in the Kirk Field, a place in the more healthful ſuburbs of the town. Here the queen continued to viſit him with the moſt endearing marks of affection, and ſome nights lay in a room in the ſaid houſe. It happened that on the ninth of February, one of the queen's maids of honour was married, and Mary, to ſhew her regard for a favourite ſervant, reſolved to honour the ceremony with her preſence, and therefore returned not that night out of the city. About two o'clock in the morning, the whole town was much alarmed with a violent noiſe, which, to the amazement of every one, proved to be from the blowing up of the houſe in which the king lodged, whoſe dead body was found at a diſtance in a neighbouring field. Buchanan and others, who have delighted in raking for every circumſtance that can poſſibly fix an odium upon Mary's character, pretend that the whole was a plot concerted between her and Bothwell; that her aſſiſting at the marriage of her ſervant was merely a pretext to be out of the way when the deed was performed; and they add, that when the dead body of Darnley was diſcovered, his ſhirt was not the leaſt ſinged with flame, his ſlippers lay juſt by him, and that ſome black and blue marks were ſeen round his neck, whence they would infer that he was ſtrangled before the houſe was blown up. But this ſuppoſition is contradicted by the confeſſion of the criminals; and there is no neceſſity to admit it in order to account for the condition of his body: there are many inſtances that men's lives have been ſaved, who have been blown up in ſhips; had Henry fallen into the water, he had not probably been killed.

No doubt, however, could be entertained but Henry was murdered, and the general conjecture ſoon pointed out Bothwell as the author of that crime. As to Mary, ſhe cauſed the body of Darnley to be interred with as much pomp as the ſour manners of the proteſtants in her court would admit of, in a vault, where, to ocular demonſtration, it yet reſts, with the remains of other royal perſonages, contrary to the infamous falſhood of Buchanan, who has made Mary mingle his duſt with that of the ignoble Rizzio. According to Leſlie, Mary was inconſolable on this occaſion: ſhe ſhut herſelf up in the caſtle of Edinburgh, and could not be drawn from the melancholy life ſhe led there, but by the repeated remonſtrances of her council, and the advice of her phyſicians.

In the mean while, it appears from authentic papers, that ſhe omitted nothing to bring the authors of her huſband's murder to juſtice; and even the earl of Lenox, father of the deceaſed king, expreſſed under his own hand his ſatisfaction in that reſpect: but he adviſed her to call a meeting of parliament, as the moſt effectual courſe for diſcovering the truth. Mary readily agreed to this; and the earl of Lenox having named Bothwell and ſix others whom he ſuſpected, on the twenty-eighth of March an order was made by the privy-council of Scotland for the trial of Bothwell and his ſuppoſed accomplices. This trial came on the twelfth of April, proper notice having been given to the earl of Lenox to come prepared with his witneſſes: but whether he was conſcious that he had no convincing proofs to bring beſides the vulgar ſuſpicion, which was pretty general indeed, or that he thought himſelf too weak in point of intereſt, he did not think proper to appear againſt Bothwell, who was conſequently acquitted, as no perſon appeared to carry on the proſecution. Then a good number of the nobility engaged in a bond, acquitting Bothwell of the murder, and engaging to maintain his innocence with their bodies, heritage, and goods. The earls of Murray, Morton, and Argyll, were among the chief of thoſe who ſigned this bond, which may account for Bothwell's inſolence during the parliament which immediately ſucceeded his acquittal.

This nobleman being, as he thought, immoveably confirmed in the great authority he had aſſumed in the government, by the late bond ſubſcribed by the principal nobility of Scotland, began now to open the whole project of his ambition, which terminated in the enjoyment of Mary as a wife, and he reſolved to marry her by force, if he could not obtain her voluntary conſent. With this view he raiſed a body of eight hundred men, and, intercepting her on her return from Stirling, where ſhe had been to viſit the young prince her ſon, conveyed her to his caſtle of Dunbar, where he completed his rape. All this, it muſt be confeſſed, appears to have paſſed without any reſiſtance on Mary's part; and, though it does not appear by any evidence, that Mary could of herſelf ſo much as ſuſpect Bothwell to be the author of her huſband's death, yet ſhe doubtleſs acted very imprudently, not to give it a worſe term, to ſmile upon him while he was committing a double rape upon her perſon and dignity.

Next followed a very illegal divorce between the earl of Bothwell and his counteſs; and Bothwell brought Mary to Edinburgh caſtle, ſtill with an appearance of force. Some of the nobility, however, in order to put matters to a fair trial, ſent her a private meſſage, in which they told her, that if in reality ſhe lay under force, they would uſe all their efforts to relieve her; but Bothwell, to remove this and all other difficulties, got many of the principal lords of the council to ſign a paper, which was ſomething between a petition and a command that the queen ſhould marry him. Seeing the chief part of her nobility combined, and Murray's, Morton's, and Bothwell's factions united in this affair, and reflecting on the troubles of her reign, the parties that diſtracted the kingdom, the continual danger ger of inſurrections, and her own inability to govern them without the aſſiſtance of her nobility, ſhe found herſelf under the neceſſity of conforming to the petition in the paper delivered to her, which fatally operated to her ruin by her giving her hand to Bothwell, on the fifteenth of May, after having granted him a pardon for all offences, and created him duke of the Orkneys.

The news of this tranſaction being carried to foreign countries, filled all Europe with amazement, and threw infamy not only on the principal actors in them, but alſo on the whole nation, who ſeemed, by their ſubmiſſion and ſilence, and alſo by their declared approbation, to give their ſanction to theſe ſcandalous practices. As to Bothwell, not ſatisfied with the honour of eſpouſing his ſovereign, he endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of the young prince, who had been committed to the care of the lord Erſkine, lately created earl of Marr; but this nobleman refuſed to part with his charge. This attempt excited the moſt ſerious attention; and the principal nobility, to whom Bothwell had rendered himſelf extremely hateful by his overbearing inſolence, even many of thoſe who had formerly ſigned the application in favour of his marriage with Mary, met at Stirling, and formed an aſſociation for protecting the prince, and puniſhing the murderers of the late king. The earl of Athol himſelf, a known catholic, was the firſt author of this confederacy: the earls of Argyll, Morton, Marr, Glencairn, the lords Boyd, Lindſey, Hume, Sempil, Kirkaldy of Grainge, Tullibardin, and ſecretary Maitland, entered zealouſly into it. The earl of Murray, foreſeeing ſuch turbulent times, and being deſirous to keep free from theſe dangerous factions, had ſome time before deſired and obtained Mary's permiſſion to retire into France.

Bothwell, by his inſolence, ſwelled his guilt: he challenged to fight any man who ſhould accuſe him of the murder; and even treated the queen herſelf with the greateſt brutality, inſomuch that ſhe paſſed almoſt the whole day in tears, and once even called for a knife to ſtab herſelf, not being able to bear the indignities offered her by this ungrateful wretch, whom ſhe had ſo highly honoured by taking to her bed.

Mean while the aſſociated lords having gotten together a large body of men, with all imaginable diligence and ſecrecy, marched, on the ſixth of June, to ſurprize the queen and Bothwell in Holyrood-houſe. They had undoubtedly ſucceeded in their deſign, had it not been for an advertiſement ſent her by one of their number, ſuppoſed to be either Argyll or Boyd, who ſoon after quitted their party. Upon this notice ſhe retired with Bothwell to the caſtle of Borthwick, which the aſſociators reſolved to beſiege: and the lord Hume coming before it with eight hundred men, Bothwell fled to the Marches, while the queen was conſtrained to make her eſcape, in mens cloaths, to the caſtle of Dunbar, which was capable of holding out till her friends could come to her ſuccour. Thus diſappointed in their firſt project of ſeizing the queen's perſon, the lords marched to Edinburgh, where they knew the people were generally on their ſide; and, being admitted into the city, they publiſhed, on the twelfth of June, a proclamation, declaring their deſigns to be only "for taking revenge on Bothwell, who had murdered the late king, had raviſhed and detained priſoner the queen, and was now raiſing forces in order to murder the prince likewiſe; and ordering all who would not aſſiſt them, to quit the place in four hours, on pain of being treated as enemies.

The queen, in the mean time, was raiſing forces for her defence, and the country came in ſo faſt to her aid, that ſhe would ſoon have been much ſuperior to her enemies; but being ill adviſed, ſhe quitted Dunbar on the fourteenth of June, and advanced, with about four thouſand men, to Preſton, where ſhe joined the earl of Bothwell. The aſſociators marched the next morning out of Edinburgh, came, about noon, in view of the queen's forces, which were poſted on Carberry-hill, and the armies prepared for an engagement. Le Croix, the French ambaſſador, an aged gentleman of honour and character, interpoſed his good offices for an accommodation: with this view he went to the aſſociated lords, and aſſured them of their ſovereign's inclination to peace, and readineſs to forgive what they had done amiſs: but Morton telling him they had taken arms, not againſt the queen, but the late king's murderer, and would admit of peace on no condition but either her delivering him up, or removing him from her preſence; and Glencairn adding, that they were not come to ask pardon for any offence they had done, but to puniſh ſuch as had offended; the ambaſſador, judging by theſe haughty replies, that nothing was to be done, took leave of the queen, and rode off to Edinburgh.

All hopes of an accommodation being now at an end, and the queen perceiving a viſible backwardneſs in her officers and men to draw their ſwords in her cauſe, ſo long as Bothwell remained with her, ſhe, in this extremity, took the fatal reſolution of ſubmitting to her enemies, and ſent to deſire to ſpeak with Kirkaldy, laird of Grange; who arriving, declared to her, that the confederates deſired nothing elſe than that ſhe ſhould ſend away the murderer of her huſband. After ſome bravadoes of Bothwell, in which he diſcovered more inſolence than courage, he thought proper to retire ſecretly, while the queen, upon Kirkaldy's promiſes of good treatment, delivered her perſon into his care, who, taking her horſe by the bridle, led her down the hill, and delivered her into the hands of the confederates, by whom ſhe was conducted to Edinburgh, where the populace treated her with the utmoſt indignity. From her palace of Holyrood-houſe ſhe was ſent, under a ſtrong guard, to the caſtle of Lochleven, belonging to William Douglas, uterine brother to the earl of Murray, who received an order, ſigned by the aſſociated lords, to detain her in ſafe cuſtody. This was a houſe ſituated in the middle of a lake, and inacceſſible on all ſides but by a boat. But the moſt ingenious part of their cruelty conſiſted in committing her to the cuſtody of the earl of Murray's mother, who pretended to have been married to James V. Mary's father, and that her ſon, the earl of Murray, was the fruit of that marriage; hence ſhe was an irreconcileable enemy to all the legitimate branches of the houſe of Stuart, and ſhe omitted no occaſion to inſult and maltreat the captive queen.

As to Bothwell, he fled unattended to Dunbar; and, fitting out ſome ſhips, ſet ſail for the Orkneys, where he ſubſiſted during ſome time by piracy. He was purſued thither by Kirkaldy, and his ſhip taken with ſeveral of his ſervants; Bothwell himſelf eſcaped in a boat, and found means to get a paſſage over to Denmark, where he was thrown into priſon, loſt his ſenſes, and died miſerably about ten years afterwards. An end worthy of his flagitious conduct and behaviour.

Elizabeth's conduct during thoſe misfortunes of her kinſwoman, was irreproachable; and though the conſpirators undoubtedly truſted to be ſupported by her, yet, upon the ſtricteſt enquiry, it does not appear that ſhe had any hand at this time in the troubles of Scotland. On the contrary, on the thirtieth of June, ſhe ordered Throgmorton to ſet out for Scotland, and there to inform himſelf fully of Mary's ſituation, and to promiſe her all the aid in her power: though Throgmorton was at the ſame time entruſted to expoſtulate very freely with her upon the imprudencies of her conduct; which ſhe received with a flood of tears, and acknowleged her miſtakes. This miniſter had at the ſame time orders to talk roundly to the confederates, and to threaten them, in his miſtreſs's name, to force them to ſet their ſovereign at liberty, if they refuſed to do it of their own accord.

Throgmorton, however, found the confederates entrenched within the inſolence of ſucceſs, and that they were acting in ſuch a manner as may naturally be expected from ſubjects who have their future fears to provide againſt, as well as their preſent animoſities to gratify. The aſſociated lords were determined to proceed with the greateſt ſeverity againſt the queen, but they were divided in their opinions what to do with her: ſome would have her baniſhed perpetually into England or France; ſome would have her brought to a trial in open court, as an acceſſary to the death of her huſband, committed to perpetual impriſonment, and her infant-ſon proclaimed king; another party ſtill more inhuman, wanted at once to deprive her of princely authority, and even of life itſelf; Knox and the other fanatic proteſtant preachers in particular were for this laſt bloody expedient, which they recommended with all the inſolent rage of enthuſiaſm from the pulpit *. Throgmorton ſupported the mildeſt propoſal; but, though he promiſed his miſtreſs's guarantee for the performance of articles, he declared, in Elizabeth's name, that ſhe was determined not to ſee her ſiſter oppreſſed by her rebellious ſubjects; and warned them not to draw upon themſelves, by their violences, the public reproach which now lay upon the queen. He found, however, that, excepting ſecretary Maitland, he had not the good fortune to convince any of the leaders, and was fain to accept of (all he could get from them) a writing, without any ſubſcription, wherein they proteſted that they had ſhut up the queen for no other intent but to keep her from Bothwell, whom ſhe loved ſo deſperately, that, for the enjoyment of his company, ſhe would not heſitate to compaſs the ruin of them all, with that of her country; at the ſame time profeſſing all the duty imaginable to her royal perſon, and that ſhe ſhould be reſtored to her liberty the inſtant proper enquiry had been made into the murder of her huſband: proteſtations which their actions and behaviour towards the unhappy princeſs daily gave the lie to.

For now they doubled the rigour of her confinement, and even denied Throgmorton all acceſs to her perſon; nay, though with tears ſhe beſought them to deal more mildly with her, and to let her have but one ſight of her ſon, theſe fiends of rebellion denied her even this conſolation, ſo dear to the heart of every tender parent. Conſcious, however, that it was neceſſary for them to have the form at leaſt of the ancient government of the realm, to countenance their traiterous proceedings, they reſolved at laſt to force her, by the threats of whatever could ſhake her conſtancy, not ſparing even menaces of death, to make her comply with their views; and being by this time afraid of Elizabeth's reſentment, and that of other powers, they came to a reſolution of ſending the lord Lindſey, one of Mary's moſt deſperate enemies, with three inſtruments, ready drawn, to be ſigned by her: the firſt, conſtituting the earl of Murray, who was then out of the kingdom, regent during her ſon's nonage, and in the mean while eſtabliſhing a council for the exerciſe of the regal authority until that earl's return, and a power to continue, in caſe he ſhould refuſe to accept the commiſſion: the next was an inſtrument of demiſſion from Mary, in favour of her ſon: and the laſt, an abſolute commiſſion for Murray to act as regent, without any mention of a council. The earls of Athol and Marr, ſecretary Maitland, and Kirkaldy of Grainge, in great concern for the queen's life, ſent her their advice by ſir Robert Melvill, to ſign them, ſince no act that ſhe did under dureſs could be of any validity. Throgmorton ſent her the ſame advice in a letter which Melvill was prevailed upon to carry her, concealed in the ſcabbard of his ſword; but ſhe could not be perſuaded to follow it, till the ruffian Lindſey and his aſſociates came to her, who acted their parts with as much brutality as their principals could have wiſhed; and having terrified her almoſt out of her ſenſes, by their inhuman threats, ſhe ſubmitted to the neceſſity, and, with a flood of tears, which prevented her from reading a word of the contents, ſhe ſigned the inſtruments on the twenty-fourth of July; and theſe being preſented the next day to the pretended council of the faction, at Edinburgh, Morton accepted her reſignation, "in the name of the three eſtates of Scotland," from whom he had no powers, and who were not ſo much as mentioned in the inſtrument, the reſignation being made only in the prince's favour; a deviation from the commiſſion ſufficient, in law and equity, to invalidate the action, with all ſubſequent proceedings thereon. The unhappy queen however found means to convey to Throgmorton a letter to Elizabeth, wherein ſhe declared all that ſhe had done, as having been extorted from her by the terrors of immediate death.

In conſequence of this forced reſignation, the young prince, then about thirteen months old, was, five days afterwards, viz. on the twenty-ninth of July, proclaimed king, by the name of James VI. He was ſoon after crowned at Stirling, and the earl of Morton took in his name the coronation-oath, in which a promiſe to extirpate hereſy was not forgot. Some republican pretenſions in favour of the people's power were countenanced at the ceremony, and a coin was ſoon after ſtruck, on which the famous saying of Trajan was inscribed, "PRO ME, SI MEREOR, IN ME, — For me, if I deserve it, against me." Throgmorton had orders from his mistress, who was punctually informed of all these transactions, not to assist at the coronation of the king of Scotland; and a protestation was put in by the Hamiltons, that all this ought to be no prejudice to the duke of Chatelerault, in his right of succession over the family of Lenox.

* At the ſame time Buchanan publiſhed his elegant, but infamous, Latin pamphlet, De jure regni apud Scotos (Of the Scottiſh Government), wherein, contrary to all eſtabliſhed truth, he endeavours to prove, that the people have power to create and depoſe their king at will; and ſeeks to found facts which never exiſted, upon principles that never can be diſputed.

About the twelfth of August the earl of Murray returned out of France to Scotland, and, in a few days after his arrival, went to visit the queen in her prison, to whom he behaved with great harshness, upbraiding her for her supposed crimes and real inadvertencies, and talked to her (says Throgmorton, in one of his letters to Elizabeth) rather like a ghostly father than a counsellor. Sometimes the queen wept bitterly, sometimes she acknowleged her unadvisedness and misgovernment; and, looking for nothing less, at the hands of her rebellious lords, but an ignominious death, or perpetual confinement, she had recourse to her brother Murray, now as her only friend. This was the very point which the perfidious earl wanted to bring her, and he at last consented to stand her friend, but on condition that she should not attempt to regain her liberty, to meddle in the affairs of government, or to excite either the crowns of France or England to stir in her cause. It was no wonder if a princess surrounded, as Mary was, by mercileſs traitors, and fearing what they might do, from the experience of what they had done, was wrought to confess crimes they charged her with, of which perhaps she was never guilty, and to promise every thing that was required of her.

As to Murray, that he had held a private correspondence, not only with the Scottish rebels, but with Mary's enemies in England, appears very plain by a letter from Cecil to sir Henry Norris, the English resident in France, dated so far back as the twenty-sixth of June, part of which the reader will find in the note†: there is, moreover, great reason to suspect that he had other intentions of a very black nature; for, not to mention other particulars, he brought with him from France an agent, who offered the services of the French king to the lords, in case Elizabeth should proceed against them; but being denied access to Mary, the ambassador seemed very cold in soliciting: yet this very man (Murray) did the distressed broken-spirited queen, in one of his visits to her, beseech, with tears in her eyes, to take upon him the regency, the government of her son, and the custody of her jewels, which he accepted with an insolent condescension; and, upon a second visit, deigned to give her assurances of the preservation of her life and honour, but would promise nothing as to her liberty.

Murray being proclaimed regent, signed an instrument, by which he bound himself to do nothing which should concern either war or peace, the king's person, or his marriage, or the liberty of the queen, without the consent of the confederates; and then gave Throgmorton warning, by secretary Maitland, not to make any farther intercession for the queen's liberty, for that he, and the rest of the party, would run the hazard of all events rather then suffer it. He soon after convoked a parliament at Edinburgh, in which he broke, in the most public manner, all terms of decency with the unhappy Mary: for that assembly, after voting that she was undoubtedly an accomplice in her husband's murder, condemned her to imprisonment, ratified her demission of the crown, and acknowleged her son for king, and Murray for regent.

His power thus confirmed, Murray, who was a man of vigour and abilities, employed himself successfully in reducing the kingdom. He bribed sir James Balfour to surrender the castle of Edinburgh, which had hitherto held out for the queen; he constrained the garrison of Dunbar castle to open their gates, and he demolished that fortress. He signed a warrant for the execution of Dalgleish, Powry, and two others, servants of Bothwell, who had been taken, tried, and convicted of assisting in the king's murder: but it is not a little to Mary's honour, that, with their dying breath, they solemnly protested, before God and his angels, that they had heard Bothwell declare, that Murray and Morton were the contrivers of the murder, and that the queen was intirely innocent. This was a strong vindication of Mary, and did not fail to operate to such a degree amongst the wiser and more dutiful part of her subjects, that the conspirators had now no safety but in continuing her bondage. It is now time to turn to the affairs of England.

Towards the beginning of this year Elizabeth was alarmed with a copy of the league which has been already mentioned to have been signed by the Roman catholic powers, for the extirpation of the protestant religion: but the malignity of it was in a great measure diverted by the progress of the troubles in the Low Countries, of which we have, in the close of the last year, given some account.

Though the chief attention of Elizabeth, this year, was turned to the affairs of Scotland, yet she did not forget what was owing to her own and her subjects interests in other countries. The term of eight years since the treaty of Chateau Cambresis being now expired, sir Thomas Smith was sent over to Picardy, in April, with Winter, master of the ordnance, to demand the restitution of Calais, which they accordingly claimed by sound of trumpet, at one of the gates of that town, in presence of a public notary and several witnesses. But the French, without any regard to the faith of treaties to which their king had sworn, absolutely refused to restore that town to England: and Elizabeth, whose policy was to spin out a long and peaceable reign, if she could, by putting herself in a capacity to defend and maintain her possession of the throne against all attempts, did not care to be the aggressor, nor invade so powerful a neighbour as France; so the matter dropped for the present.

Whilst this matter was in agitation, the count de Stolberg came into England from the emperor Maximilian, to renew the treaty for a marriage between his brother the archduke Charles, and Eli-

† "At this time I send unto you certain pacquets of letters, left here by Mr. Melvill, who lately came hither from the queen of Scots. The sending of these to my lord of Murray requireth great haste, whereof you may not make the Scottish ambassador privy; but I think you may make Robert Stuart privy, with whom you may confer for the speedy sending away of the same letters. His return into Scotland is much desired of them, and for the weal both of England and Scotland. I wish he was here (i. e. in England.) And for his manner of returning, touching his safety, I pray require Mr. Stuart to have a good care." Cabala.

zabeth, who, either to pleaſe her ſubjects, or from ſome other political view, ſeemed to favour the motion. The earl of Suſſex, who had been juſt before ſent to inveſt the emperor with the order of the Garter, did all in his power to farther this match; but it was as ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the earl of Leiceſter, with reaſons drawn from the inconveniencies of engaging in ſo cloſe an alliance with a foreigner, which he ſaid England had ſo ſeverely experienced in the late reign: in a word, this treaty, which had been carrying on, at different times, for ſeven years, was, after long debates touching the maintenance of Charles, his aſſuming the title of King, and the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion, was now entirely broken off, on account of the difference in point of religion; and the archduke ſoon after married Mary, daughter to Albert V. duke of Bavaria.

In this ſame year (1567) John Baſilowitz, grand-duke of Muſcovy (ſince called Ruſſia), ſent ambaſſadors to queen Elizabeth, with propoſals of a league offenſive and defenſive, and to renew and confirm the privileges he had granted to the Engliſh Muſcovy company. But Elizabeth fearing ſuch a treaty of alliance might engage her in quarrels foreign to her intereſt, wiſely evaded the propoſal, and contented herſelf with ſending Anthony Jenkinſon (who had been for ſome years reſident in that country, and was the firſt Engliſhman who ventured through the Caſpian ſea into the territories of the Bactrians) back with the ambaſſador, giving him a commiſſion to execute ſome private treaties, by which means the Engliſh obtained ſeveral very valable privileges, and, amongſt others, an excluſive trade for the abovementioned company to Archangel.

Whilſt the queen was procuring advantages to her ſubjects in point of commerce, ſhe ſaw an happy end put to the dangerous commotions which had for ſome time diſturbed the peace of Ireland, and had coſt her great ſums to endeavour to ſuppreſs: this deſirable event was brought about by the vigilance, conduct, and valour of ſir Henry Sidney, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom.

Shan O' Neil had tyrannized over the inhabitants of Ulſter, reduced Armagh to aſhes, expelled Macguire from his paternal inheritance, ravaged the lands of Macguire, and others, who were under the protection of the Engliſh, and openly rebelled againſt Elizabeth: but upon his ſubmiſſion ſhe created him baron of Dungannon and earl of Tyrone. Not ſatisfied with theſe honours, he aſſembled an army of his vaſſals, aſſumed the title of King of Ulſter, and offered to hold the kingdom of Ireland under the ſovereignty of Mary, queen of Scotland. Randolph, a brave warrior, being ſent againſt him by the lord-lieutenant, routed him with great ſlaughter at Derry, though the victor loſt his life in the engagement. Shan fled to the bogs and faſtneſſes, while ſir Henry Sidney built ſome fortreſſes to ſtraiten him in his quarters, and re-eſtabliſhed O' Donnel, who had been driven from his country. But Sidney being called away, to compromiſe a quarrel between the earls of Ormond and Deſmond, Shan re-aſſembled a body of troops, and attacked Dundalk, from whence he was repulſed by the garriſon, though he carried off O' Donnel's wife, and retired to Clandeboy, to ſolicit the aſſiſtance of the Scottiſh Highlanders, who had formerly joined his adverſaries, and been defeated by his forces; he had even ſlain two brothers of the Highland chieftain's, who received him with ſeeming courtſey; but whether they had determined to make away with him, or he provoked them over his cups with brutal language touching the chaſtity, of their mother, they ſlew him with all his company. Though he left two legitimate ſons, his eſtate was confiſcated by the Iriſh parliament, and Tirlogh O' Neil was, by the queen's permiſſion, elected chief of the ſept, by the appellation of O' Neil. Nevertheleſs, as a check upon this new chief, ſhe received into favour Shan's nephew Hugh, baron of Dungannon, a young man of a very intriguing genius. The diſorders of Ulſter being thus appeaſed, the quarrel between the earls of Ormond and Deſmond, who had fought a battle near Dromiſh, was partly quieted by the authority of the lord-lieutenant, who was afterwards obliged to ſurprize Deſmond and his uncle, near Killmalloc, and ſend them priſoners to England.

This year, on the eighth of June, ſir Thomas Sackville, anceſtor to the preſent duke of Dorſet, was created baron of Buckhurſt. And the duke of Norfolk, who was alſo greatly in favour with the queen, loſt his ducheſs this year; ſhe was his third wife, and he had not lived with her above twelve months; her name was Elizabeth, ſhe was daughter of ſir Francis Leybourne, knight, and widow of Thomas, lord Dacres, of Gilleſland: by her death the duke unfortunately ſaw himſelf in a condition to form projects which proved his deſtruction.

The affairs of the Low Countries were much altered during this year. The great men were divided, and ſeveral had betrayed the common cauſe. The prince of Orange was withdrawn to his government, count Horn to his own town, and count Egmont continued with the governeſs, who, improving the diſſenſion, revoked whatever ſhe had been obliged to grant to the reformed. Then ſhe ſent for forces out of Germany, and raiſed ſome Walloon regiments. Soon after Philip II. reſolved to ſend the duke of Alva into the Low Countries, with an army of native Spaniards, to chaſtize both the nobles and the people: whereupon the prince of Orange retiring into Germany, the duke of Alva entered the country at the head of his army, without any oppoſition. On his arrival at Bruſſels, the ducheſs of Parma put the government into his hands, and then the duke exerciſed cruelties which it is needleſs to relate, ſince they are univerſally known: the counts of Egmont and Horn loſt their lives by the hands of the executioner, whilſt Montigny ſuffered the ſame puniſhment in Spain, and all the prince of Orange's lands were confiſcated.

On the other hand, the court of France, under colour of fearing the duke of Alva, who was to paſs near their frontiers, levied ſix thouſand Switzers, with deſign to extirpate the Huguenots, whilſt the duke of Alva ſhould do the ſame in the Netherlands, purſuant to the agreement at Bayonne. It is eaſy to ſee, that at ſuch a juncture Elizabeth could not attempt the recovery of Calais; it was ſufficient if ſhe could avert the flames which threatened England. Mean while the prince of Condé, having difficultly eſcaped the ſnares of the court, re-aſſembled the Huguenots, by the admiral's aſſiſtance, and had very near ſucceeded in his deſign of carrying off the king at Meaux. After that diſappointment, he went and blocked up Paris.

In

In ſhort, on the tenth of November was fought, at the gates of Paris, a battle, wherein the conſtable de Montmorency was ſlain. This action not being deciſive, the prince marched to meet Caſimir, count Palatine, who was bringing him a reinforcement of three thouſand foot and ſix thouſand five hundred horſe: in September, la Noue, one of the chiefs of the Huguenots, took Orleans. Thus all the neighbouring countries of England, namely, Scotland, France, and the Low Countries, were in trouble and confuſion, whilſt the Engliſh, by the wiſe management of the queen, enjoyed a profound peace.

It was, however, at the expence of her own, that Elizabeth ſecured the repoſe of her people. She had to fear both at home and abroad, and conſequently was obliged to attend perpetually as well to foreign as domeſtic affairs, in order to prevent the deſigns of her enemies. The ſtate of the Huguenots in France made her very uneaſy; their enemies were likewiſe her's, and as there was little appearance of their withſtanding the catholics, who were an hundred to one, and ſupported by the royal authority, ſhe was apprehenſive that, after their extirpation, the ſtorm would fall upon England. It was ſcarce to be doubted that the war which was waging at once with the proteſtants of France and the Low Countries, was the effect of the mutual councils of the French and Spaniſh courts, and that the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion was the principal object theſe two courts had in view; Elizabeth therefore thought it abſolutely neceſſary to let the king of France know ſhe was concerned for the preſervation of the Huguenots, whatever reaſon ſhe might have to complain of their behaviour to her. To that purpoſe ſhe ordered Norris, her ambaſſador to Charles IX. to intercede earneſtly for them, and give him to underſtand ſhe knew her own intereſt too well to ſuffer them to be entirely ruined. Theſe threats from England, the reſolution of the Huguenots, and their aſſiſtance from Germany, produced a good effect, and procured them a peace; but it was only a treacherous peace, wherein the court intended only to deceive them, and which, for that reaſon, was afterwards called the Lame Peace. Catherine de Medici, knowing it would not be long before the war was rekindled, reſolved to be before-hand to prevent Elizabeth from aſſiſting the Huguenots. To that end ſhe began now to hint to the Engliſh ambaſſador a marriage between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, who was but ſeventeen years of age: but we ſhall have occaſion elſewhere to ſpeak of the ſequel of this project.

Philip, who was now become an implacable foe to Elizabeth, as well on account of the zeal ſhe had ſhewn for the reſtoration of the reformed religion, as through reſentment of her refuſal of him for her huſband, took this opportunity to ſhew his enmity againſt her, by confining her ambaſſador, Mann, on ſome frivolous pretence, to his own houſe. On the other hand, ſir John Hawkins, an Engliſh merchant, who was gone to trade in the Bay of Mexico, with five ſhips, by virtue of the treaty between Charles V. and Henry VIII. was inſulted by the Spaniſh fleet, which took and rifled three of his ſhips. Theſe outrages were very grievous to Elizabeth, eſpecially as the merchants loudly murmured, and were importunate for a war with Spain; but ſhe did not think proper then to ſhew her reſentment, for fear of being engaged farther than the ſituation of her affairs would permit. She had the more reaſon not to enter into a war of this nature, as at the ſame time the affairs of Scotland, which touched her more nearly, took a new turn, and might be to her of very great conſequence.

While Mary continued in priſon at Lochleven, ſhe found means ſo far to mollify the hearts of her jailors, that, on Lady-day, 1568, ſome of them undertook to favour her eſcape, which ſhe attempted in the habit of a laundreſs; but one of the boatmen diſcovered her by the whiteneſs of her hand, which ſhe put up to prevent her muffiers from dropping from her face: the fellows were ſo honeſt to their maſter, the keeper of the caſtle, as to row her back, notwithſtanding her commands, but ſo humane to her as to conceal her attempt, notwithſtanding their danger in ſo doing. Murray, on his part, was too ſecure to give much heed to the repeated advertiſement he received of Mary's meditating an eſcape, and had the inſolence to refuſe a new ambaſſador from France, one Beaumont, a man of great quality, admiſſion to her.

Mary's next attempt, however, proved more ſucceſsful. She found means, by her charms and careſſes, to gain the confidence of Charles Douglas (brother to William Douglas, lord of the caſtle and iſle to which ſhe was confined), a youth only in the eighteenth year of his age, who, unable to reſiſt the temptation of ſo much beauty, ſuing to him in diſtreſs, yielded to her importunities, and drew others into a plot to effect her flight; and on Sunday, the ſecond day of May, while his brother was at ſupper, and the reſt of the family engaged in their devotions, he ſtole the keys out of his brother's chamber, and opening the gates to the queen and one of her maids, locked them behind her, and threw the keys into the loch; then getting into a ſmall boat, rowed her to the ſhore, where, upon a ſignal given (and previouſly concerted) the lord Seaton, James Hamilton of Rochbank, and John Bethune of Pillochie, came down to the ſhore, with a few ſervants, and received the queen with the utmoſt tranſports of joy. She inſtantly mounted on horſeback, and rode towards Hamilton, where ſhe was ſoon joined by numbers of the nobility, with their friends and dependants. A bond of aſſociation was formed for her defence, and ſigned by the earls of Argyll, Huntley, Eglinton, Crawfurd, Caſſils, Roſs, Montroſe, Sutherland, Errol, nine biſhops, the ſame number of barons, and a great poſſe of the moſt conſiderable gentry: and in a few days ſhe found herſelf at the head of an army amounting to no leſs than ſix thouſand men.

So ſudden a revolution in favour of a princeſs, who, but a day before, ſeemed abandoned to all the world, and doomed to drag out the remains of a wretched life in a loathſome priſon, may ſeem to border upon the romantic; it may therefore be neceſſary to aſſign the cauſes which apparently produced this unforeſeen effect. It muſt be obſerved then, that, notwithſtanding the univerſal ſubmiſſion which was paid to the regent's authority, there ſtill remained in the kingdom many ſecret murmurs and cabals: the friends of the houſe of Hamilton conſidered Murray's promotion to the regency as an injury to the duke of Chatelerault, who, as firſt prince of the blood, had, in their opinion, the beſt title to that office: all thoſe who leaned to the ancient opinions in religion, were naturally inclined to favour the intereſts of Mary; and even the people in general, though they had formerly deteſted her crime, or condemned her imprudence, in being ſo cloſely connected with Bothwell, the murderer of her huſband, now that obnoxious perſon was removed, began to be touched with pity for the unhappy condition of their impriſoned ſovereign, and lamented that a perſon, endowed with ſo many amiable qualities, and poſſeſſed of ſuch high dignity, ſhould be ſubjected to ſuch hard and ſevere treatment. Moved by theſe conſiderations, many of the principal nobility began to aſſemble at Hamilton, and to concert meaſures for ſupporting the cauſe of their oppreſſed ſovereign. Such was the favourable diſpoſition of the nation towards Mary, when ſhe received her liberty in a manner no leſs ſurprizing to her friends, than unexpected by and mortifying to her enemies.

Among the firſt ſteps that Mary took, after her eſcape, ſhe diſpatched Bethune, a perſon of abilities, and one who had been very inſtrumental in her releaſe, with a letter to Elizabeth, to acquaint her with the tranſaction, and to demand of her a body of forces to act againſt her rebel ſubjects: but as Bethune was ordered, after having obtained an audience of Elizabeth, to proceed to France, to aſk an aid from that king likewiſe, Elizabeth thought proper to ſend Leighton, a gentleman of her court, to Scotland, to aſſure Mary of her readineſs to aſſiſt her, both with her good offices in the way of mediation between her and the male-contents, and with a body of forces if the exigence of circumſtances ſhould require it; but, as ſhe was afraid of the entrance of French troops into a kingdom ſo nearly bordering on her own, ſhe begged that the difference between Mary and her ſubjects might be left entirely to her arbitration, and that no foreign ſuccours might be invited or ſuffered to enter into Scotland.

The intention of Mary was to avail herſelf of the general good diſpoſition of her ſubjects in her favour, and to have retired to the ſtrong caſtle of Dunbarton, there to wait till ſhe could be either reſtored to her throne in a parliamentary way, or be reinforced from England or France, ſo as to cruſh the oppoſition: ſhe had even taken ſome ſteps towards bringing on a treaty with Murray, by means of ſecretary Maitland and Kirkaldy of Grainge; and had alſo employed Beaumont, the French ambaſſador, for that purpoſe: but Murray refuſing to hearken to any terms that were to diveſt him of his ill-aſſumed power, every thing was prepared by both parties to decide matters by a battle. The regent could get together no more than four thouſand men; but notwithſtanding that his army was ſo inferior in number to that of the queen of Scots, he took the field againſt her; a battle was fought, on the thirteenth of May, at Langſide, near Glaſgow, which was intirely deciſive in favour of the aſſociated lords, and the queen's troops were entirely diſcomfited.

Mary was ſo diſpirited with this event, which ſhe looked upon as the deſtruction of her laſt reſerve, that ſhe loſt her uſual courage, and, with a few friends, betook herſelf to flight, not ſtopping till ſhe arrived on the borders of England. Here ſhe held a conſultation about the courſe ſhe ought to purſue, and which, in all probability, would determine her future happineſs or miſery. It was probably the late good offices done this princeſs by Elizabeth, in ſending Throgmorton to ſolicit for her liberty, and the aſſurance given Bethune, which, with her own unwillingneſs to diſoblige the queen of England by retiring elſewhere for ſuccour, and the hopes of forming a ſtrict friendſhip with her, determined Mary to take refuge in England, contrary (as the Scottiſh writers ſay) to the opinion of the wiſeſt of her ſervants: but, however it was, the reſolution ſeems to have been taken on a ſudden, for, on the fifteenth of May, the ſecond day only after the battle, the lord Herries wrote to Lowther, deputy-governor of Carliſle, to know whether the queen of Scots, his ſovereign, might come ſafely to Carliſle, if ſhe ſhould be forced to ſeek refuge in England? But the next day, without waiting for an anſwer to this letter, ſhe embarked herſelf, with that lord and a retinue of ſixteen perſons, and landed at Warkington, in Cumberland; from thence ſhe was conducted to Cockermouth, and remained there till Lowther, aſſembling all the gentry of the country, attended her in an honourable manner to the caſtle of Carliſle.

Mary, the ſame day ſhe landed on Engliſh ground, wrote a letter to Elizabeth, acquainting her with her misfortune in loſing the battle of Langſide, of having taken refuge in her territories, and deſiring liberty to viſit her good ſiſter (as ſhe called her), and ſoliciting that aid and aſſiſtance which her former profeſſions of friendſhip gave her reaſon to expect. The lord Herries was the bearer of this letter, and was charged by his miſtreſs to deliver into Elizabeth's own hand the very ring ſhe had formerly ſent Mary as a pledge of her ſiſterly affection and readineſs to aſſiſt her on all occaſions.

Had Elizabeth been left on the preſent occaſion to follow the natural bent of her own mind, the manner in which ſhe received this letter ſeemed to ſhew that ſhe would willingly have complied with the requeſt of the Scottiſh queen; but, from ſuch a reſolution, which indeed would have been more generous than prudent, ſhe was ſoon diverted by the remonſtrances of Cecil: however, ſhe determined to proceed in a ſeemingly friendly, but really cautious, manner with the queen of Scots; and ſoon after the receipt of her letter, ſhe diſpatched the lord Scroop, warden of the Marches, and ſir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain, to pay her compliments to Mary; but, as the event proved, to detain that princeſs by fair words, in order to gain time for conſultation, and improve this misfortune of her ſiſter-queen to her own advantage. In the mean time Mary was treated according to her high birth and royalty; but, for ſecurity ſake, ſhe was, on the ſixteenth of June, removed from Carliſle, and lodged at Bolton, a place of more ſecurity, under the cuſtody of lord Scroop.

The privy-council being aſſembled, great debates enſued concerning the manner how to proceed with the fugitive queen: to detain her in England had many miſchiefs attending it, to ſend her into France as many, to ſend her back into Scotland ſtill more; at length, however, it was reſolved by the majority to have her detained, as one taken by right of war, and not to be diſmiſſed till ſhe had made ſatisfaction for aſſuming the title and arms of England, and for the death of her huſband Darnley, who was born a ſubject of the queen of England. Leiceſter, the moment that Mary's misfortunes commenced, became her moſt mortal enemy, and Cecil had been ſo from the beginning. It is plain, from the foregoing account, that Mary had entered England without Elizabeth's leave, or any ſafe-conduct; hence the majority of the council were of opinion, that ſhe thereby became a priſoner. It cannot be denied that a ſovereign has power to ſeize a foreign prince who enters his dominions without a ſafe-conduct; but there are caſes wherein ſtrict right becomes the greateſt injuſtice: ſuch was that of Henry IV. with regard to the prince of Scotland, afterwards James IV. but in Mary's caſe the circumſtances appeared ſtill more favourable; ſhe had been driven out of her own kingdom by her rebellious ſubjects, and forced to take the ſhelter neareſt at hand; and as ſhe not only was in peace with England, but had received good offices from Elizabeth, that opinion was as contrary to the law of nations, as to the dictates of humanity.

It is hard to ſay what Elizabeth's ſecret reſolutions were, after hearing the debates of her council; they probably were not favourable to Mary, for that princeſs having wrote a ſecond letter of ſupplication to Elizabeth, to be admitted to her preſence, or to be permitted to depart the realm, the queen returned for anſwer, "that as ſhe (Mary) ſtood charged by the voice of the public with being privy to the murder of the king her huſband, or at leaſt with not cauſing ſtrict enquiry to be made after the murderers, and with keeping ſtill about her perſon, or in her ſervice, ſuch as were accuſed of being accomplices, ſhe could not ſee her till ſhe had cleared herſelf of ſo heinous an accuſation; and deſired to know in what manner ſhe intended to juſtify herſelf."

Mary, upon receiving this letter, perceived that Elizabeth expected ſhe was to clear her honour in a formal legal way, and before commiſſioners. This filled her with ſurprize and apprehenſion, and ſhe could not help expreſſing herſelf as highly offended (in a letter ſhe wrote to Elizabeth) that her good ſiſter would not hear the cauſe herſelf, but refer her, who was an abſolute prince, to ſubjects, whoſe proceedings ſhe had no reaſon to abide by. However, as ſhe ſaw no other method of extricating herſelf from her preſent difficulties, ſhe ſent the lord Herries with another letter to Elizabeth, wherein ſhe declared that ſhe would willingly vindicate herſelf to her ſiſter from all imputations, and would ſubmit her cauſe to the cognizance of ſo good a friend.

Elizabeth, taking Mary at her word, offered to ſend two noblemen as her commiſſioners, to hear the mutual charges between her and her ſubjects. The noblemen named were the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Suſſex, and to them, becauſe of his knowlege in Scottiſh affairs, was added ſir Ralph Sadler. Elizabeth then wrote to Murray, in a very peremptory manner, to deſiſt from any farther hoſtilities againſt the queen of Scotland's party, and to appear in perſon to juſtify his conduct with regard to his ſovereign, before the commiſſioners, who were to ſit at York, on the fourth of October following.

Murray was ſomewhat ſurprized at a meſſage which had ſo much the appearance of a command; but he had from the beginning been the abject ſlave of England, and as his domeſtic enemies were many and powerful, and Elizabeth was the only ally upon whom he could depend, he was determined to digeſt the affront, rather than forfeit the friendſhip of the queen by a refuſal. Accordingly, in ſpite of the remonſtrances of Maitland, and ſeveral of the moſt judicious of his party, who repreſented to him the the diſhonour it would bring upon himſelf and country, to accuſe his lawful native ſovereign, in a judicial way, before foreigners, profeſſed enemies of the Scottiſh nation, he, on the eighteenth of September, paſſed a commiſſion under the great-ſeal, empowering himſelf, James, earl of Morton, Adam, biſhop of Orkney, the lord Lindſey, and the abbot of Dumfermlin, to appear as delegates from the king of Scotland; to whom were added, as aſſiſtants, Maitland of Ledington, James M'Gill, a Scottiſh lawyer, Henry Balnaves, the laird of Lochleven, George Buchanan, the hiſtorian, and Mr. David Lindſey. The commiſſioners named by the queen of Scotland were the biſhop of Roſs, the lords Boyd, Livingſton, and Herries, Cowan, abbot of Killwinning, ſir John Gordon, of Lochinvar, and ſir James Cockburn, of Stirling. But it is now proper to attend other affairs, which, having a great influence on Elizabeth's proceedings towards Mary, are neceſſary to be premiſed in this place.

After the convention patched up between the queen-mother of France and the proteſtants, the civil war, towards the end of the laſt year, broke out more furiouſly than ever in that kingdom. The court of France made diſpoſitions for ſeizing the perſons of the chiefs of the Huguenot party; but they were ſo much upon their guard that they made their eſcape to Rochelle, as the cardinal Chaſtillon did his, in the habit of a ſailor, to England, where he managed the affairs of his party with Elizabeth. The prince of Condé having brought the queen of Navarre and her young ſon (afterwards the great Henry IV.) to declare themſelves in favour of the Huguenots, ſoon after took the field, and the beginning of the year was ſpent in a variety of military operations, not much to the advantage of either party. The queen-mother in the mean time renewed her propoſal, through Norris, the Engliſh reſident at the court of France, for a marriage between Elizabeth and her ſon the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. then only ſeventeen years of age, and far from being a bigot to any religion. Elizabeth, for certain reaſons, did not ſeem to diſcourage this motion; and the prince of Condé, fearing her ſteadineſs, in September this year, diſpatched Cavaignes, one of his friends, into England, with ſuch inſtructions as were moſt likely to bring Elizabeth over to his party. Cavaignes exerted himſelf ſo effectually, that he entirely fixed Elizabeth in the reſolution of powerfully aſſiſting the proteſtant cauſe in France, and ſhe agreed to pay the prince of Condé one hundred thouſand crowns, and to lend him a good train of artillery, with ammunition. At the ſame time, perceiving that the proteſtants were debarred in France from the exerciſe of their religion, ſhe offered a ſafe retreat to the Huguenots in England: upon which many of the principal manufacturers came over hither, who were kindly received, and permitted to ſettle at Norwich, Colcheſter, Sandwich, Maidſtone, and Southampton, to the inexpreſſible improvement of the Engliſh woollen manufactures; for they were the firſt who brought into the nation the art of making bays, ſays, and other light ſtuffs, to which we were before ſtrangers.

The

The conduct of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands was equally alarming to Elizabeth as was that of the court of France: he had now eſtabliſhed the court of Inquiſition, he had aboliſhed all the privileges of the inhabitants and nobility of the Low Countries, he ruled them by Spaniſh laws, and omitted no occaſion of perſecuting with the utmoſt cruelty all whom he ſuſpected of favouring the reformed religion, in order to extirpate proteſtantiſm in thoſe provinces, and render Philip abſolute there. The prince of Orange had raiſed an army in Germany, with which he marched to ſupport the proteſtants; but the duke of Alva took ſuch precautions, and the prince's army was ſo ill paid, that he was obliged to take ſhelter in France.

Theſe proceedings convinced Elizabeth that ſhe had nothing to expect from France and Spain but to be attacked alſo in her own dominions by their united forces, ſhould ſhe ſuffer the proteſtants to be deſtroyed, and put her upon a reſolution to aid them as above, and to ſeize upon a great ſum of money which was on board ſome veſſels of Biſcay, that had been driven by ſtreſs of weather, or otherwiſe, into ſome of the Engliſh ports, and which the cardinal de Chaſtillon offered to prove not to belong to the king of Spain, but to certain private merchants, who deſigned the money to be employed by the duke of Alva to the ruin of the proteſtant cauſe. The ſeizure of this treaſure ſo exaſperated the duke, that, though Elizabeth promiſed to repay it, with intereſt, as ſoon as it ſhould be made appear, by good proofs, to belong to the king of Spain, he ſeized all the effects of the Engliſh within his power, and ſent their perſons to priſon; which was returned on the part of Elizabeth by the like treatment of the Flemings in England. De Speſi, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, behaving on this occaſion with great indecency, and even reflecting perſonally on the queen herſelf, this, joined with the treatment which Mr. Mann had received in Spain, exaſperated Elizabeth ſo much that ſhe ordered de Speſi to be confined to his own houſe, under a guard.

On the fourth of October, Elizabeth's commiſſioners and thoſe of queen Mary had their firſt meeting, and both parties produced and exchanged copies of their powers. But the duke of Norfolk, who is ſaid, about this time, to have conceived hopes of gaining the queen of Scots in marriage, ſo managed Murray and his aſſiſtants in private, that by his perſuaſions they refuſed to produce their allegations againſt their queen, till Elizabeth had given them a formal promiſe under her hand, to paſs ſentence as ſoon as the proofs ſhould be produced, and to ſupport the king of Scotland's party, in caſe the queen his mother was found guilty; alleging their apprehenſions that Elizabeth had only in view to make the troubles of Scotland ſubſervient to her own ends.

Mary, on her part, endeavoured to ward off their proceedings, by a meſſage to queen Elizabeth, which the lord Herries delivered in theſe moſt preſſing terms.

"Madam,

"The queen, my miſtreſs, who is nothing ſubject to you, but by misfortune, does deſire that you would conſider, that it is a work of evil example, and moſt pernicious conſequence, to give way that her rebellious ſubjects ſhould be heard againſt her; who, not being able to deſtroy her by arms, do promiſe themſelves to aſſaſſinate her even in your own breaſt, under colour of juſtice. Madam, conſider the ſtate of worldly affairs, and ſhew ſome compaſſion to the calamities of your poor ſuppliant. After the moſt horrid attempt upon the king, her huſband, the murder of her ſervants, and the cruel deſign on her ſacred perſon; after ſo many priſons and chains, the ſubjects are heard before their queen; the rebels againſt their lawful miſtreſs; the guilty againſt the innocent; and the felons againſt their judge. Where are we? or what do we do? Though nature hath planted us in the extremities of all the earth, yet hath ſhe not taken the ſenſe of humanity from us. Conſider, ſhe is your own blood, your neareſt kinſwoman, one of the beſt of queens in the world, for whom you are preparing bloody ſcaffolds, and that in a place where ſhe was promiſed, and expected, greateſt favours. I want words to expreſs ſo barbarous a deed. But I am ready to come to the effects, and juſtify the innocence of my queen, by witneſſes unreproveable, and by papers written and ſubſcribed by the hands of the accuſers. If this will not ſuffice, I offer myſelf, by your majeſty's permiſſion, to fight hand to hand, for the honour of my queen, againſt the moſt hardy and reſolute of thoſe who are her accuſers. In this I do aſſure myſelf of your equity, and that you will not deny this favour unto her, who will acknowlege herſelf obliged to your bounty."

This pathetic remonſtrance, however, produced very little effect upon Elizabeth or her counſellors, who had already planned out the track they meant to purſue. But Murray having now engaged in a correſpondence with the duke of Norfolk, and being gained over by his arguments, Maitland, his ſecretary, the captive queen's friend, and privy to the reſolution which had been formed of effecting a marriage between Norfolk and his miſtreſs, to which Mary had ſhewn herſelf not at all averſe, was more explicit, and opened the congreſs with a ſpeech, directed to the regent and deputies of Scotland, telling them, "that whereas it appeared by the authority granted by the queen of England to her commiſſioners, that her whole deſign was to engage the Scots to throw a blemiſh on the reputation of their king's mother, they would therefore do well to conſider carefully beforehand, what hazard they expoſed themſelves to, and how they would draw upon themſelves the reſentment of the queen, her relations, and friends, and the indignation of all Europe, ſhould they impeach her of a crime which muſt ſtain her honour, and in ſo public a manner, before the Engliſh, the profeſſed enemies of Scotland: what account would they be able to give their king, when he came of age, of a charge ſo bold and diſhonourable to the king, to his mother, and to the whole nation? He therefore, for his part, thought it neceſſary to wave ſo ſcandalous an accuſation; or, if they would proceed, it was requiſite at leaſt that the queen of England ſhould expreſly engage to aſſiſt them againſt ſuch as ſhould hereafter give them any diſturbance upon this account."

This ſpeech produced the deſired effect; the regent and deputies acquieſced in Maitland's advice, and it is probable would never have departed from this reſolution, had not Mary been weak enough to talk of the duke of Norfolk's friendſhip, and proceedings ceedings at York in her favour, which reaching the ears of Cecil, he cauſed the congreſs to be removed from York to Weſtminſter, and from thence to Hampton-court, under a new commiſſion, which opened a way to gain Murray over to Elizabeth's will, and in the end proved the ruin both of the duke and queen Mary.

This management ſucceeded to the wiſh of Elizabeth; Murray now thought that his beſt courſe was to link himſelf with Cecil more cloſely than ever, and wholly to throw himſelf upon Elizabeth's generoſity: accordingly, on the twenty-ſixth day of November, he firſt entered a proteſtation, containing his reaſons for delaying to charge Mary home with her huſband's death, and his unwillingneſs to do it then, were it not that he could not by any other means vindicate himſelf from her charge, which had made impreſſions upon Elizabeth, and her council, very much to his prejudice. This proteſtatoin was attended by an additional article of accuſation againſt Mary, called by the Scots an Eik, and was as follows.

"The accuſation againſt queen Mary, entitled, An Eik to the anſwer preſented by us, James, earl of Murray, and regent of the realm of Scotland, and remanent commiſſioners, appointed for the king's majeſty of Scotland, our ſovereign lord, in his highneſs's behalf, and for ourſelves and remanent ſtates and people, his majeſty's obedient and faithful ſubjects, to the letter preſented to your grace the lords commiſſioners for the queen's majeſty of England, at York, on behalf of the queen, mother to our ſaid ſovereign lord, preſented the twenty-ſixth of November, 1568.

"Whereas in our former, upon good reſpects mentioned in our proteſtation, we kept back the chiefeſt cauſes and grounds whereupon our actions and whole proceedings were founded, wherewithout ſeeing our adverſaries will not ſubmit themſelves, but by their obſtinate and earneſt preſſing we are compelled, for juſtifying of our cauſe, to manifeſt the naked truth; it is certain, and we boldly and conſtantly affirm, that as James, ſome time earl of Bothwell, was the chief executor of the horrible and unworthy murder, perpetrate in the perſon of unquile (deceaſed) king Henry, of good memory, father to our ſovereign lord, and the queen's lawful huſband, ſo was ſhe of the foreknowlege, even to counſel, deviſe, perſuade, and commander of the ſaid murder to be done, maintainer and fortifier of the executors thereof, by impeding and ſtopping the inquiſition and puniſhment due for the ſame, according to the laws of the realm; and conſequently by marriage with the ſaid James, ſome time earl of Bothwell, declared and unanſwerably eſteemed chief author of the above-named murder. Wherethrough they began to uſe and exerciſe an uncouth and cruel tyranny in the whole ſtate of the commonwealth; and with the firſt (as will appear by their proceeding) intended to cauſe the innocent prince, now our ſovereign lord, ſhortly to follow his father, and to transfer the crown from the right line to a bloody murderer and godleſs tyrant. In which reſpect the eſtates of the realm of Scotland, finding her unworthy to regiment (i. e. govern), diſcerned her demiſſion of the crown, with the coronation of our ſovereign lord, and eſtabliſhing the regiment of that realm in the perſon of me, the earl of Murray, during his highneſs's minority, to be lawfully, ſufficiently, and righteouſly done, as in the acts and laws made thereupon more largely is contained.

James, regent.
Patrick, lord Lindſey. Morton.
Ad. Orchad. Dumfurline."

Copies of this eik being given to Mary's commiſſioners, ſome days paſſed before they made any anſwer, becauſe of the delicacy of the ſubject: at laſt, on the firſt of December, they attended the commiſſion; and both the biſhop of Roſs and the lord Herries, by their ſpeeches, very properly took notice, that the matter had taken a new turn, and that the nature of the commiſſioners proceedings were altered; becauſe, hitherto, Mary had been the accuſer of Murray, but Murray was now of her: they therefore demanded, in the name of their miſtreſs, that Murray ſhould now in perſon clear himſelf before Elizabeth, her nobility, and all foreign ambaſſadors; and that in the mean while, the parties who had ſubſcribed the eik, ſhould be put under arreſt till the matter ſhould be tried; when it was promiſed to throw the whole blame of Mary's accuſation on Murray and his colleagues.

Elizabeth found herſelf under inexpreſſible difficulties at this demand; but found means to ſhift it off by numberleſs evaſions; which Mary's commiſſioners perceiving, and underſtanding Elizabeth's drift, they, on the ſixth of December, entered a proteſt, that they would proceed no farther, unleſs Mary might be permitted to anſwer for herſelf: they alſo farther excepted againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners, and required that the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors might be added to them: nothing of all which Elizabeth could conſent to.

The neceſſary conſequence of the queen of Scots revoking the powers of her commiſſioners, and refuſing to give any anſwer to Murray's charge, ſeemed to be, that there could be no farther proceedings in the trial: but though this ſilence might be interpreted as a preſumption againſt her, it did not fully anſwer the purpoſe of thoſe Engliſh miniſters (Cecil and Leiceſter in particular) who were the enemies of that princeſs; they ſtill deſired to have in their hands proofs of her guilt, and, in order to draw them with decency from the regent, a farce was now acted, which had been planned out by Elizabeth for that very purpoſe. Murray was called before the Engliſh commiſſioners, and ſharply reproved, in the queen's name, for the atrocious imputations which he and his aſſociates had the temerity to throw upon their ſovereign; at the ſame time telling them, that though they had ſo far forgot the duty of allegiance to their prince, the queen would never forget the love of a good ſiſter, and of a good neighbour and friend towards the queen of Scotland; and ſhe therefore demanded to know what they could ſay in their own juſtification.

Murray, thus urged, proceeded to produce the proofs of his charge againſt the queen of Scotland, and, among the reſt, ſome love-letters and ſonnets of her's, to Bothwell, wrote all in her own hand, and two other papers, one wrote in her own hand, another ſigned by her and wrote by the earl of Huntley, each of which contained a promiſe of marriage with Bothwell. There were other papers likewiſe, which, if not forged to anſwer the villainous purpoſe on foot, contained inconteſtible proofs of Mary's criminal correſpondence with Bothwell, of her conſent to her huſband's murder, and of her concurrence in that rape which Bothwell pretended to commit upon her.

We ſhall not take upon us to enter into a diſcuſſion of the authenticity of theſe letters, a ſubject which has furniſhed immenſe volumes from the pens of the different advocates; we ſhall only remark in general, that they were ſaid to have been intercepted during the ſiege of Edinburgh, by the earl of Morton, and that they all paſſed through that nobleman's hands, who was well known to be the leaſt ſcrupulous of all Mary's enemies; and that it even appears, at the time they were produced, Mary's commiſſioners were not ſo much as preſent; and that the collation between them and other letters of her writing, to prove the hand to be the ſame, was made at a time when no friend of Mary's was preſent. Surely now there was a fair opportunity here for Elizabeth, and Mary's other enemies, to have juſtified themſelves to all the world, by ſhewing her to be a monſter, as they could eaſily have done, had the letters produced been demonſtratively authentic!

This accuſation produced another proteſt from Mary's commiſſioners, on the ſixth of December, which ſhould ſeem to be a full vindication of Mary as to the charge brought againſt her by ſome authors, as if ſhe had declined to put in any anſwer to the regent's accuſation, or to have the matter farther tried, from a conſciouſneſs of her own guilt, and an intention to ſtop all enquiry concerning the genuineneſs of the letters and papers produced againſt her. After recapitulating the many ſteps they had taken to have this matter brought to a full hearing, and Mary to be confronted by her accuſers, which had been conſtantly denied them, even though they had offered to enter deeper into the mattert than Murray himſelf had propoſed, they go on thus:

"Becauſe we could not obtain a direct anſwer to our petition and ſupplication (for the queen of Scots to be admitted to Elizabeth's preſence) the deſire thereof being ſo reaſonable, we did ſignify to her majeſty, like as we now preſently do to your honours, conform to our commiſſion and inſtruction, that we conſent on no wiſe that any farther ſhould be proceeded in this conference, nor yet our ſovereign's diſobedient and rebellious ſubjects be heard, to give in any pretended probation for proving of their ſaid intended addition unto the time that the queen's highneſs, our ſovereign, was preſent and had conform to the deſire of our ſaid ſupplication. And we alſo ſolemnly do proteſt, in caſe your lordſhips proceed in the contrary, that whatſoever has been, or ſhall be done hereafter, ſhall not prejudice any manner of way our miſtreſs and ſovereign's honour, perſon, crown, and ſtate; and for our part diſſolves and diſcharges this preſent conference, having ſpecial command thereto by our ſaid ſoverign, in caſe aforeſaid. And alſo in reſpect that if her own preſence was admitted (as all reaſon requires) her highneſs would not alennerly declare her innocence to the ſatisfaction of the queen's majeſty, and all Chriſtian princes, but alſo would make her rebellious ſubjects, for their heinous and ill deſervings, unworthy to compeer before any Chriſtian prince, to exhibit ſo contrived and invented allegations againſt their native ſovereign, as hereafter to the world ſhall plainly be known. And deſire, before any farther proceedings, this our preſent petition, proteſtation, and diſcharge, be inſerted in this conference; and that we have the doublet thereof authentically ſubſcribed for our warrant.

"Preſented and given into the queen's majeſty's commiſſioners of England, by the queen's highneſs commiſſioners of Scotland, at Weſtminſter, the ſixth day of December, in the year of God 1568, and ſubſcribed with their hands.

Jo. Roſs, Herries,
Boyd, Killwinning."

To ſay the truth, Mary's cauſe was plainly prejudged, ſince ſhe was required to anſwer in a corner to a charge of the blackeſt nature, and upon points in which her judges had declared themſelves to be againſt her; for, after her commiſſioners had proteſted againſt the conferences going on, unleſs ſhe was admitted to a public audience in perſon, Cecil and her enemies refuſed to treat any longer with them as her commiſſioners, but as her ſervants. There was, however, great formality, and great ſhew of impartiality preſerved in the proceedings of the other commiſſioners.

For Elizabeth, apprehenſive that her conduct towards Mary might be liable to ſome miſconſtruction, ſhe therefore reſolved to acquaint the moſt eminent of her court with all theſe tranſactions, and to convince them of the equity of her proceedings. She convened the members of her privy-council; and, in order to add to the ſolemnity of the ſcene, as well as to ſhew her candour and impartiality, ſhe joined with them the earls of Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Shrewſbury, Worceſter, Huntingdon, and Warwick.

The whole proctedings of the Engliſh commiſſioners were laid before them; the proofs adduced by Murray were examined: the authenticity of the love-letters and ſonnets was aſcertained by comparing the writing with that of ſeveral letters which Elizabeth had received from Mary: the refuſal of the queen of Scots commiſſioners to make any reply was mentioned: and after conſidering all theſe circumſtances, Elizabeth declared, that as ſhe had, at firſt judged it improper to favour Mary with a perſonal interview, until ſhe ſhould have cleared herſelf from the crimes of which her enemies accuſed her, ſo, now that her guilt was proved by ſo many plauſible evidences, and all anſwer denied, ſhe muſt, for her part, adhere to the ſame reſolution.

She then called in the queen of Scots commiſſioners, and after obſerving, that it would be more for the honour of their miſtreſs to continue the conferences, than to demand the liberty of vindicating herſelf in perſon; ſhe told them, that Mary might either tranſmit her anſwer by one of her own ſervants, or deliver it herſelf to ſome Engliſh nobleman, who ſhould attend her for that purpoſe: but as to her reſolution of giving no anſwer at all, ſhe muſt conſider it as the ſtrongeſt preſumption of her guilt; nor could they ever be her real friends who adviſed her to follow ſuch an imprudent courſe. In a few days after, ſhe wrote a letter to Mary herſelf, in which ſhe inſiſted on the ſame topic.

The queen of Scots had no other method to elude theſe preſſing inſtances, than ſtill to require the liberty of viſiting Elizabeth; a favour which ſhe knew knew would never be granted: both becauſe that expedient could be productive of no good effect, and becauſe it would bring matters to extremity, which Elizabeth, above all things, wanted to avoid.

Mean while, in order to keep herſelf in countenance, Mary had recourſe to another device. Even after the conference was entirely diſſolved, ſhe ordered her commiſſioners to accuſe the earl of Murray and his colleagues of the murder of the king: but this impeachment, exhibited ſo late, occaſioned merely by a complaint of Murray's, and ſupported by no kind of proof, could only be conſidered as an angry retaliation upon her enemy. She likewiſe required to have copies of the papers delivered by the regent; but as ſhe ſtill perſevered in her reſolution to make no reply, the demand was finally refuſed her.

The conference being now at an end, the regent was impatient to return into Scotland, where his enemies were endeavouring, in his abſence, to raiſe ſome commotions. Elizabeth therefore diſmiſſed him, after having gratified him with the ſum of five thouſand pounds, in order to defray the expence of this journey.

During the conference at York, the duke of Chatelerault arrived at London, in his way from France; and as the queen knew that he was ſtrongly attached to Mary's party, and had ſome claim to the regency of Scotland, ſhe detained him in England till after Murray's departure.

But notwithſtanding theſe inſtances of favour, and ſome other aſſiſtance which ſhe ſecretly afforded to Murray, ſhe could not be perſuaded to acknowlege the young king, or treat with Murray as regent of Scotland.

Murray having thus ſecured the friendſhip of Elizabeth, applied himſelf to re-eſtabliſh a good underſtanding with Mary likewiſe. The Hamiltons and the earl of Huntley were in arms in Scotland, and had taken poſſeſſion of Glaſgow, with a body of ſeven thouſand men, intending to march forward and to fight Murray as ſoon as he ſhould arrive. Murray apprehending the conſequences, before he ſet out ſent ſir Robert Melvill to Mary, to propoſe the marriage between her and the duke of Norfolk, and at the ſame time a ceſſation of all hoſtilities between the two parties in Scotland. Mary, though by this time fully acquainted with Norfolk's intentions, affected to be a ſtranger to the motion: ſhe expreſſed herſelf to be ready to agree to any match that ſhould be approved by her parliament, and to compromiſe matters with the rebels, but declined giving any definitive anſwer till ſhe was ſet at liberty and reſtored; however, ſhe condeſcended to ſend orders to the lords of her party to ſuſpend all hoſtilities againſt Murray till her farther orders; and thus he obtained a ſafe re-admiſſion into Scotland.

Mary now began to think her troubles were drawing to an end, but they were indeed only beginning. Elizabeth was exaſperated to the higheſt degree by ſome letters which Mary had wrote to her friends in Scotland, which, being intercepted, were put into the hands of the queen of England; and being informed that the pope was endeavouring to raiſe a rebellion in England in favour of Mary, by means of one Ridolfi, a Florentine merchant; on the eighteenth of January, 1569, ſhe ordered ſir Francis Knolles to remove his priſoner (for ſo we muſt henceforth call the unfortunate Mary) to Tutbury caſtle, in Staffordſhire, where ſhe was put under the cuſtody of George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury. But it is now time to attend other affairs.

The difference which had lately aroſe between Elizabeth and Philip II. of Spain, brought on not only that king's reſentment againſt the Engliſh merchants in Spain, and that of the duke of Alva in the Low Countries, but alſo put him upon ſeveral intrigues with her ſubjects, both in England and Ireland, in order to ſtir up a rebellion in both countries at a time; which being diſcovered to the queen by the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Ormond, to whom Philip had principally applied, the Engliſh, notwithſtanding no war was proclaimed, fitted out a prodigious number of privateers, with which they fell upon all Spaniſh merchant ſhips that came in their way, and did Philip's ſubjects ſo much damage by ſea, that Elizabeth found herſelf obliged to reſtrain their repriſals by proclamation, leſt ſhe ſhould thereby be forced into a formal war, which ſhe did not deſire. The vigorous ſupport which Elizabeth had given to the Huguenots in France, and the treaty which ſhe had made with the prince of Condé, had ſo diſobliged that court, that it had ordered its ſubjects to interrupt the intercourſe between England and Rochelle: this produced a kind of a piratical war between the two nations; but when Elizabeth found herſelf embroiled with Spain in the ſame manner, ſhe ordered a proclamation to be iſſued, "for admitting Frenchmen to traffic in England as heretofore, notwithſtanding the many great cauſes of offence ſhe had with that court, which ſhe had ſo greatly obliged, and whoſe king and miniſters ſhe hoped would amend."

While the commercial affairs of England were thus embroiled with France and Spain, they were not in a much better condition in Muſcovy, through the avarice of the Engliſh merchants, who had injured the czar Baſilowitz: but the queen ſpeedily ſent thither ſir Thomas Randolph (the ſame who had been her miniſter in Scotland) to make up matters; and though he had no commiſſion to treat of the favourite point which Baſilowitz had in view, namely, a treaty offenſive and defenſive with England, yet he managed affairs ſo well, that he obtained divers privileges for the Ruſſia company. Shortly after the czar ſent Andreas Gregorewitz Saviena his ambaſſador to the court of England, who was magnificently received by Elizabeth. According to Camden, ſhe gratified the czar, who, by his abominable cruelties, had rendered himſelf moſt hateful to his ſubjects, with a promiſe, if ever he ſhould have occaſion for it, of a ſafe retreat in England. This ſo pleaſed the tyrant, that he ever after took the Engliſh company and nation into his ſpecial protection.

This cautious behaviour in Elizabeth to avoid a war with Spain and France if poſſible, and to ſtrengthen her intereſt by that alliance with Muſcovy, was ſoon accounted for, by a plot ſhe had diſcoyered to deprive her of her moſt faithful and able counſellor, ſecretary Cecil. The duke of Alva had ſent over d'Aſſonville, to reclaim the money that had been ſeized by Elizabeth from the Italian merchants; but d'Aſſonville receiving no ſatisfaction, returned to the duke his maſter, who thereupon oppreſſed all the Engliſh in his dominions nions in the moſt cruel manner. Cecil had been the chief adviſer of that ſeizure, concerning the legality of which the council were greatly divided in their opinions, and a great handle was taken by Cecil's enemies to inveigh againſt him, as leading his miſtreſs into wrong meaſures, both as to the breach with Spain and the enormous ſums ſhe had ſent over to France to ſupply the Huguenots. The chief of thoſe who ſet themſelves againſt the ſecretary on this occaſion were the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earls of Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Arundel, Pembroke, and Leiceſter, and ſir Nicholas Throgmorton, who, having conſulted privately together, it was agreed upon that they ſhould order matters ſo as that Cecil ſhould be ſent to the Tower. But, to their great ſurprize, Elizabeth, who knew that Cecil always preferred her intereſt to every other view, and that the reſt of her council were too frequently led to make the intereſt of their ſovereign and country ſubſervient to their own private intrigues, impoſed ſuch a profound ſilence on her ſecretary's accuſers, as took from them all hopes of ſucceeding in a like enterprize for the future.

The propoſal, however, of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scots was ſtill very warmly purſued, and ſome talk was likewiſe held concerning a marriage between the young king of Scotland and the duke of Norfolk's daughter, who was about the ſame age. But Norfolk, before he would reſolve on the matter, deliberated with the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Suſſex, Pembroke, and Southampton, whom he found all agree in adviſing him to it; and as the duke was extremely popular with men of all parties, he eaſily engaged the principal nobility and gentry in his ſcheme: the lord Lumley and ſir Nicholas Throgmorton alſo embraced the propoſal with great cordiality; and every thing being agreed upon, their next conſultation was how to proceed in it with ſafety. Throgmorton adviſed the duke to open the affair to the earl of Leiceſter, who, though Elizabeth's declared favourite, and one who had formerly flattered himſelf with the honour of eſpouſing Mary, yet relinquiſhed all his pretenſions, and ſeemed zealouſly to promote the intereſt of Norfolk, inſomuch that when the biſhop of Roſs, by the duke's deſire, made that nobleman a compliment that if his miſtreſs's marrying with an Engliſh nobleman was neceſſary for the good of the two kingdoms, he (Leiceſter) might, if he pleaſed, be the man; Leiceſter anſwered, that he would have nothing to do with ſuch a marriage; but he would be for the duke's eſpouſal, if no other way could be found to be rid of ſo dangerous a rival, and provided Elizabeth was pleaſed with the match.

Some little time after the earl of Leiceſter himſelf mentioned the matter to the duke, and even wrote a letter to Mary, which was ſubſcribed by ſeveral perſons of the firſt rank, recommending Norfolk to her for a huſband, and ſtipulating certain articles for the advantage of both kingdoms: theſe were, "that ſhe ſhould attempt nothing in conſequence of her pretenſions to the Engliſh crown, prejudicial to Elizabeth or her poſterity; that ſhe ſhould agree to a league offenſive and defenſive between the two kingdoms; that ſhe ſhould confirm the preſent eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland, and grant pardon to ſuch of her ſubjects as had appeared in arms againſt her*." It may eaſily be ſuppoſed, that the queen of Scotland was not long in giving her conſent to what ſeemed the ready road to liberty and recovery of royal dignity. But now the duke of Norfolk took a ſtep, the moſt imprudent of any he had yet taken: he communicated the matter to the kings of France and Spain, who were warmly attached to Mary's intereſts, and who heartily approved of the projected marriage, a treaty concerning which he conſulted foreign princes while he concealed it from his own ſovereign, could not be deemed entirely innocent, not was it poſſible that a confederacy ſo extenſive and complicated could long eſcape the penetrating eye of Elizabeth.

But, to ſay the truth, Leiceſter, in the whole of this affair ſeems to have acted the ſame part as Murray did, that of a traiterous ſpy, and that he only ſeemed to join with the Norfolk party, in order to get at the bottom of their ſecrets and ruin them effectually with Elizabeth; for the rumour of this marriage becoming in a manner public, the duke feared it might have reached Elizabeth's ears, and make her reſolve his ruin: he therefore repeatedly preſſed Leiceſter to make her majeſty privy to it out of hand, and, if poſſible, gain her conſent, or at leaſt know her diſpoſition on that head. This Leiceſter promiſed to do, but put it off from time to time, under various pretexts. The duke then made it know to Cecil, who adviſed him to go and acquaint the queen with it himſelf. This counſel Leiceſter oppoſed, promiſing to open it to her majeſty as ſhe went in progreſs. At length, when the court was at Farnham, the duke ſtanding by as the queen ſat at dinner, ſhe took occaſion, in a tart manner, to bid him take heed what pillow he reſted his head upon. Leiceſter, who attended the queen in her progreſs, pretended to be taken ill at Tichfield; and when the queen viſited him in his apartment, he ſhewed great ſigns of fear and trouble, which ſhe perceiving, asked him the reaſon. Then begging her pardon for having ſo long concealed from her a ſecret which he ought to have told her, he diſcovered all that had paſſed concerning the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scots; whereupon ſhe ſent for the duke, and, after upbraiding him ſharply for preſuming to treat of ſuch an affair without her knowlege, ſhe commanded him, upon his allegiance, to deſiſt. The duke made her a ſolemn promiſe of obedience, and even affected to ſpeak contemptuouſly of the Scottiſh alliance.

Finding however, that the queen gave no credit to his aſſeverations, and that many of the nobility, and even Leiceſter himſelf, regarded him with an eye of coolneſs, he withdrew from court, without taking leave, and repaired to his houſe of Kenningſhall, in Norfolk. He was ſo much beloved in that county, that he could have aſſembled a conſiderable army in his own defence; but he piqued himſelf upon his loyalty, and reſolved to return again to court, and uſe his utmoſt endeavours to recover his ſovereign's confidence; but he had proceeded no farther than St. Alban's, when he was met by Fitz Garret, lieutenant of the band of penſioners, who arreſted him in the queen's name, and conducted him to Burnham, three miles diſtant from Windſor, where the court was now kept, where he underwent ſeveral examinations touching the marriage; his coffers were ſearched, his papers ſeized, and himſelf ſoon after ſent to the Tower. Leiceſter alſo underwent an examination, but received the royal pardon. The earls of Pembroke, Arundel, and the lord Lumley, were confined to their houſes; ſir Nicholas Throgmorton and Robert Rodolfi, a Florentine merchant (and an emiſſary from the pope), were impriſoned; the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland made their ſubmiſſion to the earl of Suſſex, warden of the Northern Marches. All theſe noblemen, as well as the biſhop of Roſs, agreed in declaring that the marriage had been propoſed by the earl of Murray, and that neither the queen of Scotland nor they would have concluded the match without Elizabeth's conſent. However, when the biſhop of Roſs applied to the queen for the enlargement of Mary, ſhe, in a great rage, anſwered him, "that the beſt ſtep his miſtreſs could take would be to reſt ſatisfied, unleſs ſhe had a mind to ſee thoſe on whom ſhe moſt relied, ſhorter by the head."

While theſe things were tranſacting in England, the earl of Murray, on his return to Scotland, invited ſeveral of the nobility of that kingdom to a conference, on pretence of accommodating matters, and reſtoring the queen to her liberty; but as the duke of Chatelerault, by Elizabeth's permiſſion (who probably knew of the treachery intended againſt him), and the lord Herries, with the abbot of Killwinning, were repairing thither, in order to appear in Mary's behalf, the regent cauſed them to be way-laid, and conducted, under a ſtrong guard, to Edinburgh, and, before any of the other lords could appear to be preſent at the propoſed conſultation, he committed them priſoners to the caſtle, and then proceeded by force of arms, to oppreſs every one whom he thought in the intereſt of his captive ſovereign. It is not improbable, from the general tenor of Murray's conduct, but he could have been content that Mary ſhould have been ſet at liberty, only that he was fearful her freedom might have brought on his own bondage; nay, Elizabeth perhaps would not have been unwilling to have had her reſtored to her kingdom, but that ſhe doubted ſuch an event might have been attended with conſequences detrimental to her own intereſt and ſecurity. Thus, while they both regarded their own ends as the principal object, and her's only in a ſecondary light, ſhe had the fortune to be pitied, but not the happineſs to be relieved; and all ſhe could do of herſelf, was to tie the knot of her bonds the faſter: if ſhe could have remained quiet, they would perhaps have looſened of themſelves; but now the more ſhe ſtruggled, the more ſhe was entangled.

The rigorous treatment of the duke of Norfolk, and the impriſonment of ſo many noble lords, filled the whole nation with terrors, and ſeveral ſuſpicious aſſemblies began now to be held in the North, where Mary was the darling of the people. The earl of Suſſex, lord-preſident there, had notice of this, and, alarmed at the proceedings, ſent for the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, in order to queſtion them on the ſubject; at the ſame time orders were ſent to them from the queen to repair to court, and anſwer for their conduct. This unexpected ſummons reduced the two earls to take arms before they were fully prepared; and, without waiting for a ſupply of men and money, which it is certain they had actually ſolicited from, and which had been promiſed by, the duke of Alva.

The firſt hoſtile action happened on the ſixteenth of October, when the earl of Northumberland, entering Durham, tore the Bible and Common Prayer Book in the public market-place, erected a crucifix in the cathedral, and cauſed maſs to be openly ſaid, no leſs than ſix thouſand perſons aſſiſting at the celebration. He propoſed likewiſe to ſeize York and Newcaſtle, but was prevented by the diligence of the earl of Suſſex. The rebels, however, ſoon became very numerous, and detached a party of five hundred horſe, to bring away the queen of Scotland from Tutbury: but ſhe having been removed, before their arrival, to Coventry, that enterprize miſcarried. They afterwards laid ſiege to Bernard's caſtle, which ſir George Bowes, after holding out eleven days, was forced to ſurrender, for want of proviſions; upon which the inſurgents fortified Hartlepool.

Whilſt part of their forces, which amounted to above fifteen thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, were employed in theſe operations, the reſt, in different bands, over-ran all Yorkſhire, while Suſſex, the lord Hunſdon, and the governor of Berwick, were cooped up with five thouſand men, a force far too weak to hazard an engagement. But the rebel-chiefs falling ſhort of money, the only ſinews of war, either civil or foreign, they could not furniſh proper ſubſiſtence for their forces, which for that reaſon could not move for London, as was at firſt intended, nor keep in a body longer than the beginning of November. In theſe circumſtances Weſtmoreland began to deſpond ſo viſibly, that many of his men ſlunk away: the earl of Northumberland ſtill kept up his reſolution, and remained maſter of the field till the thirteenth of December, when the earl of Suſſex, marching out of York with three thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, was joined by ſir George Bowes, with a good body of both, raiſed in the palatinate of Durham. Upon this ſhew of reſolution, and hearing that the earl of Warwick and the lord Clinton were advancing againſt them with eight thouſand men, levied in the midland counties, the rebels fled to Hexham, and from thence, on Suſſex's approach, into Cumberland, on the borders of Scotland, where they diſperſed, the common men retiring to their own houſes, and the leaders eſcaping into Scotland. Northumberland being found ſkulking in that country, was ſeized by Murray, and committed to the caſtle of Lochleven. Weſtmoreland took refuge among the clans of the Grahams and Kers, by whoſe aſſiſtance he made ſhift to get into Flanders, where he had a ſlender penſion from the king of Spain, and there lived to an old age.

This rebellion was ſoon followed by another, ſtill more raſh and imprudent, raiſed by Leonard Dacres, ſecond ſon to the lord Dacres of Gilleſland. He was a party with the two earls in all their projects; but they breaking out into action ſooner than he expected or thought prudent, he thought proper to temporize; and being then at court, and admitted to kiſs the queen's hand, he tendered his ſervice to go againſt them, and to that purpoſe was ſent home: but, by a ſtretch of double diſloyalty, he repaired to the rebels, and encouraged them, by all the arguments he could deviſe, to continue their inſurrection; then, making uſe of the letters of credence he had received from the queen, he ſurprized the caſtle of Greyſtock (in Cumberland), and gathered together a body of three thouſand men. But after the overthrow of the two earls, being encountered by the lord Hunſdon, at the head of the garriſon of Berwick, after a ſharp battle, in which Dacres behaved with a gallantry that would have done honour to any cauſe but that of rebellion, his army was put to flight: he himſelf fled into Scotland, from whence, ſoon after, he paſſed into the Low Countries, and, in great miſery and poverty, died at Louvaine.

The unhappy people who had engaged in theſe criminal enterprizes were treated with great ſeverity. Sixty-ſix petty conſtables were condemned to the gallows, and no leſs than eight hundred perſons are ſaid in the whole to have fallen by the hands of the common executioner: and the chiefs of the rebels, being convicted of high-treaſon, were proſcribed, namely, Charles Neville, earl of Weſtmoreland; Thomas Piercy, earl of Northumberland; Anne, his counteſs; Edward Dacres, of Merton; John Neville, of Leverſedge; John Swinburn; Thomas Markenfield; Egremond Radcliff, brother to the earl of Suſſex; Chriſtopher Neville; Richard Norton; Chriſtopher Marmaduke; George Stafford, and forty other gentlemen of condition*.

It muſt be remarked, that both theſe rebellions declared for the releaſement of Mary, queen of Scots, the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion, and the reſtoring the popiſh faith and religion; and the conſpiracy was looked upon by Mary's party ſo ſure of ſucceſs, that ſhe ſent a letter to the ſtates of Scotland, deſiring them to enquire into the validity of her marriage with Bothwell, who was ſtill alive in Denmark, in order to have it annulled, and make room for her intended marriage with the duke of Norfolk: and Murray was aſſured, by a letter from ſir Nicholas Throgmorton, that all the forces of England and Scotland were not able to prevent its ſucceſs. It is ſurmiſed that Elizabeth herſelf was terrified at their firſt appearance in arms; and that, to take off the equity of the demand of her rebellious ſubjects in regard to the queen of Scots releaſement, ſhe wrote to the ſame ſtates, demanding that they ſhould either reſtore Mary to her throne, as formerly, or admit her to reign jointly with her ſon, or that ſhe might live in Scotland with ſuch honours as ſhould not be prejudicial to the young king's authority. But after the danger was over, Elizabeth, in her diſcourſe with foreign ambaſſadors, affected to laugh at the whole as a fooliſh trifling enterprize; and thought on nothing but how ſhe might diſtreſs the queen and her friends more and more. Camden ſcruples not to ſay, that ſhe entered into a private negociation with Murray, to deliver Mary into his hands, finding the detention of her in England ſo dangerous, that ſhe would have been pleaſed, on any ſafe terms, to rid herſelf of a priſoner that gave her ſo much inquietude. But all theſe ſchemes were defeated by the death of the regent, who was murdered in revenge of a private injury, by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton.

While the rebellions were raging in England, the duke of Norfolk, who ſtill remained in the Tower, underwent frequent examinations, to draw from him whether he had any concern with the conſpirators; but either his conſtancy, or his innocence, baffled all attempts that way. The earl of Pembroke continued inconſolable at Elizabeth's diſpleaſure; and his great age, his former ſervices, and his penitence, won ſo far upon her, that ſhe ordered the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Leiceſter, and Cecil, to ſend him a letter declaring that ſhe took him again into favour, and was willing to accept of his ſervices as lord high-ſteward: but he did not long enjoy this comfort, for he died ſome months after. As to the duke of Norfolk, the queen's reſentment was ſo much appeaſed by his behaviour that ſhe releaſed him from the Tower, and, upon his engaging to relinquiſh all farther thoughts of the Scottiſh alliance, ſhe allowed him to live in his own houſe under a ſlight guard.

France was this whole year diſtracted with the continuance of the civil war. On the thirteenth of March was fought the battle of Jarnac, wherein the prince of Condé was killed; d'Andelot, the admiral's brother, did not long ſurvive him. Some time after, the duke of Deuxponts led an army into France to the aſſiſtance of the Huguenots; but died there in June, leaving the command of the army to count Mansfeldt, who joined the admiral. With this reinforcement the admiral laid ſiege to Poictiers, but was forced to raiſe it in September. In October the Huguenots loſt the battle of Moncontour. This defeat obliged the admiral to ſend for a ſpeedy aid from Elizabeth, who lent him money upon the queen of Navarre's jewels, which were ſent to her in pawn: ſhe alſo furniſhed a company of gentlemen volunteers, to be raiſed to ſerve in the army of the Huguenots. The campaign ended with the taking of St. Jean d'Angeli, which the king became maſter of before the end of October.

The duke of Alva ſtill continued his oppreſſions in the Netherlands. The Inquiſition, which he had ſet up, acted with the moſt bloody fury againſt the wretched proteſtants; and all who had the temerity to appeal to the king againſt the rigorous treatment they ſuffered, were puniſhed without mercy: in ſhort, theſe provinces were now conſidered by the Spaniards but as a conquered country, and every method taken to drive them to deſpair.

The death of the earl of Murray, regent of Scotland, which happened on the twenty-third of January, 1570, involved that kingdom in its former anarchy; for, immediately upon his aſſaſſination, a large body of Scots, under the command of Walter Scot, and Thomas Carr, or Ker, of Ferniherſt, entering England, ravaged the places where they came with greater cruelty than had been practiſed even in the moſt barbarous times between thoſe two nations. This ſeems to have been done on purpoſe to provoke England to revenge theſe affronts on all the Scots without diſtinction, and thus to revive the old enmity between the two people, and unite all the Scots againſt the Engliſh; whilſt the more zealous papiſts were to act their part in this kingdom: and, indeed, this intention is in a manner confirmed by an embaſſy to the duke of Alva from the Hamiltons, and the pope's bull which was ſoon after iſſued to ſtir up Elizabeth's ſubjects to rebellion, as will be hereafter ſhewn.

* Camden, p. 422, 423.

As Mary's party had reſolved to bring the ſtate into confuſion by the regent's death, ſo they had addreſs enough, under the ſpecious pretence of conferring the regency on a perſon to be approved by both parties, to put off the election of a new regent till the great men on all ſides ſhould concur in ſuch a choice: but as this was barely a feint to gain time to ſee how the court of England would behave under the late unprovoked ravages on their borders, Elizabeth and her council were too wiſe to give into the ſnare; on the contrary, the more they perceived the Hamiltonian ſcheme to be to unite the Scots in one intereſt, the more they judged it neceſſary to keep them divided, nothing being found more advantageous to Elizabeth's politics than to tie up her neighbours hands, by cutting them out a ſufficiency of work at home, through the ſtirring up or encouraging inteſtine broils and confuſion among them.

With this view Randolph, who had now returned from Muſcovy and was made poſt-maſter-general, was diſpatched to Scotland, to aſſure the king's party (as we muſt henceforward denominate thoſe who headed the oppoſition againſt Mary, and had the young king in their hands), that ſhe could not ſuppoſe them guilty of being concerned in the late unprecedented inſult upon her ſubjects, nor was inclined to caſt the blame on the whole nation; on the contrary, ſhe offered her aſſiſtance to the young king to reſettle the affairs of his kingdom, and to redreſs the great diſorders that had been committed by Mary's friends upon the Borders; adding farther, that ſhould her ſo friendly offers be rejected, ſhe was ready to do herſelf juſtice by force of arms, which ſhould attack, not the whole nation, but only take condign vengeance on ſuch as had wantonly, and without the leaſt provocation, inſulted her crown and dignity.

This declaration, which was delivered by Randolph to an aſſembly of the ſtates, on the tenth of April, diſcovered all the meaſures of Mary's friends, and all they could do was to take advantage of the excuſe which the anarchy furniſhed the miniſtry with, namely, to put off their anſwer to the firſt of May, when the ſtates were again to re-aſſemble. In the mean time both parties ſet all their political talents to work: Elizabeth prepared an army to give weight to her counſels, her ambaſſador artfully cheriſhed the diviſions of Scotland while he ſeemed to be labouring to promote its union; and the queen of Scotland's party employed the keeneſt writers they could engage to try what they could do, by publiſhing libels and the moſt provoking ſarcaſms upon Elizabeth and her council, to urge them to a general rupture.

Elizabeth's army being ready, and it being apparent that Mary's party, which grew daily ſtronger, waited only for promiſed ſuccours from France and Spain, to enable them to carry their purpoſes againſt England into execution, ſhe ordered it to march to Berwick, under the command of the earl of Suſſex, to revenge her ſubjects, to ſupport the king's party, and to influence the election of a regent that ſhould be a friend to the intereſts of England. Accordingly the earl of Suſſex, the lord Hunſdon, and the lord Scroop, warden of the Weſtern Marches, entered Scotland on the eighteenth of April, and, in the ſpace of a few weeks, razed, burned, and overthrew above three hundred towns and villages; but at the ſame time theſe generals declared againſt taking part in the quarrels of the two factions, though it viſibly appeared by the whole of their conduct, that their orders were to oppreſs Mary's friends and countenance the king's party to the utmoſt of their power; and as the former were not in a condition to defend themſelves, they could not hinder a reſolution of the ſtates, aſſembled in the beginning of July, in the king's name, by the earl of Morton, the chief of that faction, by which they choſe the earl of Lenox their regent, upon the recommendation of Elizabeth; and he was accordingly inveſted with that high office on the twelfth of the ſame month.

But, notwithſtanding this inſtance of partiality to Mary's enemies, Elizabeth ſtill maintained her ambiguous conduct, and preſerved the appearance of friendſhip with that princeſs: at the requeſt of the biſhop of Roſs, and her other agents, as well as of ſome foreign ambaſſadors, ſhe now procured a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities between the Scottiſh factions, and by that means checked the progreſs of the king's party, when they appeared likely to gain too conſiderable advantages over their opponents. By this variable conduct did the artful Elizabeth feed the flames of diſcord in Scotland, and rendered the whole country a ſcene of deſolation and bloodſhed. Throgmorton, who now remained under confinement in his houſe at Carſhalton, ſcrupled not to load Cecil with all the blame of ſo perfidious a dealing, which, however reconcileable it may be to the policy of the ſovereign or her miniſters, is the diſgrace of honour and humanity.

As a counter-ſcheme to theſe machinations of Elizabeth, ſeveral ſchemes were ſet on foot to procure the deliverance of the captive queen of Scots, who was now more cloſely confined than ever; and the inſtruments to carry on thoſe ſchemes were appointed and ſupported by France, Spain, and the pope. Charles IX. ſent Montluc, biſhop of Valence, to London, to join with the Spaniſh ambaſſador in ſoliciting her enlargement of Elizabeth in a public manner, and at the ſame time to raiſe, if poſſible, a ſtrong party to back them, in caſe of need: but when not all the inſtances of theſe ambaſſadors wrought any effect on Elizabeth, pope Pius V. tried to terrify her into a compliance, by fulminating forth a bull of excommunication againſt her, which was faſtened, in the night-time, upon the gate of the biſhop of London's palace, wherein he abſolved all the queen's ſubjects from their oath of allegiance, or any other duty to her, and pronounced anathema againſt all who ſhould continue to acknowlege or ſerve her as their ſovereign. This bull was affixed by one John Felton, who, being ſeized, boldly owned the fact, for which he was arraigned, and hanged in Alderſgate-ſtreet, oppoſite the ſaid palace. Upon this ſeveral inſurrections preſently began in different parts of the kingdom. John Throgmorton, brother to ſir Nicholas, was detected of a deſign to take up arms, and executed for the ſame. It was alſo diſcovered that ſir Thomas and ſir Edward Stanley, two younger ſons of the earl of Derby, by a daughter of the duke of Norfolk, had plotted to carry off the queen of Scotland, and ſet her at liberty; and as John Leſley, biſhop of Roſs, who acted as Mary's ambaſſador, was accuſed of being the chief promoter of theſe plots, it was thought proper to confine him priſoner in the biſhop of London's palace.

The

The longer Mary continued in England, and the more closely she was confined, the more Elizabeth found her own dangers increase, both at home and abroad. She had been this summer upon a progress; on her return she feigned to listen more kindly than ever to the pressing remonstrances made in her favour by the ambassadors of foreign powers to release her captive sister; she even pretended that she desired nothing more earnestly than to find means to restore Mary to her royal dignity, provided it could be done without danger to England: and, the more easily to amuse and deceive that princess and her friends, she, in the beginning of October, dispatched secretary Cecil and sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, to Mary, who was then removed to Chatsworth, in Derbyshire, to propose certain articles of agreement for her deliverance. The terms were somewhat rigorous, and such as the captive queen might expect from a jealous rival, whereby they bore a greater semblance of sincerity on the part of the English court.

"It was required that the treaty of Edinburgh should be ratified: that Mary should renounce her claim to the crown of England during the life of queen Elizabeth, and her heirs lawfully begotten: that she should not enter into any confederacy against England, nor permit foreign forces to land in Scotland, nor maintain correspondence with the English or Irish, but with the consent of Elizabeth: that she should deliver up the English fugitives who had taken refuge in Scotland; and repair the damage done to the English frontier: that she should punish the murderers of her husband and the earl of Murray, and send her son to be educated in England: that she should not marry an Englishman without the consent of Elizabeth, nor any other person except such as should be approved by the estates of Scotland: that her subjects should not cross the sea into Ireland, without permission from the queen of England: that this treaty should be signed by Mary and her delegates: that, for the ratification of the articles, six hostages, to be named by Elizabeth, should be sent into England: that Mary, by engaging in any attempt against the queen of England, should forfeit all title of succession to the crown: that Hume castle and Fast castle should remain three years in possession of the English; and some other fort, in Galloway or Cantyre, be delivered to Elizabeth, for preventing the Scots from infesting Ireland: and lastly, that the estates of Scotland should ratify these articles by act of parliament."

Queen Mary referred Cecil and Mildmay for an answer to the bishop of Ross, her ambassador, the bishop of Galloway, who was uncle to the earl of Huntley, and William, lord Levingston, who were delegates from her lieutenants in Scotland. These agreed to some of the articles, but refused to renounce the ancient league with France, because the queen would lose her dowry, and the Scottish nation forfeit the valuable privileges they enjoyed in that kingdom. "They promised that no foreign troops should be admitted into Scotland, except in case of a rebellion which could not be suppressed by the domestic forces of the nation: that the queen of Scotland should not maintain any correspondence with the subjects of England to the prejudice of Elizabeth, provided this last would enter into the same engagement with respect to the subjects of Mary: they said they could not deliver the prince to Elizabeth, because they were not masters of his person: that the demand with respect to the queen's marriage was altogether unreasonable, considering she was an independent princess: that the Scots should not molest Ireland, provided the Irish were prohibited from making descents on Scotland: that any hostages required, should be given, except the duke of Chatelerault, the earls of Huntley, Argyll, and Athol: that Mary should forfeit her title to the crown of England, according to the proposal on that subject, provided that queen Elizabeth should be restrained by the same penalty from attempting aught to the prejudice of the Scottish queen: but they absolutely insisted on Elizabeth's restoring Hume castle and Fast castle to the proprietor, and refused to deliver any fortress, either in Galloway or Cantyre, into the hands of a foreigner." After these articles had been debated twenty days successively, the English commissioners returned, and made such a report to Elizabeth, that she declared herself perfectly well satisfied with the answers of the Scottish queen, and said, she did not doubt that the only difference remaining, would be removed at the arrival of the commissioners from the regent of Scotland, without whose consent the young prince could not be conveyed to England.

But it was not long before she altered her language, but without seeming to alter her sentiments; for she pretended, that before the treaty could be either ratified or executed, it was necessary to have the consent of the earl of Lenox and the nobility of the country; and it was agreed that the queen should require Lenox, the regent, to send up commissioners to treat of conditions, under her mediation. At the same time Elizabeth took care to support the spirits of the king's party, by informing them, through Cecil, that all the proposals she had done were so far from being irrevocably fixed, that they were to be canvassed anew in the conference, and that it should be her care effectually to provide for their future safety. Hereupon Lenox convened the Scottish parliament, and, laying before them the transactions in England, and the dispatches he had received from the queen, they proceeded to nominate commissioners for ending the treaty; these were the earl of Morton, the abbot of Dumfermling, who had been made secretary of state in the room of Maitland of Lethington, and sir James M'Gill, a famous civilian. In this situation were affairs between the courts of England and Scotland at the close of the year 1570.

In Ireland, Connor O' Brien, earl of Thomond, being disgusted with the government of Edward Fitton, president of Connaught, entered into a consultation with other malecontents, to raise a new rebellion; and they had taken their measures so well, that they were on the point of making themselves masters of the president's person, and of the whole province, when their plot was frustrated by an odd accident: the day before they were to have executed their project, Fitton, who knew nothing of their design, sent the earl word in a friendly manner, that the next day he, and a few friends with him, would come to be his guests. The earl, struck with conscious guilt, imagined that his machinations were all discovered, and that Fitton meant to make him his prisoner under the pretence of a visit, and thereupon, in a violent panic, took shipping and fled over to France, where he confessed the the whole plot to Norris, the queen's ambaſſador there, and, by his interceſſion and his own ſubmiſſion, and promiſes of future loyalty, he was afterwards pardoned and reſtored.

This year alſo produced a peace to the French Huguenots, which was concluded at St. Germain en Laye. This peace, though made by the queen-mother (Catherine de Medici) with a wicked view, bore a good appearance to the proteſtant cauſe, nor could the Huguenots have hoped for a better, in the moſt proſperous ſituation of their affairs: among other advantages, Rochelle was ſuffered to continue in their hands, by which they ſtill retained their communication with England.

In the Low Countries, the duke of Alva continued his infamous cruelties: and being in want of money to pay his troops, impoſed the moſt arbitrary taxes on the people. He not only required the hundredth penny, and the twentieth of all immoveable goods; he alſo demanded the tenth of all moveable goods on every ſale: an abſurd tyranny, which would not only have deſtroyed all arts and commerce, but even have reſtrained the common intercourſe of life. The people refuſed compliance; the duke had recourſe to his uſual expedient of hanging. And thus matters came ſtill nearer the laſt extremity between the Flemings and the Spaniards.

We enter now upon the year 1571, which began in Elizabeth's court with a commiſſion to her faithful and moſt truſty ſervant and ſecretary, ſir William Cecil (whom ſhe now created baron of Burleigh), and to Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter; Radcliff, earl of Suſſex; ſir Nicholas Bacon, lord-keeper; Vere, earl of Oxford, lord-chamberlain; ſir Walter Mildmay, and ſir Francis Knolles, all privy-counſellors, to hear the reaſons for and againſt the queen of Scots, alleged by the deputies from Scotland already mentioned, and thoſe for queen Mary, who were the biſhops of Roſs and Galloway, with the lord Levingſton*. The conference was opened at London, on the twentieth of February, but was ſpun out, in the ſame manner as the former, with fruitleſs enquiries and remonſtrances, and at laſt broke up, on the eighteenth of April, without coming to any determination, Elizabeth's ſole aim being to gain time, and to furniſh herſelf with a plauſible anſwer to the French king's unremitting ſolicitations in behalf of the captive queen, who, upon finding herſelf thus trifled with, and that the treaty of Chatſworth was not likely to be ratified, loſt all patience, and loaded Elizabeth and her council with the moſt bitter reproaches. This ſo nettled Elizabeth, that at firſt ſhe ordered the biſhop of Roſs to leave London, with the other commiſſioners; but he pleaded the commands of his miſtreſs for his remaining there: Elizabeth repeated her orders, and he his plea, till at laſt he drove her to the alternative, either to ſuffer him to remain in London, or to deny his privilege as an ambaſſador of an independent princeſs.

Upon the breaking up of the conferences in England, all Scotland became a ſcene of blood and confuſion: the truce betweeen the two factions was now expired, and the regent, Lenox, began hoſtilities with the ſurprize of the caſtle of Dunbarton, which was ſtill kept for Mary by the lord Fleming, but in ſo careleſs a manner, that when it was attacked, the garriſon had no time to ſave either their perſons, their effects, or their papers. Amongſt the priſoners was Hall, who had been deeply concerned in the late rebellions in the North of England; Verac, the French agent; and James Hamilton, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, an inveterate enemy to all Engliſhmen. Hall was ſent to England, and there executed; Verac was ſent priſoner to St. Andrew's, but afterwards ſuffered to go to France; but the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, being extremely obnoxious to the regent and his party, it was reſolved to get rid of him at any rate; accordingly he was proceeded againſt as an acceſſary in Darnley's murder, on the evidence of a prieſt, who declared that he had revealed the ſame to him in confeſſion; upon which the archbiſhop was condemned, and publicly executed on a gallows at Stirling.

Sir Nicholas Throgmorton during all the laſt year, had been kept in confinement, either in London or at his own houſe at Carſhalton; but perceiving that the earl of Leiceſter had abandoned his former party, in the matter of the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scotland, both the duke and he threw themſelves upon Cecil's friendſhip, who did them many ſervices with Elizabeth: but Throgmorton, being ſoon after ſet at liberty, died ſuddenly at an entertainment in Leiceſter's houſe, and the public did not ſpare to load Leiceſter with the blame of having poiſoned him, from an apprehenſion that he might make diſcoveries to his prejudice.

In the mean while Mary's party in England grew very alert, and more bold than ever, which gave a ſuſpicion that ſome new plot was hatching againſt Elizabeth and her miniſtry, who being perſuaded that nothing but a marriage could ſecure their queen from ſo many conſpiracies, which were daily renewed, importuned her ſo much, that at laſt Elizabeth yielded for them to reſume the negociations for her marriage with the duke of Anjou; though, as it afterwards appeared, ſhe never had any intention that the match ſhould take place.

Soon after the peace of St. Germain en Laye was concluded, Elizabeth had recalled Norris from his embaſſy in France, to make room for ſir Francis Walſingham, who was a creature of Cecil's (now lord Burleigh), and ſent to reſide in that court, to take care of Elizabeth's intereſts, and to countermine the many plots which the papiſts had formed againſt her crown. Walſingham was in all reſpects, as a ſtateſman, a very extraordinary perſon: his ſagacity in tracing all the windings of a conſpiracy, is perhaps not to be parelleled; his intelligence being ſo admirable, that it gave him as it were a key to every cabinet in Europe. This man, therefore, was thought the moſt proper perſon to manage the affair of the projected marriage, and he had orders to talk at the court of France as if Elizabeth was ſincerely reſolved upon it, provided that court was equally well diſpoſed. This brought on a negociation, which took up great part of the ſummer, and was managed by Walſingham, on the part of Elizabeth, at the court of France; and here by the French ambaſſadors, Mauvaſiere and la Motte Fenelon.

Towards the end of Auguſt each party was brought to ſtate their reſpective demands: thoſe of the court of France were, "that the duke of Anjou might be crowned king; secondly, that he might be joined in the administration of public affairs; and lastly, that he should have a toleration for his religion." The two first were points that had been already settled in the former negociation between Elizabeth and the archduke Charles; and she readily agreed that the duke of Anjou should have the matrimonial crown, and be admitted to the joint-administration; but insisted "that the duke, if she thought proper to make him her consort, should promise to accompany her whenever she went to chapel, and not refuse to hear and learn the principles of the church of England; and that his domestics should use no rites and ceremonies repugnant to the church of God, and those only in a private place, and so as the people might not take occasion from thence to violate the established laws of the land*." After various conferences, in which the French court endeavoured to render Elizabeth more flexible on the point of religion, while she still persisted unalterably in her demand, this difference was made a pretext for breaking off the treaty, in which indeed both parties seem to have been alike insincere.

The queen-mother of France wanted to divert Elizabeth from a rumoured match between her and the young king of Navarre, and to create a false confidence in the chiefs of the Huguenots, whom she had devoted to destruction; while, on the other hand, Elizabeth's aim was to amuse the court of France with a negociation, which would prevent their sending succours to Mary's friends in Scotland. After this treaty was laid aside, Francis, duke of Alençon, younger brother to Henry of Anjou, was proposed as an husband to the queen of England; but the same difficulties about religion recurred, Elizabeth objected to his youth, and declared she would not engage in any contract of marriage before she should have seen the person proposed to be her husband.

In the mean time a new parliament, after five years interval, was assembled at Westminster, on the second of April this year; and as the queen, by the rage of the pope against her, was become still more the head of the ruling party, it might be expected, both from this incident and her own prudent and vigorous conduct, that her authority over the two houses would be absolutely uncontroulable. It was so in fact; yet it is remarkable, that it prevailed not without some small opposition, and that too arising from the height of zeal for protestantism, amongst a new sect lately sprung up, called Puritans (of whose rise and principles we shall give an account in their proper place), and who had, in the former parliament, introduced several bills for a farther reformation in religion, but had not been able to carry any one of them. Religion was a point of which Elizabeth was extremely jealous; she pretended that, in quality of supreme head of the church, she was fully empowered, by her prerogative alone, to decide all questions which might arise with regard to discipline or worship; and she never would allow her parliaments so much as to take these points into consideration. The courtiers forgot not to insist upon this topic, when the Puritans resumed their motions for a farther reformation: this brought on several warm debates, in which many principles, very popular, noble, and generous, were advanced; but the open assertion of them was very new in England, and the queen was so highly offended with the speech of Strickland, one of the members, that she sent for him to the council, and prohibited him from thenceforth to appear in the house of commons. That act of power was too violent even for this submissive parliament to endure; and the queen, finding that the experiment which she had made was likely to excite a great commotion, sent, the next day, to Strickland her permission to give his attendance in the house; but, at the same time, the parliament was, by Elizabeth's orders, hurried to a close, on the twenty-ninth of May.

The following were the principal laws enacted this session: it was declared treason, during the life-time of the queen, to affirm, that she was not the lawful sovereign: that any other enjoyed a better title; that she was an heretic, schismatic, or infidel; or that the parliament has not power to settle and limit the succession of the crown: whoever should assert, in writing, or printing, that any person, except the natural issue of her body, is or ought to be the queen's heir or successor, was, for the first offence, to be imprisoned during a year, and to forfeit half their goods; for the second offence, they were to incur the penalty of a Præmunire. This law was directly levelled against the queen of Scots and her adherents; and plainly implied that Elizabeth never intended to name her successor.

It is observable, that the usual term of lawful issue, which the parliament thought indecent in speaking of the queen, as if she could be supposed to have any other, was changed into that of natural issue. But this alteration was a fund of much wit and humour during the time; and some people suspected a deeper design, as if Leicester intended, in case of the queen's death, to impose one of his own bastards on the public, as the offspring of her majesty.

It was also decreed, that whoever should publish bulls or other mandates of the pope, or should, by means of these, reconcile any man to the church of Rome, should themselves, as well as those who were so reconciled, be guilty of treason. Whoever imported any agnus dei, crucifix, or such other implement of superstition, was subject to the penalty of a Præmunire. It was likewise moved, that if, for the future, the queen of Scots shoud be concerned in any conspiracy, she should be proceeded against by law, as the wife of an English peer; but the queen hindered this bill from passing, being satisfied with letting her prisoner see to what she would be exposed, in case of such practices. The former laws against taking interest, which was called usury, were enforced by a new statute; and a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths was granted to her majesty. We must now turn to other matters.

During the before-mentioned negociation between Elizabeth and the court of France, the queen of Scotland, looking upon her own affairs as entirely ruined, should they unite, tried what assistance she could procure from the king of Spain, by the means of Rodolfi, the Florentine, whom she dispatched, with letters, to Philip and the pope; but first with copies of them in cypher, and a letter of credence to the duke of Norfolk, recommending him as a truſty perſon, and deſiring he would give him full confidence. Rodolfi, who was the pope's private agent in England, prevailed upon the duke to undertake the queen of Scotland's defence, upon aſſurances of a powerful aid from the pope and the king of Spain, and the queen's repeated promiſes to make him her huſband as ſoon as ſhe ſhould have recovered her liberty.

The duke of Norfolk was naturally cautious, and gave his ear rather than his aſſent to this plauſible propoſal; neither would he ſign the letters of recommendation to foreign powers, which Rodolfi preſented him in his own favour, and which Mary requeſted the duke to honour him with: however, he ordered Hickford, his ſecretary, who had the key to decypher the queen's letters to Rome, and Madrid, and to the duke of Alva, and then bid him throw them into the fire: but Hickford, whether he was already gained by the court, or thought to make his own fortune by betraying his maſter, hid all theſe papers under a matt in his bed chamber, which proved fatal to the duke and Mary alſo. Theſe proceedings could not be long a ſecret in ſo prying a court as that of Elizabeth. Rodolfi, indeed, got ſafe abroad, but one Bayley, a ſervant to the queen of Scots, whom Rodolfi had ſent to inform that princeſs of his negociations, and had likewiſe entruſted with letters for her, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, the biſhop of Roſs, the duke of Norfolk, and the lord Lumley, was ſeized at Dover immediately upon his landing, and thoſe letters were ſent to the lord Cobham, governor of the Cinque Ports, who, being a friend to the duke of Norfolk, ſuffered the biſhop of Roſs to change the pacquet for other letters of no moment: but the privy-council were not to be ſo eaſily impoſed upon; Walſingham had gotten notice of the whole affair in France, and was perpetually alarming Elizabeth and her miniſtry with the plots forming againſt them by Mary's party. Bayley was ſent for to the council, and, being a ſimple young fellow, he betrayed as much upon his apprehenſion as made the government ſend him to be racked in the Tower, where he preſently confeſſed all he had learned from Rodolfi; and that the original pacquet he had brought over, was in the biſhop of Roſs's poſſeſſion.

The biſhop had foreſeen this, and, ſuſpecting that his public character would not protect him, prudently ſecreted all his papers of any conſequence; and, on the thirteenth of May, after undergoing a ſtrict examination by a committee of the council, he was given into cuſtody of the biſhop of Ely; as Henry Howard, who had aſpired to the archbiſhopric of York, was to the cuſtody of the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and ſir Thomas Stanley, ſir Thomas Gerard, and one Rolſton, to the Tower on ſuſpicion. Hitherto nothing had appeared that could effectually hurt the duke of Norfolk; but another attempt, in which he was concerned, being diligently traced, produced a full diſcovery, which completed that nobleman's deſtiny.

Mary had given a large ſum of money to the French ambaſſador, to be conveyed to her friends in Scotland. The ambaſſador, as afterwards appeared, with the duke of Norfolk's privity, gave the money to Banniſter, one of the duke's gentlemen, who was to find ſome means to tranſmit it to Scotland; but a menial ſervant, who was not in the ſecret, ſuſpecting from the weight and ſize of the box that it was full of gold, carried it, with a letter he was alſo charged with for Banniſter, to lord Burleigh, who immediately cauſed Banniſter and Hickford to be apprehended and brought before the council, where, being threatened with the torture, they immediately confeſſed the truth; and as Hickford, though enjoined to commit all the copies of Mary's decyphered letters to the flames, had diſpoſed of them as above related, he now thought proper to put all the cyphers and papers into the hands of the government, together with other letters from Mary to the biſhop of Roſs, containing her reſolution to retire to Spain rather than France; her intention to amuſe don John of Auſtria, natural ſon to the late emperor Charles V. with overtures of marriage; her ſettled reſolution to reſerve herſelf entirely for the duke of Norfolk; many injurious reflections on queen Elizabeth; and a requeſt that he would diſpatch her meſſenger, Rodolfi, with inſtructions to Rome.

Norfolk himſelf, who knew nothing of the diſcoveries made by his ſervants, was cited before the council, and, though exhorted to merit the mercy of his ſovereign by a full confeſſion, he ſtill continued to deny every article of the charge preferred againſt him; upon which the queen ordered him to be ſent to the Tower, on the ſeventh of September. The biſhop of Roſs was already in private cuſtody, and every method was uſed to make him diſcloſe the ſhare he had in the conſpiracy: he at firſt alleged, that, as an ambaſſador, his perſon was ſacred; but he was told, that as his miſtreſs was no longer a ſovereign, he could not be conſidered as a public miniſter, and that even if that character was allowed, it did not warrant him in forming conſpiracies againſt the ſovereign in whoſe court he reſided. As he ſtill refuſed to anſwer any interrogatories, he was informed of the diſcovery made by Norfolk's ſervants, and then he admitted the truth of ſome of the points alleged againſt him, by which the duke of Norfolk's guilt was more plainly proved. On the nineteenth of October the biſhop was committed to the Tower, "for attempting to diſturb the peace of the kingdom."

While theſe matters were in agitation, Scotland was more and more rent by inteſtine broils: each faction ſummoned a ſeparate aſſembly of the ſtates, and met in two different places, mutually condemning and annulling the acts of each other; but, by the policy and aſſiſtance of Kirkaldy, laird of Grainge, governor of the caſtle of Edinburgh for the young king, but in reality Mary's friend, her party got poſſeſſion of the city and the ſaid caſtle; and, about the latter end of Auguſt, met with ſuch ſucceſs that they ſeized the perſons of the earls of Morton and Lenox the regent, and muſt have carried off all the lords of the king's party, aſſembled at Stirling, had not the earl of Marr ſallied out of the caſtle, and with his garriſon compelled the queen's ſoldiers to retire, who, for the ſake of plunder, had diſperſed themſelves careleſly in parties about the town. In the diſorder the earl of Morton happily eſcaped, but the regent was carried off, and murdered in cold blood on the road, by one captain Calder, on the eighth of September; upon which the lords of the king's party choſe John Erskine, earl of Marr, to ſucceed him in the regency, to the great mortification of the earl of Morton, who aſpired to that dignity, and was zealouſly zealouſly ſupported by the Engliſh ambaſſador, who knew him to be a penſioner to his court.

The impriſonment of the duke of Norfolk, and that of ſo many noblemen and gentlemen who had been committed with him*, made ſo much noiſe in England, that the court thought it was proper to ſatisfy the public concerning the ſame. Accordingly, by Elizabeth's orders, the recorder of London laid before the lord-mayor and court of aldermen a full account of all that the duke had been charged with and confeſſed; and they again were ordered to communicate the ſame to the ſeveveral companies and wards of the city. This ſtep had great effect upon the populace, whoſe vaſt regard for the duke of Norfolk was formidable to Elizabeth.

We have little to add to the account of public affairs in England this year, only that the Engliſh having, ſince the year 1552, carried on a gainful trade for gold with the natives of the coaſt of Africa, wherein they had often been diſturbed by the Portugueſe, who laid claim to an excluſive trade to that country, as the firſt diſcoverers of it, Elizabeth made a treaty with the court of Portugal this year, by which all differences were adjuſted between the two nations on that ſcore. On the fifth of October this year, the famous ſea-fight of Lepanto was gained by don John of Auſtria againſt the Turks; and though the news was firſt communicated to Elizabeth by her mortal enemy, the duke of Alva, yet, to ſhew her great regard for the general intereſts of Chriſtianity, ſhe gave orders for public rejoicings to be made all over England for the victory †. In the beginning of this ſame year 1571, viz. on the twenty-third of January, queen Elizabeth went in great ſtate into the city, to dine with ſir Thomas Greſham, an eminent merchant, and viſited the magnificent ſtructure he had lately erected, upon the model of the Bourſe at Antwerp, for the uſe and convenience of the merchants to meet and do buſineſs in, when ſhe gave it, with great ſolemnity, and under the ſound of trumpets, beating of drums, &c. the name of the Royal Exchange. This year alſo died, in an advanced age, William Parr, marquis of Northampton.

Burleigh and his party were now very earneſt to bring the duke of Norfolk to a trial, and were very importunate with the biſhop of Roſs to give full evidence againſt him, which that prelate, with a great and noble reſolution, refuſed, inſiſting on the promiſe that had been made him by the council, at a former examination, that nothing of what he ſaid ſhould be made uſe of to accuſe any man; and declaring that, as he had never conferred with the duke himſelf on any of the matters in queſtion, but only with his ſervants, what he could ſay would not affect him; and he muſt at the ſame time publicly profeſs before the court, that he never heard him, in all his life ſpeak one word at any time that was againſt his duty to his queen and country. This made them think it improper to produce him in perſon, though Baſham, the queen's ſerjeant at law, in breach of the ſolemn promiſes of the council, made uſe of his confeſſion at the duke's trial, who, on the ſixteenth of January, 1572, was brought, with the other lords and gentlemen in confinement, by water to Weſtminſter-hall, the ſtreets being lined with ſoldiers, and the guards doubled at Whitehall, and arraigned before a jury of twenty-ſix peers, George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, ſitting as lord high-ſteward. The articles upon which he was accuſed, were as follow:

"That, in the eleventh year of queen Elizabeth, and afterwards, he had entered into a treaſonable conſpiracy about depoſing her from the throne, and taking away her life, and invading the kingdom, by raiſing war, and bringing in a foreign power.

"That though he knew for certain, that Mary, late queen of Scots, had uſurped the crown of England, with the title and arms thereof; yet he had treated about a marriage with her (witout acquainting the queen) and had lent her a great ſum

† Pope Pius V. out of his great zeal for Chriſtianity, had endeavoured to ſtir up ſeveral of the princes of Chriſtendom againſt the Turks, who were by this time become very formidable; but there was only Philip II. who took part with the pope in his deſign. He alone, of all the Catholic princes, was ſufficiently rich to anſwer the prodigious expence of the neceſſary armament; and was alone able, by the good regulations of his government, to carry this project into ſpeedy execution. He was principally intereſted in this, through the neceſſity there was of ſecuring his Italian dominions, and the places he poſſeſſed on the coaſt of Barbary, from the inſults of the Ottoman fleet; accordingly he entered into an alliance with the Venetians, though always their ſecret enemy in Italy, againſt the Turks, whom he feared ſtill more.

Never was ſo large an armament fitted out with ſo much expedition. Two hundred gallies, ſix large galeaſſes, twenty-five ſhips of war, with fifty ſail of tranſports, were all ready in the ports of Sicily by the month of September, which was leſs than five months after the taking of Cyprus. The one half of this armament was furniſhed by Philip; the Venetians were at the charge of two thirds of the other half, and the reſt was ſupplied by the pope. The command of the fleet was given to the famous don John of Auſtria, natural ſon to the emperor Charles V. and Marc Antonio Colonna commanded under him, in the pope's name.

Hiſtorians tells us, that there were no leſs than fifty thouſand fighting men on board this fleet. Nothing but exaggerations are to be found in the accounts of battles. A fleet of two hundred and ſix gallies, and twenty-five other ſhips, could not contain at moſt more than twenty-thouſand fighting men. The Turkiſh fleet alone was ſtronger than the three Chriſtian ſquadrons all together: it was compoſed of about two hundred and fifty gallies. The two fleets met in the gulph of Lepanto, the ancient Naupactus, not far from Corinth. Never ſince the famous battle of Actium, had ſo numerous a fleet been ſeen in the Grecian ſeas, nor ſo memorable an engagement. The Turkiſh gallies were worked by Chriſtian ſlaves, and the Chriſtian gallies by Turks, who were, againſt their wills, obliged to ſerve againſt their country.

The two fleets engaged with all the ancient and modern weapons of offence; ſuch as arrows, long javelins, grenades, grappling-irons, cannon, muſkets, ſpears and ſabres. Moſt of the gallies were grappled together, and the ſoldiers fought hand to hand on their decks, as on a field of battle. At length the Chriſtians gained the victory, which was the more glorious, as being the firſt of its kind.

Don John of Auſtria, and the Venetian admiral Veniero, attacked the ſhip which carried the Turkiſh admiral Ali, who was taken with his galley, and his head ſtruck off, and hoiſted upon his own flag-ſtaff. This was abuſing the rights of war; but thoſe who had flayed Bragadino in Famagoſta, did not deſerve better treatment. The Turks loſt above one hundred and fifty ſhips in this engagement. It is difficult to tell the number of ſlain: ſome make them amount to fifteen thouſand; about five thouſand Chriſtian captives were ſet at liberty. Venice celebrated this victory with ſuch feaſts as ſhe alone was capable of giving at that time. Conſtantinople was in the utmoſt conſternation; and pope Pius V. when he received the news of this ſignal victory, the honour of which was aſcribed to the generaliſſimo don John, but in which the Venetians had the greateſt ſhare, cried out in a tranſport of joy: "There was a man ſent from God, and his name was John!" words that were afterwards applied to John Sobieſki, king of Poland, when he delivered Vienna. Volt. Gen. Hiſt. vol. v. p. 259—261.

of money, contrary to what he had promiſed under his hand.

" That though he was ſure that the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, Markenfield, and others, had raiſed a rebellion againſt the queen, and were driven into Scotland, yet he had ſupplied them with money.

" That, in the thirteenth year of the queen's reign, he had, by his letters, craved auxiliary forces of pope Pius V. the queen's profeſſed enemy, of the Spaniard, and the duke of Alva, to ſet the queen of Scots at liberty, and reſtore the popiſh religion in England.

" Laſtly, That he had relieved Herries, the Scot, and other the queen's enemies, in Scotland."

The duke deſired that he might be allowed counſel to plead for him, and that he might be informed which were articles of treaſon, and which not; but both his requeſts were refuſed. It was on the two ſuppoſitions, that Mary, and the lords of her party, were enemies to Elizabeth and her crown, that the charge of high-treaſon was chiefly founded againſt the duke, who was by his peers found guilty, to the aſtoniſhment of every unprejudiced perſon, the infinite concern of all good men, and the grief of the people in general; for no public evidence that could convict him of high-treaſon, was produced againſt him, nor were the witneſſes brought into court, as the ſtatute of 5 & 6 Edw. VI. required*: nor had he the ſmalleſt indulgence, or opportunity to prepare his defence. It is true, while in the Tower, he confeſſed ſo much, that it was thought he came within the exception of the above mentioned ſtatute, which, in caſe of voluntary confeſſion, diſpenſes with the producing witneſſes in court; but ſtill the proceeding againſt him was inhuman and ungenerous. The reader may ſee a full account of the above in Camden, and in the Collection of State Trials.

The condemnation of a nobleman ſo high in rank, and ſo dear to the people, revived the compaſſion of the public for his fate; and ſeveral plots were laid for his deliverance, which coming to the knowlege of Elizabeth, ſhe thought no remedy was ſo effectual againſt the danger of the times as a parliament, which was ſuddenly ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter, on the eighth of May. In the mean time the Spaniſh ambaſſador was ordered to quit the kingdom, for having entered into a plot with one Mather and Barney, two deſperate ruffians, to kill both the queen and ſecretary Burleigh, and ſet the duke of Norfolk at liberty. Mather confeſſed, that he had been offered money by the ambaſſador and his ſecretary, to kill Burleigh; and Hall, another aſſaſſin in the plot, ſwore the ſame; upon which they were all three executed.

The diſgraceful diſmiſſion of the Spaniſh ambaſſador was ſo highly reſented by Philip, that he ordered all the Engliſh ſubjects in Spain to be impriſoned, and their effects confiſcated, and prohibited all commerce between the two nations. His reſentment was very little regarded by Elizabeth, who, in the month of April, concluded a defenſive league, at Blois, with Charles IX. of France, by which both parties agreed to aſſiſt each other againſt all invaſion: they agreed that no innovation ſhould be made in the kingdom of Scotland; but that they ſhould jointly defend it from all foreigners: and it was ſtipulated, that in caſe any Engliſh ſhips ſhould be taken or ſeized in the Low Countries, or in Spain, the French king ſhould ſolicit reſtitution at the court of Madrid, or, that interceſſion failing, make repriſals upon the Spaniſh and Flemiſh ſubjects in his dominions; Elizabeth engaging to act in the ſame manner in his behalf†. The lord high-admiral Clinton, now created earl of Lincoln, was ſent, with a magnificent train, to Paris, to ſee this treaty ratified by Charles; and the marſhal de Montmorency arriving in England, to procure Elizabeth's ratification, was inveſted with the order of the Garter. Immediately after this event the poſt of lord-keeper of the great-ſeal, vacant by the death of the old marquis of Wincheſter, was conferred upon lord Burleigh; the privy-ſeal was given to the lord Effingham; the earl of Suſſex was appointed lord-chamberlain of the houſhold; and ſecretary Smith made chancellor of the order of the Garter. About the ſame time (namely, the fourth of April) the queen favoured Walter d'Evreux, or Devereux, with the title of earl of Eſſex, he being a deſcendant of the noble family of Bourchier, formerly earls of Eſſex, by the grand-mother's ſide.

The parliament meeting in May, according to its ſummons, the commons addreſſed the queen that the duke of Norfolk might be put to death without farther delay, alleging this ſtep was neceſſary for her own preſervation and the peace of the kingdom. Elizabeth had hitherto, from a tenderneſs which ſhe well knew how to affect, delayed to order the duke's execution; but now pretending that ſhe could no longer reſiſt the importunities of her people, ſhe ſigned the fatal warrant, and the duke was brought to execution on Tower-hill, on the ſecond of June. His behaviour was, as it had been all along, calm and decent; he bewailed his having broken his faith with Elizabeth, by renewing his intrigues with Mary; but to the laſt denied his having conſented to deprive Elizabeth of her crown, to invade the kingdom, or to deſtroy the city of London; and openly declaring that he died in the proteſtant faith of the church of England, and refuſing to have his eyes blinded, as being, he ſaid, fearleſs of death, he received the ſtroke that finiſhed his life.

Thus fell Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, the firſt nobleman in England. He was grand-ſon to Thomas Howard, ſecond duke of Norfolk, and lord high-treaſurer under Henry VIII. and ſon to Henry, earl of Surry, who was beheaded by that prince, in the beginning of the year 1547. This Thomas was born in 1536, and ſucceeded his grand-father in his title: queen Elizabeth honoured him with the order of the Garter, ſoon after her acceſſion to the throne, and advanced him to the poſt of lieutenant-general of her forces North of the Humber. We have already ſhewn, in the courſe of this reign, how he fell under diſgrace with his ſovereign, on account of his propoſed marriage with the queen of Scots, and that he had promiſed, under his hand, never more to concern himſelf in that affair without the queen's approbation; notwithſtanding which, and the danger that attended the breach of his engagements with a princeſs of Elizabeth's jealous and arbitrary temper, he again countenanced the propoſal, which ended in his ruin. All of his family had firmly adhered to the catholic religion except this duke, who embraced proteſtantiſm in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign; and as he declared he died in the reformed religion, charity forbids us to diſpute the truth of his dying aſſertion. He had been thrice married: firſt to Mary, daughter to Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, by whom he had one ſon, named Philip; ſecondly, to Margaret, daughter to Thomas, lord Arundel, by whom he had two ſons and two daughters; and laſtly, to Elizabeth, daughter to ſir Francis Leybourn, knight, by whom he had no iſſue.

Some few days after the duke's execution, queen Elizabeth ſent William, lord Delawar, ſir Ralph Sadler, Dr. Wilſon, and Thomas Bromley, eſq. to the queen of Scots, now overwhelmed with mourning, to expoſtulate with her by way of accuſation, for that ſhe had uſurped the title and arms of the crown of England, and had not renounced the ſame, as was agreed upon in the treaty of Edinburgh: that, for the full poſſeſſing herſelf thereof, ſhe had treated of a marriage with the duke of Norfolk, without acquainting the queen therewith; for the conſummation whereof, and the freeing the duke out of the Tower by force of arms, ſhe had uſed all methods poſſible by her: that ſhe had raiſed a rebellion in the North, relieved notorious rebels in Scotland and Flanders, petitioned for a foreign aid from the Spaniard and others, by Rodolfi, an Italian, in order to invade England; and conſpired with certain of the Engliſh, who ſhould free her out of priſon, and declare her queen of England: that ſhe had received letters from the pope, wherein he promiſed to cheriſh her as a hen doth her chickens, and eſteem them true ſons of the church who ſhould ſtand for her: laſtly, that ſhe had procured the pope's bull againſt the queen, and permitted her party in foreign parts to ſtyle her publicly queen of England. To all which Mary anſwered in general terms, inſiſting upon her being born of the blood-royal of England; and deſiring that, if there were any malpractices laid to her charge, ſhe might be allowed to give in her perſonal anſwer at the next ſeſſion of the Engliſh parliament*. However, as there was no deſign at preſent to bring her to a trial, the affair reſted there; only Elizabeth thought convenient to confine her good ſiſter more cloſely, and to reduce the number of her domeſtics.

All this time Scotland was diſtreſſed with a more cruel civil war than ever, and for two months no quarter was given on either ſide. At laſt the two courts of France and England ordered their miniſters, le Croc and Randolph, to mediate a ceſſation of arms, which they effected, from the firſt of Auguſt to the firſt of October. The earl of Morton was generally looked upon as the author of thoſe violences, and it was owing to him, that, contrary to the general ſenſe of the Scots, the earl of Northumberland was now delivered up to the lord Hunſdon, and by him conveyed to York, where he was beheaded. The earl of Marr, the new regent of Scotland, though a wiſe and virtuous man, found himſelf too weak to withſtand Morton, even after he perceived that he was the tool of the Engliſh, and that nothing was done but by his direction and advice. Killigrew, who was ſent to ſucceed Randolph in Scotland, confeſſed privately to ſir James Melvill, that the Engliſh court depended upon Morton only, as its friend in Scotland; and that, unleſs Mary's party could bring him over, they were to expect no favour from England. Ledington had been ſenſible of this ſome time, and ſir James Melvill dealt ſo earneſtly with the regent, that a coalition between him and Mary's friends in the caſtle was actually formed, and upon the point of being declared, when the regent, after dining at Morton's houſe, was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs which carried him off†.

Notwithſtanding the great ſolemnity and proteſtations of friendſhip and ſincerity on both ſides, with which the treaty of Blois had been ſworn to and ratified by Elizabeth and Charles IX. of France, the remainder of that monarch's life was conſtantly employed in ſome action that proved his intentions to be never to perform any one of the articles, any farther than they, or any of them, might ſerve to cover ſome baſe and diſhonourable deſign; his chief drift being to tie Elizabeth's hands, and to lull the Huguenots in his kingdom into a careleſs ſecurity, till he could effect his bloody purpoſe of totally exterminating their ſect, of which the maſſacre of ſeveral thouſands of them, in cold blood, on St. Bartholomew's day this year, under the royal inſpection at Paris, and openly approved of by the pope, was a melancholy earneſt‡. And at the very time he ſhewed the greateſt deſire to live in a good

‡ As the particulars of this bloody maſſacre are not properly introducible into the body of our hiſtory, and yet may not be unacceptable to the reader, we have reſerved the relation of them for this note.

This inhuman butchery, which was deviſed by the order, and under the immediate inſpection, of Charles IX. and the queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, evince them to be two monſters of perfidy and diſſimulation. This dreadful day had been meditated and planned for above two years. It is hard to ſay, how a woman like Catherine de Medicis, brought up in the midſt of pleaſures, and to whom the Huguenot party had given the leaſt umbrage of any, could have been capable of forming ſo barbarous a reſolution. It is ſtill more ſurprizing in a young king, not quite twenty years of age. This plot was laid with as deep diſſimulation as the action itſelf was horrible.

The queen of Navarre was decoyed to Paris by a propoſal of marriage between her ſon, who was afterwards Henry IV. and the princeſs Margaret, ſiſter to Charles IX. the reigning king. The ſame pretence was uſed for alluring thither Henry, then prince of Bearn, and his uncle the prince of Condé. The admiral Coligni was invited by Charles, with a promiſe of declaring him general in a war againſt Spain in the Low Countries, and Coligni was accompanied by other chiefs of the Huguenots, depending upon the peace which had been lately ratified. The queen of Navarre died ſuddenly, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon. The admiral going home to his own lodgings, about eleven in the forenoon, and reading a petition which had been preſented to him, was wounded by a ſhot from a window, fired by one Maurevel, hired for that purpoſe. The king viſiting him in the afternoon, expreſſed the utmoſt concern for his diſaſter, and aſſured him he would take ample vengeance of the aſſaſſin and his abettors. This perfidious prince had, with his mother and council, already projected the ſcheme, which was now put in execution on the eve of St. Bartholomew. The duke of Guiſe, who was at the head of this ſhocking enterprize, communicated the king's intention to the preſident Charron, intendant of Paris, who ordered the captains of the different wards to arm the burghers privately: that at the alarm, which would be rung on the bell of the palace-clock, the citizens ſhould place lights in their windows, then break into the houſes of the Huguenots, and put them all to the ſword, without diſtinction. About midnight the duke of Guiſe, accompanied by the duke d'Aumale, the grand-prior of good understanding with Elizabeth, he was taking private measures to cause her disturbances both in England and Scotland, of which her watchful and faithful ambassador, Walsingham, gave her sufficient notice; yet, though Elizabeth could not longer depend upon such an ally, having a mind to see a little farther into the designs of her enemies, she kept an outward appearance of friendship with Charles, and even carried her political dissimulation so far as to stand god-mother to his new-born daughter, and to countenance a renewed proposal of marriage with his brother, the duke of Alençon, to the great surprize and terror of the Huguenots, who dreaded the most fatal effects from the growing union betwixt England and France.

But though Elizabeth so cautiously avoided the coming to extremities with Charles, whose union with the courts of Spain and Rome for the extermination of the protestants filled her with very disagreeable apprehensions, she gave all the assistance in her power to such of that sect as lived near the frontiers, and, immediately on the first news of the massacre of their brethren, fled into England; and when the French ambassador presumed to make a proposal from his master to have them delivered up as rebellious fugitives, Elizabeth plainly told him, that humanity would not suffer her to shut the door against so many wretches, who were driven by the barbarity of their enemies to seek refuge in her country.

Mean while she prepared herself for that attack which seemed to threaten her from the combined power and violence of the Romanists, as she, not without reason, looked upon the late massacre as the overt-act of the league of Bayonne, which had been formed for the extinction of the protestant religion. She therefore fortified Portsmouth, put her fleet in order, exercised her militia, cultivated popularity with her subjects, not only by restoring several sums of money she had borrowed of them for her own use, but also by freeing England at this time of the debts which her father and brother had contracted with foreign courts, and were increased by yearly interest: she also caused the obligations the city of London had given for those sums to be remitted, to the great joy of the citizens. But we are now to attend the concerns of the Netherlands.

The same principles which had engaged Elizabeth to support the Huguenots in France, would have led her to assist the distressed protestants in the Low Countries, but the mighty power of Philip, the tranquility of all his other dominions, and the great force which he maintained in these mutinous provinces, kept her in awe, and obliged her, notwithstanding all temptations and provocations, to preserve some terms of amity with that monarch; and Philip having remonstrated to her, by a new ambassador, that many of the Flemish exiles, who infested the seas and despoiled his master's subjects, were harboured and entertained in England, contrary to the leagues subsisting between the two courts, Elizabeth thought proper to issue a proclamation, that all the Flemish, suspected of rebellion, should forthwith depart the realm: a proclamation which, in its effect, was so far from answering the views of the Spaniards, that it proved extremely prejudicial to their interests. These desperate exiles, finding no longer any possibility of subsistence, were forced to undertake the most perilous attempts. William Vandermark, lord of Luney, a Netherlander of distinction, with a great number of his countrymen, leaving England in the beginning of April, surprized the Brill* first, and then Flushing; and, before the end of this year, almost the whole provinces of Holland and Zealand had revolted from the Spaniards, and openly declared against the tyranny of the duke of Alva, whom they, by their late successful efforts, excluded from the sea. This neglect of the sea-coasts of the Low Countries was accounted an irreparable oversight in the duke of Alva, who was, in other respects, a great general; and was the first means of enabling the protestants to hold out so long as they did against all the power of Philip; it likewise encouraged Elizabeth, who had now a strong fleet at sea, by which a safe communication could be kept up with the Netherlands, to permit her subjects to go over to serve in Flanders, as in a school of war, either under the prince of Orange ‡, or the duke of Alva, as their affections should direct them. Some of the popish affected went to the Spaniards, of France, a number of officers, and three hundred choice soldiers, marched to the admiral's hotel, broke open the gates, and entered the house. A colonel and two other desperadoes going up stairs to the admiral's apartment, butchered him without question, and threw his body out of the window. All his domestics met with the same fate, while the trained-bands acted the same tragedy in the Louvre, as well as within the city. Two thousand persons were massacred that night, and a great number perished next day. At the same time the Huguenots were sacrificed in like manner by orders from court, at Meaux, Orleans, Troye, Bourges, Angers, Tholouse, Rouen, and Lyons. The mangled body of the admiral was insulted by the populace, and hung upon the gibbet of Montfaucon. The young king of Navarre and his cousin, the prince of Condé, were closetted by the king, who told them, that if they refused to embrace the Roman catholic religion, they should not be alive in three days. The parliament being assembled, and informed by their sovereign of the steps he had taken, in consequence (as he said) of a conspiracy against the catholics, the president, who was father to the celebrated historian Thuanus, harangued in praise of the king's conduct; and the advocate-general proposed that the admiral and his accomplices might be proceeded against in form of law. Accordingly the murdered Coligni was tried, condemned, and hanged in effigy. In a word, this whole affair was one of the most infamous plans of perfidious cruelty that ever was executed, and leaves an indelible stain on the French nation.

* A fortified town at the mouth of the river Maes, in the isle of Voorn, in Holland, five miles distant from Helvoetsluys.

‡ William of Nassau, prince of Orange, descended from a sovereign family of great lustre and antiquity in Germany, inheriting the possession of a sovereign family in France, on account of his noble birth and immense riches. as well as his personal virtues, was universally regarded as the greatest subject who lived in those provinces. He had opposed, by all regular and dutiful means, the progress of the Spanish usurpations; and when Philip conducted his army into the Netherlands, and assumed the government, this prince, well acquainted with the violent character of the man, and tyrannical spirit of the court of Madrid, wisely fled from the danger which threatened him, and returned to his paternal estate and dominions in Germany. He was cited to appear before Alva's tribunal; was condemned in his absence, declared a rebel, and his ample possessions in the Low Countries were confiscated. In revenge, he levied an army of protestants in the empire, and made some attempts to restore the Flemings to liberty, but was still repulsed by the vigilance and military conduct of Alva; and by the great bravery as well as discipline of those veteran Spaniards who served under that general. The revolt of Holland and Zealand, provinces which the prince of Orange formerly commanded, and where he was infinitely beloved, called him anew from his retreat, and he added conduct no less than spirit to that obstinate resistance which was here made to the Spanish dominion. By uniting the revolted towns into a league, he laid the foundation of that illustrious commonwealth, the offspring of industry and liberty, whose arms and policy have made so signal a figure in every transaction in Europe. Hume's Hist. of the Tudors, vol. ii. p. 548, 549.

but far greater numbers preſſed to ſerve under the prince of Orange; the firſt of whom was Thomas Morgan, who carried three hundred Engliſh to Fluſhing; then followed, by his procurement, nine companies more, under the conduct of Humphrey Gilbert. Theſe volunteers arrived juſt as the duke of Alva was preparing to recover Fluſhing and the other ſea-port towns, and, it is thought, defeated the duke's deſign. At the ſame time Elizabeth, by the advice of her council, ſent other relief to the prince of Orange; but it was ſo ſecret that the Spaniards had no grounds to reproach her for breach of faith.

The year 1573 opened with the embaſſy of William Somerſet, earl of Worceſter, who was ſent by Elizabeth into France, with a font of maſſy gold, to ſtand at the baptiſm of the new-born daughter of Charles IX. which was ſo highly reliſhed by that court, that they began now to be more and more earneſt for an alliance with Elizabeth, and the duke of Alençon was ordered to write repeated letters of ſuitorſhip to her. At laſt the queen-mother became very preſſing, by the French ambaſſador here, for the young duke to have leave to come and pay his reſpects to the queen of England in perſon, to which Elizabeth, wearied out with their importunities, after ſome time affected to aſſent, but upon condition that he ſhould not take it as a diſgrace if he returned without obtaining his ſuit.

But Elizabeth hearing ſoon after that his brother Henry, duke of Anjou, was elected king of Poland, and that Charles IX. was ill of a dangerous diſorder, ſhe gave intimation to Alençon, by Edward Horſey, governor of the Iſle of Wight (whom ſhe had appointed her reſident at the French court in the room of Walſingham, now recalled at his own requeſt) that he ſhould not for the preſent think of undertaking a journey to England; but, if he meant to give her real proofs of his affection, that he ſhould firſt procure a peace for the diſtreſſed Huguenots in France, which would render his reception in England much more favourable. The Romaniſts had for ſome time cloſely beſieged Rochelle, the bulwark of the proteſtants in France, who made ſuch a deſperate reſiſtance, that the duke of Anjou, who commanded againſt the place, loſt twenty-four thouſand men, without making any conſiderable progreſs in the ſiege. When he received tidings of his being elected king of Poland, this event affording him a ſalvo for his reputation, he concluded a treaty with the inhabitants, in which their allies of Niſmes and Montauban, and at laſt all the proteſtants of France, were comprehended, and in ſome places allowed the free exerciſe of their religion. And now the king of France and the queen-mother preſſed the affair of the marriage more cloſely than ever to Elizabeth, and withal they requeſted Elizabeth to grant the duke of Anjou a ſafe-conduct, in caſe he ſhould take his voyage to Poland by ſea. To this laſt requeſt ſhe not only conſented with great alacrity, but alſo offered a fleet to conduct him thither. In the mean while the duke of Alençon falling very ill of a fever, his mother ſignified the ſame to Elizabeth by the count de Retz, and excuſing the duke thereupon for not coming to England as he had determined; Elizabeth, who had by this time received a report but little to the duke's advantage, who was repreſented to her as a very homely figure of a man, and much defaced with the ſmall-pox, cooled in her affection ſo much, that ſhe gladly accepted the excuſe, and even ſhewed a manifeſt reluctance to have any connections with him.

All this time, ſince the death of the earl of Marr, there had been no regent in Scotland; but now, by the procurement of Elizabeth, James Douglas, earl of Morton, was choſen regent; who when his authority, in a parliamentary aſſembly, was eſtabliſhed, enacted many excellent laws for the ſupport of the proteſtant religion againſt papiſts and heretics, in the name of the king. But the protection and keeping of the royal perſon he confirmed to Alexander, earl of Marr, ſon of the deceaſed regent, though that nobleman was himſelf a minor; the cuſtody of the perſons of the Scottiſh kings, during their minority, belonging, by especial privilege, to that family. In the interim the French king ſent his ambaſſador, Verac, to engage the earls of Athol and Huntley, with large promiſes, to oppoſe the regent; while Elizabeth, on the other hand, exerted all her efforts to ſupport her creature. She had already found means, through Killigrew, her ambaſſador at the Scottiſh court, to draw the duke of Chatelerault, with the moſt eminent of that faction, to acknowlege the regent, by a public inſtrument, dated in March this year; but William Kirkaldy, laird of Grainge, whom Murray (when he was regent, had made governor of Edinburgh caſtle), the lord Home, Ledington, the biſhop of Dunkeld, and ſome others, could by no means be brought to own Morton, but fortified themſelves in the caſtle; and, truſting to the natural ſtrength of the place, and to the ſupplies promiſed them by the French king and the duke of Alva, they reſolved to hold it for queen Mary, againſt all oppoſition.

Hereupon Morton and his party ſent a deputation to the Engliſh court, for aſſiſtance to reduce the caſtle, then deemed impregnable. Elizabeth's wonted policy would not ſuffer her to be a quiet ſpectator, till the fortune of war ſhould enable France and Spain to pour in troops into Scotland: ſhe therefore readily liſtened to the requeſt of the deputies, and promiſed them immediate aſſiſtance, upon certain conditions, whereof one was, that ten hoſtages ſhould be ſent into England, to be ſecurity for the ſafe return of the troops and ammunition, unleſs by the common hazard of war they ſhould be ſlain or loſt. The conditions being agreed on, ſhe ordered ſir William Drury, the marſhal of Berwick, to march into Scotland, at the head of twelve hundred ſoldiers, and three hundred pioneers with a ſtrong train of artillery. Killigrew, the Engliſh ambaſſador, ſerved as an officer in this army, together with ſeveral gentlemen of the firſt diſtinction as volunteers. Upon the Engliſh forces entering the Borders, they were joined by one thouſand Scots and four pieces of cannon; and on the twenty-fifth of April the whole army appeared before Edinburgh caſtle.

The place was very ill provided with ammunition, and the number of ſoldiers in garriſon did not exceed one hundred and ſixty. Notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, Kirkaldy, who was a man of exemplary courge, conduct, and experience, made a vigorous defence for three-and-twenty days; but, at laſt, their water failing them, and a ſickneſs getting among the garriſon, which raged ſo as to reduce it to fifteen individuals, Kirkaldy was obliged obliged to capitulate, and obtained from ſir William Drury very honourable conditions: but Morton having, during the ſiege, practiſed with Elizabeth, ſhe refuſed to accept of the priſoners taken in the caſtle as her priſoners, and ſent orders to ſir William Drury to deliver them all up, to be diſpoſed of as the regent of Scotland ſhould think proper. Accordingly the gallant laird of Grainge, James Kirkaldy, and ſome others, were ignominiouſly executed upon a gibbet at the Market-croſs of Edinburgh. Camden ſays, an hundred of the family of Kirkaldy offered to be vaſſals for ever to the regent, to pay a yearly penſion of three thouſand marks, and two thouſand pounds Scots in hand, if he would ſpare his life, but that Morton would not hear of it. As to Ledington, Elizabeth had taken care to give orders for his ſafety; but he died at Leith a few days after the capitulation, having contracted a mortal diſeaſe in the caſtle, a place noted for its unwholeſomeneſs. The lord Home, on paying ten thouſand pounds to Morton, was pardoned, and put in the poſſeſſion of his eſtates.

The regent, not yet ſatisfied with blood, ſent to demand of Elizabeth, that ſhe would deliver into his hands the biſhop of Roſs, who had been releaſed from the Tower, at the interceſſion of the French ambaſſador in England, and committed in cuſtody to the biſhop of Winchester: but the ambaſſador remonſtrating againſt ſuch an outrage upon good faith and the laws of nations, the queen of England rejected Morton's demand, and allowed the biſhop to withdraw himſelf into the French dominions. And now Scotland began to reſt a little from the inteſtine troubles which had ſo long deſolated it, and every thing being reduced under the authority of the young king, and a regent devoted to England, Elizabeth was freed from great uneaſineſs: and, as a farther increaſe of her happineſs, ſhe received advice from the Low Countries, that the Zealanders had defeated a fleet under the duke of Medina Celi, which was deſtined for the aſſiſtance of the queen of Scots and her friends; as alſo that the duke of Alva, finding in the reſolute reſiſtance of the oppreſſed Flemings, the pernicious effects of his violent counſels, had ſolicited to be recalled from the government, and that don Lewis de Zuniga, commendator of Roqueſanto, in Caſtile, had been ſent to replace him. The tyrant Alva departed finally from the Netherlands, the beginning of the following year, leaving his name in execration to the inhabitants, and boaſting in his turn, that, during the courſe of five years government, he had delivered above eighteen thouſand of theſe rebellious heretics into the hands of the executioner *.

This year died William, lord Howard of Effingham, lord privy-ſeal, ſon of Thomas Howard the martial duke of Norfolk, by his ſecond wife, Agnes Tilney. He was made lord high-admiral by queen Mary, and afterwards lord-chamberlain, in which poſt he ſerved queen Elizabeth; and was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles, who, a while after, was made lord-chamberlain and lord high-admiral. This year alſo died Reginald Grey, earl of Kent, whom the queen, the year before, had raiſed from a private gentleman to that dignity, after the title had been dormant fifty years: his brother Henry ſucceeded him in his honours.

The ſucceeding year, 1574, the duke of Alençon grew more and more importunate in his ſuit to Elizabeth, inſomuch that he obtained her conſent to come into England any time before the twentieth of May; and to this conceſſion ſhe was the more readily moved, becauſe ſhe knew the young prince to be a great oppoſer of the family of the Guiſes, her ſworn enemies: but before Elizabeth's anſwer could be carried to the duke, ſhe received advice from Valentine Dale, doctor of the civil law and her reſident in France, that Alençon and the king of Navarre were both put under arreſt, through the intereſt of the Guiſes, who had perſuaded the queen-mother that they held a treaſonable correſpondence with the chief of the proteſtant intereſt in France. It appears that Alençon, who was a weak young man, actually confeſſed that he had held ſome conſultation with the duke de Bouillon, a proteſtant chief, about his intended marriage with the queen of England, and of the beſt meaſures to be taken for ſecuring to the proteſtants the ſafe enjoyment of the privileges granted them by the late treaty of Rochelle, as alſo for ſupporting the Flemings againſt the oppreſſive power of the court of Spain. Elizabeth was greatly concerned at the news of Alençon's impriſonment and that of the king of Navarre, leſt they ſhould be intimidated to confeſs ſome practices which ſhe had underhand held with the Huguenots; and accordingly ſhe immediately wrote to Dale, to re-aſſure thoſe two princes, and to give them the ſtrongeſt promiſes of her friendſhip and protection. As Dale himſelf durſt not be ſeen in executing this commiſſion, he committed it to Thomas Wiekes, his ſecretary, who diſguiſed himſelf to admiration; nor is there, in all the confeſſions and declarations given by thoſe two princes, the ſmalleſt circumſtance reflecting on the honour of the engagements of the queen of England. Soon after Elizabeth ſent ſir Thomas Randolph into France, to the queen-mother, to bring about, if poſſible, a reconciliation between that princeſs and her ſon, the duke of Alençon, and the king of Navarre.

But while this affair was on the carpet, Charles IX. died, on the thirtieth of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after having rendered his name odious to all the world, at a time of life when his own ſubjects were not reckoned out of their minority. He died of a very extraordinary diſtemper: his blood oozed from all the pores of his body. This uncommon end, which, however, is not without example (and was probably the effect of a putrid colliquation of the blood, and a general relaxation of the ſmaller veſſels), paſſed with the people, eſpecially the proteſtants, for the effect of divine vengeance: an uſeful notion, did it put a ſtop to the wickedneſs of thoſe who are powerful or unfortunate enough not to be ſubject to the curb of the laws!

The queen-mother took her meaſures ſo well, that, cauſing the dying king to confer on her the regency of the realm, ſhe kept all quiet till the arrival of the duke of Anjou, king of Poland, who ſucceeded his brother, by the name of Henry III. He arrived in France the fifth of September this year, but came not to Paris till about the middle of February following.

Nothing memorable paſſed in England during the year 1574. The only thing Camden has remarked in his Annals, is the marriage of Charles, earl of Lenox, uncle to the young king of Scotland, with Elizabeth Cavendiſh, daughter to the counteſs of Shrewſbury: as this marriage was made unknown to the queen, ſhe impriſoned the mothers of the new-married couple. It may not be uſeleſs to mention, that this year, in order to put a check to the growing luxury of the Engliſh, eſpecially in dreſs, the queen, by proclamation, commanded that every one ſhould, within fourteen days, wear cloaths of ſuch a faſhion, of which ſhe herſelf fixed the pattern. On the third of April the queen granted a commiſſion to lord Burleigh, lord high-treaſurer of England, and to ſir Walter Mildmay, chancellor and under-treaſurer of the Exchequer, to manumiſe and enfranchiſe bondmen and bond-women, or, as they are now called, copyholders, regardant and appertaining to the royal manors and poſſeſſions within the counties of Cornwall, Devon, Somerſet, and Gloceſter *. It is with reluctance that we muſt obſerve, the ſpirit of Chriſtianity in the church could not keep pace with its doctrines, for we find, in Stowe, that ſome of our reforming biſhops, about this time, for a few doubtful points in religion, dragged innocent people to the ſtake, where they were burned to death, with all the circumſtances of popiſh cruelty.

In the Netherlands, the confederates ſtill continued their progreſs, taking ſeveral towns from the Spaniards. But, on the other hand, Lewis, count of Naſſau, who was leading an army to his brother, the prince of Orange, was defeated upon Moker heath, near Nimeguen, and was himſelf ſlain, with his brother Henry and Chriſtopher Caſimir, count Palatine. Upon this untoward accident the prince of Orange began to entertain thoughts of applying to the French; but Elizabeth ſent Daniel Rogers to diſſuade him from it; which he not being able to do, ſhe ſent Henry, lord Cobham, to Philip of Spain to inform him of the prince of Orange's deſign.

The paucity of events in England during this inactive year, affords room to introduce a brief account of the affairs of its ſiſter kingdom, Ireland.

There the deprivatory bull, fulminated by the pope againſt Elizabeth, continued to have dreadful effects. But ſir John Perot, preſident of Munſter, kept that turbulent country in ſo good order, that James Fitz Maurice, the moſt formidable of all the confederates againſt the Engliſh government, was forced to ſubmit. In Connaught, the ſons of the earl of Clanrickard took arms againſt the ſevere government of the preſident ſir Edward Fitton, and engaged a thouſand mercenary Scots in their ſervice. The earl their father, who was then priſoner in Dublin, offered to ſuppreſs his ſons, and the government there would have entruſted him with the command; but Elizabeth, more prudently, removed Fitton from his place, and the rebels then returning to their duty, the thouſand Scots were left to the mercy of the garriſon-ſoldiers, under captain Collier, by whom they were all cut to pieces. The earl of Kildare was not ſo ſucceſsful in Leinſter, againſt the O'Mores, whom he was unable to reſtrain from joining the O'Connors, and making an irruption into the Pale, where they burned Athlone, and were guilty of dreadful exceſſes, while their confederate Brien M'Phelim took and burned Carrickfergus. Fitz Maurice being ſubdued by ſir John Perot, who likewiſe took the caſtle of Mayo, wherein was a garriſon of French free-booters, the rebels of Leinſter were diſappointed in their intention of joining thoſe of Munſter: but M'Phelim ſtill continued in arms.

Thoſe repeated commotions in Ireland, the ſuccours which the rebels received from abroad, and the ſmall proſpect of reducing the iſland to perfect quiet, put Elizabeth upon very ſerious conſiderations. Upon examining her accounts laſt year, ſhe found that the groſs amount of all the revenues of Ireland, ſince her ſucceſſion to the throne, came only to one hundred and ninety thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-nine pounds, ſeven ſhillings, and ſix pence half-penny. This vaſt diſproportion of expence and ſupply made her lend an ear to a propoſal of the earl of Eſſex, an active young nobleman, full of ſpirits, and under ſome diſguſts with the courtiers: it was, that the earl ſhould, before Michaelmas, carry over to Ireland, two hundred horſe and four hundred foot, and maintain them there, to be employed againſt the rebels for two years, the queen furniſhing the ſame number during that time; while the earl was to have a commiſſion to be captain-general for ſeven years. In conſideration of this, the queen was to give him half the lordſhips of Clandeboy, Ferney, and other lands to a great extent, which were to be occupied by him; with an equal number of ſoldiers, as the queen ſhould think fit to maintain upon the other half of the ſaid lordſhips. They were to be at equal expence in maintaining neceſſary fortifications. Every horſeman ſerving as volunteer gratis for two years, was to be recompenſed with four hundred acres of land, at two pence an acre at the ſame rent. Several other articles were inſerted in this agreement, which ſeems to have been founded on the foot of the old feodal tenure; but the above are the chief. Eſſex was ſo fond of this command, which ſet him upon the footing of a prince, that he borrowed ten thouſand pounds of Elizabeth, upon a mortgage of his lands in Eſſex; and, about the latter end of Auguſt this year, he landed in Ireland, accompanied by the lords Dacres and Rich, three ſons of the lord Norris, and many other gentlemen of diſtinction, who ſerved under him as volunteers. But Fitz Williams, the lord-deputy, conſidered this command, given the earl of Eſſex, as derogating from his own authority, and underhand gave him all the obſtruction he could. M'Phelim, one of the principal chieftains, at firſt ſubmitted to the earl, but ſoon after revolted, preceiving the troops he brought with him were but few, and ill diſciplined. The lord Rich and ſir Henry Knolles in a few weeks became ſo diſpirited, that they returned to England, which threw a damp upon the whole expedition. The lord-deputy, under frivolous pretences, with-held the earl's commiſſion, ſo that his hands were in a manner tied up; while M'Phelim, putting himſelf at the head of the Iriſh and Hebridian Scots, endeavoured to cut him off. With great difficulty he kept his ground all this ſummer, and endeavoured to fortify Clandeboy. In the following ſpring the lord-deputy marched againſt the earl of Deſmond, who had eſcaped out of priſon, and Eſſex was ordered to guard the borders of Ulſter. The earl of Deſmond, through the perſuaſion of Eſſex, ſubmitted himſelf to the government. The reſt of the year was ſpent in reducing Turlogh, Leinigh, Con O'Donald, and the other Iriſh. But Eſſex, broken both in body and mind, earneſtly applied to Elizabeth for leave to return, or to allow him pay for one hundred horſe and ſix hundred foot, or to grant him the peninſula of Mayo. Elizabeth of herſelf was inclinable to have recalled him, but Eſſex had enemies, particularly Leiceſter, who did all they could to prevent his returning to court, ſo that he continued in his diſagreeable commiſſion, to the almoſt utter ruin of his fortune. Towards the end of the year 1574, Eſſex ſent over to Elizabeth a plan for civilizing Ulſter, by building there three new towns and ten forts. While the project was under deliberation, M'Phelim, Turlogh, and the Scots, again endeavoured to ſurprize and cut him off: but the earl diſcovering the plot, he was beforehand with the conſpirators, of whom he killed two hundred, and took M'Phelim and his wife priſoners. Theſe commotions in Ireland gave Elizabeth great diſquiet, ſhe looking upon them as fomented underhand by the French and Spaniards; ſhe therefore redoubled her attention towards ſettling the affairs of that country. One Chaderton, an Engliſh gentleman, offered to people the Fues and the O'Hanlan territory with Engliſh; but the inexpreſſible obſtinacy of the native Iriſh, and the ſelfiſhneſs of the Engliſh already ſettled in Ireland, defeated that deſign, to the ruin of Chaderton's fortune. A worſe fate befel a natural ſon of ſir Thomas Smith, the ſecretary of ſtate, who was ſent over to plant a colony in the peninſula called the Arles, in the eaſt of Ulſter: every horſeman inhabiting that tract was to have one hundred and forty Iriſh acres, and every footman one hundred and twenty (almoſt five hundred Engliſh acres); but the deſign was defeated, and young Smith, after carrying over the colony, was treacherouſly murdered by Neal Breanarths. His death was ſoon after revenged by Malbey, the Engliſh governor of Lecale, who killed the murderer, and left his body to be devoured by wolves. So many untowardly circumſtances determined Elizabeth at laſt to give the earl of Eſſex leave to return to England, which he did; and to change the government of the country, which was once more put into the hands of ſir Henry Sidney. This gentleman had ſerved in that capacity twice already with great ſucceſs; and the finances there were now put under a new regulation. He undertook to plant Leih and Offaley with Engliſh adventurers, and, if poſſible, to raiſe from them ſums for diſcharging the crown-debts in Ireland. But Elizabeth, in the mean time, beſides the ordinary revenues of Ireland, was to remit him twenty thouſand pounds every year out of England, provided that he fortified Carrickfergus, and built ſome bridges, neceſſary for the quiet of the country*.

Early in the year 1575, the queen ſent Roger, lord North, into France, to congratulate Henry III. on his return and happy inauguration into the kingdom of his anceſtors. Henry was no ſooner ſeated in the throne than he reſolved to purſue the favourite ſcheme of his mother, and the late king his brother, to extirpate the proteſtants, and actually renewed hoſtilities againſt the Huguenots, without any provocation given by them ſince the peace granted by Charles IX. in the year 1573. But, fearing the queen of England ſhould aſſiſt them, his firſt care was to renew the treaty of Blois in its utmoſt extent, to which Elizabeth conſented, and, by Mr. de la Chatre, ſent Henry the order of the Garter.

This, however, did not hinder her from furniſhing John Caſimir, ſon to the deceaſed elector Palatine, with a ſum of money, to levy and lead into France a body of ten thouſand Germans to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre, who, making their eſcape from the French court, had put themſelves at the head of the malecontent party, and made war upon the government jointly with the Huguenots. It was probably to furniſh out ſupplies for this occaſion, that the queen, in April this year, iſſued out privy ſeals for a loan of ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling, half of which was charged upon the citizens of London, ten thouſand pounds on the clergy, and the other twenty thouſand pounds on the gentry of the kingdom.

Whilſt Elizabeth was thus ſecure from any attempts on the ſide of France or Spain, who were both too much embarraſſed with their own affairs to have leiſure to think of diſturbing her peace, it is not eaſy to conceive how ſhe could have any reaſon to be jealous of the queen of Scots, who was kept ſo cloſe a priſoner, that it was ſcarce poſſible for her to correſpond with any one; yet a great ſtir was made about letters and pacquets being conveyed to her, and a negociation being ſet on foot between her and de Guouza, the Spaniſh reſident. Five perſons of quality were committed to the Tower, and divers others examined on the ſubject; but, after the utmoſt diligence in enquiry, nothing came to light, all being founded on mere ſuſpicion. The death of the duke of Chatelerault‡, in the beginning of this year, and the inſane ſtate of mind under which his ſon, the earl of Arran, now laboured, ſeemed to overturn all hopes of reviving a party for Mary in Scotland. The regent, Morton, was maſter of the kingdom, and being a moſt obedient ſlave to the queen of England, this laſt had nothing more to deſire in Scotland but to get the young prince delivered into her hands, which, perhaps, was the reaſon why ſuch large ſums were ſent at this time to Killigrew, reſident in that country. Unluckily this happened to be the only point in which Morton could not gratify her, the prince being in cuſtody of the young earl of Marr's uncle, in the caſtle of Stirling; and this truſty guardian would not give up his charge without an order from the eſtates of Scotland, who would not ſuffer the prince to be carried out of the kingdom. Morton next formed a ſcheme for getting the king out of the hands of Erskine, by making a match between the late earl of Marr's widow and his own nephew the earl of Angus; but the lady dying in July this year, he was diſappointed in this meaſure alſo.

‡ James Hamilton, duke of Chatelerault, and earl of Arran, was great-grand-ſon to James II. of Scotland, by his daughter. He was appointed tutor to Mary, queen of Scots, and governor and preſumptive heir of the kingdom during her minority. Upon his delivering her to the French, he was made duke of Chatelerault in France. Camden, p. 454. This year alſo, on the fifteenth of May, died the learned Matthew Parker, archbiſhop of Canterbury. Strype. Stowe, p. 679.

Before the end of this year the Huguenots, ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of the German army under the prince of Condé and prince Caſimir, but much more by the credit and influence of the king of Navarre, who had aſſumed the command of them, rendered themſelves ſo formidable that Henry III. was glad to grant them a truce of ſix months, at the mediation of Elizabeth, who now openly patronized the duke of Alençon. This was the fifth pacification made with the Huguenots; but the terms of it being extremely diſgraceful and diſadvantageous to the crown of France, it gave the higheſt offence to the catholics, and furniſhed Henry, duke of Guiſe (ſon to Francis, the deceaſed duke, ſlain at the ſiege of Orleans), with the deſired pretext for condemning the meaſures and maxims of his ſovereign. That bold and daring leader embraced the ſame opportunity of forming his party into a regular and conſiſtent body, and laid the firſt foundation of the famous league, which, without regarding the royal authority, aimed at the total extirpation of the Huguenots; while Henry endeavoured, but in vain, to adopt a new plan, by acting as an umpire between the two parties, and, by balancing their power, to reduce both to a dependence on himſelf. But ſuch was the wretched condition of France, from the paſt ſeverities of its princes, that toleration and indulgence could be no longer practiſed, and an edict for liberty of conſcience, which would probably have ſatisfied the proteſtants, inflamed the reſentment of the catholics to the higheſt pitch.

Philip II. in the low ebb of his affairs, had, ſome time before, ſolicited an accommodation with Elizabeth, who, with a view to obtain ſome advantages in trade to her ſubjects, agreed to adjuſt the difference ſubſiſting between the two crowns. Commiſſioners were appointed to ſettle the accompts of the ſeizures on both ſides; the balance was very honourably paid to the king of Spain; and the commerce between England and his territories renewed by a treaty concluded at Briſtol. Upon the faith of this good underſtanding between the two courts, Lewis Zuniga, the ſucceſſor of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands, being wholly bent to recover the command of the ſea, which his predeceſſor had ſo impoliticly neglected, ſent to Elizabeth, deſiring leave to hire ſhips and mariners in England, and demanded that all the Dutch rebels ſhould be expelled the kingdom. Although the queen refuſed to comply with thoſe requeſts, yet, upon his ſending away the earl of Weſtmoreland and other Engliſh fugitives out of the Low Countries, ſhe baniſhed all the Dutch who carried arms againſt the king of Spain, and prohibited her ſubjects from receiving any ſuch perſons into her ports or harbours.

This however did not hinder the prince of Orange and the eſtates of Holland and Zealand, who found themſelves unable to ſupport the war much longer againſt the wealth and power of Spain, from venturing, in the ſpring of the year 1576, to ſend deputies to implore the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth, and to offer her the ſovereignty of their country, as being deſcended from Philippa, wife to Edward III. and daughter to William III. of Bavaria, earl of Holland and Zealand. Though this title was ridiculous, yet it ſerved Elizabeth as ſome pretext to pauſe upon their offer. The deputation conſiſted of Philip Marnix, lord of Aldegonde; James Douza, William Nieuville, Paul Buys, advocate for the ſtates of Holland, and Melſen, a lawyer. A deputation of ſo many illuſtrious men was what Elizabeth had long wanted, and ſhe neither granted nor rejected their requeſt; but, after having taken ſome time for conſideration, ſhe gave them for anſwer, that "as yet ſhe conceived not how, with the ſafety of her honour and an upright conſcience, ſhe could receive thoſe provinces into her poſſeſſion; but promiſed ſhe would uſe her beſt offices with the king of Spain, for obtaining them a ſuitable peace." Accordingly ſhe actually ſent an ambaſſador to the court of Spain for that purpoſe; but Philip found means to evade a punctual anſwer, no accommodation enſued, and the war continued to rage with as much violence as ever.

The Hollanders, who now appeared on the very brink of perdition, were happily delivered from their diſtreſſes by a mere accident: Zuniga being carried off this year by a ſudden death, the Spaniſh troops, diſcontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper commander, broke out into a moſt terrible mutiny; they ſacked and plundered the cities of Antwerp and Maeſtricht, and maſſacred near ſeventeen thouſand perſons of all ages and ſexes, without any poſſibility of preventing their outrages; and the mutineers menacing all the other cities of the Low Countries with the fate of the two already mentioned, all the provinces, excepting only that of Luxembourg, engaged in an aſſociation for their mutual defence, and ſent to the prince of Orange, who was then in Holland, imploring his protection, and that he would put himſelf at their head. Hereupon conferences were held at Ghent, where was formed the union of the Low Countries, called the Union or Pacification of Ghent, which laid the foundation of the preſent States of the United Provinces. This union, which was ſigned on the eighth of November this year, 1576, was for the defence of the laws and liberties of the inhabitants of the Low Countries, againſt the encroachments, oppreſſions, and cruelties, that had been exerciſed upon them by Spaniſh tyranny. Notwithſtanding this, they were ſtill willing to own the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern according to the ancient laws. This union being thus formed, the fortreſſes raiſed by the duke of Alva, to keep the Netherlands in ſubjection, were demoliſhed every where. Some time after the aſſociation was ſworn to by the clergy and nobility at Bruſſels. By this Philip II. loſt almoſt all his authority in the Low Countries, having only the bare title of ſovereign, unleſs he would confine himſelf to the rights enjoyed by his predeceſſors, which was very far from his thoughts.

France was not at more quiet than the Low Countries. The duke of Alençon had aſſembled an army againſt the king, in favour of the Huguenots. On the other hand, the prince of Condé, with the forces levied by prince Caſimir, his brother, entered France, and joined the duke of Alençon. Thus the Huguenots, whom the court was determined to extirpate, were in a condition to ſell their lives dear, having at their head the king's brother, the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, with an army of thirty thouſand men. But the queen-mother had the addreſs to break all their meaſures: ſhe ſent them offers of treating, and, during the negociation, found means to ſow jealouſy among them, and win from them the duke of of Alençon and prince Caſimir: in ſhort, ſhe cauſed them to agree to a truce, which, for all its ſeeming advantages, proved fatal to them, as it diſunited their forces. The treaty was concluded on the ninth of May, and enrolled ſix months after by the parliament of Paris. The Huguenots had never obtained ſo advantageous a peace ſince the beginning of the troubles. In October the duke of Alençon came to court, where the queen his mother diſengaged him entirely from the party of the Huguenots: then it was that he aſſumed the title of duke of Anjou, borne by the king his brother before he aſcended the throne‡.

But the peace was no ſooner ſigned, than the catholic party took effectual meaſures to fruſtrate its ſalutary intentions. The condeſcenſion of Henry III. in granting ſuch favourable terms to the Huguenots*, emboldened the duke of Guiſe to form the league, which had been projected by his uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, now dead, in defence of the catholic religion, with a deſign to raiſe himſelf upon the ruins of a miſerable and ill-governed kingdom. The ſtate now teemed with factions, and Henry de Guiſe was formed for them. He was ſon to the deceaſed duke Francis, ſlain at the ſiege of Orleans, and is ſaid to have had all the noble qualities of his father, with the moſt headſtrong and deſigning ambition: like him he captivated all hearts; and it was commonly ſaid of the father and ſon, that, in compariſon with them, all other princes appeared but as common men.

The league, or Holy Union as its eſtabliſhers thought proper to term it, was ſet on foot at Paris; papers were diſperſed among the citizens, containing a project of aſſociation for the defence of religion, the king, and the liberty of the ſubject; or rather to oppreſs at once king, religion, and ſtate. The league was afterwards ſolemnly ſigned at Peronne, and through the greateſt part of Picardy; and ſoon after the reſt of the provinces acceded to it: the king of Spain declared himſelf its protector, and it afterwards received the ſanction of the apoſtolic ſee. The king, preſſed between the proteſtants, who demanded additional privileges, and the leaguers, who wanted to deprive him of his own, thought to ſtrike a blow in politics by ſigning the league, for fear it ſhould cruſh him, and declaring himſelf its chief, which inſpired the other members with double boldneſs. He now found himſelf, much againſt his will, obliged, in an aſſembly of the ſtates, to revoke the edict of pacification which he had concluded with the reformed, and to renew the war againſt them. However, we ſhall in the end find him not only obliged once more to give peace to that deceived and diſtreſſed part of his ſubjects, but even to owe his ſafety on the throne to their loyalty.

And now the earl of Eſſex, who, out of Leiceſter's enmity, had been recalled from Ireland, was, out of Leiceſter's fear, ſent thither again. It ſeems Eſſex had threatened him with vengeance; and the miniſter, who never durſt venture his credit with Elizabeth in glaring acts of injuſtice, pocketed all his reproaches, and, under pretence of making him amends, he was this year created earl-marſhal of Ireland for life, in the room of ſir Nicholas Bagnal, and ſent back to that kingdom, where every thing was, as uſual, in the utmoſt confuſion; but the earl finding, notwithſtanding his late conferred dignity, that he was little better than a private officer, took it ſo to heart, that, about September, he fell ill of a bloody flux, which carried him off in the thirty-ſixth year of his age, not without ſuſpicion of having been poiſoned by the earl of Leiceſter's procurement; and what gave this ſuſpicion greater weight, was, that ſcarcely had the grave received the laſt remains of Eſſex, when Leiceſter, putting away his wife, the lady Douglas Sheffield, married the deceaſed earl's relict: we leave the reader to draw his own concluſion.

We ſhall add to the occurrences of this year, that a company of Engliſh merchants ſent out Martin Forbiſher, the famous ſeaman, with three pinnaces, to diſcover the north-weſt paſſage. Forbiſher ſailed from Harwich on the eighteenth of June, and on the ninth of Auguſt entered in a bay, under the latitude 63°, where he found inhabitants much reſembling the ancient Britons, as they have been deſcribed: but being frozen up, he was obliged to return without any farther diſcovery, on the twenty-fourth of September. Two years after, he made the ſame attempt, and with the like ill ſucceſs.

This year died the emperor Maximilian, a prince that had deſerved well of queen Elizabeth and the Engliſh, who thereupon ſent ſir Philip Sidney to his ſon Rodolphus, king of the Romans, with compliments of condolance on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his acceſſion to the Imperial dignity.

But the moſt memorable event in this period was a ſeſſion of parliament, ſummoned on the eighth of February this year, where debates were ſtarted, full of that ſpirit of freedom which was ſo new and ſo offenſive to the ear of majeſty at that time: accordingly it drew on the promoters the indignation of the queen and the courtiers. Some of the members were committed, but ſoon after releaſed. The curious reader may find the ſum of thoſe debates accurately and conciſely related by Mr. Hume, in his hiſtory of this reign: as they would too much ſwell this work, were they to be here inſerted, we have contented ourſelves with this curſory mention of them.

We come now to the year 1577, which was opened by the ambitious projects of don John of Auſtria, who had been made governor of the Netherlands in the preceding year, and who was a prince famous through Europe for the glorious victory he gained over the Turkiſh fleet at Lepanto, and for his ambition in attempting to get himſelf made king of Tunis. Don John was naturally of an aſpiring genius, and, encouraged by the ſucceſſes which had hitherto attended him in all his undertakings, had projected in his mind a ſcheme far beyond the reduction of the revolted provinces, and had actually entered into a league with the pope and king of Spain, to aſſiſt him in obtaining the queen of Scots for a wife, and placing him upon the throne of Britain.

‡ Mezerai. P. Daniel.

* By this treaty Henry diſowned the late bloody maſſacre, in which, however, he was but too deeply concerned: he exempts from taxes, for ſix years, the children of all thoſe who were killed on that fatal day: reſtores the memory of the late attainted admiral Coligni to its honours: and, to complete his own humiliation, ſubmits to pay the German troops of prince Palatine Caſimir, thoſe very troops who had forced him to conclude this peace. But not having money enough to ſatisfy them, he permitted them to live at diſcretion for three months in the provinces of Champagne and Burgundy. Vol. Gen. Hiſt. vol. v. p. 67.

On his taking upon him the government of the Netherlands, he choſe rather to inflame than allay the quarrel between the Flemings and the Spaniards, and as he found the ſtates reſolved to confine his authority within very narrow limits, he took all occaſions of mortifying them. But the prince of Orange having gotten notice of his deſign upon the queen of Scots, imparted the ſame to Elizabeth; who now ſeeing, from the ruin of all the provinces, a probable proſpect of oppoſing the Spaniſh uſurpations, ſhe no longer ſcrupled to undertake the defence of their liberties, which ſeemed to be intimately connected with her own ſafety.

In the mean time the breach between don John and the ſtates grew daily wider: the latter thought that don John wanted to ſtrip them of their liberties, and he imagined his life to be in danger from the ſtates. The effect of all this mutual diſtruſt was, that don John, thinking himſelf no longer ſafe in Bruſſels, where he had hitherto reſided, ſurprized the caſtle of Namur, to the great joy of the prince of Orange's party, who thought, as don John had now thrown off the mask, that the ſtates might throw away the ſcabbard, which they accordingly did; for they not only openly challenged don John to ſhew any cauſe for ſo violent a proceeding, which ſet aſide the late pacification, but ſent the marquis of Hautrec and Adolphus Meetkirck to Elizabeth in the autumn of this year, to vindicate their proceedings, and to ſolicit from her the loan of one hundred thouſand pounds for eight months. Elizabeth readily gave them credit for this, provided certain towns were bound for the repayment: and ſhe alſo entered into a treaty with them, whereby "ſhe engaged to aſſiſt them with five thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, to be paid by the Flemings, and to be commanded by an Engliſh general, who was to have a ſeat in the council of the ſtates; that no ſtep relating to peace or war ſhould be taken, without previouſly imparting it either to the queen or him; that they ſhould conclude no league without her conſent; that if any difference happened among themſelves, it ſhould be ſubmitted to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretext, ſhould preſume to make war upon her, they ſhould ſend to her aid an army equal to that which ſhe employed in their ſervice *.

In the mean time Elizabeth ordered Wilkes to repair to the court of Spain, where he preſented a memorial to that king, on the twentieth of December, importing, "that the queen by no means intended to break the ancient alliance between England and the houſe of Burgundy; that with this view ſhe had refuſed the principality of Holland and Zealand when offered her; had adviſed the prince of Orange to return to his allegiance, and had even threatened him with her diſpleaſure, in caſe of refuſal; but withal, if the king of Spain would wiſh to ſee this part of his ſubjects quietly embrace his rule, ſhe counſelled him, as a friend, to oblige don John to reſign his government, and that ſome other prince, more popular, might be appointed in his room; that the Spaniſh forces might be recalled, and the Flemings re-eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of their liberties:" adding, "that if, after theſe conceſſions, they ſhould ſtill refuſe to return to their duty, ſhe engaged to join her arms with thoſe of the king of Spain, and compel them to ſubmit †." It is likely Philip was not very well pleaſed with theſe reaſons, but he feigned to be ſo, yet ſtill continued to furniſh don John with money and troops.

The rumour of the correſpondence between don John and the queen of Scots had this ſummer alarmed the court with a report of her having eſcaped from Chatſworth: this produced a very earneſt letter, by Elizabeth's orders, from Burleigh to the earl of Shrewſbury, who had the cuſtody of Mary, recommending to him a greater circumſpection than ever with regard to his charge, and not without expreſſing ſome ſuſpicion that ſome of his lordſhip's family were in confederacy with Mary. But though we know not that any ſuch eſcape was attempted, yet Elizabeth this year held a ſtrict hand over the papiſts: many ſuſpected of that religion were put out of the commiſſion of peace; ſome were ſeverely fined; and one Maine, a prieſt, was put to death, upon the ſtatute prohibiting the importation of popiſh trinkets into England; while a gentleman of Cornwall, one Trugion, was condemned to loſe his eſtate, and to be impriſoned during life, for harbouring him. Theſe ſeverities occaſioned many reflections upon the government: and while one Jenkins, a bookſeller, was trying at the Oxford aſſizes, a ſudden peſtilential vapour ſo fatally affected the judge, the ſheriff, with ſome other perſons of diſtinction, and about three hundred common people, that they all died within a fortnight after.

At this time the affairs of France were in a very melancholy ſituation. Henry III. could not be ſaid to reign: the catholic league and the proteſtant confederacy (whereof the king of Navarre was declared general, and the prince of Condé appointed his lieutenant) made war upon each other in deſpite of him, in all the provinces of the kingdom. Epidemic diſeaſes and famine were added to theſe ſcourges: and at this time of general calamity, in order to ſet up his own favourites againſt the duke of Guiſe, after having created Joyeuſe and d'Eſpernon dukes and peers, and given them precedence over their ſeniors, Henry expended four millions of livres on the marriage of the duke of Joyeuſe with the ſiſter of the queen his conſort, and gave him rank as the king's brother-in-law. New taxes were impoſed to defray theſe prodigalities: this excited the indignation of the public afreſh. Had the duke of Guiſe not made a league againſt the king, his conduct was ſufficient to have produced a general defection. In a word, the faction of Sixteen was now formed: this was a kind of particular league for Paris only, conſiſting of ſeveral perſons, who were diſtributed in the ſixteen wards of that city, and who ſhared the adminiſtration one among another: they were ſtaunch friends to the duke of Guiſe, and ſworn enemies to the king, to whom nothing of that auguſt rank remained but the name.

England mean while enjoyed peace and plenty under the wiſe adminiſtration of Elizabeth; but Philip of Spain burned with an eager deſire to retort upon the queen the ill offices he thought ſhe had done him, by aſſiſting the confederates of the Low Countries. With this view he entered into a conſultation with the pope (now Gregory XIII.) to invade at once both England and Ireland. Gregory had formed a project ſome time before, to gain the latter of theſe kingdoms for James Buon Campagno, his baſtard ſon, whom he had made marquis of Vincola. As the greateſt ſtrength of England conſiſted in her ſhipping, it was reſolved, under various pretexts, to hire ſeveral of the veſſels for long voyages, to the end that while they were abſent, the Engliſh ports might be ſeized by a ſuperior fleet. At the ſame time one Thomas Stukeley, an Engliſh fugitive, was to be ſent over to join the Iriſh rebels with a ſtrong body of forces. This man, by making a great boaſt, and pretending that he was able to reduce the kingdom of Ireland for the pope's baſtard, had ſo inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of the ambitious old pontiff, that he inveſted him with the titles of marquis of Leinſter, and earl of Wexford and Catherlough (the principal dignities of Ireland), and appointed him commander of eight hundred Italians, to be employed in the Iriſh war; with which Stukeley ſetting ſail from Civita Vecchia, in the ſpring of 1578, landed at Liſbon. Here he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by don Sebaſtian, king of Portugal (to whom the chief command of the expedition againſt England was aſſigned) to engage in his ſervice againſt the Moors in Africa, after which they were to proceed together to Ireland: but both Sebaſtian and himſelf being ſlain in the memorable battle of Alcazar, this deſign was fruſtrated.

In the Netherlands, don John of Auſtria being reinforced by the Spaniſh troops from Italy, and another body of forces from that country, under the command of Alexander Farneſe, prince of Parma, obtained a ſignal victory, at Gemblours, over the confederates, whoſe affairs began to decline in conſequence of religious diſputes. The towns of Amſterdam, Haarlem, and Utrecht, expelled their magiſtrates, and put the government into the hands of the proteſtants. The catholics, alarmed at theſe events, which ſeemed to portend the deſtruction of the old religion, propoſed to confer the government of the ſtate upon the duke of Anjou, who was accordingly declared protector of the Belgic liberty. The proteſtants demanded, that they ſhould be admitted to the exerciſe of public employments as well as the catholics; this demand was granted by the ſtates, on condition that the catholics ſhould enjoy the ſame privileges in Holland and Zealand. Theſe two provinces eluded this article, and hence diſſenſions aroſe among the confederates. This diviſion was increaſed by the inhabitants of Ghent, who expelled the Romiſh prieſts from their city, while the people of Artois and Hainault baniſhed the proteſtants, in their turn. Don John, in hope of profiting by this animoſity, attacked the army of the ſtates in their camp at Rymenant, in Brabant, and was repulſed, after a very obſtinate engagement, in which ſir John Norreys, ſecond ſon of the lord Norreys of Rycot, and colonel Stuart, at the head of two regiments of Engliſh and Scottiſh volunteers, ſignalized themſelves by remarkable acts of valour. This event miſcarrying, don John endeavoured to amuſe them with propoſals of peace, till his army ſhould be reinforced: they agreed to the negociation for the ſame reaſon, for they expected to be joined by prince Caſimir and a conſiderable body of Germans, and the duke of Anjou had already advanced to the frontiers of Hainault with eight thouſand auxiliaries. By theſe junctions on both ſides, don John found himſelf at the head of fifty thouſand men, including infantry and cavalry, and the army of the eſtates amounted to threeſcore thouſand; but this laſt was rendered uſeleſs by the diſputes between the inhabitants of Ghent and the provinces of Hainault and Artois; ſome of their troops mutinied, and joining the people of Artois, made incurſions into Flanders; and the inhabitants of Ghent brought over prince Caſimir to their intereſt, by promiſing to pay his ſoldiers, he having ſquandered away the money which Elizabeth had remitted to him for that purpoſe. Daviſon was ſent over by the queen to make ſevere remonſtrances on this ſubject; but he made ſuch an apology as ſhe admitted, for in the winter he viſited her court, where he was graciouſly received, and inveſted with the order of the Garter. Don John dying ſuddenly, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon, was ſucceeded in command by the prince of Parma, to whom the eſtates of Artois and Hainault ſubmitted; and the duke of Anjou ſeeing this defection, diſmiſſed his troops and retired to France. While he reſided in the Low Countries, he diſpatched Martel de Bacqueville to England, to renew the negociations of his marriage with Elizabeth; afterwards the king of France ſent over Rambouillet for the ſame purpoſe; and both theſe envoys were received in ſuch a manner as ſeemed to denote her approbation of the propoſal. This was thought to be the more ſincere, as ſhe had now no cauſe to diſſemble her ſentiments.

This year ſir Henry Sidney was, at his own requeſt, recalled from Ireland, where the ſervice was full of trouble and danger, and the reward void of profit or reputation: ſir William Drury was ſworn lord-deputy in his ſtead. But we are now to attend the affairs of Scotland, the critical ſituation of which now demanded all Elizabeth's attention.

The earl of Morton had hitherto retained that kingdom in a cloſe alliance with England, and had alſo re-eſtabliſhed domeſtic tranquility: but it was not likely, that the factitious authority of a regent would be long able to maintain itſelf in a country unacquainted with law and order, where the natural dominion of hereditary princes was ſo frequently oppoſed and controuled.

The nobility began anew to ſplit into factions; the people were offended at ſome inſtances of Morton's avarice; and the clergy, who complained of farther encroachments on their narrow revenues, contributed to inflame the diſcontent of the other orders. The regent foreſaw the approaching danger; and having dropt ſome peeviſh expreſſion, as if he was willing to reſign the government, the noblemen of the oppoſite party, favourites of the young king, embraced ſuch a favourable opportunity, and demanded that diſmiſſion which he ſeemed ſo readily to offer. James was only in the twelfth year of his age; yet Morton having, as he imagined, effectually provided for his own ſecurity by a general pardon, on the twelfth of March this year, reſigned his authority into the hands of the king, who now pretended to conduct, in his own name, the affairs of the nation, while the late regent withdrew from the government, and ſeemed to devote himſelf entirely to his own private concerns; but, either diſguſted with this inactivity, which appeared ſo inſipid after the buſtle of public life, or thinking it time to pull off the maſk, he returned again to court, and obtained an aſcendant in the council; and though he reſumed not the title of regent, continued to rule with his former authority.

to

The oppoſite party, after holding ſome private meetings, took to arms, under pretence of reſcuing the prince from captivity, and re-inſtating him in the free exerciſe of his government: queen Elizabeth interpoſed her good offices, and effected an agreement between the factions: Morton kept poſſeſſion of the government; but his enemies were numerous and powerful, and his authority ſeemed every day to be approaching towards its end.

Eſme Stuart, count d'Aubigney, of the houſe of Lenox*, couſin-german to the king's father, had been born and educated in France; and being a young nobleman of a polite and inſinuating addreſs, he was judged by the duke of Guiſe to be a proper inſtrument for drawing off James from the Engliſh alliance, and attaching him to his mother and her relations. He no ſooner arrived at Sterling, where James reſided, than he engaged the affections of the young monarch; and uniting his influence with James Stuart of the houſe of Ochiltree, who had acquired the king's confidence, he employed himſelf, under the appearance of plays and amuſement, in infuſing into the tender mind of the prince, new ſentiments of politics and government. He convinced him of the injuſtice which had been done to Mary in her depoſition, and made him entertain ſome thoughts, either of reſigning the crown in her favour, or of giving her a ſhare in the adminiſtration.

Elizabeth was no ſooner informed of theſe intrigues, than ſhe diſpatched ſir Robert Bowes into Scotland; accuſed d'Aubigney, now created duke of Lenox, of an attachment to the French; and adviſed James to beware of engaging in ſuch ſuſpicious and dangerous commotions. The king apologized for his conduct by means of his ambaſſador; and Lenox, regarding the queen as his enemy, was farther inſtigated to undermine the Engliſh intereſt, and particularly to ruin Morton, who was conſidered as the head of that party.

Morton was ſeized in council, accuſed as an accomplice in the late king's murder, thrown into priſon, brought to trial, and condemned to ſuffer the death of a traitor. He acknowleged that Bothwell had acquainted him with the deſign, had pleaded Mary's aſſent, and had ſolicited his aſſiſtance; but he denied that he had ever given his approbation to that crime; and in excuſe for his ſilence, repreſented the danger of diſcloſing it, either to Henry, who had no reſolution nor conſtancy, or to Mary, who ſeemed to have a capital ſhare in perpetrating the deed. Elizabeth diſpatched ſir Richard Randolph, to intercede in Morton's favour; and that ambaſſador, not ſatisfied with performing this duty of his function, perſuaded the earls of Argyll, Montroſe, Angus, Marr, and Glencairn, to engage in a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the priſoner. The more to intimidate that nobleman's enemies, Elizabeth cauſed a body of forces to advance towards the borders of Scotland: but this expedient, inſtead of producing the deſired effect, contributed only to precipitate his fate.

Morton died with that courage and reſolution, which he ever diſcovered in all the various ſcenes of his life; and, though blameable in ſome parts of his private conduct, he left behind him the character of an able and accompliſhed ſtateſman.

In the courſe of this year, 1578, Egremond Radcliffe, ſon to Henry, earl of Suſſex, by his ſecond wife, who had been a leading man in the rebellion in the North, and afterwards ſerved under don John of Auſtria, in the Netherlands, was accuſed by the Engliſh fugitives in the Spaniſh intereſt, with being acceſſary to the death of don John, upon which, whether true or falſe, he was arreſted and put to death. The Spaniards have affirmed, that Radcliffe, in his laſt moments, voluntarily confeſſed that he had been freed from his confinement in the Tower of London, and ſent over by Walſingham with large promiſes if he would perpetrate this fact; but the Engliſh, who were preſent at his death, deny his having made any ſuch confeſſion, though all means were uſed to wreſt it from him by the Engliſh rebels.

The year 1579 opened with the departure from England of prince Caſimir, who returned highly pleaſed with the honours paid him here, and repaired to his army in the Netherlands; and with the death of that great ſtateſman and zealous friend to the proteſtant cauſe, ſir Nicholas Bacon: he was deſcended from an ancient family in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, but was himſelf born at Chiſlehurſt, in Kent, A. D. 1509. Mr. Lloyd ſums up his character in this manner: "He underſtood his miſtreſs well, and the times better: he could raiſe factions to ſerve one, and could allay them to ſuit the other. He had the deepeſt reach into affairs, of any man at the council-table; the acuteſt head to penetrate into difficulties, the moſt comprehenſive judgment to diſcern the merits of a cauſe, the ſtrongeſt memory to recollect all buſineſs at one view, the greateſt patience to debate and conſider, and the cleareſt reaſon to urge any thing that came in his way, in council or chancery. His favour was eminent with his miſtreſs, and his alliance ſtrong with her ſtateſmen. His dexterity and diſpatch advanced him to the court of wards, his deep experience made him lord-keeper. He was the exacteſt man to draw up regulations in council, and the moſt diſcreet to execute them in court. When others urged the repeal of the act whereby Elizabeth was declared illegitimate, he was for waving that deſign, thinking the cloſure of a feſtered wound more prudent than the opening it; and judging it higher wiſdom to ſatisfy the world with the old law, that the crown takes away all defects, than to perplex it with new diſputes. His account of England and all its affairs, was punctual; his uſe of learned artiſts, was continual; his correſpondence with his fellow ſtateſmen, exact; his apprehenſion of our laws and government, clear; his model of both, methodical; his faithfulneſs to the church, eminent; and his induſtrious invention for the ſtate, indefatigable: he was, in a word, a father to his country, as he was of ſir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave, the firſt baronet of England, and of ſir

* He had his title from the town of Aubigney, in France; which title Charles IX. of France had formerly conferred on John Stuart, of the family of Lenox, who being conſtable of the Scottiſh army in France, vanquiſhed the Engliſh in one battle, and was ſlain by them in another; and from that time this title belonged to the youngeſt branch of that houſe.

Francis Bacon, lord viſcount Verulam, and lord-chancellor of England.

It was not only the loſs of this good and faithful ſervant, but the growing power and artful contrivance of the papiſts that gave the queen, at this time, more than ordinary concern. The pope himſelf, not diſcouraged by the miſcarriage of Stukeley, as noted before, ſent more forces into Ireland, and renewed the bull of pope Pius V. and granted a bull for founding a new college a Rome for training up the Engliſh fugitives in rebellion, of whom, among other things, it was required, before they could be admitted, to take the oath, "that they would at any time, at the command of their ſuperiors, return into their own country, and be ready to," &c.

This year alſo was remarkable for bringing Robert Parſons and Edmund Campain into England, who were the firſt two Jeſuits that ever appeared in this kingdom. At the ſame time the nation ſwarmed with prieſts and emiſſaries from the pope, to preach ſedition and rebellion, under colour of adminiſtering the ſacraments to the ſcrupulous catholics, and under the diſguiſe of gentlemen, merchants, artificers, and even in the garb of ſoldiers. Which being known at court, was enough to awake the attention of the queen and her council, who had not forgot the effects of bulls and excommunications, where many were bound by oath, and others thought themſelves obliged by conſcience, to ſee them executed; and this produced a proclamation, commanding all thoſe that had any children, wards, or kinſmen beyond ſea, to give in their names to the ordinary in ten days, and to call them home in four months; and forbidding all perſons to entertain or harbour any Jeſuit or prieſt ſent forth from the ſeminaries of Rome or Rheims, on pain of being puniſhed as rebels and ſeditious perſons. However, this did not deter the malecontents from their pernicious deſigns. Seditious books were diſperſed, aſſerting the king of Spain's right to the crown, and his and the pope's engagements to aſſiſt Elizabeth's rebellious ſubjects, in caſe they would take up arms to dethrone her. And theſe declarations being backed immediately by the forces of theſe two enemies, which landed in Ireland, under San Joſeppo, an Italian commander, though without ſucceſs, they being obliged by the earl of Ormond to ſurrender at diſcretion in five days after he had opened the trenches before the fort del Oro, which they had built, the queen iſſued out another proclamation, that they who would not keep within the bounds of their duty, muſt expect no favour.

The difficulties and dangers which ſo threatened the ſtate greatly forwarded the treaty of marriage between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou; for which purpoſe ambaſſadors from the court of France had all laſt year been paſſing backwards and forwards between France and England; at laſt the baron de Simier, the moſt artful man in France for the management of a love-intrigue, was ſent over to put a finiſhing hand to this negociation. This man gained ſuch an aſcendant over the paſſions of Elizabeth, that ſhe ſeemed to have conceived a very warm affection for the perſon of the duke of Anjou, inſomuch that Leiceſter and others affirmed ſhe was infatuated by the arts of incantation. Simier, in revenge, did Leiceſter all the ill offices he could with the queen, and was the firſt that informed her of that nobleman's private marriage with the widow of Eſſex. She was ſo incenſed at this information, that ſhe ordered the earl to be confined in the caſtle of Greenwich, and would actually have committed him to the Tower, had not the earl of Suſſex, though his enemy, generouſly interpoſed in his behalf, and repreſented the injuſtice of puniſhing any ſubject for contracting a lawful marriage.

In the mean while the duke of Anjou, flattered by the intelligence he received from his agent, came over to England incognito, attended by two domeſtics only, towards the end of May this year, and paid the queen a viſit at Greenwich, who expreſſed great ſatisfaction at his unexpected arrival; and, after a ſhort converſation with her, the ſubject of which has not tranſpired, he departed.

But Elizabeth was ſo apprehenſive of the hoſtile intentions of Philip, whoſe power was greatly augmented by his late acquiſitions, that ſhe reſolved not to let the affair of the marriage cool; and this winter ſhe ordered Burleigh (now treaſurer), Suſſex, Leiceſter, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and ſecretary Walſingham, to ſettle with the French ambaſſador the terms of the intended alliance.

Henry III. of France ſent on this occaſion a very ſplendid embaſſy into England, compoſed of Francis de Bourbon, dauphin of Auvorgne, and many conſiderable noblemen: and as Elizabeth had, in a manner, the power of chuſing what terms ſhe pleaſed, the articles were ſoon adjuſted with the Engliſh commiſſioners.

It was agreed, "I. that the marriage ſhould be ſolemnized within ſix weeks after the ratification of the articles.

"II. That the duke and his attendants ſhould be indulged with the free exerciſe of their religion.

"III. That, after the marriage, he ſhould enjoy the title of King, but the adminiſtration ſhould remain in the hands of Elizabeth.

"IV. That their children, male or female, ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England.

"V. That if there be two males, the eldeſt, in caſe of Henry's death without iſſue, ſhould be king of France, the younger of England.

"VI. That if there be but one male, and he ſucceed to the crown of France, he ſhould be obliged to reſide in England eight months every two years.

"VII. That the laws and cuſtoms of England ſhould be preſerved inviolate.

"VIII. And that no foreigner ſhould be advanced by the duke to any office in England."

Theſe articles, however, were not poſitively concluded, but the diſcuſſion of them referred either to a parliament, or a conference between the queen and the duke of Anjou.

The public, who generally judge by appearances, began now to conſider the match to be as good as concluded, and the puritans thought popery was already at their gates. The apprehenſion of this drove one Stubbs to publiſh a libel againſt the match, in which he abuſes the French king, his brother, and the French ambaſſador with great virulence. This performance had ſo remarkable an influence upon the public, that Elizabeth ordered a proclamation to be drawn up, expreſly in anſwer to the facts and reaſonings brought by the libeller; and all the clergy in England had orders to ſet the queen's proceedings, in the matter of her marriage, in a true (that is, favourable) light to their congregations. Stubbs, the author, and Page, the bookſeller, were proſecuted as libellers, and condemned to loſe their right hands, which were accordingly chopped off by the executioner; and Stubbs afterwards endured a long impriſonment in the Tower.

This year affords little extraordinary beſides what we have already related, except the execution of Matthew Harmont for blaſphemy, at Norwich; the eſtabliſhment of the Turkey Company, by virtue of a treaty with Amurath, ſultan of the Turks, managed by ſir William Harbourn; the appointing ſir Thomas Bromley lord high-chancellor of England, upon the deceaſe of ſir Nicholas Bacon; and the death of ſir Thomas Greſham, who built the Royal Exchange, and dedicated a large houſe to the purpoſes of learning, called after him Greſham College, where he founded lectures in divinity, the civil law, medicine, aſtronomy, geometry, rhetoric, and muſic.

In the Low Countries, the prince of Parma amuſed the confederates with a negociation at Cologne, and in the mean time fomented their diſſenſions and mutual animoſities. The prince of Orange, far from being diſpirited by the defection of Hainault, Artois, and ſome other popiſh provinces, which ſubmitted to Philip, exerted all his influence and induſtry in ſtrengthening the confederacy of thoſe provinces which ſtill perſiſted in the reſolution to throw off the Spaniſh yoke. At length he effected the famous treaty of Utrecht, between Holland, Zealand, Frieſland, and Utrecht, to which Ghent and Ypres afterwards acceded, and the prince was elected governor of Flanders. Mean while the prince of Parma reduced Maeſtricht, and then diſmiſſed great part of his Spaniſh and Italian troops, according to his agreement with the ſtates who had ſubmitted; an act of honour and good faith which was productive of the voluntary ſubmiſſion of Mechlin, Liſle, and Valenciennes.

The news from Scotland was rather diſagreeable than otherwiſe to Elizabeth. The young king was now wholly governed by two young favourites, minions of the duke of Guiſe, who wanted to engage the king to marry a daughter of France, and, after marriage, to declare the duke of Guiſe his lieutenant-general, which muſt have ended in the worſt of conſequences to Elizabeth.

The city of London increaſing exceſſively, to the detriment of the reſt of the towns of the kingdom, the queen thought it neceſſary to remedy this inconvenience: ſhe publiſhed therefore, in the beginning of the year 1580, a proclamation, prohibiting any new buildings within three miles of the gates of the city, upon pain of impriſonment, and forfeiture of the materials; and ordered that no more than one family ſhould live in a houſe.

But there was ſtill a more preſſing evil which it was no leſs neceſſary to remedy, I mean the practices of the papiſts; for the farther the enquiries of the government reached, the ſtronger reaſons were found for being upon its guard againſt the pernicious order of Jeſuits, which had now got footing in England. It was diſcovered, that, notwithſtanding the late regulations, they ſtill perſiſted in ſpreading ſeditious tenets, and encouraging, not only thoſe of their own religion, but all the lewd, the needy, and the turbulent, to join in attempting a revolution. In ſhort, the zeal and activity of the papiſts were ſuch as drew upon themſelves a ſtorm of perſecution; nor can the ſeverities now exerciſed againſt them be excuſed by any other apology but the danger they had brought upon their country. Campian, the Jeſuit, who publiſhed a treatiſe, called the Ten Reaſons, in favour of the church of Rome, was taken and executed; but Parſons, the other Jeſuit, who had come over with him, making his eſcape to the continent, joined the Engliſh refugees in ſoliciting the king of Spain to invade England.

While the church and ſtate of England were thus threatened on the one hand from the fury of the papiſts, they were no leſs diſquieted on the other by the fanatical opinions of ſectaries, imported from Germany and the Low Countries. A new ſect, founded by Nicholai, a Dutchman, and termed the Family of Love, prevailed at this time in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk: they rejected the Lord's Prayer, the ſacraments, and the outward admiſſion of miniſters; they confined ſalvation to themſelves, holding the reſt of the world as reprobates; they were guilty of the moſt ſcandalous impurities and libertiniſm, and publiſhed apologies, filled with all the abſurdities of fanaticiſm; till at length, a proclamation being publiſhed againſt them, they were proſecuted and ſuppreſſed.

This year, 1580, was remarkable for the return of captain Francis Drake from his voyage, which he had completed round the world. This man was born of mean parents in the county of Devon: having amaſſed a large fortune by ſome depredations made on the Spaniards in the Iſthmus of Panama, and having there got a view of the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, was ſo actuated by ambition and a thirſt of gain, that he ventured to employ his whole ſubſtance in a new adventure through thoſe ſeas, ſo little known at that time to the European nations.

It falls not under a general hiſtory to give all the particulars of this famous voyage; but it is proper to mention thoſe of a public concern. He was introduced to court by Hatton, upon propoſing to ſail to the South Seas through the ſtreights of Magellan, a voyage till that time unattempted by Engliſhmen. The fleet with which he ſet ſail conſiſted of the following veſſels: the Pelican, commanded by himſelf, of the burden of one hundred tons; the Elizabeth, vice-admiral, eighty tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, commanded by captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly boat of fifty tons, under captain John Cheſter; and the Chriſtopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under captain John Noon. On board thoſe ſhips, the largeſt of which would at this time be deemed too ſmall for undertaking a common voyage to any of our own ſettlements, embarked one hundred and ſixty-four men, and on the thirteenth of December, 1577, Drake ſailed from Falmouth; on the twentieth of Auguſt following, having turned two of his ſhips adrift, but taking their crews and proviſions on board, he entered the ſtreights of Magellan, and paſſed them with his own ſhip only. While he was in the South Sea he took a prodigious booty from the Spaniards, whom he treated as enemies: he ſacked and plundered the town of St. Aricia; and in one ſhip he took four hundred pounds weight of Baldivian gold: on land he ſeized the value of four hundred thouſand thouſand ducats, in bars of ſilver; and all along the coaſt he found ſuch ſecurity that he had little to do but to load his ſhip with gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones. At laſt he had intelligence that the viceroy of Peru had ſent Pedro Sarmiento, with two ſhips, to intercept him on his return through the Streights of Magellan.

This news, with his own adventuring ſpirit, determined him, if poſſible, to find a way back to England by the north of America, which he coaſted to the latitude of forty-eight degrees; but finding this impracticable, fell back to the latitude of thirty-eight degrees, where he landed in a convenient harbour, amongſt an hoſpitable people, and, in Elizabeth's name, took poſſeſſion of the country, to which he gave the name of New Albion. It was the twenty-ninth of September before he ſet ſail from thence, and the lateneſs of the ſeaſon, joined to the danger of the navigation, determined him to ſail to the Moluccos, where he arrived in the middle of November. On the fifteenth of June next year, after various adventures and dangers, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope, with but fifty-ſeven men on board his ſhip, and three casks of water. On the twenty-fifth of September (Camden ſays the third of November) he entered again the harbour of Plymouth, finding his countrymen in high admiration of his intrepidity, his conſtancy and good fortune.

His adventure, however, became matter of very ſerious conſideration to Elizabeth. Drake had left England on pretext of a voyage to the Levant: the treaties between Elizabeth's anceſtors and the houſe of Burgundy were ſtill in full force, and many doubted whether they were not violated by Drake's proceedings. Mendoza, the Spaniſh reſident, preſented very warm memorials, accuſing him of robbery and piracy, and reclaiming all the treaſure he had taken. Elizabeth for ſome time forbore to declare her opinion either for or againſt Drake, and he therefore ſought to procure friends at court, by making large preſents to ſome of the chief men there. The voice of the public, and her own good ſenſe, which never failed her, ſoon determined Elizabeth in the part ſhe was to act; ſhe ſequeſtered the treaſure, all but what ſhe allowed to Drake, though what that was does not appear.

The Spaniſh miniſtry was informed that if Drake had been guilty of any thing irregular, he was ready to anſwer the law, and that the booty he had made was ſequeſtered to make ſatisfaction: it was added, by Elizabeth's order, that his catholic majeſty had forced her, by ſupporting her rebels in Ireland, to ſpend a greater treaſure than even that which Drake had brought into England: that no treaty betwixt his catholic majeſty and her ſubſiſted, by which her ſubjects were excluded from trading to the Weſt Indies; that ſhe could not look upon that country to be the ſole property of his catholic majeſty, as he held it from no better title than the donation from the biſhop of Rome, who having no right over thoſe countries himſelf, could convey none to another, and whoſe authority, both in ſpiritual and temporal matters, ſhe diſowned; that the inſignificant ceremonies which the Spaniards made uſe of, in taking poſſeſſion of tracts of land in America, ſhould never preclude her from ſending thither colonies of her people, far leſs from looking upon the ocean as the property of any prince or perſon.

Though this was the true language which all proteſtant princes ought to have held during the infancy of the Spaniſh power in the Weſt Indies, before it was eſtabliſhed by preſcription, or confirmed by treaties, yet Elizabeth would not venture to puſh that doctrine ſo far as to treat the Spaniards as they had treated the natives of America; ſhe ordered a large ſum of money to be reſtored to Seburra, a Spaniſh agent, who, inſtead of paying it to the proprietors, remitted it to the prince of Parma, in the Low Countries. But that the whole was not returned, appears from the complaints the Spaniards continued to make concerning Drake's piracy; and the court of England, which, in the manifeſto it publiſhed when the Spaniſh ambaſſador was baniſhed the kingdom, thought proper to give an anſwer to all the other charges brought by the Spaniards, excepting that againſt Drake.

Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel, died this year, in whom the ſirname of a noble family ended, which had been poſſeſſed of this title for above three hundred years, from Richard Fitz Allan, who, being deſcended from the Albineys (ancient earls of Arundel, in Suſſex), in the reign of Edward I. obtained the title of earl without any creation, on account of his being poſſeſſed of the caſtle and lordſhip of Arundel. One of his daughters married Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, by whom ſhe had a ſon, named Philip, who, in right of his mother, took the title of earl of Arundel, which thus came to the Howard family.

In Ireland, Arthur, lord Grey, the deputy-governor, was ſo fortunate as to ſuppreſs a dangerous conſpiracy raiſed by the O' Connors, the M'c Geoghans, and the other ſepts, and put ſeveral of the heads to death, particularly the lord Nugent, ſon to the earl of Weſtmeath. It is ſaid that this lord declared his innocence to the laſt, and that the queen was extremely offended at the lord-deputy for his precipitate cruelty; but this ſeverity had a good effect, for it brought Turlogh Leynigh to accept conditions of peace, and the O' Briens and Cavenaghs (rebellious families in Leinſter) to ſue for pardon, and offer hoſtages for their future good behaviour.

The civil war was renewed in France in the month of February, and ended in November, by a ſixth treaty of peace.

It was in the beginning of this year that Philip II. of Spain ſeized the throne of Portugal, vacant by the death of king Henry: don Antonio, prior of Crato, natural ſon to don Lewis, brother to the late king, would have diſputed the crown with the king of Spain, but the forces of the two competitors being very unequal, all Antonio's endeavours were fruitleſs.

The great expences Elizabeth had been at, obliged her to re-aſſemble her parliament, on the ſixteenth of January, 1581, which, after ſome diſputes about the chuſing a ſpeaker, and filling the vacant ſeats, applied themſelves to the national buſineſs. The puritans in the houſe of commons, not humbled by the checks they had received in the two former ſeſſions, made another attempt in this, to encroach upon what the queen conceived to be her prerogative in eccleſiaſtical matters, and, on the twenty-firſt of January, Mr. Paul Wentworth making a motion for a public faſt to be appointed on a certain day, it was carried by one hundred hundred and fifteen voices againſt one hundred. The debate ſeems to have turned on the power of the houſe of commons in this point, which was not ſupported by any precedent; but as there were inſtances of faſts having been appointed in London by orders of the privy council, it was inferred from thence that the parliament ought in reaſon to be ſuppoſed to have the like power. This ſeems to have been the chief argument whereon the reſolution was founded, which, under pretence of applying to God for his bleſſing on their conſultations and actions, was deſigned as a check or encroachment upon the royal prerogative; and to make the faſt entirely puritanical, it was appointed on the twenty-ninth of January, which was upon a Sunday, a day which hath in all ages and in all parts of the Chriſtian church been conſtantly obſerved as a feſtival.

The queen was ſo highly incenſed at this preſumption, that, on the twenty-fourth of January, ſhe ſent a meſſage to the houſe by her vice-chamberlain, Hatton, "declaring her admiration at the raſhneſs of the houſe in committing ſo evident a contempt againſt her expreſs command, very lately delivered to them, in her name, by the chancellor, as to attempt and exerciſe ſuch an innovation as the appointment of a faſt, without her majeſty's privity and pleaſure firſt known; but was pleaſed to conſtrue it as a raſh, unadviſed, and inconſiderate error of the houſe, proceeding of zeal and not of the wilful or malicious intent of the houſe, or of any member thereof, but imputing it to her own lenity towards a brother of the man that now made this motion, who in the laſt ſeſſion had been for juſt cauſes reprehended and committed by the houſe, but graciouſly pardoned, and reſtored again by her majeſty." The houſe hereupon made their humble ſubmiſſion, and kiſſed the rod of power Elizabeth now ſhook over their heads; and when Mr. Carlton roſe up to ſpeak for the privileges of the houſe, his mouth was ſtopped from the chair, for fear of giving offence to her majeſty *.

The parliament then proceeded to enact ſome ſtatutes for the ſecurity of the government, chiefly againſt the attempts of the catholics: whoever in any way reconciled any one to the church of Rome, or was himſelf reconciled, was declared to be guilty of treaſon: to ſay maſs was puniſhed with one year's impriſonment, and a fine of two hundred marks; the hearing it was puniſhable by a year's impriſonment, and a fine of one hundred marks: a fine of twenty pounds per month was impoſed on every one who continued during that time abſent from the ſervice of the church of England: to utter ſlanderous or ſeditious words againſt the queen, was puniſhable, for the firſt offence, with the pillory and loſs of ears; the ſecond offence was declared felony. The ſeſſion ended, by a prorogation, on the eighteenth of March, the commons having firſt granted the queen a ſubſidy, as did the clergy likewiſe.

The power of Spain was ſo much aggrandized by the acquiſition of Portugal, that Elizabeth found ſtronger reaſons than ever for keeping well with the French: accordingly ſhe, this year, diſpatched Walſingham as her ambaſſador to France, to contract a cloſer connection with Henry, and to conclude a league offenſive and defenſive againſt the formidable power and dangerous uſurpations of the Spaniards.

The great ſucceſs of the duke of Parma laſt year, had obliged the ſtates of the United Provinces to ſend deputies to offer the ſovereignty thereof to the duke of Anjou, which was to deſcend to his legitimate male heirs; but if he had ſeveral ſons, they were to chuſe one in whom it was to be veſted. The treaty was made at Pleſſis le Tours; and the duke undertook the defence of thoſe provinces the more willingly, becauſe, having by his mediation procured a peace between his brother, Henry III. king of France, and the king of Navarre, the former was ſo well pleaſed with this ſervice, that, forgetting his former enmity, he had promiſed to aſſiſt him in procuring a ſettlement to his mind, and particularly in his marriage with the queen of England.

The duke of Anjou had himſelf wrote to Elizabeth for a ſupply of money, in order to enable him to begin his operations in Flanders, and the queen, notwithſtanding her great frugality, was at length perſuaded to grant his requeſt: ſhe ſent him a preſent of one hundred thouſand crowns, by which, added to his own revenues, and the aſſiſtance of the queen-mother, he aſſembled an army, and took the field againſt the prince of Parma. He obliged that general to raiſe the ſiege of Cambray, and, after being formally elected governor of the Netherlands, he diſperſed his troops into winter-quarters, and came over to England, in order to renew his addreſſes to the queen, in the month of November.

He met with ſuch a gracious and favourable reception, that he began to entertain the moſt ſanguine hopes of ſucceſs, and fondly concluded that Elizabeth had now overcome all her ſcruples, and was finally reſolved to chuſe him for her huſband. He was not a little confirmed in theſe hopes by a very extraordinary mark of affection which ſhe gave him, at a magnificent entertainment ſhe made on the anniverſary day of her coronation; for, in ſight of all her court, while the duke and ſhe were entertaining each other apart, ſhe pulled a ring from her own finger, and put it upon his. All the ſpectators imagined that in this ceremony ſhe had given him a promiſe of marriage, and was even deſirous of publiſhing her intention to all the world. Expreſſes immediately flew all over the kingdom, and all over Europe, with information that the match between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou was actually concluded.

But it is more than probable that Elizabeth never had any intention to conſummate what was agreed on by the articles of marriage already mentioned: ſuch a treaty was, if ever, moſt neceſſary at the time it was ſet on foot, when ſhe was ſo powerfully beſet with inveterate and powerful enemies, daily plotting againſt her; and was certain if ſhe rejected the offer, or ſeemed otherwiſe than in earneſt, that the duke would have immediately accepted the daughter of the king of Spain, by which the number and power of her enemies would be increaſed: therefore Elizabeth ventured to play this bold ſtroke, and to make the brother and the ſon of a king the dupe of her politics, not doubting but time would furniſh her with ſufficient pretences to delay the conſummation of her marriage till a more favourable juncture ſhould warrant her final retractation.

This juncture ſeemed now to offer, and ſhe ſaw herſelf furniſhed very ſubſtantial reaſons for acting in this manner by the openneſs of the papiſts, who made no ſcruple every where to boaſt of the duke of Anjou's protection; and ſome of their prieſts were even ſo impudent as publicly to own that they were empowered to abſolve every man in particular from his oath of allegiance, from which Pius V. had, by his bull, abſolved the whole nation in general.

Armed with theſe objections, the diſſembling queen knew ſhe could break off her engagement at will; but as ſhe was deſirous to caſt the blame entirely on the duke, ſhe next care was, by acts of ſeverity, and the rigorous execution of juſtice againſt thoſe that hoped to be protected by him, to wean his affections, and to make him diſcover ſufficient tokens of diſguſt, upon which ſhe might more eaſily clear herſelf of any blame in the eye of the world: but finding that the duke never attempted to interpoſe in favour of the popiſh delinquents, but ſtill continued to preſs with unremitting ardour the conſummation of his marriage, ſhe was obliged to throw off the mask, and declare herſelf openly. Beſides, all her chief confidents and counſellors, Leiceſter, Hatton, and Walſingham, exerted their utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade her from the projected alliance: they repreſented to her, that ſhe was ready to divide her power, by which all England was obedient to her nod, and all Europe in terror of her frown, with a young man of an untried temper, of a foreign education, and of a different religion; ſhe was to bear the diſcontents, the reproaches, nay the curſes of her ſubjects, who, by this match, dreaded to ſee a total alteration in the religion, the laws, and the conſtitution of their country. Elizabeth was deeply affected with theſe various conſiderations, and ſhe was obſerved to paſs ſeveral nights without any ſleep or repoſe: at length her prudence and ambition got the better of her temporal inclination (for I am apt to believe that Elizabeth, by diſſembling ſo long and ſo deeply, had fooled her heart into a certain degree of tenderneſs for her young lover), and having ſent for the duke of Anjou, ſhe had a long converſation with him in private, wherein ſhe informed him of the diſlike her ſubjects had to a French prince, and which was unſurmountable: ſhe next repreſented the little advantage he would reap from her alliance (ſhe being in the forty-ninth year of her age, and not likely to have any children); the great events ſhe apprehended it might produce, and the inconveniences that would ariſe from their different ſentiments in point of religion; and concluded with declaring her final reſolution was, "never to marry."

The duke was thunder-ſtruck to find all his hopes daſhed in the moment he expected to ſee the completion of them, and one of the fineſt crowns in Europe on his head: he flung from the queen's preſence with the moſt viſible marks of diſcontent and rage; he threw from his finger the deceitful ring with which ſhe had ſo lately preſented him; and he taxed the whole ſex with levity, not without ſome particular imputations upon Elizabeth, and her country.

The earl of Suſſex and the lord Burleigh, ſworn enemies to Leiceſter, had been very aſſiduous in bringing about this match, and had been completely duped by Elizabeth's diſſimulation, or variableneſs, by which ever name it may be called. They were ſtruck with ſurprize at this ſudden reverſe, and omitted no efforts to give her mind another turn, more favourable to their deſigns: they repreſented to her the neceſſity of the match, for ſupporting her againſt the power of Spain, which ſingly ſhe was not able to encounter; the danger there was, leſt the young king of Scotland might be brought over entirely to the intereſt of France, and thereby put himſelf at the head of all the papiſts in Britain; and laſtly, the probability that France would reſent ſo much ill treatment, and that the duke of Anjou might ſacrifice Elizabeth's intereſts to the Spaniſh court. Elizabeth heard all this with great temper, but yielded to the ſtronger reaſons urged by Hatton, Walſingham, and Leiceſter, againſt the match. However, to provide againſt all accidents, ſhe found means to prevent the duke from going back to the Low Countries, though the ſtates preſſed his immediate return thither, to oppoſe the progreſs of the prince of Parma, and continued to treat him with extraordinary diſtinctions during the three months ſtay he made in England.

On his departure, in February following, ſhe accompanied him as far as Canterbury, and, after taking his promiſe that he would return in a ſhort time, ſhe ordered the earl of Leiceſter, and ſome of her chief courtiers, to wait upon him to Antwerp. By this gallant treatment the queen took off the edge of that reſentment which otherwiſe might have been expected to follow from the court of France; or rather, the preſent diſtraction of the French monarchy ſecured her againſt the effects of that indignation, which ſhe had reaſon to dread from ſo wanton an affront put upon that royal family.

The duke made a pompous entry into Antwerp, where he was inaugurated duke of Brabant, and afterwards inveſted, at Ghent, as count of Flanders. He gave free leave for the exerciſe of the Romiſh religion to as many as would ſwear fealty to him, and abjure the king of Spain's authority. But, after ſpending great ſums of money, with which he was ſupplied from England, and finding that the titles conferred on him were at beſt but vain and idle, while the ſtates and the prince of Orange held all the dominion in their own hands, he entertained the mad deſign of ſurprizing Antwerp and the chief towns in the Low Countries, in which he was unſucceſsful, and thereby loſt all confidence with the ſtates, and the prince of Orange, and was ſhortly after baniſhed that country, and withdrew to France.

Elizabeth, ſeeing no likelihood of concluding an offenſive league with France, thought fit to cultivate a friendſhip with other potentates, who might be of uſe to her, in caſe of a rupture with Spain; and as Frederic II. king of Denmark, was a prince of great wiſdom and reputation, and had always ſhewed himſelf very affectionate to her, ſhe cauſed him to be choſen knight of the Garter, and ſent Peregrine Bertie, lord Willoughby of Ereſby, to inveſt him with the enſigns of the order. He politely accepted this compliment, but declined the ceremony of inveſtiture, or to take the accuſtomed oath, alleging that he had already taken one, when admitted by the king of France into the order of St. Michael. The ambaſſador was likewiſe charged to remonſtrate in behalf of the Engliſh merchants, againſt the exacting the toll or impoſt laid on ſhips that paſſed the Sound, and to procure that the laſt gelt might be remitted. This laſt duty owed its original to the wars between Denmark and Sweden, when the Dane began to exact, by way of loan, the thirtieth part of all kinds of merchandize, on promiſe of repaying the value thereof when the war was ended. No regard, however, was had to this engagement, and it was become a cuſtomary exaction. But princes ſeldom caring to abate any thing of their revenue, however acquired, the lord Willoughby procured no redreſs of theſe grievances: it was not adviſeable to take rougher meaſures with a prince, whoſe friendſhip might be very ſerviceable to Elizabeth in forming a league with the proteſtant princes of the empire to oppoſe the ambitious deſigns of the king of Spain.

Though Henry III. had very little reaſon to be pleaſed with Elizabeth, yet being jealous of the increaſing power of Philip, and hating the duke of Guiſe; he ſent early in the year 1582, to inform Elizabeth, that the duke, under pretext of raiſing men for the ſervice of the duke of Anjou in the Low Countries, was preparing, with the king of Spain's aſſiſtance, to embark a body of men in Normandy to be landed in England. This intelligence obliged Elizabeth to turn her thoughts ſeriouſly upon the affairs of Scotland.

There the duke of Lenox and James Stuart of Ochiltree, lately created earl of Arran, had acquired an unlimited influence over their ſovereign. Lenox was not deſtitue of good qualities, but he was giddy and unexperienced, a profeſſed Roman catholic, and a ſuppoſed adherent to the duke of Guiſe, ſo that he ſoon became odious to the nation. His colleague, Arran, was a young man, void of principle and religion, who, under the mask of friendſhip, encouraged Lenox to follow unpopular courſes, that he might incur the hatred of the people, and ſo contribute to his own deſtruction. As for James, though he had ſome capacity and inclination for ſchool-learning, he was a weak, ſilly, irreſolute prince, and of a very deſpicable character, and conſequently a fit ſubject for an ambitious and cunning favourite to work upon: in ſhort, his two counſellors, by their arbitrary and illegal proceedings, expoſed not only themſelves but their maſter to the odium of the public. It was not the temper of the Scots to ſubmit patiently to any kind of oppreſſion; they no ſooner felt the goad of power, than they inſtantly began to ſeek redreſs; and if they could not obtain it by fair and gentle means, they immediately had recourſe to the moſt violent and deſperate expedients.

Elizabeth, whom a long knowlege of that people had made perfectly acquainted with their diſpoſitions, and who feared every thing from the duke of Guiſe's faction prevailing in Scotland, turned the reſentment of the great men to her own advantage, and ſo artfully managed, that, without appearing to have any concern in the plot, king James was ſeized by the earls of Marr, Lindſey, and Gowry, partiſans of England; the duke of Lenox, his boſom-friend, was obliged to flee into France, and the earl of Arran, his other favourite, was alſo taken and detained priſoner by the conſpirators; by which it was thought the intereſts of Elizabeth's enemies were entirely deſtroyed.

In the mean time a new treaty was pretended to be begun by the Engliſh council, for the enlargement both of queen Mary and her ſon; but the articles tendered to the captive queen on this occaſion, were couched in ſuch ambiguous terms as, it muſt be confeſſed, there does not appear in them any more ſincerity or intention to bring that affair to an iſſue, than in the preceding negociations. However, this propoſal from Elizabeth ſerved her purpoſe to free herſelf from the perpetual ſolicitations in Mary's favour, and to check the continual plots hatched for her deliverance. It was not without reaſon that this unhappy princeſs had filled all the courts of Europe with complaints of the hardſhips ſhe underwent: ſhe had been confined thirteen years, under different keepers, and often treated in the moſt rigorous manner; ſhe ſaw herſelf deprived of her crown and liberty, her youth had pined away in dreary confinement, her reputation had been blaſted by the venomous breath of malice and defamation, her life was in the power of a jealous rival, who could brook no competition, her health was impaired by confinement and vexation, yet ſhe was denied almoſt every comfort that could help to alleviate ſuch diſtreſs, nay ſhe was even denied the decent conveniency of having female ſervants to attend her *.

But James being permitted to meet an aſſembly of his nobles at St. Andrew's, in the following year, 1583, and by ſeeming to be contented under the government of his new miniſtry, having obtained his full liberty, Elizabeth ſaw all her politics on the point of being overthrown by the reſtoration of the earl of Arran about the royal perſon; who regained ſuch an aſcendant over his ſovereign, that he prevailed with him to declare the noblemen who had ſurprized him, traitors, unleſs they would own themſelves guilty by making ſubmiſſions and taking out pardons: this they did not think it ſafe to do, but retired into foreign countries, all but Gowry who was pardoned, and the earl of Angus, who was confined.

In this ſtate were matters at the Scottiſh court, when Walſingham, though now ſickly and aged, was ſent thither by Elizabeth as the moſt proper perſon to deal with James, and thoſe in power about him; and this miniſter executed his commiſſion ſo well, that he found means to win over Arran, and to ſecure his intereſt in his royal maſter, which proved of no ſmall ſervice to Elizabeth, as that enterprizing nobleman would certainly have cut her out more work in that part of the iſland than ſhe could have been well able to manage, as appeared by ſeveral letters which were, about this time, diſcovered, containing, amongſt other treaſonable matters, earneſt exhortations to ſeveral of the ladies immediately about her perſon, to ſerve her in the ſame manner as Judith did Holofernes; and giving certain advice of Philip II's intention to aſſiſt the duke of Guiſe in a deſcent upon England, in order to revenge the loſſes the crown of Spain had ſuſtained by the late expedition of ſir Francis Drake.

Theſe letters appeared to have been written by one Francis Throgmorton, a young man of a good family and pregnant parts, who, being apprehended and brought before the council, at firſt abſolutely denied the accuſation; but being ſhewn a liſt of all the ports in England that were convenient to land forces

forces at, and another liſt of all the gentlemen that profeſſed the Romiſh religion in England, and were inclinable to countenance the propoſed invaſion, all which papers had been found in his ſcrutore, or desk, he then made the following confeſſion, "That going ſome few years ſince to the Spa, he conferred ſeveral times with Jeney and ſir Francis Inglefield, two Engliſh fugitives, how England might be invaded; and that they had for that purpoſe drawn up the two liſts juſt ſpoken of: that after his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, told him, the catholic princes had formed a deſign to free the queen of Scots, and to employ the duke of Guiſe for that purpoſe: that nothing was wanting, but to know what ſuccours might be depended upon from the Engliſh catholics: that in order to take their meaſures the better, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was ſent into Suſſex, where the duke of Guiſe intended to land: that he (Throgmorton) imparted the project to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who had been already informed of it, and ſhewed him the ports where it would be moſt proper to land: that he moreover acquainted the ſame ambaſſador with the names of the great men to whom he might freely open his mind, becauſe, as he was a public perſon, he would not be ſo narrowly watched: finally, that he conferred with him how to raiſe ſoldiers privately in England, to have them ready when the foreign troops ſhould arrive."

Throgmorton, after this confeſſion, lay ſome months in priſon, but being at length brought to his trial, he was found guilty by his jury, of holding treaſonable correſpondence with the queen's enemies, and received ſentence of death. We learn however from Camden, that when he was brought to Tyburn, he retracted what he had confeſſed.

Before we take our leave of this year, we are to mention, that Elizabeth's fame was ſo great as to induce John, king of Sweden, to ſend a noble embaſſy to her, intreating her mediation between him and John Baſilowitz, emperor of Muſcovy, which ſhe willingly undertook, and ſir Jerome Bowes was ſent her ambaſſador to Muſcovy, who procured a peace for the king of Sweden upon very reaſonable conditions. But the emperor of Muſcovy dying ſoon after, and being ſucceeded by his ſon Theodore Iwanowitz, this latter granted liberty of free traffic to merchants of all nations, without diſtinction. Hereupon Elizabeth preſſed him to adhere to the treaty between his late father and the crown of England, by which the Engliſh ſubjects were indulged with the excluſive right of trading to his country; but the new emperor returned for anſwer, that he would never ſuffer a ſmall company of men to exerciſe a monopoly in his dominions, to the reſtraining of every other free trading nation; however, he promiſed to exact but one half of the uſual cuſtoms of the Engliſh, on account of their having been the firſt who opened a way to trade with Ruſſia.

This year proved fatal to divers great men, for there died, firſt, Thomas Radcliffe, the third earl of Suſſex of this family, lord-chamberlain to the queen, on the twenty-ninth of June, and was buried at Newhall, in Eſſex. Alſo, on the ſixth of July, died Edmund Grindal, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was ſucceeded by Dr. John Whitgift: and, in the month of Auguſt, died Henry Wriotheſly, earl of Southampton, one exceedingly devoted to the Romiſh religion, which coſt him Elizabeth's diſpleaſure and a long impriſonment. This year was alſo diſtinguiſhed by the fate of that brave, but unfortunate ſeaman, ſir Humphrey Gilbert, who was caſt away at ſea on the ninth of September, in his return from the coaſt of North America, where he had taken poſſeſſion, in Elizabeth's name, of the harbour of St. John's, in the iſland of Newfoundland.

In Ireland the famous rebel Gerald Fitz Gerald, the eleventh earl of Deſmond of his family, after having a long time, in lurking places, eſcaped the Engliſh, was now, by a common ſoldier, found in a poor cottage, and ſlain: his head was ſent into England, and ſet upon London bridge. Such was the end of this nobleman, who had for many years carried on a rebellion againſt all the forces that the ſeveral Engliſh lord-deputies could raiſe againſt him: he was deſcended from Maurice, the ſon of Gerald de Windleſhore, or Windſor, an Engliſhman, famous amongſt thoſe who firſt accompanied Henry III. in the expedition into Ireland, in the year 1170.

Sir John Perot being ſent over lord-deputy of Ireland, held a parliament, in which the eſtates of theſe and other rebels were forfeited; and the queen granting the earl of Ormond, (who, being the eldeſt ſon of Deſmond's ſiſter, was his next heir, and had been the principal means of reducing him) ſome part of his lands, ſold the reſt at very eaſy rates to adventurers, that undertook to plant and improve the country. Sales were made of entire baronies, into which the Iriſh counties are divided, as the Engliſh are into hundreds, and the purchaſers, under colour of their general grants, ſweeping all within their diſtricts, turned the innocent Iriſh as well as the guilty out of their poſſeſſions. The queen endeavoured to repreſs this rapaciouſneſs, by a proclamation, of which the injured proprietors, by an inſtance of good fortune rare in that country, reaped the benefit; the deputy, a man of rigid juſtice and inflexible integrity, taking care to ſee it duly executed. No governor in that realm was ever more diligent, vigorous, and impartial in doing right equally to the Iriſh and the Engliſh, which raiſed him abundance of enemies among the latter, who could not bear being reſtrained from oppreſſing the former; but by this means he ſoon brought Munſter into a ſtate of tranquility; nor was he leſs ſucceſsful in rendering the native Iriſh and Highland Scots in Ulſter to obedience, forcing them to ſwear allegiance, and to hold their lands of her in vaſſalage, paying yearly a certain number of beeves and hawks, in lieu of rent, and engaging to ſupply her, in caſe of an expedition, with their ſeveral proportions of horſe and foot ſoldiers, according to the cuſtom of ancient tenures*.

In France, Henry III. behaved in ſuch a manner, that he daily incurred the contempt of his ſubjects. In public he affected an over-ſtrained devotion, whilſt in private he plunged himſelf into the moſt criminal pleaſures. Philip, taking advantage of Henry's indolence with regard to his moſt important affairs, ſtrove by all ſorts of ways to raiſe him troubles, which would hinder him from taking upon

upon him the defence of the Netherlands, who ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to put themſelves under the dominion of France. He tried firſt to perſuade the king of Navarre to take up arms, promiſing to aid and protect the Huguenots. This way failing, the applied to he duke of Guiſe, who accepted the ſuccours offered by Philip, to revenge the mortification he daily received from the king's minions.

Mendoza, the Spaniſh miniſter, was ſo deeply involved in by the diſcoveries made by Throgmorton, that Elizabeth conſidered him as the moſt dangerous enemy ſhe had in England; nor was there any thing bloody or deſperate undertaken againſt her, which ſhe did not lay at his door, and in particular a conſpiracy which had been contrived, and was on the point of taking effect, againſt the queen's life, by the papiſts, who were now worked up to ſuch a degree of enthuſiaſm againſt Elizabeth, that John Somerville, a gentleman of Warwickſhire, undertook a journey to London, on purpoſe to put the queen to death with his own hand, and actually attacked with his ſword ſome of her attendants. Being ſecured, he confeſſed his intention, and named his accomplices, who were all tried and found guilty of high-treaſon, at Guildhall in London. Theſe, and other the like alarming practices of the popiſh faction, made Elizabeth think it was high time to order Mendoza to leave England, for which ſhe had a very plauſible reaſon in the conviction of Throgmorton.

Accordingly, towards the latter end of January, 1584, the ambaſſador was ſummoned to appear before the Engliſh council, who charged him very home with Throgmorton's confeſſion, and the great hand he had in the conſpiracy againſt England. Mendoza boldly ſtood upon his juſtification, and even accuſed Elizabeth of being the aggreſſor, by committing hoſtilities againſt his maſter by ſea, and her miniſters of labouring inceſſantly to ſow diſcord between England and Spain. This behaviour of Mendoza exaſperated Elizabeth ſo much, that he ordered him inſtantly to leave her dominions, which he did, and retired to France. Upon his departure the government thought proper, for the ſatisfaction of foreign courts, that a manifeſto ſhould be drawn up, containing Mendoza's caſe, and an anſwer to the recriminations he had brought *. At the ſame time ſir William Wade, clerk of the council, was diſpatched to the court of Spain, to inform Philip of what had paſſed, and of his miſtreſs's willingneſs to receive another ambaſſador from him; but the haughty Spaniard refuſed Wade an audience, who thereupon returned back, without imparting the contents of his embaſſy to any one at that court.

New overtures were, in the ſummer of this year, made by Mary concerning her liberty, and were ſuch as ſeemingly very well ſatisfied Elizabeth: poor Mary promiſed, if ſhe was ſet at liberty, not only to depend entirely upon Elizabeth, but to deal with her ſon for reſtoring the exiled lords of the Engliſh faction; to order her miniſters abroad to forbear all practices againſt Elizabeth's perſon and dignity; and farther, that Elizabeth ſhould have the honour to publiſh the aſſociation of her ſon with herſelf in the government. Theſe preliminaries ſerved as the foundation of many conferences, but Mary ſtill declined to diſcover any particulars of the duke of Guiſe's purpoſed invaſion before ſhe was reſtored to liberty: and a freſh diſcovery of the intrigues of the Jeſuits once more defeated theſe promiſing appearances.

One Creighton, a Scotchman, of that order, had been employed by Mary to ſolicit twelve thouſand ducats, which had been promiſed her by the court of Rome. Creighton, on his return, happened to fall into the hands of a Dutch privateer, and attempted to tear his papers and throw them overboard; but the wind driving them back into the ſhip, they were ſent with Creighton to England, and being pinned together, Walſingham diſcovered ſome part of his commiſſion, by which it appeared that he had in charge to inform the male-contents of both kingdom, that the pope, Philip of Spain, and the Guiſes, had confederated to exert their utmoſt power to dethrone Elizabeth, and utterly to diſinherit the king of Scotland from the ſucceſſion to the crown of England, as an open favourer of the reformed religion: to marry the captive queen to ſome catholic nobleman of England, and to engage the catholics to chuſe him, ſo married, king of England, to be confirmed by the pope; and to cauſe the children to be born of that marriage to be declared the rightful ſucceſſors to the crown and kingdom of England.

Theſe and other diſcoveries, together with the officiouſneſs of the Engliſh papiſts and the malice of the Scottiſh puritans, rendered Mary extremely obnoxious to Elizabeth, who could not but think her life in danger ſo long as Mary lived, or at leaſt lived with any tolerable degree of freedom; and ſhe took a ſecret umbrage at the earl of Shrewſbury, or his counteſs, or both, for allowing the captive princeſs ſo large a correſpondence as they did, and reſolved to remove her out of their cuſtody; therefore Mary ſent her ſecretary, Nau, with freſh propoſals to Elizabeth, in order to regain her liberty, which, however advantageous, were ſlighted, and ſerved only to heighten the ſuſpicions entertained againſt her; and ſhe was taken from under the cuſtody of the earl of Shrewſbury, and committed to the care of ſir Amias Pawlet and ſir Drue Drury, the firſt her profeſſed enemy, and the latter a cloſe, watchful, cunning puritan.

At the ſame time an aſſociation was formed by the earl of Leiceſter, and other courtiers; and as Elizabeth was extremely popular with all her ſubjects, except the moſt zealous catholics, men of every rank and condition willingly flocked to the ſubſcription of it.

The aſſociators bound themſelves "to defend the queen againſt all her enemies; to revenge her death, or any injury offered to her majeſty; and to exclude from the throne any perſon, whatever title they poſſeſſed, at whoſe inſtigation, or for whoſe behoof, any attempt ſhould be made againſt the life and authority of Elizabeth." The queen of Scots was ſenſible, that the aſſociation was levelled againſt her; and, in order to free herſelf from all ſuſpicion, ſhe likewiſe begged leave to be one of the ſubſcribers.

On the twenty-third of November Elizabeth ſummoned a new parliament; and the members diſcovered the moſt zealous attachment to her perſon and government. They ratified and confirmed the aſſociation; and they ſubjoined a clauſe, empowering the queen to appoint commiſſioners for the trial of any pretender to the crown, who ſhould attempt or imagine any invaſion, inſurrection, or aſſaſſination againſt the queen: upon ſentence, given by theſe commiſſioners, the delinquent was deprived of all right to the ſucceſſion, and was farther liable to ſuch puniſhment as her majeſty ſhould think proper to inflict. And for the greater ſecurity, in caſe of the queen's violent death, a council of regency was named to puniſh the authors of that barbarous deed, to conduct the adminiſtration of public affairs, and to ſettle the ſucceſſion of the crown.

* Strype's Annals, vol. iii. Append. p. 43.

At the ſame time, in order to ſtrengthen the hands of her majeſty, the parliament granted her a ſupply of one ſubſidy and two fifteenths. They likewiſe paſſed a ſevere law againſt Jeſuits and popiſh prieſts, importing, "that they ſhould leave the kingdom within forty days; that thoſe who ſhould tarry behind that time, or ſhould afterwards return, ſhould be puniſhed as traitors; that thoſe who harboured or aſſiſted them, ſhould be guilty of felony; that thoſe who were educated in foreign ſeminaries, if they returned not in ſix months after notice given, and ſubmitted not themſelves to the queen, before a biſhop or two juſtices, ſhould be guilty of high-treaſon: and if any one, ſo ſubmitting themſelves, ſhould, within ten years, approach the queen's perſon, or come within ten miles of the court, their ſubmiſſion ſhould be void and of no effect.

This law, however rigorous in appearance, was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of the queen's perſon, which, even with all theſe precautions, was conſtantly expoſed to the moſt imminent danger, from the ſecret plots or open attempts of the bigotted Romaniſts.

The ſtate of affairs in Scotland this year continued to be very diſagreeable to Elizabeth: ſhe had learned that the earl of Arran, who now had an entire aſcendancy over James, had brought him to conſent to a marriage with a daughter of France; in order, therefore, to prevent the miſchiefs which might happen from that quarter, ſhe ſent ſecretary Daviſon into Scotland, under colour of excuſing her protection of certain Scottiſh fugitives, though the king had demanded them by virtue of the treaty of alliance concluded between the two kingdoms; but Daviſon's buſineſs was to complete the work which Walſingham had begun, namely, to win the earl of Arran over to the queen's intereſt. This miniſter ſucceeded perfectly well in his commiſſion, and, by means that are eaſy to be gueſſed, prevailed with him to act nothing but in concert with Elizabeth.

Before his return to England, it was agreed between the two courts, that the lord Hunſdon for England, and the earl of Arran for Scotland, ſhould meet upon the borders, and make a regulation proper to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms. Under this pretence theſe two lords conferred together, and, before they parted, made a private treaty, whereby the earl of Arran engaged to keep the king unmarried for three years: Elizabeth pretended ſhe deſigned to give him a princeſs of the blood royal of England, who was not yet marriageable: this was at leaſt the pretence with which the treaty was coloured.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the maſter of Gray, a young Scottiſh lord, inſinuated himſelf ſo far into king James's favour, that the earl of Arran, growing jealous, found means to remove him by cauſing him to be ſent ambaſſador to Elizabeth. Gray was no ſooner in England, but the queen won him by careſſes and bounties: from that time the ambaſſador feigned to be ſtrongly attached to queen Mary's intereſt, and by that means drew ſecrets from her, which Elizabeth knew how to improve. The earl of Arran having ſome intelligence of the intrigue, informed the king of it, in order to ruin his rival; but as in all likelihood he could bring no proof of what he advanced, Gray being returned to Scotland, was very well received by the king, and ſpared no pains in his turn to ruin the favourite.

As for the unfortunate Mary, ſhe ſtill continued under the moſt rigorous confinement, and every method was uſed that was thought moſt likely to drive her to deſpair, or, perhaps, provoke her to take ſome raſh meaſures, which would furniſh her enemies with a ſufficient handle for her deſtruction. The earl of Leiceſter, being baffled in his expectation by her temper and reſignation, is ſaid to have hired ruffians to murder this forlorn princeſs; but Drury was a man of too much honour to admit them into her preſence: nevertheleſs, ſhe endured the moſt barbarous treatment; ſhe was now deprived of the conveniences ſhe hitherto enjoyed; ſhe was prohibited giving alms to the poor; ſhe was confined to two wretched chambers, in ſuch decay that they could not ſcreen her from the inclemencies of the weather, ſo that ſhe was ſeized with rheumatic diſorders, by which her life was endangered; and though ſhe appealed to queen Elizabeth for redreſs, the winter was far advanced before ſhe was removed to Chartley caſtle.

This year died, in exile and miſery, on account of his rebellion in the North in the year 1569, Charles Neville, the laſt earl of Weſtmoreland of this family; a houſe from whence were deſcended many noble perſonages, viz. ſix earls of Weſtmoreland, two earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, an earl of Kent, a marquis of Mountacute, a duke of Bedford, baron Ferrers of Oſley, the lord Latimer, the lord Abergavenny, one queen, five ducheſſes, an archbiſhop of York, and many others.

It was in this year alſo that the valiant and learned ſir Walter Raleigh diſcovered that part of North America which he afterwards called Virginia, in honour of his virgin miſtreſs, queen Elizabeth*.

The

* The ſituation of this colony is remarkably happy and convenient, having the river Potowmack on the north-eaſt, which ſeparates it from Maryland; the Atlantic Ocean on the eaſt; Carolina on the ſouth; and the Apalachian mountains on the weſt, which divides it from a vaſt tract of land called Louiſiana. Its extent is from latitude 36° 30′, to 39° 30′ north, on the weſt ſide of the bay; but on the eaſt ſide it extends only from cape Charles in latitude 37°, 13′, to latitude 38°. Its breadth, ſo far as it is planted, is about one hundred miles; but it hath no bounds to the weſtward. The air of this country depends very much upon the winds: the north and north-weſt are either very ſharp and piercing, or boiſterous and ſtormy; and the ſouth-eaſt and ſouth, hazy and ſultry. The winter is dry and clear; ſnow falls in great quantities, but ſeldom lies above a day or two: and the froſts, though quick and ſharp, ſeldom laſt as long. The ſpring is ſomewhat earlier than ours: May and June are very pleaſant months; July and Auguſt, ſultry hot; September is noted for prodigious ſhowers of rain. The ſoil is low towards the ſea-coaſts; and for an hundred miles up into the country hardly a hill or a ſtone are to be met

The prince of Parma continued to gain ground upon the confederate provinces of the Low Countries, which ſuſtained an irreparable loſs by the death of the prince of Orange, who was treacherouſly ſhot by one Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian. His eldeſt ſon, Philip, being in the hands of the king of Spain, and bred in the Roman catholic religion, the ſtates conferred the government of Holland and Zealand upon his ſecond ſon, Maurice, though he was but eighteen years of age; and the prince of Parma, taking notice of their conſternation, inveſted Antwerp. In this diſtreſſed condition they offered to acknowlege the ſovereignty of the French; but Henry being too much embarraſſed in his own affairs to accept an offer that would engage him in farther trouble and expence, they had recourſe to the queen of England, who likewiſe declined their offer, though ſhe promiſed to aſſiſt them in maintaining the war againſt their oppreſſors.

In the mean time the duke of Anjou dying, and the king of France having no children, the duke of Guiſe, taking advantage of the bigotry of the people, and their averſion to the king of Navarre, then apparent heir to the crown, on account of his being a proteſtant, was contriving and caballing with all his power, under the name of religion, to ſecure the ſucceſſion to himſelf in caſe of a demiſe. With this view he entered into a league with Philip II. of Spain, who, covering his real deſign under the ſame religious mask, kindled a flame in France which conſumed that kingdom, and hindered the French from thinking of the acquiſition of the Netherlands. Henry III. having the laſt year been choſen into the order of the Garter, queen Elizabeth ſent this year the earl of Derby to France, to inveſt him with the robes and enſigns of the order.

In the beginning of the year 1585, Elizabeth diſcovered a conſpiracy to take away her life, of which one Parry was the author. He was a gentleman of Wales, and a member of the houſe of commons, and one greatly indebted to the queen for giving him his life, after condemnation for breaking into the chamber of Hugh Hare and wounding him: he had alſo been her ſworn ſervant for ſeveral years before that time; but was now ſo ſpirited up by the ſolicitations and traitorous arguments of cardinal Allen, Benedict Palaſius Campegius, the pope's nuncio at Venice, and others, confirmed with the encouragement of Ragazonius, the pope's nuncio in France, and letters from the cardinal Coſmo, wherein the attempt was commended, and Parry was abſolved in the pope's name, that he was wrought upon, and agreed with one Edward Neville, a diſcontented relation to the earl of Weſtmoreland, to kill the queen as ſhe rode abroad to take the air as uſual.

Neville diſcovered this plot and bloody attempt, in hopes, as ſuppoſed, to ſecure an intereſt in the title of lord Latimer, as next male heir to the earl of Weſtmoreland, the news of whoſe death arrived about the beginning of this year: and Parry confeſſed it fully upon his examination before three privy counſellors, the lord Hunſdon, ſir Chriſtopher Hatton, and ſir Francis Walſingham; and by letters to the queen herſelf, the lord-treaſurer, and to the earl of Leiceſter, he acknowleged his crime, and interceded for pardon. A few days after he was brought to judgment in Weſtminſter-hall, where he pleaded guilty, and declared that his confeſſion was free and not extorted; yet denied his having been reſolved at any time to kill the queen: and, after ſome pauſe, being urged to ſpeak if he had any thing to ſay why judgment ſhould not paſs upon him, he, with great perturbation, as one agitated with a bad conſcience, added, "I ſee I muſt die, becauſe I was not reſolved." At the gallows he boaſted much of his having been a faithful keeper of the queen, becauſe he had not killed her; and he was hanged in Palace-yard, Weſtminſter, while both houſes of parliament were ſitting in the hall, which met by prorogation in March this year, and was their fourth ſeſſion.

Theſe deſperate proceedings againſt the queen's perſon were productive of ſeveral very ſevere reſolutions of the parliament, for her ſafety, againſt popiſh prieſts and Jeſuits; but not all the vigour or watchfulneſs of the government was able to reſtrain the plottings of thoſe zealots, as we ſhall have occaſion to remark hereafter.

On the nineteenth of April this year, the province of Utrecht, and, on the fifteenth of May thereafter, the province of Guelderland, by their deputies, preſented formal petitions to Elizabeth, to take them under her protection; and by the ſixteenth of June, their example was followed by all the other provinces. Elizabeth's counſellors were greatly divided with regard to the conduct which ſhe ought to obſerve in this delicate and critical juncture: ſome of them adviſed her to accept the propoſal of the ſtates; others perſuaded her, not only to reject it, but refuſe them all aſſiſtance; and each party endeavoured to ſupport their opinion by many plauſible arguments. Elizabeth foreſaw the dangerous conquences attending either extreme, and ſhe therefore reſolved to ſteer a middle courſe. She was determined not to behold patiently the met with. Here are trees of various kinds, and of an incredible magnitude, with plenty of paſture-grounds. The land in general is as good as in England, producing rice, hemp, and Indian corn; alſo flax, ſilk-cotton, ſilk-graſs, and wild grapes: but in Virginia they are ſo extremely addicted to their ſtaple commodity, tobacco, that they hardly mind any thing elſe, ſo they can bring that plant to a tolerable market. This trade is brought to ſuch perfection, that the Virginia tobacco, eſpecially the ſweet-ſcented, which grows on York-river, is reckoned to be the beſt in the world, and generally vended in England for home conſumption. The other ſort, called Oranoac, turns to as good an account, being ſent to Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Germany. In this province are fifty-four pariſhes, of which thirty or forty are ſupplied with miniſters. In each pariſh is a church, and in thoſe of large extent are chapels of eaſe. The miniſters maintenance is ſettled at ſixteen hundred pounds of tobacco yearly, beſides perquiſites. There are only two preſbyterian and three quakers meetings in this colony. At Middle Plantation Row, called Williamſburg, is a college. Though the common way of traffic here is by barter of one commodity for another, or of any for tobacco, yet they have ſome ſilver coin, both Engliſh and Spaniſh. In Virginia, when any perſon is diſabled from working, either by age or ſickneſs, he is placed in ſome planter's houſe, and ſupported at the public expence. Such is the hoſpitality of the Virginian planters, that a ſtranger will be entertained at any of their houſes, ſo that inns on the road are unneceſſary. It is but very lately that they have begun to build forts, their main dependence being on a well regulated militia by land, and the cruizers ſent from England by ſea. Though they have plenty of excellent timber and naval ſtores, and the whole country one grand harbour, after entering Cheſapeak bay, between cape Charles and cape Henry, yet they build no ſhips. In Virginia are few towns; the chief are James Town and Williamſburgh above mentioned, the planters reſiding on their eſtates or farms, moſt of which lie contiguous to ſome great river, ſo that ſhips can come up almoſt to their doors, and take in their tobacco. Syſtem of Geogr.

total ruin of the revolted provinces, whoſe intereſt ſhe conſidered as intimately connected with her own; but, ſenſible that the acceptance of their ſovereignty would oblige her to exert her whole force in their defence, and excite the jealouſy of her neighbours, and perhaps expoſe her to the reproach of ambition and uſurpation, ſhe prudently declined this offer.

She engaged, however, in a league with the ſtates, on the following terms; that ſhe ſhould aſſiſt them with an army of five thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, at her own expence, during the war; that the general, and two others whom ſhe ſhould name, ſhould have ſeats in the council of the ſtates; that no peace or treaty ſhould be made but by common conſent; that immediately after the concluſion of the war, ſhe ſhould be reimburſed for her charges; and that in the mean time the towns of Fluſhing and the Brill, with the caſtle of Rammekins, ſhould be put into her hands, by way of ſecurity.

The prince of Condé alſo, in behalf of the French Huguenots, was favoured with a ſupply of fifty thouſand crowns and ten ſhips of war, with which he was enabled to raiſe the blockade of Rochelle, and to take the field with his land forces, which the duke of Guiſe had ſhut up in this port.

On the twenty-third of October the earl of Leiceſter was ſent over to Holland at the head of the Engliſh auxiliaries. He was attended by a ſplendid retinue, compoſed of the young earl of Eſſex, his ſon-in-law, the lords Audley and North, ſir William Ruſſel, ſir Thomas Shirley, ſir Arthur Baſſet, ſir Walter Waller, ſir Gervaſe Clifton, and a ſelect troop of five hundred gentlemen. He was met at his arrival at Fluſhing by his nephew, ſir Philip Sidney, the governor: and every town through which he paſſed, diſcovered their joy by acclamations and triumphal arches, as if his preſence and the queen's aſſiſtance had ſaved them from impending ruin.

The ſtates, deſirous of ſecuring the friendſhip of Elizabeth, and knowing the influence which Leiceſter had with her, honoured him with the title of Governor and Captain-general of the United Provinces, aſſigned him a guard to attend his perſon, and treated him in ſome meaſure as their ſovereign. But this ſtep produced a contrary effect to what they intended: the queen was equally diſpleaſed at the artifice of the ſtates and the vanity of Leiceſter; ſhe reprimanded both of them very ſharply by letters, and it was not without great difficulty that, after many humble ſubmiſſions, they were able to regain her favour.

As Elizabeth could expect no otherwiſe than that Philip of Spain would look upon the aid ſent to his rebellious ſubjects in the Low Countries, to be a breach of the alliance between the two crowns, and a declaration of war againſt him, ſhe very politicly determined to ſtrike a blow, that might at once procure her reſpect and advantage. Accordingly ſhe diſpatched a fleet of twenty-one ſail, under the command of ſir Francis Drake, with two thouſand three hundred land forces, under the conduct of Chriſtopher Carliſle, to attack the Spaniſh ſettlements in America, which were conſidered as the chief ſource of Philip's power, as well as the moſt defenceleſs part of his dominions. The appearance of the Engliſh being altogether unexpected there, they, without any reſiſtance, made themſelves maſters of St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd iſlands; made a deſcent upon St. Domingo, or Hiſpaniola, and took its capital; then ran down along the continent and reduced Carthagena, and burnt the towns of St. Antonio and St. Helena, in Florida; and were meditating other expeditions, had they not been ſeparated by violent ſtorms, which prevented the fleet from joining till they met in England. In this expedition the Engliſh loſt ſeven hundred men, but brought home ſuch an immenſe booty, as ſufficiently rewarded the others for their ſufferings, and with ſuch accounts of the Spaniſh weakneſs in thoſe quarters as greatly contributed to animate the nation to future enterprizes of the like nature. It is commonly ſuppoſed that the uſe of tobacco was firſt introduced into England by Drake's fleet.

In the courſe of this year alſo John Davis finiſhed his third voyage in queſt of a north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt Indies. He diſcovered the ſtreight which bears his name, and ſailed beyond the eighty-third degree of northern latitude, but was obliged to return without ſucceſs.

The very rigorous laws which the late parliament had enacted againſt the papiſts, made Philip, earl of Arundel, ſon of the late duke of Norfolk, who was zealouſly attached to that religion, reſolve to retire to another country, where he could enjoy his faith in quiet. This nobleman had been twice examined before the council, and confined to his own houſe, on ſuſpicion of practiſing againſt the government; and his intended departure being now betrayed by a ſervant, he was ſent priſoner to the Tower, which was at this time the ſcene of a remarkable tranſaction.

Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, brother of him who had been beheaded, being accuſed of having ſome ſhare in Throgmorton's conſpiracy, and of having correſponded with lord Paget and the duke of Guiſe, was committed to the Tower, where, either conſcious of his guilt, or foreſeeing that evidence would be ſuborned for his deſtruction, he, in order to diſappoint Elizabeth of his forfeiture, and to retain his fortune in the family, ſhot himſelf in the breaſt with a piſtol.

Pope Gregory dying in April this year, was ſucceeded by the cardinal de Montalto, who took the name of Sixtus V. He immediately fulminated the cenſures of the church againſt the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, not only as relapſed heretics, but as perſons of ſpurious birth: hence it was eaſy to ſee how much the court of Rome countenanced the deſigns of the duke of Guiſe, and what reaſons Elizabeth had to dread that duke's becoming one day king of France, and being ſupported by the pope and Spain.

Such being the ſtate of affairs in France, and Elizabeth knowing that the party of the Guiſes were continually ſtirring up the embers of ſedition both in Scotland and England, ſhe thought it highly neceſſary to ſtrengthen herſelf by ſome powerful alliances. With this view ſhe ſent ſir Thomas Bodley, the great patron of learning, to negociate with the king of Denmark, and other northern ſtates; and Edward Wootton, a fine gentleman, and one who had equally a turn for buſineſs, for pleaſure, and politeneſs, was diſpatched to the court of Scotland, to aſſure James how ſincerely ſhe was in his intereſt, and to endeavour by any means to draw him into a league of mutual offence and defence, and withal to recommend to that monarch a match with the the daughter of the king of Denmark: but Wootton, under the pretence of entertaining and diverting the young king, endeavoured to remove from his royal preſence all who were ſuſpected of being averſe to Elizabeth's intentions; to ſow factions in his court; and, when opportunity ſerved, to ſeize his perſon, and carry him by force into England. But the conſpiracy was diſcovered before it could be carried into execution, and Wootton fled haſtily from Scotland, without taking leave of the court. However, James ſoon after was obliged to ſubmit to Elizabeth's creatures: the Scottiſh fugitive lords, returning well ſupported from England, made themſelves maſters of his perſon by ſurprize, in the caſtle of Stirling, and obliged him to paſs an act of indemnity for all offences committed againſt him by any perſons whatever ſince his being declared king; and ſoon after to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with the queen of England. The earl of Arran, James's favourite and firſt miniſter, finding his affairs for the preſent entirely ruined, and his life itſelf in jeopardy, fled over to France.

In Ireland, this year, the Burghs raiſed two ſucceſſive inſurrections, but were reduced by ſir John Perot, the lord-deputy, reinforced by the earl of Clanrickard, who not only compelled them to give freſh hoſtages, but deſtroyed their allies the Hebridian Scots, three thouſand of whom were cut in pieces at Arvadar; ſo that their countrymen were deterred from proſecuting ſuch adventures, and Ireland for ſome time remained in tranquility.

The earl of Leiceſter, notwithſtanding the pretended diſpleaſure of Elizabeth at his having accepted the title of Governor and Captain-general of the United Provinces, which veſted him with an almoſt univerſal power, proceeded in the exerciſe of his new authority. His firſt military ſervice in the Low Countries was an attempt to raiſe the ſiege of Grave, in Brabant, which had been formed by count Mansfeldt, a general in the prince of Parma's ſervice, in the ſpring of 1586, in which Leiceſter miſcarried, the town being yielded up by its governor, Peter Van Hement, who, for this act of cowardice, was, by Leiceſter's orders, puniſhed with death.

After the reduction of Grave, the prince of Parma bent all his force, which conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, to take Venlo; which he likewiſe reduced, after a moſt gallant defence on the part of the beſieged, under the command of colonel Skenke, the governor, who, with ſir Robert Williams, a Welſh officer, ſignalized themſelves greatly on this occaſion. On the other hand, the lord Willoughby of Ereſby, governor of Bergen op Zoom, cut off a large convoy of proviſions belonging to the enemy; and ſir Philip Sidney, with count Maurice, ſurprized the town of Axel, in Flanders. The next expedition of the prince of Parma was againſt Rheinberg: this place was garriſoned by twelve hundred Engliſh, under colonel Morgan. Leiceſter thought this a place of too much importance to be neglected, and therefore, by way of diverſion, made diſpoſitions for attacking Zutphen, a town of the greateſt conſequence to the enemy: this had the propoſed effect; the prince of Parma immediately abandoned the ſiege of Rheinberg, and advanced to give the earl of Leiceſter battle before Zutphen, when, after a bloody diſpute, the Engliſh were obliged to retreat. In this action our country ſuffered irreparable loſs by the death of ſir Philip Sidney, who was mortally wounded in the thigh. This gentleman, though not quite thirty-five years of age when he died, was at once the delight and ornament of the Engliſh court; and as all his influence with the queen and the earl of Leiceſter was wholly employed in the encouragement of genius and literature, his name has been immortalized by the writings as well of cotemporaries as of ſucceeding authors. Nor was his fame confined to England alone; the king of Scotland, charmed with the virtues of this young hero, celebrated his memory in a copy of Latin verſes which he compoſed on occaſion of his death.

Notwithſtanding the extraordinary joy the ſtates had diſcovered on the arrival of Leiceſter, they ſoon found that his abilities were by no means equal to the task with which he was entruſted; and his exceſſive pride and ambition ſoon bred an univerſal diſcontent againſt him, inſomuch that, after an inſignificant campaign, he ſent his forces into winter-quarters, and coming himſelf to the Hague, found a very different reception from the ſtates to what they had given him before: the members did not heſitate to charge him with abuſing the public money, with the neglect of diſcipline, and with many other oppreſſive exerciſes of his power, inconſiſtent with the liberties of that country. Upon this the earl thought proper to leave the Low Countries and return to England, where he arrived in the month of December. And thus ſtood the ſtate of affairs in the Low Countries this year: we are now to attend thoſe of England, where all was in confuſion.

Every day brought Elizabeth freſh intelligence of the king of Spain's ſchemes againſt her perſon and crown; one amongſt many others was a new-pretended claim to the ſucceſſion of the kingdom of England, which Camden ſays the Jeſuits about this time forged for the Spaniard in his own right, and to that end ſent into England one Chamier, a prieſt of their own ſociety, to engage the popiſh noblemen and gentry in their party. If Elizabeth was alarmed at theſe intelligences, ſhe was ſtill more ſo by the diſcovery of a plot which was laid againſt her life.

The ſpirit of depoſing and murdering princes upon papal bulls and excommunications had arrived to an incredible height in the Engliſh ſeminaries abroad. The brain of one John Savage had been fired to ſuch a degree by that doctrine, that he ſolemnly devoted himſelf to murder Elizabeth; and one Ballard, a prieſt, being ſent over from the ſeminary at Rheims to England, in order to propagate the king-killing principles lately ſet on foot, and being encouraged by Mendoza, the late Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, but now reſiding in France, he found means to corrupt one Anthony Babington, a young gentleman of good fortune in Derbyſhire, with ſeveral more, to join Savage in the execution of his vow. In the mean time the papiſts, in order to carry on their plot with leſs ſuſpicion, and to lull the watchful council of the Engliſh cabinet into fatal ſecurity, publiſhed ſeveral hypocritical writings, in which they profeſſed the higheſt regard for Elizabeth's perſon and government, admoniſhing the people of their perſuaſion not to engage in any practices againſt the ſtate, but to confine themſelves to ſuch weapons as are alone lawful for Chriſtians to uſe, ſuch as tears, ſpiritual armour, daily prayers, faſtings, and the like.

Nevertheleſs the watchful Walſingham had his ſpies on all their actions; and one Maud, a man of impenetrable diſſimulation, who mingled in all their counſels, by Walſingham's orders, had ſo inſinuated himſelf into the good opinion of Ballard, that this latter took him in company with him back to France, and made him privy to all his proceedings; and by him and Gilbert Gifford, a prieſt of the Rheimiſh ſeminary, who was intruſted with the conveyance of all the literary correſpondence, Walſingham had every part of the conſpiracy regularly communicated to him.

Ballard having, as he thought, ſettled all matters upon a ſure footing, for the perpetration of his villainous purpoſe, returned to England, about Whitſuntide, in a military dreſs, and with the aſſumed name of captain Foſcue, to aſſiſt in the final execution of it, and with him brought his new-made convert, Anthony Babington above-mentioned. This young gentleman was a zealous papiſt, of a violent ſpirit, and of parts and knowlege above his years: he had, in his travels through France, ſome years before, contracted an intimacy with Thomas Morgan, a fugitive rebel and a penſioner of the queen of Scots, who had introduced him to the biſhop of Glaſgow, Mary's ambaſſador at that court, upon whoſe recommendation young Babington gained a confidence with the captive princeſs, inſomuch that, during her being in the cuſtody of the earl of Shrewſbury, he had managed her correſpodence at certain times with her foreign friends. Upon her being removed to the cuſtody of ſir Amias Pawlet, the connection dropped, and Babington had therewith dropped all farther thoughts of Mary or her concerns; but the wicked workings of Ballard had quickly rekindled all Babington's zeal for her ſervice, and he not only readily joined as one in the execution of the intended aſſaſſination, but alſo planned out a new ſcheme of an invaſion, and was himſelf to be one of an hundred gentlemen who were to deliver the queen of Scots from her impriſonment. He then wrote to Mary, giving an account of all that had paſſed between Ballard and him, and inſiſting with that queen, that the gentlemen who were engaged in her ſervice, ſhould be aſſured of a reward ſuitable to their merits, with other ſtipulations of no great moment to be inſerted here. This letter of Babington's, which was written in the uſual cypher which had paſſed between him and Mary, was ſo agreeable to the latter, that ſhe failed not to anſwer it in the ſame cypher, on the twenty-ſeventh of July, deſiring that the conſpirators would be extremely cautious, leſt they ſhould precipitate matters before the return of their Engliſh friends from abroad, before they were aſſured of foreign ſuccour, and before ſome diſturbances were raiſed in Ireland: at the ſame time ſhe pointed out the moſt ready methods for her own deliverance, viz. either by overturning a cart in the gate-way of the houſe where ſhe was kept, ſetting the ſtables on fire, or carrying her away as ſhe rode abroad to take an airing in the fields between Chartley and Stafford. Theſe leters were afterwards produced in evidence againſt Mary upon her trial, and made the very foundation of the judgment paſſed upon this princeſs, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

In the mean time Walſingham made uſe of a new artifice, in order to diſcover the bottom of the plot; he added to a letter of Mary's, delivered to him by his truſty agent Maud, a poſtſcript in the ſame cypher, in which he made her deſire Babington to ſend her the names of the conſpirators. This ſcheme ſucceeded according to the ſtateſman's wiſh, and he quickly learned that Savage, already mentioned; Charles Tilney, a man of family, one of Elizabeth's band of penſioners; John Charnock, a Lancaſhireman; Edward Abingdon, whoſe father had been cofferer to Elizabeth; Chidcock Tichburn, a gentleman of Southampton; and one Barnwell, a perſon of quality in Ireland, were the ſix engaged by oath to aſſaſſinate the queen. At the ſame time the ridiculous vanity of Babington furniſhed Walſingham with ſtill another means of diſcovery, as well as of defence: that gentleman had cauſed a picture to be drawn, where he himſelf was repreſented ſtanding amidſt the ſix aſſaſſins, and a motto added, implying that they were jointly embarked in ſome hazardous enterprize. A copy of this picture was carried to Walſingham by one Polly, another of his ſpies, who had wormed himſelf into Babington's confidence, and by Walſingham ſhewn to the queen, that ſhe might know the aſſaſſins, and be upon her guard if any of them ſhould attempt to approach her perſon.

Thus the conſpirators were, unknown to themſelves, within inextricable toils; and indeed it required all Walſingham's ſagacity to counter-work Babington's cunning; for, perceiving that the deſign was likely to ſtick at the want of foreign force, he betook himſelf to the common arts of the prieſts and papiſts of thoſe days, of tempting Walſingham to place him as a ſpy abroad upon Mary's friends. Walſingham received him as a gentleman, and promiſed him the queen's paſſport for going to France; but, as it were in great confidence, bid him beware of the informers and meſſengers, who were every where abroad, and were in the king's pay; though it ſhould be abſolutely unſafe for them to lay hold on Babington, becauſe releaſing him without trial would render him ſuſpected by his own party. This correſpendence with Walſingham was by Babington intruſted with Ballard, who was to be embarked in the ſame deſign, and go abroad with Babington, who by this time had provided all his agents.

But Walſingham thought his buſineſs would be but half done unleſs he could find means to involve the queen of Scots in the fate of her friends. With this view he laid a deep ſcheme for entrapping her, through the heedleſſneſs of her ſecretaries Nau and Curle. The former was a Frenchman, the latter a Scot, both of them, the firſt through want of honeſty, the latter through want of courage, very ill qualified for their employments. Mary continued ſtill at the houſe of ſir Amias Pawlet, and Walſingham wrote to that gentleman for leave for Gifford, the prieſt, to corrupt one of his ſervants; Pawlet declined this, becauſe he thought it inconſiſtent with his own character, as a gentleman, to harbour a known traitor in his houſe, but he winked at Gifford's corrupting a fellow in the neighbourhood, who, through a hole in the wall, ſtopped up by a looſe ſtone, brought all the letters from Mary, or her ſecretaries, to Gifford, by whom they were tranſmitted to Walſingham, who thus became poſ-ſeſſed of all that paſſed between Mary, or rather her ſecretaries, and her friends, either at home or abroad.

While Walſingham was thus taking every precaution neceſſary to detect and prevent all the deſigns of the conſpirators, Elizabeth began to be afraid leſt he ſhould ſpin his thread of politics too fine, and ſhe herſelf at length fall a victim to the determined revenge of her enemies; ſhe therefore inſiſted that the whole affair ſhould be laid before her council, and ſuch meaſures taken as to ſecure the conſpirators. According Ballard, as the moſt dangerous of all, was ſeized at Babington's houſe. This would have alarmed the conſpirators the more, if both Ballard and Babington had not been at firſt perſuaded from the cautions given them by Walſingham, that it was unknown to him, and that their arreſt was only in conſequence of the officiouſneſs of ſpies and informers. Walſingham himſelf confirmed them in this notion, and thereby prevented Babington's deſign of immediately murdering Elizabeth, and risking all conſequences: but inſtead of that he remained in London, and had one Scudamore placed over him as a ſpy by Walſingham. One evening, while they were both at ſupper, Scudamore received a note from Walſingham, ordering him to watch Babington more narrowly than ever; and Babington, by Scudamore's inadvertency, reading the note over his ſhoulder, haſtily roſe from table, and, leaving his cloak and ſword behind him, went out of the room as if upon a ſudden occaſion, made the beſt of his way to Weſtminſter, and, after conferring with Charnock, withdrew, with him and ſome others, into St. John's Wood, where they lurked ten days, but were at laſt diſcovered near Harrow on the Hill, hid in barns and dreſſed like countrymen, and brought priſoners to London.

During their impriſonment, they were examined upon the particulars of the conſpiracy, and confeſſed all they knew, but, indeed, nothing that could affect the queen of Scots as being privy to the deſign of aſſaſſinating Elizabeth, farther than that Babington had received letters from her in cypher, which they believed to have been written by her, or by her order; nor has it been pretended, that even Babington ever ſaw her, much leſs ever ſee her write. On the thirteenth of September, Babington and Ballard, with five of their accomplices, were arraigned, and pleaded guilty; and next day ſeven others concerned in the ſame conſpiracy were convicted upon their own confeſſions, or thoſe of their aſſociates. The firſt ſeven were executed with all the rigour of the ſentence pronounced againſt traitors; but Elizabeth ordered that the other ſeven ſhould hang till they were dead. At the place of execution they behaved in general with decency and reſignation, and repented that part of the conſpiracy, in which they were to murder Elizabeth.

The leſſer conſpirators being thus puniſhed, meaſures were taken for the trial and conviction of her, for whoſe ſake, and by whoſe ſuppoſed concurrence this deep and dangerous plot had been formed againſt the life of the queen and the peace of the kingdom: but the more determined Elizabeth was to cut off the queen of Scots, the more earneſtly ſhe applied herſelf to bring the ſon to wink at the death of his mother. It was natural to think, that James would have reſented the late traitorous attempt made upon his perſon, at the inſtigation and with the countenance of Elizabeth; but the preſent ſituation of his affairs obliged him to conceal his indignation, and his mild and peaceable temper ſoon induced him to forget the injury. Randolph had been ſent by the court of England to ſucceed Wootton as ambaſſador in Scotland; and, by the temptation of a penſion of five thouſand pounds ſterling per annum, offered to king James to enable him to ſupport the regal dignity with more luſtre, he ſo won on that weak prince, that he perſuaded him to put the final hand to the league with Elizabeth, which had been ſet on foot laſt year; and James this ſummer ſent commiſſioners to Berwick, where, on the fifth of July, the treaty was ſigned by the plenipotentiaries of both kingdoms, the heads of which were as follow:

"It was agreed, "that if Elizabeth was attacked, James ſhould aſſiſt her with a body of fifteen thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe; that if James was invaded, Elizabeth ſhould aid him with ſix thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe; that theſe auxiliaries ſhould be maintained by the prince who demanded aſſiſtance; that if the deſcent ſhould be made upon England, within ſixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, James ſhould march to the relief of Elizabeth with the whole forces of his kingdom: and that this league ſhould be binding and valid, ſo far as religion was concerned, notwithſtanding any former aliances which either ſtate might have contracted with foreign princes*."

We now approach towards the laſt act of the queen of Scots tragedy. Her death was by this time irrevocably determined by Elizabeth and her council. Sir Edward Wootton was diſpatched with Mary's original intercepted letters to the king of France, to prevent any applications in her favour from that court; and the government having now received all the information they expected or wiſhed, concerning Babington's conſpiracy, came to a reſolution that Mary ſhould be removed by ſir Amias Pawlet to Fotheringay caſtle in Northamptonſhire.

The queen of Scots had been ſo ſtrictly guarded, that ſhe was ſtill ignorant of the detection of Babington's conſpiracy; and it was with equal ſurprize and concern, that ſhe received intelligence of this event from ſir Thomas Gorges, who had been ordered by Elizabeth to execute that office.

He choſe the time for giving her this intimation, when ſhe was mounted on horſeback to take an airing; and ſhe was not allowed to return to her former place of abode, but led through the country from one gentleman's houſe to another, until ſhe arrived in Fotheringay-caſtle, which it was reſolved to make the laſt ſtage of her mortal pilgrimage.

Her two ſecretaries, Nau and Curle, were immediately apprehended; all her papers were ſeized, and tranſmitted to the council: about ſixty different keys to cyphers were diſcovered: there were likewiſe found many letters from perſons abroad; and ſeveral too from Engliſh noblemen, expreſſing their attachment to her perſon and title.

This laſt diſcovery the queen thought proper to overlook; but the perſons themſelves, conſcious of their guilt, and dreading the puniſhment which their crime deſerved, endeavoured to atone for their

their error, by changing their principles, and declaring themſelves thenceforth the moſt inveterate enemies of the queen of Scots.

It was determined to try Mary, not by the common ſtatutes of treaſon, but by the law which had been enacted the former year, with a view to this very event; and the queen, in conſequence of that act, appointed a commiſſion, compoſed of forty two noblemen and privy-counſellors, and five judges * of the realm, who were empowered to examine and pronounce ſentence againſt Mary, whom ſhe ſtiled daughter and heir to James V. late king of Scotland †.

But, in order to procure every poſſible proof of Mary's abetting the late conſpiracy, Gifford having revealed, that he had delivered to the French ambaſſador ſeveral papers of moment concerning the queen of Scots, was baniſhed the realm upon a falſe action, which no ways related to the conſpiracy. He informed the French ambaſſador of this proceeding againſt him, and, at the ſame time, gave him a piece of paper cut after a certain manner, with directions not to deliver the queen of Scots papers to any one, but to him who ſhould produce the counter-part: and, leaving the counter-part with Walſingham, this crafty ſtateſman got every thing this ambaſſador had, relating to the affair, into his hands.

On the eleventh of October, the commiſſioners repairing to Fotheringay caſtle, ſir Walter Mildmay, and Edward Barker, notary public, were ſent the next day to deliver to the devoted Mary the queen's letters for her trial; which having read with a countenance more becoming her dignity than her ſituation, ſhe expreſſed herſelf in the following manner: "It grieves me much that the queen, my dear ſiſter, is miſinformed of me; and that, after ſo many years cloſe confinement in priſon, and being grown lame in my limbs, I have lain wholly neglected, though I have offered ſo many reaſonable conditions for my liberty: though I have given her full and faithful notice of ſeveral dangers that threatened her, yet no credit hath been given me, and I have been ſtill ſlighted, though ſo nearly allied to her in blood. When the aſſociation was entered into, and the act of parliament made thereupon, I foreſaw, that whatever danger ſhould happen, either from foreign princes abroad, or from ill diſpoſed people at home, or for the ſake of religion, I muſt bear the blame, having ſo many mortal enemies in the court. Certainly I might take it ill, and not without juſt reaſon, that a league hath been lately made with my ſon, without my knowlege; but ſuch matters I omit. As for this letter, it ſeems ſtrange to me, that the queen ſhould command me, as a ſubject, to ſubmit myſelf to a trial. I am an abſolute queen, and will do nothing which may be prejudicial either to royal majeſty, to other princes of my place and rank, or to my ſon. My mind is not yet ſo far dejected, neither will I faint or ſink under this my calamity. I refer myſelf to what I have formerly proteſted to Bromley, now chancellor, and the late lord Delawar. The laws of England are to me altogether unknown: I am deſtitute of council; and who ſhall be my peers I cannot tell. My papers and notes are taken from me, and no man dares appear to be my advocate. I am clear from being guilty of any thing againſt the queen; I have ſtirred no man againſt her; and am not to be charged, but upon my own words or writings, which I am ſure cannot be produced againſt me: yet I cannot deny but I have recommended myſelf and condition to foreign princes." When this ſpeech being put in writing, was ſent her the next morning, to ſee if ſhe allowed it to be right, ſhe owned it, and deſired that the following words might be added, "Whereas the queen writes, that I am ſubject to the laws of England, and to be tried and judged by them, becauſe I have lived under their protection; I anſwer, that I came into England to crave her aſſiſtance, and have been ever ſince in priſon; ſo that I could not enjoy the protection or benefit of the laws of England; nay, I could never yet underſtand, from any man, what laws they were."

In fine, this and the following day were taken up with her diſputing the authority of her judges; nor could ſhe have been perſuaded to plead, had ſhe not been convinced, that an obſtinate refuſal would injure her innocence; and ſhe was allowed firſt of all to enter her proteſt; when ſhe found they were determined to proceed to judgment againſt her for non-appearance, this wrought upon her ſo much, that on the fourteenth of October ſhe agreed to appear.

The trial had an appearance of great order and ſolemnity. At the upper end of the room (according to Camden) was placed a chair of ſtate for the queen of England (had ſhe been preſent), under a royal canopy: overagainſt it, below, at ſome diſtance near the beam that ran acroſs the room, ſtood a chair for the queen of Scots: by the walls, on both ſides were placed benches, on which ſat the commiſſioners. The particulars of this trial, together with the ſeveral articles of the charge

* They were ſir Henry Bromley, knight, chancellor of England, the lord Burleigh, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earl of Oxford, great-chamberlain, the earl of Sherwſbury, the marſhal of England, the earl of Kent, the earl Derby, the earl of Worceſter, the earl of Rutland, the earl of Warwick, maſter of the ordnance, the earls of Pembroke, Leiceſter, and Lincoln, the viſcount Montagu, the lord Howard, high-admiral of England, Hunſdon, lord-chamberlain, Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Cobham, lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Stafford, Grey of Wilton, Lumley, Sturton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordaunt, St. John of Bletſho, Buckhurſt, Compton, Cheney, ſir Francis Knolles, treaſurer of the houſhold, ſir James Croſts, comptroller, ſir Chriſtopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain, ſir Francis Walſingham and William Daviſon, ſecretaries of ſtate, ſir Ralph Sadler, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, ſir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, ſir Amias Pawlet, captain of Jerſey, John Wolley, eſq. ſecretary for the Latin tongue, ſir Chriſtopher Wray, ſir Edmund Anderſon, ſir Roger Marwood, ſir Thomas Gawdy, William Periam, judges. Camden, p. 519.

† Very great care was taken in drawing up this commiſſion, as the reader will perceive by the following anſwer of Popham, the queen's attorney-general, and the other crown lawyers, to a letter ſent them by lord Burleigh on this ſubject: the anſwer ran to this tenor.

"That that morning they had conference with ſuch judges as were at preſent there, viz. the lord chief-baron ſir Thomas Gawdy, juſtice Windham, juſtice Periam, and juſtice Rodes, and to Mr. ſerjeant Gawdy, touching the courſe of the proceeding in the commiſſion.

"That they thought good, among other things, to underſtand their opinions, by what name the Scottiſh queen was to be called in the commiſſion and record: and that therein they found them all of opinion, that to give her directly and preciſely the name of "regina Scotorum," either in the beginning, or by a copulative, as was ſet down in his lordſhip's laſt letters, could not well be warranted by law; and therefore they held it the ſureſt way to name her "Maria, filia & hæres Jacobi quinti, nuper regis Scotorum, communiter vocat regina Scotorum, & datariæ Franciæ." againſt Mary, and her defence, and to be met with at large in almoſt all our hiſtorians, and in the Collection of State Trials; but being, on account of their great length, too tedious to be inſerted in this hiſtory, we hope our readers will be content with a conciſe account of the moſt remarkable matters, as they occured in the courſe of the proceedings.

The court being opened, the chancellor, turning to Mary, told her, "that ſhe was accuſed of conſpiring the deſtruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the proteſtant religion; and they were commiſſioned to examine the truth of the accuſation, and to hear her anſwer." The chancellor having done ſpeaking, the queen roſe up, and ſaid, "that ſhe came into England to crave the aid which had been promiſed her: that ſhe was a queen, and no ſubject to Elizabeth; and if ſhe appeared before them, it was only to ſecure her honour and reputation." The chancellor would not own that any aid had been promiſed her: as to the proteſtation, he anſwered her, "it was in vain, ſince the law upon which the accuſation was grounded, allowed of no diſtinction in the perſon of the tranſgreſſors; therefore it was not to be admitted." The court ordered, however, that the proteſtation ſhould be recorded, with the chancellor's anſwer.

Through the whole of her trial, Mary conſtantly denied being any way concerned in that part of Babington's plot which tended to the taking away the life of Elizabeth: ſhe even denied having had any correſpondence with him by letters. She alleged that it was eaſy to counterfeit the hand-writing and cypher of another; and as to the confeſſions of her ſecretaries, ſhe declared they were entirely falſe, and complained of being denied the right of ſeeing her accuſers face to face. She did not, indeed, attempt to deny that ſhe had tried all means, both in England and abroad, to procure her own liberty; in which ſhe ſaid ſhe thought herſelf warranted by the laws of God and man. The lord Burleigh then put her in mind, that Morgan, her ſervant, had, with her knowlege, put Parry upon his deſign of taking queen Elizabeth's life: upon which Mary exclaimed, with ſome warmth, "Ah! are you my adverſary!" "Yes (replied Burleigh) I am adverſary to all Elizabeth's enemies:" and then, as if ſhe had been a common criminal; aſked her, whether ſhe had any more to ſay? Mary, upon this, roſe with great conſciouſneſs of majeſty, and demanded to be heard before a full parliament, or the queen and her council. No anſwer was made to this; but the court was adjourned from Fotheringay, to ſit in the Star-chamber, at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-fifth of October.

On that day all the commiſſioners, except the earls of Shrewſbury and Warwick, attended; and though ſeveral of them (according to Thuanus) were popiſh lords, they found her, queen of Scots, guilty of the impeachment; and a formal ſentence was pronounced againſt Mary, under the hands and ſeals of all the commiſſioners preſent.

At the ſame time the court iſſued a declaration, importing "that the ſaid ſentence in no way derogated from the title and honour of James king of Scotland, but he was in the ſame place, degree, and right, as if the ſentence had never been pronounced." The unprejudiced and diſcerning reader will naturally form ſuitable reflections upon this proceeding againſt Mary, without my troubling him with any comments of my own: I ſhall only obſerve, that Elizabeth did not think herſelf ſafe in what had been done by her orders, until ſhe was once more aſſured, that her parliament, which met on the twenty-ninth of October, not only confirmed the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary, but alſo preſented an addreſs to her, humbly beſeeching her to conſent to its publication and execution. To this petition Elizabeth returned an anſwer, every word of which breathed the moſt unparaleled diſſimulation: ſhe pretended a mighty averſion to extreme meaſures; deſired the two houſes to find out ſome expedient to ſave her from the neceſſity of taking them; though at the ſame time ſhe took eſpecial care to throw into her ſpeech every circumſtance that ſhe knew would make them earneſt in preſſing her to proceed with the utmoſt ſeverity: among other things ſhe told them, that, not long ſince, "ſhe had ſeen with her own eyes, and read, an oath, wherein ſome were bound to kill her within a month. Hereby (ſays ſhe) I ſee your danger in my perſon, which I will be very careful to prevent."

This public declaration of the jeopardy their ſovereign's life was in, increaſed the apprehenſions and terrors of the parliament ſo much, that when the commons returned to their houſe, they were determined more than ever to inſiſt upon the execution of Mary; which they accordingly did in a ſecond addreſs, preſented to Elizabeth on the twenty-third of November. This ſecond application revived the pretended doubts and ſcruples of Elizabeth: ſhe lamented her own unhappy ſituation, expreſſed her uneaſineſs at their earneſt importunities, profeſſed the warmeſt affection for her people, and diſmiſſed the committee who waited on her with the addreſs, in an uncertainty what, after all this irreſolution, would be the final reſult of her deliberation.

Her reſolution, however, was not long kept ſecret; the ſentence againſt the queen of Scots was, by Elizabeth's orders, openly proclaimed throughout England; and on the ſixth of December, the lord Buckhurſt, with Beal, clerk of the council, were ſent to notify it to Mary, and exhort her to prepare for death. The captive queen received the meſſage with great firmneſs of mind, thanking God that an end was ſoon to be put to her troubleſome pilgrimage: and then, with ſome emotion, ſaid, "It is no wonder if the Engliſh, who have ſo often put their own ſovereigns to death, ſhould treat in the ſame manner a princeſs ſprung from the blood of their kings." When ſir Amias Pawlett took down her canopy of ſtate, and diveſted her of all the badges of royalty, ſhe bore it with extraordinary patience: ſhe complained, indeed, of this treatment, and of the unfair uſe made of the letters and papers taken from her, in a letter to queen Elizabeth, wherein, after declaring herſelf void of all malevolence towards her, ſhe deſired "that her corpſe might be interred in France; that ſhe might not be put to death in private, but in the ſight of the world; and that her ſervants might enjoy the legacies left them by her will, and be ſuffered to depart freely and peaceably whither they pleaſed." This letter was wrote on the nineteenth of December, but whether it was delivered is uncertain. On the ſecond of that month the parliament was adjourned to the fifteenth of February; a reſolution being fixed, within that time to take off Mary's head.

While the queen of Scots was preparing herſelf for her approaching fate, great intereſt was made by all the princes of Europe, in order to prevent the execution of the ſentence pronounced againſt her. Even Henry III. notwithſtanding his known averſion to the houſe of Guiſe, was obliged to interpoſe in her behalf, and to appear in defence of the common rights of royalty. L'Aubeſpine, the French reſident at London, and Bellievre, who was ſent over with an extraordinary commiſſion to the ſame purpoſe, interceded for Mary with great appearance of warmth. They employed every argument, which could either move the pity, or alarm the fears, of Elizabeth: they pleaded from juſtice, generoſity, and humanity: they intermingled reproaches and threats. But, to all theſe Elizabeth continued deaf and inexorable; and having received ſome private intimation of Henry's real indifference about the fate of the Scottiſh queen, and knowing the implacable hatred to all the family of the Guiſe, ſhe hoped that theſe loud remonſtrances would be productive of no violent effects.

James of Scotland was no ſooner informed of his mother's diſtreſs, than he diſpatched ſir William Keith, gentleman of his bed-chamber, with a letter to Elizabeth, conjuring her to ſpare the life of his parent, otherwiſe he ſhould think himſelf bound, by the laws of God and man, to revenge her death; and beſeeching her at any rate to reſpite the execution of the ſentence, until he could ſend an ambaſſador with farther propoſitions, which ſhe might find ſatisfactory. She was ſeized with a tranſport of indignation when ſhe peruſed this letter, in which James preſumed to threaten her with vengeance; but her paſſion ſubſiding, ſhe granted the deſired reſpite. At length the maſter of Gray and ſir Robert Melvill arriving in London, propoſed that their king ſhould give the chief of his nobility as hoſtages, to ſecure Elizabeth from any future practices of his mother, who ſhould reſign the right of her ſucceſſion to her ſon; and the reſignation ſhould be guarantied by foreign princes. Theſe propoſals the queen rejected with diſdain: and when ſir Robert Melvill begged earneſtly that execution might be deferred for a week, the queen anſwered, with great emotion, "No, not for an hour." We have already obſerved that Elizabeth's diſſimulation failed her whenever Mary was the ſubject of converſation. James recalled his ambaſſadors in a paſſion, which, however, was ſoon cooled by the maſter of Gray, who was a penſioner of the queen of England.

Elizabeth proceeded now to act the laſt part of the tragedy relating to the unhappy queen of Scots; and in the mean time her miniſtry, in order to pave the way for the bloody deed, took care to alarm the nation with falſe ſurmiſes of new plots and projected invaſions; and the French reſident, l'Aubeſpine, was accuſed of being concerned in hiring two ruffians to make away with Elizabeth; but the heinouſneſs of this charge does not appear to have been ſupported with any authentic evidence, and ſo dropped of itſelf. It had however all the effects that were expected from it, by raiſing the impatience of the public for Mary's blood; and Elizabeth thinking that as many entreaties had been uſed, and as much delay interpoſed as decency required, ſhe was at laſt reſolved to execute the ſentence againſt her ſiſter-queen: but even in this laſt reſolution ſhe could not proceed without exhibiting a new ſcene of artifice and deceit; for, after much affected perturbation of mind, ſhe ſent for Daviſon, a man of great parts, but eaſy to be deceived, and who, for that very reaſon, had been lately made ſecretary, and commanded him to draw out a warrant for the execution of the queen of Scots, which ſhe afterwards ſaid ſhe deſigned to have kept by her in caſe any attempt ſhould be made for the delivery of that princeſs: ſhe ſigned the warrant, and then deſired Daviſon to carry it to the chancellor, in order to have the ſeal affixed to it.

Next day ſhe ſent Killigrew to Daviſon, requiring him to delay, for ſome time, the execution of her former orders; and when Daviſon came, and told her that the warrant had already paſſed the ſeals, ſhe ſeemed to be ſomewhat ſurprized, and blamed him for his precipitation. Daviſon, not knowing what courſe to purſue, communicated the whole tranſaction to the council; and they adviſed him to diſpatch the warrant by the hands of Beale, clerk to the council: if the queen ſhould be offended, they promiſed to juſtify his conduct, and to take on themſelves the whole blame of this meaſure. The ſecretary, not ſuſpecting their intention, followed the advice; and the warrant was tranſmitted to the earls of Shrewſbury, Kent, Derby and Cumberland, commanding them to ſee the ſentence carried into immediate execution.

Common reaſon will not permit us to imagine that the matter could proceed thus far without Elizabeth's knowlege, nor was there even the leaſt proof that ſhe ordered Daviſon to with hold the warrant: the preſumption is very ſtrong to the contrary; becauſe had Elizabeth pleaſed, even after Beale and the four earls were ſet out, there was time enough for countermanding the execution. But, indeed, Elizabeth, whoſe ſcheme ſeems to have been to deceive the world into an opinion that the odium of the queen of Scots death was not to be laid to her account, though, if we are to credit the apology of Daviſon himſelf, after his trial, and the following abſtracts from two letters, inſerted in the Life of the unfortunate Queen Mary, by M^c^ Kenzie, it will remain paſt a doubt, that ſhe was determined upon her death, and did not ſtick at the moſt unjuſtifiable methods to compaſs it.

In the firſt, dated at London, February 1, 1586-7, to ſir Amias Pawlet and ſir Drue Drury, they thus expreſs themſelves: "Her majeſty doth note in you both a lack of that care and zeal for her ſervice, which ſhe looketh for at your hands, in that you have not, in all this time (of yourſelves, without any other provocation) found out ſome way to ſhorten the life of the Scottiſh queen, conſidering the great peril ſhe is hourly ſubject to, ſo long as the ſaid queen ſhall live. She taketh it moſt unkindly, that men profeſſing that love towards her as you do, ſhould, in a kind of ſort, for the lack of the diſcharge of your duties, caſt the burden upon her, knowing, as you do, her indiſpoſition to ſhedding blood." To which ſir Amias Pawlet replied next day, "My anſwer I ſhall give unto you with great grief and bitterneſs of mind, in that I am ſo unhappy, as living to ſee this unhappy day, in which I am required by direction from my moſt gracious ſovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbiddeth. God forbid I ſhould make ſo foul a ſhipwreck of my conſcience, or leave ſo great a blot upon my poor poſterity, and ſhed blood without law or warrant."

However, her artifices anſwered the main end for which they were deſigned, to give the young king of Scotland, who is ſaid to have been too conſenting to his mother's proſecution and death, a plauſible excuſe for continuing his correſpondence with Elizabeth; and to furniſh Elizabeth with an anſwer to the repreſentations of foreign princes, expected on that occaſion.

An awful, but humiliating, ſcene is now to be diſcloſed; a daughter, a wife, and a mother of kings, and herſelf a ſovereign queen, after being ſhut up for eighteen years in dreary priſons by a ſiſter-queen, is, by her orders, to be dragged to the block, and her head ſtruck off by a common executioner.

On the evening of the ſixth of February (though our hiſtorians ſay the ſeventh), 1587, the four lords, with Beale, arrived at Fotheringay; and the earls of Shrewſbury and Kent, together with Mary's two keepers, intimated to her that ſhe muſt die on the eighth following. The calmneſs and reſignation with which ſhe received this dreadful news were of a piece with all her other conduct: ſhe confeſſed, indeed, ſhe did not think ſhe was to die ſo ſoon; but all her geſtures, looks, and words, were full of chearful reſignation. She deſired of the earls, that ſhe might have a conference with her almoner, confeſſor, and Andrew Melvill, the maſter of her houſhold: but they would not allow her confeſſor to come near her, but recommended to her the biſhop or dean of Peterborough; whom ſhe refuſing, the earl of Kent, out of his zeal to the reformed religion, inſiſted that ſhe ſhould have no other. After they were gone, ſhe ordered ſupper to be haſtened, that ſhe might have the more time to diſpoſe of her concerns. She ſupped temperately, as ſhe uſed to do: towards the end of ſupper, ſhe drank to her ſervants, who pledged her upon their knees, begging pardon for their neglect of duty, as ſhe alſo did of them. After ſupper ſhe peruſed her will, and wrote down the names of thoſe to whom ſhe bequeathed her goods and jewels. At her wonted time ſhe went to bed; ſlept ſome hours; and then, awaking, ſpent the reſt of the night in prayer. The fatal day being come, ſhe dreſſed herſelf as ſhe was wont to do upon feſtival days, and, calling her ſervants together, commanded her will to be read, and then retired into her oratory, where ſhe ſtaid till ſir Thomas Andrews, the ſheriff, acquainted her that ſhe muſt now come forth. She appeared with a compoſed countenance and chearful look; her head was covered with a veil, hanging down to the ground; her beads hanging at her girdle, with a crucifix in her hand. In the porch ſhe was received by the earls and other noblemen, where, ſpeaking a ſhort ſpeech to Melvill, who bewailed his hard hap, that he was to carry into Scotland the woful tidings of the unhappy fate of his lady and miſtreſs, ſhe bade him farewel; and turning to the earls, deſired that her ſervants might ſtand by her at her death. Then the earls of Kent and Shrewſbury, ſir Thomas Andrews, ſheriff of Northamptonſhire going before her, ſhe came to the ſcaffold, at the upper end of the hall, on which were placed a chair, a cuſhion, and a block, covered with black cloth. As ſoon as ſhe was ſat down, Beale read the warrant, to which the queen liſtened with a careleſs or rather merry countenance: which done, Dr. Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, began a long ſpeech to her, concerning her life, paſt, preſent, and to come. She interrupted him, praying him not to trouble himſelf, for ſhe was reſolved to die in the catholic religion. Then they appointed the dean to pray; after which, the executioner having asked her forgiveneſs, her women took off her upper garments, and covering her face with a handkerchief, ſhe laid her head upon the block, which was ſevered from her body at two ſtrokes. She was buried in a royal manner, in the cathedral of Peterborough, on the firſt of Auguſt, where ſhe lay till her ſon king James's acceſſion to the crown of England; but he ordered her remains to be removed, in 1612, into the ſouth iſle of king Henry VII's chapel, at Weſtminſter, where ſhe now lies under a ſtately monument erected to her memory.

Thus, in the forty-ſixth year of her age, and the eighteenth of her captivity, died Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland by birth, and of France by marriage, whoſe character has been equally injured by the virulence of her enemies, and the intemperate zeal of her friends. The panegyric of the latter has ever been ſuſpected, becauſe unſupported, and has thereby given countenance to the defamation of the former. Upon a ſtrict and impartial review of her life and actions, I think it may be juſtly ſaid, that ſhe was an amiable woman rather than an illuſtrious queen; and that ſhe was partly the cauſe of her own ruin, by certain levities and errors in her conduct, which furniſhed her reſtleſs ſubjects with a pretext to oppoſe her authority, and drove her to ſeek for ſhelter with that perſon, who, of all the world, was by nature, inclination, and the ſituation of her own affairs, her moſt inveterate enemy.

If we are to believe contemporary authors, her perſon was ſo finiſhed a pattern of beauty, that it exceeded all the luxuriancy of deſcription; in ſhort, Mary is, with her countrymen, to this day, but another name for Beauty itſelf; nor is it eaſy to contradict them, ſince they have the French writers on their ſide; and, notwithſtanding their pretences, few if any original pictures of her, in the bloom of life, are remaining to contradict them. Brantome ſays of her, "that no man ever beheld her perſon without admiration and love, or will read her ſtory without ſorrow."

Elizabeth had hitherto acted a moſt egregious farce in her conduct to the queen of Scots, and ſhe was now determined to perform the laſt ſcene with the ſame dexterity and addreſs which ſhe had diſplayed in the former. No ſooner was ſhe informed of Mary's death, than ſhe affected a violent tranſport of grief, and openly declared the execution had been done againſt her intention, and without her orders. Her firſt care was to make her apology to James: her kinſman, Cary, ſon to the lord Hundon, was charged with this commiſſion, and had orders to deliver to James a letter, written all in her own hand, to this effect: "that her mind was infinitely diſquieted on account of this lamentable event, done againſt her meaning and intent; intreating him to believe, that if ſhe had commanded it, ſhe would never have denied it; and withal profeſſing her true affection towards him, and and her aſſiduous watchfulneſs for the preſervation of him and his ſtates*."

While Cary was on his journey, Elizabeth, the better to ſupport her diſſimulation, cauſed Daviſon to be tried at the Star-chamber, "for contempt of the queen's majeſty, violating of his truſt, and neglect of his duty;" which charge was aggravated againſt him with all the chicanery of the bar, by Egerton, the queen's ſolicitor, and Gawdy and Pickering, crown-lawyers. Daviſon behaved with great modeſty on his examination; he readily acknowleged his error, and ſuffered himſelf to be railed at by thoſe very counſellors, who had promiſed him their countenance and protection, and had encouraged him to the fact for which he now ſtood arraigned. The pleadings ended, the commiſſioners proceeded to paſs ſentence on this eaſy dupe of his ſovereign's treachery and diſſimulation; and it was decreed, that, for his haſty and inconſiderate conduct, he ſhould be fined ten thouſand pounds, and ſuffer impriſonment during the queen's pleaſure. In this ſentence all the court concurred; only the lord Grey excuſed Daviſon ſo far, as to ſay that he thought him worthy of reward rather than puniſhment. He continued a long time in cuſtody, and was obliged to pay every ſhilling of the fine, though it reduced him to abſolute beggary: all the favour he could procure from the queen, was a temporary ſupport, juſt ſufficient to keep him from ſtarving, who had ſerved her at the hazard of his own head. We cannot refuſe the reader a ſight of the apology which Daviſon afterwards drew up for himſelf and ſent to Walſingham, and which the reader will find in the note† tranſcribed from Camden, and is at liberty to make his own reflections on it.

Elizabeth's hypocriſy was ſo groſs, that it could impoſe on nobody who was not previouſly reſolved to be deceived; but as James's concern for his mother was heart-felt and ſincere, he expreſſed the higheſt rage and indignation, and refuſed to admit Cary into his preſence. He recalled his ambaſſadors from England, and ſeemed to breathe nothing but war and vengeance: however, the friends of Elizabeth, taking advantage of the caution and timidity of James, gave him ſuch frightful ideas of the power of England, and the treachery of the Roman catholics, of his danger in marrying into a popiſh family, and of his own inability to avenge his mother's death, that in a few months he turned his thoughts towards peace; in which he was more eaſily confirmed by Cary's producing the ſentence paſſed upon Daviſon; and another inſtrument, ſigned by all the judges of England, in which they declared that the ſentence againſt the queen of Scotland could in no wiſe prejudice James in his right of ſucceſſion to the crown of England.

Elizabeth having thus diſſipated the clouds which threatened to burſt with fury upon her head from this quarter, and being informed that Philip of Spain was meditating a formidable deſcent upon England, for which purpoſe a great navy was equipping in his ports, ſhe ſent ſir Francis Drake, with a fleet, to intercept the ſupplies of naval and military ſtores going to Cadiz, to plunder the Spaniſh coaſt, and to deſtroy the enemy's ſhipping in their own ports; all which this brave and active commander effected with equal courage and ſucceſs, burning and deſtroying above an hundred ſhips, moſt of them laden with proviſions and military ſtores; and, after taking the town of St. Vincent, and bombarding Liſbon, he ſet ſail for the Weſtern Iſlands, in order to intercept a rich carrack, or galleon, called the St. Philip, then on her return from the Eaſt Indies, which falling into his hands, he returned to England in July, covered with glory, and maſter of an immenſe booty. But the moſt valuable acquiſition accruing to the nation from this expedition, was the finding of certain papers on board the galleon, which ſerved to inſtruct the Engliſh in the nature of the Eaſt Indian commerce, and put them on the firſt thoughts of eſtabliſhing an Eaſt India Company.

The Engliſh, during this year, were not equally ſucceſsful in their land enterprizes in the Low Countries, where two of Leiceſter's favourites, Stanley and York, to whom he had, on his return to England, aſſigned the command of Zutphen and Deventer, two important poſts, treacherouſly delivered the ſame up to the duke of Parma; and the ſtates of the United Provinces, who thought they had already ſufficient reaſons to be offended with the conduct of Leiceſter, now ſent an embaſſy to the Engliſh court with their complaints, and a requeſt that the government might be taken from the earl, and given to ſome other more able and prudent general. Elizabeth, who was greatly chagrined at the diſlike the ſtates expreſſed to her favourite, ſent over Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurſt, to uſe his beſt endeavours to compromiſe matters, but

† The queen, after the departure of the French and Scottiſh ambaſſadors, of her own accord commanded me to deliver her the warrant for the executing the ſentence againſt the queen of Scots. When I had delivered it, ſhe readily ſigned it with her own hand: when ſhe had ſo done, ſhe commanded it to be ſealed with the great ſeal of England; and, in a jeſting manner, ſaid, "Go, tell this to Walſingham, who is now ſick, though I fear he will die for ſorrow when he hears it." She added alſo her reaſons for deferring it ſo long, namely, leſt ſhe might ſeem to have been violently or maliciouſly drawn thereto; whereas, in the mean time, ſhe was not ignorant how neceſſary it was. Moreover, ſhe blamed Pawlet and Drury, that they had not eaſed her of this care; and wiſhed Walſingham would feel their pulſes touching this matter.

The next day after the warrant was under the great-ſeal, ſhe commanded me, by Killigrew, that it ſhould be done; and when I had informed her that it was done already, ſhe found fault with ſuch great haſte, telling me, that, in the judgment of ſome wiſe men, another courſe might be taken. I anſwered, that the courſe which was juſt, was always beſt and ſafeſt. But, fearing leſt ſhe ſhould lay the fault on me (as ſhe had laid the putting the duke of Norfolk to death upon the lord Burleigh), I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, proteſting that I would not plunge myſelf any deeper in ſo great a buſineſs. He preſently imparted it to the lord Burleigh, and the lord Burleigh to the reſt of the council, who all conſented to have the execution haſtened; and every one of them vowed to bear an equal part of the blame, and ſent Beale away with the warrant and letters. The third day after, when, by a dream which ſhe told of the queen of Scots death, I perceived that ſhe wavered in her reſolution, I asked her whether ſhe had changed her mind? She anſwered, "No; but another courſe (ſaid ſhe) might have been deviſed;" and withal ſhe asked me, whether I had received any anſwer from Pawlet, whoſe letters when I had ſhewed her, wherein he flatly refuſed to undertake that which ſtood not with her honour and juſtice; ſhe waxing angry, accuſed him, and others (who had bound themſelves by the aſſociation), of perjury and breach of vows, as thoſe that had promiſed great matters for their prince's ſafety, but would perform nothing: "yet there are (ſaid ſhe), who will do it for my ſake." But I ſhewed her how diſhonourable and unjuſt a thing this would be; and withal into how great danger ſhe would bring Pawlet and Drury by it: for if ſhe approved the fact, ſhe would draw upon herſelf both danger and diſhonour, not without cenſure of injuſtice; and if ſhe diſavowed it, ſhe would undo men of great deſcent, and their whole poſterity. And afterwards ſhe gave me a light check, the ſame day that the queen of Scots was executed, becauſe ſhe was not put to death.

without effect; for the Dutch, thinking it no longer ſafe to truſt Leiceſter, would hearken to no terms of accommodation, but gave the command of their army to count Maurice of Naſſau, the late prince of Orange's ſecond ſon. Elizabeth, who conſidered the independence of the ſtates as immediately connected with her own ſafety, ſhewed no reſentment at their excluding Leiceſter, but, on the contrary, to give them entire ſatisfaction, ſhe commanded that nobleman to reſign his government. But though her good ſenſe ſo far prevailed, on the preſent occaſion, over her attachment to Leiceſter, he, by his artful ſubmiſſion, ſoon regained his former influence; and the lord Buckhurſt, who, on his return to England, accuſed him before the parliament of his conduct in Holland, loſt for ſome time the confidence of his ſovereign, and was even committed to cuſtody, while all proceedings againſt Leiceſter were quaſhed by the royal authority, to the ſecret indignation of all honeſt men. The lord Willoughby was made general of the Engliſh forces in the Low Countries, who had orders to oblige the partizans of England there, to ſubmit to the authority of prince Maurice. During theſe tranſactions, the Dutch loſt Sluys, which was taken by the prince of Parma, and Gueldres ſubmitted to him through the treachery of its governor.

In regard to domeſtic affairs in England, we have to obſerve, that the parliament meeting on the fifteenth of February, a motion was made in the houſe of commons, to preſent an addreſs of thanks to her majeſty, for having put the queen of Scots to death; but this did not paſs, becauſe it would have fixed upon Elizabeth an imputation which ſhe ſought eagerly to avoid. A petition, with a Directory or Book of Devotion, from the puritans being preſented to the houſe, ſeconded by four gentlemen, the queen ſent for the book, and committed the four members to the Tower, for having preſumed to meddle in church-matters, in contempt of her repeated inhibition: a motion was made to addreſs her for the releaſe of the impriſoned members, but was over-ruled, and they continued in confinement till the parliament was diſſolved. This ſeverity did not hinder the commons from granting a ſubſidy, and afterwards a benevolence for the ſupport of the war in the Netherlands: ſhe met with the like indulgence from the lords, and the clergy aſſembled in convocation.

This year ſir John Perot was called home from Ireland, where he left every thing in great tranquility, to the government of Fitz Williams, his ſucceſſor. Hitherto the Engliſh had found the Iriſh an eaſy conqueſt, on account of the unskilfulneſs of theſe latter in military exerciſe; eight hundred foot and three hundred horſe was held an invincible army, but, after Perot's command, they were trained to arms, and taught to diſcharge muſquets at a mark, and being inſtructed in the art of fortification, they held the Engliſh tighter to it, and were not ſo eaſily overcome. But we are now to ſee the attention of Elizabeth and her people engroſſed by objects of the moſt important and alarming nature.

Philip II. king of Spain, upon the ſlender title of being deſcended from John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, the fourth ſon of Edward III. and upon the conveyance and will of the queen of Scots, deceaſed, who had been perſuaded to give up her right and title to England in favour of him, as the only means to reſtore popery in this nation, and being alſo prepoſſeſſed with that maxim of the church of Rome, that a heretic is unworthy and incapable of enjoying a crown, thought he might juſtly claim that of England; and, ſupported with the bulls of pope Pius V. and Gregory XIII. abſolving Elizabeth's ſubjects from their oath of allegiance, he had for ſome time been projecting the conqueſt of England and its dependencies.

It is true that Philip poſitively denied his intention to moleſt Elizabeth, or aſſiſt her enemies, with theſe great naval preparations he was carrying on throughout all his dominions; but that watchful miniſter Walſingham, having intelligence, from his ſpies in the Spaniſh court, that Philip had declared in council that he had diſpatched an expreſs to Rome with a letter, wrote with his own hand, to the pope, acquainting him with the true deſign of his preparations, and asking his bleſſing upon it, but that, for ſome reaſons, he would not diſcloſe the particulars of the matter to them till the return of the courier; the ſecretary loſt no time to make himſelf maſter of this important ſecret; and, by the help of a Venetian prieſt, his ſpy at Rome, he found means to bribe a gentleman of the pope's bed-chamber, who took out of his holineſs's pocket, when aſleep, the keys of his cabinet, which he opened, and taking a copy of the king of Spain's letter, ſent it to Walſingham; who thereupon adviſed the ſending ſir Francis Drake upon the coaſt of Spain in the manner already related: which, with Walſingham's farther contrivance to get the Spaniſh bills, which were to ſupply the king of Spain with money to carry on his preparations, proteſted at Genoa, obliged Philip to defer the execution of his grand project to another year.

In the mean while Elizabeth, who was thoroughly informed of the ſtorm which was raiſing againſt her, took all poſſible care to be in a poſture of defence at home, as well as to diſtreſs her enemies abroad: but ſtill ſhe could not help being much perplexed to ſee her crown at ſtake, and herſelf alone without any ally to defend it, and therefore ſought as much as poſſible to gain time; Philip himſelf was in no condition as yet to precipitate matters; and each diſſembled ſo far, that, in December this year, it was agreed that commiſſioners ſhould meet to draw up preliminaries for a pacification. It was propoſed at firſt that the commiſſioners ſhould meet at Munſter, but at laſt, after many altercations, Oſtend was fixed upon for the place of holding the conferences, which were not opened, however, till the twelfth of April, 1588 (a year that will be ever memorable in the Engliſh annals); and then ſuch artful obſtacles were thrown in the way of a mutual agreement, that the time was dallied on till the thundering of the Spaniſh artillery on the coaſt of England demonſtrated how fruitleſs all farther treating would prove.

Nowithſtanding the very great damage that ſir Francis Drake had done the Spaniſh armament laſt year, yet ſo univerſal and prodigious a preparation as had been making for three years could not be eaſily rendered wholly uſeleſs; and, by the month of May this year, Philip had equipped a fleet, which, on account of its ſtrength, he called the Invincible Armada. He procured from the pope (Sixtus V.) a conſecrated banner, with freſh bulls for excommunicating Elizabeth as an heretic, publiſhing liſhing a cruzade againſt her, and abſolving her ſubjects from their oath of allegiance.

The gold of Peru was laviſhed for the purpoſes of this expedition. This tremendous armament rendezvouſed at the Groyne, and conſiſted of the following particulars: nineteen thouſand two hundred and ninety ſoldiers; eight thouſand three hundred and fifty ſailors; two thouſand and eighty galley-ſlaves; and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty pieces of ordnance: in a word, there never was any fleet equal to it in modern times, whether we conſider the goodneſs of the troops, the appointments of the ſhips, the proviſion of ammunition, victuals, and arms, or its confidence of ſucceſs.

The duke of Medina Sidonia was appointed admiral of the whole; and don Juan Martinez de Ricaldo, an experienced ſea-officer, ſerved under him; nor was there a noble family in Spain but had a ſon, brother, or nephew, in this expedition, in hopes of acquiring riches and revenues in England, which they looked upon as an eaſy conqueſt. And ſtill more to inſure ſucceſs, Philip ordered the duke of Parma to provide tranſports, and an army of twenty-five thouſand men, to be convoyed into this kingdom as ſoon as the Spaniſh fleet ſhould appear on the coaſt of Flanders. The duke, in purſuance of theſe orders, cauſed a great number of flat-bottomed veſſels to be built, for the tranſportation of the cavalry; provided other ſhips for the foot ſoldiers; and quartered his troops in the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Dunkirk, and Nieuport. To the diſgrace of human nature, ſeven hundred Engliſh fugitives enliſted under his banner, to aſſiſt in the conqueſt of their own country!

In the mean while Elizabeth had many ſerious conſultations concerning the manner of repelling this danger. Having equipped a conſiderable fleet, ſhe created Charles lord Howard of Effingham, lord high-admiral of England; and he was ſent with a ſtrong ſquadron to the Weſt, where he was joined by ſir Francis Drake, now appointed vice-admiral. She ordered lord Henry Seymour, ſecond ſon to the duke of Somerſet, to cruize along the coaſt of Flanders, with forty Engliſh and Flemiſh ſhips, to prevent the prince of Parma from putting to ſea with his forces. Twenty thouſand men were cantoned along the ſouthern coaſts of England; another body of well-diſciplined troops encamped at Tilbury, near the mouth of the Thames, under the conduct of the earl of Leiceſter, whom the queen created general in chief of all her forces; and the lord Hunſdon commanded a third army, amounting to thirty-thouſand horſe and foot, for the defence of her majeſty's perſon. Arthur, lord Grey, ſir Francis Knolles, ſir John Norreys, ſir Richard Bingham, and ſir Roger Williams, men renowned for their valour and experience, were conſulted about the management of the war by land: in purſuance of their advice, all the landing-places on the coaſt were fortified and garriſoned, from Hull to the Land's End and Milford Haven; the militia of the country was armed, and regulated under proper officers, who received inſtructions for interrupting the diſembarkation of the enemy, waſting the country before them with ſlight skirmiſhes and continual alarms, until the army could be aſſembled at the place, in order to give them battle. The queen impriſoned ſome ſuſpected papiſts; ſent new inſtructions to ſir William Fitz Williams, lord-deputy of Ireland; and, by her friends in Scotland, inſtigated James againſt the Roman catholics and the Spaniſh faction. That prince was more afraid than ſhe of the ſucceſs of ſuch an invaſion, which would have deprived him of his fair ſucceſſion, and expoſed his native kingdom to the arms of a foreign conqueror. The lord Maxwell, returning from Spain, landed at Kirkudbright, and began to aſſembled troops as if he expected the Spaniards would have made a deſcent in Galloway: James, being informed of theſe practices, marched againſt him with ſuch expedition, that it was with difficulty he eſcaped in a bark; but being purſued, was taken and impriſoned.

As I ſhall, in the future part of this hiſtory (which has already inſenſibly grown upon me, and, much againſt my will, is likely to exceed the limits I at firſt propoſed), be cautious of enlarging upon matters ſufficiently known, I muſt therefore refer the reader to the journals of this expedition, which are in the hands of almoſt every one, for the minute particulars of each day's action, after the meeting of the two fleets to the final deſtruction of the Spaniards, and confine myſelf to a more ſuccinct narrative.

The Invincible Armada, then, ſet ſail from the port of Liſbon on the third of June, 1588; but being met at ſea by a violent tempeſt, was forced back to the Groyne, where it lay till the twelfth of July, and then ſet ſail for England, and, after a troubleſome voyage, the whole fleet was, on the nineteenth, within ſight of our weſtern ſhores. It was impoſſible for the Engliſh ſhips, which, for the moſt part, were no more than ſmall barks in compariſon with thoſe of the Spaniards, to ſtand againſt the force of thoſe floating citadels, whoſe upper works were above three feet thick, and almoſt cannon-proof. Nevertheleſs, this well-concerted ſcheme failed in almoſt every part: the Engliſh appeared before the enemy with one hundred ſail, and, notwithſtanding their inferiority in bulk, numbers, and ſtrength, ſtopped the progreſs of this formidable fleet. They took ſeveral of the Spaniſh ſhips, and diſperſed the reſt by means of fire-ſhips, on this occaſion firſt uſed: a ſtorm ſeconded the efforts of the Engliſh; the Spaniſh admiral's ſhip, called the Invincible, was very near being loſt on the coaſt of Zealand. The duke of Parma's army, which could not put to ſea without the aſſiſtance of the Spaniſh fleet, remained inactive. Philip's navy, unable to reſiſt the courage of the Engliſh and adverſe winds, retreated round the north part of our iſland; ſome were wrecked upon the coaſt of Zealand; others upon the Orkney iſlands and the coaſt of Scotland; and another was caſt away upon the Iriſh ſhore, where the country-people maſſacred moſt of the ſoldiers and ſailors who eſcaped the fury of the tempeſt; and the lord-lieutenant, Fitz Williams, cauſed the reſt to be hanged. In ſhort, of the whole Invincible Armada, only fifty ſhips returned to Spain; and of thirty thouſand men who had ſailed on this expedition, no more than ſix thouſand eſcaped ſhipwreck and the ſword and fire of the enemy. I have in the note * inſerted ſome curious particulars, as they were tranſmitted to the court of Spain, concerning its whole loſs in this expedition. That of the Engliſh was almoſt too inconſiderable to be mentioned; only one commander (Cox), with his bark, periſhing in the midſt of the enemy.

The lord high-admiral Effingham having entirely cleared the Engliſh coaſt of the Spaniards, returned in ſafety back to the Downs, to join in the acclamations and thankſgiving of the whole nation for ſo great a deliverance. Two medals were ſtruck by the government's order, in memory of this ſignal victory: one in honour of the queen, which repreſented fire-ſhips, and a fleet in a hurry and confuſion, with this motto, DVX FÆMINA FACTI; another in honour of the Engliſh navy, with the device of a fleet flying under full ſail, and the inſcription VENIT, VIDIT, FVGIT. The Zealanders, whoſe very exiſtence depended upon the ſucceſs of the Engliſh arms, ſtruck one, repreſenting the Spaniſh fleet in great confuſion, with this motto, IMPIVS FVGIT NEMINE SEQVENTE.

As for Elizabeth, ſhe ordered a public thankſgiving for the deliverance to be made in all the churches throughout the kingdom; and went herſelf to St. Paul's, in great ſolemnity, to perform the ſacred duty: at the ſame time eleven ſtandards and colours, taken from the enemy, were hung up in the body of the church, as trophies of their defeat. The queen's next act was to beſtow on the lord high-admiral Howard a yearly penſion, or rather gratuity, in recompence of his great ſervice to his country, and likewiſe beſtowed penſions on ſeveral of the maimed and wounded officers. For the reſt, their rewards conſiſted more in words than in deeds. To add to the general joy, ſir Robert Sidney, who had been ſent into Scotland, before the arrival of the Spaniſh fleet, at the time the queen was afraid king James would think the troubles of her realm afforded him a proper opportunity, by joining with the Spaniards, to revenge the murder of his mother, returned to England, with a letter, under James's own hand, to Elizabeth, wherein that monarch teſtified his ſincere attachment to the intereſt of England and the proteſtant religion, and declared that he was ſo far from wiſhing well to the cauſe of Philip, that he looked for no other favour from the Spaniard than what Polyphemus promiſed Ulyſſes, namely, that he ſhould be devoured the laſt.

On the fourth of September, ſoon after the diſperſion of the Armada, died Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter, the queen's great but unworthy favourite. He had diſcovered no conduct in any of his military enterprizes, and was even ſuſpected of cowardice; yet ſhe entruſted him with the command of her armies during the danger of the Spaniſh invaſion, a partiality which might have proved fatal to her, had the duke of Parma been able to land his troops in England: ſhe had even given orders for drawing a commiſſion, appointing him her lieutenant in the kingdoms of England and Ireland; but Burleigh and Hatton repreſented the danger of inveſting any ſubject with ſuch unlimited authority, and prevented the execution of that deſign. No wonder, that a conduct ſo unlike the uſual jealouſy of Elizabeth, ſhould give ground to ſurmiſe that her partiality was founded on ſome other paſſion than friendſhip. But the queen's affection for Leiceſter ſeemed to be terminated with his death: ſhe cauſed his goods to be expoſed to public ſale, in order to reimburſe herſelf for the money ſhe had lent him, and her uſual œconomy was obſerved to prevail over her regard to the memory of the deceaſed. Leiceſter's character may be ſummed up in a few words: he was a great hypocrite, a pretender to the ſtricteſt religion, an encourager of the puritans, and a founder of hoſpitals.

The duke of Parma, with his fine army of thirty thouſand men, had no better ſucceſs in the Netherlands than the Invincible Armada had in its attempt upon England. The Hollanders, who found a ready defence in their canals and ſluices, and who were fond of liberty to a degree of enthuſiaſm, and who were all become generals under their princes of Orange, were in a condition to have reſiſted a much ſtronger force; and the duke, after laying ſiege to Bergen op Zoom, was, by the bravery of the Engliſh governor, ſir William Drury, and his garriſon of the ſame nation, obliged to abandon his enterprize with diſgrace.

In France, the duke of Guiſe was become ſo powerful and popular, that he inſtigated the Pariſians to make barricadoes in the ſtreets, and prepare for attacking the king in his palace of the Louvre. Henry was obliged to quit his capital, and make a diſhonourable peace with the chiefs of the league; but before the end of this year he revenged this outrage upon the duke and his uncle, the cardinal, whom he cauſed to be aſſaſſinated at Blois; an act of barbarity which he conſidered as abſolutely neceſſary to ſecure his own ſafety.

About this time Philip, earl of Arundel, who had been three years a priſoner in the Tower, was tried in Weſtminſter-hall, on an accuſation of holding private and treaſonable correſpondence with cardinal Allen and other popiſh prieſts, and of having cauſed maſs to be ſaid in his own apartment for the happy ſucceſs of the Spaniſh Armada; as alſo with being privy to the bull of pope Sixtus V. depriving the queen of her dominions, and making them over to the Spaniard. Upon theſe accuſations, unſupported by any legal proofs, this nobleman was by his peers found guilty; but Elizabeth ſpared his life. This Philip, earl of Arundel, was the fourth immediate heir from father to ſon, who ſtood condemned to die, through the jealouſy of the crown rather than the juſtice of the laws, as if the ſafety of the houſe of Tudor and the exiſtence of the family of Howard were held incompatible.

In the beginning of the enſuing year, 1589, Elizabeth convoked a new parliament, and ſhe obtained from them a ſupply of two ſubſidies and four fifteenths, payable in four years. This is the firſt time that ſubſidies were doubled in one ſupply; and this uncommon conceſſion was probably owing to the joy of the late ſucceſs and the general ſenſe of the queen's neceſſities.

Some of the commons made a motion for reſtraining the tyranny of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, and rectifying the abuſes of purveyance*. But Elizabeth, who conſidered both theſe as eſſential parts of her prerogative, of which ſhe was extremely tenacious, ſtrictly prohibited them from touching upon things which did not belong to their cognizance.

The defeat of the Armada had inſpired the nation with a kind of enthuſiaſtic paſſion for enterprizes againſt Spain; and nothing ſeemed now impoſſible to be accompliſhed by the heroic valour and good fortune of the Engliſh.

Don Antonio, prior of Crato, was a natural ſon of the royal family of Portugal, who, truſting to the irreconcileable hatred which his countrymen bore to the Caſtilians, had trumped up a claim to the crown, and flying firſt to France, and then to England, had been encouraged, both by Henry and Elizabeth, to aſſert his pretenſions; and now a reſolution was taken by the people, not the court, of England, to conquer the kingdom for don Antonio; ſir Francis Drake, and ſir John Norris, were the leaders in this romantic enterprize; about twenty thouſand volunteers engaged in the ſervice: and ſhips were hired, as well as arms provided, at the ſole charge of the adventurers. The queen's frugality hindered her from contributing more than ſixty thouſand pounds to the expence; and ſhe only permitted ſix of her ſhips to attend the expedition.

This fleet ſailed from Plymouth on the fifth of April; and after a ſhort paſſage arrived at Corunna (commonly called the Groyne), in Galicia; where, after making themſelves maſters of the harbour, they ſoon reduced the lower town, which was followed by the giving up of the higher. And from thence ſailing to the coaſt of Portugal, they met the young earl of Eſſex, whom we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to mention in a diſtinguiſhed light during the latter part of this reign. This young nobleman had equipped ſome ſhips at his own expence, unknown to Elizabeth, and ſailed upon a roving cruize. This junction gave great ſpirits to the Engliſh; and their firſt exploit was to ſeize upon Panicha, a town in Portugal, which, with the caſtle, they ſurrendered to don Antonio, as lawful ſovereign of the country; and from thence bent their march by land to Liſbon, at the diſtance of ſixty miles. The foot companies led by Norris, whom Drake promiſed to follow with the fleet, being come to St. Catherine's, which is now the weſtern ſuburb of Liſbon, they found nobody there but a few diſarmed Portugueſe, who cried out, "God ſave king Antonio!"

The day following, the Spaniards, in a large body, ſallied from the citadel, and cut off ſeveral of the Engliſh, with ſome of their beſt officers; but the earl of Eſſex behaved ſo gallantly on this occaſion, that he inſpired freſh courage into his followers, who turned upon their aſſailants ſo warmly, that they beat them back to the very gates of the city. And having now remained at Liſbon two days, and ſeeing no ſigns of a revolt in their favour among the natives, which don Antonio had made them believe would be the immediate conſequence of his appearance; finding freſh ſupplies daily thrown into the town, their own army ſickly, and proviſions and ammunitions growing ſhort; and, what was more diſcouraging than all, no appearance of Drake's joining them, they left the ſuburbs of Liſbon, and marched to Caſcais, a little town at the mouth of the river Tagus, which town Drake had in the mean time taken; and from him they now learned the reaſon of his not having joined them, namely, that of two paſſages for proceeding to

* The right of purveyance was an ancient prerogative, by which the officers of the crown were empowered to take, at pleaſure, proviſions for the houſhold, from all the neighbouring counties, and the uſe of carts and carriages; and the price of theſe were always fixed and ſtated. The payment of the money was often diſtant and uncertain; and the rates were always greatly below the market price: ſo that purveyance, beſides the ſlavery of it, was always conſidered as an intolerable grievance, and, being arbitrary and caſual, was ſubject to great abuſes. Hume's Hiſt. of the Tudors, vol. ii.

Liſbon,

Liſbon, he found, upon a ſtrict examination, both impracticable: the firſt by the channel of Alcacæva, not having depth enough of water for his veſſels, he muſt have ſtruck upon the ſhelves and ſhoals; and the port of St. Julian's, at the mouth of the harbour, was defended by all the Spaniſh gallies, and a battery of fifty pieces of cannon on ſhore.

The Engliſh land forces, on their arrival at Caſcais, ſeized about ſixty hulks belonging to the Hanſe Towns, which had ſailed round the Orkney iſlands, contrary to Elizabeth's expreſs prohibition, with naval ſtores and proviſions for the enemy. They next burned Vigo, a ſea-port town; and, after blowing up a part of the caſtle of Caſcais, they returned to England in the month of June. In this expedition more than one half of theſe gallant adventurers periſhed by ſickneſs, famine, fatigue, and the ſword; and England derived much more glory than advantage from this extraordinary enterprize. It is computed, that of eleven hundred gentlemen who embarked on board this fleet, no more than three hundred and fifty returned to their native country.

When theſe ſhips were on their voyage homewards, they met with the earl of Cumberland, who was outward-bound, with a fleet of ſeven ſail, all fitted out at his own expence, except one ſhip of war, which he had obtained from the queen. That nobleman ſupplied ſir Francis Drake with ſome proviſions; an act of generoſity which preſerved the lives of Drake's men, but which proved fatal to his own troops in the ſequel.

Cumberland ſailed towards the Terceras, and took ſeveral of the enemy's ſhips; but the richeſt, valued at an hundred thouſand pounds, was loſt in her return, with all her cargo, near St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall. Many of theſe adventurers periſhed in a raſh attempt at the Terceras: the reſt were ſeized with a violent diſtemper; and it was not without extreme difficulty, that the few hands which remained were able to bring back their ſhips into harbour.

While the queen was thus diſtreſſing the Spaniards, Henry III. of France received a mortal wound, of which he died, by the dagger of an aſſaſſin, namely, James Clement, a Jacobine friar, when he was on the point of compelling his rebellious citizens of Paris to return to their duty. This act of regicide was openly avowed by the popiſh party, who extolled it as a meritorious deed, undertaken to deliver the church from an enemy, and to revenge the deaths of the Guiſes, thoſe darlings of that bigotted party. The king lived two days after he received the wound, during which time he nominated Henry, king of Navarre, head of the houſe of Bourbon, his ſucceſſor, who aſſumed the name of Henry IV. But he could never have maintained his advancement, had not Elizabeth ſupported him with both men and money; for the league refuſed to acknowlege him for their ſovereign: and the duke of Mayenne, brother to the duke of Guiſe, having a more powerful army, drove him out of Paris, proclaimed the old cardinal of Bourbon ſucceſſor to Henry III. by the name of Charles X. and, being aſſiſted by the duke of Parma, obliged him to raiſe the blockade of that city. In this ſtate were the affairs of France during the year 1589.

In Scotland, the Spaniſh party had been ſo ſucceſsful as to raiſe ſeveral commotions. In the beginning of this year 1589, the Scottiſh miniſtry intercepted letters, by which it appeared that the earls of Huntley, Errol, Craufurd, and Bothwell, ſon to a baſtard of James V. maintained a correſpondence with the duke of Parma, who had ſupplied them with a ſum of money to raiſe diſturbances in Scotland. They had diſpatched colonel Sempil to ſolicit Philip for another invaſion. Bothwell undertook to ſeize the king's perſon; but was diſappointed: the other three advanced with a body of forces towards Aberdeen; but the king aſſembling a greater number of troops, they were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and remained in cuſtody till the new queen arrived in Scotland. The king of Denmark had a ſecond daughter unmarried; and James, laying aſide his deſign upon Catherine of Bourbon, ſent the earl Mareſchal as his ambaſſador to Copenhagen, to demand this princeſs, Anne, in marriage. Though her father was by this time dead, the treaty of marriage was concluded with the ſtates of the kingdom, and the princeſs embarking about Michaelmas for Scotland, was driven by a ſtorm into Norway. James, impatient to ſee his bride, ſailed thither in October, attended by his chancellor, ſeveral noblemen, and a numerous retinue; the nuptials were celebrated at Upſal; they paſſed the winter in Denmark, ſet ſail for Scotland in the ſpring, and, landing at Leith in the beginning of May, the new queen was crowned in the church of Holyrood abbey.

Towards the cloſe of this year died the famous ſir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate, one of the moſt able and accompliſhed miniſters that ever appeared in this or any other country, and not more diſtinguiſhed by the abilities of his head, than the virtues of his heart. Though he had paſſed through many great employments, and had been very frugal in his expences, he yet died ſo poor, that his family was obliged to give him a private burial. He left only one daughter, who was firſt married to ſir Philip Sidney, then to the earl of Eſſex, favourite of queen Elizabeth, and laſtly to the earl of Clanrickard in Ireland.

This year alſo died ſir Thomas Randolph, who had been employed by the queen in ſeveral embaſſies to Scotland; and alſo Ambroſe Dudley, earl of Warwick, eldeſt brother to Leiceſter.

The affairs of England, in the year 1590, were ſo proſperous, that Elizabeth ſaw her enemies in no manner of condition to give her freſh diſturbances from abroad, and the interior peace of her dominions was ſo well confirmed, and the hearts of her loyal ſubjects ſo well tried and attached to her intereſts by the late attempts of the king of Spain, that ſhe had nothing to fear: however, ſhe very prudently kept her marine on a reſpectable footing, and ready for ſervice on the ſhorteſt notice; the fortifications of her towns and ſea-ports were alſo properly attended to; and ſuch was her frugality and good management, that, without loading her ſubjects with new taxes, ſhe gave penſions to ſeveral perſons in the court of Scotland and other parts, for ſecret ſervices; and aſſiſted both the Hollanders and the king of France with men and money, to withſtand the arms and intrigues of Philip II. who aimed at univerſal monarchy, and who would have infallibly reduced thoſe two nations, had not England came ſeaſonably to their aſſiſtance, by ſending troops to Normandy and Brittany, under der the earl of Eſſex and ſir John Norris. But Henry IV. notwithſtanding all his obligations to Elizabeth, dealt very deceitfully with her; for he made uſe of the Engliſh auxiliaries only to prevent the progreſs of the Spaniards, while he himſelf carried his arms elſewhere, inſtead of employing them to drive the Spaniards out of Brittany, agreeable to the treaty made between him and Elizabeth in the ſpring of this year, and in conſequence of which theſe troops were ſent over: but Henry's ſole intent ſeems to have been to temporize till he could make peace upon his own terms.

In the courſe of this year ſome diſturbances happened in Ireland, partly owing to the ferocity of the natives, and partly occaſioned by the oppreſſive conduct of Fitz Williams, lord-deputy. The earl of Tyr Oen having cauſed Hugh Gavilloch, the natural ſon of Shan O'Neil, to be ſtrangled, was ſummoned to England, where he obtained the queen's pardon, upon his ſolemnly engaging that he would live in peace with Tirlogh Leinigh and all his neighbours, that he would not aſſume the title of O' Neil, impoſe taxes, exerciſe any juriſdiction, intercept any ammunition or proviſions intended for the uſe of the Engliſh garriſons, nor admit into his territories monks, friars, or malecontents. This nobleman was very punctual in performing his engagements, and poſſeſſed many excellent qualifications, both of mind and body. Hugh Roc M'Mahon, a powerful lord in Monaghan, having exacted the tax called Bonaghty from the people according to the cuſtom of Ireland, was apprehended by the order of the lord-deputy, tried by a jury of common ſoldiers, condemned, executed, and his eſtate divided between his own ſept and the Engliſh ſettlers. Brian O' Rourk, the chieftain of another powerful ſept in the county of Antrim, apprehending the ſame fate, broke out into open rebellion; but being routed by ſir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, he fled into Scotland, and, being claimed by Elizabeth, was delivered into the hands of that princeſs, who cauſed him to be tried and executed at London.

Elizabeth this year ſuſtained a great loſs in the perſon of ſir Chriſtopher Hatton, who, upon the death of ſir Thomas Bromley, in 1587, had been made lord-chancellor of England. He was a perſon of great abilities, unſhaken probity, firmly attached to the conſtitutions of his country, and a munificent patron of learning. He is ſaid to have died of grief and vexation at the ſeverity of the queen, who inſulted him with abuſive language, and exacted with great rigour a debt which he had contracted in managing the tenths and firſt-fruits. Immediately before his death, Hacket, Coppinger, and Arthington, three puritanical fanatics, uttered many blaſphemous and treaſonable expreſſions againſt God and the queen: the firſt was tried, condemned, and executed; Coppinger ſtarved himſelf to death in priſon; but Arthington was pardoned upon his recantation. That her Iriſh ſubjects might no longer be tempted to ſend their children to foreign ſeminaries for education, the queen founded Trinity college, in Dublin, endowing it with a power of conferring degrees, and other privileges of an univerſity.

Elizabeth and her miniſtry reflecting that the Indian treaſure was the true ſource of that greatneſs which rendered Philip ſo formidable to all his neighbours, reſolved to enfeeble him in that part, and the lord Thomas Howard, ſecond ſon to the late duke of Norfolk, was diſpatched, in the ſpring of the year 1591, to the Azores, or Weſtern Iſlands, with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, to intercept the plate-fleet in its return to Europe; but the king of Spain, apprized of the deſigns of the Engliſh court, equipped a fleet of fifty-five ſail, and ſent them to convoy the India ſhips. They came upon the Engliſh ſquadron ſo unexpectedly, that it was with great difficulty admiral Howard, who was then lying at anchor in the iſland of Flores, could put out to ſea, more than half of his men being ſick and unfit for ſervice; and captain Grenville, in the Revenge, was ſo unfortunate to be pent up between the iſland and the Spaniſh fleet: in this deſperate ſituation he attempted to break through the enemy, and, after maintaining a moſt gallant fight with the whole Spaniſh fleet for fifteen hours together, having received, upon a moderate computation, eight hundred cannon-ſhot in his ſhip, and withſtood the fire of near ten thouſand ſoldiers and ſeamen, and that with one hundred men only, he was compelled by his men to ſurrender himſelf priſoner, and, being carried on board the Spaniſh admiral, died a few days after of the wounds he had received during the engagement. The reſt of the ſquadron returned ſafely to England, diſappointed in their expectations, but pleaſing themſelves with the reflection, that their attempt to annoy the enemy had not been altogether ineffectual; for the Indian fleet had been ſo long detained in the Havannah, from the fear of the Engliſh, that they were at laſt obliged to put to ſea in an improper ſeaſon, and moſt of them were ſhipwrecked before they could reach the Spaniſh harbours. I ſhall omit to recount ſome other naval adventures of leſs importance, which happened at this time, after obſerving that Elizabeth loſt no opportunity of encouraging every attempt by ſea, which carried with it the ſmalleſt proſpect either of a new diſcovery or of profit.

Elizabeth was extremely offended with Henry IV. for having broken his word to her, in neglecting to drive the Spaniards out of Brittany; and not a little diſpleaſed with the earl of Eſſex for his too eaſy compliance with the meaſures of the French king, and therefore recalled him from the command of her forces in Normandy, at the ſame time threatening Henry, that if he continued his prevaricating method of proceeding, ſhe would totally withdraw her aſſiſtance from him. Henry, alarmed at this menace, ſent moſt ſubmiſſive letters to the queen, excuſing himſelf in the beſt manner he was able; and, by the mediation of Eſſex and Mornay du Pleſſis, whom he had ſent his ambaſſador to England, obtained freſh ſupplies, and then laid ſiege to Roan: but the duke of Parma having entered France, and being joined by the duke of Mayenne, and the young duke of Guiſe, obliged him to abandon his enterprize.

On the twenty-eighth of December this year died pope Sixtus V. This event conduced not a little to the tranquility of Elizabeth and her kingdoms; for had this pontiff lived a little longer, it is very probable that her expence and great endeavours to maintain the proteſtant intereſt in France, and to ſupport the houſe of Bourbon againſt the Spaniards, had proved ruinous to herſelf and people; king Henry IV. having a ſecret underſtanding with this pope, and, though he pretended to be a ſerious proteſtant outwardly, was entirely at his devotion in his heart. This was the ſpring of thoſe prevarications on the part of that king, from his firſt acceſſion to the throne, in all the negotiations and treaties with her majeſty, and of thoſe miſapplications of her generous and powerful aids, ſent to him from time to time, to drive the Spaniards out of Brittany. Pope Sixtus was ſucceeded in the pontifical dignity by Sfondrati, an Italian, who aſſumed the name of Gregory XIV.

In the beginning of the year 1592, the report continued very hot, that the duke of Parma was again to march into France. This report was not without foundation; and Elizabeth took care moſt punctually to fulfil all her engagements for the ſupport of Henry. The ſcene of war lay chiefly in Normandy and Brittany, where the prince de Dombes joined the prince of Condé, with the Engliſh troops under Norris, while Elizabeth prevailed with the prince of Anhalt to enter France with a conſiderable body of German auxiliaries, to aſſiſt Henry. The prince of Condé, however, having formed the ſiege of Craon, was defeated by the duke of Mercœur, and all Brittany was upon the point of falling into the hands of the Spaniards, when the dukes of Mayenne and Mercœur, with other heads of the league, diſguſted with the Spaniſh inſolence, and jealous of their power, formed ſecret reſolutions of making their peace with Henry. This ſlackened the operations of the war on the ſide of the league, and the duke of Mayenne was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Quillebœuf, with ſome loſs. Epernal was afterwards taken by the marſhal Biron, but with the loſs of that brave general's life. The farther operations of the French army fall not within my deſign; it is ſufficient to ſay, that by the ſecret intrigues of the duke of Mayenne, the leaguers ſplit among themſelves, which gave great advantages to Henry's party. But at laſt the cardinal legate publiſhed his maſter's bull, for aſſembling the catholics of France, and for proceeding to the election of a popiſh king. The violent leaguers intended at this aſſembly to have given their crown to the king of Spain; and the duke of Parma's true intention of marching into France, was that he might over-awe the aſſembly, which the Spaniſh party propoſed ſhould be held at Rheims, or Soiſſons. But the duke of Mayenne, ſenſible of the conſequence, ordered the aſſembly to be held at Paris. This ſomewhat diſconcerted the prince of Parma; and Henry drew all his troops, to Elizabeth's moriſication, out of Normandy, Picardy, and Brittany, to fight him before he ſhould advance into the heart of the country. What the conſequence would have been, is hard to ſay; but all Philip's vaſt deſigns were at this time defeated by the death of the duke of Parma, in the forty-ſixth year of his age. Elizabeth is ſaid to have dropped ſome generous expreſſions in favour of this great man's memory; and perhaps, few princes ever excelled him in virtue, in civil, and in military accompliſhments. His great merits were quickly ſeen after his death: no other general had authority enough to keep the Spaniſh troops together; and the great ſums which Philip had raiſed, being applied towards the corrupting the deputies of France, his ſoldiers mutinied, and many of them diſbanded themſelves.

In the month of April this year, ſir John Perot, the late lord-deputy of Ireland, was brought to his trial, upon a charge of high-treaſon during his adminiſtration there. He was a man of courage and abilities, but proud, poſitive, covetous, and overbearing. Hatton had been ſo much his enemy, that notwithſtanding all Burleigh could urge in his favour, Elizabeth was reſolved he ſhould be tried before commiſſioners, who were the lords Hunſdon and Buckhurſt, ſir Robert Cecil, ſir John Forteſcue, ſir John Wooby, and other judges. Great pains had been taken to rip up all the private behaviour of Perot in Ireland, where he had many enemies; yet nothing was judicially proved againſt him, but ſome paſſionate diſreſpectful words againſt Elizabeth's perſon, for which ſhe reſolved to humble him. The grounds of his impeachment were "for having treated the perſon and character of the queen contumaciouſly: for relieving popiſh prieſts; for holding a ſecret correſpondence with the duke of Parma, and Elizabeth's enemies; and for foſtering the civil commotions in Ireland." He made a noble defence, but acknowleged his indiſcretion in ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of his queen. Popham, the attorney-general, who knew that Elizabeth made it a point that he ſhould be convicted, produced a ſet of ſcandalous, and ſome of them infamous, witneſſes, to prove the charge, and ſupported it with all his venal eloquence. At laſt, after a long time, the jury found him guilty; and Burleigh by his tears teſtified his opinion of his innocence. It was thought that Elizabeth intended to have pardoned him, but he died in September following, a priſoner in the Tower.

Elizabeth this year continued to purſue her favourite ſcheme of humbling the Spaniard, by cutting the very nerves of his ſtrength in the Weſt Indies. Sir Walter Raleigh was ſent with a ſquadron of fifteen men of war, either to attack Panama, or to intercept the plate-fleet in its return to Europe. Never man had a head better fitted for this enterprize than ſir Walter Raleigh had: his ſchemes were great, but difficult, if not impracticable, to any capacity but his own; his learning was inferior to his knowlege; his conſtancy to his courage; and his virtue to his genius, which was equal to the greateſt and meaneſt things. Having at a great expence been detained too long in port by contrary winds, he ſet ſail three months later than he ought to have done; and having paſſed the Land's End, he learned, that orders had gone from Spain to ſtop the return of the plate-fleet to Europe that year; this news, with a violent ſtorm which diſperſed his ſquadron, obliged him to alter his plan. He therefore ſent one part of his ſquadron, under ſir Martin Forbiſher, to cruize off the coaſt of Spain, and he ſent another part of it, under Boroughs, a brave officer, and ſecond ſon to ſir John Boroughs, to the Azores. The earl of Cumberland at the ſame time was at ſea with three of Elizabeth's ſhips, and had chaſed a galleon into Flores juſt at the time when Boroughs had arrived there; while the Spaniſh fleet, which was then at ſea, went after Forbiſher. Boroughs would have taken this galleon, had it not been for a dead calm, and then a ſtorm, which gave the Spaniards an opportunity of unloading, and ſetting it on fire: he had, however, the good fortune to make prize of another ſhip, called the Mother of God, after a deſperate engagement, in which moſt of of the Spaniſh crew, which conſiſted of ſix hundred men, were killed. This victory was equally for the profit and honour of the Engliſh; the money that was known to come to the queen and captors amounted to one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, and the embezzlements were thought to amount to the ſame ſum; but, though Elizabeth did all ſhe could to recover them, no diſcovery was made.

This year the earl of Bothwell made a new attempt in Scotland to ſeize on the perſon of king James; but the deſign being timely diſcovered, the rebel fled into England. Elizabeth at firſt promiſed James to puniſh ſuch of her ſubjects as ſhould harbour him; but ſhe having always made it a point in her politics to oblige that prince to regard her, more by keeping him in a ſtate of uneaſineſs than by real tokens of love and friendſhip, refuſed to deliver the traitor up, though the king of Scotland demanded him according to treaty.

The year 1593 began with a new parliament, which met in February, when two of the members of the houſe of commons, Peter Wentworth, eſq. and ſir Henry Bromley, were committed, the firſt to the Tower, and the latter to the Fleet, for preparing a petition to entail the crown.

In this parliament there paſſed ſeveral remarkable acts, one of which obliged all perſons to conform, and repair at leaſt once a month, to the eſtabliſhed church, under pain of impriſonment, and baniſhment ſhould they refuſe to ſubmit; and ſuffering as felons, without benefit of the clergy, ſhould they return without her majeſty's licence. Another confined popiſh recuſants within five miles of their reſpective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattels, together with their lands during life. Another confirmed all the abbey-lands to the crown and grantees.

By the firſt of theſe acts the queen, who hated the puritans as much as the papiſts, thought to have driven the obſtinate quite away, and to have compelled the more moderate to conform to the eſtabliſhed church. How far her policy in this particular failed her, I ſhall leave my readers to judge, only obſerving, that the ſeverity which at this time began to be exerciſed in England upon the non-conformiſts (ſome of whom were executed on the ſixth of April this year), produced terrible effects in the following reigns, and gave riſe to troubles and factions which remain to this day, without any proſpect of their ſubſiding. Before this parliament broke up, which was on the tenth of April, they granted the queen an extraordinary aid of money, but at the ſame time it was inſerted in the act, "that ſo large and unuſual a ſupply, granted to a moſt excellent queen, who made ſo good a uſe of the public money, ſhould not be drawn into precedent."

The papiſts about this time began again to ſhew their inclination to rebellion, both in England and Scotland. One Richard Hacket was ſent by the Engliſh fugitives beyond ſea, to perſuade Ferdinand, earl of Derby, ſon to Henry newly deceaſed, to aſſume the regal title, by claim of deſcent from Mary, daughter to Henry VII. and to threaten him, that, unleſs he undertook this enterprize, and withal concealed the adviſer, he ſhould ſhortly die in a moſt wretched manner; as an encouragement, he was told that he might aſſuredly rely on the aſſiſtance of the king of Spain. But the earl, fearing this was a trap laid for him, diſcovered the whole matter to the council, and Hacket was taken and hanged: but the threats of that villain were unhappily fulfilled upon the poor earl, who, in leſs than four months after, died in the moſt excruciating torments, ſuppoſed to be the effects of an arſenical poiſon. The ſuſpicion lighted upon his gentleman of the horſe, who diſappeared the morrow after his lord's death. There was found in the earl's chamber an image of wax, with hairs thruſt through the belly of it, of the ſame colour with his own; which was thought to have been placed there on purpoſe to take off the ſuſpicion of his having been poiſoned, and to throw it upon the effects of necromancy, which was much believed in thoſe days.

In Scotland the Spaniſh governor of the Netherlands endeavoured to excite freſh troubles, by aſſuring the popiſh ſubjects of a powerful aſſiſtance from the king of Spain. Their project, however, was principally levelled againſt England; for though they reſolved and promiſed to ſend a Spaniſh army into Scotland, it was in order to cover their enterprize againſt Elizabeth, whom they intended to aſſaſſinate or poiſon, and then to invade England with that army from Scotland, ſuppoſing that the general conſternation at her death would render this invaſion leſs difficult. And to execute this murdering deſign upon Elizabeth, they had caſt an eye on Roderigo Lopez, a Jew phyſician, retained about the queen's perſon, and two Portugueſe: Lopez agreed to the propoſal for fifty thouſand crowns; but the plot was diſcovered, the three conſpirators ſeized, who, upon their trials, confeſſed the fact, and that they were engaged in it by the king of Spain's governors in the Low Countries, and were executed.

The day following one Patrick Cullen, an Iriſh fencing-maſter, ſent from the Low Countries to kill the queen, underwent the ſame fate at the gallows: and about the ſame time Edward York and Richard Williams, who had been ſuborned by Diego de Ibarra, the collegue of count Fuentes in the government of the Low Countries, were arreſted, and others were diſcovered, who had engaged to burn the navy. Of theſe ſecret and unnatural proceedings againſt a crowned head, the queen complained loudly at foreign courts; and ſhe lived in continual dread, that at ſome opportunity this Spaniſh policy might take effect. But her uneaſineſs increaſed upon information that her enemies had prevailed too much with the king of Scotland, and that the Spaniſh gold had inclined him to favour popery: and ſhe was the rather convinced of the truth of this report by that monarch's reply to her ambaſſador, ſent on that occaſion; for when he demanded, as an inſtance of his ſincerity to the proteſtant faith, to repreſs the popiſh party by more ſevere laws than the preſent, James replied, with ſome heat, "that he was not at the queen's command, and that it did not belong to her to preſcribe in what manner he ſhould govern his kingdom:" and, by way of recrimination, complained of her breach of treaty, in giving protection to his rebellious ſubject Bothwell, whom he demanded afreſh.

Elizabeth plainly perceived that James was much inclined to break with her, upon the firſt advantageous circumſtance; and therefore ordered it ſo as to ſend Bothwell, at the head of a reſolute body of men, into Scotland, to ſurprize Leith, and then publiſhed a manifeſto, importing, "that perſons dangerous dangerous to the church and ſtate, having by ſome artifice procured admiſſion into the council, gave occaſion, by their conduct, to believe they were forming deſigns againſt the evangelical religion; that, for ſome time, the Romiſh prieſts had been ſeen running from village to village, and celebrating maſs, in the moſt public manner; that they endeavoured to animate the people againſt the Engliſh, in order to kindle a war between the two nations, which could not but prove fatal to Scotland; that, to give a check to theſe dangerous conſpiracies, he had, with the concurrence of divers lords and gentlemen, taken arms, to drive theſe pernicious counſellors out of the kingdom, or to bring them to an account for their actions; that the affair was the more important, as the Spaniards were preparing to invade the kingdom; and therefore he exhorted the Scots to join with him to prevent greater miſchiefs, and to induce the king to favour ſo juſt a deſign." All which bears ſuch a connection with the repreſentation made by Elizabeth's ambaſſador, that ſhe muſt be ſuſpected of being concerned in this undertaking.

In Ireland this year, ſeveral of the great men in Connaught broke out into rebellion, and Tirlogh Leinigh being dead, Tyr Oen aſſumed the title of O'Neil (which in Ireland was held in higher eſteem than that of Emperor); but, upon a ſudden diſſembling his diſcontent, he ſubmitted himſelf to the lord-deputy, and promiſed all obedience.

The ſupplies given by parliament, and the prizes taken from the Spaniards, enabled Elizabeth to act up to her ſpirit, and her notions of the ballance of power which England ought to preſerve on the continent. Notwithſtanding all the cauſes of complaint which ſhe had againſt the French king, ſhe would not ſee his affairs ruined for want of her aſſiſtance; and it ſoon appeared that all her menaces to withdraw it, were only with a view to quicken him to do all he could, if he could not do all that ſhe deſired. Elizabeth kept Norris and his army during the winter in Brittany, at the great charge of three thouſand two hundred pounds a week for their ſubſiſtence: but Henry's affairs in that province were ſo miſerably ruined, that he could aſſign them no fortified place for their winter-quarters; nor could he ſend, according to his promiſe, the marſhal d'Aumont, with four thouſand men, to join them. The bad quarters which the Engliſh were forced to take up with, and the inclemency of the weather, carried off great numbers of them; but Elizabeth's ſhips were perpetually employed in carrying over recruits to keep the number complete. In the mean while the aſſembly of the ſtates of France was held at Paris, when the Spaniſh party propoſed that the members ſhould, by a ſolemn oath, bind themſelves never to acknowlege the king of Navarre as king of France, even though he ſhould declare himſelf a catholic. This propoſition would have been infallibly complied with, had not Elizabeth's ſeaſonable aſſiſtance, and the auxiliaries which her credit with the princes of Germany had brought to Henry, daunted the more moderate catholics, and even the duke of Mayenne rejected it. That duke was now obliged to meet the duke of Feria, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who was in Picardy; while count Mansfelt, the Spaniſh general in the Low Countries, had laid ſiege to Noyon, which he took. In the conferences held between the dukes of Mayenne and Feria, the latter propoſed that the Salic law ſhould be aboliſhed by the aſſembly of the ſtates, that the crown of France might fall more eaſily upon the infanta's head: this propoſal was warmly rejected by the duke of Mayenne, who threatened to drive all the Spaniards out of France; but not daring yet abſolutely to truſt Henry, who was guided by Elizabeth, he was mollified; while Henry, on the other hand, ſhewed great inclination to be converted to popery, and conferences for that purpoſe were actually held.

But this did not retard the operations of the war in Brittany, where, in April, the Engliſh were joined by St. Luc, with ſome French troops, and beat the army of the league at Laval, but with the loſs of ſome of their beſt men and officers. They then beſieged la Guerche, in which were four thouſand men, whom the duke of Mercœur had ſent to fortify that place, and obliged them to ſurrender it by capitulation, leaving behind them their arms and baggage. In the mean while Elizabeth received certain intelligence that Henry had changed his religion.

Du Pleſſis Mornay, who was then Henry's reſident at the Engliſh court, laid before Elizabeth his maſter's motives for his converſion; but they were ſo far from giving her ſatisfaction, that ſhe wrote that king a letter with her own hand, to this effect:

"Alas! what grief, what anxiety of mind, hath befallen me, ſince I heard this news! Was it poſſible, that worldly reſpects ſhould make you lay aſide God's fear? Could you think that he, that had hitherto upheld and kept you, would leave you at the laſt? It is a dangerous thing to do evil that good may come thereof: but I hope your mind may alter. In the mean time I will pray for you, and beg of God that the hands of Eſau may not hinder the bleſſing of Jacob." She concludes, "Your ſiſter, after the old-faſhioned way; as for the new, I have nothing to do with it.

ELIZABETH."

But, however ſincere and zealous Elizabeth appears to be by this letter, ſhe never loſt ſight of her intereſts. She at firſt ordered Wilks to lay before Henry her firm reſolution to recal her troops out of Brittany, where Henry had been ſo negligent of them: but being convinced by him, that his converſion was not only prudent, but neceſſary, and he making great offers, and greater promiſes, ſhe ordered Norris to remain there till her farther pleaſure ſhould be known. She then ſignified to Henry, that, upon proper terms, ſhe was willing to continue her aſſiſtance, and to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Spain, as long as either of them ſhould be at war with that crown. One of the conditions required by Elizabeth, who ſent ſir Robert Sidney upon this negociation, was, that Breſt ſhould be put into her hands, as a place of retreat for her troops, and ſecurity of her money: but Henry neither would nor durſt agree to this demand; and Elizabeth, after commending the proteſtants to his protection, and laying before him the danger of his ſea-coaſts, ſigned the treaty with him in Auguſt, and at the ſame time fortified the iſles of Scilly, Guernſey, and Jerſey.

Some of the above tranſactions, eſpecially thoſe in Scotland, exceeded the bounds of the year 1593, but as the ſucceeding one, 1594, affords very few events of an intereſting nature, I thought proper to throw the two years together, and ſhall only obſerve, that though Bothwell's undertaking in Scotland miſcarried, it however produced a very good effect, by inducing James to alter his conduct, leſt his vain projects ſhould loſe him the Engliſh crown. He therefore aſſembled the ſtates, and prevailed to have the catholic lords, who had appeared too zealous for the Spaniards, to be baniſhed the kingdom. They made ſome efforts to reſiſt, but James marched in perſon to ſubdue them, and drove them to ſuch extremity, that Bothwell fled to France, and the other lords were obliged to give ſecurity for departing the kingdom. This vigorous proceeding gave Elizabeth great ſatisfaction, as it took from the Spaniards all hopes of attacking her on the ſide of Scotland; and commiſſioners for both nations were named, about the latter end of this year, 1594, for putting an end to all diſputes upon the Borders: and the queen, to give James a farther proof of her good-will, ſent the earl of Suſſex, in her name, to aſſiſt at the baptiſm of the new-born ſon of the king of Scotland.

The ſweets of the Spaniſh plunder lately made in America, encouraged ſir Richard Hawkins, ſon to the famous admiral of that name, to take out a commiſſion under the broad-ſeal, for annoying the Spaniards there. He accordingly put to ſea with three ſhips, and about two hundred men; but in a few days one of his ſhips was burnt, and another forced back to England: however he purſued his voyage with the ſhip that was left, ſo undauntedly that, in January this year, he entered the ſtreights of Magellan, and from thence proceed to the South Sea, all along the coaſt of Chili, where he made ſeveral valuable prizes: but being attacked by two Spaniſh ſhips, under Bertrand de Caſtro, he fought them ſeveral days, till all his men being killed or wounded, he was obliged to ſurrender upon promiſe of life and liberty. But ſome doubts ariſing about de Caſtro's power to make ſuch a promiſe, and the Spaniards being extremely ſolicitous to deter Engliſhmen from entering thoſe ſeas, Hawkins was ſent priſoner to Spain, where he was honourably diſcharged by the conde de Miranda, preſident of the council.

James Lancaſter was another bold adventurer of thoſe days; and about this time ſome Engliſh merchants, who had been plundered by the Spaniards, gave him the command of three privateers and a long pinnace, for cruizing upon the Spaniards. Being at ſea, he had intelligence of a large Spaniſh Eaſt India ſhip that had been wrecked near Fernambuco, in Brazil, where the Spaniards were then buſied in ſaving her cargo. Thither Lancaſter, with Venner, another Engliſh commander, actually ſailed; and, though they found the enemy prepared to receive them, they landed their men, and made themſelves maſters of the lower town and port, together with the wreck. The Spaniards, however, endeavoured to diſlodge them, and for thirty days employed both force and ſtratagem to retake the place; but all was to no purpoſe, and the Engliſh made ſo much booty as loaded fifteen ſhips, with which they returned home.

The year 1595 was diſtinguiſhed by many other glorious exploits of the Engliſh at ſea, and in particular by ſir Walter Raleigh's expedition to Guiana, the nobleſt that had been meditated yet by any Engliſhman. This was a large rich tract of land, rather poſſeſſed than inhabited by the Spaniards, and ſir Walter had, at his own expence, ſent one captain Whiddon to view that coaſt as much as he could. Upon Whiddon's report, Raleigh was confirmed in his reſolution, and having publicly imparted it, it met with ſo much applauſe that the lord high-treaſurer and the lord high-admiral of England contributed to his expences in fitting out a ſquadron for carrying the war into the very vitals of the Spaniſh empire in America. On the ſixth of February, 1595, he ſailed from Plymouth, and about the twenty-ſecond of March he took the little city of St. Joſeph, in the iſland of Trinidado, and made Boreo, its Spaniſh governor, priſoner. Upon the ſtrength of the information he received from Boreo, he left his ſhip at Trinidado, and, putting about an hundred men in long-boats, he went about four hundred miles up the river Oronoque, but met with ſuch inſurmountable difficulties in the navigation, and from the climate, that he did not reap all the advantages due to ſuch a brave and hazardous undertaking. It is certain, however, that he made great diſcoveries; but, notwithſtanding all the pains he took, neither the public of that or this age, could ever be brought to believe the ſcheme of the Engliſh making themſelves maſters of Guiana to be ſo practicable as ſir Walter Raleigh imagined. In ſhort, at laſt he was obliged to return to the iſland of Trinidado, after firing the town of Cumana, which refuſed to pay him contributions, and threatening to do the ſame to St. Mary's and Rio de la Hacha, till they paid him large ſums. The particulars of ſir Walter's profits in this expedition are not very clearly ſet down; but, from the vaſt eſtate he amaſſed, and the many enterprizes he was enabled to carry on upon his own bottom, we may fairly preſume, that in this and all other expeditions, the riches he acquired were much greater than he choſe to own. Upon his return to England he was received with vaſt applauſe, and printed a pompous account of his voyage; though he could make but few proſelytes to his opinion, he was however himſelf ſo firmly convinced of the facts he advanced, that at his own expence he fitted out two ſhips, and ſent them, under Kemys, to Guiana, to make farther diſcoveries, and to aſſiſt the Indians, whom Raleigh had found very friendly, in throwing off the Spaniſh yoke.

And now, upon the general report throughout Europe, that the Spaniards were fitting out a more formidable fleet than that of 1588, to invade England and Ireland, Elizabeth reinforced her troops in this latter kingdom, to defeat the intentions of the enemy there, where the earl of Tyr Oen (or Tyrone) had already taken up arms in favour of the Spaniards: and at the ſame time ſhe ordered two ſquadrons to be fitted out, on the public account; one to cruiſe in the Britiſh ſeas, to guard the coaſts at all events; the other, conſiſting of twenty-ſix ſhips, under the command of ſir Francis Drake and the famous admiral ſir John Hawkins, to make a diverſion in the Spaniſh ſettlements in the Weſt Indies: on board of this laſt fleet was a body of land forces, commanded by ſir Thomas Baskerville.

Notwithſtanding the vigilance of the earl of Cumberland, who commanded the Channel fleet, don Diego Brocha, with four Spaniſh men of war, made a deſcent in Mount's Bay, in Cornwall, in the month of June this year, and burnt three ſmall villages, the inhabitants of which, upon the firſt appearance of the enemy, fled up the country, and thus preſerved their lives and effects. Theſe were the only Spaniards that ever landed in England as enemies. This attempt, however alarmed Elizabeth ſo much, that they gained their ends by her detaining the ſhips deſigned for the Weſt Indian expedition too long, for it was the twenty-eighth of Auguſt before they ſet ſail from Plymouth.

Their firſt deſign was to attempt Porto Rico, where they knew a rich carrack was at that time ſtationed; but as they had not preſerved the requiſite ſecrecy, a pinnace, having ſtrayed from the fleet, was taken by the Spaniards, and betrayed the intention of the Engliſh. Preparations were made in that iſland to receive them; and the Engliſh fleet, notwithſtanding the brave aſſault which they made on the enemy, was repulſed with loſs. Hawkins ſoon after died, and Drake purſued his courſe to Nombre di Dios, on the iſthmus of Darien; where having landed his men, he attempted to paſs forward to Panama, with a view of plundering that place: or, if he found ſuch a ſcheme practicable, of keeping and fortifying it. But he met not with the ſame facility which had attended his firſt enterprizes in the ſame parts: the Spaniards, taught by experience, had every where fortified the paſſes, and had ſtationed troops in the woods, which ſo infeſted the Engliſh with continual alarms and skirmiſhes, that they were obliged to return without being able to effectuate any thing. Drake himſelf, from the intemperance of the climates, from the fatigue of his journey, and the vexation of his diſappointment, was ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he ſoon after died: ſir Thomas Baskerville took command of the fleet, which was in a very weak condition; and, after having fought a battle near Cuba with a Spaniſh fleet, of which the event was not deciſive, he returned to England. The Spaniards ſuffered ſome loſs from this enterprize, and the Engliſh reaped very little profit.

Elizabeth, piqued at the behaviour of Henry IV. of France, who, by his ſubmiſſion to terms unbecoming a king, and tending to the ruin of the proteſtant intereſt, only to obtain the pope's abſolution, ſhewed that he no longer conſidered the proteſtants as his friends; and by miſapplying the Engliſh aids of men and money, convinced her that he regarded not her intereſt, recalled her troops from Brittany, and left him to manage his affairs as he pleaſed, without giving herſelf any farther concern. And, upon information that the ſtates of the United Provinces had ſupplied him with a large ſum of money, a conſiderable quantity of corn, and two regiments of ſoldiers, her majeſty ſhewed her reſentment at ſuch an ill-timed proceeding, by ordering ſir Thomas Bodley to demand a reimburſement of the money ſhe had lent them, ſince they were able to make ſuch large preſents to the king of France, and to declare to them in her name, that, unleſs they forthwith diſcharged part of the moneys they were indebted to her, and gave her aſſurance of the remainder, within a certain time, ſhe would take proper meaſures to do herſelf juſtice.

This unexpected demand threw the Hollanders into great perplexity, and in the end they were glad to ſubmit to ſuch conditions as her majeſty thought proper to accept, which was the payment of forty thouſand pounds per annum, towards defraying the expence of the Engliſh forces in their ſervice; twenty thouſand pounds per annum more till a peace ſhould be made, and one hundred thouſand pounds per annum for four years after its concluſion; and, on a farther condition, that they ſhould join the queen's fleet with a certain number of ſhips, in caſe ſhe ſhould be attacked by the Spaniards *.

The late unſucceſsful expedition of Drake and Hawkins againſt the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, had given Philip II. ſo much encouragement, who had alſo this year gained many great advantages in France, and taken Calais and ſeveral other important towns in that kingdom, that he now openly declared his intention of invading England anew, and was actually buſied in making vaſt preparations for that purpoſe. Theſe conſiderations, with the rebellion Philip had fomented in Ireland, determined Elizabeth and her council to carry the war into the very heart of Spain, as the only means left for fruſtrating the ambitious projects of that monarch.

A powerful fleet was equipped at Plymouth, conſiſting of an hundred and ſeventy veſſels, ſeventeen of which were capital ſhips of war, the reſt tenders and ſmall veſſels: twenty ſhips were added by the Hollanders. In this fleet there was computed to be ſix thouſand three hundred and ſixty ſoldiers, a thouſand volunteers, and ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-two ſeamen; beſides the Dutch. The land forces were commanded by the earl of Eſſex; the navy by the lord Effingham, high-admiral: both theſe commanders had expended great ſums of their own in this armament; for ſuch was the ſpirit of Elizabeth's reign. The lord Thomas Howard, ſir Walter Raleigh, ſir Francis Vere, ſir George Carew, and ſir Coniers Clifford, had commands in the expedition, and were named as a council to the general and admiral.

The fleet ſet ſail on the firſt of June, 1596, and, meeting with a fair wind, bent their courſe to Cadiz, at which place, by ſealed orders delivered to all the captains, the general rendezvous was appointed. They ſent before them ſome armed tenders, which intercepted every ſhip that could carry any intelligence to the enemy, and they themſelves were ſo fortunate, when they came near Cadiz, as to take an Iriſh veſſel, by which they learned that that port was full of merchant ſhips of great value, and that the Spaniards lived in perfect ſecurity, without any apprehenſions of an enemy. This intelligence much encouraged the Engliſh fleet, and gave them the proſpect of a fortunate iſſue to the enterprize.

After a fruitleſs attempt to land at St. Sebaſtian's, on the weſtern ſide of the iſland of Cadiz, it was, upon deliberation, reſolved by the council of war to attack the ſhips and gallies in the bay. This was a plan of ſir Walter Raleigh's, and was ſtrongly ſeconded by the young earl of Eſſex, who burnt with an eager deſire to ſignalize his courage on this occaſion, and the point being carried, it was agreed that the attack ſhould be formed the very next day, being the twenty-ſecond of June. Raleigh, in the Warſpite, was to lead the attack, and to be ſe-conded by ſir George Carew, in the Mary Roſe, ſir Robert Southwell, in the Lion, ſir Francis Vere, in the Rainbow, vice-admiral Croſs, in the Swiftſure, ſir Coniers Clifford, in the Dreadnought, and by Dudley, in the Nonpareil, on board of which went the lord Thomas Howard.

The Spaniards were no leſs provident in their diſpoſitions: they ranged their gallies under the walls of the city ſo as to flank the Engliſh ſhips as they paſſed; ſome culverins were planted to ſecure the channel of the harbour; and the artillery of both fort Philip and of the curtain of the fortification were brought to bear upon the Engliſh fleet. Beſides the ſhips here mentioned, the Spaniards had put guns on board all their large galleons; and the whole reached from ſhore to ſhore, being covered by fort Puntal, which lay in the entrance of the harbour. All night there was an inceſſant cannonading on both ſides, and at break of day, the twenty-ſecond of June, the action began.

Sir Walter, as he advanced at the head of the Engliſh van, received the cannon of fort Philip, from the curtain, and from all the ſeventeen gallies, to which he anſwered with only a flouriſh of his trumpets, and intrepidly kept driving forward, to encourage thoſe that followed him, to haſte into play, and to engage thoſe he paſſed by, while he attacked the body of the enemy. He, during the whole action, kept cloſe to the enemy, and ſtood for the moſt part a-head of all; and at laſt, after a long and deſperate fight, in which his ſhip was almoſt ſunk, he, by the conſent of the two commanders, who promiſed to ſecond him, prepared to board the Spaniſh admiral the St. Philip, of fifteen hundred tuns; but his intention being diſcovered, the admiral ran his ſhip a-ſhore, and was followed by the other capital ſhips, two of which, the St. Matthew and St. Andrew, were ſaved by the Engliſh boats, but the St. Philip and St. Thomas were burnt, either by accident, or deſignedly to prevent their being taken.

During the engagement at ſea, the earl of Eſſex, with eight hundred men, landed at the Puntals, and marched directly to Cadiz. Three or four hundred paces from the city he met with five hundred Spaniards, who, when they ſaw him, retired into the town, and were ſo cloſely purſued, that the Engliſh had like to have entered with them. The conſternation was ſo great that before any meaſures could be taken for its defence, the Engliſh had time to force the gate, and throw themſelves into the town; though they found ſome reſiſtance in the ſtreets, yet in half an hour they made themſelves maſters of the market-place. Then the garriſon and inhabitants retired into the caſtle and town-houſe, but the ſame, or the following day, were forced to ſurrender. By the capitulation they were to have their lives, on payment of ſeventy thouſand ducats, for which four principal citizens were given in hoſtage. The town being thus in the power of the Engliſh, the earl of Eſſex turned out the inhabitants, and then ordered to be carried on board a great quantity of ſilver, ammunition, and other valuable things, beſide what the ſoldiers had plundered.

On the other hand, admiral Howard ſent ſir Walter Raleigh to burn the merchant-ſhips at Port Real. The admiral was offered two millions of ducats for their ranſom, but rejected the offer, ſaying, he came to burn, and not to ranſom the ſhips. Mean while the duke of Modena found means to unload ſome of theſe ſhips and fire others, to deprive the Engliſh of their riches. Beſides the merchant-men, the king of Spain loſt two galleons taken by the Engliſh, with above a hundred braſs guns, thirteen men of war, eleven ſhips freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others; without reckoning the ſtores prepared for the intended expedition againſt England. The Engliſh eſtimated his loſs at twenty millions of ducats.

Thus ended this memorable conqueſt, gloriouſly for the Engliſh, fatally for the Spaniard. No Engliſhman of note periſhed in it, excepting ſir John Wingfield, who was killed in the town: in other reſpects the victory coſt them but two hundred men. Beſides the vaſt booty the Spaniards loſt, and the ruin of their trade to the Weſt Indies for this year, that proud and ambitious people were obliged to ſubmit to the indignity of ſeeing one of their chief cities taken, and a noble fleet of men of war and merchant-ſhips, richly laden, deſtroyed in their own harbour, and that by an enemy, for whom they were, in full confidence of victory, at that very time publicly forging chains.

It is hard to account for the reaſons which determined the Engliſh ſea-officers to abandon this conqueſt, where the enemy's known loſs was ſo very great: Eſſex, all on fire for glory, regarded this great ſucceſs only as a ſtep to future atchievements; he inſiſted on keeping poſſeſſion of Cadiz, and even offered to ſtay there and defend it in the name of the queen of England, provided he might have four hundred men and three months proviſions: but neither this, nor his ſcheme for intercepting the carracks at the Azores, aſſaulting the Groyne, for taking St. Andero and St. Sebaſtian, were hearkened to, every one being impatient to return with their plunder to England. Soon after the return of this armament to England, which was on the eighth of Auguſt, the admiral, lord Howard of Effingham, was created earl of Nottingham; and this promotion gave great diſquiet to Eſſex. In the preample of the patent, it was ſaid, "that the new dignity was conferred on him on account of his good ſervices, in taking Cadiz, and deſtroying the Spaniſh ſhips;" a merit which Eſſex pretended to belong ſolely to himſelf (though in fact that ſucceſs was principally owing to the courage and conduct of ſir Walter Raleigh); and the earl offered to maintain his plea by ſingle combat, againſt Nottingham, or his ſon, or any of his kindred.

The earl had alſo the additional mortification to find, on his return to court, ſo great a change in the miniſtry, by the advancement of his enemy, ſir Robert Cecil, to the office of ſecretary of ſtate, inſtead of ſir Thomas Bodley, whom he had recommended at his departure; beſides other ſlights caſt upon his friends, that they convinced him that his credit was declining; and his uneaſineſs at it engaged him in ſuch extravagant projects as coſt him his life.

Notwithſtanding the diſguſt which Elizabeth had conceived againſt the French king, and that prince's reſentment of her refuſing to ſuccour Calais, their mutual intereſt was ſo inſeparably connected in the war with Spain, that they agreed to open conferences for a treaty, which had been propoſed before the Spaniards had reduced the towns in Picardy. The duke of Bouillon was ſent over to aſſiſt Sancy in the negociation; and Engliſh commiſſioners being appointed to treat with them, the league was ſoon after concluded, on condition that Elizabeth ſhould furniſh four thouſand men for the defence of Picardy and Normandy, that the king of France ſhould ſupply her with the ſame number in caſe her kingdom ſhould be invaded; and that neither party ſhould make peace without the other's conſent. The States General acceded to this treaty, though their admiſſion was retarded by the jealouſy of Elizabeth, who pretended that they had no right to accede as a ſovereign power, but merely as aſſociated towns, under her protection; at length the French king prevailed upon her to wave this diſtinction.

Before we leave this year we muſt juſt mention the deaths of ſome great perſonages, which happened in the courſe of it, namely, Philip, earl of Arundel, who was condemned in the year 1589, but though his ſovereign ſpared his forfeited life, death at laſt claimed his due; he had ſpent the time of his confinement in the utmoſt auſterities of his religion, and left behind him only one ſon, named Thomas: Henry Carey, lord Hunſdon; ſir Francis Knolles; and ſir John Pickering, lord keeper of the great-ſeal (ſo made upon the death of the lord-chancellor Hatton); he was ſucceeded by ſir Thomas Egerton, maſter of the Rolls.

Philip of Spain, exaſperated by the conduct of Elizabeth, and the loſſes he had ſuſtained from the arms of her people, reſolved to make another effort for the conqueſt of England. With this view, early in the ſpring of the year 1597, he aſſembled a formidable fleet, when the queen thought him utterly diſabled from executing any ſcheme of revenge; and this navy having taken land-forces on board, at Ferrol, ſteered its courſe for England, but was diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, which rendered it altogether unſerviceable for that ſeaſon. The king of Spain had begun to treat privately of a ſeparate peace with Henry; but the negociation was altogether interrupted by the ſucceſs of Porto Carrero, governor of Dourlens, who found means to ſurpriſe Amiens, though this advantage did not recompence Philip for the defeat of his troops at Turnhaut, by prince Maurice: nevertheleſs, depending upon a ſeparate peace with France, he determined to make a deſcent upon Ireland, where he ſtill fomented the diſcontent of the natives; but his fleet was again diſperſed, and diſabled. Almoſt all the native Iriſh in Ulſter and Connaught being encouraged by his emiſſaries with hopes of aſſiſtance, had riſen in arms, and Thomas lord Bourrough, was ſent over with the commiſſion of lord-deputy. Tyrone endeavoured to amuſe him with excuſes, profeſſions, and propoſals; but, inſtead of ſuffering himſelf to be cajoled by that crafty rebel, he marched againſt him, and took the fort of Blackwater; then he returned to Dublin, where he died; and Thomas, earl of Ormond, was conſtituted lieutenant-general of the army. This nobleman advanced againſt Tyrone, but his troops being in a miſerable condition, he agreed to a truce for a few months, during which he expected to receive a reinforcement from England.

Elizabeth, in return, reſolved to make an attempt upon Tercera, the principal iſland of the Azores, and, if poſſible, intercept the Spaniſh flota, in their paſſage from the Weſt Indies. With this view ſhe cauſed to be fitted out a large armament, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty-two ſhips, with ſix thouſand land forces (of whom one thouſand were veterans) on board. The management of the whole expedition was committed to Eſſex, with a command of one of the diviſions of the fleet; the ſecond diviſion was committed to the lord Thomas Howard; the third and laſt to ſir Walter Raleigh: Charles Blount, lord Montjoy, was appointed lieutenant-general under Eſſex; ſir Francis Vere, marſhal of the camp; ſir George Carew, lieutenant of the ordnance; and ſir Chriſtopher Blunt, firſt colonel, or what we may now call brigadier. The chief volunteers were the earls of Rutland and Southampton, two noblemen who were very dear to Eſſex, the lords Grey, Cromwell, and Rich, beſides many other perſons of diſtinction; and on the ninth of July the whole fleet ſet ſail together, and two days after ſealed inſtructions were ſent on board every ſhip, to be opened in a certain latitude.

The true deſtination of this fleet was firſt to Ferrol and the Groyne, where it was hoped to ſurprize the Spaniſh fleet in theſe harbours, and then to the Azores; but contrary winds, ſtorms, and a fatal quarrel betwixt the earl of Eſſex and ſir Walter Raleigh, broke theſe meaſures, and the fleet returning to England about the end of October, without performing any memorable action, and Eſſex not being able to juſtify his conduct in the expedition, he was highly blamed by the nation for his ill treatment of Raleigh; but Elizabeth, who ſaw in him only the valiant defender of her honour and authority, and not conceiving there was any danger in a mere compliment to conſole him for the public reproach, made him marſhal of England, a poſt vacant by the death of George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury; by which Eſſex, to his no ſmall ſatisfaction, obtained precedency over his hated rival, the earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral.

Towards the end of this year Elizabeth received certain inteligence that Henry of France and Philip of Spain, equally tired out with a bloody and expenſive war between them, were deſirous of peace, and that a private negociation was actually on foot for that purpoſe. The queen could not, for ſome time, bring herſelf to believe a crowned head capable of ſo much falſhood and perjury, after a treaty ſo recently made with herſelf, and ſolemnly ſworn to upon the Evangeliſts by Henry, in the preſence the Engliſh ambaſſador; yet, fearing the worſt, ſhe called a parliament to meet on the twenty-fourth of October, this year, which ſhe opened with a ſpeech, acquainting them, "that ſhe had reaſon to ſuſpect that ſhe was on the point of being abandoned by her ally, though he ſtill pretended not to treat without her;" and concluded with giving them to underſtand, that ſhe had expended in the wars of France, Flanders, Spain, and Ireland, above three times the amount of the ſubſidies ſhe had received: whereupon the commons and convocation indulged her with a conſiderable ſupply; and this with ſo much unanimity and alacrity as ſhewed the nation ready to ſacrifice their all in defence of their beloved queen.

In this parliament, which, after enacting ſeveral excellent laws, was diſſolved in February following, the commons ventured to engage in two controverſies, about forms, with the houſe of peers; a prelude to thoſe encroachments, which, as they assumed more courage, they afterwards made upon the prerogatives of the crown. They complained, that the lords failed in civility to them, by receiving their messages sitting with their hats on, and that the keeper returned an answer in the same negligent posture: but the upper house proved, to their full satisfaction, that they were not intitled, by custom and the use of parliament, to any more respect. Some amendments had been made by the lords on a bill sent up by the commons, and these amendments were wrote on parchment, and returned with the bill to the commons: the lower house took umbrage at the novelty; they pretended, that these amendments ought to have been wrote on paper, and not on parchment; and they complained of this innovation to the peers. The peers replied, that they expected not such a frivolous objection from the gravity of the house; and that it was not material whether the amendments were wrote on parchment or on paper, nor whether the paper was white, black, or brown. The commons were offended at this reply, which seemed to contain a mockery of them; and they complained of it, though without obtaining any satisfaction*.

An application was made, by way of petition to the queen, from the lower house, against monopolies, an abuse which had risen to an enormous height: and they received a gracious, though a general answer, for which they returned their thankful acknowlegements. But not to give them too great encouragement in such applications, she told them in the speech which she delivered at their dissolution, "That, with regard to these patents, she hoped that her dutiful and loving subjects would not take away her prerogative, which is the chief flower in her garden, and the principal and head pearl in her crown and diadem: but that they would rather leave the matter to her disposal." The commons also took notice, this session, of some transactions in the court of high-commission, but not till they had previously received permission from her majesty for that purpose.

Elizabeth having had her hands strengthened by the bounty of her subjects at home, deputed Thomas Wilks, sir Robert Cecil, the new secretary, and sir John Herbert, master of requests, as her ambassadors to Henry, to demand of that prince upon what terms the negociation stood with Spain; to which Henry answered in very general terms, "That he wanted peace, and that the welfare of his subjects, which he preferred to all other considerations, absolutely required it; and that, as the king of Spain offered to restore all places taken by him in France, he could not reject the offer without exposing his kingdom to utter ruin." This answer convinced the ambassadors that the peace between France and Spain was as good as concluded, without Henry having taken any care of his allies; and this drew from them, especially Cecil, some very severe reproaches on the ingratitude of that king: he produced the treaty he had signed in England; he mentioned the oaths by which Henry had solemnly bound that treaty; he cajoled, he promised, he menaced; in fine, he tried every expedient to divert Henry from the thoughts of a separate peace with Spain; wherefore, to avoid such disagreeable and mortifying conferences, the French king, instead of granting any farther audiences as they demanded, appointed commissioners to treat with the ambassadors in the beginning of the following year: but, after some time spent in warm altercations on both sides the French king, consulting only the good of his own people, concluded a peace with Philip of Spain, on the second of May, 1598.

This conduct of Henry exasperated Elizabeth beyond all sufferance, who was no sooner informed of the treaty being signed, than she wrote him a letter, in which, after several other severe expressions, she told him, "that if in temperal concerns there was any such thing as a sin against the Holy Ghost, it was doubtless ingratitude." Henry was stung with these reproaches, but excused himself upon the urgent necessity which forced him to make peace; and concluded with observing, that as he had hitherto been only a burden to the queen of England, he would, for the future, give her marks of his acknowlegement in procuring her a safe and honourable peace, and in never forsaking her interests. But these were only words, and as such were regarded by Elizabeth.

In this situation of public affairs, especially as the peace of Ireland was disturbed about the same time with a formidable insurrection under O'Neil, earl of Tyrone; and James of Scotland not only almost openly demanded to be declared the queen's presumptive heir, but seemed to be making his peace with the court of Rome, as appeared from an intercepted letter, subscribed with his own hand, and addressed to the pope; Elizabeth resolved at all events to support the Dutch, and never to accept of peace with Spain, till she could procure the states such a peace as should secure their liberty, lest she should oblige them to put themselves again under the Spanish yoke. The Hollanders, on their side, seeing themselves deserted by the king of France, were glad to preserve the queen's alliance by submitting to any terms which she pleased to require of them. The debt which they owed the queen was now fixed at eight hundred thousand pounds; of this sum they agreed to pay, during the war, thirty thousand pounds a year, and these payments were to continue till four hundred thousand pounds of the debt should be extinguished. They engaged also, during the time that England should continue the war with Spain, to pay the garrisons of the cautionary towns: they stipulated, that if Spain should invade England, or the Isle of Wight, or Jersey, or Scilly, they should assist her with a body of five thousand foot and five hundred horse; and that in case she undertook any naval armament against Spain, they should join an equal number of ships to her's. By this treaty the queen was eased of an annual charge of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds.

This treaty was ratified on the eighth of August, and shortly after Elizabeth saw herself delivered from her greatest fears by the death of Philip II. king of Spain, her most powerful enemy, who, at the age of seventy-two, and in the forty-third year of his reign, died a most dreadful death, being devoured by lice, which swarmed from innumerable ulcers in all parts of his body. This haughty prince, desirous of an accommodation with his revolted subjects in the Netherlands, but disdaining to make in his own name the concessions requisite for that purpose, he transferred to his daughter, who had married the archduke Albert, the property of the Low Country provinces; but as it was not expected that that princeſs could have any poſterity, and as the reverſion, in failure of her iſſue, was ſtill reſerved to the crown of Spain, the ſtates conſidered this deed only as the change of a name, and perſiſted with equal obſtinacy in their reſiſtance to the Spaniſh arms; the other ſtates of Europe alſo made no diſtinction between the courts of Bruſſels and Madrid; and the ſecret oppoſition of France, as well as the avowed force of England, continued to operate againſt the progreſs of Albert, as it had done againſt that of Philip.

Elizabeth's ſatisfaction at this event was, however, conſiderably damped by the loſs of Burleigh, her moſt zealous and faithful counſellor. This great man had long and earneſtly, but in vain, begged from his miſtreſs ſome moments of interval between buſineſs and the grave, but death, on the fourteenth of Auguſt, gave him that repoſe which Elizabeth would not afford him: lord Burleigh was now on the verge of eighty, and though many miniſters have lived with leſs envy, none ever died with greater reputation. If the reader is deſirous to know more particulars of this great man, let him conſult Camden; but the nature of a general hiſtory will not admit them here.

The loſs of this able miniſter was ſenſibly perceived by a ſcene of diſtractions and diviſions which ſucceeded in Elizabeth's councils, eſpecially in reſpect to the affairs of Ireland, which ſeemed now to be in a deſperate ſituation, and gave riſe, about this time, to a troubleſome affair at court. The earl of Eſſex had gained a great aſcendancy in Elizabeth's councils, which was not a little increaſed by the death of lord Burleigh, who had been a conſtant bar in the way of his ambition, and who being now removed, Eſſex lorded it at court without controul. A cabinet council being called to conſider of a fit perſon to be ſent over to quiet the rebellious Iriſh, it was propoſed to diſpatch ſir William Knolles, the earl's nephew, with a commiſſion for that purpoſe; but Eſſex, jealous of ſir George Carew, who ſeemed to be a growing favourite with the queen, and thinking this would be a proper opportunity to remove him from court, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed his nephew's advancement, and urged ſir George's with great warmth. Upon this a very ſerious debate followed in the cabinet, in the preſence of the lord high-admiral, ſecretary ſir Robert Cecil, and Windebank, clerk of the ſeal. Eſſex, in the courſe of the argument, ſhewed ſuch a contempt for Elizabeth, that ſhe could not reſtrain her indignation, and his arrogant behaviour, in diſdainfully turning his back upon her, made her forget herſelf ſo far, that ſhe ſtruck him a blow on the ſide of the face: Eſſex, in a whirlwind of paſſion, raiſed by this groſs inſult, loſt all his reaſon, and, clapping his hand to his ſword, ſwore that he would not have taken ſuch an affront from her father Henry. The lord-admiral, upon this, threw himſelf between the ſovereign and her ſubject, and matters proceeded no farther at that time, only Eſſex withdrew from court, with a ſeeming reſolution never to return. Egerton, at this time lord-keeper, wrote to Eſſex (probably by Elizabeth's orders), adviſing him to ask the queen's pardon for ſo diſreſpectful and daring a behaviour to her royal perſon; but the earl, deeply ſtung with the diſhonour which he had received, wrote a very ſpirited letter to Egerton, in which he vented ſeveral warm reproaches againſt the queen: yet, notwithſtanding this additional provocation, Elizabeth's partiality was ſo great, that ſhe reinſtated him, before the end of the year, in his former favour; and her kindneſs towards him appeared rather to have acquired new force from that ſhort interruption of anger and reſentment; and nothing, indeed, but his own indiſcretion, could henceforth have ſhaken his well-eſtabliſhed credit.

About the latter end of this ſummer, Walpole, an Engliſh Jeſuit, and one Squire, both of them fooliſh ignorant fellows, conſulted about killing Elizabeth; and Squire was ſent over to England for that purpoſe, after receiving from Walpole a phial, which both of them believed contained a poiſon, that, if rubbed upon the pommel of Elizabeth's ſaddle, would kill her if ſhe touched it. Squire, who firſt acted as an agent for redeeming ſome Spaniſh priſoners in England, and then as a helper about Elizabeth's ſtables, and laſtly as a marine under the earl of Eſſex, not only beſmeared the pommel of Elizabeth's ſaddle, but alſo a chair in which Eſſex uſed to ſit, with this pretended poiſon, but all to no effect. In the mean while Walpole had advanced large ſums of money to Squire, and was mighty uneaſy about the ſucceſs of his undertaking: at laſt, being perſuaded that Squire had only made a property of him, he managed ſo that Squire was diſcovered, and arreſted. Upon examination he confeſſed all he knew, and was then tried and hanged; but, to his laſt breath, he blamed the Jeſuit, who, he ſaid, had drawn him in, contrary to his own conviction; while Walpole, in print, as confidently denied the charge.

Before the cloſe of this year, we muſt take notice of the return of that noble adventurer, the earl of Cumberland, from an expedition to the Weſt Indies, in which he had taken Porto Rico, and ſent away the inhabitants that he might convert it into an Engliſh ſettlement; but having loſt a great number of men by the bloody flux, he reimbarked his people for England, having reaped very little fruit from his expedition: in which he had plundered Lancerota, one of the Canary iſlands.

The fire of rebellion which Philip of Spain had kindled in Ireland, continued to rage violently even after his deceaſe, inſomuch that the Engliſh council were now ſenſible that nothing was left but to puſh matters with the utmoſt ſeverity: it was therefore reſolved, early in the beginning of the year 1599, to adopt the moſt vigorous meaſures againſt the rebels; and the queen caſt her eyes on Charles Blount, lord Montjoy, as a man who, though hitherto leſs accuſtomed to arms than literature, was endowed with talents equal to that undertaking. But Eſſex, who had now recovered all his wonted influence with the queen, and was deſirous of obtaining this government for himſelf, oppoſed the nomination of this lord, and drew a picture of the qualities required in a lord-deputy of Ireland in ſuch colours, that it was plain he himſelf was the original he deſcribed; and ſuch was the great credit and quality of Eſſex, that it bore down all oppoſition, and Elizabeth gave him the commiſſion of lord-deputy, and thereby put him at the head of an army of twenty thouſand men, all devoted to his ſervice: nor was this all; his commiſſion was more ample than any that had been granted to former lord-deputies, for he was empowered to continue, or end the war, as he pleaſed; even to pardon the earl

earl of Tyrone, and other rebels; which was an authority never granted to any of his predeceſſors. But it was inſerted in his commiſſion, that, laying aſide all other affairs, he ſhould apply himſelf wholly to purſue and ruin the earl of Tyrone, the chief of the rebels: a clauſe founded on his own ſpeech in council.

The earl was not long in ſetting out for his new government, and arrived at Dublin on the ſeventeenth of April. His firſt ſtep there, was, in expreſs contradiction to Elizabeth's orders, to make the earl of Southampton his lieutenant-general; the queen being diſpleaſed with that nobleman for having married without her permiſſion, which men of quality in thoſe times were accuſtomed to ask. On the other hand, inſtead of advancing directly againſt Tyrone, he waſted his army in purſuing the rebels of Munſter, whom he drove into woods and mountains; and when, at the latter end of the ſummer, he was prevailed upon to march into Ulſter, againſt the arch-rebel, he managed ſo badly that his vanguard, of fifteen hundred men, fell into an ambuſcade, and were entirely defeated. This obliged him to demand a reinforcement; but though it was granted him, he fell into the ſame error he had complained of in council, againſt others, and granted Tyrone a truce to continue from ſix weeks to ſix weeks, till May of the enſuing year; with this condition, that either party ſhould be at liberty to break it, upon giving fourteen days notice.

The queen, on receiving a letter from Eſſex with the news of this inglorious truce, was ſo highly provoked, that ſhe could not help ſuſpecting the earl of ill deſigns, and began to give ſome credit to thoſe reports which charged him with aſpiring to the crown, on a pretended right of ſucceſſion from Edward III. by his great-grand-mother, who numbered among her anceſtors Edmund de Langley, duke of York, and Thomas of Woodſtock, both ſons of that monarch.

Eſſex, underſtanding how greatly the queen was incenſed againſt him, reſolved to return to England, even without leave, to counterwork the efforts of his enemies at court; and his departure is ſaid to have been haſtened by a falſe report of the queen's being dangerouſly ill, and deſpaired of by her phyſicians. The friends of Eſſex adviſed him to land in Wales with the Iriſh army, which was at his devotion; but he rejected this counſel, and, leaving the adminiſtration of Ireland in the hands of the lord-chancellor Loftus and ſir George Carew, he ſet ſail for England on the fourth of September, with a few followers only; and on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, he threw himſelf at the queen's feet, at Nonſuch, ten miles from London, where the court had reſided for ſome days. Elizabeth was informed time enough of his arrival, to prevent any ſurprize to betray her intentions, and, according to her uſual art, received him without any emotion, and with ſome marks of favour; but after ſome upbraidings for his irregular conduct, ſhe commanded him to his own apartment till farther orders: he was afterwards committed to the cuſtody of the lord-keeper, from whence ſome of his friends propoſed to reſcue him, would he have giving his conſent.

However, this did not hinder them from exciting the people to an inſurrection in his favour, repreſenting him as the moſt accompliſhed lord England ever ſaw ſince the foundation of monarchy, and in inveighing againſt the miniſtry, not without malicious reflections on the queen's conduct, as if ſhe took no care of the Iriſh affairs, where the rebels, upon the news of Eſſex's diſgrace, and the receipt of ſupplies of ammunition, proviſions, and money, from Spain and the pope, had broke the truce, and committed great outrages on the Engliſh inhabitants.

Such proceedings extremely injured the earl, and increaſed the queen's ſuſpicions of him; and therefore, to ſatisfy the populace that his confinement was juſt and neceſſary for the public peace and ſafety, ſhe ordered his conduct to be examined in the Star-chamber, where it was unanimouſly condemned by all the privy counſellors; but no ſentence paſſed upon him, only he was more narrowly watched in his confinement at the lord-keeper's houſe.

The earl of Tyrone in the mean time, having nothing to intercept his progreſs, reduced the whole province of Ulſter to his obedience; and, being encouraged by a bull ſent from pope Clement VIII. granting him and his adherents the ſame indulgences as thoſe who fought againſt the Turks for the recovery of the Holy Land, he hoped to be ſoon maſter of the whole kingdom, had not the ſeaſonable appointment of the lord Montjoy to the place of lieutenant of Ireland, and his wiſe conduct, put a ſtop to his rebellious deſigns, and checked the inſolence of his adherents.

It was now the year 1600, and the forty-ſecond of Elizabeth's reign, when ſhe was agreeably ſurprized with overtures for a peace on the part of Philip III. king of Spain, who had ſucceeded his father Philip II. on that throne: theſe overtures were backed by the interceſſion of Henry IV. of France, and Albert, archduke of Auſtria, then in the Low Countries. The queen, willing to bleſs her ſubjects with peace, lent a ready ear to this propoſal, and left it to the French king to nominate both the time and the place for the meeting of plenipotentiaries, which was ſettled for the month of May, at Boulogne.

On the day appointed, the commiſſioners met to open the conferences: thoſe on the part of England were ſir Henry Neville, ſir John Herbert, Robert Beale, and Thomas Edmonds. The Engliſh had inſtructions, firſt, to demand the precedency, agreeable to the decrees of the councils of Baſil, Conſtance, and others, and in no wiſe to give way in this reſpect to the crown of Spain; nevertheleſs, if any diſpute ſhould ariſe thereupon, the queen of England agreed that the ſame ſhould be determined by the caſting of lots, rather than break off the treaty; and for the reſt, they were to propoſe the renewing the ancient Burgundian league, freedom of commerce, &c. The Spaniards could not be brought to quit their pretenſions to the precedency, which they inſiſted on in ſo peremptory a manner, that without it they would not enter upon treaty. Hereupon the Engliſh made a propoſition to wave the queſtion of precedency, and to tranſact the buſineſs by writing and meſſages between them; or that the treaty might be intermitted only for two months, without being entirely broke off: but all was to no purpoſe; the Spaniſh ambaſſadors finding they could not carry their point, broke off the negotiation entirely.

The ſtates of the United Provinces in the mean time were ſo far from having thoughts of a peace, that, even during the negociations, they planned a deſign to reduce the ſea-coaſt of Flanders to their ſubjection; and accordingly landing an army there, of fourteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, under the command of prince Maurice of Naſſau, aſſiſted by fifteen hundred Engliſh, headed by ſir Francis Vere and his brother Horatio; theſe forces, on the ſecond of July, gained the famous battle of Nieuport, where nine thouſand of the Spaniards were ſlain, and the victory, by the valour of the Engliſh, fell to the Dutch; for ſo nobly did our countrymen acquit themſelves on this occaſion, that out of the fifteen hundred, eight hundred were left dead on the field, and of the remaining number, moſt part were deadly wounded.

During theſe tranſactions, pope Clement VIII. who had ſucceeded Gregory XIV. not content with taking part with Elizabeth's ſubjects in Ireland, reſolved to try what miſchief he could do her at home. Accordingly he diſpatched two bulls or briefs into England; one addreſſed to the Romiſh clergy, the other to the people, in which both clergy and laity were forbid to acknowlege, after Elizabeth's death, any prince for their ſovereign, who would not ſwear not only to tolerate the Roman catholic religion, but even to ſupport it with all his power. This was in order to pave the way for the king of Spain's claim to the Engliſh crown, and the excluſion of James, whom the court of Rome hated as a proteſtant himſelf, and a friend to proteſtants.

While the popiſh faction were thus buſy in England, they were no leſs induſtrious in carrying on their helliſh plots in her ſiſter-kingdom, Scotland. There the Ruthvens, ſons of earl Gowry, beheaded in 1584, who was deſcended from Margaret, daughter of king Henry VII. and conſequently ſtood next to king James in ſucceſſion to the crown of England, conſpired to murder that prince in their own houſe at Perth, where, on ſome pretence, they had engaged the favour of his royal preſence as their gueſt. But the king eſcaped their deep-laid plot by a ſort of miracle, even in the inſtant of its execution, by the timely aſſiſtance of ſir Thomas Erſkine and John Ramſey; the two Ruthvens were killed upon the ſpot, and ſuch of their accomplices as were taken, ſuffered the puniſhment due to their atrocious villany. But it is now time to return to the domeſtic affairs of England.

The earl of Eſſex, who had been a priſoner ſix months in the houſe of the lord-keeper, began to repent in good earneſt of his follies; and the queen at laſt ſuffered herſelf to be ſo far wrought upon by the earl's ſubmiſſive letters, that ſhe permitted him to retire to his own houſe, under the free cuſtody of ſir Richard Berkeley, who had orders to watch him; the ſame time proteſting, that all that ſhe did, or deſigned, againſt him, was for his reformation, not ruin; and there is no doubt but that he might have found means to be reſtored to her royal preſence and favour; but his friends and domeſtices raiſed ſuch cabals among the people by aſſerting his innocence, and inſinuating that his life was attempted on falſe ſuggeſtions, that her majeſty, who always endeavoured to remove the prejudices of the people againſt her, was obliged to bring the earl to an open trial before her privy council, to whom ſhe added two earls, four barons, and four judges; not to condemn him to any infamous puniſhment, as guilty of treaſon or treachery, but only to convince him of having failed in his allegiance, and ſlighted her orders and inſtructions, through exceſs of vanity; in order to ſhew the prejudiced people, that ſhe in this caſe had acted with moderation, and not rigour; and that the earl of Eſſex deſerved a ſeverer puniſhment than a few months confinement in a nobleman's houſe.

The accuſations laid againſt him in this court were, "I. A contempt of the queen's orders in making the earl of Southampton general of the horſe. II. His making knights, contrary to the expreſs words of his patent. III. A neglect to purſue the rebel of Tyrone, though that was the principal end of his commiſſion. IV. A ſecret conference with that rebel. V. The grant of a truce, very prejudicial to the queen's affairs. VI. The abandoning his government without vouchſafing to ask the queen's permiſſion." Some inferences were likewiſe drawn from his diſreſpectful expreſſions in his apology, and from certain dangerous principles contained in a book dedicated to him, concerning the depoſing of king Richard II.

Eſſex, when his turn came to plead in his own behalf, renounced, with great ſubmiſſion and humility, all pretenſions to an apology, and declared his reſolution, "never, on this or any other occaſion, to have any conteſt with his ſovereign; he ſaid, that, having ſevered himſelf from the world, and abjured all ſentiments of ambition, he had no ſcruple to confeſs every failing or error into which his youth, folly, or manifold infirmities might have betrayed him; that his inward ſorrows for his offences againſt her majeſty, was ſo profound, that it exceeded all his outward croſſes and afflictions; nor did he retain any ſcruple of ſubmitting to a public confeſſion of whatever ſhe had been pleaſed to impute to him; that in his acknowlegements he retained only one reſerve, which he would never relinquiſh but with his life, the aſſertion of a loyal and unpolluted heart, of an unfeigned affection, of an earneſt deſire ever to perform to her majeſty the beſt ſervice which his poor abilities would permit; and that if his ſentiment was recognized by the council, he willingly acquieſced in any condemnation or ſentence which they could pronounce againſt him." This ſubmiſſion was uttered with ſo much eloquence, and in ſo pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from many of the ſpectators. All the privy counſellors, in giving their judgment, made no ſcruple of doing the earl juſtice with regard to the loyalty of his intentions; even Cecil, whom he believed his capital enemy, treated him with regard and humanity: and the ſentence given by the lord-keeper (to which the council aſſented) was in theſe words, "If this cauſe (ſaid he) had been heard in the Star-chamber, my ſentence muſt have been for as great a fine as ever was ſet upon any man's head in that court, together with perpetual confinement in that priſon which belongeth to a man of his quality, the Tower: but ſince we are now in another place, and in courſe of favour, my ſentence is, that the earl of Eſſex is not to execute the office of a counſellor, nor that of earl marſha lof England, nor of maſter of the ordnance; and to return to his own houſe, there to continue a priſoner till it ſhall pleaſe her majeſty to releaſe this, and all the reſt of his ſentence."

The earl received his chaſtiſement with ſo much humility, that the queen, perſuaded that his repentance was ſincere, in order to convince him that ſhe had not entirely withdrawn her countenance from him, ordered his ſentence ſhould not be recorded, and was even pleaſed to remove Berkeley from him and leave him at his full liberty; but ſhe adviſed him to be cautious of giving farther offence, and forbid him the court. Hereupon he immediately prepared to ſet out for the country, and, before his departure, ſent a moſt abject meſſage to the queen, by the lord Henry Howard, filled with all that fulſome flattery to which Elizabeth's ears were ſo accuſtomed, and with which they were never to be ſated. On this occaſion ſhe expreſſed a moſt viſible ſatisfaction, both in looks and words; however, ſhe thought fit to return the earl this anſwer, "that ſhe was not to be amuſed with empty words; but as he had ſo long abuſed her patience ſhe would take ſome time to try his ſincerity;" thereby plainly inſinuating, that, with a little perſeverance, he might appeaſe her entirely; and in ſome meaſure directing him how to frame his conduct: but the impetuous temper of Eſſex hindered him from improving the advantage his ſovereign's manifeſt partiality in his favour ſeemed to give him; on the contrary, he was ſo imprudent as to follow the intereſted and fatal counſels of his domeſtics and dependents, which ended in his final ruin.

In the courſe of this year Elizabeth treated with the kings of France and Denmark about the regulation of traffic; and ſome diſputes ſubſiſting between the Engliſh and Danes, touching the fiſhery on the coaſt of Norway, commiſſioners being appointed on both ſides, met at Bremen, but they could not agree, and the matters were left undetermined. But though the trade of England thus received ſome check in the North, it was carried on with great glory and ſucceſs in the moſt ſouthern and eaſtern parts of the globe: and Elizabeth, for the increaſe of trade, the glory of England, and the improvement of navigation, was pleaſed to erect the Eaſt India Company, towards the cloſe of this year, and endowed them with great privileges, as will appear by a peruſal of their charter of inſtitution, dated December 31, 1600, for the heads of which I refer the reader to the article Commerce, at the end of this reign.

The year 1601 began with the machinations of that reſtleſs ſpirit, Eſſex. It has been already intimated that the queen, by her behaviour on his ſubmiſſive letters, had given him great reaſon to expect a revival of the royal favour, and he was now grown ſo confident, that he became a ſuitor to her for a renewal of the farm on ſweet-wines, in which the chief part of his fortune conſiſted; and Elizabeth, whom age and infirmities had now rendered very touchy, immediately imagined that all his pretended humility was only to ſmooth his way to this grant, ſhe therefore give him a denial, attended with ſome ſlighting reflections; and Eſſex, who was always in extremes, flew from that of reſignation to that of reſentment; and he was ſo imprudent as to follow the intereſted counſels of ſeveral needy perſons, who lived upon his bounty and in his houſe, and who, on the refuſal of his petition by the queen, inſpired him with a deſign to reſtore himſelf to favour by force, and to deſtroy all his enemies about the royal perſon. That unhappy nobleman came but too readily into ſuch deſigns; and now kept open houſe for all anti-courtiers and malecontents: the chief of theſe were the earl of Southampton, ſir Chriſtopher Blount, ſir Giles Merrick, captain Henry Lea, and Henry Cuff. They fomented his anger, and inſtigated him to violent meaſures. By this time the miniſtry began to miſtruſt that Eſſex entertained very dangerous deſigs; convinced the queen of the juſtneſs of their ſuſpicions; and found means to have ſpies placed about him, who informed the court of all the earl's tranſactions.

Thoſe who ſpeak moſt favourably of the earl of Eſſex's project, ſay it was to ſeize the queen's perſon, and to drive his enemies from court, as had been practiſed in Scotland with regard to king James: but he ſeems to have had greater deſigns, ſince he ſent Henry Lea ſecretly into Scotland, to ſolicit that king's aſſiſtance; probably to place him on the throne before the queen's death: thus much is certain, that, by his letters, he put James upon the only courſe that could ruin him with Elizabeth.

He acquainted him, "that whatever appearances the Engliſh court affected, there was a fixed deſign to introduce the infanta of Spain to the ſucceſſion; that for this purpoſe all places of power, all poſts of importance, were in the hands of thoſe who were enemies to the Stuart family; that the lord high-admiral had the command of the army and navy: that Buckhurſt had the power of the purſe; Cobham was warden of the Cinque Ports; Burleigh lord-lieutenant of the North; Raleigh was governor of the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; and Carew preſident of Munſter; all of them the moſt proper places in Elizabeth's dominions for favouring the landing of the infanta. He added, that the queen was ſo impaired in her underſtanding that ſhe was incapable to act of herſelf, and was entirely guided by her miniſters; that he was therefore neceſſarily obliged to proceed openly to defeat this conſpiracy, and to ſend ambaſſadors immediately to England, to demand a public declaration of his title to the ſucceſſion, and the removal of his enemies, creatures and penſioners of Spain, from the court and council: at the ſame time he furniſhed the Scottiſh king with proofs to be uſed by the ambaſſadors, to ſhew the truth of the plot: and he concluded, that it would be neceſſary to ſupport his ambaſſadors effectually."

But this was not the only dependence of the ill-adviſed Eſſex, for he had now formed a ſelect council of malecontents, conſiſting of Southampton, ſir Charles Danvers, ſir Fernando Gorges, ſir John Davis, and John Littleton of Frankel. Theſe were men who, by their quality or accompliſhments, were well fitted to ſecond Eſſex in his views. The reſt of his friends, according to a liſt which he produced at Drury-houſe, the uſual place of his council's rendezvous, conſiſted of one hundred and twenty of the firſt noblemen and gentlemen in England. Among other criminal projects debated in this aſſembly, one was, in what manner to take up arms; whether they ſhould ſeize the palace, and force the queen to give up the enemies of Eſſex; or to ſeize the Tower of London, and bring the city to their devotion; or, finally, whether they ſhould purſue all thoſe meaſures at once? At laſt it was determined to drop the deſign of ſurprizing the court, and to make trial of his intereſt in the city. He was the more encouraged to this by being informed that ſir Francis Smith, one of the ſheriffs, was ready, with one thouſand men of the trained bands, to eſpouſe his quarrel.

While theſe treaſonable conſultations were carrying on, the government, who had private information of all that paſſed, ordered the guards to be doubled, and the lord-mayor received a meſſage from Elizabeth, commanding him to take care of the peace of the city; at the ſame time ſir Robert Sackville, ſon to Buckhurſt, the lord-treaſurer, was ſent to Eſſex-houſe, under pretence of a viſit, but in reality with a view of obſerving how matters ſtood there. Soon after Eſſex received a ſummons to attend the council, which met at the treaſurer's houſe: by this circumſtance, with the late unexpected viſit from Sackville, he was ſufficiently convinced that matters were now come to extremities; he therefore excuſed himſelf to the council, on pretence of an indiſpoſition, and he immediately diſpatched meſſages to his more intimate confederates, requeſting their advice and aſſiſtance in the preſent critical ſituation of his affairs.

The conſpirators having aſſembled at the earl's houſe, on the ſeventh of February, after many confuſed counſels, the wild project of raiſing the city was reſolved on by the majority, and Eſſex determined next day, being Sunday, to appear in the church of St. Paul, while the people were at ſermon, and, with two hundred gentlemen at his back, to demand the aſſiſtance and protection of the city of London againſt his enemies. The earls of Southampton and Rutland, the lords Parker and Monteagle, with three hundred of their friends and dependents, next morning approved of this reſolution, which probably was betrayed by ſir Fernando Gorges to Raleigh, who had a meeting together on the water. All the night between the ſeventh and eighth of February was paſſed at Eſſex-houſe in great conſternation and confuſion, and Elizabeth was punctually informed of every thing; for, early on Sunday morning, ſhe ſent the lord-keeper, the earl of Worceſter, ſir William Knolles, and the lord chief-juſtice Popham, to demand of Eſſex the meaning of his conduct. It was with difficulty they got admitance into the court-yard of the houſe, which was filled with a confuſed multitude of Eſſex's deſperate dependents, who ſurrounded their idol. In this ſtate he gave audience to the queen's meſſengers, who, on the part of the queen, offered him all reaſonable ſatisfaction, if he was unjuſtly aggrieved. Eſſex, in anſwer, repeated all his complaints, not forgetting that his life had been ſought by his enemies, who endeavoured to murder him in his bed, and that letters had been counterfeited under his hand and ſeal; and that all he did was only in ſelf-defence. While they were thus arguing, they were interrupted by a diſreſpectful clamour of the multitude, who, after groſly reviling them, even threatened them with death; and Eſſex turning from them into another room, the apartment in which they were was immediately locked, and a guard ſet upon their perſons.

Such an act of violence upon the queen's meſſengers was drawing the ſword of rebellion and throwing away the ſcabbard: Eſſex was now ſtrangely diſconcerted; he was at once loſt to all reſolution, and to all conduct; and putting himſelf at the head of about two hundred ill-armed followers, ruſhed into the ſtreets, crying out "For the queen! for the queen! my life is in danger!" and perceiving that the people only crouded to ſee him paſs, without joining in his attempt, he cried, "Arm, my friends, or you can do me no good." But all was in vain; and even the ſheriff, of whoſe aid he conceived ſuch expectations, no ſooner ſaw him advancing towards his houſe, in Fenchurch-ſtreet, but he withdrew himſelf by a back-door to the lord-mayor: which diſappointment convinced the earl that his affairs were deſperate. During the time he continued at the ſheriff's houſe, in a ſtate of uncertainty how to act, word was brought him, that an hearld and Thomas, lord Burleigh, had proclaimed him a traitor in one of the wards of the city, and that the earl of Cumberland had done the ſame in another. He then quitted the ſheriff's houſe, and proclaimed in the ſtreets, as he ſtrolled with his little army, "that England was going to be delivered to the infanta of Spain;" and conjured the inhabitants to take arms for the prevention of ſo great a misfortune. But ſeeing no body preparing to aſſiſt him, and hearing withal that the lord-admiral was marching againſt him with a ſtrong party, he reſolved to return to his own houſe, had he not been intercepted by ſir John Leveſon, and his company of ſoldiers, who had ſecured the poſt at Ludgate. Here the earl gave orders to Gorges to go and releaſe the three counſellors from their confinement in Drury-houſe, and retired back to St. Paul's: however, finding no way to retreat in ſafety through the ſtreets, which, by the care of the biſhop of London, were by this time chained and guarded by ſoldiers, he ordered Blount to begin the attack, and to force a paſſage, and ſeconded him with great reſolution, ſword in hand; in which ſkirmiſh Blount was taken priſoner, and the earl was repulſed and ſhot through the hat, which obliged him to take boat at Queenhithe, and retire to his own houſe near Temple Bar, where Devereux-court and Eſſex-ſtreet now ſtand.

He was now reduced to deſpair, and the lord-admiral, who ſurrounded his houſe with a large body of the guards, ſummoning him to ſurrender, he appeared determined, by the advice of the lord Sandys, to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity, and rather periſh like a brave man, ſword in hand, than by the ſtroke of a baſe-born executioner. But, after ſome parly, and after demanding in vain firſt hoſtages, then conditions from thoſe without, he ſurrendered at diſcretion, requeſting only civil treatment and a fair and impartial hearing. He and Southampton were immediately conveyed over the water to the archbiſhop of Canterbury's palace, at Lambeth, from whence they were next day ſent to the Tower, and his friends were confined in other priſons.

The queen, who, during all this commotion, had behaved with admirable tranquility and preſence of mind, ſoon gave orders for the trial of the moſt conſiderable of the criminals. The earls of Eſſex and Southampton were arraigned on the nineteenth of February, before a jury of twenty-five peers, the lord-treaſurer Buckhurſt acting as lord high-ſteward. The guilt of the priſoners was too apparent to admit of any doubt; and, beſides the inſurrection known to every body, the treaſonable conferences at Drury-houſe were proved by undoubted evidence: ſir Fernando Gorges was produced in court; the confeſſions of the earl of Rutland, of the lords Cromwell, Sandys, and Monteagle, of Danvers, Blount, and Davis, were only read to the peers, according to the practice of that age: Eſſex's beſt friends were ſcandalized at his aſſurance in inſiſting ſo poſitively on his innocence, and the goodneſs of his intentions, and ſtill more at his vindictive diſpoſition in accuſing, without appearance of reaſon, ſecretary Cecil as a partizan of the infanta's title. The ſecretary, who had expected this charge, ſtepped into the court, and challenged Eſſex to produce his authority, which, on examination, was found extremely weak and frivolous. When ſentence was pronounced, Eſſex ſpoke like a man who laid his account to die; but he added, he ſhould be ſorry if he was repeſented to the queen as a perſon that deſpiſed her clemency, though he would not be believed to make any cringing ſubmiſſions to attain it. Southampton's behaviour was more mild and ſubmiſſive; he intreated the good offices of the peers in ſo modeſt and becoming a manner, as excited compaſſion in every one.

Eſſex, after condemnation, was viſited by that ſuperſtitious devotion which always poſſeſſed his mind in all his diſgraces. He was terrified almoſt into deſpair by the ghoſtly remonſtrances of his own chaplain, Aſhton, a fanatic preacher: he was reconciled to Cecil and the reſt of his adverſaries, and made a full confeſſion of his conſpiracy; he even gave the particulars of all his friendſhips and correſpondences, in writing under his own hand: and upon his diſcoveries ſir Henry Neville, Elizabeth's reſident in France, was ſent for over, and committed; as the lord Montjoy, whom he likewiſe accuſed, would have been, had not the greatneſs of his ſervices in Ireland, and perhaps the fear of rendering him deſperate, prevailed with Elizabeth to ſacrifice her reſentment to the public good.

It was natural for Elizabeth to have ſome remorſe about taking off the head of a nobleman like Eſſex, who had done her ſignal ſervices, who had been ſo lately the pride of her court, and the ornament of her kingdom; but, after all the ridiculous and romantic ſtories of her paſſion for him, it does not appear that ſhe had ever conſidered Eſſex in any other light than as being a man of great birth and greater merit: but as he had now forfeited all he could claim from his former ſervices, the ſenſe of her own dignity, and the danger in which ſhe thought herſelf, ſhould he live, at laſt got the better of all conſiderations, and ſhe ſent, by the lord Darcy, a warrant, that he ſhould die on the twenty-fifth of February, according to his own requeſt, in the Tower court-yard, attended by Aſhton a diſſenting miniſter, and two divines of the church of England. Several noblemen, by Elizabeth's order, were preſent on the ſcaffold at the execution, with ſome of the aldermen of London, and chief gentlemen about court; among others Raleigh, the avowed enemy and rival of Eſſex, appeared; but this was thought ſo indecent, that he was prevailed upon to withdraw to ſome diſtance, whence he ſaw the only head in Europe better than his own, ſtruck off. The behaviour of Eſſex in his laſt moments was full of penitence and contrition; but he had the misfortune to have a bungling executioner. He died before he was full thirty-ſix years of age.

Robert Devereux, earl of Eſſex, was a nobleman poſſeſſed of excellent and amiable qualities; brave, liberal, and humane; a patron of learning, in which he himſelf held a conſiderable rank: he was a warm friend, and an open enemy. His foibles were vanity, ambition, and an impetuoſity of temper, to which he fell a ſacrifice. His accomplices, Meyrick, and Cuffe, were executed, on the fifteenth of March, at Tyburn: ſir Charles Danvers, and ſir Chriſtopher Blount were beheaded; Littleton, Orel, and ſir Edward Baintoun were tried and condemned; but the firſt dying in priſon, the others were pardoned. The earl of Southampton was detained in the Tower till the acceſſion of king James, by whom he was ſet at liberty, and reſtored in blood by act of parliament.

The king of Scotland, when he heard of the earl's being apprehended, had diſpatched the earl of Marr, and the abbot of Kinloſs, as his ambaſſadors to the court of England; and, by the notes with which they were furniſhed, we may conclude that he was intereſted in ſome project which did not take effect: but the earl being executed before their arrival, they pretended that their errand was to congratulate her majeſty upon her happy ſucceſs in quelling the late audacious attempt. Elizabeth affected to take the compliment in good part, and was even prevailed upon to add two thouſand pounds a year to their maſter's penſion. During their reſidence in England they managed his affairs ſo dexterouſly, that the majority of the council was won over to his intereſt, and among the reſt ſecretary Cecil, who from this period correſponded with James by means of the lord Henry Howard. About this time Oſtend was inveſted by the archduke Albert, and defended with incredible valour by ſir Francis Vere, at the head of the Engliſh garriſon. Henry IV. of France repairing to Calais, Elizabeth ſent ſir Thomas Edmonds, with a compliment to that prince; who returned it by the hands of the marſhals de Biron, de Lavardin, and the duke d'Aumont. Theſe noblemen were received at the court of England with great magnificence; and, though no part of their negociation tranſpired, are ſaid to have conferred with her majeſty upon a ſcheme which Henry had formed againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

Upon Elizabeth's return from a progreſs which ſhe had made during the ſummer, ſhe convoked a parliament, which met on the twenty-ſeventh of October; and Egerton, lord-keeper of the great-ſeal, having given them to underſtand, that the wars in Flanders and Ireland had drained her majeſty's Exchquer, notwithſtanding every frugal method had been adopted, the commons indulged her with a more conſiderable ſupply than had ever been granted ſince her acceſſion. In conſideration of this ſupply, ſhe iſſued a proclamation for repealing certain monopolies of ſalt, oil, ſtarch, and other commodities, which were a grievous burden upon the people: the commons thereupon deputed eighty of their body, to preſent their humble thanks for this inſtance of her parental regard, which was delivered by Crook, the recorder of London, who had been choſen ſpeaker, in a fulſome ſpeech, which, in its flattery, approached near to blaſphemy. The commons then paſſed an act for the relief of the poor; and, having made ſome other laws of public utility, were diſſolved in the month of December.

In the mean time the queen was not without her troubles in Ireland. The Spaniards continuing their aid to the Iriſh rebels, ſent them freſh ſuccours under don Juan d'Aquila, who landed at Kinſale, with a manifeſto, ſetting forth, "that queen Elizabeth had been depoſed by the pope; that her ſubjects were, by the ſame power, abſolved from their oath of allegiance; and that he was come to deliver them from the jaws of the devil." The Spaniards took the town; but, after a ſhort ſiege by the lord-deputy, and having the mortification of ſeeing the rebel earl of Tyrone utterly routed in attempting to raiſe the ſiege, the Spaniſh general was glad to ſurrender, on condition that he might reimbark with the remainder of his men for Spain, which he did with all expedition, the capitulation being ſigned, and the place given up to the Engliſh, on the ſecond of January, 1602. From this time the earl of Tyrone's affairs daily declined, which was chiefly owing to the lord-deputy's cloſe purſuit of him, without giving him the leaſt opportunity to recruit or breathe.

Spaniards

The remaining events of this reign are neither very numerous nor important. The queen, finding that the Spaniards had involved her in ſo much trouble, by fomenting and aſſiſting the Iriſh rebellion, reſolved to give them employment at home; and, in the ſpring of the year 1602, ſhe fitted out a ſquadron of nine ſhips, under ſir Richard Leveſon, admiral, and ſir William Monſon, vice-admiral, whom ſhe ſent on an expedition to the coaſt of Spain. The admiral, with part of the ſquadron, met the galleons, loaded with treaſure, but was not ſtrong enough to attack them; the vice-admiral alſo fell in with ſome very rich ſhips, but they eſcaped for a like reaſon: and theſe two brave officers, that their expedition might not be entirely fruitleſs, hereupon reſolved to attack the harbour of Coimbra, in Portugal, where they received intelligence that a very rich carrack had taken ſhelter. The harbour was defended by a caſtle; there were eleven gallies ſtationed in it, and the militia of the country, to the number, as was believed, of twenty thouſand men, appeared in arms on ſhore: yet, notwithſtanding theſe obſtacles, and others derived from the winds and tides, the Engliſh ſquadron broke into the harbour, diſmounted the guns of the caſtle, ſunk, burned, or put to flight the gallies, and obliged the carrack to ſurrender. They brought her home to England, and ſhe was valued at a million of ducats: a ſenſible loſs to the Spaniards, and a ſupply ſtill more conſiderable to Elizabeth.

In the beginning of this year, an ambaſſador extraordinary arriving from France, in order to regulate the navigation, which had been interrupted on both ſides by depredations, the queen appointed commiſſioners to treat upon the ſubject, and all difficulties were compromiſed. The Engliſh miniſter at Paris had, in the name of his miſtreſs, made a propoſal to Henry of a league offenſive and defenſive, in order to drive the Spaniards entirely out of the Low Countries; but the finances of the French king were ſo diſordered, and his kingdom ſo filled with malecontents, that he could not engage in an enterprize of ſuch importance. The arch-duke Albert had made ſome advances towards a peace with Elizabeth, but ſhe rejected them, leſt the ſtates of the United Provinces ſhould be tempted to throw themſelves into the arms of France: that they might be encouraged to maintain the war, ſhe ſuſpended their annual payment for two years, and allowed them to raiſe ſeven thouſand men in England.

About this time a rancorous quarrel broke out between the Jeſuits and the popiſh ſecular clergy in England, the original of which was as follows: one Blackwell, a man wholly at the devotion of the Jeſuits, had by them been ſet over the ſeculars as their ſuperior, who oppreſſed them in the moſt cruel manner; and when they appealed for redreſs to the pope, cauſed them to be repreſented as ſchiſmatics and heretics. Bitter pamphlets were publiſhed on both ſides: whether this contention was ſerious, or a ſcheme to lull the government into ſecurity, while ſome great blow was preparing, is hard to ſay; it is however certain that the biſhop of London politicly fomented this diviſion, which at length roſe to ſuch an height, that the queen and her council finding them dangerous to the commonwealth, both parties were, by public proclamation, commanded to depart the kingdom forthwith. It was at this juncture that Henry IV. of France ordered the marſhal de Biron to be beheaded, for having conſpired, with other noblemen, to diſmember the French monarchy. The marſhal de Bouillon, who was likewiſe concerned in the conſpiracy, retired to Germany, where he ſolicited Elizabeth's interceſſion with his maſter; and ſhe, by her ambaſſador, hinted that this might be a Spaniſh ſtratagem, to infeſt him with ſuſpicions of his beſt ſubjects. But that prince told the Engliſh ambaſſador, his miſtreſs had a better opinion of Bouillon than he deſerved, inaſmuch as he had actually engaged in the conſpiracy of Eſſex, againſt her own perſon and dignity.

Towards the cloſe of this year the affairs of Ireland, in conſequence of Tyrone's defeat, and the expulſion of the Spaniards, haſtened to a ſettlement, and by the vigilance and activity of Montjoy, the lord-lieutenant, that arch-rebel and his friends were driven to the utmoſt extremity; and many of them, after skulking like wild beaſts in woods and moraſſes, ſubmitted to mercy, and received ſuch conditions as the lord-deputy was pleaſed to impoſe on them, which were ſo mild and generous, that Tyrone himſelf, ſeeing all hopes, either of ſucceeding or eſcaping, vaniſh, applied in the moſt abject ſtrain both to Elizabeth and the deputy for pardon. The queen was for a long time obſtinately bent not to ſhew him the leaſt favour; but being continually teized by her council, who repreſented the immenſe expence ſhe was at in keeping troops in Ireland to follow the rebels, and this clemency would be an infallible means of making every thing quiet, ſhe was at laſt prevailed upon to ſign his pardon, and ſend it to the lord Montjoy, with power to grant it upon certain conditions, mentioned in his inſtructions: but this ſhe did with ſo much reluctance, that it was deemed by many to be the occaſion of that illneſs whereof ſhe died. The terms to which the lord-deputy was reſtrained, were ſuch as the council apprehended Tyrone would not accept; but his neceſſities were ſo extreme, that, on the thirteenth of March, 1603, he came to Mellefont, where he preſented himſelf upon his knees before the lord-deputy, who received him with great pomp, ſurrounded by his principal officers, and ſeated in a chair of ſtate. Tyrone then addreſſed himſelf in a ſubmiſſive ſpeech to the lord-deputy, who thinking that he ſtood too much upon his juſtification, ordered him to be ſilent, and brought him with him under confinement to Dublin. O'Rourk, another active chief in the late inſurrections, ſurrendered about a month after; and thus this dreadful rebellion, which had raged in Ireland for eight years together, and had coſt the queen near four hundred thouſand pounds a year, was entirely ſupreſſed, and the whole kingdom reduced to a ſtate of ſub-jection and tranquility. As for Tyrone, the lord-deputy kept him under a ſtrict guard in the caſtle of Dublin, with an intention of preſenting him to Elizabeth; but in this he was diſappointed by the death of that glorious princeſs, whoſe eyes we are now to cloſe.

She had, in general, been bleſſed with a very good ſtate of health, and notwithſtanding her age (near ſeventy) was continually hunting, or on horſeback, without minding the wind, weather, or other inconveniences, though ſhe always expreſſed a great fondneſs for life. It was about the middle of November, 1602, that ſhe began to feel herſelf decay, though ſhe affected not to let it appear, and would have her inauguration-day (the ſeventeenth of November) kept as uſual, with feaſting and great pomp. A ſlight cold confined her for a few days in the following months, but otherwiſe ſhe ſeemed to be in good health.

On the thirty-firſt of January, 1603, ſhe removed, in a very ſtormy day, from Weſtminſter to Richmond. Here ſhe began to grow worſe, and was obſerved to be continually in tears, and labouring with ſome extraordinary affliction. She had uſed to be particularly careful of her health, but now ſhe would take nothing, and obſtinately refuſed all the remedies preſcribed by her phyſicians. When the archbiſhop of Canterbury, Cecil, and others of her council, begged on their knees, that ſhe would take what was neceſſary for her ſuſtenance and relief, ſhe deſired them, in an angry tone, to let her die in quiet, as ſhe had reſolved.

All about her agreed that a deep melancholy, too ſtrong to be either aſſwaged or diverted, was the cauſe of her illneſs; but they differed much in their opinions about the occaſion of that melancholy: ſome aſcribed it to the aſſiduity which ſhe had remarked in certain of her counſellors, whom ſhe had loaded with favours, in making their court to the king of Scotland, her preſumptive heir, and ſome bitter expreſſions were heard to burſt from her lips, as if ſhe had thought herſelf helpleſs, abandoned, and betrayed by all: many imputed it to her grief for having put the earl of Eſſex to death. There is no doubt but ſhe had felt a ſenſible regret for the loſs of that great man; but it is not ſo eaſy to account how her grief came to break out ſo violently at this time: and though this may be reaſonably thought owing to the weakneſs of her body diſabling her mind to act with its former vigour, yet it is remarkable that it broke out on a ſudden, after the death of the counteſs of Nottingham (which happened about Chriſtmas laſt year), and her ſigning the pardon of Tyrone. Theſe were coinciding events, and, without having recourſe to the anecdote related by Oſborne*, it may very well be ſuppoſed, that when Elizabeth found the ſuggeſtions of Eſſex's enemies, as if he had engaged in a traitorous combination with Tyrone, which was the chief reaſon of her putting the former to death, for what might elſe have been rather termed a riot than a rebellion, to be mere ſlanders; and that thoſe very men had, after an infinite profuſion of the blood and treaſures of her ſubjects, obliged her to grant that rebel pardon, it could not but inflame her reſentment at being deceived, and enhance her grief for the loſs of a man ſo highly eſteemed as ſhe did Eſſex†.

Be that as it might, her anxiety of mind at laſt had ſo long preyed upon her frail body, that her end was viſibly approaching, and the council had many ſerious deliberations concerning the ſucceſſion. Though all the counſellors in general were firmly attached to James, yet they knew not what the ſecret intrigues of the popiſh and puritan factions might produce, and therefore reaſonably thought, that Elizabeth's own declaration in favour of James would give vaſt ſtrength to his title; but, leſt ſhe had been too weak to expreſs herſelf, the lord-admiral declared, that before ſhe left Weſtminſter, ſhe had, as it were foreſeeing her own death, in private ſaid to him, "My throne hath always been filled by a ſucceſſion of princes, and ought only to go to my next heir." It was then thought proper, that the lord-admiral, the lord-keeper, and ſecretary Cecil ſhould, in the name of the council, intreat her to ſignify her laſt will on that head. They found her almoſt ſpeechleſs, but ſhe had ſtrength enough to repeat the meaning of her former orders to the lord-admiral, "that ſhe had filled a royal throne, and deſired to have a royal ſucceſſor." Cecil thought that this declaration was not explicit enough, and urged her to a farther explanation: "I deſire (ſaid ſhe) that a king ſhould ſucceed me, and who ſhould that king be, but my neareſt kinſman, the king of Scotland?" And when theſe noblemen, on the day before her death, when her ſpeech had failed, put her in mind of what ſhe had told them, and deſiring her, in preſence of other lords of the council, to ſhew ſome ſign of confirming what ſhe had ſaid to them, ſhe accordingly put her hand to her head, in token of her approbation.

Although there was no great danger of any oppoſition being made to the Scottiſh ſucceſſion, nevertheleſs the council thought expedient to take

* This fact, which has long been rejected by hiſtorians as romantic, but which late diſcoveries ſeem to have confirmed, was as follows.

The earl of Eſſex, after his return from the fortunate expedition againſt Cadiz, obſerving the increaſe of the queen's fond attachment to him, took occaſion to regret, that the neceſſity of her ſervice required him often to be abſent from her perſon, and expoſed him to all thoſe ill offices which his enemies, more aſſiduous in their attendance, could practiſe againſt him; ſhe was moved with his tender jealouſy, and, making him the preſent of a ring, deſired him to keep that pledge of her affection; aſſured him, that in whatever diſgrace he ſhould fall, whatever prejudices ſhe might be induced to entertain againſt him, yet if he ſent her that ring, ſhe would, immediately upon ſight of it recollect her former tenderneſs, would afford him again a hearing, and would lend a favourable ear to his apology. Eſſex, notwithſtanding all his misfortunes, reſerved this precious gift to the laſt extremity; but, after his trial and condemnation, he reſolved to try the experiment, and he committed the ring to the counteſs of Nottingham, whom he deſired to deliver it to the queen. The counteſs was prevailed on by her huſband, who was Eſſex's capital enemy, not to execute the commiſſion; and Elizabeth, who ſtill expected that her favourite would make the laſt appeal to her tenderneſs, and who aſcribed the neglect of it to his obſtinacy, was, after much delay, and after many internal combats, puſhed by reſentment and policy to ſign the warrant for his execution. The counteſs of Nottingham falling into ſickneſs, and finding herſelf approaching towards her end, was ſeized with remorſe for her conduct, and having obtained a viſit from the queen, ſhe craved her pardon, and revealed to her the fatal ſecret: the queen, aſtoniſhed with this incident, burſt into a furious paſſion; ſhe ſhook the dying counteſs in her bed, and crying to her "that God might forgive her, but ſhe never could," broke from her, and thenceforth reſigned herſelf over to the deepeſt and moſt incurable melancholy.

See the proofs of this remarkable fact collected in Birch's Negociations, p. 206. and Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 481, 505, 506, &c.

† Carte, vol. iii. p. 696, 697.

every precaution for ſecuring the peace and ſafety of the kingdom: great numbers of idle and ſuſpected perſons, who ſwarmed about the metropolis were ſeized, and ſent to Holland for the Dutch ſervice; the fleet, which lay ready equipped, was ordered to guard the mouth of the Thames; the ſea-ports were all ſhut; and the lady Arabella Stuart was put into cuſtody. It was reſolved likewiſe to ſummon all the peers to town, and, if any commotion happened on the queen's death, to make the earl of Northumberland general of the forces. The queen in the mean time was in a deplorable condition, ſitting dreſſed and penſive ten days, on cuſhions, without an hour's reſt all the time, till, on the twenty-firſt of March, ſhe was put into bed by force, and, though ſhe then ſeemed to be better, ſhe lay on her ſide without ſpeaking to or regarding any body, only ſhe cauſed ſome meditations to be read to her, particularly thoſe of M. du Pleſſis. The archbiſhop of Canterbury attending her on this occaſion, ſhe heard his exhortations, and joined him in prayer, with great humility and devotion. On the twenty-third of that month ſhe was ſpeechleſs all the day; and having in the night got a continued ſleep of five hours, waked only to die in the calmeſt manner and almoſt inſenſibly, about two o'clock the next morning, in the ſeventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign. Her corpſe, without being opened or embalmed, was removed, on the twenty-eighth of March, from Richmond to Whitehall; but, on the pretence of her having given orders that it ſhould not be cut up, or ſeen, after her deceaſe, no body was ſuffered to ſee it, which occaſioned ſome rumours among the people that hated her miniſters, as if her death had been cauſed by violence. It was interred on Thurſday the twenty-eighth of April, in the chapel of Henry VII. in Weſtminſter abbey, with great magnificence, king James having given orders that no expence ſhould be ſpared in her funeral.

The beſt character that can be drawn of this princeſs is to be learned from the ſtory of her life; and to add a multiplicity of general reflections upon her political conduct, after having already explained it in the preceding pages, would be tireſome and uninſtructive to the reader: let it ſuffice then to obſerve, that there are few great perſonages in hiſtory who have been more expoſed to the calumnies of enemies, and more bedaubed by the adulation of friends than queen Elizabeth; and yet, there is ſcarce any whoſe reputation has been more certainly determined by poſterity. Her vigour, her conſtancy, her magnanimity, her penetration, vigilance, and addreſs, are allowed to merit the higheſt praiſes, and appear not to have been ſurpaſſed by any perſon who ever filled a throne; at the ſame time that we acknowlege ſhe was often too rigorous, too imperious towards her dependents, and too little regardful of the conſtitution, or concerned for the liberties and privileges of her ſubjects: her prerogative, like the rod of Aaron, ſwallowed up whatever came in competition with it; and ſhe thought that her people were entitled to no more liberty than their anceſtors enjoyed. She was remarkably happy in the choice of her ſtateſmen and generals, whom ſhe directed by her good ſenſe, and animated by her high ſpirit. Her abilities for government were never queſtioned by any one; her application to public buſineſs was extraordinary; but her prudence was in many caſes the effect of low cunning, and of the diffidence or jealouſy of her nature; and her meaſures were often ſuch as morality could not approve, however politics might repreſent them as neceſſary.

Elizabeth is deſcribed by thoſe who knew her, to have been as to her perſon handſome, well-made, ſtrongly limbed, rather tall than middle-ſized, her forehead high and round, her eyes brown and lively, her complexion fair, her hair of a lightiſh yellow, her fingers long and taper, her voice clear and ſhrill: ſhe had a fine ſet of teeth, and her outward form was much ſet off by an air that was very agreeable. She was fond of being thought learned: ſhe ſpoke with great fluency the Greek, Latin, Italian, and French languages, underſtood the Spaniſh, and tranſlated ſeveral of the ancient writers with judgment and fidelity. Whether ſhe died a virgin was a problem much handled in thoſe days; but, upon the whole, there appears to be very good grounds for the vulgar report, that ſhe had about her perſon ſome imperfections, that rendered her very unfit for marriage. She was a great encourager of learning and learned men, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in its place. She was the great bulwark of the proteſtant religion. Her predominant paſſions were jealouſy and avarice, the former of which hurried her, in ſome caſes, into acts of tyrannic cruelty. Her vanity appeared in her love of flattery, which ſhe greedily ſwallowed even when it was fulſome and abſurd; and in the variety and richneſs of her apparel, which ſhe continued to wear long after her declining years ſeemed to require more gravity and decency.

Her cruelty and jealouſy were too conſpicuous in the fate of the duke of Norfolk, and Mary, queen of Scots. Of avarice and parſimony ſhe exhibited numberleſs proofs, in extorting preſents from noblemen, on pretence of viſiting them at their own houſes; in allowing her ambaſſadors in foreign countries to live at their own expence, until ſome of them were ruined; and in carrying on the war againſt Spain at the charge of private adventurers. When ſhe died, beſides a vaſt quantity of plate and jewels, ſhe left three thouſand robes, none of which ſhe had the liberality to diſtribute amongſt her ſervants. She raiſed an hundred thouſand crowns yearly, by granting licences to Roman catholics and non-conformiſts, exempting them from the penalty inflicted by the law upon thoſe who did not regularly attend divine worſhip. She exacted every New-year's day above ſixty thouſand crowns, in gifts from her dependents. She entertained ſpies in all the houſes of the nobility; encouraged informers; introduced the uſe of torture; enacted a great number of penal laws; and, by the terror of her ſuſpicion, which was generally fatal to the object, drove many gentlemen into exile, that ſhe might proſecute them to confiſcation, and enjoy their eſtates. Her choleric diſpoſition prompted her often to revile foreign ambaſſadors in the groſſeſt terms; to inſult her miniſters and ſubjects in the moſt abuſive language; and even to chaſtize her female attendants with her own hand. On ſuch occaſions ſhe uſed to utter oaths and imprecations in the moſt vulgar ſtyle: and the ladies of her court did not ſcruple to follow her example. Her great art conſiſted in cajoling her parliament and people with flattering careſſes; the ſincerity of which they could not doubt, when they found themſelves rich and happy under her adminiſtration. But, as Mr. Hume very juſtly obſerves, in his hiſtory of this great princeſs, the true method of eſtimating her merit, is to conſider her merely as a rational being, placed in authority, and entruſted with the government of mankind; and then, however difficult we may find it to reconcile our fancy to her in other reſpects, her qualities as a ſovereign, though with ſome conſiderable exceptions, are the object of undiſputed applauſe and approbation.

Remarkable Occurrences.

In her third year, on the fifteenth of June, the ſpire of St. Paul's cathedral in London, the timber part of which was two hundred and ſixty feet high, and the roof ſeven hundred and twenty feet long and one hundred and thirty broad, were burnt by lightening, as it was then thought; but a plumber confeſſed, on his death-bed, that it was ſet on fire by his careleſſneſs, in leaving a pan of coals in the ſteeple when he went to dinner.

In her ſeventh year, on the twenty firſt of December, began a froſt, ſo extreme, that on New-year's day people paſſed over the Thames on foot; yet this great froſt began to thaw on the third of January at night, and by the fifth there was no ice to be ſeen at all.

In her thirteenth year a prodigious earthquake happened in the eaſt parts of Herefordſhire; and on the ſeventeenth of February, at ſix o'clock in the evening, Marcley-hill, in the neighbourhood of Hereford city, was moved from the place where it ſtood, and continued in motion from Saturday till Monday following, when it reſted. It carried along the trees, hedges, and ſheep, that grew and fed upon its ſurface, overturned Kynaſton chapel, which ſtood in its way, left an opening where it ſtood, forty feet in depth and eight ells in length, and formed a large hill twelve fathoms high, in the place where it reſted.

In her ſixteenth year was a great dearth, ſo that wheat ſold for five and ſix ſhillings a buſhel, and other things in proportion: and in her ſeventeenth year the Thames ebbed and flowed twice in an hour.

In her twenty-ſixth year, being 1588, the like prodigy happened in Dorſetſhire, as in the year 1571 had happened in Herefordſhire; a field of three acres, in Blackmore, with the trees and fences, moved from its place, and paſſed over another field, travelling in the highway to Hearn, where it reſted.

In her thirty-ſixth year was a great plague in London and its ſuburbs, which ſwept off ſeventeen thouſand eight hundred and ninety ſouls.

Of the State of Religion, Learning, Laws, Arts and Sciences, Commerce, Public Revenues, &c. in England, from the Acceſſion of Henry VIII. to the Death of Queen Elizabeth. Including a Period of Ninety-four Years, viz. from A. D. 1509 to A. D. 1603.

Of RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

WE have upon many occaſions, in the courſe of this hiſtory, ſhewn what dreadful blows the kings and parliaments of England had given to the papal power in this country, and how greatly the doctrines of Wickliff, and of other reformers, even before a general reformation was thought of, had diſpoſed the minds of the people to what followed. The kings of England, however, by the tameneſs of thoſe whoſe titles were diſputed, and who were therefore obliged to keep well with the ſee of Rome, were ſtripped of many of their prerogatives over churchmen by the papal encroachments; but ſtill a door was open for reſuming them, and for reinforcing all the acts of parliament on that head: but even at the time of Henry VIII's acceſſion he had ſome ſuperiorities over the clergy, which no other prince in Europe beſides himſelf enjoyed: Amongſt others, in the caſe of a vacancy of a biſhopric, the crown ſeized all the temporalities, and recommend to the ſee of Rome the perſon who was to ſucceed; upon the neceſſary inſtruments for this ſucceſſion being expedited at Rome, the biſhop elect was obliged, before the king, or his commiſſioners, to renounce every clauſe in thoſe inſtruments that was inconſiſtent with the prerogative of the crown or the laws of the land, and to take an oath of fidelity and allegiance to the ſovereign.

Had not Henry VIII. immediately after his acceſſion, been intoxicated with the flattery of the popes and clergy, he might have made an excellent uſe of this part of his prerogative, by filling the ſees of England with men of ſenſe and virtue, who might in time have reſtored to the crown its prerogatives, and to the church its purity. But Henry was ſo far from this, that, during the firſt eighteen years of his reign, he acted in ſpiritual matters as an humble dependent on the Roman pontiff. He drew his pen in defence of the church of Rome, and ſent deputies to the Lateran council, which had been convoked in oppoſition to that of Piſa: the pope, delighted with this inſtance of the Engliſh monarch's attachment to his cauſe, rewarded him with the pompous title of Defender of the Faith.

This, and other compliments, induced Henry to order all Luther's books to be called in; and a commiſſion for that purpoſe was iſſued by Wolſey, by virtue of his legatine power, in the year 1521. In the ſame commiſſion forty-two articles were excerpted from Luther's doctrine, and condemned: and in the year 1523 Henry granted a privilege for printing biſhop Fiſher's book againſt Luther; and he every day gave freſh proofs of his great zeal for the ſee of Rome. The pope imputed all this to the good offices of Wolſey, whoſe character the reader has has already ſeen in the civil part of this hiſtory. No honour which the court of Rome could deviſe were thought too great for that ambitious cardinal, who cunningly made a property of each court, and indeed of all the courts of Europe. With his maſter he pleaded his vaſt influence with the pope; and the pope was laviſh of honours upon him for his influence with his maſter; and the king of France with the Imperial court by turns courted and paid him for his influence with both. But the truth is, that Wolſey had great things in view, even from the commencement of his adminiſtration, for encreaſing the power of the crown at the expence of the church's poſſeſſions. This ſcheme could not be effected but under the pretext of the vaſt diſſolution of morals which had crept in among the clergy, of which Wolſey made moſt dreadful repreſentations at the court of Rome: this drew from the pope a bull, impowering Wolſey to viſit all monaſteries, and all the clergy of England, and to diſpenſe with all laws of the church for one whole year after the date of the bull. This bull in effect cancelled all the other powers of the clergy in England, and raiſed Wolſey to be pope in his own country.

Being then ſeated, as he thought, firmly in his power, he began to ſhew an extraordinary zeal againſt the doctrines of Luther, or the Reformation. In the year 1519, ſix men and one woman were burned at Coventry, for teaching their children the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Apoſtles Creed, in the vulgar tongue. Severities of the ſame nature were practiſed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom where the Reformation began to gain ground: this, however, was the only practice in which the cardinal and the clergy could agree. He aſſumed a power of calling convocations, and laying them under contribution; and when they complained of theſe encroachments, he threatened them with a general viſitation. He was ſupported in theſe arbitrary proceedings by the king, who reaped the fruits of his exaction, and began to hold the perſons of the clergy in contempt, on account of their ignorance and profligacy. Nevertheleſs, he ſtill retained his attachment to the old religion: when Luther, at the deſire of his patron, the elector of Saxony, wrote a letter to the king of England, excuſing the acrimony and abuſe with which he had treated him in his writings, Henry, in his anſwer, retorted the other's virulence in ſarcaſms upon his doctrine; and refuſed to forgive him upon any other terms than thoſe of retracting his errors, renouncing his wife, and retiring from the world to paſs the remainder of his days in penance and mortification. It appears, by a letter from cardinal Wolſey to the biſhop of Wincheſter, that the firſt had formed a plan for the reformation of the clergy; and pope Adrian was ſo well diſpoſed in this particular, that the German princes were encouraged to preſent him with the grievances of the church, digeſted into one hundred articles, containing the luxury, prophaneneſs, avarice, ſuperſtition, and pride of the eccleſiaſtics; but the good effects of the pope's moderation were prevented by the cabals and intrigues of his clergy; and in England Henry ſtill continued to proſecute the Lutherans.

After Wolſey had been diſappointed in his repeated attempts to be elected pope, he found it his beſt courſe to keep fair with pope Clement VII. to whom he had been very inſtrumental in his election; and he obtained from the pope the prolongation of his legatine power during life. This gave him ſome notion of proceeding by his own authority, ſupported by that of the king, to diſſolve ſome monaſteries. At firſt, he pretended to purſue the plauſible method of applying the revenues to the endowment of his colleges, one at Ipſwich and the other at Oxford, which he had himſelf erected; but, upon recollection and conſulting with his friends, he thought it would be dangerous for him to proceed to this by his own authority, and therefore applied to the pope, who granted him bulls for the diſſolution of forty leſſer monaſteries, provided the king and other founders gave their conſent, for an endowment of his two colleges. The cardinal made a noble uſe of this bounty, nor indeed is he indefenſible in the meaſure, but by the precedent which it ſet. His ſcheme was to erect a college at Ipſwich, as a kind of ſeminary where youth was to be fitted for his college in Oxford, which he deſigned to be a great and noble foundation: his plan was to have it built in the moſt magnificent manner, and furniſhed with all the moſt coſtly rarities of art and learning that Europe could afford, and its clear rent was to conſiſt of two thouſand pounds a year, beſides a revenue for the entertainment of ſtrangers, the relief of the poor, and other extraordinary charges of the univerſity. After the patent for this eſtabliſhment was obtained from Henry, Wolſey ſent to Oxford, under his hand and ſeal a draught of the ſtatutes by which it was to be governed; and, according to them it was to conſiſt of the following members:

"The dean, ſubdean, ſixty ſuperior canons, and forty petty-canons; all to reſide at their ſtudies; thirteen chaplains, twelve ſinging-men, for the chapel-ſervice. Public profeſſors of the college and univerſity; of canon-law, civil-law, phyſic, liberal arts, critical learning, private lecturers and tutors, to read philoſophy, logic, ſophiſtry, critical learning. Four cenſors, to enquire into the ſtudents manners and ſtudies. Three burſers. Four rent-gatherers. Twenty inferior officers, and college ſervants. In all, one hundred and eighty-ſix."

The college itſelf was to have been built upon the ſite of St. Frideſwell's priory, which was one of the houſes diſſolved to endow it. But on Wolſey's fall, all his grand deſign was dropped, and the foundation itſelf, with all its revenues, were forfeited to the king: who in part, however, purſued the cardinal's ſcheme, and the foundation is now called Chriſt-church College, and is provided with a dean, eight canons, three public profeſſors of divinity, Hebrew, and Greek, ſixty ſtudents, eight chaplains, eight ſinging-men, an organiſt, a ſchool-maſter, an uſher, forty boys, and twenty-four almſmen.

The reader will find in the civil parts of this hiſtory, ſuch full accounts of the progreſs of Henry's divorce, and of thoſe ſteps which induced and enabled him to ſhake off his obedience to the papal power, that I ſhall reſume no part of thoſe matters here, but content myſelf with opening to the reader the co-operative means which Providence furniſhed to ſecond the great work of reformation. The diſpleaſure which Wolſey ſaw he had incurred from queen Anne Boleyn, for his proceedings in the affair of Henry's divorce, made him very jealous of the Lutheran party, who he knew would omit no opportunity of contributing to his ruin, and he ordered Sampſon, dean of the king's chapel, to have a ſtrict eye over all Lutheran books brought into the court, leſt Henry, by reading them, ſhould get a reliſh of their doctrine. A book happened to be publiſhed at this time by Tindal, an eminent reformer of thoſe days, entitled, The Obedience of a Chriſtian Man, and was privately lent by the queen to Mrs. Guynſford, one of her maids of honour, who lent it to a young gentleman who courted her, one Mr. Zouch, in whoſe hands Sampſon ſeized the book, and delivered it to the cardinal. This diſcovery alarmed the queen and all concerned, it being a matter which touched their lives; and the queen, to prevent any bad impreſſions upon Henry, threw herſelf at his feet, and with tears and entreaties obtained from him an order that the book ſhould be reſtored to her: after this ſhe threw herſelf again at his feet, intreating him to read it, which Henry conſenting to, he is ſaid from that time to have taken the reſolution of diſclaiming many doctrines, as well as throwing off the ſupremacy of the Romiſh church. Till then he had entertained a notion, that the doctrines of the Lutherans tended to rebellion as well as hereſy; but this book, which is written in a more dutiful ſtrain towards the civil power, than any publiſhed by the papiſts of that reign, convinced him of his miſtake.

Upon the fall of Wolſey we have, in the civil hiſtory, ſeen the demands of Henry upon his clergy, and in what manner they ſubſcribed the articles in which they owned his ſupremacy. Cranmer being appointed archbiſhop of Canterbury, the king deliberated with him about the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries; and it was reſolved that this ſhould be preceded by a viſitation, which, in all probability, would reconcile the people to the ſcheme, by bringing to light the vices and impoſtures practiſed in religious houſes. Cromwell was created vicar-general, with ſuch powers as ſuſpended all epiſcopal juriſdiction; and the power he delegated to his deputies enabling them to confirm or annul the election of prelates, to ſuſpend or deprive them, to convene ſynods, try eccleſiaſtical cauſes, paſs cenſures, or grant penſions to ſuch monks as might be willing to quit a monaſtic life; their inſtructions were extremely minute, touching their enquiry into the doctrines, morals, and behaviour of abbots and abbeſſes, nuns and friars; and they followed them with the utmoſt rigour, diſcloſing ſuch ſcenes of vice, obſcenity, and impoſture, as expoſed them to the deteſtation of all thoſe who retained the leaſt regard for decency and good order. After three hundred and ſeventy-ſix abbeys had been ſuppreſſed, when a motion was made in convocation for tranſlating the Bible into the Engliſh language, Gardiner and the popiſh biſhops oppoſed it with all their power, till Henry himſelf ordered that the tranſlation ſhould be begun; and it was afterwards printed at Paris. In the mean time an Engliſh book, called The King's Primer, was publiſhed, containing the doctrines of Chriſtianity, ſet forth in a plain familiar manner, and expoſing the ſuperſtitions of the Romiſh clergy.

A convocation being held in the year 1536, to confirm the ſentence againſt the king's marriage, the lower houſe preſented the upper with fifty-nine opinions meriting reformation, extracted from the writings of Cranmer and the proteſtant party. After a long debate, they eſtabliſhed a ſet of articles, called the Six Articles, concerning religion, ſome of which we have already mentioned under the reign of Henry, and the reſt may be found at large in biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, but are too long to be inſerted here. Theſe articles were publiſhed, with a preface, by Henry himſelf.

The pope having ſummoned Henry to his council at Mantua, the king proteſted againſt the legality and proceedings of this aſſembly, and was ſeconded by the convocation of Canterbury. Hitherto he had acted under the ſanction of this authority, but now Cromwell, as his vicar-general, independent of all reſtriction, publiſhed a ſet of inſtructions to the clergy, inforcing the late articles, and recommending order and diſcipline among the people. Theſe were followed by a viſitation and diſſolution of the leſſer monaſteries (i. e. ſuch as had eſtates not exceeding two hundred pounds per annum.) Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that the full report of the viſitation of thoſe houſes (previous to their ſuppreſſion) is loſt; yet he ſaw an extract of a part of it, concerning one hundred and forty-four houſes, which contained abominations in it equal to any that were in Sodom. In ſome they found tools for coining; and, briefly, in almoſt all of them the greateſt lewdneſs and wickedneſs. The lord Herbert ſays, that the yearly amount of all theſe leſſer monaſteries was thirty-two thouſand pounds; but the king ſold them at eaſy rates to enable them to keep up the hoſpitality which the monks had done, when they were poſſeſſed of them, adding thereto a penalty of ſix pounds thirteen ſhillings and four pence per month on the farmers and poſſeſſors of the monaſteries and lands belonging to them, on failure of keeping up hoſpitality and huſbandry therein: "but (adds his lordſhip) the penalty being not ordinarily required, due hoſpitality was for the moſt part neglected; for the forfeitures, being great, were, at the ſupplication of the parliament (21 Jac. I. cap. xxviii.) wholly aboliſhed at length, by the indulgence of that king." Somewhat ſurely ought to have been done in time for preventing the poor from becoming ſo heavy a weight on the landed and trading intereſts, as it was eaſy to foreſee they would become, on the ſuppreſſion of thoſe monaſteries, whoſe kitchens were ever open to the poor of the neighbourhood. Had the purchaſers of thoſe church-lands, in every pariſh, been obliged by their tenures to ſupport the poor thereof, or at leaſt to contribute thereto in a much greater and fixed proportion than others, it would have been extremely reaſonable, as they purchaſed them at very low prices: this would have been more conducive to the benefit of a free and trading people, than the lord Herbert's ſcheme, of annexing them all to the crown for ever, for enabling our kings to keep a good army and navy, without being obliged to have recourſe to the people's purſes from time to time: a dangerous ſcheme for a free people.

It is ſaid that there were ten thouſand monks and nuns diſmiſſed by the ſaid ſuppreſſion of leſſer monaſteries, to ſeek their living where they could: to the men, if in orders, was given a prieſt's habit, and forty ſhillings in money; but to the nuns, only a gown, ſuch as ſecular women wore. Some however, ſays lord Herbert, for ſurrendering their houſes, got a ſmall yearly penſion. Now if the ſaid ten thouſand perſons could not, whilſt in their monaſteries, ſpend leſs annually than ſeven pounds each on a medium, then the ſaid eſtates were at leaſt ſeventy thouſand pounds per annum; which ſum, by the increaſed value of lands, and other improvements in our days, equal to three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds (at the rate of five to one) would be probably leſs than their yearly value at this day.

In the year 1538 was begun, and in 1539 was completed, the diſſolution of all the remaining abbeys, called the greater ones, and ſoon after thoſe of Ireland.

Lord Herbert computes the total yearly value of them all (both greater and leſſer ones) to be one hundred and ſixty one thouſand pounds; but this is far from being an exact account of their annual value, for the abbots and priors, foreſeeing the impending diſſolution, had raiſed the fines for leaſes very high, which brought the rents very low in conſequence, that they might thereby have wherewithal to ſupport themſelves when they ſhould be expelled. Indeed the heads of theſe convents had, in part at leaſt, long before fallen into that practice, that they might not be bound to entertain too great a number in their houſes, whereby they muſt have enriched themſelves.

The nameleſs author of a ſmall folio printed anno 1689, with the title of The happy future State of England (ſaid by many to be the earl of Angleſey), thinks there were in all about fifty thouſand perſons maintained in all the convents of England and Wales. Now if they were then maintained at ſeven pounds each perſon, their annual expence would be three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, which probably was about the then yearly value of their lands; and living being at that time five times cheaper than in our times, the total yearly value of their lands in our money would be one million ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds. And if, on an average, thoſe lands be worth twenty years purchaſe (as being ſince greatly improved), then the now total value or purchaſe of all the ſaid abbey-lands may be about thirty-five millions ſterling. That anonymous author farther obſerves, that as Camden, in his Britannia (anno 1607), makes all the pariſhes of England amount to nine thouſand two hundred and eighty-four; thereto may be added twenty-ſix biſhoprics, twenty-ſix deaneries, ſixty archdeaconries, and five hundred and forty-four prebends; theſe, joined to ſeveral rural deaneries, may make about one thouſand more (though here our author ſeems to have forgot that the deans and archdeacons, as well as the prebendaries, have, almoſt without exception, at leaſt one pariſh living, in ſome of which he may officiate (though but few) without entertaining a curate.) And (continues he) there being then (i. e. at the diſſolution of the monaſteries) in Oxford and Cambridge about ſixty thouſand ſtudents, who, in expectation of church-preferments, either as regulars or ſeculars, abſtained from marriage, there were then in all about one hundred and twenty thouſand perſons reſtrained by their function from increaſing and multiplying. As at preſent, double (he ſhould, at leaſt, ſurely have ſaid treble) that number is in France; which conſideration alone gives a conſiderable advantage to proteſtant countries in point of commerce as well as popularity. And reckoning that every marriage one with another produces four children (viz. two of each ſex) thoſe would more than double that number in the ſame age. This, we doubt, is not ſtrictly true.

According to Camden's Britannia, the number of monaſteries ſuppreſſed in England and Wales, firſt and laſt, was ſix hundred and forty-three, beſides ninety colleges, two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chantries and free chapels, and one hundred and ten hoſpitals. It is now too late to lament the demolition of all the monaſteries, two or three of which in every county (as being many of them ſpacious and ſtately edifices), would excellently well have ſerved for county-hoſpitals and work-houſes: much more ſhould the overthrow of the colleges be lamented, ſince even the two illuſtrious univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge were included in the diſſolution-act, and it was ſome time after, that the king was, with much difficulty, induced to continue them in their former condition. Yet ſo inconſiſtent was he, almoſt at the ſame time, as to found new and magnificent colleges in the ſaid univerſities. And what ſhall we likewiſe ſay of the deſtroying of ſuch as were real hoſpitals for the ſick poor, the moſt innocent and uſeful of any kind of charity whatever? There was no one perſon in Henry's dominions who durſt openly diſſent from his ſyſtem, except Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury; and we have already obſerved, in the civil hiſtory, that this prelate was ſcreened from deſtruction by the perſonal affection of the king.

After the fall of Cromwell, the archbiſhop was obliged to proceed with great caution, and reſolved to befriend the proteſtants, by gradually ſapping the foundations of the Romiſh religion; he even made a motion in the houſe of lords for moderating the Six Articles, which had been the foundation of a moſt cruel perſecution; and, though unſupported by the other prelates, he argued with ſuch ſtrength of reaſon, that the houſe agreed to the act of mitigation. He actually finiſhed the draught of a code, intituled "Reformatio legum eccleſiaſticarum," which he preſented to the king at Hampton-court; and letters patent were drawn up for authorizing this digeſt: nay Henry, about this time, ſeemed bent upon a farther reformation. In a letter to the archbiſhop, he forbad the practice of creeping to the croſs, and of ſeveral other ſuperſtitious ceremonies of popery. But his intention was partly fruſtrated by Gardiner, who, in a letter to him from the Imperial court, where he reſided, gave him to underſtand, that if any farther innovations ſhould be made in the religion of England, the emperor would never conſent to a pacification. This was the true reaſon for dropping the ſcheme of the digeſt, in which Cranmer had made ſuch conſiderable progreſs. Nevertheleſs, Cranmer, in obedience to Henry's commands, tranſlated the Liturgy and ſome proceſſions into the Engliſh language.

Henry himſelf was, indeed, very intent upon the great work of reformation he propoſed in religion; and the ſum of it having been drawn up in The neceſſary Erudition of a Chriſtian Man, this book was publiſhed by authority, and recommended to all perſons as a rule for directing their belief and practice. It contained a rational account of the Chriſtian covenant, with an expoſition of the Apoſtles Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, the Ten Commandments, and the ſacraments; and though theſe laſt, and the doctrines relating to them, were aſſerted therein agreeable to what had been determined in the ſtatute of the Six Articles, yet the worſhip of ſaints, pilgrimages, and other ſuperſtitions, which had for ſome ages debaſed religion, were condemned: the king's ſupremacy in eccleſiaſtical matters was explained ſo as to prevent any juſt offence being taken at his title of Head; the pope's pretenſions were refuted; the Holy Catholic Church was defined to be an aggregate body, "comprehending all aſſemblies of men over the whole earth, that receive the faith of Chriſt, who ought to hold in unity of love and brotherly agreement together, by which they become members of the catholic church:" and the unreaſonableneſs of placing its unity in a ſubmiſſion to the biſhop of Rome, is fully ſhewed. Sinners were taught to depend wholly upon the merits of Chriſt; unlearned people were exhorted to pray in their mother-tongue; and a foundation laid for a farther reformation, by declaring "every national church to be a complete body within itſelf, with power to reform hereſies, correct abuſes, and do every thing elſe neceſſary for keeping itſelf pure, and governing its members."

To complete his deſigns for the inſtruction of the people, Cranmer had prevailed upon Henry to cauſe the Bible to be tranſlated into Engliſh, and publiſhed: it accordingly appeared in Engliſh in the year 1541, under the following title: "The Bible in Engliſh, of the largeſt and greateſt Volume, uſed and appointed by our ſovereign Prince, King Henry VIII. ſupreme Head of the Church and Realm of England, to be frequented and uſed in every Church within this his ſaid Realm, according to the Tenor of his former Injunctions given in that behalf: overſeen and peruſed, at the Command of the King's Highneſs, by the reverend Fathers in God, Cuthbert, biſhop of Durham, and Nicholas, biſhop of Rocheſter. Printed by Richard Grafton, cum privilegio ad imprimendum ſolum, 1541." The printing this Bible was looked upon as a great point gained for the Reformation; but ſtill the fires of Smithfield blazed with the bodies of proteſtants as well as papiſts. Cranmer, imperceptibly, was gaining ground on many of the groſſeſt abſurdities of the church of Rome: he had wrote a preface to the lately publiſhed tranſlation of the Bible, which had been tranſlated by Tindal, and reviſed by Coverdale: and even Bonner was obliged to fix up ſix copies of the ſame in his cathedral of St. Paul's. In this convocation he propoſed, with Henry's leave, that candles, ſilk habits, and other ornaments of images might be taken away; and he deſired that each morning and evening a chapter of the New Teſtament ſhould be read in every church.

Towards the latter end of his reign Henry became more and more arbitrary, both in ſpirituals and temporals. The archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, Bonner, biſhop of London, and ſeveral other prelates, were fain to make conveyances in his favour of many manors belonging to their reſpective dioceſes, upon very ſlight conſiderations; and theſe deeds were confirmed by parliament, which had already veſted in him all the colleges, free chapels, and other remaining religious endowments. In the laſt year of his reign the French king ſent over Annibault, his admiral, with a propoſal for aboliſhing the maſs in both kingdoms; and Henry reliſhed the ſcheme ſo well, that he ordered Cranmer to draw up the form of a communion to be ſubſtituted in the room of it; but his death prevented it from being put in execution.

When Edward ſucceeded to the throne, the archbiſhop exerted all his influence to complete the Reformation. The king had been inſtructed by tutors who were attached to the proteſtant doctrines; and the protector openly favoured that religion. Cranmer was aſſiſted by Barlow, biſhop of St. David's, Ridley, afterwards biſhop of London, and ſeveral other able preachers, who, by their zeal and elocution, contributed to the ſucceſs of his endeavours. Gardiner perceiving, by the complexion of the miniſtry and the inclinations of the people, that he ſhould be of very little ſervice to the cauſe of popery by openly oppoſing the tenets of the Reformation, endeavoured to check the progreſs of them by repreſenting to the protector, that all innovations during a minority would produce confuſion and diſturbance in the ſtate, and propoſing that matters of religion ſhould continue in the ſtate they were left at the death of Henry, until the reigning king ſhould take the management of affairs into his own hands. Very little regard was paid to his inſinuations. A book written againſt the corruptions of popery, and publiſhed by Harman, archbiſhop and elector of Cologne, was now tranſlated into the Engliſh language, and printed at London by the direction of Cranmer. This performance made a ſtrong impreſſion on the minds of the people; which were farther enlightened by Marcat's Declaration of the Maſs, and a Paraphraſe of Eraſmus on the New Teſtament, which were carefully tranſlated, and publiſhed for the general uſe of the nation. Glaſier, in a ſermon at St. Paul's church, affirmed that the inſtitution of Lent was no more than a politic law; and others preached againſt the other parts of the popiſh worſhip: but theſe were vehemently oppoſed by the inferior clergy, who derived their ſubſiſtence from the fees they received by the ſacrament and other ſacramentals, and chiefly by ſinging maſſes for the departed ſouls of the poor, for which they charged two pence a maſs. Theſe therefore were enemies to the Reformation, which would have deprived them of bread; and they were ſupported by Gardiner, Bonner, and Tonſtal, who declared againſt all alteration in religion; but the chief of the party was the princeſs Mary, who now openly eſpouſed the regulations of her father, and in particular the act of the Six Articles.

It may not be amiſs in this place to give a ſhort account of the Engliſh biſhops at this juncture, extracted from the beſt authorities, as it will ſerve to ſhew the reader what difficulties Cranmer had to ſtruggle with in promoting the Reformation.

Holgate, archbiſhop of York, Holbeach, biſhop of Worceſter, Goodrick, biſhop of Ely, and Ridley biſhop elect of Rocheſter, ſeconded Cranmer's deſigns: Latimer, who had quitted his biſhopric in the late reign, lived in retirement with Cranmer at Lambeth, without being reinſtated in his ſee: Heath, who had ſucceeded Latimer, was of any religion that could ſecure his own preferment: Thirlby, made biſhop of Weſtminſter by Henry, was an excellent courtier and a fine gentleman, but a ſtrict papiſt: Skip, biſhop of Hereford, was a time-ſerver, though he had been raiſed by Anne Boleyn for his zeal for the Reformation: Day, biſhop of Chicheſter, ſeems to have been a man of conſcience, but inclined more to popery than the Reformation: King, biſhop of Oxford, was always of the ſame religion with the prince upon the throne:

throne: Chambre, biſhop of Peterborough, was a court biſhop, and we know little of his principles: Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, was a prelate of virtue and moderation, and well-affected to the royal ſupremacy, but was a papiſt in the belief of tranſubſtantiation and other points: Goodrick, biſhop of Ely, was, as we have already ſeen, a friend to Cranmer, but was too good a courtier to be ſo uſeful as he might have been to the Reformation: Sampſon, biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry, had eſpouſed the royal reformation againſt the pope, but was a papiſt and time-ſerving prelate: Salcot, otherwiſe called Capon, biſhop of Saliſbury, was a worthleſs and mercenary man, and a papiſt: Knight, biſhop of Bath and Wells, was looked upon to be a good ſtateſman, but in matters of religion he ſeems to have been indifferent: Veſey, biſhop of Exeter, minded little of religious matters, but ſupported great pomp and figure in life, and, upon a valuable conſideration, reſigned his biſhopric in this reign; but inclining to popery, reſumed it in the next: Buſh, biſhop of Briſtol, was a man of learning and merit, therefore we may ſuppoſe him to have favoured the Reformation: Aldrich, biſhop of Carliſle, was a man of learning, but a time-ſerver, and in his heart a papiſt: Bird, biſhop of Cheſter, though married, was a papiſt, as appeared by the encouragement he met with under queen Mary. Barlow, biſhop of St. David's, had been advanced by the recommendation of queen Anne Boleyn to Wolſey, and continued his zeal for reformation; he likewiſe was married: Kitchen, biſhop of Llandaff, was a mean mercenary prelate, and if he had any religion, it was popiſh: and the ſame may be ſaid of Bulkeley, biſhop of Bangor, and of Durphew, biſhop of St. Aſaph.

On the fifth of November, 1547, the convocation met, and Taylor, dean of Lincoln, was choſen prolocutor. Cranmer opened the aſſembly with a ſpeech, in which he preſſed the members to a farther reformation, that the remains of popery might be entirely laid aſide. The lower houſe preſented four petitions to the upper houſe, praying that the eccleſiaſtical laws might be reviewed and publiſhed, purſuant to a ſtatute enacted in the late reign; that the clergy of the lower houſe might be admitted to ſit in parliament with the commons, according to the ancient uſage; that the corrections made by the biſhops and others, in the offices of divine ſervice, by order of this convocation, might be laid before the houſe; and that the rigour of the ſtatute for the payment of the firſt-fruits might be mitigated. The attendance of the lower clergy in parliament had been two hundred years in diſuſe, and therefore no regard was paid to this petition. It was reſolved, however, that ſome biſhops and divines ſhould be appointed to labour for the reformation of the church-ſervice. In this convocation a motion was made for annulling all canons, laws, and uſages, againſt the marriage of prieſts; and likewiſe all vows of celibacy; and a reſolution taken to adminiſter the communion in both kinds. This was immediately confirmed by act of parliament.

At the ſame time the privy-council publiſhed a proclamation, indemnifying all thoſe who had omitted carrying candles on Candlemas-day, taking aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, creeping to the croſs, carrying palms, and other ceremonies of ſuperſtition. They likewiſe directed a mandate to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, for a general ſuppreſſion of images; and this order was rigorouſly put into execution, though not without a dangerous oppoſition. Cranmer's next care was to form a committee for reforming the offices of the church: it was compoſed of eminent preachers and doctors in divinity, who proceeded with great accuracy and circumſpection. A form being drawn up for the communion in both kinds, was publiſhed by the king's proclamation, and the book diſtributed to all the pariſhes of England.

The new Liturgy being eſtabliſhed, and the act of Uniformity paſſed, another viſitation was ſet on foot: the inſtructions given to the viſitors imported, that in all pariſh-churches, the ſervice ſhould be read in a plain audible voice, as the people did not underſtand it while the prieſts retained the tone they uſed in reading Latin prayers: that ſome of the old rites ſhould be aboliſhed, ſuch as prieſts kiſſing the altar, the practice of croſſing, lifting the book from one place to another, breathing on the bread and ſhewing it before the diſtribution, praying by beads, and ſubſtituting a certain number of Ave Marias for one Pater noſter: that the prieſt ſhould exhort the people to remember the box of the poor; and that curates ſhould catechiſe at leaſt once in ſix weeks: that the communion ſhould not be ſold in trentals; and that there ſhould be but one communion in one church, except on Eaſter-day and Chriſtmas, when people came to the ſacrament in greater numbers: and that no market ſhould be held, or bargains made, in churches or churchyards, eſpecially in time of divine ſervice, or ſermon. Cranmer at the ſame time held a provincial viſitation, in which the articles were drawn according to the king's injunction. The council ſent orders to London, to forbid ſpecial maſſes in St. Paul's church, and to take care that there ſhould be only one communion at the great altar. Gardiner alſo, to whom the new Common Prayer and the other offices, compoſed by the committee, were extremely diſagreeable, exerted all his eloquence and influence in exciting the people to reject ſuch innovations; he was ſeveral times ſummoned before the council, and reprimanded, for the liberties he had taken in defending popery: at length he flatly told the protector duke of Somerſet, that, as a biſhop, he could not be anſwerable to his own conſcience for omitting to preach upon the maſs and euchariſt, which he had conceived to be the principal points of the Chriſtian religion. He was therefore committed to the Tower, and all his papers were ſecured.

In the year 1551, Cranmer and the other prelates of the Reformation, at the remonſtrances of Peter Martyr and Calvin, the famous reformer of Geneva, were prevailed upon to ſuffer a reviſal and correction of the Book of Common Prayer. This was accordingly done, and ſome alterations were made in things which Cranmer had rather tolerated for the ſake of bringing over the papiſts, than for any opinion he had of their efficacy. The uſe of oil and the ſign of the croſs were omitted in confirmation; as was extreme unction in the viſitation of the ſick; and the prayers for the dead, in the communion and burial ſervices. Many other alterations alſo took place, to the diſcredit of tranſubſtantiation; and ſome conſiderable variations were made in the forms of delivering the conſecrated elements. Cranmer then, by order of the king and council, proceeded to draw up articles of religion, for greater uniformity of doctrine and practice: this was a favourite meaſure with Cranmer, and we have elſewhere mentioned the progreſs which he made in it. They were afterwards publiſhed, and differ only in ſome particulars from thoſe authorized by Elizabeth in 1562.

In the laſt parliament of Edward, an act was paſſed for dividing the dioceſe of Durham into two biſhoprics, one of which was denominated the ſee of Newcaſtle. The council afterwards appointed viſitors, to make an enquiry about the plate, jewels, and other furniture, in all cathedrals and churches, and compare what they ſhould find with the inventories made in former viſitations, that they might know how far, and in what manner, it had been embezzled.

Upon the acceſſion of queen Mary, all the deprived popiſh biſhops were reſtored, and conſequently the proteſtants, who had filled their ſees, were ſet aſide; and a letter was iſſued to the biſhops, attended by a proclamation, forbidding all exerciſes of preaching and expounding the Scriptures, without the queen's licence: and one of Mary's firſt meaſures, after the parliament met, was to repeal Edward's laws in favour of the Reformation, and to reſtore religion to the ſtate Henry VIII. had left it in. Another act was made againſt affronting prieſts, and another repealing all acts allowing marriage in the clergy. Upon the ſuppreſſion of Wyatt's rebellion, the queen directed inſtructions to biſhops for viſiting their clergy. Thoſe inſtructions inveighed ſtrongly againſt the religion eſtabliſhed by king Edward, and then proceeded to require, "that the biſhops, and others having eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, ſhall, with all poſſible expedition, put the canons and eccleſiaſtical laws in execution, which were formerly uſed in the reign of king Henry VIII. provided they are not contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of the realm: that no biſhop, or eccleſiaſtical officer, ſhall in any inſtrument of proceſs inſert the clauſe, "regia authoritate fulctus:" that the oath of primacy or ſucceſſion, that is, the oath of ſupremacy, ſhould not be impoſed on the clergy at ordination or admiſſion to benefices; with many others in favour of popery, too numerous to be here inſerted.

After this, commiſſions were iſſued for depriving the biſhops who had been favourable to the Reformation; and according to biſhop Burnet, no fewer than twelve thouſand clergymen, throughout England, were turned out of their benefices, on account of their being married. Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, were committed, by the queen's order, to the mayor and bailiffs of Oxford, where they were obliged to diſpute with four popiſh divines in public, and treated with the moſt inſolent partiality. Thoſe who were impriſoned in and about London, drew up repeated addreſſes and petitions to the queen and parliament; and theſe being altogether neglected, their friends and partizans were inflamed into ſome indecencies againſt the government, which were productive of a ſevere perſecution.

In the beginning of this reign a great number of Engliſh proteſtants retired to the continent, and ſettled in ſeveral places. Thoſe reſiding at Franckfort were greatly influenced by John Knox, the Scottiſh reformer, who exclaimed againſt the Engliſh Liturgy, and was a violent aſſertor of purity in the church-government. Theſe principles produced a ſchiſm among the Engliſh refugees: thoſe who had retired to Zurich diſclaimed all ſuch innovations: Knox and Wittingham conſulted Calvin, who diſapproved the Engliſh ſervice. Nevertheleſs, they agreed to compromiſe the difference, and to compile a new liturgy from thoſe of England and Geneva. Dr. Cox, however, with ſome other refugees, arriving at Franckfort, acquired a majority in the aſſembly, and fixed the imputation of treaſon upon Knox and his party. They ſupported the charge from parts of his own writings, levelled not only at queen Mary, but againſt the emperor, ſo that he was obliged to take refuge in Geneva; and Cox modelled the church at Franckfort according to the Engliſh conſtitution.

In the mean while the perſecution, as we have ſeen in the civil part of the hiſtory, proceeded very warmly in England; and a reſolution was taken, if poſſible, to bring into the univerſities a teſt for purging them of all proteſtants, and to prevent their admiſſion for the future: this was done by way of oath, which being very remarkable, I ſhall here tranſcribe:

"You ſhall ſwear by the holy contents of this book, that you ſhall not keep, hold, maintain, and defend, at any time, during your life, any opinion erroneous or error of Wickliff, Hus, Luther, or any other condemned of hereſy; and that you ſhall keep, hold, maintain, and defend, generally and eſpecially, all ſuch articles and points as the catholic church of Rome believeth, holdeth, or maintaineth, at this time; and that ye ſhall allow and accept, maintain and defend, for their power, all traditions, inſtitutions, rites, ceremonies, and laudable cuſtoms of the ſaid church of Rome as ſhe taketh them, alloweth them, and approveth them; and that you ſhall generally and eſpecially hold as the ſaid catholic church holdeth, in all thoſe articles wherein lately hath been controverſy, diſſention, and error, as concerning faith and works, grace and free-will, of ſin [in a good work, of the ſacrifice of the New Teſtament, of the prieſthood of the new law, of communion under both kinds, of baptiſm and Chriſtian liberty, of monaſtic vows, of faſtings and choice of meats, of the ſingle life of prieſts, of the church, of the canonical books, of the form of holding of matters not expreſſed in Scripture, of the inerrability of general councils in faith and manners, of the power of the church to make laws, of the church's ſacraments, and efficacy of the power of excommunication conferred upon the church, of puniſhing heretics, of the ſacrifice of the maſs, of purgatory, of worſhipping ſaints and praying to them, of worſhipping the images of ſaints, of pilgrimages, of evangelical precepts and councils; and likewiſe of all other articles wherein controverſy or diſſention hath been in the church before this day."

It doth not appear that this oath was preſſed more than one year; for, towards the end of the year 1557, the queen was ſo much exaſperated upon being informed, that, notwithſtanding all the ſevere methods that had been uſed, the number of Engliſh heretics was rather increaſed than diminiſhed, that ſhe iſſued out commiſſions that fell very little ſhort of the inquiſition. Among other ſufferers, was John Rough, a Scotchman, who had ſignalized his zeal for the Reformation, both in his own country and in England, where he held a benefice in Yorkſhire; the government therefore finding that he had enjoyed a local protection, ordered him to be tried before Bonner, who condemned him to the ſtake, and he was burned in Smithfield, together with a woman of the ſame communion. Theſe, and the many raging inhumanities of this time, were principally promoted, as we have already ſeen, by cardinal Pole, who went to a ridiculous degree of zeal.

About this time, Weſton, dean of Weſtminſter, was prevailed on, or intimidated, to ſurrender the foundation of that houſe, which was again converted into an abbey, and the government of it beſtowed upon Dr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, who had under him fourteen monks. The queen likewiſe reſtored and rebuilt the convent of Obſervants, at Greenwich, in gratitude for their having diſtinguiſhed themſelves in oppoſition to her father's divorce from her mother: ſhe likewiſe reſtored the nunnery of Sion, near Brentford, in Middleſex; and furniſhed the ancient monaſtery of Sheen, near Richmond, in Surry, with a convent of Carthuſians. The fraternity of Knights Hoſpitallers of Jeruſalem was refounded, and ſir Thomas Treſham was made lord prior; but he dying, that dignity was conferred upon ſir Richard Shelley, whoſe preferment was confirmed by the pope, and he was the laſt grand-maſter of that order in England. Mary likewiſe re-endowed the hoſpital in the Savoy; and made an attempt to reſettle the monaſtery of Glaſtonbury. Towards the end of this reign Pole gave out articles of enquiry for the viſitation of his dioceſe of Canterbury, which regarded both clergy and laity, and were well calculated to promote the deteſtable perſecution that then raged. The other chief eccleſiaſtical events of this reign are mentioned in the civil hiſtory.

Upon the acceſſion of Elizabeth to the throne, all the eccleſiaſtical meaſures which had been taken in the laſt reign were reverſed. Soon after the queen's coming to the crown, ſhe, by proclamation, ordered the Engliſh Liturgy, as it was uſed in her own chapel, together with the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Epiſtles and Goſpels, to be read in all churches and chapels throughout her dominions, in the vulgar tongue; her firſt parliament reſtored the firſt-fruits and tenths to the crown; the ſupreme government of the ſtate eccleſiaſtical, and the Book of Common Prayer and Adminiſtration of Sacraments in the Engliſh Tongue, were alſo reſtored: and thus, by degrees the proteſtant religion was again eſtabliſhed. The biſhops that refuſed the oath of ſupremacy were all removed, and proteſtant biſhops placed in their room. It was enacted, that all perſons ſhould go to divine ſervice on Sundays and holidays; and a fine of one ſhilling was impoſed upon every abſentee, the ſame to be given to the poor. The queen, in virtue of her reſtored ſupremacy, prepared a ſet of injunctions, which contains ſo good an account of the declared ſenſe of the church of England in matters of religion at this time, that I cannot refuſe the reader a peruſal of them.

"It was no where declared, either in the Scriptures, or by the primitive church, that prieſts might not have wives; upon which many, in king Edward's time, had married: yet great offence was given by the indecent marriages ſome of them made. To prevent the like ſcandal for the future, it was ordered, that no prieſt or deacon ſhould marry without allowance from the biſhop, two juſtices of the peace, and the conſent of the woman's parents or friends. All the clergy were to uſe habits according to the degrees in their univerſities; the queen declaring that this was not done for any holineſs in them, but for order and decency. No man might uſe any charm, or conſult with ſuch as did. All were to reſort to their own pariſh-churches, except on extraordinary occaſions. Inn-keepers were to ſell nothing in the time of divine ſervice. None were to keep images, or other monuments of ſuperſtition in their houſes. None might preach but ſuch as were licenced by their ordinary. In all places they were to examine the cauſes why any, in the late reign, had been impriſoned, puniſhed, or put to death, upon the pretence of religion; and all regiſters were to be ſearched for it. In every pariſh the ordinary was to name three or four diſcreet perſons, who were to ſee that all the pariſhioners did duly reſort on Sundays and holidays to church; and thoſe who did not, and upon admonition did not amend, were to be denounced to the ordinary. On Wedneſdays and Fridays the Common Prayer and Litany were to be uſed in all churches. All ſlanderous words, as Prieſt, Heretic, Schiſmatic, and Sacramentarian, were to be forborne, under ſevere penalties. No books might be printed without a licence from the queen, the archbiſhop, the biſhop of London, the chancellor of either of the univerſities, or the biſhop or archdeacon where it was printed. All were to kneel at their prayers, and to ſhew a reverence when the name of Jeſus was pronounced." Then follows an explanation of the oath of ſupremacy, in which the queen declared, "that ſhe did not pretend to any authority for adminiſtering divine ſervice in the church; and that all ſhe challenged, was that which at all times had belonged to the temporal crown of England: that ſhe had the ſovereignty and rule over all manner of perſons, under God, ſo that no foreign power had any rule over them; and if thoſe who had formerly appeared to have any ſcruples about it, took it in that ſenſe, ſhe was well pleaſed to accept of it, and did acquit them of all penalties in the act." The next was about altars and communion-tables: ſhe ordered, that for the future, for the preventing of riots, no altar ſhould be taken down without the conſent of the curates and church-wardens; that a communion-table ſhould be made for every church; and that, on ſacrament-days, it ſhould be ſet in ſome convenient place in the chancel, and at other times it ſhould be placed where the altar had ſtood. The ſacrament-bread was ordered to be round and plain, without any figure on it, but ſomewhat broader and thicker than the cakes formerly prepared for the maſs. Then the form of bidding-prayer was preſcribed, with ſome variation from that of king Edward's time; for whereas to the thankſgiving for God's bleſſing to the church in the ſaints departed this life, a prayer was added, "that they with us, and we with them, may have a glorious reſurrection;" now the words they with us, as ſeeming to import a prayer for the dead, were left out.

The queen next gave orders for a royal viſitation of the clergy all over England. The commiſſioners were chiefly laymen, to whom ſhe committed her whole ſupremacy. The Engliſh refugees now returned to their own country; the greater part of them with ſtrong prejudices againſt the church-ſervice; and ſeveral foreign princes interceded terceded with the queen in behalf of thoſe diſſenters, that they might be indulged with the liberty of a ſeparate worſhip. This, however, ſhe would never grant, though they enjoyed a toleration by her connivance. Dr. Parker was prevailed upon to accept the archbiſhopric of Canterbury; and the papiſts affected afterwards to ridicule the irregularity of his ordination. which they branded with the name of Nag's-head Conſecration, becauſe, after he had been conſecrated at Lambeth chapel, the officers of the court of Canterbury were entertained at a tavern of that name in Cheapſide: it appears, however, from inconteſtible evidence, that he was duly conſecrated; and thus authorized, he proceeded to the conſecration of other prelates, who were elected into vacant ſees. Jewell, biſhop of Saliſbury, publiſhed a liſt of the abſurdities in the church of Rome, and declared from the pulpit, that if any papiſt would make good a ſingle propoſition of thoſe he had ſtigmatized, either from the Scripture, from the ancient fathers, or councils, he would give up the conteſt, and ſubſcribe himſelf a proſelyte. He afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Apology for the Church of England; and acquired great reputation for learning all over Europe.

In proportion as England, by the wiſdom of its queen, enjoyed the bleſſings of peace and plenty, with the eſteem and veneration of all its neighbours, religious heats increaſed within it. The prodigious influx into England of foreign ſectaries, driven hither by perſecution, had infuſed into many of the common people an inclination for the plainer modes of worſhip practiſed abroad; and ſeveral Engliſh noblemen, allured by the ſweets of ſacrilege, were ſo forward in encouraging ſuch doctrines, that in a few years a formidable party was formed in England againſt the church.

This party, which was known by the name of the Puritans, as affecting ſtrict evangelical purity in the doctrine, habit, and ceremonies of holy worſhip, was chiefly under the guidance of Thomas Cartwright, of the univerſity of Cambridge, under whom, and the auſpices of Theodore Beza, a foreigner, they greatly gained ground, and grew ſo troubleſome to the queen and kingdom, by their writings and preachings, and publicly refuſing to attend the divine ſervice of the eſtabliſhed church, or conform to any of its rites, that Elizabeth, to ſuppreſs them, was obliged, in the year 1569, to publiſh a proclamation enjoining uniformity of worſhip and eccleſiaſtiacal habits, and that all the books of the diſſenters ſhould be delivered into the hands of the biſhops, or the queen's council, under pain of impriſonment to thoſe who concealed them. Cartwright, however, ſtill continued to publiſh pamphlets in defence of his tenets*. He was ſeconded by one Edward Deringe, who gave lectures in St. Paul's cathedral, and a preſbytery was formed at the village of Wandſworth, on the model of the Geneva inſtitution. Some dignitaries

* I have, in this note, given the reader the heads of his opinions, by which he will perceive the total ſum of the objections of the diſſenters to the church at this period.

"I. The names and functions of archbiſhops and archdeacons ought to be ſuppreſſed,

"II. The names of the lawful miniſters of the church, ſuch as biſhops and deacons, when abſtracted from the office deſcribed in the Holy Scriptures, are likewiſe to be rejected, and the whole brought back to the apoſtolical inſtitution: and thus the biſhops function ought to be limited to praying and preaching, and the deacons to take care of the poor.

"III. The government of the church ought not to be intruſted with biſhops, chancellors, or archdeacons officials, but in the hands of the miniſters and elders of the ſame church.

"IV. That the miniſtry ought not to live at large, but that every one ought to be tied to a particular congregation.

"V. That nobody ought to ſolicit for the function of a miniſter, nor ſtand candidate as it were for that employment.

"VI. That miniſters ought not to be ordained by the ſole authority of the biſhop; much leſs are they to receive orders in a ſtudy, or ſuch private place: but this office ought to be confirmed by a public choice of the congregation."

Beſides theſe heterodoxies and miſrepreſentations of the government of the church, there were ſeveral unſound propoſitions maintained by Cartwright and his party; and of theſe the chancellor had an account ſent him this year: theſe were ranged under the following articles.

"I. In reforming the church, it is neceſſary to proceed upon the firſt model, and to bring every thing up to an apoſtolical inſtitution.

"II. None ought to be admitted into the miniſtry, unleſs qualified for teaching; and thoſe who have no claim for this function, ought to forfeit their character, and be diſcharged.

"III. Preaching, praying, and adminiſtering the ſacraments, ought to be performed by the ſame perſon: from hence it follows, that thoſe who are miniſters of the word, that is, thoſe who cannot preach, ought neither to pray publicly for the congregation, nor adminiſter the ſacraments.

"IV. Popiſh prieſts have no authority to be miniſters of the Goſpel by virtue of their own ordination.

"V. Nothing but canonical Scripture ought to be publicly read in the church.

"VI. The church liturgy ought to be ſo formed for the public ſervice, that no allowance ſhould be left for private prayer or reading; but that all the audience ſhould attend to the miniſter, whether preaching or praying.

"VII. That the office of burying the dead belongs no more to the miniſter, than to the reſt of the pariſh.

"VIII. That all portions of Scripture, all names and diſtinctions of God Almighty, are to be treated with the ſame reverence and regard: and therefore it is againſt reaſon to enjoin the people to ſtand at the reading of the Goſpel, or to bow, and pull off their hats, at the name of Jeſus.

"IX. That ſitting at the holy communion is as lawful and defenſible a poſture, as ſtanding or kneeling; and, over and above, it is more convenient, becauſe it gives a better image of a ſupper.

"X. That the ſacrament ought not to be delivered in private places, nor by the miniſters themſelves, and much leſs by women and private perſons, as baptiſm is ſometimes adminiſtered to infants, and the Lord's ſupper to thoſe in danger of death.

"XI. That to make uſe of the ſign of the croſs in the baptiſm of infants is a ſuperſtitious practice, and the cuſtomary reaſons for the uſe of this ceremony, makes it ſtill more intolerable.

"XII. It is very reaſonable that the father ſhould preſent the child to the church for baptiſm, and make a profeſſion of what faith he intends to inſtruct him in; and that this ought to be done without repreſenting, form, or anſwering, "I will," "I will not," "I believe," and ſo forth, in the name of the infant: neither is it to be ſuffered that the child's name ſhould be given by a woman in the church; or that an ignorant one ſhould engage for the education of the infant. By an ignorant one, is meant one not qualified to receive the Lord's ſupper.

"XIII. That in giving the names at baptiſm, all reſemblance of paganiſm ſhould be avoided; and beſides, the names of officers ſhould be declined upon ſuch occaſions, as that of Chriſt, Angel, Baptiſt, &c.

"XIV. That to forbid matrimony at certain times of the year is quite a popiſh fancy; but to take money for a licence within the times prohibited, is ſtill more intolerable.

"XV. To give any perſons liberty to marry without acquainting the congregation, who are the proper judges of the impediment (in caſe there ſhould be any) is unlawful.

"XVI. The keeping Lent, together with Friday and Saturday, either upon motives of ſuperſtition, or otherwiſe, is unlawful; neither is it a ſufficient defence to ſettle the keeping thoſe faſts upon reaſons of ſtate.

"XVII. Keeping the holidays is unlawful, and ſo are fairs, upon the Lord's day.

"XVIII. Theſe words, "Receive the Holy Ghoſt," at the ordination of miniſters, is a ridiculous and wicked expreſſion.

"XIX. Kings and biſhops ought not to be anointed." Collier, vol. ii. p. 525, 526.

of the church took up the pen, and anſwered ſome pamphlets: a proclamation was iſſued for executing the laws againſt nonconformiſts, and ſome of the principal diſſenters were ſuſpended, deprived, and impriſoned. The ſeverities exerciſed againſt them were chiefly attributed to archbiſhop Parker, who ſuſpected them of practices againſt his perſon. He had always been a bitter enemy to their opinions, and now, perceiving they were countenanced by perſons of high rank, he complained that the church had no friend at court but the queen herſelf. She ordered the lord high-treaſurer Burleigh to make a ſevere ſpeech in the council againſt nonconformity: ſhe declared againſt the religious exerciſes of the diſſenters, and ſeemed at this juncture inclined to a perſecution; for ten Dutchmen and one woman were condemned to the ſtake for hereſy, though the ſentence was afterwards mitigated into baniſhment; yet two perſons of the ſame nation were actually burned in Smithfield.

Hitherto the papiſts in England had lived free from perſecution, nay they were even indulged with the liberty of ſolemnizing their own rites within their private houſes, though againſt the laws then in being; but when that hot haughty prelate, pope Pius V. in the year 1569, fulminated his bull againſt Elizabeth, by which he deprived her of her crown, and abſolved her ſubjects from their obedience and allegiance to her, the government, well knowing what vaſt ſwarms of miſſionaries were then in England, thought it neceſſary to redouble its circumſpection upon the popiſh party. Many gentlemen of the inns of court were brought before the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and not giving a ſatisfactory account of their principles, were ſent to priſon. The gentlemen in the commiſſion of peace all over England were obliged to ſign an inſtrument, profeſſing their conformity to, and belief in, the eſtabliſhed religion; and in the next parliament, which ſat in the year 1571, the law was enacted againſt thoſe who brought into, or offered to publiſh in England, any bulls or mandates from the pope, &c. already mentioned in the civil hiſtory of this reign†: yet, for ſix whole years together, after this law was made, it was not executed upon any papiſt, till Cuthbert Mayne, a prieſt, and an obſtinate maintainer of the pope's authority over that of the queen, was executed at Launceſton, in Cornwall; and a country gentleman who had harboured him, had his goods confiſcated, and himſelf adjudged to perpetual impriſonment.

Archbiſhop Parker dying in 1575, was ſucceeded in the ſee of Canterbury by Grindal, of York, a prelate of great moderation towards the puritans. In his firſt convocation, ſome articles for the regulation of the clergy were agreed upon; and in the ſummer after he made a metropolitical viſitation. The articles of his injunctions manifeſt a becoming concern for the doctrines and worſhip of the church; but appearing too zealous for the puritans, the members of the Star-chamber, by virtue of their eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, confined him to his houſe, and ſuſpended him for ſix months from his juriſdiction. At length, however, he was reſtored to his functions, which he exerciſed until, finding himſelf preſſed with age and infirmities, he reſigned his archbiſhopric in 1583, and retired to Croydon, where he ſoon after died.

He was ſucceeded by Dr. John Whitgift, biſhop of Worceſter, a divine who had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning and regard for the church of England. The beginning of his adminiſtration was peſtered with the ſect of Browniſts, ſo called from their founder, Robert Brown, an Engliſh gentleman of Rutlandſhire, who refuſed to join the congregation in any public office of worſhip, and out-did all the other puritans in railing againſt the church. Brown having written ſome pamphlets that were obnoxious to the miniſters of the ſtate and Goſpel, Elias Thacker and John Copping, who had diſperſed ſome of them, were proſecuted by the government, and executed for their crime. As to Brown himſelf, he was a poor unſteady wrong-headed man; he was ſaved from the gallows by being kinſman to the lord Burleigh; he next conformed, and then relapſed, and conforming again, had a benefice given him: at laſt he died in jail, into which he had been thrown for the breach of the peace: his ſect, however, continued very numerous. But Whitgift was a prelate of great reſolution, and preſſed conformity as vigoroully as the queen could wiſh him: finding the diſſenters, among other things, had confined the queen's ſupremacy to a temporal juriſdiction, he took occaſion to repreſent them to Elizabeth as agreeing with the papiſts on that head. Elizabeth could not brook the leaſt oppoſition of this kind, and finding Whitgift to be a prelate according to her own mind, ſhe remitted all eccleſiaſtical buſineſſes to him, that ſhe might be free from the importunities of the great patrons of the diſſenters.

The firſt thing, therefore, that Whitgift did, was to preſs the clergy of his own dioceſe to ſubſcribe to the following articles, which had been declared lawful by the civilians and judges of England.

"I. That the biſhop, but no other inferior judge, may puniſh any perſon, eccleſiaſtical or lay, by a pecuniary mulct, for an eccleſiaſtical crime or offence, eſpecially if he ſees the party more afraid of ſuch a penalty than the church cenſures.

"II. By the eccleſiaſtical law, the ordinary may ſet a pecuniary puniſhment upon ſuch as abſent themſelves from divine ſervice without reaſonable excuſe, eſpecially when his abſence proceeds from contempt.

"III. Some canoniſts affirm, that a biſhop may make an ordinance, that an excommunicated perſon ſhall pay ten thouſand pounds for every month he ſtands excommunicated out of contempt."

The preſſing thoſe articles raiſed ſuch a ſtorm of calumny againſt the archbiſhop as muſt have cruſhed him, had he not been powerfully ſupported by Elizabeth. After various tentatives to reclaim the diſſenters, Whitgift at laſt gave the heads of them a meeting at Lambeth, in preſence of the earl of Leiceſter and other miniſters, who, though puritanically inclined, could not help deciding in his favour. Nevertheleſs, in the next parliament, a ſtrong party in the houſe of commons joined in a petition to the upper houſe in favour of the nonconformiſts; but they were baffled by the vigilance of the archbiſhop, who prevailed upon the queen to quaſh all objections from the houſe of commons, and inflict farther ſeverities on the diſſenters; they were ſubjected to the oath "ex officio," as often as it ſhould be adminiſtered, on pain of impriſon-ment. Cartwright was ſent to the Fleet for refuſing it; Udal, one of their preachers, was condemned to death; and Penry was executed for having written ſome ſatirical libels.

The other eccleſiaſtical occurrences of this reign are very inconſiderable; I ſhall therefore only obſerve, that the diſſenters, who, like all other ſects, increaſed under perſecution, now ſwarmed all over England; and at laſt they diſputed the legality of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion under which they had ſuffered ſo great ſeverities, and the matter was ſolemnly argued at the bar, in an action brought by one Caudrey, a deprived miniſter: many learned arguments were produced on each ſide the queſtion; but the judges came to a reſolution, that if the act of ſupremacy had never been made, the king or queen of England, for the time being, might eſtabliſh ſuch an eccleſiaſtical commiſſion as was then in force, by the ancient prerogative and law of England. Some time after this, one John Greenwood, a prieſt, and Henry Barrow, a gentleman, were, to the ſhame of Chriſtianity, executed for not thinking like the queen and her council; but Cartwright, relenting in his oppoſition, had ſome indulgence ſhewn him: and, in the latter part of Elizabeth's reign, the farther execution of the more ſanguinary laws againſt diſſenters were, for reaſons of ſtate, judged proper to be remitted.

Of LEARNING and LEARNED MEN in the XVIth CENTURY.

LEARNING, on its revival, was held in great eſtimation by the Engliſh princes and nobles; and as it was not yet proſtituted by being too common, even the great deemed it an object of ambition to attain a character for literature: the four ſucceſſive ſovereigns, Henry, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, may be, on one account or other, admitted into the claſs of authors. Queen Catherine Parr tranſlated a book; lady Jane Grey, conſidering her age, her ſex, and her ſtation, may be regarded as a prodigy of literature; ſir Thomas Smith was raiſed from being profeſſor at Cambridge, firſt to be ambaſſador to France, and afterwards ſecretary of ſtate. The diſpatches of thoſe times, and among others thoſe of Burleigh himſelf, are frequently interlarded with quotations from the Greek and Latin claſſics: even the ladies of the court valued themſelves on knowlege; lady Burleigh, lady Bacon, and their two ſiſters, were miſtreſſes of the ancient as well as the modern languages, and valued themſelves more on their erudition than on their rank and quality. But to be more particular:

Cardinal Wolſey may be ſaid to have been the father of revived learning in England, in this century. He had before him the fame which Leo X. the fineſt gentleman of his age, had acquired by reſtoring more than an Auguſtan age. In Italy, Bembo, Vida, Sannazarius, and more great poets and writers than ever appeared in any one nation at any one time, all found encouragement and protection, either from the bounty or through the example of his holineſs. Painting, ſculpture, and architecture, now ſtarted at once to that height from which they have been ever ſince declining. Wolſey had a ſoul exquiſitely ſuſceptible of the glory ariſing from a patronage, that gives ſurer immortality than power or titles can communicate. The learning of the Engliſh in general, at this time, was equally uſeleſs and heavy, and their taſte none. Wolſey ſaw this, and had the virtue to attempt to improve the one, and introduce the other. He had himſelf as much learning as was ſufficient for a gentleman, and more than was uſeful for a ſtateſman. Mr. Guthrie, in his Hiſtory of England, has favoured us with a letter of this great man, addreſſed to the maſters of a ſchool he founded at Ipſwich, which does great honour to his ſtyle, his taſte, and his judgment: it contains the method of teaching and education that was to be obſerved in that ſchool; and it is no ſmall reproach to Engliſh literature, that this piece, the moſt perfect of its kind that we know of, muſt have been utterly loſt here, had it not been preſerved in a foreign grammar, which, by great accident, fell into the hands of a late laborious antiquary.

I am pleaſed that I can here introduce the reader to ſome acquaintance with this curious piece, as it fully confirms the character of the cardinal's taſte and learning. It is drawn up as a ſcholar, and at the ſame time as a gentleman would expreſs himſelf, were it not perhaps in too princely a ſtyle: it is prefaced by a letter to his two ſchoolmaſters, where he pays great compliments to their functions, and exhorts them ſtrongly to the faithful diſcharge of their duty. He then lays down the method of education to be obſerved in his ſchool, and orders the boys to be divided into eight claſſes: he orders thoſe in the firſt claſs to be inſtructed in the eight parts of ſpeech, and to be taught to pronounce the Latin in a full, open, elegant manner. The ſecond claſs is to practiſe the ſpeaking of Latin: every boy is to have a note-book, and being well grounded in his rudiments, he is to be exerciſed in tranſlating ſome quick, witty, pertinent ſaying from Engliſh into Latin: they are in this claſs to read no author but their rudiments; though the maſters are at liberty to teach them, if they pleaſed, Lily's Carmen Monitorium, or Cato's Diſtichs: "Nimirum (ſays the cardinal) formandi oris gratia." To the third claſs his eminency recommended the reading of Æſop, for the improvement of their ordinary ſtyle, becauſe of that author's pure, neat, polite, and pleaſant language: along with this ſtudy he recommends the learning of Lily upon Nouns, but without enjoining it. The fourth claſs is to read Virgil, that prince of poets, as the cardinal calls him; and he orders the maſters to make the boys read the majeſty of his verſe aloud, in full ſonorous tone. There is ſomething ſo genteely expreſſed by the cardinal, when he comes to ſpeak of the fifth claſs, that I cannot help tranſcribing and tranſlating it: "Imprimis hoc unum admonendum cenſuerimus, ut neque plagis ſeverioribus, neque vultuoſis minis, aut ulla tyrannidis ſpecie tenera pubes afficiatur. Hæc enim injuriâ ingenii alacritas, aut extingui, aut magnâ ex parte obtundi ſolet —"In the firſt place, I think it proper to put you upon your guard, that tender youth is not to be treated with ſevere whippings, or bluſtering threatenings, nor with the leaſt appearance of tyranny; for by ſuch uſage a forward genius is commonly either quite cruſhed, or at leaſt in a great meaſure blunted." After this preface, he recommends to the fifth claſs Cicero's Select Epiſtles, as being, in his opinion, the beſt book for obtaining the richneſs and copiouſneſs of ſtyle. The ſixth claſs are appointed to read books of hiſtory, ſuch as Salluſt, or Cæſar's Commentaries; and, by the bye, he recommends it to the maſters to teach the ſtudents in this claſs, the knowlege of defective, anomalous, and heteroclite verbs, out of Lilly. The ſeventh claſs are enjoined to read the Epiſtles of Horace, with Ovid's Metamorphoſes and Faſti; they are likewiſe to be taught compoſition of verſes and epiſtles; to reduce verſe to proſe, and proſe to verſe; and to have always in the morning ſome ſpecimen of their compoſition ready: and the cardinal concludes his directions to this claſs in the following amiable manner: "Interdum laxandus eſt animus, intermiſcendus luſus at liberalis tamen et literis dignus. In ipſis ſtudiis ſic voluptas eſt intermiſcenda, ut puer ludum potius diſcendi quam laborem exiſtimet. Cavendum erit ne immodicâ contentione ingenia diſcentium obruantur, aut lectione prælongâ defatigentur. Utrâque enim juxta offenditur.—" In the mean time the mind is to be relaxed, and labour to be mixed with diverſions, but ſuch diverſions as may become a gentleman, and a man of letters. Pleaſure is even to be mingled with ſtudy itſelf, that the boy may think learning rather an amuſement than a toil. Particular care is to be taken nor to hurt the genius of a boy by over-ſtretching it, nor to fatigue him by too long leſſons: both extremities are hurtful." I cannot withſtand the temptation of tranſlating the whole of the ſection relating to the eighth and laſt claſs: "Laſtly (ſays his eminence), when the youths, by ſuch exerciſes, have attained to ſome knowlege of the language, let them then proceed to the higher rules of grammar, ſuch as the figures, as they are laid down by Donatus Valla, upon elegance, and ſeveral ancient writers who treat upon the Latin tongue. In reading thoſe works, we particularly recommend it to you, to endeavour to make yourſelves maſters of every paſſage requiring immediate explanation: as, for inſtance, ſuppoſe you were to give the plan of one of Terence's comedies, you are to preface it with a ſhort account of the author's life, his genius, and his manner of writing; you are next to explain the pleaſure and profit that attends the reading of comedies; you are then, in a clear but ſuccinct manner, to explain the ſignification and etymology of the word, to give a ſummary of the fable, and alſo an exact deſcription of the nature of the verſe; you are afterwards to conſtrue it in its natural order; laſtly, you are carefully to mark out to your pupils every ſtriking elegance of ſtyle, every antiquated expreſſion, every thing that is new, every greciciſed turn, every thing that is obſcure, every etymology, derivation, or compoſition, that may ariſe, whatever is harſh or confuſed in the arrangement of the ſentence: you are to mark every orthography, every figure, every graceful ornament of ſtyle, every rhetorical flouriſh, whatſoever is proverbial, all paſſages that ought to be imitated, and all that ought not. Beſides, you are to take care in ſchool, that your pupils ſpeak as correctly as poſſible; you are to applaud the excellent, and you are to mend the incorrect; ſometimes you ought in the Engliſh language to throw out a ſhort ground-work for an eſſay; but let it be ſomewhat that is excellent: if you pleaſe, you are to lay before them certain ſhort rules, by which they may more conveniently handle the ſubject aſſigned them.

"When in the ſchool, the ſtudents are tinctured with ſuch ground-works of learning, they will ſoon give eminent proofs of what great importance it is to have their tender years formed by the beſt maſters. In the mean while, do you perſevere in adorning the country to which you owe ſo much, with the moſt liberal ſtudies."

To his zeal for the improvement of youth, the cardinal added all the qualities of a fine gentleman and a polite courtier. Eraſmus, one of the beſt judges of wit and good-manners that ever wrote, in ſeveral of his epiſtles takes particular notice of his politeneſs and affability: he ſays, that his manners betrayed nothing of his birth; and that the public was not in greater admiration of his exalted fortune, than of his generous diſpoſition. But it was not for Wolſey to confine his love for learning and the Muſes to his own example and munificence, without planting thoſe ſeminaries, which, in ſucceeding ages, were productive of many of the nobleſt fruits of learning. He ſearched for men of genius and letters, as the lord of a ſoil does for a rich mine: he employed no miniſters but ſuch as were ſcholars; and under his adminiſtration, the dignities of the law, the church, and of the ſtate, were filled with men who had nothing but merit to recommend them. Dr Clark and Dr. Knight were through him made biſhops; Dr. Taylor was made maſter of the Rolls; Dr. Pace, one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate; Dr. Gardiner, who had a very fine turn for letters, was employed in ſeveral embaſſies; not to mention Cromwell and others, who by his means roſe to the higheſt offices in the ſtate, with a vaſt number of other promotions, equally juſt and generous.

Wolſey's houſe, like Cicero's Tuſculanum, was a retreat to all men of letters, without diſtinction; they were welcome to his purſe, to his library, and to his table. The ſtudy of the liberal arts, ſays the great author I have already quoted, when decayed and degenerated, was by him revived and renewed. Learning, whilſt ſtruggling with the patrons of ancient ignorance, was encouraged by his countenance, protected by his authority, embelliſhed by his ſplendor, and cheriſhed by his munificence. Whenever he heard of a learned foreigner, he ſettled on him a handſome ſalary, ſuitable to his merit, and invited him to England. He employed agents through all countries for making up a library which might vie with that of Ptolemy Philadelphus himſelf; and revived the ſtudy of the three learned languages, the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Latin, without which, to uſe his own expreſſion, learning itſelf was but lame.

No mechanic ever worked with more labour in his profeſſion, than the cardinal did with aſſiduity to adorn England with the luminaries of learning: he brought Matthias Calphurnius, one of the beſt Greek ſcholars of his time, from Greece, to teach that language at Oxford; and I am apt to believe it is owing to his labours that England can ſhew more great men than any other nation can in that language: though Eraſmus differed from him greatly, both in political and religious matters, yet he allowed him a large appointment, and offered to provide for him, if he would come to England, either in the church or ſtate: he was the patron of Ludovicus Vives, another learned foreigner, perhaps the beſt critic of his time, who lived ſome time in England at the cardinal's invitation: he appointed Lavinius, a pupil and relation of Eraſmus, to be his private ſecretary, and gave him an education worthy his merit. I ſhould tire the reader were I to enumerate all the other inſtances of Wolſey's regard for the polite arts; I ſhall therefore cloſe this account of the cardinal with obſerving, that he did a thouſand generous acts for the benefit of learning, for which his memory deſerves all the immortality the pen can beſtow.

There were many other perſons of note in the literary walk during this reign; but it would too much ſwell our work to enumerate all their names and writings: we muſt not, however, paſs unnoticed Dr. John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, and founder of the ſchool there; nor William Lilly, born at Odiham, in Hampſhire, who was firſt maſter of St. Paul's ſchool, and compoſed a grammar of the Latin tongue, which goes by his name, and is ſtill in uſe in ſeveral of our ſchools; John Leland, that famous ſearcher of antiquities, flouriſhed alſo in Henry's time.

The ſhort reign of his ſucceſſor, Edward VI. furniſhed very few perſons of note, either as ſwordſmen or ſcholars. Edward Hall, a barriſter at law, wrote a chronicle of the union of the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, which was well received; and Thomas Sternhold, born at Southampton, turned into Engliſh metre the Pſalms of David, as we now hear them ſung in moſt of our churches.

During the reign of Mary, bloody and tumultuous as it was, we find ſeveral learned men, the chief of whom were John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancaſhire, who tranſlated the Bible into Engliſh, with notes; and Henry, lord Stafford, ſon to Edward, duke of Buckingham, who, amongſt other works he wrote, tranſlated a book out of Latin into Engliſh, entitled, "Utriuſque poteſtatis differentia," which book, as ſome think, was firſt compoſed by Edward Fox, biſhop of Hereford: John Hopkins alſo tranſlated ſeveral of the Pſalms into Engliſh metre, which, with thoſe of Sternhold, ſtill continue to be ſung in the church.

Revived and improved literature made one of the principal glories of Elizabeth's reign; England under her ſaw an Auguſtan age! Elizabeth herſelf tranſlated ſeveral books, and was familiarly acquainted with the Greek as well as Latin tongue. It is pretended that ſhe made an extempore reply in Greek to the univerſity of Cambridge, who had addreſſed her in that language: it is certain that ſhe anſwered in Latin without preparation, and in a very ſpirited manner, to the Poliſh ambaſſador, who had been wanting in reſpect to her; when ſhe had finiſhed, ſhe turned about to her courtiers, and ſaid, "God's death! my lords (for ſhe was much addicted to ſwearing), I have been forced this day to ſcour up my old Latin that hath lain long ruſting." Elizabeth, after ſhe was queen, did not entirely drop the ambition of appearing as an author: and, next to her deſire of admiration for beauty, this ſeems to have been the chief object of her vanity: ſhe tranſlated Boethius Of the Conſolation of Philoſophy, in order, as ſhe pretended, to allay her grief for Henry IV's change of religion. As far as we can judge from Elizabeth's compoſitions, we may pronounce, that, notwithſtanding her application and excellent parts, her taſte in literature was very indifferent; ſhe was inferior to her ſucceſſor in this particular, who was himſelf far from being a juſt model of eloquence.

Unhappily for literature, at leaſt for the learned of this age, the queen's vanity lay more in ſhining by her own learning, than in encouraging men of genius by her liberality: this province ſhe left to Leiceſter, &c.

During this reign England produced a number of excellent poets, ſuch as Spencer, Sidney, Donne, Johnſon, Shakeſpeare, Beaumont, and Fletcher: Fairfax tranſlated Taſſo with great eaſe and elegance, and Harrington tranſlated Arioſto with tolerable accuracy; Bacon acquired immortal renown by his philoſophical writings; Camden excelled as an antiquary and hiſtorian. In this reign we owe to the patronage of the illuſtrious great who compoſed the Engliſh court, the ſtrength of Jewell's reaſoning, the inimitable ſtyle of Hooker, with the extent and variety of Raleigh's learning; it was under Elizabeth that Hobbes formed his firſt notions; and, towards the latter end of her reign, Cromwell drew his firſt breath, as if (ſays a modern author) it had been the will of Heaven, that ſhe ſhould not leave the world without bequeathing to it a ſpirit equal to her own.

LAWS.

HENRY VIII.

THIS king's firſt parliament ſat on the twenty-firſt of January, 1510, at Weſtminſter. Its laudable deſign ſeems to have been chiefly pointed towards relieving the people from the dreadful yoke under which they groaned, through the infamous revival of the penal ſtatutes by Empſon and Dudley. Among other ſtatutes, it was now enacted, "that untrue inquiſitions found in the reign of king Henry VII. by the procurement of Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, entitling the king to tenures in capite, may be traverſed by the parties, though they have had liveries: and that their livery ſhould be no concluſion." By another act, all aſſurances made by Empſon and Dudley of lands to the uſe of others, were made void, and their joint feoffees ſtood ſeiſed of the whole. The penal laws againſt clothworkers were likewiſe repealed, or mitigated. But the moſt important act of this parliament, was that determining that all actions for the king, upon any penal ſtatute, ſhould be taken within three years after the offence was committed; and actions for any other perſon, within one year: this act wiſely foreclоſed the field of litigation, by ripping up or reviving paſt offences, ſince no benefit for a forfeiture could accrue three years after the offence charged or committed.

There likewiſe paſſed in this parliament a repeal of that ſtatute made in Henry VII's time giving authority to juſtices of aſſize and juſtices of the peace, peace, in their ſeſſions, to hear and determine all offences and contempts committed againſt any ſtatutes in force, ſaving treaſon, murder, and felony. A law was likewiſe made for obliging coroners to do their duty without having the thirteen ſhillings and four pence advanced to them as a fee; ſince the meaning of the law was, that the fee ſhould accrue from the eſtate of the murderer, but not in caſes of death by accident or miſadventure.

On the fourth of February, 1512, the parliament ſat again, when the following acts were paſſed: That every perſon carrying beyond ſeas money, plate, or jewels, ſhould forfeit double the value. This had been a favourite meaſure in the Engliſh government, though it was often broke through for conveniency; but as the Engliſh were now upon the eve of a war with France, it was abſolutely neceſſary to enforce it. By another act it was ordained, "That all ſorts of men, under the age of forty years, excepting judges and clergymen, ſhould make uſe of bows and arrows, and practiſe ſhooting." This act was occaſioned by the experience of the decay of military diſcipline in England. The uſe and conveniency of fire-arms bade fair to enervate the bodies of the Engliſh, who, by the practice of archery and ſtrength of their arms in drawing the bow, had rendered themſelves the terror of Europe; it was therefore provided by the parliament, that thoſe exerciſes ſhould be revived, not only to improve the natural ſtrength of Engliſhmen, but becauſe the long-bow and arrow was ſtill a more formidable weapon than any of the ſmall fire-arms that were yet carried to the field. In conſequence of this principle, that bodily exerciſe in the people is abſolutely neceſſary for the defence of the ſtate, another act was made in this parliament, in confirmation of a ſtatute paſſed in the nineteenth of the late reign, againſt ſhooting with croſs-bows, and retracting all licences which allowed ſuch exerciſe.

Two other acts which paſſed in this parliament, relate entirely to the expedition which was now on foot againſt France: the firſt was a kind of extenſion of the law made in Henry VII's time, and which we have already taken notice of, for empowering all thoſe who followed the king to the wars, to alienate their lands; for it was now provided, that who is or ſhall be in the king's wars beyond the ſea, or on the ſea, ſhall have a protection of "Profecturus, or Moraturus cum clauſula volumus;" and he may alien his lands holden in capite, without licence: and if he die in that ſervice, his heirs, within age and ward, his executors, feoffees, or aſſigns, ſhall have the wardſhip and marriage towards the performance of his will.

The other act related to falſe muſters, and to penalties upon captains uſing the ſame, or defrauding the ſoldiers of their pay: deſertion was made felony without benefit of clergy, and was cognizable by the juſtices of the peace of that county where the offender was apprehended.

By another act it was provided, "That no perſon within the city of London, or within ſeven miles of the ſame, ſhould practiſe phyſic or ſurgery without being firſt examined by the biſhop of London, or the dean of St. Paul's, who were to be aſſiſted by expert phyſicians and ſurgeons. The ſame proviſions were to extend throughout all the other counties in the kingdom, but with this difference, that the number of aſſiſtants to be called in by the biſhop there, was left undetermined; and the practitioners approved of at London were not to undergo any ſecond examination: but all this was with a ſaving clauſe to the two univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge of all their rights and privileges.

In the winter of the following year, 1513, an act paſſed for taking away benefit of clergy from all who committed murder or felony in any conſecrated place, or upon the king's highway, or in their houſes.

In 1514, the parliament paſſed an act relating to ſurgeons, by which they were exempted from ſerving all conſtableſhips and wardſhips, bearing of arms, and ſitting on all juries and inqueſts, by reaſon of the continual ſervice and attendance they give day and night, and at all times, to their patients. This privilege is ſtill enjoyed by all perſons of that profeſſion.

The parliament of the year 1515, paſſed many ſalutary acts; among others, a ſumptuary law was enacted againſt the exceſſive expence of apparel; and the dreſs of every degree among the laity was regulated. Another act confirmed and made perpetual the ſtatute of the third of this reign, concerning the maintenance of archery and ſhooting in long-bows. I am inclined to believe, with lord Herbert, that this precaution chiefly tended to exerciſe the common people, whom the conveniency of calivers, or hand-guns, then in uſe, was apt to render idle and effeminate. Another act was made for regulating the wages of artificers and farmers ſervants; and another for encouragement of huſbandry. Another act was made, for regulating the manner of manufacturing woollen cloth, and a ſevere penalty impoſed upon any perſon that ſhould export Norfolk wool out of the kingdom. Thoſe acts concerning the woollen trade were at this time abſolutely neceſſary, becauſe of the diſreputation which the faults in that trade had brought upon Engliſh cloths in foreign countries.

But the moſt remarkable act of this parliament was for remedying an abuſe become frequent, from the great hurry the members of the houſe of commons were generally in for returning into the country before the cloſe of the ſeſſions: it was therefore provided, that ſuch members who ſhall, without leave from the houſe, abſent themſelves from their duty, ſhall forfeit all their wages to which they are entitled from their conſtituents. From this act it appears, that the practice of paying wages, viz. four ſhillings to a knight of the ſhire, and two ſhillings at leaſt to a burgeſs, a day, beſides travelling expences, was ſtill continued, and punctually obſerved. But it is remarkable we know of no coercive power upon the face of this act, which the houſe of commons before this time had over its own members; and the act itſelf eſtabliſhes no other penalty againſt thoſe who ſhould abſent themſelves even without leave from the houſe, beſides the loſs of their wages. This, however, is no argument that the houſe might not exerciſe a compulſatory power, by ordering ſuch members into cuſtody; though it is a very ſtrong reaſon for thinking, that the payment of their wages was then by law ſo much a debt from the conſtituents, that, let the behaviour of the repreſentative, after choſen, be what it would, it might be levied by him.

The parliament of 1523 took the ſtate of the coinage into conſideration. It was found that the the increaſe of trade demanded a greater circulation of money, than the current ſpecie of that time could effect; it was therefore enacted, "That coiners who make money in any mint in England, ſhould coin of every hundred pounds of gold, twenty pounds into half angels, or pieces of forty pence; and of every hundred pounds worth of bullion, plate, or ſilver, a certain portion into groats, two-pences, pence, and farthings: the farthings to have a different make from the half-penny; that they who bring leſs than one hundred pounds in bullion, or plate, to the mint, ſhall have the tenth part thereof in half-pence or farthings; and yet this ſhall not extend to the mint-maſters of York, Durham, or Canterbury." By another ſtature it was enacted, "That all in the king's ſervice in war, might alienate their lands for the performance of their wills; and if any of them died in the king's ſervice in war, his feoffees or executors ſhould have wardſhip of his heirs and lands." This gave a new blow to what ſtill remained of the feodal inſtitution, as it left the barons and great tenants at farther liberty to indulge their full enjoyment, at the expence of their eſtates, of all the luxuries now introduced by the extenſion of commerce and the increaſe of coin. Thus many of thoſe great poſſeſſions, which, ever ſince the Conqueſt or ſoon after, had gone from father to ſon in the ſame deſcent, came now into the hands of commoners, and thereby the ſyſtem of property was almoſt daily and hourly altered.

The parliament which ſat in the year 1530, paſſed ſeveral acts relating to the clergy, which we have mentioned in their proper places; beſides which, ſeveral acts paſſed of a civil nature; in particular one act, by which all ſervants embezzling goods to the value of forty ſhillings and upwards, within their maſters houſes, were adjudged to be guilty of felony; and the goods, after conviction, were ordered to be returned to the rightful owners. Another act was made for prohibiting the exportation of braſs; probably with a view to encourage the making of great guns. Several regulations about foreign tradeſmen likewiſe paſſed in this parliament, and they were ſubjected to the ſame taxes and duties with natural-born ſubjects.

In 1532, the twenty-fourth of this king, it was enacted by the parliament, that none ſhould have the benefit of his recourſe to his ordinary, excepting thoſe in holy orders, and even they were to give ſecurity for their good behaviour. The act, however, did not extend to thoſe, who, being attainted of felony or murder, are afterwards admitted to the benefit of clergy, and ſo delivered to the ordinary; but the ordinary, having ſuch a perſon in his cuſtody, might, if he pleaſed, diſcharge himſelf of the ſame, by degrading him, and ſending him to the King's Bench.

By another act in the ſame ſeſſion, the places where jails ought to be built and kept, were pointed out: the juſtices of the peace, in their reſpective counties, had the power of taxing the inhabitants towards building the jail, and of appointing collectors for raiſing the money for the ſame. Another act was made againſt falſe verdicts, by which a writ of attaint was followed againſt every juror giving ſuch verdict; and the jury, if found guilty, was each man to forfeit twenty pounds, one half to go to the king, and the other to the party that ſueth.

Another act provided for the importation of all French wines by the king's natural ſubjects, Engliſh, Iriſh, or Welſh; and that no ſuch wines ſhould be imported between the laſt day of September and the ſecond day of February: it was farther enacted, that no perſon ſhould retail French wine for above one penny the pint, and malmſey and ſack for one ſhilling the gallon. Another excellent act was made, extending the ſtatute of the ſtaple (which was before confined between merchant and merchant, and only for the merchandize of the ſtaple) to the reſt of the king's ſubjects: and this, ſays lord Herbert, not only enlarged contracts, but ſtrengthened the ſinews of them.

By another act, another terrible grievance which the ſubjects laboured under from the clergy's power, was removed. It ſeems (as the preamble of the act recites) that it had been a common practice to cite people, upon fictitious and ſurmiſed cauſes, from the moſt diſtant parts of the kingdom, to the Arches, Audience, and other high courts of the archbiſhops; and upon their not attending, to lay them under excommunication, or ſuſpenſion from divine ſervice; it was therefore provided, that no ſuch citation ſhould take place, but in caſes ſpecified by the ſtatute.

Another act declared all feoffments of lands to the uſe of the church, to be void; and that all aſſurances of lands to churches, communities, or companies of any kinds, were as prejudicial to the lords ſuperiors of ſuch lands, as if they were alienated in mortmain.

Several other acts paſſed in this parliament, equally beneficial, though not ſo extenſive, in their nature: which were all allowed of by Henry, that he might ſtrengthen his own power againſt the clergy, and ſtrike the greater terror into the court of Rome.

In 1534, the parliament paſſed an act, giving power to the chancellor to ſettle the price of victuals; and all exportation of corn or cattle was prohibited, excepting to the Engliſh dominions abroad. By another act, all thoſe who, being regularly indicted, ſhall ſtand mute to prevent the courſe of law, are deprived of the benefit of clergy. Another act was made to prevent the abuſe of converting tillage into paſturage, eſpecially for ſheep: in the preamble of the act, great complaints are made againſt this practice, which raiſed the rents, and enhanced the prices of every thing; it was therefore enacted, "that no man ſhould have in his farmed lands above two thouſand ſheep; yet that every temporal perſon may keep upon his inheritance as many as he will: ſecondly, that no man ſhall take and hold above two farms at once; and thoſe to be in the ſame pariſh, upon certain penalties there ſet down."

By another act it appears, that the legiſlature thought it became them to take into conſideration the ſtate of printing: an act had been made ſo far back as the reign of Richard III. for importing books, both printed and manuſcript; according to the preamble of this act, made in Henry's reign, there were but few printers within this realm in the reign of Richard III. who were cunning and expert in the ſaid ſcience and craft of printing; but there being now great numbers of that kind, the ſaid act of Richard III. was repealed; and, for the encouragement both of printers and book-binders, it was provided that no man ſhould buy books which were brought from beyond ſeas to ſell again, if they were bound: that no man ſhall buy books by retail, brought from beyond ſeas; and that the prices of books, increaſed to a miſerable rate, were to be qualified by the king's great officers of ſtate, or the juſtices, or any two of them. Several other acts, not relating to the buſineſs of the Reformation, were likewiſe paſſed for the benefit of the ſubject, but are too immaterial to be mentioned here.

The parliament of 1536, undertook and brought about the union of England with Wales, in the manner we have related in the hiſtory of this reign; and, in order to introduce a general uniformity, juſtices of the peace, with like powers as they have in England, were appointed by the lord chancellor of England in the county-palatine of Cheſter, and the other counties already mentioned. By another, the inhuman foreſt-laws were taken away. By another, it was enacted, that no perſon, from the firſt of July, 1536, ſhould have power and authority to pardon or remit treaſons, murders, manſlaughters, or any felons, or their acceſſaries, in any part of England, Wales, or the Marches of the ſame: that likewiſe none ſhould make juſtices of oyer, juſtices of aſſize, juſtices of peace, or juſtices of jail-delivery; but they ſhould be made by the king's letters patent; and that all original writs, and all manner of indictments of treaſon, felony, and treſpaſs, and all manner of treſpaſs, ſhould be made in the king's name; and things done againſt the king's peace, ſhould be ſuppoſed to be done againſt the king's peace, and not againſt the peace of any other perſon. But, notwithſtanding the generality of thoſe acts, a great many privileges ſtill continued to the proprietors of lordſhips.

It appears that there was as yet in England no determined method eſtabliſhed by the municipal law for the trial of pirates, who were left to the forms of the civil law, which did not admit any one to be put to death without firſt confeſſing their offences, and required more ſtrict proof of the fact than the nature of the offence would admit of: by this means great numbers of offenders had eſcaped; and thoſe who were convicted, were often put to the torture for confeſſion: but it was now enacted, that they ſhould be judged by commiſſioners appointed by the king, and in the ſame manner as if their offences had been committed on land; and that no benefit of clergy ſhould be allowed the criminal: the act, however, very properly made a diſtinction between pirates, and thoſe who took things through neceſſity, upon the ſea; the ſaid things, viz. proviſions, materials, or utenſils for navigating the ſhip, to be paid for, if taken on this ſide the ſtreights of Morocco (Gibraltar, I ſuppoſe) in four months; and if on the other ſide, in twelve. Another act was made in favour of the breed of Engliſh horſes; and a penalty impoſed upon thoſe who, having parks, did not keep mares thirteen hands, and ſtallions fourteen hands high. Several regulations were likewiſe made concerning the form for ſuing for the gifts and grants made under the king's ſign manual. The king, likewiſe, in this ſeſſion, carried, in part, his former deſign of voiding private deeds made in prejudice of the right of wardſhip: it was likewiſe enacted, that no lands ſhould paſs by bargain and ſale, but that which was by writing indented, ſealed, and enrolled.

We have now the title of the firſt law ever made in England relating to bankrupts, in the thirty-fourth year of Henry VIII. viz. "the lord-chancellor, treaſurer, &c. ſhall take order with bankrupts bodies, lands, and goods, for the payment of their debts." But there was a farther regulation made in this act by the thirteenth of Elizabeth.

We now come to the time when intereſt, or uſe for money lent, and in thoſe days always known by the name of Uſury, was firſt ſettled in England by law. It was a ſtatute of 37 Henry VIII. cap. ix. entitled, "How offenders in uſury ſhall be puniſhed." Before this time (ſays the judicious Joſiah Child) there was no law for limiting the rate of intereſt; there was little trade, and as little money, in the nation, wherefore every man took ſuch an intereſt for what money he could put out, as he could get; which in ſundry inſtances (to be found in hiſtory here and there) was, before this time, higher than ten per cent. as partly appears from the ſtrong expreſſions in this law, the preamble of which ſays, "that ſundry ſtatutes have been made for the avoiding and puniſhing of uſury, being a thing unlawful [and yet, with the ſame breath, theſe lawgivers eſtabliſhed it; for this was the church's opinion in thoſe times, though never uniformly put in practice], of other corrupt bargains, ſhiefts, and cheviſances; which ſtatutes are ſo obſcure and dark in intent [ſo framed on purpoſe to leave room to avoid the penalties; whilſt, in general words (to pleaſe the clergy), it was declared ſinful], and are of ſo little force, that by reaſon whereof little or no puniſhment hath enſued to the offenders of the ſame; for reformation whereof (ſays this preamble gravely), be it enacted, that all former ſtatutes concerning uſury, ſhiefts, &c. all forfeitures and penalties concerning the ſame be henceforth utterly void.

Taxes in the Reign of Henry VIII.

In his fourth year, in a parliament at Weſtminſter, were granted to the king two fifteenths of the temporalty, and two tenths of the clergy; and head-money, of every duke ten marks, an earl five pounds, a baron four pounds, a knight four marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, to pay four marks, and ſo after that rate till him that was valued at forty ſhillings, and he paid twelve pence; and every man and woman of fifteen years and upwards, four pence.

In his ſixteenth year a parliament was holden, wherein divers ſubſidies were granted to the king, towards the charges of his wars in France.

In his fourteenth year, order was taken by cardinal Wolſey, that the true value of all men's ſubſtance might be known, and would have had every man ſworn to give an account of his worth, and required a tenth part thereof towards the king's charges in the then war, as the ſpiritualty had granted a fourth part: this the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excuſed taking an oath, and were allowed to bring in their bills upon their honeſties. But when all was done, after much labouring by the cardinal, the clergy granted one half of their yearly ſpiritual revenues for five years; and the temporalty, two ſhillings in the pound, from twenty pounds and upwards; and from forty ſhillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty ſhillings twelve pence; and under forty ſhillings, of every head, of ſixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in every two years.

In

In his ſixteenth year, the cardinal, of his own head, attempted by commiſſion to draw the people to pay the ſixth part of every man's ſubſtance in plate or money; but this was generally oppoſed, and cauſed inſurrections in ſeveral counties, which coming to the king's knowlege, he utterly diſavowed it, and blamed the cardinal extremely for attempting it.

In his twenty-fourth year, in a parliament then held, a fifteenth was granted to the king, towards his charges in erecting fortifications againſt Scotland.

In his thirty-firſt year, a ſubſidy of two ſhillings in the pound upon lands, and twelve upon goods, with four fifteenths, were granted to the king, towards his charges in making bulwarks.

In his thirty-fifth year, a ſubſidy was granted, to be paid in three years; every Engliſhman being worth, in goods, twenty ſhillings and upwards to five pounds, to pay four pence of every pound; from five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, ſixteen pence; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two ſhillings: ſtrangers, as well denizens as others, being inhabitants, to pay double. And for lands, every Engliſhman paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty ſhillings to five pounds; from five pounds to ten pounds, ſixteen pence; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, two ſhillings; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three ſhillings: ſtrangers double. The clergy, ſix ſhillings in every pound of benefices; and every prieſt having no benefice, but an annual ſtipend, ſix ſhillings and eight pence yearly, during three years.

EDWARD VI.

A Very neceſſary ſtatute was made the ſecond and third of Edward VI. cap. xv. "for reſtraining the ſellers of all manner of proviſion in England, from combining together not to ſell but at a fixed price; and alſo for reſtraining workmen and labourers not to make or do their work but at a fixed price; or to do but a certain work in a day, or not to work but at certain hours." A clauſe, wiſely intended, was added to this act, licenſing all manner of workmen relating to building of houſes, &c. to follow their occupation in all cities and towns corporate, although they did not live therein, nor were free of ſuch corporations: but this clauſe was repealed by a ſtatute of the third and fourth of this king, cap. xx. plainly (as appears) by the interpoſition of the city of London, who repreſented "that being the king's chamber and moſt ancient city of this realm, the artificers and craftſmen of the arts, crafts, and myſteries aforeſaid, were at great coſts and charges, as well in bearing and paying taxes, tallages, ſubſidies, ſcot, lot, and other charges, as well to the king's majeſty as to the ſaid city, and to many and ſundry triumphs and other times for the king's honour; and that if foreigners [i. e. non-freemen] ſhould come and work among them within the liberties of the ſaid city, contrary to their ancient privileges, the ſame ſhould be a great decay of learning, and the impoveriſhment and driving away of the freemen, being artificers of the crafts and myſteries aforeſaid, within the ſaid city; for reformation whereof, the ſaid clauſe is hereby repealed entirely." So that the reaſons for this repeal are expreſſed as above only in reſpect to London, yet the repeal being general, took in all other corporations, cities, and towns; and ſo it remains to our own times, contrary to the opinion of moſt wiſe and judicious men. By cap. iii. of the ſaid ſecond and third year of king Edward VI. for regulating the purveyors for the king's houſhold, poſt-horſes are therein fixed at one penny per mile.

In the third and fourth of king Edward VI. there was an act of parliament paſſed (cap. ii.) with many well-contrived clauſes for preventing of frauds in the woollen manufactures in England, ſuch as for the clothier's ſeal on his cloth, againſt over-ſtretching the cloths, for the well drying of cloth, alſo for the well dyeing of wool to be converted into cloth, or into hats or caps; alſo for preventing the putting any deceitful thing upon cloth, ſuch as flocks, chalk, flour, ſtarch, &c. nor to uſe iron cards in the rowing of cloths; alſo for juſt meaſuring of cloths: for all which purpoſes overſeers are directed to be annually appointed, not only in corporation-towns, by the chief magiſtrates, jointly with the wardens, &c. of the clothworkers, but in towns, villages, and hamlets not incorporated, by the juſtices of the peace, jointly with the clothworkers; which overſeers ſhall, at leaſt once in every quarter of a year, or as often as they think needful, viſit clothiers, drapers, dyers, and preſſers houſes, ſhops, &c. to which overſeers one moiety is hereby given of all the forfeitures and penalties of this act, and the other to the king, &c. All which evidently ſhews the care of the legiſlature for that manufacture, and alſo that it was at this time univerſally ſpread all over the kingdom, and in a flouriſhing condition.

Notwithſtanding all which favourable laws for regulating the Engliſh woollen manufacture, we have another ſtatute, anno 1552 (5 and 6 Edward VI.) for the very ſame ends and purpoſes, to which we refer the curious reader.

We have ſeen, under the year 1515, a ſtatute for aſcertaining the length, breadth, and weight of certain Engliſh woollen cloths; as alſo another more ample ſtatute, anno 1549, for more fully regulating the different kinds of them: in this year, 1552, we have another ſtill more extenſive law for the ſame purpoſe (5 and 6 Edward VI. cap. vi.) wherein the woollen manufactures of all the different counties of England and Wales are aſcertained with reſpect to length, breadth, weight, &c. whereby all former ſtatutes concerning this ſubject are repealed. Yet, as perfect as this ſtatute might then be thought, there were many more ſubſequent ones made on the ſame ſubject, not only for aſcertaining the true dimenſions and weight of thoſe cloths, but for diſcovering and reſtraining many frauds and irregularities therein; the full recital of which would be both tireſome and unprofitable to the generality of readers; ſuch as are deſirous of peruſing them, may conſult the ſtatute-books.

By cap. xxiv. of the ſaid 5 and 6 Edward VI. there is another monopolizing act relating to the making of felt hats and thrummed hats, coverlets, and dornecks (i. e. diaper linen), though ſomewhat more more moderate than that in favour of the city of York; for whereas, by the ſtatute made in the year 1544, the manufacture of coverlets was abſolutely confined to that city alone, excluſive of all other parts whatever of that county, this law now before us only confines the making of the above-named four kinds of goods to the city of of Norwich, and to corporate or market-towns of that county.

By a ſtatute of the ſeventh and laſt year of king Edward VI. cap. v. "I. The prices of wines are fixed thus; Gaſcony and Guienne at eight pence per gallon; and Rochelle wine at four pence per gallon; nor ſhould any other wines be ſold at an higher price than twelve pence per gallon, on forfeiture of five pounds. This ſtatute is ſaid, in the preamble, to be enacted for the avoiding of many inconveniences, much evil rule, and common reſort of miſruled perſons, uſed and frequented in many taverns, of late newly ſet up in back lanes, corners, and ſuſpicious places, both in London and other towns and villages.

"II. The next clauſe enacts, that none but ſuch as can ſpend a thouſand marks, or elſe, laſtly, ſhall be the ſon of a duke, marquis, earl, viſcount, or baron of the realm, ſhall have in his houſe any veſſel of the ſaid wines, for his family's uſe, exceeding ten gallons, on forfeiture of ten pounds.

"III. Nor ſhall any perſon keep a tavern retailing of the ſaid wines, unleſs licenſed, and that only in cities, towns-corporate, boroughs, port-towns, or market-towns, or in the towns of Graveſend, Sittingbourn, Tuxford, and Bagſhot, on the forfeiture of ten pounds: and there ſhall be but two taverns for retailing wines in every city or town, except in London, which may have forty taverns, in York eight taverns, in Norwich four, in Weſtminſter three, in Briſtol ſix, in Lincoln three, in Hull four, in Shrewſbury three, in Exeter four, in Saliſbury three, in Gloceſter four, in Weſtcheſter four, in Hereford three, in Worceſter three, in Southampton three, in Canterbury four, in Ipſwich three, in Wincheſter three, in Oxford three, in Cambridge four, in Colcheſter three, in Newcaſtle upon Tyne four. By this limitation it may be thought a pretty near gueſs may be made at the comparative magnitude of cities and towns, allowances being made for towns ſituated on very public roads; yet this matter is nevertheleſs ſtill very uncertain.

"IV. None of the ſaid taverns ſhall retail wines to be ſpent or drank within their reſpective houſes.

"V. Merchants may uſe in their own houſes (but not to ſell) ſuch wines as they ſhall import; alſo high-ſheriffs, magiſtrates of cities and towns, and inhabitants of fortified towns, may keep veſſels of wine for their own conſumption only."

As extraordinary as ſeveral parts of this ſtatute may appear to ſome of us at this time, they may be pretty well accounted for, not only from the ſobriety, poverty, and ſimplicity of that age, compared with ours, but alſo from the unſettled and tumultuous diſpoſition of a great part of the people, thoſe eſpecially who adhered to the old religion, and thoſe alſo who excited commotions in moſt counties againſt incloſures; yet, with reſpect to the limited number of taverns, in ſeveral of the fore-named towns, we cannot now perhaps altogether clearly judge or determine the proportion of the magnitude of thoſe places therefrom; for inſtance, Cambridge is allowed four and Oxford but three taverns; nor ſome other points relating to this act.

Taxes in the Reign of Edward VI.

In no king's reign were ever more parliaments for the time, nor fewer ſubſidies. The greateſt was in his laſt year, when there was but one ſubſidy, with two fifteenths and tenths, granted by the temporalty, and a ſubſidy by the clergy. And indeed, to ſhew how loth this king was to lay impoſitions upon his people, this may be a ſufficient argument, that, though he was much in debt, yet he choſe rather to negociate a loan of money from the people of the Low Countries, at the intereſt of fourteen per cent. per ann. But his way of raiſing money was by ſelling the chantry-lands and religious houſes, granted him by parliament; and by enquiring after all church goods, either remaining or embezzled, as jewels, gold and ſilver chalices, ready money, copes, and other veſtments, reſerving to every church one chalice and one covering for the communion-table, the reſt to be applied to his own benefit. He alſo raiſed money by enquiring after offences of officers in great places: on enquiry one Beaumont, maſter of the Rolls, being convicted of many crimes, ſurrendered all his offices, lands, and goods, into the king's hands. Alſo one Whalley, receiver of Yorkſhire, being found a delinquent, ſurrendered his office, and paid a great fine beſides. Alſo the lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, conſcious that he had ſold the king's lands and timber woods without commiſſion, and had applied the king's ſtores to his own uſe, for theſe and other offences, ſurrendered his office, and was fined four thouſand pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time, for raiſing of money; twenty thouſand pounds weight of bullion was appointed to be made ſo much baſer, that the king might gain thereby one hundred and forty thouſand pounds.

MARY.

WE have ſeen, under the year 1285, that the firſt ſtatutes made in England for widening the roads between market-towns, was made purely for the prevention of robberies, without the leaſt hint therein of the benefit to ariſe thereby to carriages, on account of commerce, of which there was but very little at that time.

From that time we meet with nothing relating to that ſubject (except the paving the ſuburbs about London, &c.) till king Henry VIII's reign, in which there are four ſtatutes, viz. two for the altering or removing certain roads (annis 14 & 15, cap. vi.) in the Weald of Kent, and (anno 26, cap. vii.) in the deep ways of Suſſex; both which have been already taken notice of, under the year 1524; a third, for mending a lane near Cheſter; and a fourth for the repair of bridges, and highways at the ends of bridges; neither of which two did we think worthy of animadverſion. But commerce beginning to increaſe conſiderably in the reign of his daughter Mary, whereby the old roads became much more frequented by heavy carriages, an act, of 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, anno 1555 (cap. viii.) takes notice, "that the highways were then very noiſome and tedious to travel in, and dangerous to all carriages; wherefore it was now enacted (and is ſtill in force), that every pariſh ſhould annually elect two ſurveyors of the highways, to ſee that the pariſhioners, according to their lands, abilities, farms, &c. ſend their carts, horſes, men, tools, &c. four days in every year, for mending the roads." So that this is properly the firſt general ſtatute made for mending the roads, extending extending to all England and Wales, by the labour and expence of each reſpective pariſh alone; and on that bottom alone we find in all ſix ſtatutes relating to this ſubject in queen Mary's reign, nineteen in queen Elizabeth's, and one in king James I's reign; after which there were none of this kind till king Charles II's Reſtoration. The ſaid parochial means for keeping the roads in repair were found, in moſt caſes, tolerably effectual, till after the Reſtoration of Charles II. when the vaſt increaſe of the nation's commerce and manufactures, and of the capital city of London, with the concomitant increaſe of luxury, brought in ſuch a number of heavy-wheeled carriages on our roads, as rendered it by degrees impracticable in moſt caſes for pariſhes entirely to keep their own part of the roads in tolerable condition, more eſpecially in the counties near London, and in the manufacturing counties. This has introduced the more equitable and effectual method of tolls payable at numberleſs toll-gates (called turnpikes) by the identical wearers of thoſe roads alone: and many ſubſequent local ſtatutes have been made for thoſe ends, and alſo ſeveral general ones for limiting the weight of waggon-loads, the breadth of wheel-rims, called fellies, the number of horſes, &c. And thus much we thought ſufficient to ſerve for a ſummary hiſtory of the laws relating to the roads of England, ſo as not to have much occaſion to name them any more in this work.

What we have here ſaid, concerning a ſummary hiſtory of the keeping the roads or highways of England in repair, may alſo be partly applied to the ſubject of deepening rivers, and meliorating havens or harbours on the ſea-coaſts. With reſpect to the former, we have ſeen that the firſt inſtance thereof in the ſtatute book, is that of the third of Henry VI. (cap. v.) for deepening the river Lea from the town of Ware to London, an. 1424; and that in his ninth year (cap. ix.) for the ſame end: after which we find none, either for rivers or for havens, till the reign of Henry VIII. who repaired and fortified ſeveral harbours; for that of 4 Henry VII. for preſerving the river Thames, relates merely to the fiſhing therein; and that of the eleventh of the ſame king, for removing wears and engines from Southampton harbour, was for the like purpoſe; but we find no more ſtatutes of either kind till queen Elizabeth's reign, ſome of which, as alſo ſubſequent ones, we may perhaps think it neceſſary to take a more particular notice of, in their reſpective places; as alſo for bridges over rivers.

Taxes in the Reign of Queen Mary.

Queen Mary began with a rare example, for in the firſt year of her reign, ſhe remitted, by proclamation, the ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound of land, and two ſhillings in the pound of goods granted in the laſt parliament of king Edward VI.

In her ſecond year, in a parliament then holden, was granted to the king and queen a ſubſidy of the laity, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence in the pound; and from twenty pounds and upwards, of ſixteen pence in the pound; all ſtrangers to pay double: and the clergy, ſix ſhillings in the pound. If this were all, then, upon the matter, in all her time there came no new charge upon her people: for one ſubſidy remitted, and one received, made but even.

In her laſt year ſhe borrowed twenty thouſand pounds of the city of London, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum.

ELIZABETH.

IN the fifth year of Elizabeth (cap. iii) was the firſt ſtatute enacted in England for the relief of the poor: for whereas all other acts of parliament were only on the foot of voluntary contributions for the poor, reſting or depending upon the charitable devotion of the people, which method had not anſwered the intended purpoſe, or prevented common beggars from multiplying every where, it was now therefore found neceſſary to go a ſtep farther. It is certain that the ſuppreſſion of the convents had not a little increaſed this diſorder; thoſe houſes having been a great relief to the poor of their own lands, and in their neighbourhood, to whom not only their kitchens, but their granaries, were ever open, more eſpecially in times of dearth; when, therefore, the church-lands were ſold by Henry VIII. at very eaſy purchaſes, it was then declared to be for enabling the buyers to keep up that wonted hoſpitality, which, however, they greatly neglected to do; yet ſtill there was no compulſory law till now. This act, therefore, after "directing poor and impotent perſons of every pariſh to be relieved of that which every perſon will, of their charity, give weekly, to be gathered by collectors, and diſtributed to the poor, ſo as none of them ſhall go, or ſit, openly begging; (now comes the compulſory clauſe) and if any pariſhioner ſhall obſtinately refuſe to pay reaſonably towards the relief of the ſaid poor, or ſhall diſcourage others, then the juſtices of the peace, at their quarter-ſeſſions, may tax him at a reaſonable weekly ſum; which if he refuſes to pay, they may commit him to priſon: yet, where the pariſhioners have more poor than they can relieve, the juſtices may licence ſo many of their poor as they ſhall think proper, to beg in one or more hundreds of their reſpective counties. Laſtly, beggars in any other place than where legally licenced, were to be puniſhed according to the laws of vagabonds."

The next ſtatute of the ſame ſeſſion of parliament (viz. cap. iv.) entitled "A repeal of ſo much of former ſtatutes as concern the hiring, keeping, departing, working, or order of ſervants, labourers, &c. and a declaration who ſhall be compelled to ſerve in handicrafts, and whom in huſbandry, and their ſeveral duties, &c." gives the ſubſtance of many former laws, with their imperfections, contrariety, and remarks, and obſerves that the wages aſcertained in many of thoſe acts of parliament were now become inſufficient, by reaſon of the advanced prices of all neceſſaries ſince thoſe times; yet, large and comprehenſive as this act is (and too much of it is ſtill in force) there are ſundry ſubſequent ſtatutes, both in this and ſucceeding reigns, for the regulation of diſputes between maſters and their ſervants, apprentices, and labourers, concerning their wages, time of labour, &c.

The next law (cap. v.) of that year, entitled "Conſtitutions for the maintenance of the navy, &c." contains many good clauſes for encouraging our own ſhipping and mariners: as "I. By permitting herrings, and other fiſh caught upon our coaſts, to be exported duty-free. II. That no foreign ſhips ſhall carry any goods coaſtwiſe, from any one Engliſh port to another. III. Wines and woad ſhall be imported from France in Engliſh ſhipping alone (with ſome inconſiderable exceptions.) IV. That, as well for the maintaining of ſhipping, the increaſe of fiſhermen and mariners, and the repairing of port-towns, as for the ſparing and increaſe of the fleſh victuals of this realm, it ſhall not be lawful for any to eat fleſh on Wedneſday and Saturdays, on the penalty of three pounds for each offence, excepting caſes of ſickneſs; and alſo thoſe by ſpecial licences to be obtained [this purely political faſting from fleſh meat was partly altered by cap. ii. 27 Eliz. by leaving out Wedneſday; yet the victuallers were to utter no fleſh in Lent, nor on Fridays and Saturdays]; for which ſaid licence obtained by peers, they were to pay one pound ſix ſhillings and four pence to the poor's box of the pariſh; knights and their wives, thirteen ſhillings and four pence; and others, ſix ſhillings and eight pence each: but no licence was to extend to the eating of beef [on theſe days] at any time of the year [this ſhews, that in thoſe days, black cattle were deemed ſcarce]; nor to the eating of veal, in any year, from Michaelmas to the firſt day of May. "But becauſe (adds the ſtatute) no perſon ſhall misjudge the intent of this ſtatute, be it enacted, that whoſoever ſhall, by preaching, teaching, writing, or open ſpeech, notify that any eating of fleſh, or forbearing of fleſh, mentioned in this ſtatute, is of any neceſſity for ſaving the ſoul of man, or that it is the ſervice of God, otherwiſe than as other polite laws are and be, then ſuch perſons ſhall be puniſhed as ſpreaders of falſe news ought to be."

In the following year the parliament, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, among others, paſſed the following acts, viz. I. An act againſt holding or maintaining the authority of the biſhop of Rome. II. That no one ſhall procure a falſe witneſs, upon the penalty of forty pounds; nor any one be a falſe witneſs, upon the penalty of twenty pounds, and ſix months impriſonment. III. An act making the clipping and waſting of coin treaſon. IV. That any perſon who ſhall be ſeen or found in the company of Egyptians [gypſies], ſhall be deemed felons. V. An act for the due execution of the act "De excommunicato capiendo." VI. An act for tranſlating the Bible and Common Prayer Book into Welſh. VII. An act to eſtabliſh and confirm the queen's ſupremacy in eccleſiaſtical affairs. The work of Reformation, which, with ſeveral interruptions, had been carrying on above thirty years, was in a great meaſure completed, and the articles of the church of England ſettled by the convocation, and reduced to the number of thirty-nine, as they ſtand at this day.

The parliament which was diſſolved on the twenty-ſecond of January, 1567, made the following acts: I. An act declaring the making and conſecrating of biſhops within this realm, to be good, orderly, and lawful. II. That no man ſhall ſend any rams, ſheep, or lambs, alive, out of the realm, upon pain, for the firſt offence, of forfeiture of all his goods, and one year's impriſonment; and for the ſecond, of being declared a felon. III. That cut-purſes and pickpockets ſhall not have benefit of clergy. IV. Whereas there was but one ſheriff for Surry and Suſſex, one for Eſſex and Hertfordſhire, one for Somerſet and Dorſetſhire, one for Warwick and Leiceſterſhire, one for Nottingham and Derbyſhire, one for Oxford and Berkſhire; it was ordered that, for the future (the year 1567 being the firſt), each of theſe counties ſhould have a ſheriff reſpectively.

In the year 1571, the fourteenth of Elizabeth's reign, was paſſed the famous act for the maintaining the queen's title, of which we have given the ſubſtance, in our hiſtory of that reign*. The other acts made in this parliament are little worth notice, if we except one relating to the clergy, by which it is enacted, "that no eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhall be admitted to any benefice with cure, except he be twenty-three years of age at leaſt, and ſhall firſt ſubſcribe the articles of religion, in preſence of the ordinary, and, within two months after induction, read the ſame in his pariſh-church, in the time of common prayer, and declare his unfeigned aſſent thereunto, and all this upon pain of deprivation. That no one ſhall retain a benefice with cure, being under the age of twenty-one years, or without a teſtimonial of his honeſt life, nor unleſs he is able to render to the ordinary an account of his faith in Latin."

In the eighteenth year of her reign, an act was paſſed, making it treaſon to impair, diminiſh, or falſify the coin of the realm.

The parliament of 1585 enacted ſeveral ſevere laws againſt papiſts: it was alſo declared, "that no perſon ſhould be returned to ſerve upon juries, but who has an eſtate of freehold lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the clear yearly value of four pounds at leaſt.

The parliament which met in February, 1593, paſſed a very rigid ſtatute againſt all non-conformiſts, which equally affected papiſts and proteſtants. In the preamble to this act it is ſaid, "that this act was made for preventing and avoiding ſuch great inconveniences and perils as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of ſeditious ſectaries and diſloyal perſons." The act ran, "that if any perſon above the age of ſixteen years, ſhall refuſe to repair to ſome church, or refuſe to do the ſame for the ſpace of one month, ſhall be committed to priſon, there to remain, without bail or mainprize, until they ſhall conform, and make ſuch open ſubmiſſion and declaration of their conformity, as by this act is appointed." The offenders againſt this ſtatute, who refuſed to make the ſubmiſſion, were to abjure the realm, and not to return without her majeſty's licence, under the penalty of ſuffering as felons, without benefit of clergy. This bill met with great oppoſition in the houſe of commons, as may be ſeen in d'Ewe's Journal, p. 474, &c. where the ſpeeches on both ſides are inſerted. There was an act alſo made againſt popiſh recuſants, by which they were confined within five miles of their reſpective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattles, together with lands, during life. By another act all the abbey-lands were confirmed to the crown and grantees.

The parliament which met at Weſtminſter on the twenty-fourth of October, 1597, and was diſſolved on the ninth of February, 1598, made the following acts: "I. An act for the puniſhment of rogues, vagabonds, and ſturdy beggars: by this ſtatute all the following perſons are to be adjudged

rogues and vagabonds: people who go about begging as poor ſcholars, or on the pretence of loſs by fire or ſhipwreck; collectors for jails, or perſons delivered out of jail and begging for their fees; ſuch as uſe any ſubtle craft or unlawful games, fortune-tellers, gypſies, fencers, bear wards, common players, and minſtrels, jugglers, lurkers, pedlars, and petty-chapmen, fellows not working for reaſonable wages when they are able, and the like: their puniſhment is, to be whipped and ſent from pariſh to pariſh, by the officer in each, the next ſtraight way to the pariſh where they were born, or laſt dwelt for the ſpace of a whole year. II. An act for erecting hoſpitals, houſes of correction, and workhouſes for the poor. III. One for the increaſe of mariners, and maintenance of navigation. IV. An act againſt lewd and wandering perſons, pretending to be ſoldiers or mariners, and travelling without teſtimonials from juſtices of the peace.

In the laſt parliament of this reign, holden at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-ſeventh of October, 1601, the following ſtatutes were paſſed. I. An act for the relief of the poor, appointing the chuſing of overſeers, and the manner of raiſing money for the relief of the poor. II. That every pariſh in England ſhall pay a weekly ſum for the relief of the ſick, hurt, and maimed ſoldiers and mariners. III. An act to redreſs the miſemployment of lands, goods, &c. given to charitable uſes. IV. That perſons cutting and carrying away corn growing, robbing of orchards, breaking or cutting up hedges, poles, &c. and digging or pulling up fruit-trees, cutting or ſpoiling wood or underwood, not being felony by law, ſhall be obliged to make ſatisfaction or be whipped.

Taxes in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

In the parliament holden in the firſt year of her reign, a ſubſidy was granted, of two ſhillings and eight pence in the pound on goods, and four ſhillings on lands, to be paid at two ſeveral payments, by every perſon, ſpiritual and temporal.

In her ſixth year, in a parliament held at Weſtminſter, one ſubſidy was granted by the clergy, and another by the laity, together with two fifteenths and tenths.

In her eighth year, at a parliament then held, there were offered to her four ſubſidies, upon condition ſhe would declare a ſucceſſor; but ſhe refuſed their offer, and directly remitted the fourth ſubſidy which they had granted, ſaying, "that it was all one, whether the money was in her ſubjects coffers or in her own."

In her thirteenth year, in a parliament then held, towards her charges of repreſſing the Northern rebellion, there was granted her a ſubſidy of ſix ſhillings in the pound, by the clergy; and by the temporalty, two fifteenths, and a ſubſidy of two ſhillings and eight pence in the pound.

In her ſix-and-thirtieth year a parliament was holden, in which two ſubſidies were granted by the clergy, and by the laity three, beſides ſix fifteenths and tenths; but it was put in this act, that this contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former ages, ſhould not be drawn into example.

In her fortieth year, in a parliament at Weſtminſter were granted her by the clergy three entire ſubſidies, and by the laity as many, with ſix fifteenths and tenths.

In her forty-ſecond year, to furniſh her with money towards the Iriſh war, ſhe delegated certain commiſſioners to confirm the crown-lands to the poſſeſſors that held any of controverted titles, and to take money for the confirmation, thereby to take away the trouble by contractors, who were at this time very buſy.

ARTS and SCIENCES, MANNERS and CUSTOMS, in the XVIth Century.

IF there is a ſatisfaction, ſays a modern hiſtorian, in viewing in painting and ſculpture the features of our anceſtors, it muſt be equally ſo to read in the page of hiſtory their manners and diſpoſitions. We have already ſhewn how great encouragement learning and the polite arts received from Wolſey, in the beginning of this period; neither were the Engliſh wanting all this time in cultivating and cheriſhing new-born arts and diſcoveries. One Owen is noted as being the firſt who, about the year 1536, caſt braſs cannon in England, ſome ſpecimens of which are ſaid to be ſtill preſerved in the Tower of London. The art of printing had alſo before this time been imported, and had been brought to as great perfection in England as in any neighbouring country. Muſic and painting had met likewiſe with encouragement, Henry himſelf having ſome taſte for thoſe arts, as appears from ſeveral letters patent in favour of their profeſſors, eſpecially to the famous Hans Holbein.

Archbiſhop Nicholſon, in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, ſpeaking of the ſtate of geographical knowlege at or about this period, obſerves, "that ſince the beginning of king Henry VIII's reign, our eldeſt general geographer or antiquary is ſaid to have been Thomas Sulmo, a Guernſey man, who died at London in the year 1545. The year following, a much greater man of the profeſſion, ſir Thomas Elliot, one of king Henry's ambaſſadors, and ſir Thomas More's friends, died alſo. Cotemporary with thoſe two was George Lily (ſon of William, the famous grammarian), who lived ſome time at Rome with cardinal Pole, and publiſhed the firſt exact map that ever was, till then, drawn of this iſland."

In the year 1521 was firſt introduced the uſe of hand-guns or muſquets, whereby, in proceſs of time the practice of bows and arrows in war was quite laid aſide.

About the year 1535, glaſſes were firſt begun to be made in England: the finer ſort was made in Crutched-friars, London; the fine flint-glaſs, little inferior to that of Venice, was firſt made in the Savoy-houſe, in the Strand, London; but the firſt glaſs-plates for looking-glaſſes and coach windows, were made about the year 1673, at Vauxhall, near Lambeth, by the encouragement of the duke of Buckingham. The Engliſh have improved this manufacture ſo greatly, as to ſurpaſs every other nation in Europe in this uſeful branch of buſineſs.

The ingenious author of the Preſent State of England, printed in 1683, acquaints us, that the firſt manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1563, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London.

London. How ſtrangely are things altered ſince thoſe times! for now London excels all the earth in this article, and ſupplies many other nations therewith in great quantities.

Mr. Anderſon, in his moſt elaborate and uſeful work, lately publiſhed, concerning the Origin of Commerce, to which I acknowlege myſelf greatly indebted for many curious extracts, tells us that he has in his poſſeſſion the firſt work ever publiſhed in England on the art of Italian book-keeping, or merchants-accounts by double-entry; it is a folio, printed at London, anno 1569, in a black letter, the author James Peele. The ſtyle (ſays Mr. Anderſon) is obſolete, yet he has ſufficiently teſtified that he underſtood the true grounds and principles of double-entry accounts full as well as ſome who have written much later.

In all probability, this art of double-entry accounts had its riſe, or at leaſt its revival, amongſt the mercantile cities of Italy: poſſibly it might be firſt known at Venice, about the time that numeral algebra was taught there, from the principles of which ſcience double-entry, or what we call merchants-accounts, ſeem to have been deduced, viz. about the middle of the XVth century, though it did not reach England till our commerce, about this time, began to be conſiderable. It is ſaid that Lucas de Burgo, a friar, was the firſt European author who publiſhed his algebraic work at Venice, anno 1494.

In the year 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine or ſteel-loom, called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of ſtockings. This was but twenty years after we had firſt learned from Spain the method of knitting them with wires or needles. Mr. Lee's invention has proved of conſiderable benefit to the ſtocking manufacture, by enabling England, in after times, to export vaſt quantities of ſilk ſtockings to Italy, &c. where, it ſeems (by ſir Joſiah Child's excellent Diſcourſe on Trade, firſt publiſhed in the year 1678), they had then not got the uſe of the ſtocking-frame, though little ſhort of one hundred years after its invention: yet Dr. Howell, in his Hiſtory of the World (vol. iii. p. 222.) makes this invention eleven years after, 1600; and adds, that Mr. Lee not only taught his art in England and in France, but his ſervants did the ſame in Spain, Venice, and Ireland.

We have the beſt authority for fixing the date of the firſt manufacturing of ſail-cloth in England to the year 1599, being the preamble to an act of parliament of king James I. cap. xxiii. reciting, that "whereas the cloths called Mildernix, and Powl Davies, whereof ſails and other furniture for the navy and ſhipping are made, were heretofore altogether brought out of France, and other parts beyond ſea, and the skill and art of making and weaving the ſaid cloth was never known or uſed in England till about the thirty-ſecond year of the reign of the late queen Elizabeth (i. e. 1590.), about which time the skill and art of making and weaving was attained to, and ſince practiſed and continued in this realm to the great benefit and commodity thereof," &c.

As we ſtill excel all nations upon earth both in naval power and maritime commerce, every thing relative to either ſhould (as far as is practicable) come to us at the firſt hand; yet, though it may ſeem ſomewhat ſtrange, that a nation in thoſe days very far from being eminent in ſhipping, ſhould have ſo long ſupplied us with this great article, it ought to be conſidered, that they were in thoſe days (and long before we fell into it) eminent for the manufacture of many kinds of excellent cloths, made both of flax and hemp; and that perfection (in almoſt every art) is not to be arrived at but by very ſlow degrees.

In or about the ſame year was the invention of the teleſcope or ſpying-glaſs diſcovered, being juſtly eſteemed one of the moſt uſeful and excellent diſcoveries of modern times; though it was, it ſeems, produced by mere chance. The common account is, that two children of one Janſſen, a ſpectacle-maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand, being at play in their father's ſhop, and looking through two pieces of glaſs between their fingers, which were at ſome ſmall diſtance from each other, the weather-cock of the church-ſteeple appeared to them unuſually large, and much nearer; of this they inſtantly told their father, who, ſurprized alſo at firſt, made the experiment of fixing two ſuch pieces of glaſs in brazen circles, or cylinders, ſo as they might be placed nearer or farther, at pleaſure. Janſſen very ſoon improved this diſcovery ſo much, that he preſented a teleſcope, twelve inches long, to prince Maurice, and another to the archduke Albert. Mr. Wotton (in his Reflections on ancient and modern Learning) relates, "that prince Maurice, conjecturing this might be of great uſe in war, deſired him to conceal his ſecret, and for that reaſon his name was ſo little known, that neither Des Cartes nor Gerard Voſſius had ever heard any thing of him, when they attributed this invention to one Jacobus Metius, of Allemain." None of theſe firſt teleſcopes, however, were above eighteen inches long, neither were they properly framed for aſtronomical obſervations, until Galileo, aſtronomer to the grand-duke of Tuſcany, hearing of this diſcovery for bringing objects nearer, made ſuch great improvements therein, as to have gained him, in the opinion of many, the honour of the invention itſelf, by giving to the teleſcope the appellation of Galileo's Tube. Some, indeed, make this noble invention to have happened ſome years later, and that J. Baptiſta Porta, a Neapolitan, was the firſt inventor; but the general belief is as above. Our incomparable ſir Iſaac Newton was the inventor of the reflecting teleſcope, conſiſting of ſpecula, or mirrors, inſtead of lenſes, which has been ſince much improved, and is much more exact than reflecting ones. The microſcope, which magnifies the ſmalleſt objects ſo as to be diſtinctly viewed, was diſcovered in the year 1621; and it is ſaid this happened both at Naples and Holland at the ſame time. Mezeray makes this invention eighteen years later; yet he adds, that even the ancients muſt have known the uſe of them, if what Roger Bacon ſays be true, viz. "that Julius Cæſar being on the Belgic ſhore, oppoſite Britain, did, with certain great burning-glaſſes, diſcover the poſture and diſpoſition of the Britiſh army, and all the coaſts of that country."—Which whoever pleaſe, may believe!

By the teleſcope, aſtronomy is brought to ſuch a degree of perfection, as it was impoſſible for the ancients to arrive at. Navigation, and conſequently commerce, is likewiſe much aſſiſted, from a more perfect diſcovery of the heavenly bodies:

and many volumes have been publiſhed of the wonderful and amazing diſcoveries made by the microſcope.

About this time flouriſhed the famous Daniſh aſtronomer, Tycho Brahe, who made ſome aſtronomical diſcoveries and improvements, which proved very beneficial to navigation and maritime commerce. He deceaſed anno 1601.

The progreſs which the fine arts made in England ſince the death of their patron, Wolſey, was next to nothing. The Engliſh poetry, indeed, ſeemed to have riſen amongſt us complete, and is the only art that, ſince the days of Shakeſpeare and Spencer, has been on the declining hand. Architecture came, towards the middle and cloſe of this century, to be more ſumptuous; but its ſtyle was barbarous. Painting has, in England, been always of foreign growth, and when tranſplanted hither, has been but juſt kept alive by the bounty of the great; nor could England, during the ſucceſſive reigns of Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, produce a patron like Wolſey, or an artiſt like Holbein, who in the likeneſs could draw the character.

The progreſs made in the mathematical art was confined to the ſtudies of Dee and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh. In natural philoſophy the nation was exceſſively ignorant, inſomuch that we read in the year 1577, ſome of the greateſt men about court ſuffered themſelves to be bubbled out of conſiderable ſums by impoſtors, who pretended to the ſecret of tranſmuting metals: we are ſorry to find the name of that great and able man Burleigh, in the liſt of thoſe dupes of a ſenſeleſs credulity. The queen's own example revived a taſte for muſic, both vocal and inſtrumental; and even dancing was not void of elegance.

Although the nobility of this age preſerved great remains of the ancient cuſtoms, yet they were by degrees acquiring the taſte of elegant luxury, and many edifices in particular were built by them, neat, large, and ſumptuous, to the great ornament of the kingdom, ſays Camden, but to the no leſs decay of the glorious hoſpitality of the nation. It is, however, more reaſonable to think, that this new turn of expence promoted arts and induſtry, while the ancient hoſpitality was the ſource of real diſorder and ſedition, idleneſs. Among the other ſpecies of luxury, that of apparel began much to increaſe during this age, and the queen thought proper to reſtrain it by proclamation. Her example was very little conformable to her edicts; as no woman was ever more conceited of her beauty, nor more deſirous of making impreſſions on the hearts of beholders; no one ever went to greater extravagance in apparel, nor ſtudied more the variety and richneſs of her dreſs; ſhe appeared almoſt every day in a different habit, and tried all the ſeveral modes by which ſhe hoped to make herſelf agreeable: ſhe was likewiſe ſo fond of her cloaths, that ſhe never would part with any of them; and at her death ſhe had in her wardrobe all the different habits, to the number of three thouſand, which ſhe had ever worn in her life-time. The retrenchment of the ancient hoſpitality, and the diminution of retainers, was ever favourable to the prerogative of the ſovereign, and, by diſabling the great noblemen from reſiſtance, promoted the execution of the laws, and extended the authority of the courts of juſtice.

Of COMMERCE, HUSBANDRY, NAVIGATION, PUBLIC REVENUES, &c. in ENGLAND during the XVIth Century.

THE Engliſh had not the ſame ſplendor of ſucceſs with the Spaniards, nor ſuch influence in other courts, nor did they poſſeſs that great power which rendered Spain ſo dangerous to her neighbours; but they acquired a new kind of glory from the ocean, and the extenſive maritime trade they carried on: they knew their true element, and that alone made them more happy than all the foreign conqueſts and poſſeſſions of their ancient kings, and they became a powerful, civilized, induſtrious, laborious, and enterprizing nation. The improvements made by the Spaniards in navigation excited their emulation, and they undertook three ſucceſſive voyages to diſcover a north-weſt paſſage to Japan and China: Drake and Cavendiſh ſailed round the globe, attacking in all places thoſe very Spaniards who had extended their conqueſt and trade to both ends of the world: the famous ſir Walter Raleigh eſtabliſhed the colony of Virginia, and afterwards aſſiſted in that expedition wherein the Engliſh fleet went and inſulted Philip II. upon his own coaſts, deſtroying his ſhips, and burning the rich city of Cadiz: at length, grown more formidable, they, in 1602, defeated the firſt fleet Philip III. ſent to ſea, and from that time acquired a ſuperiority at ſea, which they have ever ſince maintained.

From the firſt beginning of Elizabeth's reign they applied themſelves to manufactures. The Flemings, being perſecuted by Philip II. removed to London, bringing with them an increaſe of inhabitants, induſtry, and riches. This capital, which enjoyed the bleſſings of peace under Elizabeth, cultivated likewiſe the liberal arts, which are the badges and conſequences of plenty: in a word, London was enlarged, civilized, and embelliſhed, and in a ſhort time one half of the little iſland of Great Britain was able to counterbalance the whole power of Spain.

The Engliſh now figured as the ſecond nation in the world in induſtry, as in liberty they were the firſt. They began early to eſtabliſh a navy-royal; they commenced a great fiſhery on the Banks of Newfoundland, a whale-fiſhery in the North Seas, and a trade to Ruſſia; and, by means of an important diſcovery of a paſſage by ſea to that country, round the north cape of Lapland, opened an extenſive field for other diſcoveries, and new branches of commerce; they alſo commenced their Turkey trade; and in the very laſt year of this century incorporated the Eaſt India company.

Agriculture now began to be conſidered in England as the chief riches of the ſtate, while in Spain they began to neglect this real good for ideal treaſures: the gold and ſilver trade of the new world enriched the king of Spain, but in England the ſubject was benefited by the ſale of the natural commodities. A private merchant of London, ſir

Thomas Greſham, was at that time rich enough to build the Royal Exchange at his own expence, and to found and endow the college which bears his name; and ſeveral other citizens founded hoſpitals and public ſchools. Such, ſays Mr. de Voltaire, in his Eſſay on General Hiſtory, were the glorious effects produced by induſtry in this kingdom, that private perſons could do what kings at preſent can only effect, during the moſt happy adminiſtration.

Thus much in general: I ſhall now proceed to point out the moſt remarkable gradations, by which the ſeveral articles under our conſideration tended to perfection during this period.

Nothing material of diſcovery had been made from England ſince Cabot's voyage to the coaſt of America, in the year 1496. In 1525, king Henry VIII. ſent two ſhips towards the ſame coaſts, one of which was caſt away in the Gulph of St. Laurence, and the other returned home the ſame year, but without any material diſcovery. One Robert Thorn is ſaid to have put Henry upon this voyage, in hopes of finding a north-weſt paſſage to the Moluccas.

In our review of the ſtate of Commerce, &c. at the end of the reign of Henry VII. we have ſhewn the ſtate of huſbandry in England at that time; it ſeems the evil then complained of, was now grown to a greater height, for, in the twenty-fifth of Henry VIII. a law was made (cap. xiii.) which repreſents "the cuſtom of engroſſing great numbers of ſheep in one man's hands, and for that end keeping many farms in the ſame man's hands, as a practice which has not been but within a few years paſt, putting ſuch lands as they can get into paſture, and not to tillage; whereby they have not only pulled down churches and towns [quære, how this could be], and enhanced old rates and rents, or elſe brought them to ſuch exceſſive fines, that no poor man is able to meddle with them; but alſo have enhanced all manner of corn, cattle, wool, pigs, geeſe, hens, chickens, eggs, &c. by reaſon whereof a marvellous multitude of people be not able to provide meat, cloaths, &c. for themſelves and families. One of the greateſt occaſions why thoſe covetous people do keep ſuch great quantities of lands in their hands from the occupying of the poor huſbandman, and do uſe it in paſture and not in tillage, is only the great profit that cometh by ſheep, now got into few perſons hands in reſpect to the whole number of the king's ſubjects, that ſome have twenty-four thouſand, ſome twenty thouſand, ſome ten thouſand to five thouſand ſheep, whereby a good ſheep, that uſed to be ſold for two ſhillings and four pence, or three ſhillings at moſt, now ſold for ſix, five, or four ſhillings at the leaſt; and a ſtone of wool, which uſed to be ſold for eighteen pence and twenty pence, is now ſold for four ſhillings or three ſhillings and four pence at leaſt, &c. which things tend to the decay of hoſpitality, the diminiſhing of the people, and the let of cloth-making, whereby many poor people have been accuſtomed to be ſet to work. For the remedy whereof, it was in ſubſtance enacted, I. That none ſhall keep above two thouſand four hundred ſheep (excluſive of lambs) at any one time, unleſs it be on his own land of inheritance, in which caſe he is not hereby limited, nor any ſpiritual perſons. II. No man ſhall hold above two farms, in the pariſh of one of which two he ſhall be obliged to live or reſide himſelf."

The increaſe of the woollen manufacture increaſing the demand for wool, gave riſe to this practice of engroſſing farms, and turning them into ſheep-walks, which undoubtedly can be managed by much fewer hands than tillage-farms can be, whereby depopulation muſt neceſſarily enſue.

In the year 1536, the twenty-ſeventh of Henry VIII. the king gave encouragement to certain merchants to ſend out two ſhips on diſcovery to the north coaſt of America, where they viſited Cape Breton and Newfoundland; and being in great diſtreſs for want of proviſions there, they returned home in October the ſame year; and although this voyage proved unfavourable to their main intent of finding a north-weſt paſſage to India, yet it gave riſe to the very beneficial fiſhery of the Engliſh on the Banks of Newfoundland, on which barren iſland one Mr. Hoar, of London, merchant, attempted a ſettlement at this time, though he met with much misfortune in that unſucceſsful attempt.

We find that the Engliſh merchants of Southampton and London traded to Braſil in the years 1540 and 1542, and ſo it ſeems at thoſe times to have been permitted, and until the year 1580, when the king of Spain got poſſeſſion of Portugal.

About this time the ſtate of ſhipping, even in the port of London, was very low, compared with the preſent time. If we may give credit to Wheeler's Treatiſe of Commerce, who wrote in 1601, he expreſly aſſerts, that about ſixty years before he wrote, there were not above four ſhips, beſides thoſe of the royal navy, that exceeded one hundred and twenty tons burthen, within the river of Thames.

In the year 1553, the laſt of Edward VI. a very great coſmographical as well as mercantile diſcovery was made by the enterprizing genius of a certain Engliſhman, who (whether reading Oether's account of the ſituation of the lands and ſeas about Norway, &c. delivered to the great king Alfred, anno 887, or whether from any informations lately received from the Norway people, with whom we now conſtantly traded) about this time diſcovered a paſſage by ſea to Ruſſia, along the north end of Norway and Ruſſian Lapland, and down into the ſea or rather great bay, ſince termed the White Sea, in which is ſituated the noted port of Archangel. Sir Hugh Willoughby, as commander in chief, with three ſhips, had begun this voyage juſt before the death of Edward VI. being ſupported by a ſociety or company of gentlemen and merchants for the diſcovery of unknown countries. It ſeems to have been the ſcheme of the famous Sebaſtian Cabot, who was choſen governor of that company, and who well deſerved the penſion already noted to have been ſettled on him by Edward VI. and that the wars of Sweden with Ruſſia by the way of Norway, in ſome degree obliged the Engliſh to attempt this new paſſage to Ruſſia by the Northern Ocean. This undertaking was ſupported by a ſubſcription of ſix thouſand pounds, divided into twenty-four ſhares, twenty-five pounds each ſhare. With thoſe ſhips went letters from king Edward to all kings, princes, &c. for their protection. It was intended chiefly as a ſhorter and eaſier paſſage (as they imagined) to Cathay (a name then uſed for that country which is now called China.) Sir Hugh Willoughby being toſſed up and down down for a long time as far as ſeventy-two degrees north latitude, was compelled, by the ſudden approach of winter, to run into an obſcure harbour in Ruſſian Lapland, called Arcaia Keca, where he and the crew of two of his three ſhips (ſeventy in number) were frozen to death, and where ſome Ruſſian fiſhermen, in the ſummer following, found him ſitting in his cabin, with his diary and other papers before him: it being the cuſtom of thoſe Laplanders to frequent the ſea-coaſts in ſummer for the benefit of the fiſhery, but when winter approaches, to withdraw into the Calmar iſle and parts, which occaſions thoſe ſtormy ſhores to be deſolate in winter. Richard Chancellor however, in the third ſhip, accidentally fell into the bay of St. Nicholas, or White Sea, on the Ruſſian coaſt, where no European, nor any other ſhips, had ever been ſeen before: here he landed at the abbey of St. Nicholas, near Archangel, then only a caſtle, determining to wait on the czar John Bazilowitz, at that time engaged in the Livonian war; which war having greatly interrupted the Eaſtland trade, that prince was the more inclinable, by Chancellor's interpoſition, to grant the Engliſh conſiderable privileges at Archangel, &c. The Ruſſians before thoſe times having no ſea-ports nor ſhipping on the Baltic ſhores, the rich furs, hemp, &c. were carried to other parts of Europe, from the ports of Livonia lately poſſeſſed by the Teutonic kinghts of St. Mary of Jeruſalem. Thus (as in general is noted in our introduction), although we failed in our principal aim of arriving at China by this ſuppoſed north-eaſt paſſage, we however made a uſeful and profitable diſcovery of a trade by ſea to Ruſſia: and this ſame diſcovery moreover pointed out likewiſe to the Engliſh the way to the whale-fiſhery at Spitzbergen, ſoon after put in practice.

Chancellor, from Archangel, by the governor's leave and aſſiſtance, travelled on ſledges to the czar's court at Moſcow, of whom (overjoyed at the new opening of a maritime commerce with Europe) he obtained privileges from the Engliſh merchants, and letters to king Edward VI. who, however, died before the arrival of Chancellor.

Thus, by the encouragement of this excellent young prince, for making diſcoveries northward, a beginning was made for a trade to Ruſſia; but Edward dying before he had executed a very ample charter to thoſe adventurers, it was the ſaid firſt and ſecond of Philip and Mary (February 6, 1554) that the firſt charter of incorporation was granted to the Ruſſia company (as it has ſince been uſually called), but then by the name of the Merchants Adventurers for the Diſcoveries of Lands, Countries, Iſles, &c. not before known or frequented by any Engliſh. The preamble to this charter, and the ſubſtance of the whole it ſets forth, is, that the marquis of Wincheſter, then lord high-treaſurer, the earl of Arundel, lord high-ſteward of the queen's houſhold, the earl of Bedford, lord privy-ſeal, and the earl of Pembroke, the lord Howard of Effingham, lord high-admiral, &c. had already fitted out ſhips for diſcoveries northward, north-eaſtward, and north-weſtward, not as yet frequented by other Chriſtian monarchs in friendſhip with us, to have one governor (the firſt to be Sebaſtian Cabot, for life), and twenty-eight of the moſt ſad (i. e. ſedate), diſcreet, and honeſt of the ſaid fellowſhip, four of whom to be called Conſuls, and the other twenty-four to be called Aſſiſtants; the governor and two conſuls (or three conſuls in the governor's abſence), and twelve aſſiſtants to be the quorum of a court. This corporation might purchaſe lands to the yearly value of ſixty pounds thirteen ſhillings and four pence, to have perpetual ſucceſſion, a common-ſeal, may plead and be impleaded, may impoſe mulcts, forfeitures, &c. on offenders againſt the company's privileges, and may admit perſons from time to time to be free of the company; may make conqueſts of lands of infidels, ſo to be diſcovered by them. And whereas one of the ſaid ſhips (i. e. Chancellor's) ſet forth laſt year (1553) arrived ſafe, and wintered, in the dominions of our couſin and brother, lord John Baſilowitz, emperor of all Ruſſia, who entertained them honourably, &c. and granted them letters to us, with free licence to traffick into his country, with other privileges, under his ſignet; wherefore we grant this corporation liberty to reſort, not only to all parts of that emperor's dominions, but to all other parts not known to our ſubjects; none of whom but ſuch as ſhall be free of, or licenced by, this company, ſhall frequent the parts aforeſaid, under forfeiture of ſhip and merchandize, one half to the crown and the other half to the company."

It ſeems the Briſtol merchants had gotten into the Ruſſia trade ſoon after its diſcovery, being encouraged thereto by ſir Sebaſtian Cabot.

Much the like complaints in relation to the Engliſh woollen manufacturers as have been made in the preſent time, were we find made above two hundred years ago, as appears by the ſtatute of the ſecond and third of Philip and Mary (cap. xi.) entitled, "Who ſhall uſe the trade of weaving," viz. "that whereas the rich clothiers do oppreſs the weavers, ſome by ſetting up and keeping in their houſes divers looms, and maintaining them by journeymen and perſons unskilful; ſome by engroſſing looms into their hands, and letting them out at ſuch unreaſonable rents as the poor artificers are not able to maintain themſelves by, and much leſs their wives and families, ſome again by giving much leſs wages for the workmanſhip of cloths than in times paſt, whereby they are forced utterly to forſake their occupations, &c. wherefore it is enacted, I. That no clothier, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, ſhall keep above one loom in his houſe, nor let out any loom for hire. II. That no woollen weaver, living out of a city, borough, or market-town, ſhall keep more than two looms, nor more than two apprentices. III. No weaver (whilſt ſuch) ſhall have a tucking-mill, nor be a tucker, fuller, nor dyer. IV. No tucker or fuller (whilſt ſuch) ſhall keep any loom in his houſe. V. That no perſon who hath not heretofore been a cloth-maker, ſhall hereafter make or weave any kind of broad white woollen cloths, but only in a city, borough, town corporate, or market-town, or elſe in ſuch places where ſuch cloths have been uſed to be commonly made for ten years preceding this act. [This clauſe was probably well intended, that the ſearchers might be the better enabled to ſee the goodneſs of this manufacture.] VI. No perſon ſhall ſet up as a weaver, unleſs he hath previouſly ſerved an apprenticeſhip of ſeven years to that buſineſs. Laſtly, that nothing in this act is to extend or be prejudicial to the inhabitants of the counties of York, Cumberland, and Weſtmoreland; but they they may keep looms in their houſes, and do every other matter relating to ſpinning, weaving, and cloth-making in the ſaid counties as before the making this ſtatute."

After England had held the town and port of Calais (with its dependent garriſons of Guiſnes and Ham) for two hundred and eleven years (the only part of the continent of France held by England) during which time it was not only a door always open for the invaſion of France, over which, for that reaſon, England had no ſmall influence; but (which is more to our purpoſe) was extremely well ſituated for a ſtaple port, to diſperſe, in more early times, the wool, lead, tin, and, in later times, the woollen manufactures of England, into the inland countries of the Netherlands, France, and Germany; the loſs of this important place (in the year 1558) to the French, moſt ſhamefully and negligently, in the midſt of winter, was undoubtedly a conſiderable prejudice to commerce, and not a little to the honour and influence of England. Hereupon the ſtaple of wool, &c. was removed to Burges, to the great benefit of that city, which had been for ſome time declining from its ancient opulence and grandeur.

That moſt diligent agent for the Ruſſian company, Mr. Anthony Jenkinſon, did, in the year 1557, firſt ſet on foot a new channel of trade, through Ruſſia into Perſia, for raw ſilk, &c. He ſailed down the great river Volga to Niſi, Novogorod, Caſan, and Aſtracan, and thence croſſed the Caſpian ſea to Perſia. At Boghar, a goodly city, he found merchants from India, Perſia, Ruſſia, and Cathay or China, from which laſt-mentioned country it was nine months journey to Boghar. Jenkinſon returned the ſame way to Colmizro, in the bay of St. Nicholas, anno 1560, and ſo home the ſame year to England. On his return he publiſhed the firſt map of Ruſſia, that had ever been made. This voyage, it ſeems, he performed ſeven different times; yet ſo promiſing a proſpect for that company was dropped ſome few years afterwards, and remained as if it had never been, until the reign of king George II. anno 1744, when it was revived by an act of parliament, enabling the Ruſſia company to trade thence into Perſia; upon which conſiderable quantities of raw ſilk were brought home by the very ſame way that Jenkinſon took from Perſia to Ruſſia, and thence to England: yet the continual troubles and ravages in Perſia have ſince ſuſpended the good effects of this law.

We are now arrived (November 17, 1558) at the commencement of the moſt illuſtrious female reign, and of the longeſt duration, which probably ever exiſted in the world, viz. that of the truly great Elizabeth, queen of England, it is not now either our preſent province or intention to draw her character at length, which has already been done; we ſhall therefore, at this entrance on her glorious government, confine ourſelves to this one brief remark, viz. that, to her immortal honour and her kingdom's immenſe benefit, her reign was ſupplied with more important articles for commercial hiſtory, and more beneficial to the kingdom (even whilſt ſhe was ſurrounded by foreign and domeſtic enemies) than perhaps all the preceding reigns jointly, ſince the time of her great predeceſſor king Edward III. We ſhall here only in general remark, that, on her now ſucceeding to the crown, ſhe found the balance of power and wealth already got into the hands of the commons, or people, ſhe prudently conducted her meaſures accordingly; though now and then ſhe would exert her prerogative as far (though with more prudence) as did ſome of her leſs wiſe ſucceſſors.

In the year 1560, the ſecond of Elizabeth, ſhe by her charter confirmed all former charters of privileges to the company of merchant-adventurers of England, and likewiſe granted them two other ample charters, viz. one in the ſixth, and the other in the twenty-eighth year of her reign, in the former of which they had firſt the deſignation of Merchant-adventurers given them.

The Engliſh Ruſſian company which had been incorporated in the firſt and ſecond of Philip and Mary, anno 1554, had now the noble ſanction of an act of parliament, in the eighth year of Elizabeth's reign.

Martin (afterwards ſir Martin) Frobiſher or Forbiſher made now his firſt voyage for diſcovering a north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt Indies, Captain Luke Fox, in his book, in quarto, entitled The North-weſt Fox, printed anno 1535, ſays, "that Mr. Forbiſher was fifteen years in noting and bringing up the adventure, before he did attempt the ſame, which was brought to paſs by the help of Ambroſe Dudley, earl of Warwick." He ſet out with two barks, of twenty-five tons each, and one pinnace, of ten tons, and entered the ſtreights going into the great bay (ſince called Hudſon's Bay), which he named Forbiſher's Streight; he alſo gave the following names to places there, viz. Queen Elizabeth's Foreland, Cape Labrador, Gabriel's Iſland, Prior's Sound, and ſundry other iſlands, capes, and bays, by which names the ſame places are known to this day. He brought home one of the ſavages, and alſo a kind of bright ſtone, which being tried by the London goldſmiths, it was given out by them, that it held gold in it very richly, and are ſaid to have promiſed great matters, if any quantity thereof could be obtained; which flattering hopes produced a ſecond voyage, ten years after, although no north-weſt paſſage was found.

Mr. John Hawkins, aſſiſted by the ſubſcriptions of ſundry gentlemen, now fitted out three ſhips, and having learned that Negroes were a very good commodity in Hiſpaniola, he ſailed to the coaſt of Guinea, took in Negroes, and ſailed with them for Hiſpaniola; where he ſold his ſlaves and Engliſh commodities, and loaded his three veſſels with hides, ſugar, and ginger, and alſo many pearls, returning home anno 1563, after making a proſperous voyage. This ſeems to have been the very firſt attempt from England for eſtabliſhing a Negroe trade.

The Engliſh genius was not to be diſcouraged by former unſucceſsful attempts for finding a paſſage to China and the Eaſt Indies, without interfering with the Portugueſe by the Cape of Good Hope ſouth-eaſtward, nor with the Spaniards ſouth-weſtward by the Streights of Magellan: and as they had attempted in vain a paſſage north-eaſtward, there ſeemed now only the north-weſtward paſſage to be explored, which we have ſeen had been in part already attempted by Forbiſher. The Portugueſe and Spaniſh chart-makers and coſmographers were, it ſeems, expreſly enjoined by their ſovereigns, not to give any kind of light to any other nation, in this reſpect, becauſe they were greatly aprehenſive leſt, if there were any ſuch north-weſt paſſage, it would prove a much ſhorter courſe to India and China than theirs, either by the ſouth-eaſt or ſouth-weſt paſſage. For encouraging the Engliſh in this attempt, ſundry treatiſes were publiſhed by ſir Humphrey Gilbert, Mr. Richard Wilkes, &c. built moſtly upon the romantic reports of certain ancient and ſome more modern authors, without any ſolid probability: yet, upon ſuch ſlight grounds, and encouragement of friends, captain Forbiſher made his ſecond attempt in 1577, with one of the queen's own ſhips, two barks, and one hundred and forty perſons, ſome of whom were gentlemen. He again entered the ſtreights he had named after himſelf in his former attempt, where he found ſtore of glittering ſtones and ſand, which he had ſeen in his laſt voyage, and with which he now loaded his veſſels, returning home the ſame year, with his imaginary treaſure, which, upon farther trial proved good for nothing. However, this ſerved to give riſe to the third and laſt fruitleſs attempt, by the ſame ſea-commander, in the enſuing year, to find out a north-weſt paſſage to China.

In the ſame year, 1578, Hakluyt gives us an account of the Newfoundland fiſhers from Europe, in the preceding year, viz. "One hundred ſhips from Spain, fifty from Portugal, one hundred and fifty from France, and fifteen from England: that the Engliſh had the beſt ſhips, and therefore gave law to the reſt, being in the bays, and protectors of others; for which it was then, and had been of old a cuſtom to make them ſome ſort of acknowlegement as admirals, ſuch as a boat-load of ſalt for guarding them from pirates and other violent invaders, who frequently drove them from a good harbour," &c. He ſays, "the fiſhery of the Engliſh at Iceland was the reaſon that we had not then ſuch numbers of ſhips at Newfoundland; that the Spaniards, next to the Engliſh, had the beſt ſhips there; that there were then alſo twenty or thirty ſhips from Biſcay, to kill whales, for train-oil." (But here is no mention as yet of whale-fins, or whale-bone, of ſo great value in our days (which ſhews its uſe for women's ſtays, &c. was not then known.) His friend, in a letter from Newfoundland, is earneſt for the Engliſh to ſettle at the iſland of Cape Breton, for the benefit of the fiſhery, and in another iſle in the mouth of the great river of St. Laurence. Hakluyt was in thoſe times a moſt indefatigable enquirer after new trades and diſcoveries, and was undoubtedly of great uſe to our adventurers, by giving them much light into the nature and means of diſcoveries, and ſeems to have been a public bleſſing to England in thoſe days.

We have, in the former part of the hiſtory of this reign, given an account of the circumnavigation of the terraqueous globe by ſir Francis Drake, and therefore have no occaſion to recapitulate the particulars of that tranſaction in this place; we ſhall therefore proceed to give a ſhort account of the firſt eſtabliſhment of, and charter granted to, the Engliſh Turkey company.

Queen Elizabeth having ſettled preliminaries at Conſtantinople, two years before, for her ſubjects to trade to Turkey, ſhe now (viz. anno 1581) judged it reaſonable to incorporate a number of eminent merchants for that end, ſir Edward Oſbern, an alderman of London, Thomas Smith, eſq. Richard Staper, and William Garrett, merchants; in which charter of corporation the queen ſets forth, "that the ſaid ſir Edward Oſbern and Richard Staper, had, at their own great coſts and charges, found out and opened a trade to Turkey, not heretofore, in the memory of any man living, known to be commonly uſed and frequented, by way of merchandize, by any merchants or other ſubjects of us or our progenitors, whereby many good offices may be done for the peace of Chriſtendom, relief of Chriſtian ſlaves, and good vent of the commodities of the realm, to the advancement of her honour and dignity, the increaſe of her revenue, and of the general wealth of the realm: her majeſty therefore grants unto thoſe four merchants, their executors and adminiſtrators, and to ſuch Engliſhmen (not exceeding twelve in number) as the ſaid ſir Edward Oſbern and Richard Staper ſhall appoint to be joined to them and the other two before-named perſons, and their factors, ſervants, or deputies, for the ſpace of ſeven years to trade to Turkey, in ſuch manner as the ſaid company ſhall agree between themſelves. During which time, they may make bye-laws for their good government (not repugnant to the laws of the kingdom.) Nothing to be tranſacted without the conſent of the governor for the time being (ſir Edward Oſbern being hereby appointed the firſt governor): the trade to Turkey to be ſolely to them, their factors and ſervants, during the ſaid term: and any other ſubjects trading thither, either by ſea or land, without this company's licence, to forfeit ſhips and goods; a moiety to the crown, the other moiety to this company. For the laſt ſix of the ſaid ſeven years, this company ſhall export ſo much goods to Turkey as ſhall annually pay at leaſt five hundred pounds cuſtom to the crown (except in caſe of ſhip wreck, &c.) I. Proviſo, that in caſe this excluſive grant ſhall hereafter appear to be inconvenient, the queen may revoke the ſame, upon one year's previous notice. II. Proviſo, the queen, during the ſaid term, may nominate two perſons to be added to the ſaid number of patentees, with the ſame privileges, &c. as the reſt herein named. Laſtly, that if, at the end of the ſaid ſeven years theſe grantees deſire it, the queen will grant other ſeven years to them, provided (as aforeſaid) the ſaid excluſive trade ſhall not appear to be unprofitable to the kingdom."

The queen's letters to the grand ſignor were received with much civility, being delivered to him by her ambaſſador, Hareborne, anno 1582, whom ſhe empowered to ſettle conſuls in the ſeveral ports, and to eſtabliſh laws or rules to be obſerved by the Engliſh trading to Turkey.

With the firſt factor the indefatigable Hakluyt (vol. iii. p. 164, 165) ſent excellent inſtructions for enquiring into the nature of dyeing ſtuffs; alſo what of thoſe drugs might be produced in England; and how beneficial ſuch new productions would have been to us, which he inſtances in that of ſaffron, firſt brought into England by a pilgrim; as alſo woad, originally from Thouloufe, in Languedoc: "that the damask-roſe was firſt brought into England by Dr. Linacre, phyſician to king Henry VII. and king Henry VIII. Turkey fowls, about fifty years paſt (viz. about 1532): the artichoke in king Henry VIII's time; and of later times the muſk-roſe and ſeveral ſorts of plums, by lord Cromwell, out of Italy: the apricot by king Henry VIII's French gardiner: (but there is no mentioned yet of peaches, nor of nectarines).

And now, within theſe four years (anno 1578) have been brought into England from Vienna, in Auſtria, divers kinds of flowers called tulips, and others procured thither a little before from Conſtantinople. And it is ſaid, that ſince we traded to Zante (this muſt have been but lately), the plant that beareth the currant is alſo brought into this realm; and although it brings not fruit to perfection, yet it may ſerve for pleaſure and for ſome uſe. (This ſhews it was then but juſt introduced.) Many other things have been brought in, that have degenerated by reaſon of the coldneſs of the climate: ſome things brought in, have, through negligence, been long loſt; and archbiſhop Grindal brought the tamariſk plant from Germany, and many people have received great health by this plant."

On the commencement of the Engliſh trade to Turkey, the merchants having occaſion to attend the queen and council, they had there great thanks and commendations for the ſhips they then built of ſo great burthen, with many encouragements to purſue the plan, for the kingdom's ſake, ſays the author of Trade's Increaſe, who adds, that the ordinary returns of this trade, at the beginning, were three for one.

By England's entering at this time into a direct trade to Turkey, all the commodities of Greece, Syria, Egypt, Perſia, and India, came home to us much cheaper. "And (ſays ſir William Monſon) when the Venetians ſerved us with thoſe rich eaſtern wares, by the way of the Red Sea, and down the Nile to Alexandria, and alſo by the way of caravans to Aleppo, they (i. e. the Venetians) alſo were then wont to take freight in their ſhips from port to port, whereas now (i. e. 1685) all ſtrangers are more deſirous to employ our own ſhips in that ſervice."

Jacobs, in his Lex Mercatoria, alleges (upon what authority I know not), that the Barbary merchants were incorporated in king Henry VII's time; but that company decaying, out of their ruins aroſe the Levant or Turkey company, who firſt trading with Venice, and then with Turkey, furniſhed England that way with Eaſt Indian commodities, which till then were brought to us (moſtly) by land, and to the Portugueſe alone by long ſea," &c.

The ſame year, 1582, the ſhip Suſan, of London, mounting thirty-four guns, carried over to Turkey the Engliſh ambaſſador, Hareborn, who now firſt ſettled peace with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, which piratical ſtates had taken many ſhips belonging to London, Briſtol, &c. and Hareborn having eſtabliſhed all the Engliſh factories in Turkey (maugre the ſpite and malice of the French and Venetians) returned over-land to England.

Sir Walter Raleigh, whoſe great genius much inclining him to new enterprizes and diſcoveries, had this year formed a ſociety of gentlemen and merchants to ſubſcribe a conſiderable ſum of money towards forming a ſettlement on the continent of North America, and on Lady-day, 1584, queen Elizabeth granted them a charter for that purpoſe. Amidas and Barlow, with two veſſels, were accordingly ſent thither: but they ſailed about a thouſand leagues out of their way; for the ſhort courſe to the northern parts of America not being as yet known to us, they ſteered the wonted courſe of the Spaniards, by the Canary Iſlands, and thence into the trade-winds to the Caribbee Iſlands, thence ſailing through the Gulph of Florida, they anchored at a part of what is now called Virginia, where, making ſome inſignificant trade with the natives, exchanging toys for their furs, they returned home with gain (as they ſaid), and greatly magnified the richneſs of the country. For encouraging a ſecond adventure, they brought home ſome pearls and tobacco (the firſt of that ſort that had been ſeen in England.) The wiſe queen ſeemed fond of this deſign, and either ſhe herſelf, or ſir Walter Raleigh, gave the country the name of Virginia, which they judiciouſly repreſented to be a pleaſant country, abounding in fine woods, deer, hares, wild fowl, fiſh, vines, currants, &c.

Raleigh therefore obtained queen Elizabeth's patent to himſelf, &c. for the poſſeſſing ſuch remote heathen lands, not then inhabited by Chriſtians, as they ſhould diſcover for ſix years, of which they thereby had the property granted to them for ever, reſerving to the crown the fifth part of all gold and ſilver ore found therein, with power to ſeize to their proper uſe all ſhips, with their merchandize, that ſhall, without leave, plant within two hundred leagues of this intended ſettlement, excepting, however, the queen's ſubjects and allies, fiſhing at Newfoundland, &c. She alſo grants free denization to the planters and their poſterity reſiding there: powers are alſo granted to the patentees for making bye-laws there, not repugnant to thoſe of England.

It is obſervable, that in this, and ſome other patents of thoſe times, there were no diſtinct place, longitude, or latitude, fixed or limited for ſuch plantation, although undoubtedly North America was the country intended.

In the next year, 1585, captain John Davis, with two barks from Dartmouth, firſt ſailed into the ſtreights ſince called by his name, in the country called Old Greenland, and returned home the ſame year, as all others have done, without making any uſeful diſcovery. At this time we find they knew the uſe of ſomewhat like the harpoon, with which they killed a porpoiſe; but though many whales fell in their way, they knew not yet the right method of killing them.

This ſame year the gallant ſir Richard Grenville ſailed for Virginia by the old round-about courſe, above deſcribed, with ſeven ſhips, laden with arms, ammunition, and proviſions, and with ſettlers for planting a colony. He began with planting at Roanoke Iſland, lying about five leagues from the continent, in eighty-ſix degrees north latitude. There he left one hundred and eight men: it is a truly melancholy conſideration, that thoſe poor creatures were left to ſhift for themſelves in ſo wild a country, for above a year; who, ſo eager to diſcover gold and ſilver mines (now never like to be found there), whilſt they neglected to prepare their proviſions in due ſeaſon, and going up the country in queſt of thoſe mines (for golden dreams were then univerſal), moſt of them were either deſtroyed by the natives, or periſhed for want; and the few who ſurvived were taken up by ſir Francis Drake, coming now again upon the coaſt from harraſſing the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, who took them all home with him, even although they had ſown corn there, which was very near ripe, ſufficient for two years ſuſtenance; ſuſtenance; and they were but juſt gone, when a ſhip, fitted out at the ſole expence of ſir Walter Raleigh, arrived there with all ſorts of conveniences, as did ſir Richard Grenville ſoon after, with three other ſhips, bringing a farther ſupply: but finding the places quite deſolate where the Engliſh planters had ſettled, they all returned home. In thoſe accounts there appears to be ſome confuſion, with reſpect as well to the identical year, as to the names of perſons engaged therein, which is owing to the inaccuracy of writers and tranſcribers in thoſe days, which, however is of very little conſequence at preſent.

Sir Walter Raleigh had his mind ſo intenſely ſet upon a plantation in North America, that he again ſent out three ſhips, with an hundred and fifty perſons of both ſexes. Theſe planters Raleigh's ſuperintendant ſettled in the iſle of Roanoke, where he found the ſecond colony had been deſtroyed by the natives. Here he rebuilt the fort and houſes, calling it the city of Raleigh in Virginia: he left one hundred and fifteen men in this new ſettlement, and returned home, where he remained three years before he could obtain the neceſſary ſupplies, which he had promiſed to bring in the year after he had left the colony, where he arrived in 1590, with theſe ſupplies both of men and ſtores, in three ſhips. It ſeems, ſuch of the colony as had remained alive had removed to a place on the continent called Croatoan, that word being carved upon the trees; to this place they intended to ſail in ſearch of the colony, but a ſtorm unfortunately ariſing, the ſhips loſt their anchors and cables, and proviſions alſo failing, they agreed to return home, leaving that miſerable colony to periſh, to the ſhame of that age; for although Raleigh was in trouble about this time, yet ſurely the queen and nation ought to have ſhewn ſome compaſſion to the poor people left in a wilderneſs amongſt ſavages.

Thus was this ſcheme of a plantation in Virginia quite laid aſide during all the reſt of queen Elizabeth's reign, and all the great expence of Raleigh and the other adventurers utterly thrown away, beſides the loſs of many mens lives.

It was in the year 1591 that the firſt voyage from England to Eaſt India was undertaken with three ſhips; but it was rather a privateering adventure, than a proper mercantile voyage, for they took ſeveral ſhips in their way to India. They had loſt ſo many men by ſickneſs near the cape of Good Hope, that they were obliged to ſend one of their ſhips home, and proceeded with only two to India: moreover, in a ſtorm beyond the Cape they loſt company with captain Raymond in the principal ſhip, which was never heard of more; ſo that only captain Lancaſter's ſhip arrived in India, which alſo met with many grievous misfortunes; and, on her return, ſailing to the Weſt Indies, whilſt the captain and the reſt of the men went on ſhore to ſeek proviſions on an uninhabited iſland, ſix of the ſailors ran away with the ſhip; and at the end of three years this unfortunate officer was brought home, ſeveral of his men having periſhed for want at that place.

Some Engliſh ſhips now made a voyage to Cape Breton, at the entrance of the Bay of St. Laurence, in North America, ſome for morſe-fiſhing and others for whale-fiſhing (ſays Hakluyt), which is the firſt mention we find of the latter fiſhery by any Engliſh; and although they met with no whales there, they found on an iſland eight hundred whale-fins, where a Biſcay ſhip had been loſt three years before. This too is the firſt mention of whale fins or whalebone by the Engliſh. How the ladies ſtays were made before this commodious material in them was diſcovered, does not appear; probably ſlit pieces of cane, or of ſome other tough and pliant wood, might have been in uſe before.

By the trade to Archangel the Engliſh became well acquainted with the northern ſeas at this time, where alſo they at firſt carried on a great fiſhing, or hunting rather, for morſes (as the Ruſſians call them, the Engliſh call them ſea-horſes, and the Dutch and French, ſea-cows) on Cherry Iſland, beyond the North Cape, ſo called from alderman Cherry, but called by the Dutch Bear Iſland: but it ſeems thoſe amphibious animals became ſo ſhy, that the moment they ſaw any man, they ran into the ſea. The Engliſh thereupon fell into the whale-fiſhery, though not quite ſo early as this time.

Grotius tells us, that the Hollanders, about this time built two thouſand ſhips every year; a thing almoſt incredible, conſidering their new exiſtence as an independent ſtate, did it not proceed from ſo illuſtrious and reſpectable an author, and their own countryman.

Our own Turkey merchants firſt, and the Dutch Eaſt India company next (for they had got the ſtart of us in the Eaſt India trade) keeping up the price of pepper and other ſpices to a high rate, we being at war with Spain, and ſo could not get ſpices from Liſbon at firſt-hand, queen Elizabeth now determined to enter her people directly on a commerce to Eaſt India.

Accordingly, on the thirty-firſt of December, 1600, ſhe granted a charter to George, earl of Cumberland, and two hundred and fifteen knights, aldermen, and merchants, "that, at their own coſts and charges they may ſet forth one or more voyages to the Eaſt Indians, in the countries and parts of Aſia and Africa, and to the iſlands thereabout, divers of which countries, iſlands, &c. have long ſince been diſcovered by others of our ſubjects; to be one body politic and corporate, by the name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the Eaſt Indies: to have ſucceſſion: to purchaſe lands (without limitation): to have one governor, and twenty-four perſons, to be elected annually, who ſhall be called Committees, jointly to have the direction of the voyages, the proviſion of the ſhipping, and the management of all other things belonging to the ſaid company. Sir Thomas Smith, alderman of London, was to be the firſt governor: and a deputy-governor to be elected in a general court: both the governors, and all the committees to take the oath of fidelity; as alſo every member ſhall take an oath, before being admitted to traffic as a freeman of this company. The company, their ſons (at twenty-one years of age), their apprentices, ſervants, and factors, in India or elſewhere, may, for fifteen years, from Chriſtmas laſt, freely and ſolely trade (by ſuch ways and paſſages as are already found out, or which ſhall hereafter be diſcovered) into the countries and ports of Aſia and Africa, and into and from all the iſlands, ports, towns, and places of Aſia, Africa, and America, or any of them, beyond Cape Bona Eſperanza to the Streights of Magellan, where any traffic of merchandize may

may be uſed, and to and from every of them, in ſuch manner as ſhall from time to time be limited and agreed on, at any general court of the company; any ſtatute, uſage, diverſity of religion or faith, or any other matter to the contrary notwithſtanding, ſo as it be not any country already poſſeſſed by any Chriſtian potentate in amity with her majeſty, who ſhall declare the ſame to be againſt his or their good liking. Either the governor or deputy governor muſt always be one in the general aſſemblies, when they may make all reaſonable conſtitutions, &c. agreeable to the laws of England, for their good government, by plurality of voices; and may puniſh, by fines and impriſonment, the offenders againſt their laws. The queen grants the company an exemption from paying any cuſtoms for the firſt four voyages; and for the cuſtoms which ſhall afterwards be payable for merchandize from India, the company ſhall be allowed to give their bonds, payable one half in ſix months and the other half in ſix months after: for merchandize loſt at ſea, outward-bound, the cuſtoms ſhall be allowed to the company out of the next cargo ſhipped off. Indian merchandize that ſhall have paid the cuſtoms, may, at the end of thirteen months, be re-exported by any ſubjects, without paying for their cuſtoms. The company may export, in their firſt voyage, now preparing, thirty thouſand pounds in foreign coin, or bullion, ſo that at leaſt ſix thouſand pounds thereof be firſt coined in the queen's mint; and the like for the ſubſequent voyages; provided the company firſt import at leaſt ſo much foreign coin or bullion, in gold or ſilver, into this realm, of which ſix thouſand pounds ſhall be coined as aforeſaid. The company may ſend yearly to Eaſt India ſix good ſhips and ſix pinnaces, with five hundred mariners, unleſs the navy-royal goes forth. None of the queen's ſubjects, but the company, their ſervants, or aſſigns, ſhall reſort to India, without being licenced by the company, upon pain of forfeiting ſhips and cargoes, with impriſonment till the offenders give one thouſand pounds bond to the company not to trade thither again. Nevertheleſs, for the encouragement of merchants ſtrangers, and others, to bring in commodities to the realm, the queen gives power to the company to grant licences to trade to Eaſt India; and ſhe promiſes not to grant leave to any others to trade thither, during the company's term, without their conſent. The majority of any general meeting of the company may admit apprentices, ſervants, factors, &c. to the fellowſhip or freedom of the ſaid company. The ſilver to be exported ſhall only be ſhipped at the ports of London, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and ſhall be duly entered by the cuſtom-houſe officers, without paying any cuſtom for the ſame. Gold and ſilver, imported by the company, ſhall be entered before the landing of the ſame. Provided, that, in caſe this charter ſhall hereafter appear not to be profitable to the crown and realm, then, upon two years notice to the company, their charter ſhall ceaſe and determine: but if otherwiſe, then the queen promiſes, at the end of the ſaid fifteen years, upon the company's ſuit, to grant them a new charter for fifteen years longer."

This is the very ſame Eaſt India company which, through many various viciſſitudes, exiſted under the ſame denomination until the year 1708, when it was abſorbed by the preſent United Company of Merchants of England trading to the Eaſt Indies. The original ſhares ſubſcribed were fifty pounds each.

To cloſe this account of the riſe and firſt proceedings of our Eaſt India company, we ſhall remark, that the company's ſhips in their homeward bound paſſage took poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. Helena, then uninhabited; though, according to the cuſtom of the Portugueſe, well ſtocked with goats, hogs, and poultry, that they might be ſupplied therewith when obliged at any time to ſtop there. Here our Eaſt India company planted and fortified, and held it till the year 1673, as will be ſhewn in the courſe of this hiſtory. This iſland is all a high rock, whoſe ſurface is covered with about twelve inches of earth. As the winds blow conſtantly at ſouth-eaſt, from the Cape of Good Hope to this iſland (which is about twenty-two miles in circuit), it is ſailed in about three weeks, without handing the ſails, and the moderate gale renders the voyage very pleaſant. On the contrary, it is extremely difficult to find this iſland in ſailing from Europe, becauſe of the ſaid conſtant ſouth-eaſt wind; for which reaſon, when a ſhip is ſent from England thither, they are obliged to ſail directly to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence take their courſe to St. Helena, as already deſcribed. The great and only benefit our ſhipping receive from this iſland, is the freſh water and proviſions they there meet with in their return from India, whereby above two hundred families are there ſupported and employed.

The very laſt day of the XVIth century having thus given birth and form to the firſt Engliſh Eaſt India company, the members thereof immediately raiſed ſeventy-two thouſand pounds, though not in one joint-ſtock, or common capital, as in ſucceeding times, there having been no joint-ſtock in this company till the year 1613. They this year, 1601, ſent out their firſt fleet for India, commanded in chief by captain James Lancaſter, having one ſhip of ſix hundred tons, one of three hundred tons, two of two hundred each, and one of one hundred and thirty, as victualler to the whole fleet, carrying four hundred and eighty men and twenty ſeven thouſand pounds in money and goods, the remainder of the ſaid ſeventy-two thouſand pounds being entirely expended in the purchaſe of thoſe ſhips, and for artillery, ammunition, proviſions, &c. But queen Elizabeth did not live to ſee the return of this voyage. At Acheen, in the iſland of Sumatra, they loaded pepper for ſome of their ſhips, but not meeting with a ſufficiency, and ſailing from thence for the Streights of Malacca, they completed their lading by the capture of a Portugueſe ſhip of nine hundred tons, laden with callicoes and other goods. Sailing thence to Bantam, they delivered queen Elizabeth's letter and preſents to the king, as they had before done to the king of Acheen; and from both thoſe kings they received letters and preſents for queen Elizabeth; they alſo obtained privileges for the company from thoſe monarchs. Having ſettled factories at Bantam, they ſailed homewards, and arrived in the Downs in September, 1603, having proſperouſly made their firſt voyage in two years and ſeven months.

In the year 1601, we have a ſtatute of the forty-third of queen Elizabeth (cap. xii.) for awarding commiſſioners to hear and determine policies of aſſurances made among merchants, in the preamble of which ſtatute are the following words: "Whereas it hath been, time out of mind, an uſage amongſt merchants, both of this realm and of foreign nations, when they make any great adventure (eſpecially into remote parts, to give ſome conſideration of money to other perſons (which is commonly in no ſmall number) to have from them aſſurance made of their goods, merchandizes, ſhips, and things adventured, or ſome parts thereof, at ſuch rates, and in ſuch ſort as the party aſſurers and party aſſured can agree, which courſe of dealing is commonly termed a Policy of Aſſurance; by means of which it cometh to paſs, upon the loſs or periſhing of any ſhip, there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loſs lighteth rather eaſily upon many, than heavily upon few, and rather upon them that adventure not, than upon thoſe that adventure; whereby all merchants, eſpecially of the younger ſort, are allured to venture more willingly, and more freely: and whereas heretofore ſuch aſſurers have uſed to ſtand ſo juſtly and preciſely on their credit, as few or no controverſies have ariſen thereupon; and if any have grown, the ſame have, from time to time, been ended and ordered by certain grave and diſcreet merchants, appointed by the lord-mayor of London; until of late years, that divers perſons have withdrawn themſelves from that arbitrary courſe, and have ſought to draw the parties aſſured to ſeek their moneys in her majeſty's courts, to their great charges and delay. For remedy whereof, it is now enacted, that the lord-chancellor (or keeper) do award one general or ſtanding yearly commiſſion for the determining of cauſes on policies of aſſurance, ſuch as now are, or hereafter ſhall be entered within the office of aſſurance within the city of London, this commiſſion to conſiſt of the judge of the admiralty, the recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight diſcreet merchants, or to any five of them: which commiſſion ſhall have authority to determine all cauſes concerning policies of aſſurance, in a ſummary way; who ſhall ſummon the parties, examine witneſſes upon oath, and impriſon diſobeyers of their decrees. They ſhall meet weekly at the office of aſſurance, on the weſt ſide of the Royal Exchange, for the execution of their commiſſion, without fee or reward. And any ſuch as may think themſelves aggrieved by their determinations, may, in two months, exhibit his bill in Chancery, for a re-examination of ſuch decree; provided the complainant do firſt lay down to the ſaid commiſſioners the ſum awarded; and that the lord-chancellor, or keeper, may either reverſe or confirm the firſt decree, according to equity. Laſtly, no commiſſioner ſhall be an aſſurer, or aſſured."

This law ſufficiently demonſtrates, that at this time there was a great increaſe of foreign commerce in England.

Aſſurance, or inſurance, of ſhips and merchandize on the ſeas, is of great antiquity, even as far back as the reign of the emperor Claudius Cæſar.

The ſea-laws of Oleron, as far back as the year 1194, treat of it.

It ſeems to have been in uſe in England upon the revival of commerce, ſomewhat earlier than on the continent; and Antwerp, though in its meridian glory, learned it from England: "whereas (ſays Molineux's Lex Mercatoria, the meetings of merchants in London were held in Lombard-ſtreet (ſo called becauſe certain nations of Lombardy kept there a pawn-houſe, or Lombard, long before the Royal Exchange was built), all the policies of aſſurance at Antwerp, which then were, and now (1622) yet are made, do make mention, that it ſhall be in all things concerning the ſaid aſſurances, as was accuſtomed to be done in Lombard-ſtreet in London; which is imitated alſo in other places of the Low Countries."

As the gradual increaſe of the ſuburbs of London does in great meaſure keep pace with the gradual increaſe of the general commerce of England, and as it is, moreover, a curious and entertaining part of hiſtory, to mark the gradual advances of both, I therefore have no need of an apology for laying before my readers whatever falls in my way of that kind, during the period now before us.

We find by an act of the fourteenth and fifteenth of Henry VIII. (cap. ii.) for limiting foreign artizans as to their journeymen and apprentices, that the juriſdiction of the London corporations was to extend two miles from the city, viz. within the town of Weſtminſter, the pariſh of St. Martin in the Fields, and of Our Lady in the Strand, St. Clement Danes without Temple-bar, St. Giles in the Fields, St. Andrew in Holborn, the town and borough of Southwark, Shoreditch, White-chapel pariſh, St. John's ſtreet (i. e. Clerkenwell), and Clerkenwell pariſh, St. Botolph without Aldgate, St. Catherine's (near the Tower of London), and Bermondſey-ſtreet." This is an authentic view of the ſeveral ſuburbs of London in the year 1524. Nevertheleſs we are not to imagine that all thoſe ſuburbs were contiguous to each other, or joined, as at preſent to the great contiguity; for there were then, and long after, ſundry large breaks, or interruptions, where no buildings were; not only the ſtreet (now ſo well built) called the Strand, then chiefly taken up with the capital dwellings of the nobility, with their large adjoining gardens, but alſo a great part of St. Martin's pariſh, were ſtill literally in the Fields: the like may be ſaid of St. Giles in the Fields (then ſtyled the town of St. Giles), and of the upper part of St. Andrew's in Holborn, much of all which, and alſo of Weſtminſter, Clerkenwell, Shoreditch, White chapel, and Southwark, was literally Fields, even ſo late as the reign of queen Elizabeth, as appears by a map of London and its ſuburbs, ſtill extant, firſt publiſhed in the year 1560.

By a ſtatute 24 Henry VIII. the ſtreetway between Charing-croſs and Strand-croſs (i. e. that is near where Somerſet-houſe is now ſituated) in the ſuburbs of London, was directed "to be ſufficiently paved and maintained, at the charge of the owners of the land adjoining." This ſhews that the Strand was not yet built into a continued ſtreet.

In the following year, 1534, the high-ſtreet between Holborn-bridge and Holborn-bars, at the weſt end thereof, was directed to be paved; as were alſo the ſtreets of Southwark; and that every one ſhould maintain the ſaid pavements before his own ground, or forfeit to the king ſix pence for every yard ſquare.

In the thirty-ſecond of the ſaid king's reign, viz. anno 1541, the following ſtreets or ways in London were ordered to be paved, viz. 1. The ſtreet leading from Aldgate to White-chapel church: 2. the upper part of the lane called Chancery-lane: 3.

the way leading from Holborn-bars, weſtward, towards St. Giles in the Fields, as far as any habitation is on both ſides of the ſaid ſtreet: 4. Gray's Inn lane: 5. Shoe-lane: and, 6. Feuter, now called Fetter-lane; the two laſt being thoroughfares and paſſages from Fleet-ſtreet into Holborn." The part of Chancery-lane now to be paved is thus deſcribed, viz. "from the bars beſide the Rolls, lately ſet up by the lord privy-ſeal, into the ſaid highway in Holborn." Theſe paſſages ſhew the age of the Rolls-office in Chancery-lane; and alſo that all Holborn, above the city-bars, remained unpaved till now; nor was it at this time all built on both ſides (nor a conſiderable time later) as appears by the map before mentioned, drawn in queen Elizabeth's reign: all theſe ſix ways now directed to be paved, are therein deſcribed as "very foul, and full of pits and ſloughs, very perilous and noyous (noiſome) as well for all the king's ſubjects on horſeback as on foot and with carriages." Yet three of theſe, viz. Shoe-lane, Fetter-lane, and Chancery-lane, are now in the very center of the preſent immenſe contiguity; and all the reſt are likewiſe well built and inhabited. So vaſt is the increaſe and improvement of London ſince thoſe times. By a ſtatute of 34 and 35 Henry VIII. cap. xii. the ſtreets named White-croſs-ſtreet, Chiſwel-ſtreet leading from White-croſs-ſtreet into the highway leading to Moor-gate; the lane called Golding-lane, and ſtreet called Grub-ſtreet, in the pariſh of St. Giles without Cripple-gate; the ſtreet called Goſwell-ſtreet, in the pariſh of St. Botolph without Alderſgate; Long-lane, in the pariſh of St. Botolph aforeſaid and of St. Sepulchre without Newgate; the ſtreet called St. John's-ſtreet, leading from the Bars of Smithfield up to the Pound at the corner of the wall extending along the high way to Iſlington; and alſo the ſtreet leading from the ſaid Bars to Cow-croſs: the lane called Water-lane, in Fleet-ſtreet, leading down to the Thames; the way leading without Temple-bar, weſtward, by and unto St. Clement's Inn gates and New Inn gates to Drury-place, in the county of Middleſex (this ſhews that this way was not built on); and alſo one little lane ſtretching from the ſaid way to the ſign of the Bell at Drury-lane end; and the common way leading through a certain place called Petit France, from the bars at the weſt end of Tothill-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, unto the uttermoſt part of the weſt end of the ſaid place called Petit France: the ſtreet or highway leading from Biſhopſgate-ſtreet to and above Shoreditch-church; and the bridge called Strand-bridge, and the way leading from the ſaid bridge towards Temple-bar, and the lane called Foskue-lane from the garden and tenement of the biſhop of Lichfield, and the garden and tenement called the Bell and Proctors, down to Stand-bridge (thoſe names are now unknown), be very foul and full of pits and ſloughs, very perilous and noyous, and very neceſſary to be kept clear, for the avoiding of corrupt ſavours, and avoiding of peſtilence: for the amendment and reformation whereof, all who have any lands or tenements adjoining to the aforeſaid ſtreets, lanes, and ways, unto the midſt of them, in length and breadth as his land and tenement do lie or extend, in like manner and form as the ſtreets in the city of London be paved, with cauſeys or channels in the midſt of the ſame ſtreets, and ſhall yearly maintain the ſame."

James Howel, in his Londinopolis, publiſhed in folio, anno 1657, gives us many particulars of the vaſt increaſe of the ſuburbs of London towards the cloſe of queen Elizabeth's reign, which more plainly points out the vaſt increaſe of England's commerce, than a whole volume of ſpeculative reaſoning could do alone. It was not material to make different ſections thereof, and therefore we have brought them altogether, whether a little before or after this year.

"It ſeems, that about this time the ground called Spital-fields, began gradually to be built upon for weavers; as had alſo Hog-lane, in that part which had (within ſixty years from the date of his ſaid book) had fair rows of elm-trees all along, now turned into houſes on both ſides, from Houndſditch to White-chapel church.

"As to Wapping (ſays Howel), it is yet within the memory of man, that there was never a houſe from St. Catherine's to Wapping: but now (i. e. anno 1657) there is a continued ſtreet towards a mile from the Tower, all along the river, almoſt as far as Radcliffe; which proceeded from the increaſe of navigation, mariners, and traffick." This ſhews that Wapping was originally a village, or place detached from London, though now part of the great contiguity thereof. "Radcliffe alſo (continues he) is much increaſed in buildings, and alſo Nightingale-lane.

"Northward, London's ſuburbs have been leſs increaſed than on the eaſt and weſt ſides; yet there was an increaſe, about this time, on that ſide alſo. Where the buildings on the weſt ſide of Smithfield ſtand, was formerly a very large pond of water; and where the place called the Sheep-pens is, was a field with growing elms, and the place of execution for criminals. Afterwards (in king Henry VI's reign) they began to build the ſpace between the ſaid pond and river of Wells (now Turnmill-brook) which runs into Fleet-ditch; and afterwards that pond was drained, and built upon, and ſo down that ſtreet now called Cow-lane; and alſo Chick-lane and Hoſier-lane, &c. So that the buildings there are ſo increaſed, that now remaineth not one tree there."

Some other additions were made about Clerkenwell, about or near this time, where the fields, gardens, and avenues of the great priory of St. John of Jeruſalem, and alſo the convent on the north ſide of Clerkenwell-green, ſtood.

Weſtward, without Newgate, the great ſtreet named Holborn, and its contiguity, have been gradually built quite up to the village of St. Giles in the Fields: but as the greateſt increaſe thereabout was chiefly in the next century, we muſt refer thereto.

From the year 1512, the fourth of Henry VIII. we may properly date the commencement of what may be called an Engliſh royal navy. i. e. a number of ſtout ſhips of war, actually belonging to, and permanently kept on foot by, the Engliſh crown, for national defence, king Henry VIII. being the firſt Engliſh monarch who effectually purſued this plan, and for that end eſtabliſhed a royal navy-office, with commiſſioners, &c. nearly as at preſent. He muſt indeed be allowed (amidſt all his wild diſſipations) to have employed great ſums of money on his marine affairs, as well for the conſtruction of ſhips for war, as of dock-yards, wharfs, ſtore-houſes, &c. Before his time there was no fixed permanent royal navy; but, on ordinary occaſions, the Cinque Ports (as already fully ſeen) ſupplied the crown with a determined number of ſorry ſhips as they had in thoſe old times; and on great emergencies we alſo have ſeen that all the maritime towns of the kingdom were bound, or reaſonable notice to ſend their quota of ſhips and mariners, for a determined time; commanded either by the king or his admiral; ſuch as was the fleet of king Edward III. at the ſiege of Calais, anno 1347, and other capital expeditions.

Moreover (biſhop Gibſon, in his Additions to Camden's Britannia) obſerves that king Henry VIII. in the ſaid fourth year of his reign, for the advancement and benefit of navigation and commerce, erected a corporation for the buſineſs of examining, licencing, and regulating of pilots; for ordering and erecting of beacons, light-houſes, buoys, &c. which is ſtyled the Corporation of the Trinity-houſe of Deptford Strand, and has proved of great benefit for accompliſhing the ends of its founder. Another ſociety, for the like good purpoſes, he alſo erected at Hull, by the name of the Trinity-houſe at Hull; and alſo another at Newcaſtle upon Tyne (anno 1537): "Which three eſtabliſhments (ſays Hakluyt) were in imitation of that which the emperor Charles V. had erected at Seville, in Spain; who, obſerving the many ſhipwrecks in voyages to and from the Weſt Indies, occaſioned by the ignorance of ſeamen, eſtabliſhed, at the Contraction-houſe, lectures upon navigation; and a pilot major, for the examination of other pilots and mariners: he alſo directed books to be publiſhed on that ſubject, for the uſe of his mariners." The king, by his charter, confirmed to the Deptford Trinity-houſe ſociety, all the ancient rights, privileges, &c. of the ſhipmen and mariners of England, and their ſeveral poſſeſſions at Deptford: whereby it appears plainly, that they had been a ſociety long before, though nowhere recorded how long. This corporation (whoſe powers, &c. have been ſince confirmed and augmented by ſucceeding kings) have alſo the power of appointing pilots for the king's ſhips, and for examining and fixing their wages, and certifying their qualifications, and thoſe of the maſters of the ſhips of war; alſo of clearing and deepening the Thames by ballaſt hoys, with which balaſt they ſupply the ſhipping. They have alſo the examination of the forty mathematical boys of Chriſt's Hoſpital. They have likewiſe power to hear and determine complaints of officers and ſailors in the merchants ſervice: ſo that this corporation more eſpecially is eminently of great utility to the nation.

Henry alſo made Deptford, near London, a magazine to the royal navy, which has gradually increaſed to the flouriſhing ſtate we now ſee it in. And, conſidering how far the river of Thames was expoſed to inſults from foreign enemies, he cauſed a fortification to be erected at Graveſend, and another oppoſite to it on the Eſſex ſhore, where Tilbury fort now ſtands. And having loſt his fine ſhip Regent, of one thouſand tons, he cauſed another to be built; ſuch a one (ſays Hall) as had never been ſeen in England, and named it the Henry Grace de Dieu.

We have in a treaty of peace between Henry VIII. and Lewis XII. of France, made anno 1514, a recital of implements for a naval war, ſuch as cannon, gunpowder, ſtones (for they had not yet the uſe of iron bullets), darts, &c. And in the ſame year the Chronicon Pretioſum makes a maſter ſhipwright's daily pay, with his diet, five pence, and without diet ſeven pence per diem; an hewer, with diet four pence, without diet ſix pence; and an able clencher the ſame. Note, that living was then twice as cheap as in our days.

In the year 1523, according to lord Herbert's Hiſtory of Henry VIII. in the attempts of the Engliſh and French courts to gain Scotland to their reſpective intereſts, at the death of king James V. the Engliſh miniſters, among other arguments, aſſerted "that the Engliſh were maſters of the ſeas, and thereby were able to ſtop and interclude all ſuccour that ſhould come to them (the Scots) from any other place." And as in the replication of the partizans of France that aſſertion is not contradicted, the point ſeems to have been admitted.

The reigns of Edward VI. and Mary furniſh no improvements in navigation worthy our notice; but Elizabeth, very early in her reign, put naval affairs upon a better footing than they had been under her predeceſſor, both by building ſome ſhips of her own, and by encouraging the merchants to build large trading veſſels, which on occaſion, were converted into ſhips of war. In 1582, the ſeamen of England were computed at fourteen thouſand two hundred and ninety-five, and the number of veſſels twelve-hundred and thirty-two, of which there were not above two hundred and ſeventeen above eighty tons. Monſon computes that, though the navigation decreaſed in the firſt year of James I. by the practices of the merchants, who carried on their trade in foreign bottoms, yet before 1640, the number of ſeamen was treble in England.

The navy which the queen left at her deceaſe appears conſiderable, when we conſider only the number of veſſels, which were forty-two; but when we reflect, that none of theſe ſhips carried above forty guns, that four only came up to that number, that there were but two ſhips of a thouſand tons, and twenty-three below five hundred, ſome of fifty, and ſome even of twenty tons; that the whole number of guns belonging to the fleet were ſeven hundred and ſeventy-four; we muſt entertain a very contemptible idea of the Engliſh navy, compared with the force it hath now attained. In the year 1588 there were not above five veſſels equipped by the noblemen and ſea-ports, which exceeded two hundred tons.

In this famous year (1588) what is called the Cheſt at Chatham was firſt erected, being a contribution for the benefit and relief of maimed and ſuperannuated Engliſh mariners (out of which penſions are paid to ſuch for their lives) by the advice of ſir Francis Drake, ſir John Hawkins, &c. It was firſt only a voluntary monthly contribution of the mariners out of their pay, for the ſuccour of their then wounded brethren, but was afterwards made perpetual by queen Elizabeth. By an act of the rump-parliament, anno 1649 (cap. xxiv.) for aboliſhing deans and chapters, and of their lands, we find this cheſt had been uſually kept at what is called the Hill Houſe, at Chatham, which, with its gardens, &c. belonged to the dean and chapter of Rocheſter. Until the foundation of Greenwich hoſpital by king William III. this was the only charity of that kind for diſtreſſed ſailors.

PUBLIC

PUBLIC REVENUE.

It is difficult to compute exactly queen Elizabeth's ordinary revenue, but it certainly fell much ſhort of five thouſand pounds a year. In 1590 ſhe raiſed the cuſtoms from fourteen thouſand pounds a year to fifty thouſand pounds, and obliged ſir Thomas Smith, who had farmed them, to refund ſome of his former profits. This improvement of the revenue was owing to the ſuggeſtions of one Caemarden, and was extremely oppoſed by Burleigh, Leiceſter, and Walſingham: but the queen's perſeverance overcame all their oppoſition. The great undertakings which ſhe executed with ſo narrow a revenue, and with ſuch ſmall ſupplies from her people, prove the mighty effects of prudence and œconomy. She received from the parliament, during her whole reign, only twenty ſubſidies and thirty-nine fifteenths. It is not eaſy to compute the amount of thoſe ſupplies, becauſe the value of a ſubſidy was continually falling; and in the end of her reign it amounted only to eighty thouſand pounds, which in the beginning had been an hundred and twenty thouſand. If we ſuppoſe that the whole ſupplies granted to Elizabeth, during a reign of forty-five years, amounted to three millions, we ſhall not probably be much wide of the truth. This ſum makes only ſixty-ſix thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty-ſix pounds a year; and it is ſuppriſing that while the queen's demands were ſo moderate, and her expences ſo well regulated, ſhe ſhould ever have found any difficulty of getting a ſupply from the parliament, or be reduced to make ſale of the crown-lands; but ſuch was the extreme, I had almoſt ſaid abſurd, parſimony of the parliaments during that period; they valued nothing in compariſon of their money. The members had no connection with the court, and the very idea which they conceived of the truſt committed to them, was to refuſe the demands of the crown, and to grant as few ſupplies as poſſible. The crown, on the other hand, conſidered the parliament in no other light than a means of ſupply. Queen Elizabeth made a merit to her people of ſeldom aſſembling parliaments: no redreſs of grievances was expected from theſe aſſemblies; they were ſuppoſed to meet for no other purpoſe than to impoſe taxes.

Before queen Elizabeth's reign, the Engliſh princes had always recourſe to the city of Antwerp for voluntary loans; and their credit was ſo low, that beſides the exorbitant intereſt of ten or twelve per cent. they were obliged to make the city of London join in the ſecurity. Sir Thomas Greſham, that great and enterprizing merchant, one of the chief ornaments of this reign, engaged the company of Merchant-adventurers to grant the queen a loan; and as the money was regularly paid, her credit by degrees eſtabliſhed itſelf in the city, and ſhe ſhook off this dependence on foreigners.

In 1559, the queen employed Greſham to borrow two hundred thouſand pounds at Antwerp, in order to enable her to reform the coinage, which was at that time extremely debaſed. She was ſo impolitic as to make herſelf an innovation in the coin, by dividing a pound of ſilver into ſixty-two ſhillings, inſtead of ſixty, the former ſtandard. This is the laſt time that the coin has been tampered with in England.

The ſplendor of a court was, during this age, a great part of the public charge; and as Elizabeth was a ſingle woman, and expenſive in no ſpecies of magnificence, except cloaths, this circumſtance enabled her to perform great things by her narrow revenue. She is ſaid to have paid four millions of debt left on the crown by her father, brother, and ſiſter; an incredible ſum for that age*. The ſtates of the United Provinces, at the time of her deceaſe, owed her about eight hundred thouſand pounds; and the king of France four hundred and fifty thouſand: though that prince was extremely frugal, and, after the peace of Vervins, was continually amaſſing treaſure, the queen never could, by the moſt preſſing remonſtrances, prevail on him to make payment of thoſe ſums which ſhe had ſo generouſly advanced him during his greateſt diſtreſſes; one payment of twenty thouſand crowns, and another of fifty thouſand, were all ſhe could obtain by the ſtrongeſt repreſentations ſhe could make of the difficulties to which the rebellion in Ireland had reduced her. The queen expended in the war with Spain, between the years 1589 and 1593, the ſum of one million three hundred thouſand pounds, beſides the double ſubſidy, amounting to two hundred and eighty thouſand pounds, granted to her by parliament. In the year 1599, ſhe ſpent ſix hundred thouſand pounds in ſix months, in the ſervice of Ireland. Sir Robert Cecil affirmed, that in the ſpace of ten years Ireland coſt her three millions four hundred thouſand pounds. She made the earl of Eſſex a preſent of thirty thouſand pounds, upon his departure to take upon him the government of that kingdom. Lord Burleigh computed, that the value of the gifts conferred on that favourite, amounted to three hundred thouſand pounds; a proof of her ſtrong affection to him. It was a common ſaying during this reign, that the queen paid bountifully, though ſhe rewarded ſparingly.

* D'Ewes, p. 473. I think it is impoſſible to reconcile this account of the public debts with that given by Strype, Eccleſ Mem. vol. ii. p. 344. that in the year 1553, the crown owed above three hundred thouſand pounds. I own that this laſt ſum appears a great deal more likely. The whole revenue of queen Elizabeth would not in ten years have paid four millions. Hume's Hiſtory of the Tudors, vol. ii. p. 729.

An Hiſtorical Deduction of the VALUE of our ENGLISH SILVER and GOLD COIN, but particularly thoſe of the former, from the CONQUEST. Extracted from Mr. Anderſon, Biſhop Fleetwood, and others; together with ſome Obſervations on the Preſent State of our SILVER MONEY.

WE ſhall cloſe our remarks upon this period with a view of the ſtate of our coinage, from the acceſſion of William the Norman to that of Elizabeth incluſive, when the value of our money was nearly ſettled on the ſame footing as at preſent. This is a matter very neceſſary to be properly underſtood, for by this alone we ſhall be enabled to form a ſuitable judgment of the true rate in cheapneſs of proviſions and all other neceſſaries of life through their different variations and periods, the pay of artificers, labourers, ſoldiers, ſailors, &c. a ſubject frequently brought into converſation, and as frequently miſunderſtood.

The ancient Britons, when firſt invaded by the Romans, had no other kind of money but iron and tin plates and rings (copper not being then, nor long after, found in our iſland); theſe might well enough anſwer, with barter, the purpoſes of the inconſiderable tranſactions in thoſe rude times, when they had neither arts nor manufactures of any kind. The neceſſity, however, of an univerſal medium in commerce, which we call Money, was in much earlier times diſcovered in the more eaſtern parts of the world, and both gold and ſilver money were thence ſoon after introduced into Carthage and Greece; from Greece it was brought to Rome, and thence gradually weſtward into all the Roman provinces.

Silver, on account of its cleanneſs and moderate plenty, was, by the general conſent of all civilized nations, deemed the moſt proper for an univerſal medium of commerce, though at firſt, and for many ages, by weight only, till at length, for greater convenience, princes and ſtates fell upon the expedient of coins, by ſtamping pieces of the metal of a determined weight and fineneſs, to paſs current by their authority.

Gold had, indeed, all the properties of ſilver for ſuch a general medium, even in a higher degree; it was leſs diminiſhable by fire, more ductile, more beautiful; but its much greater ſcarcity, more eſpecially in Europe, rendered it unfit for an univerſal medium of commerce.

On the other hand, copper, by reaſon of its fouler and baſer nature, and its great plenty, could not be ſo well uſed in large tranſactions, though extremely uſeful in ſmall ones.

Whilſt the Romans held Britain, they coined here gold, ſilver, and copper; of all which coins, as well as of thoſe brought from Rome itſelf, many have been dug up, in various parts of this iſland.

When the Saxons firſt conquered a part of England, in the middle of the Vth century, they were little better than ſavages, and probably had no ſort of coins in their own country of Germany; but when they became more civilized, they coined ſilver money, of which ſome pieces are ſtill to be found in the cabinets of the curious.

As far as certainly appears, the largeſt ſilver coin in England, not only before, but for ſome centuries after the Norman ingreſſion, was denominated a Penny; which, till the reign of king Edward III. contained as much ſilver as about three pence of our money; and as this penny was, in their manner of coining, cut almoſt through croſswiſe, it could with eaſe be divided into half-pence and farthings, or fourthlings. Thus in England, from the time of our firſt Norman king, William I. called the Conqueror, the ſilver coins were thrice the value of the modern, till the eighteenth year of king Edward III. A. D. 1344; and from thence to the time of king Henry VIII. it was not only farther leſſened, but in his reign, and in the firſt five years of his ſon, Edward VI. ſhamefully debaſed; but in the laſt year of that hopeful young monarch its purity was reſtored, and its weight reduced to the ſtate it is in at this preſent time. But to be more particular:

From the before-mentioned year, 1344, to the eighth year of Henry V. anno 1420, the Engliſh ſilver penny, on an average, weighed very near two pence half-penny of our money.

From the ninth year of Henry V. anno 1421, to the firſt year of Henry VIII. anno 1509, the ſilver penny, on an average, was worth near two pence of our modern money.

From the ſecond year of king Henry VIII. anno 1510, to his thirty-third year, anno 1542, a pound of fine ſilver was coined into forty-five ſhillings, being three ſhillings and nine pence per ounce; ſo that their nine pence was equal to our ſhilling. But,

In the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth years of Henry VIII, annis 1543, 1544, the ſilver coin began to be debaſed to ten ounces of fine ſilver and two ounces allay per pound, troy weight, out of which pound they coined forty-eight ſhillings; yet ſtill four pence of their coin was equal to five pence of our money.

But in the following year, 1545, that king ſuffered his ſilver coin to be debaſed ſo far as to ſix ounces fine and ſix ounces allay, in ſuch ſort that eight pence of their money was but equal to five pence of our's.

And in the three following years, 1546, 1547, 1548, the coin was ſtill farther debaſed to four ounces fine and eight ounces allay, and they coined forty-eight ſhillings of this baſe metal in the pound; ſo that their ſhilling, or twelve pence, was worth but five pence of our modern money, whereby they made the people pay after the rate of twelve ſhillings for an ounce of pure ſilver.

In the third year of Edward VI. anno 1549, the coin was brought back to the fineneſs of the year 1545, viz. ſix ounces fine and ſix ounces allay, ſo that their eight pence (as above) was equal to our five pence.

Yet they ſtill remained infatuated, as if foreigners as well as our own people would, in bills of exchange, and other money tranſactions with us, put any greater value on our ſaid coins than they actually contained of fine ſilver; for out of a pound of ſilver of the laſt-named fineneſs, they coined ſeventy-two ſhillings in the year 1550; whereby an ounce of fine ſilver was valued at twelve of their ſhillings, as in the years 1546, 1547, and 1548.

And, moſt ſcandalouſly for the nation (ſays biſhop Fleetwood, in his Chronicon Pretioſum) in the fifth year of king Edward VI. anno 1551, the ſilver coin was debaſed ſo low as three ounces fine and nine ounces allay; and out of a pound thereof they coined ſeventy-two ſhillings of their coin per ounce: ſo that twelve pence of their money was not worth three pence of our's.

In the following year, 1552, Edward's miniſters at length ſaw this their great error: wherefore they now reſtored the fineneſs of the ſilver coin to eleven ounces and one penny-weight fine, and coined ſixty ſhillings out of the pound; nearly the ſame as in our days.

In the firſt year of queen Mary, anno 1553, they coined a pound of ſilver into ſixty ſhillings, and a pound of gold into thirty-ſix pounds in ſilver, being ſovereigns, of thirty ſhillings; and angels, of ten ſhillings; alſo half-ſovereigns and half-angels: and ſo it continued to the ſecond year of queen Elizabeth, when that princeſs coined ſixty ſhillings out of a pound of ſilver, of eleven ounces and two penny-weight fine; and thus it has continued till now (i. e. 1706, when the biſhop wrote.) So that the variation of the value of our ſilver coin, from the year 1552, down to the preſent time, has been ſo inconſiderable as not to be worth regarding.

In the laſt year of king Edward VI. anno 1553, ſilver crowns, half-crowns, ſhillings, and ſix-pences, were firſt coined in England (excepting only ſome few ſhillings which had been coined in 1504.) "I have weighed thoſe crowns (ſays biſhop Fleetwood) and found them of the ſame weight, and much the ſame fineneſs, as our's."

In the year 1561, queen Elizabeth coined ſix-pences, four-pences, three-pences, two-pences, pennies, three-farthings, and half-pence, all of ſilver (for there were then no national copper coins.) She at the ſame time called in all the baſe coin, and ſet our coin on the noble footing it now ſtands. There have been no ſilver farthings coined ſince the thirty-ſixth year of Henry VIII. which were very bad, or otherwiſe they muſt have been too ſmall for currency.

Queen Elizabeth coined in her whole reign, viz. from 1558 to 1602, in ſterling ſilver money, ...	4,632,932	3	$2\frac{1}{2}$
And in baſe money for Ireland (of three ounces fine)	85,646	19	$5\frac{3}{4}$
	4,718,579	2	$8\frac{1}{4}$
And in gold	795,138	8	$4\frac{1}{2}$
Total of ſilver and gold	5,513,717	11	$0\frac{3}{4}$

In king Charles the IId's reign, when milled money came firſt in uſe amongſt us, and at which time I ſuppoſe ſtandard ſilver all over Europe to be at or near five ſhillings and two pence per ounce, it was thought neceſſary to encourage the ſubject to bring his ſilver to the mint, that the coinage, which before was paid for, ſhould be free (the crown being reimburſed that expence by a duty on foreign ſpirits), and to bring it as near as poſſible to that price of five ſhillings and two pence per ounce, the following prices, and the following weights, were what was to be returned them in lieu.

For every twelve ounces of ſilver, allowed by the aſſay-maſter of the mint, to contain twelve ounces two penny weights of fine ſilver and eighteen penny weights of baſe metal (or allay) and called ſtandard; if in ſixpences, one hundred and twenty-four of one penny-weight, twenty-two grains one half, each, (abating ſix grains upon the whole) which is the twelve ounces, and at five ſhillings per ounce, comes to the ſame at the tale, viz. three pounds two ſhillings.

If in ſhillings, ſixty-two of three penny-weights twenty-one grains each, (abating ſix grains upon the whole) which is the twelve ounces, and at five ſhillings and two pence per ounce, comes to the ſame at the tale, viz three pounds two ſhillings.

If in half crowns, they had of them, at nine penny-weights fifteen grains one half, and ſhillings, &c. to make them up (for no certain number will weigh the twelve ounces), in the ſame proportion.

If in crowns alſo the ſame, nineteen penny-weights ſeven grains each, and in the ſame proportion.

This was executing the thing in as equal a proportion as human foreſight could well diſtribute it; for years ſo it continued, and our coin anſwered the purpoſe intended; but as commerce extended her wings, and as ſilver became a main article in one of her very extenſive flights, its value increaſed; yet we attended not to it; we ſtill continued, and do ſtill, to coin ſilver after the above rate. A nation ſo great in commerce and calculation to continue this error, nothing but the characteriſtic we are by foreigners ſtamped with, of mixing the greateſt abſurdities with the greateſt good ſenſe, can account for it. It is very clear from the above, that five ſhillings and two pence per ounce is the price our ſilver is coined at; which ſilver, to melt for theſe thirty years, except upon very particular occaſions, hath been worth from five ſhillings and four pence, to five ſhillings and nine pence, to carry to India, or to work up into utenſils, and the laſt fifteen years nearer the latter than the former. Surely could we, from the ſame circumſtance, get at our neighbours ſilver to go to the market, at five ſhillings and two pence, inſtead of five ſhillings and four pence, five ſhillings and ſix pence, and five and ninepence per ounce, we ſhould not miſs the opportunity; and we have the greateſt reaſon in the world, ſupported by our coin's diſappearing, to aſſert we have not.

The conſideration of this led a gentleman, who appeared to be perfectly maſter of his ſubject, to propoſe in the public papers, ſome few years ago, that, for the future, the ſubject ſhould receive from the mint, for every twelve ounces of ſtandard, one hundred and thirty-two ſix-pences of one penny-weight nineteen grains $\frac{3}{11}$ each, which is the twelve ounces, and at five ſhillings and ſix pence per ounce comes to the ſame as by tale, three pounds ſix ſhillings.

Sixty-ſix ſhillings of three penny-weights fifteen grains $\frac{9}{11}$ each, which is the twelve ounces, and at five ſhillings and ſix pence per ounces comes to the ſame as by tale, three pounds ſix ſhillings.

Crowns

Crowns and half crowns in proportion; the firſt eighteen penny-weights four grains $\frac{24}{66}$ each; the other nine penny-weights two grains $\frac{12}{33}$ each.

Which, if carried into execution, would bid fair to ſecure coin for our uſe at all times, for what ſhall be melted down above five ſhillings and ſix pence per ounce, would be recoined when ſilver is below; but we muſt guard againſt the ill uſe that may be made by perſons coining large quantities, if ſilver ſhould be under five ſhillings and ſix pence per ounce; to do which it need only be enacted, that no perſon ſhould be obliged to take in payment above ten pounds in ſilver.

With reſpect to our gold coins, the ſtandard of them in ancient times was twenty-three carats and three grains and an half of fine gold, and half a grain of allay (the allay being either ſilver or copper); the pound of gold being divided into twenty-four carats, and each carat into four grains.

The proportional values of gold and ſilver, in England, have always kept pace pretty nearly with each other; for the pound of gold, which in the year 1344, when gold was firſt coined in this kingdom, was worth thirteen, fourteen, to fifteen pounds in ſilver, is by degrees riſen to forty-four pounds ten ſhillings, and the gold at preſent not ſo fine as then: now as a ſilver penny was then worth our three-pence, and twenty ſhillings then were worth ſixty ſhillings, therefore gold and ſilver have kept pretty near the ſame proportion to each other. But as ſilver has always been more current in buying and ſelling than gold, becauſe always more plenty and eaſy to come at, ſo the quantity of coin in our ounce of ſilver is more immediately for our purpoſe in eſtimating the different rates of living, than is that of gold coin.

The preſent proportion of gold to ſilver was not exactly effected till the reign of king James I. when a pound weight of gold was coined into forty-four pounds ten ſhillings by tale, viz. into pieces of five pounds value, of two pounds one ſhilling, and of ten ſhillings: and the pound weight of ſilver was coined into ſixty-two ſhillings, viz. into pieces of five ſhillings, two ſhillings and ſix pence, one ſhilling, ſix pence, four pence, two pence, and one penny.

Whereas we meet with obolus, farthing, or farling of gold, in our old hiſtories, it has always a reference to the integer, or higher denomination of ſome gold coin, as an angel, a noble, &c. ſo when, in the reign of king Edward III. nobles, oboluſes (or half-pence), and farthings of gold were coined, the obolus is here half a noble, and the farthing a quarter of a noble; and the like of other gold coins. Crowns of gold are of great antiquity. There never were any ſilver coins named nobles or angels, florins nor ryals (or royals) ſovereigns nor units, Britain-crowns, thiſtle-crowns, nor double crowns (the three laſt coined by king James I.) pieces of three ſhillings and four pence, coined by king Henry VIII. &c. all theſe being always gold: yet no gold coins older than Edward III's reign can be found now, excepting ſome very rare as far back as Edward III. though, from the minuteneſs of the then ſilver coins, it is highly probable that moſt of the great payments were made in gold. As for the bezant, ſuppoſed to be ſo named from Byzantium, or Conſtantinople, the value of it was forgot, even in king Richard III's time; and biſhop Fleetwood thinks it never was an Engliſh coin.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND FROM

The Union of the Two Crowns of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, under JAMES I. to the Reſtoration of King CHARLES II.

PART X.

JAMES I. The firſt King of ENGLAND of the Houſe of STUART*. A. D. 1603.

THE line of Henry VIII. of the houſe of Tudor, being extinct in Elizabeth, the crown of England devolved, of indiſputable right, to James VI. of Scotland, as the next lineal heir †, and he was accordingly proclaimed at the gates of Whitehall, and at the Croſs of Cheapſide, by ſecretary Cecil and the lord-mayor, with the uſual pomp and ceremony.

I ſhall not take up the reader's time with enumerating the minute deſcriptions which other writers have given of the univerſal acclamations which reſounded from all quarters upon the proclamation of James, the quick diſpatch which was made to inform him of his good fortune, the dutiful letters he received, the affectionate ones he returned, his magnificent progreſs to England, his behaviour to his new ſubjects on his firſt entering amongſt them, nor the frantic joy with which the giddy mulitude hailed their new ſovereign: it is ſufficient to ſay, that while he was upon the road he ordered the earl of Southampton, and the other priſoners on the account of Eſſex, to be ſet at liberty; and the funeral rites of Elizabeth were performed in a moſt ſumptuous manner: the earl of Northumberland, with the lords Thomas and Henry Howard, and the lord Montjoy, were made privy-counſellors, notwithſtanding their lying under the ſuſpicion of popery, on account of their family-ſufferings for the king's mother; the lord Egerton was at the ſame time created baron of Elleſmere. The king's gratitude to the Howard family, who, for the ſake of the queen his mother, were in diſgrace in the late reign, did not ſtop there; the lord Thomas was made earl of Suffolk, and then lord-treaſurer; and the lord Henry was created, ſome years after, earl of Northampton: moreover, Philip, earl of Arundel, the late duke of Norfolk's eldeſt ſon, having loſt his title by his condemnation, though Elizabeth gave him his life, the king created his ſon

* The ſurname of Stuart had no ignoble original. Bancho, a lord of eminency in Scotland, while Edward the Confeſſor governed in England, is ſaid to have been their anceſtor. This nobleman was murdered by the tyrant Macbeth; but his ſon Fleance eſcaped, and lived for ſome time in exile in Wales, where he married the daughter of one of its petty princes. His ſon Walter reſided ſome time at the court of Edward the Confeſſor; and afterwards going over to France, he is ſaid to have ſerved under William the Norman, at the battle of Haſtings. After various adventures, he came to Scotland, where his own and his anceſtors merits procured him an honourable eſtabliſhment, and he was made hereditary great high-ſteward of Scotland. From this office he and his poſterity, as uſual, took their name, which originally ſignifies the Ward or Guardian of an Houſe.

† James IV. king of Scotland, married Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. king of England, by whom he had James V. who had only one child, Mary, queen of Scots, who had only one ſon, James VI. who, from James IV. had an undoubted right to the kingdom of Scotland, and from Margaret, king Henry VII's daughter (the male line being utterly extinct), an unqueſtionable title to the crown of England. Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry ‡. Thus the king's regard for the duke of Norfolk's family plainly ſhewed what he thought of Elizabeth's treatment of that nobleman and his houſe. It was not in this alone that he expreſſed his reſentment againſt the late queen: upon all occaſions he pretended to ſhew it was only out of policy that he had, whilſt ſhe lived, concealed his averſion for her. The moſt notable mark he gave of it, was that he neither went into mourning himſelf, nor would admit any perſon to his preſence in a mourning habit.

On the ſeventh of May, James, after creating a multitude of knights, was received in London; and on the twentieth he created Cecil lord Cecil of Eſſenden, ſir Robert Sidney lord Sidney of Penſhurſt, ſir William Knowles lord Knowles of Grays, and ſir Edward Wotton lord Wotton of Morley. This conduct, ſo much the reverſe of Elizabeth's frugality as to titles of honour, ſeems to have been owing to the grateful ſenſe James had of the affection diſcovered towards his perſon and right by his new ſubjects.

Theſe promotions were preparatory to the coronation, which was celebrated at Weſtminſter abbey on Monday the twenty-fifth of July, being St. James's day, Whitgift, archbiſhop of Canterbury, performing the cermonies of crowning and anointing both the king and queen; the earl of Nottingham being conſtituted the lord high-ſteward, and the earl of Worceſter made earl-marſhal, for that day's ſolemnity. The plague raging at this time in London with ſo much fury that thirty thouſand perſons died of it within the year; there was no cavalcade from the Tower through the city to the palace of Weſtminſter, as had been uſual, the day before the coronation; and a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding all perſons, except the lord-mayor, aldermen, and twelve citizens (who came in the mayor's barge by water) to reſort thither, for fear of ſpreading the infection. To avoid the diſtemper, the king, after knighting all the aldermen, the next morning removed with his court to Wincheſter.

The public rejoicings were, however, ſomewhat damped by the gifts and dignities which were now laviſhed upon ſwarms of Scots, who had attended their ſovereign to his new kingdom, in order to feed upon the fat of a land, ſo much more fertile and grateful than their own: the duke of Lenox, the earl of Marr, the lord Hume, the lord Kinloſs, ſir George Hume, and ſecretary Elphinſton, were immediately admitted into the privy-council; ſir George Hume was created earl of Dunbar; Hay was dignified firſt with the title of viſcount Doncaſter, then earl of Carliſle; and Ramſey was promoted to the earldom of Holderneſſe.

It muſt be confeſſed, however, in juſtice to James, that he left almoſt all the chief offices in the hands of Elizabeth's miniſters, and committed the management of political affairs, both foreign and domeſtic, to his Engliſh ſubjects. Among theſe ſecretary Cecil, ſon to the famous Burleigh, created lord Eſſenden, was retained by him as his prime miniſter and chief counſellor, to the no ſmall ſurprize of all parties, who thought that his name and family muſt naturally be odious to James, on account of the great hand his father had in the execution of queen Mary, and that he himſelf had been deeply engaged againſt the earl of Eſſex, whom James had been often heard to declare he conſidered as a martyr to the Scottiſh ſucceſſion: but the truth is, that Cecil, who poſſeſſed all the art and cunning of a courtier, as well as many of the qualities of a ſtateſman, had wiſely reſolved, on the firſt approach of Elizabeth's diſſolution, to reconcile himſelf to James, without the knowlege of either the queen or her miniſters, and for this purpoſe had kept up a ſecret correſpondence with the Scottiſh monarch, during ſeveral months, in which he fully informed him of the private as well as public diſpoſition of the people of England in regard to his ſucceſſion; the conſequence of this was, that James, on his arrival at York, honoured Cecil with a moſt gracious reception, and created him a baron; and this cunning politician ſoon gained an aſcendancy over the ſpirit of James, who, with very little experience or judgment, and an infinite conceit of his own abilities and penetration, laid himſelf entirely open to the arts of adulation. Thus much, however, by way of introduction.

The eyes of all the potentates of Europe were fixed in anxious expectation upon James, from the firſt inſtant of his aſcending the throne of England; they ſaw in him the ſon of a mother who died a martyr to the cauſe of popery, which raiſed vaſt hopes in the profeſſors of that religion, and equal apprehenſions in thoſe of the proteſtant communion; and ambaſſadors from almoſt all the princes and ſtates concerned, ſoon appeared at the Engliſh court, in order to felicitate the king on his new-acquired dignity, and to conclude with him new treaties and alliances: beſides envoys from Venice, Denmark, and the Palatinate, Henry Frederick of Naſſau, aſſiſted by the famous penſionary Barnevelt, repreſented the ſtates of the United Provinces, Aremberg was ſent by the archduke Albert, and Taxis was expected in a little time from Spain.

Henry IV. of France could not, without vaſt concern, reflect that James, in one part of his life, had been already tampering with Spain; he thought he had every thing to dread from ſuch an union, eſpecially if James ſhould happen to diſcover an enterprizing genius. Though there was little likelihood of this, yet Henry, conſcious how much he had provoked him, could not be very eaſy till he had founded his intentions, and charged the marquis de Roſné, afterwards duke of Sully, the beſt political head of the French court, with that commiſſion. This miniſter propoſed, in his maſter's name, a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the Northern crowns, in order to invade the Auſtrian dominions on every ſide, and humble the exorbitant power of that ambitious family; but the genius of the Engliſh king was little adapted to ſuch vaſt enterprizes: the love of peace was his ruling paſſion; and Roſné found James to be maſter of ſo much diſſimulation, that all his addreſs could not ſift out his real intentions, nor bring him to make any declaration farther than in general terms, of his deſign to live in friendſhip with France; and upon the whole the marquis thought that Cecil ſeemed rather diſpoſed to a peace between England and Spain. At laſt, after numberleſs evaſions on the part of James and his miniſters, a ſolemn conference was held upon the ſtate of affairs, when it was agreed, that the two kings ſhould permit the Dutch to levy forces in their reſpective dominions, and ſhould privately ſupply that republic with the ſum of one million four hundred thouſand livres a year, for the maintenance of their forces; that the whole ſum ſhould be advanced by the king of France, but that the third part ſhould be deducted for a debt due by him to Elizabeth; and if the Spaniards attacked either of the princes, they engaged to aſſiſt each other, Henry with a force of ten thouſand, James with that of ſix thouſand men.

‡ To avoid confuſion, it will be proper to continue the account of the numerous family of Howard. Thomas Howard, the third duke of Norfolk, married, firſt, Anne, daughter to king Edward IV. by whom he had Thomas, who died young: his ſecond wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, by whom he had Henry, earl of Arundel, beheaded 13 Henry VIII. and Thomas, created viſcount Howard of Binden, 1. Eliz. The ſaid Henry married Frances, daughter of John de Vere, earl of Oxford, and by her had Thomas the fourth duke of Norfolk (reſtored 1 Mary, and beheaded for attempting to marry Mary, queen of Scots), and Henry, made earl of Northampton, 1 James I. The laſt mentioned Thomas had two wives: 1. Mary, daughter and coheir of Henry, earl of Arundel; who was mother of Philip, earl of Arundel: 2. Margaret, daughter of Thomas lord Audley, and mother of Thomas, created earl of Suffolk 1 James I. and of William, made lord Howard of Naworth-caſtle, 1 James I. The aforeſaid Philip, earl of Arundel, had a ſon, named Thomas, who was reſtored 1 James I. This Thomas was father, 1ſt of Henry; 2dly of William, created viſcount Stafford in 1640. The laſt Thomas was father of Thomas, the fifth duke of Norfolk, 13 Car. II. and of Henry, created earl of Norwich in 1683. The before-mentioned Thomas, earl of Suffolk, had ſeven ſons: 1. Theophilus, who ſucceeded him; 2. Thomas, created earl of Berkſhire, 1629. 7. Edward, made lord Howard of Eſcrick, 1629. The above-ſaid William lord Howard of Naworth-caſtle, was father of Philip; and he of William, who was father of Charles, created earl of Carliſle, 1661. Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii.

The court of France thought that it had gained a great point in bringing James to ſign this treaty; but a very extraordinary diſcovery that was made, or pretended to be made, in England about this time, did not perhaps a little influence the councils of James on this occaſion. The king, on his arrival in England, had given a very cold reception to Raleigh, Cobham, with all the other enemies of Eſſex, Cecil excepted; and they were imprudent enough to give their enemies an handle, by keeping ſuſpicious company: while, amidſt the moſt profound tranquility, both foreign and domeſtic, the nation was alarmed with a diſcovery of a plot to overturn the government, and to place upon the throne the lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinſwoman of the king, deſcended equally with him from Henry VII. who had been for ſome time a cloſe ſtate-priſoner in the Tower; and ſir Walter Raleigh, with his friends the lords Cobham and Grey, ſir Griffith Markham, ſir Edward Parham, ſir George Brooke, brother to lord Cobham, Bartholomew Brookſby, and Anthony Coppely, with two prieſts, William Watſon and William Clarke, were ſent to priſon. Every thing remains ſtill myſterious in this conſpiracy: though nothing could be more ridiculous than that Raleigh, who had ever diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a kind of enthuſiaſm againſt Spain, ſhould mingle his treaſons with thoſe of the papiſts, yet it is certain, that, beſides the general charge, another was brought againſt him and Cobham in particular, for the tolerating popery by the help of ſix hundred thouſand crowns, which were to be paid to the duke of Aremberg, and diſtributed among the diſaffected in England. The account of the trial, as it is come to our hands, is very imperfect and confuſed; the two prieſts and Brooke, however, were executed, but without confeſſing themſelves guilty of any actual treaſon: Watſon indeed, an ignorant pragmatical prieſt, acknowleged that he had given it as his opinion, that, as the king was not yet crowned, any attempt upon his perſon could not be properly deemed treaſon; but nothing appears to have gone farther amongſt the pretended conſpirators than table-talking, though ſuch as certainly could not be defended.

On the ſeventeenth of November Raleigh was tried before commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, without having any witneſſes brought to confront him, though he earneſtly requeſted that privilege, allowed by the law. One Dyer, indeed, was brought to ſwear, that he heard a gentleman at Liſbon ſay, that don Raleigh and don Cobham would cut the king's throat before his coronation: and, to the reproach of all law and juſtice, ſir Edward Coke, the attorney-general, laid very great ſtreſs upon this ridiculous evidence; and in the end the confeſſion of Cobham was the only evidence, weak as it was, that bore hard againſt him. That nobleman had been weak enough to let himſelf be tricked into the confeſſion to ſave his own life; but, after he was thrown into the Tower, being ſeized with a violent fit of ſickneſs, he ſolemnly retracted all he had ſaid; nevertheleſs Raleigh was found guilty by his jury, upon which he had ſentence of death paſſed upon him as a traitor, as had likewiſe Cobham, on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month by his peers, the lord-chancellor Elleſmere ſitting as lord high-ſteward. In a few days after, the lord Grey and Markham had the ſame judgment paſſed on them. James ſigned warrants for the execution of the two lords and ſir Griffith Markham, and publicly ſent them to the ſheriff of Wincheſter: at the ſame time he privately ſent, by one of his Scottiſh domeſtics, a warrant, written all with his own hand, directed to the ſheriff likewiſe, ſuperſeding the execution. His laſt warrant was not produced till the two lords and the knight were actually making ready for the ſtroke. This arrant piece of king-craft in James was far from anſwering his expectations: it is plain he had been made to expect the priſoners, in their laſt moments, would have enhanced the value of his unexpected clemency, and perhaps have brought more confiſcations into his coffers; but no ſuch diſcovery having been made, the public was thrown into greater doubts than ever as to the truth of the conſpiracy; and James afterwards acted as if he had repented of his mercy; for he ſuffered ſir Griffith Markham to periſh abroad in obſcurity and oblivion; the lord Grey died in the Tower; and the lord Cobham periſhed through hunger, cold, and filth, in a garret in the Minories, to which he was forced to aſcend by a ladder, and even for that he was indebted to the gratitude of an old woman. The natural reflection that is to be made upon this ſcene of blood and myſtery, is, that the whole was a contrivance of Cecil, and the Spaniſh faction, to get rid of his and their moſt formidable enemies.

The papiſts, upon the acceſſion of James to the crown of England, found themſelves miſerably deceived; for he gave them plainly enough to underſtand that he was determined to maintain religion as it had been left by Elizabeth. The puritans, encouraged by this, and by ſome doubts concerning the worſhip of the church of England, which James, perhaps only to ſhew his polemical accompliſhments, had thrown out, applied for favour and indulgence, and James appointed a diſputation between the heads of both parties, in which he was to ſit umpire. The diſputation was held at Hampton-court, and the managers for the church were, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of London, Durham, Wincheſter, Worceſter, St. David's, Chicheſter, Carliſle, and Peterborough, the dean of the chapel, the deans of Weſtminſter, Chriſt-church, St. Paul's, Worceſter, Saliſbury, Cheſter, and Windſor; to theſe muſt be added Dr. King archdeacon of Nottingham, and Dr. Field afterwards archdeacon of Gloceſter. Thoſe for the nonconformiſts were, Dr. John Reynolds and Dr. Thomas Sparks, of Oxford; Mr. Chaderton and Mr. Knewſtubbs, of Cambridge.

In the courſe of this conference, which was opened on the fourteenth of January, 1604, James, in his capacity of præſes, ſhewed uncommon talents at diſputation; and it may be ſaid with juſtice, that his merits would have been great, had a college, inſtead of a kingdom, been his province of government. Upon the whole, the reader may eaſily gueſs the nonconformiſts, on this occaſion, were as much worſted in the diſpute as the proteſtants had been under Mary, or the papiſts under Elizabeth: the king's opinion and deciſion went clearly againſt them; if they did not conform, he threatened to uſe more forcible arguments than diſputation; and he cloſed up the whole with the grave aphoriſm of "No biſhop, no king."

It being thus reſolved to treat the puritans with the utmoſt ſeverity, it was neceſſary to proceed in ſome ſort againſt the papiſts; accordingly a proclamation was publiſhed on the twenty-ſecond of February, commanding all Jeſuits, and other papiſts having any orders from foreign powers, to depart the kingdom on or before the nineteenth of March. But this proclamation was ſo worded, that the king was extremely deſirous to ſhew he did not baniſh the Jeſuits in hatred to the catholic religion in general, but only on account of their attachment to the pope's unlimited power over crowned heads: as to the other doctrines, he was willing to allow his popiſh ſubjects to believe what they pleaſed, which gave occaſion to ſuſpect him to be inclined to the Roman catholic religion; and biſhop Burnet ſays, that, from the year 1606, he was always writing and talking againſt popery, though he acted for it. But what made James more ſuſpected by the zealous proteſtants, was the great partiality he ſhewed in his proceedings againſt the puritans; for, in his proclamation againſt them, he paid no regard to the tender conſciences of ſuch as could not comply with the doctrines of the church of England, but in the whole condemned them as a ſet of obſtinate people deſerving no favour.

Theſe proclamations were followed by a great many more againſt certain monopolies, protections, ſalt-petre men, and againſt ſome other grievances complained of by the people, hoping to gain the concurrence of the public to eſtabliſh thoſe royal mandates as ſo many laws, and ſo to enable him to govern without a parliament; and though he did ſubmit to call one, to meet him at Weſtminſter, on the nineteenth of March, 1604, he words the writs, and proclamation for ſummoning the ſame, in ſuch terms of command, and under ſuch reſtrictions, that he reſerved the power of rejecting all thoſe who did not come ready to ſubmit to his will and direction; as moſt plainly appears in the words themſelves, where it is ſaid:

"We notify by theſe preſents, that all returns and certificates of knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, ought and are to be brought to the Chancery, and there to be filed on record; and if any ſhould be found to be made contrary to this proclamation, the ſame is to be rejected as unlawful and inſufficient, and the city or borough to be fined for the ſame: if it be found that they have committed any groſs or wilful default and contempt in their election, return, or certificate, than their liberties, according to the law, are to be ſeized into our hands as forfeited. And if any perſon take upon him the place of a knight, citizen, or burgeſs, not being duly elected, returned, and ſworn, according to the laws and ſtatutes in that behalf provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this our proclamation, then every perſon ſo offending to be fined and impriſoned for the ſame." By which the king aſſumed the power to judge the validity of all elections, and demanded the ſame ſubmiſſion to his own proclamations as to any of the laws of the land.

James opened this his firſt parliament by the moſt extraordinary ſpeech that ever was pronounced from a throne: it contained excellent matter, but is blameable for its vanity, its prolixity, and many improprieties. His general propoſitions, however, are very juſt; and the following noble paſſage demands the admiration and praiſe of every lover of Engliſh liberty, and contains a glorious leſſon for a crowned head. "When, (ſays he,) I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that which I am bound to do, and am accountable to God, ſhould I do the contrary; for I acknowlege, that the greateſt and moſt eſſential difference between a rightful king and an uſurping tyrant, is this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think, that his kingdom and people are only ordained for the gratification of his deſires and unreaſonable appetites; the righteous and juſt king doth, on the contrary, acknowlege, that he himſelf is only ordained for promoting the wealth and proſperity of his people, and that his greateſt and principal happineſs muſt conſiſt in their proſperity. If you be rich, I cannot be poor; if you be happy, I cannot be unfortunate: and I proteſt, that your welfare ſhall be the conſtant object of my ſtudy and attention. That I am a ſervant is moſt true; and that as I am head and and governor of all the people in my dominions, conſidering them in number, and in different ranks; ſo if we will take the people as one body and maſs, then, as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, ſo muſt a righteous king acknowlege himſelf to be ordained for the people, and not his people for him: for although a king and people be relative, yet can he be no king if he want people and ſubjects. But there be many people in the world, that want a king: wherefore I will never be aſhamed to confeſs it my principal honour to be the great ſervant of the commonwealth, and ever think the proſperity there-thereof to be my greateſt felicity, as I have already obſerved*." The reſt of this ſpeech was calculated to perſuade a union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and he took occaſion to compliment the Roman catholics, by owning the church of Rome for the mother-church, "although defiled with ſome deformities and corruptions:" he even offered to meet them half way in their doctrines, &c. and dropped ſome ſevere expreſſions againſt the puritans, which rendered that ſect and their friends very diffident of his intentions all the ſubſequent part of his reign.

This ſpeech was ſo far from meeting with the general applauſe he expected, that it drew upon him the ill-will of all but the moſt zealous partizans of the church of England, whoſe chief point was to ruin the puritans. The nobility and gentry could not bear the diſappointments they met with in the numerous advancements of the Scots to places of honour and profit, and to titles and dignities, which the Engliſh expected as their birth-right; the preſbyterians were enraged to hear the king profeſs himſelf their open enemy; and all the proteſtants in general were grieved at the advances he made to the papiſts.

This laid the foundation of all the misfortunes experienced by the eſtabliſhed church afterwards; and ſo far contributed to the preſent diſlike to his majeſty, that the parliament could not be perſuaded to agree to his favourite ſcheme of uniting the two kingdoms, though he had ordered himſelf to be proclaimed king of Great Britain, and quartered the croſs of St. Andrew with that of St. George in the Engliſh flag.

The caſe of ſir Francis Goodwin was another cauſe of diſcontent to the people; for he being declared duly elected knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks by the committee of elections, after a full hearing on a petition of ſir John Forteſcue, the king commanded the commons to proceed to re-conſider the caſe, and to have a conference with the judges, after they had refuſed to confer with the lords thereupon; which in all probability muſt have ended in a quarrel between the king and his commons, had not Goodwin's moderation diſengaged him with honour in ſo nice an affair, and convinced him of what little ſignification that clauſe in his proclamation was, by which he intended to be maſter of the elections; and which convinced the parliament of the neceſſity of obviating ſuch pernicious incidents for the future. Wherefore they addreſſed his majeſty, on the fifteenth of June, and amongſt other grievances, took occaſion to repreſent their privileges, of which they ſuppoſed him not yet fully informed. But this ſo diſpleaſed the king, that he prorogued the parliament, on the ſeventh of July, to the ſeventh of February following, after they had granted him a large rate on tonnage and poundage, and paſſed ſeveral good acts for the peace and good government of the kingdom; ſuch as an act for the due execution of the laws againſt Jeſuits, ſeminary prieſts, and recuſants; a continuation of queen Elizabeth's vagrant-act, by which the people who go about the country to ſell glaſſes are adjudged rogues and vagabonds: an act to reſtrain the inordinate haunting and tippling in inns, alehouſes, &c. one againſt conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil ſpirits; one for relief of creditors againſt bankrupts; and another againſt brokers, &c.

Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, a treaty of peace with Spain was ſet on foot at London, and the commiſſioners for the king of England were Thomas Sackville, lately created earl of Dorſet; Charles Howard, earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral; Henry Howard, earl of Northampton; Charles Blount, earl of Devonſhire; and Robert lord Cecil, baron of Eſſenden, lately created viſcount Cranburn, and ſoon after earl of Saliſbury: on the part of the king of Spain, John de Velaſco, conſtable of Caſtile; John Baptiſta de Taxis, count de Villa Medina, the Spaniſh ambaſſador: for the archduke Albert, Charles, count d'Aremberg; John Richardot, preſident of the privy council; and Ludovic Wareiker, principal ſecretary of ſtate. On the eighteenth of Auguſt, 1604, the ſeveral articles were finally agreed upon, the moſt remarkable of which imported, "that James ſhould fix a day, before the expiration of which the ſtates of the United Provinces ſhould make peace with the archduke; and in caſe of a refuſal, the king of England ſhould deem himſelf abſolved from all engagements with that confederacy." Nevertheleſs, he never fixed the time, or withdrew his troops from their ſervice; nay he even reſtored the places they had mortgaged, for a much ſmaller ſum than that for which they were depoſited. It was after the concluſion of this treaty that the town of Oſtend capitulated, having been three years beſieged by the Spaniards, who found nothing in the place but heaps of ruins in recompence for the vaſt ſums of money and incredible numbers of lives which had been expended in the conqueſt. James, without concerning himſelf about the fate of this fortreſs, reſolved to improve his new connexion with Spain, and the earl of Nottingham, the lord high-admiral, was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to that court, for which he took his departure, with a very numerous and magnificent retinue, while the earl of Hertford was diſpatched to Bruſſels.

At the ſame time that the above treaty was concluded, another was alſo made, relating entirely to commerce, and the king granted a monopoly of the trade with Spain and Italy to a company of merchants, excluſive of all his other ſubjects. But this was ſo generally complained of, as deſtructive to trade, that it was thought proper by the government to revoke the patent in the next ſeſſion of parliament.

The remainder of this year was ſpent at court in flatteries by thoſe who ſought for preferment, and in a laviſh diſpoſal of the royal favour to the king's minions, which bred great diſcontent in thoſe who had no ſhare in it, and thought themſelves not leſs worthy than the others who monopolized the king's graces. Queen Elizabeth took a different method, but king James did not think fit to be her imitator in this, more than in other matters. Never were honours beſtowed with leſs diſcretion and more profuſion than in this reign; accordingly they were no longer conſidered as the reward of merit, but only of adulation.

Before we conclude the year 1604, it is proper to obſerve, that his majeſty, who was a great enemy to tobacco, as appears in his writings againſt it, ordered, by proclamation, dated the ſeventh of October, that, beſides the cuſtom of two pence per pound charged upon it by an act of parliament of the late reign, there ſhould be an additional duty of ſix ſhillings and eight pence on every pound imported into this realm: and as a farther token of his intention to exert his power and rule without parliaments, he, by privy-ſeal, borrowed ſeveral ſums of money from the wealthieſt citizens of London.

Cardinal d'Oſſat, the great French miniſter at Rome, died on the thirteenth of March this year, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Perron. By this time the few years of peace which France had enjoyed, had put that king and kingdom in an excellent ſituation: but there ſtill remained many great men in France who favoured the Huguenots. Though the duke of Bouillon had taken refuge at the elector Palatine's court, yet his friends were very ſtrong and numerous: the dukes de la Tremouille and Rohan were known to favour the ſame intereſt; and Pleſſis Mornay, with thoſe Huguenots who had ſtood moſt firmly to Henry, accuſed him of ingratitude to their party. All theſe conſiderations made Henry extremely ſolicitous to keep well with James, leſt he ſhould be drawn either to the Spaniſh or the Huguenot party; he was fortified in this reſolution by the marquis de Roſné.

Henry was at this time daily alarmed with diſcoveries of conſpiracies of the Spaniards againſt his perſon and government; and he had not only the good fortune to defeat and diſappoint them all, but, by a ſeaſonable mixture of ſeverity and clemency, came a to diſtinct knowlege of all the connexions between the diſaffected party and the Spaniſh ambaſſadors in France and England. The marchioneſs de Verneuil, his beloved miſtreſs, had drawn from him a promiſe of marriage in writing, which the court of Spain endeavoured to get into their hands, hoping thereby to rear up a pretender to the crown of France againſt Henry's lawful iſſue, in the ſon of poſterity of the marchioneſs; but her indiſcretion and inſolence, upon the ſtrength of this promiſe, drove the king from all his tenderneſs to her; he ſuffered her and her father, with one Morgan, who managed the correſpondence with the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, to be arreſted, and tried them, with the count d'Auvergne, who was engaged in the ſame conſpiracy. They were found guilty: upon the ſtrength, however, of the diſcoveries which all of them, eſpecially the marchioneſs, made, the king mitigated their puniſhments, and cruſhed a conſpiracy for betraying Marſeilles. At the ſame time his miniſters at Rome became entire maſters of all the intrigues of that court, where this year three popes ſucceeded one another.

On the twenty-third of April, 1605, being St. George's day, the king kept the feaſt of the order of the Garter at Greenwich, when two new knights companions were admitted, viz. Ulric, duke of Norway, eldeſt ſon to the king of Denmark, and brother to James's queen, and Henry Howard, earl of Northampton: and upon the Saturday following, in the hall at Greenwich, being richly ornamented for the purpoſe, his majeſty created three earls, one viſcount, and four barons, namely, ſir Robert Cecil, viſcount Cranburn, he created earl of Saliſbury; Thomas Cecil, lord Burleigh, his lordſhip's eldeſt brother, earl of Exeter; and ſir Philip Herbert, younger brother to the earl of Pembroke, he created earl of Montgomery; Robert Sidney, baron of Penſhurſt, lord-chamberlain to the queen, was created viſcount Liſle; ſir John Stanhope, his vice-chamberlain, he made lord Stanhope of Harrington; ſir George Carew, vice-chamberlain to the queen, was made lord Carew of Clopton; Mr. Thomas Arundel, of Devonſhire, lord Arundel of Wardour; and Mr. William Cavendiſh, lord Cavendiſh of Hardwicke: Charles, duke of Albany, the king's ſecond ſon, then an infant of four years old, had, in the preceding year, been created duke of York with great ſolemnity, and admitted into the order of the Bath.

About this time one Thomas Douglas, a Scot, who had lately been ſent in the character of envoy from the count palatine of the Rhine, was committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower, for having counterfeited the king's privy-ſeal to divers princes of Germany; and being, upon due trial, fully convicted of the ſame, he was drawn upon a hurdle to Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered.

We are now to attend the diſcovery of a plot, the moſt daring and impious that occurs in the annals of mankind. This is no other than the Gunpowder Treaſon, by which the conſpirators propoſed to blow up the king, the royal family, and both houſes of parliament, while in full ſeſſions, and thus involve them all in utter and inevitable ruin. This moſt diabolical deſign was ſet on foot by ſeveral Roman catholics, who were enraged to hear that James was firmly reſolved to put in force the laws againſt them. Their infernal cabal conſiſted of Henry Garnet, an Engliſhman, who, about the year 1586, had been ſent over here as ſuperior of the Engliſh Jeſuits; Cateſby, an Engliſh gentleman; Teſmond, a Jeſuit; Thomas Wright; two gentlemen of the name of Winter; Thomas Piercy, a near relation of the earl of Northumberland; Guido Fawkes, a bold and enterprizing ſoldier of fortune; ſir Edward Digby; John Grant, eſq. Francis Treſham, eſq. with Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, gentlemen. Moſt of theſe were both men of birth and fortune; and Cateſby, who had a large eſtate, had already expended two thouſand pounds in ſeveral voyages to the court of Spain, in order to introduce an army of Spaniards into England, for overturning the preſent government, and reſtoring the Roman catholic religion; but, being diſappointed in his project of an invaſion, took an opportunity of diſcloſing to Piercy, who was his intimate friend, and who, in a ſudden fit of paſſion, had hinted a deſign of aſſaſſinating the king as he was riding a-hunting, a nobler and more extenſive plan of treaſon, ſuch as would include a ſure execution of vengeance, and, at one blow, conſign over to deſtruction all their enemies. Piercy approved of this project of Cateſby, and they reſolved to impart the matter to a few more, and, by degrees, to all the reſt of their cabal, every man being bound by an oath and taking the ſacrament, the moſt ſacred rite of their religion, not to diſcloſe the leaſt ſyllable of the matter, or to withdraw from the aſſociation, without conſent of all concerned. Theſe conſultations were held in the ſpring and ſummer of the year 1604, and it was towards the beginning of that year they began their operations; the manner of which, and the diſcovery, I ſhall give the reader from authentic papers of the earl of Saliſ-bury (Cecil), with all the brevity that is conſiſtent with perſpicuity.

It had been agreed, that a few of the conſpirators ſhould run a mine below the room in which the parliament was to aſſemble, and choſe the very moment when the king delivered his ſpeech to both houſes, and then, by one blow, to cut off the king, the royal family, lords, commons, and all the other enemies of the catholic religion, in that very ſpot where that religion had been moſt oppreſſed. For this purpoſe Piercy, who was at that time a gentleman-penſioner, undertook to hire an houſe adjoining to the upper houſe of parliament, with all diligence: and the others, expecting the parliament would meet on the ſeventeenth of February following, began, on the eleventh of December, to dig in the cellar, through the wall of partition, which was three yards thick. There were ſeven in number joined in this labour: they went in by night, never after appeared in ſight, and, having provided themſelves with baked meat, had no occaſion to ſend out; and, in caſe of diſcovery, they had provided themſelves with powder, ſhot, and fire-arms, with a reſolution rather to die than yield or be taken. On Candlemas-day, 1605, they had dug ſo far through the wall, as to be able to hear a noiſe on the other ſide: upon which unexpected event, fearing a diſcovery, Guido Fawkes (who perſonated Piercy's footman) was diſpatched to know the occaſion, and returned with the favourable report, that the place from whence the noiſe came was a large cellar, under the upper-houſe of parliament, full of ſea-coal, which was now on ſale, and the cellar offered to be lett. Piercy immediately hired the cellar, and bought the remainder of the coals; then he ſent for thirty barrels of gunpowder from Holland, and landing them at Lambeth, conveyed them gradually, by night, to this cellar, covered them with ſtones, iron bars, a thouſand bullets, and five hundred faggots; all which they did at their leiſure, the parliament being farther prorogued to the third of October, and again to the fifth of November.

The conſpirators conſulted, in the next place, how they ſhould ſecure the duke of York, who was too young to be expected at the parliament-houſe; and his ſiſter, the princeſs Elizabeth, educated at lord Harrington's, in Warwickſhire. It was reſolved, that Piercy, and another gentleman, ſhould enter into the duke's chamber without ſuſpicion, and a dozen more, properly diſpoſed at ſeveral doors, and two or three on horſeback at the court-gate to receive him, ſhould carry him ſafe away as ſoon as the parliament-houſe was blown up: or, if that could not be effected, to kill him, and to declare the princeſs Elizabeth queen, having ſecured her, under colour of a hunting match that day.

Some moved for foreign aid beforehand, but were over-ruled; and it was agreed only to apply to France, Spain, and the archduke, for aſſiſtance after the plot had taken effect: they alſo reſolved to ſave the princeſs Elizabeth, and proclaim her queen, and to ſpread a report after the blow was given, that the puritans were the perpetrators of ſo inhuman an action.

Every thing being now prepared by the conſpirators, they, without the leaſt remorſe of conſcience, and with the utmoſt impatience, expected the fifth of November. But all their counſels were blaſted, and brought on their own heads, by the all-ſeeing eye of Providence: one of the conſpirators, with a deſire to ſave William Parker, lord Monteagle, ſon to lord Morley, wrote the following letter.

"My Lord,

"Out of the love I bear to ſome of your friends, I have a care for your preſervation; therefore, I adviſe you, as you tender your life, to deviſe ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance at this parliament; for God and man have concurred to puniſh the wickedneſs of this time: and think not ſlightly of this advertiſement, but retire yourſelf into your country, where you may expect the event with ſafety; for though there be no appearance of any ſtir, yet I ſay they ſhall receive a terible blow, this parliament, yet they ſhall not ſee who hurts them. This counſel is not to be contemned, becauſe it can do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is paſt ſo ſoon (or as quickly) as you burn this letter; and I hope God will give you the grace to make good uſe of it, to whoſe holy protection I commend you."

Monteagle was for a good while at a loſs what judgment to form of this letter, and unreſolved whether he ſhould ſlight the advertiſement or not; and fancying it a trick of his enemies to frighten him into an abſence from parliament, would have taken the firſt party, had his own ſafety been only in queſtion; but apprehending the king's life might be in danger, he carried it at midnight to the earl of Saliſbury, who was full as much puzzled about the meaning of the letter, and, though he inclined to think it a wild and waggiſh contrivance to alarm Monteagle, thought proper to conſult about it with the earl of Suffolk, lord-chamberlain. The expreſſions, "that the blow ſhould come without knowing who hurt them," made them imagine that it would not be more proper than the time of parliament, nor by any other way like to be attempted than by gunpowder, while the king was ſitting in that aſſembly: the lord-chamberlain thought this the more probable, becauſe there was a great cellar under the parliament-chamber, never uſed for any thing but ſome wood or coal, belonging to Whineyard, the keeper of the palace; and having communicated the letter to the earls of Nottingham, Worceſter, and Northampton, proceeded no farther till the king came from Royſton, on the firſt of November, to Weſtminſter.

His majeſty being ſhewed the letter, and acquainted with their ſuſpicions, was of opinion that either nothing ſhould be done, or elſe enough to prevent the danger; and that a ſearch ſhould be deferred till the day deſigned for the execution of the diabolical enterprize. Thus on Monday the fourth of November, in the afternoon, the lord-chamberlain, whoſe office it was to ſee all put in readineſs for the king's coming, taking Monteagle with him, went to viſit all places about the parliament-houſe, and taking a ſlight occaſion ſo ſee the cellar, obſerved only piles of billets and faggots, but in greater number than he thought Whineyard could want for his own uſe: asking him who owned the wood, and being told it belonged to one Mr. Piercy, he began to have ſome ſuſpicions, knowing him to be a rigid papiſt, and ſo ſeldom there that he had no occaſion for ſuch a quantity of fuel; and Monteagle confirmed him therein, by taking notice that Piercy had made him great profeſſions of friendſhip, though he was not come out of the North when the letter was received. There were no other materials viſible, yet Suffolk thought it abſolutely neceſſary to make a farther ſearch; and upon his return to the king, a reſolution was taken that it ſhould be made in ſuch a manner as ſhould be effectual, without ſcandalizing any body, or giving any alarm. Sir Thomas Knevet, ſteward of Weſtminſter, was accordingly ordered, under the pretext of ſearching for ſtolen tapeſtry hangings in that place, and other houſes thereabouts, to remove the wood and ſee if any thing was concealed underneath. This gentleman going at midnight, unlooked-for, to the cellar, met Fawkes juſt coming out of it, booted and ſpurred, with a tinder-box and three matches in his pockets, and ſeizing him without any ceremony or asking him any queſtions, cauſed him to be bound as ſoon as the removal of the wood diſcovered the barrels of gunpowder. Fawkes, an hardened and intrepid villain, made no difficulty of avowing the deſign, and that it would have been executed on the morrow. He made the ſame acknowlegement at his examination before a committee of the council; and though he did not deny having ſome aſſociates in this conſpiracy, yet no threats of torture could make him diſcover any of them, declaring "he was ready to die, and had rather ſuffer ten thouſand deaths, than willingly accuſe his maſter, or any other." It was however drawn from him by repeated examinations, and aſſurances of his maſter's being apprehended, "that whilſt he was abroad, Piercy had kept the keys of the cellar, had been in it ſince the powder had been laid there, and in effect that he was one of the principal actors in the intended tragedy." In the mean time it was found out, "that Piercy had come poſt out of the North on Saturday night, the ſecond of November, and had dined on Monday at Sion Houſe, with the earl of Northumberland; that Fawkes had met him on the road; that, after the lord-chamberlain had been that evening in the cellar, he went, about ſix o'clock to his maſter, who had fled immediately, apprehending that all was diſcovered." Saliſbury, in his account of this matter, aſcribes the thorough ſearch that was made entirely to the lord-chamberlain, owning for his own part, that though he had been ſufficiently apprized of the recuſants deſigning ſome ſtir during the parliament, yet he could not poſſibly conceive it was of ſuch a nature as had never entered before into the hearts of any conſpirators mentioned in hiſtory.

The news of the diſcovery ſpreading as quick as lightning, the conſpirators fled different ways, but moſtly into Warwickſhire, where ſir Everard Digby had appointed a hunting match, near Dunchurch, to get a number of recuſants together, ſufficient to ſeize the princeſs Elizabeth; but this deſign was prevented by her taking refuge in Coventry, and their whole party, making about one hundred horſe, retired to Holbeach, the ſeat of ſir Stephen Littleton, on the edge of Staffordſhire, having broke open ſtables and taken horſes thence, in the adjoining counties. Sir Richard Walſh, high-ſheriff of Worceſterſhire, purſuing them to Holbeach, inveſted them there, and ſummoned them to ſurrender. In preparing them for their defence, they put ſome moiſt powder before a fire to dry, and a ſpark from the coals ſetting it on fire, ſome of the conſpirators were ſo burned in their faces, thighs, and arms, that they were ſcarce capable of handling their weapons. Their caſe was deſperate, and no means of eſcape appearing, unleſs by forcing their way through the aſſailants, they made a deſperate ſally for that purpoſe: Cateſby (who firſt propoſed the manner of the plot), Piercy and the two Winters, were killed; Thomas Winter, Grant, Digby, Rookwood, and Bates, were taken and carried to London, where the firſt made a full diſcovery of the conſpiracy. Treſham, lurking in that city, and frequently moving his quarters, was apprehended not long after, and, having confeſſed the whole matter, died of the ſtranguary in the Tower. The earl of Northumberland, ſuſpected by reaſon of his being related to Thomas Piercy, was, by way of precaution, committed to the cuſtody of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, and was afterwards fined thirty thouſand pounds and ſent to the Tower, for admitting Piercy into the band of penſioners without tendering him the oath of ſupremacy. Robert Winter and Littleton wandering through woods in the country, were at laſt ſeized and ſent to the Tower. Hugh Owen and Baldwin the Jeſuit being demanded of the archduke, the former was impriſoned and his papers ſeized, but, under the pretence of his being naturalized, and of the privilege of the latter's order, neither of them was ſent to England. Some eſcaped to Calais, and coming thither with others who fled only to avoid a perſecution, as they apprehended on this occaſion, were kindly received by M. de Vic, the governor; but one declaring before him, that he was not ſo much concerned at his exile, as that the powder-plot did not take effect, de Vic was ſo much incenſed at this man's glorying in ſuch an execrable iniquity, that he had like to have thrown him into the ſea. Eight of the conſpirators being tried on the twenty-ſeventh of January, and convicted, ſir Everard Digby being the only one that pleaded guilty to the indictment, though all the reſt had confeſſed their guilt before; he was executed on the thirtieth of that month, with Robert Winter, Grant, and Bates, at the weſt end of St. Paul's Church-yard; as Thomas Winter, Keyes, Rookwood, and Fawkes were in Old Palace-yard, the day following. The earls of Nottingham, Worceſter, Suffolk, Devonſhire, Northampton, and Saliſbury, were in the commiſſion for hearing their trials, and took occaſion to vindicate the king from having ever promiſed the Roman catholics a toleration for their religion, the breach whereof had been alleged as the chief ground of their diſcontent. Garnet had been mentioned in Treſham's confeſſion; and being tried on the twenty-eighth of March, "for his knowlege and concealment of the conſpiracy; for adminiſtering an oath of ſecrecy to conſpirators; for the perſuading them of the lawfulneſs of their treaſon; and for praying for the ſucceſs of the great action in hand at the beginning of the parliament," was condemned, notwithſtanding his falſe plea, of having known of the plot only in confeſſion, which he was not to reveal. The ſentence was not executed till the third of May, when, confeſſing his own guilt, and the iniquity of the enterprize, he exhorted all Roman catholics to abſtain from the like treaſonable practices. Gerard and Hall, Jeſuits, got abroad; Littleton, and others were put to death in the country. The lord Monteagle had a grant of two hundred pounds a year in land, and a penſion of five hundred pounds for life, as a reward for diſcovering the letter which gave the firſt hint of the conſpiracy.

for

The reader will readily perceive that I have, in this account, advanced pretty far into the year 1606; but I thought it would be more ſatisfactory to preſerve the narrative of this unexampled villany and its progreſs entire to its final ſubverſion: I ſhall now reſume the thread of the hiſtory.

The ſeſſion of parliament which was fixed for the fifth of November, 1605, was poſtponed to the ninth, when the king, in an elaborate ſpeech opened it, and, as much as poſſible, endeavoured to clear the profeſſors of the catholic religion of the deteſtable principles and practices of the late conſpirators; he then very earneſtly recommended it to both houſes, that they ſhould not believe that any foreign prince was concerned in the conſpiracy, and that they ſhould reverently judge and ſpeak of them in that caſe. The truth is, that James was under a thouſand perplexities; peace was the ruling paſſion of his ſoul, and the diſcoveries he had made of the archduke's hand in this conſpiracy, made him afraid, that, if he proſecuted the matter with too keen a reſentment againſt the catholic profeſſors and princes, the court of Spain itſelf might have been found a party; in which caſe it would not have been in his power to have prevented a general war all over Europe, in which he himſelf muſt have been a principal. From the ſame ſpirit of caution James publiſhed ſeveral proclamations to prevent any public apprehenſion that the conſpirators had been promiſed aſſiſtance from foreign princes; "we do declare (ſaid he) that we cannot admit ſo inhumane a thought, as to conceive that any prince, of what religion ſoever, could give ear to ſo ſavage and barbarous an imagination; and that by ſuch examinations as hitherto had been taken, we find them all and their miniſters clear from any ſuſpicion or privy thereunto; whereof an infallible argument to us is, that all the miniſters of foreign princes, who are now here, made earneſt ſuit to be preſent in the place that day: charging and commanding all his ſubjects not to ſpeak of any of his neighbour princes, or their ambaſſadors, but reverently." The parliament was now adjourned to the twenty-firſt of January, 1606.

Early in which year the court of Spain ſent John de Mendoza to congratulate James upon his deliverance, and accompanied its congratulations with many rich preſents. But their actions gave their profeſſions the lie in the ſtrongeſt manner; for when ſir Thomas Edmonds, the Engliſh reſident with the archduke, demanded that Owen and Baldwin the Jeſuit, who had both of them been great promoters of the late conſpiracy, ſhould be ſent to England, the archduke flatly refuſed to give them up, upon pretext that Baldwin was a Jeſuit, and was to be puniſhed by his ſuperiors; and Owen a ſervant to the king of Spain, and therefore only ſubject to him. The French king behaved with much more frankneſs, for he ordered all who were only ſuſpected of the conſpiracy to be ſeized at Calais, and ſent over to England.

The parliament met to do buſineſs agreeable to their prorogation, when they confirmed the attainders of the conſpirators, and ſeriouſly applied themſelves to prevent the deſigns of ſuch popiſh recuſants as refuſed to acknowlege the king's independent authority; and the form of an oath for that purpoſe, in the nature of a teſt, was drawn up and agreed to by the two houſes; which oath, as it contained nothing repugnant to the eſſential articles of the Romiſh faith, and concerned only the unlimited power which by ſome is given, and by others denied, to the pope, was ſaid to have been deviſed by the principal catholics of the ſecular faction, that is, by the ſecular prieſts, ſo called in contradiſtinction to friars, monks, and Jeſuits, who take an oath to the pope, wherein they ſwear unlimited allegiance to his holineſs. Hence we find, that moſt of the Engliſh catholics, not infected with Jeſuitiſm, even their archprieſt himſelf, their ſuperior Blackwell, made no ſcruple to take it. But pope Urban VIII. dreading the conſequences of ſuch a coalition between thoſe members of his church and the church of England, was determined, at all events, to prevent it, ſo far as in his power; and for that end, by a brief, dated on the tenth of the calends of October, 1606, forbad them to take the ſaid oath: and, upon information that this brief was diſregarded, he, the next year, in another brief, told them plainly, that they who took the ſaid oath did forfeit all hopes of ſalvation. This wrought upon ſome weak minds, but ſome of the more learned and judicious deſpiſed ſuch unſcriptural proceedings of the court of Rome, and the archprieſt Blackwell, and others, did not fear to defend the reaſonableneſs and lawfulneſs of taking the oath of allegiance.

The parliament alſo paſſed an act for the better diſcovering and repreſſing popiſh recuſants: another to prevent the dangers which may grow by popiſh recuſants. At the ſame the practice of the law being found intolerable to the ſubject, they paſſed an act to reform the multitudes and miſdemeanors of attorneys and ſolicitors, and to avoid unneceſſary ſuits and charges of the law; and another for the recovery of ſmall debts, and the relieving of debtors in London: and then without regarding the diſputes which aroſe in the firſt ſeſſions of parliament, and as if they reſolved to buy the king's good-will, they granted him one of the largeſt ſubſidies that had ever been given to any one of his predeceſſors on the moſt urgent occaſions of the ſtate, though he was then in profound peace, and wanted money only to enrich his favourites. This aid conſiſted of three whole ſubſidies and ſix fifteenths and tenths, beſides four ſubſidies of four ſhillings in the pound, granted at the ſame time by the clergy: the whole was payable at eleven ſeparate payments, and amounted to the ſum of four hundred and fifty-three thouſand pounds.

The paſſing this grant was quickened by as arrant a ſtate-trick as ever was practiced; for, on the twenty-ſecond of March, a time when the paſſions of the people were warmed with the recent guilt and obſtinacy of the conſpirators, and while the commons were in all the heat of their debates againſt the prerogative, all London and the neighbourhood was fill with a report that James and ſome of his principal favourites were murdered at Oking, about twenty miles weſtward of London. This report was very circumſtantial, the better to gain credit, for it mentioned James to have been ſtabbed with an envenomed knife, and the murderers were compoſed of Engliſh Jeſuits, Scots in diſguiſe, Frenchmen and Spaniards. In an inſtant the court and city gates were ſhut, and the guards upon both doubled: the citizens were put under arms by the lord-mayor; and ſir William Wade, lieutenant of the Tower, made all diſpoſitions for preventing a ſurprize and ſtanding a ſiege. The commons were ſitting when, about eight in the morning, this alarm reached their houſe, and put a ſtop to all their buſineſs: ſir Edwin Sandys, however, during this conſternation gravely intimated to the houſe, that the king's murder might have been prevented, had the archbiſhop of Canterbury liſtened to his advice, to baniſh the papiſts twenty miles from London, during the ſeſſion of parliament. In an hour or two after the report became leſs ſtrong, and then doubtful; and ſir Maurice Berkley and two other perſons were diſpatched immediately to know the truth. While this was paſſing within doors, the privy-council had aſſembled, and ſoon underſtanding the report to be groundleſs, publiſhed a proclamation to diſabuſe the people, and to prohibit all riotous aſſemblies. In a few hours James himſelf ſent a meſſage, that he was to be in London about two in the afternoon; and he was received at Hyde-park by the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, preceded by the mace, and all the members attending him. The city of London followed the example of the parliament; and, amongſt other foreign ambaſſadors, the Spaniſh was ſo extravagantly joyful, that he preſented ſir Lewis Leucknor, maſter of the ceremonies, with a chain of gold worth ſix ſcore pounds. Then James, having got all he wanted for the preſent, prorogued his parliament on the twenty-ſeventh of May to the eighteenth of November following.

The court cormorants rejoiced greatly at this large ſubſidy, ſure of having it to divide among themſelves; but they were miſerably diſappointed at ſeeing it conſumed ſoon after in the court-entertainments made for the reception of Chriſtian, king of Denmark, who came to England on the ſeventeenth of July, to viſit the queen his ſiſter and the king his brother-in-law; and for the prince of Vaudemont, the duke of Lorraine's third ſon, attended by ſeven earls, ten barons, forty gentlemen, and one hundred and twenty domeſtics.

The parliament meeting on the eighteenth of November, continued ſitting till late in the ſummer of the following year, 1607. In this parliament king James renewed with more earneſtneſs than ever, his ſolicitations with the two houſes to agree to a union of England and Scotland; but the parliament was compoſed of members who were ſo little influenced by the court, that no arguments could prevail for it. The king finding them thus refractory, ſent for both houſes to attend him at Whitehall, and endeavoured, in a long ſpeech, by far the beſt he ever made, to ſhew the neceſſity of the union, and the common advantage it would procure to both nations. However, this had no effect farther than to obtain a repeal of the hoſtile laws on the borders: and James was ſo exaſperated at the oppoſition made to his favourite project, that he could not forbear loading thoſe who were againſt the union with the epithets of blind, ignorant, reſtleſs, and diſaffected; and from thenceforward ſhewed a great averſion to parliaments, and even tampered with his judges to countenance and determine actions in the King's Bench upon the authority of his proclamations only: and towards the end of June, 1607, he prorogued the parliament. The buſineſs of the commons was now become ſo complicated and important, that, in conſequence of a propoſal of ſir Edwin Sandys, a member of great influence, the houſe entered, for the firſt time, an order for the regular keeping of their journals.

The puritans exerted themſelves, as uſual, in this ſeſſion, in bringing in bills againſt pluralities, and for reſtraining the execution of eccleſiaſtical canons not confirmed by parliament; and moving for a toleration of the conventuous oppoſers of ceremonies, but without any effect. In the mean time an inſurrection happened in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Leiceſter, the country-people pretending they were deprived of their rights of commoning, and gathering three or four thouſand together, and ſometimes double the number in a body, in order to demoliſh parks and incloſures; ſuch were their feats for about a month that they roved about the country. A puritan miniſter, lately deprived, was ſaid to be one of their chiefs; four or five of them went maſqued, and otherwiſe diſguiſed; but the principal ringleader was one John Reynolds, called captain by his followers, which he boaſted would enable him to defend them againſt all aſſailants. Proclamations were iſſued, ordering them to diſperſe; the high-ſheriffs raiſed the poſſe of their counties againſt them, and broke them in ſome encounters, taking care to ſhed as little blood as poſſible. The king at laſt, by a proclamation on the twenty-eighth of June, expreſſing his unwillingneſs to proceed againſt them by martial law, and giving them hopes of mercy as well as redreſs of their grievances, they diſperſed; and ſpecial commiſſions being iſſued for their trials, captain Pouch, and others of their ringleaders, were convicted of high treaſon, and executed. This commotion was ſcarce quelled, when James, though no ſupply had been granted him in the late ſeſſion, paid on the third of July, a debt of ſixty thouſand pounds, contracted by queen Elizabeth, who had borrowed that ſum on the third of February, 1598, of the citizens of London, and had left it undiſcharged at her deceaſe.

The diſturbances in the middle of England were nothing in compariſon of one that was going to break out in Ireland, where the earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnel, weary of a quiet and inactive life, had conſpired to ſeize the caſtle of Dublin, and to make a general maſſacre of the Engliſh families ſettled in that realm; and had employed ſome Romiſh prieſts to treat with foreign princes for ſuccours. Their deſign being diſcovered, a relation of the former was put upon commencing a ſuit againſt him for part of his eſtate; and the council of Ireland pretending the cauſe was too weighty or difficult for their deciſion, remitted it to that of England, in hopes that Tyrone might be drawn thither and clapped up in the Tower: the parties had notice to attend there with their title-deeds; but Tyrone excuſing himſelf from the journey, offered to ſend his papers by a knight, who knew all his affairs. In the mean time, having ſecured a foreign veſſel that had put into a port belonging to him, he got over to France; and procuring a paſs from the government of Normandy, poſted away for Bruſſels; but finding this place at that time not a proper aſylum, he retired to Rome, where not long after he died.

In the beginning of this year, 1607, was begun a new tranſlation of the Bible, which was publiſhed in 1611, and is the ſame that is now in common uſe.

The next year, 1608, began with the execution of George Jarvis, a ſeminary prieſt of Rheims, who was hanged for treaſon at Tyburn, on the eleventh of April; and Thomas Garret, a Jeſuit, had the ſame fate on the twenty-third of June, for refuſing to take the oath of allegiance. This year alſo died Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorſet, and was ſucceeded in his poſt of lord-treaſurer by Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, a nobleman of great genius, and a fit inſtrument for the king's urgent occaſions for money, who was extremely prodigal of the Engliſh meney to his Scottiſh favourites. Amongſt other means deviſed by the miniſtry to procure the neceſſary ſums, they granted many monopolies, to the incredible loſs of our woollen and other manufactures; they moreover obliged the Dutch to pay an annual acknowlegement for fiſhing on the coaſts of Great Britain.

In the ſpring of the year 1609, after a long negociation, was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, under the guarantee of France and England, that war, which, for near half a century, had been proſecuted between Spain and the ſtates of the United Provinces; that haughty monarchy, finding her trade entirely ruined, and her provinces expoſed to the moſt imminent danger from the maritime forces of the ſtates, at laſt conſented to acknowlege them for a free people, whom ſhe had ſo long treated as rebellious ſubjects, and ſolemnly to relinquiſh all pretenſions to ſovereignty over them.

This event proved a ſource of great mortification and diſſatisfacton to James, who, on all occaſions, condemned the Hollanders as rebels, it being his avowed maxim, in all debates concerning his prerogative, that ſubjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their prince upon any account whatever; he therefore conſidered this treaty as a dangerous precedent, and prejudicial to the ſovereign authority of kings: this appeared more evidently at preſent by his licenſing two books, which maintained moſt extravagant maxims of arbitrary power. The firſt, written by Dr. Cowel, of Cambridge, profeſſor of the civil law and vicar-general to archbiſhop Bancroft, laid down theſe three principles: "1. That the king was not bound by the laws or his coronation-oath. 2. That the king is not obliged to call a parliament to make laws, but might do it alone by his abſolute power. 3. That it was a great favour to admit the conſent of the ſubject in giving ſubſidies." The other, wrote by Dr. Blackwood, a clergyman, laboured to prove that the Engliſh were all ſlaves by right of the Norman conqueſt.

By this time the immoderate expences of the court had emptied the Exchequer; and James, to recruit it, was obliged to have recourſe to raiſing an aid from his ſubjects upon the ſtale pretence of an act of the twenty-fifth year of Edward III. for giving the king a reaſonable aid upon making his eldeſt ſon a knight. But the money he raiſed in this manner being ſoon diſſipated, and the houſhold of prince Henry, who was now fifteen years of age, increaſing, James was obliged to aſſemble his parliament on the ninth of February, 1610. The earl of Saliſbury was ordered to demand the ſupply: in order to conciliate all their affections, he began with aſſuring them that his majeſty was reſolved to redreſs all their grievances; he then proceeded to explain the cauſes of the king's indigence, by obſerving that he had paid the debts of the late queen; that he had maintained an army of nineteen thouſand men in Ireland; that he had expended great ſums in the funeral of Elizabeth, in his own journey, and that of his queen and children, from Edinburgh to London; in entertaining the king of Denmark and the foreign ambaſſadors; in maintaining three courts, for himſelf, his conſort, and the prince of Wales; in ſending envoys to the different countries on the continent, and in liberalities to his officers and dependents; he launched out into extravagant encomiums upon the king's wiſdom and probity, and declared that his majeſty, far from intending to rule deſpotically, was ready to hear the remonſtrances of his parliament, provided they would confine themſelves within proper bounds, without deviating from that reſpect which was due to ſuch a great and generous ſovereign. Notwithſtanding theſe profeſſions, the members of the houſe of commons loudly complained of the king's prodigality and exceſſive profuſion towards his own countrymen: others ventured to affirm, that his intention was to ſap the privileges of the ſubject by gradual uſurpation. He had been heard to declare at his own table, that the civil law of the Roman emperors ought to be ſubſtituted in the room of the common law of England; and approved of the treatiſe called the Interpreter, written by Dr. Cowel, on that ſubject; but the chief cauſe of their complaint was the high-commiſſion court, which had exerciſed great ſeverities againſt the puritans, whoſe party was eſpouſed by a majority of the commons.

James being informed of theſe proceedings, had recourſe to his own eloquence, which he thought irreſiſtible, and required the attendance of the two houſes at Whitehall on the twenty-firſt of March, where he talked to them, in a very high ſtrain, of prerogative, a ſubject the reader will beſt underſtand by the following ſhort extract: "As it is blaſphemy (ſays he) to diſpute what God may do, ſo it is ſeditious in ſubjects to diſpute what a king may do in the height of his power." Then he tells them not to meddle with the main points of government; "for (ſays he) that is my craft, and it would be leſſening me, who have been thirty years at the trade in Scotland, and ſerved an apprenticeſhip of ſeven years here in England;" ſo that there did not want much penetration to perceive how diſtant the king's maxims of government, how artfully ſo ever palliated, were from the eſtabliſhed conſtitutions of the land: if the whole ſpeech ſhould be examined, there is ſcarce a word but what tends, either plainly or ambiguouſly, to eſtabliſh in the king an abſolute deſpotic power. The Engliſh had not been uſed to hear their kings ſpeak in ſuch a ſtyle; and indeed the whole of this curious harangue was very ill calculated to ſooth the animoſity of the people.

The commons, however, though highly diſguſted at ſome of the maxims he had broached, thought proper to diſſemble their reſentment, and expreſs their willingneſs to comply with the king's deſires. The earl of Saliſbury moved for a conference with the commons, in order to obtain an adequate ſupply for his majeſty's preſent occaſions; as well as a grant for two hundred thouſand pounds a year, for the future ſupport of his royal dignity. The commons fired at this propoſal, and voted only one ſubſidy and one fifteenth, which did not amount to the ſixth part of what had been asked for the king's preſent occaſions: they refuſed to ſettle any ſtanding revenue, unleſs the king would purchaſe it with ſome valuable conſideration. They complained of reſpites of homages, and conſented to ſettle an annual revenue of two hundred thouſand pounds, provided wardſhips ſhould be ſuppreſſed, purveyances ſhould be aboliſhed, and ſome farther privileges granted to the ſubject: but they afterwards roſe in their demands, and inſiſted upon a redreſs of their grievances. They complained of the king's pretending that his proclamations ought to have the force of laws, and of the power arrogated by the high-commiſſion court; and of his majeſty's having altered the Book of Rates, and impoſed new cuſtoms on certain ſpecies of merchandize; they petitioned, that nobody ſhould lend money to the king, or give reaſon for his refuſal: and having received divers meſſages, forbidding them to debate of his right of laying impoſts, they repreſented, that it was their fundamental right to debate freely upon all matters that concerned the ſubject. They afterwards paſſed a bill againſt taxes and impoſitions on merchants and merchandize, but it was thrown out of the houſe of lords at the firſt reading. James, had he not been bound down by his wants, would have reſented the proceedings of this parliament very highly; but he found he could not, without it, either pay his immenſe debts, or obtain a perpetual independent revenue, both which he earneſtly deſired, that he might be ſet free from the tutelage of parliaments, thoſe obſtacles to his immenſe profuſion and boundleſs partiality.

Amongſt the other occurrences which fell out in the courſe of this parliament, the creating the king's eldeſt ſon, Henry, prince of Wales, made a great noiſe. It appears, that ſeveral difficulties were ſtarted againſt this creation; and that, by the profuſions of late reigns, the revenues of that principality were greatly diminiſhed *. The debts of the crown were urged as ſo many reaſons why the expences of the king ought not to be increaſed; and it was ſtrongly inſinuated to James, that by creating his ſon prince of Wales, and putting him in poſſeſſion of a great independent ſtate, the glory of the crown would be eclipſed; it was farther urged, that the juriſdiction of a prince of Wales, when exerciſed by him in perſon, would claſh with that of the crown of England. What effect thoſe objections had upon the mind of James, does not appear; but it is certain he created his ſon prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter; and that the ſum of his revenues ariſing from thence, beſides the vaſt privileges annexed to his dignities, amounted to fifty-one thouſand four hundred and fifteen pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and ten pence, beſides two thouſand pounds a year allowed him for collection, that the revenue might come clear into his own pocket; and ſeven thouſand pounds given him by James, to purchaſe the great barony of Killingworth from ſir Robert Dudley, ſon of the earl of Leiceſter.

Henry was a youth of very promiſing talents and an amiable character, by which he acquired the love and eſteem of the Engliſh people: he ſpent his time in ſtudies becoming a prince, and exerciſed himſelf in the moſt manly diverſions. He poſſeſſed the advantage of a fine perſon, and there was a martial turn in his diſpoſition that could not but be agreeable to a warlike nation. He kept his court at St. James's, while his mother reſided at Somerſet-houſe, where ſhe lived at a great expence; ſo that James was obliged to maintain three ſeparate houſeholds.

Differences now daily increaſing between the king and his parliament, the latter was at length, on the twenty-third of July, prorogued to the ſixteenth of October, parting equally diſſatisfied with each other.

James had ſhut the temple of Janus in England, and was at peace with all the world. The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon Henry IV. of France, who by his experience and good ſenſe, was become one of the greateſt politicians as well as generals of the age: he ſaw that while the houſe of Auſtria, through its widely-extended branches, was ever ready to embrace all opportunities of aggrandizing itſelf, France had every thing to fear from its ambition; and he had formed a noble project

* As this part of the Engliſh Hiſtory, which relates to the conſtitution of the principality of Wales, appears to be very little known to the generality of our hiſtoriographers, we ſhall, from an original manuſcript, written by prince Henry's order, give ſome account of it in this note.

Edward I. had, in his father's life-time, a juriſdiction in Wales; and when he came himſelf to the crown, in the twelfth year of his reign he obliged the barons, and other great men of that country, to do homage to his ſon, after making the policy of the country more analogous to that of England. Whether, in the twenty-ninth year of his reign, he created Wales into a principality by charter, is juſtly doubted; but it is certain, from the ſummonſes to parliament, that Edward II. was earl of Cheſter. Edward III. in the ſeventeenth year of his reign, created his ſon, the famous Black Prince, prince of Wales; and with the principality, he gave him its revenues, together with the lands of Rice ap Marydick, who had been attainted. The ſame prince was likewiſe created duke of Cornwall, upon the death of his uncle, John of Eltham; and when he was no more than three years of age, he was made earl of Cheſter. Thus the whole revenue of the principality, the duchy, and the earldom, amounted to nine thouſand nine hundred and eighty-two pounds twelve ſhillings and ſeven pence; as appears by a ſurvey taken upon the death of this prince, in order to aſcertain the jointure of his princeſs, which was to be one third of the whole. This was in thoſe days an immenſe revenue, when we conſider that the prince was at the ſame time duke of Aquitain; and deſcended to his ſon, afterwards Richard II. who died without iſſue. Henry IV. in the firſt year of his reign, created his ſon prince of Wales; and he had an eſpecial ſeat in parliament on account of that principality: the prince, beſide the dukedom of Cornwall and the earldom of Cheſter, had many additional lands granted him, beſides thoſe poſſeſſed by the Black Prince, and was duke of Lancaſter beſides. Henry VI. never was prince of Wales; but, in the thirty-ſecond year of his reign, he made his eldeſt ſon prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter; and next year duke of Cornwall. By act of parliament, the rents and profits of theſe lands were to accrue to the king, until the prince was fourteen years of age; but he was to enjoy one thouſand pounds a year, for his neceſſary expences, till he was eight years of age; and two thouſand marks a year after that, till he was fourteen. But, upon the claim of the houſe of York to the crown, that duke was, in Henry VI's time, created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, as being heir to the crown. Edward IV. was never prince of Wales; but, in the eleventh year of his reign, he created his ſon prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, earl of Cheſter, and earl of Pembroke, and appointed a council to manage his revenues till the prince was fourteen. The next prince of Wales was the ſon of Richard III. who died before his father: and Henry VII. in the fifth year of his reign, created his ſon Arthur prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter. It appears that the revenues of this prince were very great, and yearly increaſed by his father, who aſſigned him a council, for the better management of his principality, of which Dr. William Smith was the firſt preſident. Upon the death of Arthur, his brother Henry, afterwards Henry VIII. was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter; and the crown reſumed the revenues of the duchy of York, upon his obtaining thoſe of the dukedom of Cornwall. Dr. Powel, a great Welſh author, is of opinion, that Edward VI. never was created prince of Wales; but admits that his ſiſter Mary was princeſs of Wales, and that the king made the biſhop of Exeter preſident of her council.

for

for humbling that houſe. The ſucceſſion to the duchies of Cleves and Juliers offered a fair opportunity of putting in practice what Henry appears to have long meditated, a general league amongſt all the princes of Europe. The duke of Cleves dying on the twenty-fifth of March, 1609, his four ſiſters, or their heirs, claimed his inheritance, containing the duchies of Cleves and Juliers, the earldoms of la Mark, Bergh, Ravenſburg, and Ravenſtein. The chief competitors were, Wolfgang William, ſon to the duke of Newburg; John, duke of Deux Ponts; both of the Palatine family: John Sigiſmund, elector of Brandenburgh; Chriſtian II. elector of Saxony; and Charles of Auſtria, marquis of Burgaw. Whilſt theſe princes contended for the ſucceſſion, the emperor Rodolphus II. pretended it was to be committed to his truſt till the affair ſhould be decided: to that purpoſe he ſent his letters to Leopold of Auſtria, biſhop of Straſburg, who, entering the duchy of Juliers, at the head of an army, took the capital city, and placed a garriſon in it. This proceeding convinced the elector of Brandenburg and the duke of Newburg, that, whilſt they were contending about the ſucceſſion to the duke of Cleves, they both ran the riſk of loſing it; they therefore joined in a league, and, taking poſſeſſion of the deceaſed duke's dominions, implored the aid of France and Holland to ſupport them. Henry IV. who had now made great preparations againſt the houſe of Auſtria, promiſed to aſſiſt them in perſon, and at the ſame time ordered the troops he had in Holland to be ready to join him in the duchy of Cleves, and deſired the ſtates to ſend thither prince Maurice, with part of their own forces. But all the great deſigns of Henry were blaſted by his untimely death; for as he was preparing to follow his army, he was, after repeated warnings given him of his fate, ſtabbed in his coach by Ravaillac, a deſperate popiſh enthuſiaſt†. This villain, on his examination, boldly confeſſed he did it becauſe the king did not take arms againſt the Huguenots, and that his making war againſt the pope was the ſame as making war againſt God, "ſeeing the pope was God, and God was the pope." This diſcovery of the principles on which this regicide had been committed, was extremely diſagreeable to James; and as the Jeſuits were univerſally believed to be concerned in it, James, thinking it greatly behoved him to remove from his perſon men who held ſo deteſtable a doctrine, iſſued out a proclamation commanding all Jeſuits and prieſts to depart the kingdom, and all recuſants to keep themſelves at the diſtance of ten miles from the court: then he cauſed the juſtices of peace in all the counties to adminiſter the oath of allegiance which had paſſed in the third year of this reign, and which, without any regard to any particular religion, eſtabliſhed the independency of the crown againſt the court of Rome and all other powers.

The beſt informed hiſtorians have not proved that any prince or ſtate was privy to the deſign of the murderer, who took the whole upon himſelf; but it is certain that the zealots of the Roman catholic religion had ever looked upon Henry's converſion to it as a matter of policy and conveniency in him; and when he came to declare ſo highly as he did in favour of the proteſtant intereſt in Germany, they were confirmed in their ſuppoſitions that he ſtill remained in his heart an Huguenot. By a letter from Mr. Beecher, ſecretary to the Engliſh reſident at Paris, we learn that the aſſaſſin had, ſome time before the murder, reſided at Bruſſels, and this augmented the general opinion that the court of Spain was privy to Henry's death. James, however, did not believe it, or thought it adviſeable to diſſemble his real ſentiments, being willing to gain the friendſhip of an houſe ſo formidable to the proteſtants, and ſent ſir Charles Cornwallis his ambaſſador, to negociate a marriage between the prince of Wales and the king of Spain's eldeſt daughter.

The death of Henry, which happened on the third of May, deferred for a time, but did not prevent, the ſiege of Juliers, which was inveſted in the beginning of July by prince Chriſtian of Anhalt, general of the army of the claimants and confederate princes, aſſiſted by a body of Dutch troops under prince Maurice, four thouſand Engliſh under the command of ſir Edward Cecil, the earl of Saliſbury's nephew, eight thouſand French foot and two thouſand horſe commanded by the marſhal de la Chatre: Ruſhenburg, the governor, ſurrendered it on the thirteenth of September; and the caſtle of Braidebant being alſo taken, the two claimants gained poſſeſſion of the whole country.

About this time the proteſtant princes of Germany thought it neceſſary to enter into a more ſtrict union, and a project was drawn up for that purpoſe by the duke of Wirtemberg. As the death of the king of France had entirely altered their ſyſtem, they threw their eyes upon James as their chief protector, and ſent to him the duke of Wirtemberg's project, both for his approbation and to try how far he would eſpouſe their cauſe. Before this paper arrived in England, the queen-regent of France, Mary de Medicis, who had been ſo appointed during the minority of her ſon

† This infamous miſcreant had for ſome time followed the king in his excurſions, in queſt of an opportunity of perpetrating his horrid purpoſe. That very morning he intended to ſtab him at the Feuillans, where he went to hear maſs; but was hindered by the interpoſition of the duke de Vendôme. After dinner the king appeared extremely uneaſy, and, leaning his head upon his hand, was heard to ſay "My God! what is this that will not ſuffer me to be at quiet!" About four in the afternoon he went into his own coach, with the duke d'Epernon, the duke de Monbazon, the marquis de la Force, marquis de Mirebeau, meſſieurs de Lavardin, Roquelaur, and Liancourt, and ordered the coachman to drive to the croſs of Tiroy; from thence it proceeded to the church-yard of St. Innocent; then turning into the Rue de la Ferroniere, which was very narrow, there was a ſtop, occaſioned by two loaded carts: the king had ſent away his guards, and ordered the coach to be opened, that he might ſee the preparations for the queen's entry; all the pages had gone round another way, except two, one of whom went before to clear the way, while the other ſtepped behind to tie his garter: Ravaillac, who had followed the carriage, took this opportunity to perpetrate his ſhocking purpoſe; he mounted on the coach-wheel, and, with a long knife, ſharp on both ſides, ſtruck the king over the ſhoulder of the duke d'Epernon. Henry exclaimed, "I am wounded!" The aſſaſſin repeated the blow with greater violence, and the knife, penetrating the thorax, divided the vena cava, ſo that the king expired immediately. Ravaillac was not ſeen by any perſon while he perpetrated this atrocious murder; and if he had thrown down the knife under the coach, might have eſcaped unnoticed: but he ſtood on the wheel like a ſtatue, with the bloody knife in his hand. A gentleman coming up, would have put him to death immediately, but the duke d'Epernon called aloud, "Save him, on your life!" and the miſcreant was taken alive. Every body knows the nature of the torments to which this deſperate fanatic was ſubjected. See Smollett's Notes to Voltaire, vol. v. p. 113.

Lewis XIII. had intimated, by the French ambaſſador at London, the ſtate of her affairs, and that the intereſt of her ſon's crown did not permit her to engage farther in the German war than was abſolutely neceſſary, and therefore ſhe wiſhed that means might be found to prevent any farther hoſtilities. Though this declaration ſtartled James, yet, in anſwer to the duke of Wirtemburg's project, he offered to enter into a league with the princes for ſix years, and to lend them four thouſand men, or money to pay them, they promiſing to furniſh him two thouſand in caſe he was attacked. The court of France ſeems to have had no concern in this tranſaction, and found it their intereſt to court James to renew all his alliances with them: James, in conſequence of this requeſt, which was made by Boderie, the French ambaſſador, gave a commiſſion to the earls of Saliſbury, Northampton, Nottingham, and others, to treat with Boderie; and upon his paying to James ſixty thouſand pounds, a treaty was concluded ratifying all the former leagues, and ſtipulating particularly the quantity, the number, and the pay of the troops which each one was to ſend to the other's aſſiſtance. The lord Wotton was then appointed by James ambaſſador extraordinary to Paris, where he made a moſt magnificent entry, and received the queen's oath in confirmation of the late treaty.

But the magnificent embaſſies and ſplendid court of James demanded a farther ſupply of money than his revenues could furniſh, and it was neceſſary that he ſhould give leave for his parliament to meet on the ſixteenth of October, when the great affair of the annual ſtanding revenue was again brought upon the carpet, but neither party were able to finiſh the buſineſs on which they were ſo intent, and in which they were ſo deeply intereſted. The journals of that ſeſſion are loſt, ſo that we are at a loſs to know the reaſon of this miſcarriage: it only appears that James was highly diſpleaſed with the conduct of the parliament, and ſoon after diſſolved it by a proclamation, dated the laſt day of December, 1610. This was his firſt parliament, and it laſted almoſt ſeven years.

We cannot in juſtice to James omit to mention, that he this year exerted a laudable care for the navigation and trade of the kingdom. Several uſeful diſcoveries were by him encouraged, large ſtore-houſes were erected, and naval architecture brought, under the king's direction, to greater perfection than it had ever been known in England, or perhaps in Europe. His care for the Eaſt India company deſerves likewiſe the eternal gratitude of the Engliſh nation: this company, which had been incorporated by queen Elizabeth, had hitherto ſubſiſted under great diſadvantages, through the difficulty and length of their voyages, and the barbarous diſpoſition of the inhabitants of thoſe countries they had diſcovered; but the great profits of a fortunate voyage made it worth their trouble to apply to James for an enlargement of their charter, by which they propoſed to increaſe the trade, the ſhipping, the mariners, the ſtrength and wealth of the kingdom, and to deprive the Turks and Perſians of the Eaſt Indian commerce. James entered into all theſe conſiderations with an attention becoming the father of his people, and granted them a perpetual charter, enlarging their patent, and enabling them to be a body corporate and politic: he alſo prohibited the importation of pepper by foreigners and by all but the Eaſt India company, and ordered that no retailer ſhould ſell pepper at above two ſhillings and ſix pence the pound at moſt. But James did not think it ſufficient to advance the intereſt without adding to the dignity of trade; he graced the meetings of the company with his own preſence, and that of his family; he attended at the launching of the largeſt ſhip that had ever been known in England, of the burden of twelve hundred tons, built by the ſame company; and he made a preſent to ſir Thomas Smith, its governor, of a gold chain with his own picture, with many encomiums upon their laudable ſpirit, and exhortations to perſevere in it. This condeſcenſion, in which James ſucceſsfully imitated his illuſtrious predeceſſor, gave great encouragement to the company, and we find this year the great ſhip, with four others, ſent out under ſir Hugh Middleton, at the charge of one hundred thouſand two hundred pounds; beſides three other ſhips fitted out a few months after, at the expence of ſixty thouſand pounds more, under captain Sayres. The next ſpring, which was 1611, the ſame company fitted out four other ſhips, the largeſt of which was one thouſand tons burden, and ſent them under the command of captain Beſt, who eſtabliſhed a very advantageous Engliſh ſettlement on the coaſt of Surat, and obtained a patent for holding it from the mogul himſelf.

The king having freed himſelf from the encumbrance of the parliament, and being determined never to call another, the courtiers highly applauded his deſign, as an abſolute government was much more for their advantage than a government bounded by the laws, where the king depends in ſome meaſure upon the people: the whole court was overjoyed at the king's ſhaking off this troubleſome yoke, and nothing was now heard there, but mirth and diverſion. As the king, during his reign in Scotland, was hardly ever without a favourite, both the Engliſh and the Scots did all in their power to give him one in England, but hitherto all their endeavours had proved abortive: James's taſte was very different from that of moſt other princes; neither virtue, merit, nor eminent qualities had any charms for him; ſomething external and dazzling, as youth, gracefulneſs of perſon, elegance of dreſs, were the only things to captivate him. At laſt, however, the lord Hay introduced to him Robert Carr, a young Scottiſh gentleman, of an ancient family, who had formerly been a page of honour to him in Scotland; and now James's remembrance of him was renewed by his happening to break his leg by a fall from an unruly horſe, as he was preſenting his majeſty with his ſhield at a tournament. James conceived an unuſual pity at this accident; he viſited the unfortunate youth while he lay ill of his fracture; and ſo rapid was the progreſs of his paſſion, that, upon his recovery, he became the growing favourite at court. It is hard to ſay, whether thoſe who introduced him at the tournament did it by accident or deſign, but they could hardly have employed a more fit perſon than Carr was, for engaging the affection of James. His perſon was handſome, and his years not above twenty; he was extremely ambitious, but profoundly ignorant; his paſſions were ſtrong enough, though his diſſimulation was deep; and the reſt of his character was compounded of ill-applied capacity, exceſſive inſolence, inhuman ingratitude, and every ſpecies of wickedneſs. The firſt diſtinction that James beſtowed upon him was knighthood; honours and riches were then heaped upon him, and he quickly became the channel through which all favours paſſed between the king and his ſubjects. On the ninth of April, 1611, he was made viſcount Rocheſter, on the eighteenth of May following he was, with the duke of York and the earl of Arundel, inſtalled knight of the Garter; upon the death of the earl of Dunbar, he became the unrivalled favourite of James, to the no ſmall diſtaſte of the Engliſh nobility.

But we are now to behold all James's attention engroſſed by another favourite ſubject, of a very different nature, and the moſt abſurd and the moſt foreign to the character of a king that can be imagined; of which it is neceſſary to give ſome account, becauſe it gave riſe to ſome of the moſt conſiderable events in Europe. The famous preacher Arminius, at Amſterdam, had been choſen divinity-profeſſor at Leyden, and had been accuſed by the Calviniſts with teaching abſurd doctrines concerning free-will and predeſtination. Before his death, which happened in 1608, his party remained poſſeſſed of the field of diſputation, and his chair was filled by Vorſtius, who had publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes in defence of the Arminian principles; and as he differed from his Britannic majeſty in ſome abſtruſe points concerning the intimate eſſence and ſecret decrees of God, he was regarded as a dangerous rival in ſcholaſtic fame, and was, at laſt, compelled to yield to the legions of that royal doctor, whoſe ſyllogiſm he might have refuted or eluded. If James wanted vigour in other incidents of his reign, he behaved here even with arrogance and preſumption; and the ſtates were forced, after ſeveral remonſtrances, to deprive Vorſtius of his office, and to expel him from their dominions.

The king deſiſted from any farther perſecution againſt that profeſſor; though he very charitably hinted to the ſtates, "that, as to the burning of Vorſtius for his blaſphemies and atheiſm, he left it entirely to their own Chriſtian wiſdom; but never ſurely did heretic better deſerve the flames." The ſtates, however, had too much ſenſe and humanity to underſtand his majeſty's hint; and they even procured for the ejected profeſſor a chair in another univerſity. All this exertion in James, a prince of remarkable indolence, who had already treated tranſubſtantiation and the number of the ſacraments as ſcholaſtic queſtions of little conſequence to ſalvation, is not to be accounted for but from his vanity and ſelf-conceit: he thought himſelf the moſt able theologiſt in the world; and after he had ſignified his ſentiments on this diſpute, he could not brook the laſt oppoſition. Perhaps too he was influenced by motives of reſentment againſt penſionary Barnevelt, the patron of Vorſtius, whom he treated as a rank republican.

No tranſaction of this reign reflected ſo much honour on the ſovereign as did the ſettlement of Ireland, in which James had been ſeriouſly engaged ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown of England. He began with paſſing an act of oblivion, to quiet the minds of the people; he took them into his protection, and indulged them with the benefit of the Engliſh laws; and cauſed juſtice to be adminiſtered to them with the utmoſt impartiality: Wexford, Tyrone, Tyrconnel, the northern parts of Ulſter, half Connaught, and all Munſter, were divided into counties, ſupplied with ſheriffs and juſtices of the peace, and the judges made their circuits regularly twice every year. The lords chieftains made a ſurrender of their lands to the crown; and, before they were re-granted, all oppreſſive exactions were aboliſhed. The Iriſh duties, rents, and ſervices, were valued, and reduced to certain ſums of money, on payment of which the tenants poſſeſſed their lands in ſecurity, ſo that the moſt miſerable ſlavery was ſucceeded by wealth and independence. Tyrone, Tyrconnel, O'Dogharty, and other rebellious chieftains having forfeited their poſſeſſions, together with Ardmagh, Cavan, Derry, Donnegal, and Fermanagh, which had been eſcheated to the crown, were granted out in different portions to Engliſh, Scottiſh, and Iriſh adventurers, in order to be properly cultivated. Theſe undertakers obliged themſelves to make certain improvements; and, in a word, ſuch meaſures were taken, that Ulſter, the wildeſt part of Ireland, became one of the beſt cultivated countries in Europe.

During the great tranquility enjoyed by James, he cauſed the body of his mother, Mary late queen of Scots, to be removed, in the ſpring of 1612, to Henry VII's chapel at Weſtminſter, from Peterborough, where it was interred after her decapitation, and had lain ever ſince.

About the middle of the ſame year James had an opportunity to exhibit an agreeable ſpecimen of impartiality, in the execution of Robert Creighton, lord Sanquhar, a Scottiſh nobleman, who had baſely aſſaſſinated one Turner, his fencing-maſter. In vain did Abbot, then archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other gentlemen, intercede for him; the king obſerving how much the Engliſh were provoked at his attachment to his countrymen, prudently ſacrificed him to their reſentment.

Shortly after a very extraordinary embaſſy arrived in England. Sir Robert Shirley, an Engliſhman, who had ſerved the king of Perſia many years in his army, deſiring to ſee his native country, obtained of that monarch the character of ambaſſador, and a letter of credit to the king. His inſtructions were only to pay his compliments to the king, with the offer of a free trade to the Engliſh throughout the Perſian dominions. The ambaſſador had paſſed through the Hague, where he demanded audience of the ſtates, to propoſe to them a treaty with the king of Perſia; but becauſe he came from Spain, where he had made ſome ſtay, the ſtates ſuſpected he had ſome other deſign, demanded to ſee his inſtructions, and upon his ſcrupling to produce them, he was deſired to withdraw. As he had been alſo at other courts, it was believed he had put the king of Perſia in hopes of engaging all the Chriſtian princes in a war with the Turks, who were preparing to invade him. He had married a Perſian lady, who was delivered of a ſon in England, to whom the queen ſtood god-mother, and prince Henry god-father. After a year's ſtay in England, he returned to Perſia.

The great noiſe made by the arrival of this ambaſſador was, however, far exceeded by that of Frederic V. elector Palatine, who, in conſequence of a treaty of marriage which had been ſome time negociating between him and the princeſs Elizabeth, James's daughter, came over to England on the ſixteenth of October this year. He was received with the greateſt reſpect, and for ſome time nothing was ſeen at court but entertainments and diver-ſions on his account. But amidſt the univerſal joy which this marriage occaſioned, the prince of Wales was attacked with a diſtemper which at firſt was not thought dangerous: he was ſeized with it a few days before the elector's arrival, but believed it of ſo little conſequence, that he accompanied him every where for ſome time, and was not confined to his bed till the twenty-fifth of the ſame month. He died on the ſixth of November, being eighteen years eight months and ſeventeen days old, and was buried at Weſtminſter on the ſeventh of December following. His funeral charges amounted to ſixteen thouſand and ſixteen pounds.

Some authors would inſinuate that the king cauſed him to be poiſoned; but as there are no clear proofs of this, or, indeed, hardly the ſlighteſt preſumptions, it probably proceeded entirely from malice. Others are content with accuſing the viſcount Rocheſter of this crime, but without any manner of proof. However, as a proof of this nature was ſpread immediately after the prince's death, his head and body were ordered to be opened, in preſence of many phyſicians and ſurgeons, who gave their opinion, upon oath, that no ſigns of poiſon appeared: but what reflected moſt upon the king, was his commanding that no perſon ſhould appear at court in mourning; probably he was willing to remove from his ſight all melancholy objects that might renew his grief, or determined not to interrupt the preparations for his daughter's marriage; decency, however, obliged him, to defer the nuptials for a few weeks.

The great application which Saliſbury gave to buſineſs had ſuch an effect on his health, that, in the beginning of this year, he was ſeized with a diſorder that finiſhed his days on the fourteenth of May. His death proved a great misfortune to James, who in him loſt a very able miniſter, and one perfectly well acquainted with the affairs of ſtate and the genius of the Engliſh nation. He was a check to the reſt of the miniſters, and hindered them from running upon precipices, the danger whereof they were not ſo well acquainted with: he had alſo a wonderful talent of diverting the king himſelf from dangerous reſolutions; though it muſt be granted that he did not always ſucceed. According to Weldon, he was a man of great parts, very wiſe, full of honour and bounty, a great rewarder and lover of virtue and merit in others, if they did not aſpire at too great places.

The beginning of the year 613 was wholly ſpent in preparations for the princeſs's marriage, which was ſolemnized on the fourteenth of February, the elector having been, on the ſeventh, inſtalled knight of the Garter. Nothing was ſpared to render the entertainments on theſe occaſions as magnificent as poſſible: in order to this the king demanded an aid of money from his ſubjects, in conformity to a cuſtom anciently obſerved, when the king married his eldeſt daughter, though an hundred years had elapſed ſince this cuſtom had been uſed, there having been no occaſion ſince the reign of Henry VII. However, few or none dared to refuſe complying with the king's command: by this means twenty thouſand five hundred pounds were raiſed, and all expended in the marriage.

During the ſtay of the elector and his conſort in England, which was till April, there was nothing but entertainments, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions: the city of London entertained the new-married couple at a ſplendid feaſt, after which the lord-mayor and aldermen preſented the bride with a chain of oriental pearl, worthy the grandeur and riches of that metropolis: Stowe ſays it coſt upwards of two thouſand pounds.

Soon after the elector and his ſpouſe embarked at Margate, and in four days landed at Fluſhing. He behaved during his ſtay in England, ſo nobly and diſcreetly, in all reſpects, that he gained the general applauſe and love of all men, and gave away to the full value of one hundred and twenty thouſand French crowns. The king was not behind the Palatine in magnificence, and the total of the marriage, including the princeſs's portion, coſt him ninety-three thouſand two hundred and ſeventy-eight pounds. The nation, however, was ſo well pleaſed with the match, which promiſed the greateſt advantages to the proteſtant intereſt in Europe, that all impoſitions to defray this immenſe expence were chearfully bore by the public; and in the ſpring of this year the old earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral, attended the princeſs to Germany, with a gallant train of Engliſh nobility and gentry. At the departure of the elector and electreſs, the court was rendered more quiet, with regard to public rejoicings, which had continued ſeveral months without interruption; but at the ſame time a private ſcene was acting, the plots whereof began this year to open: I mean the annulling the marriage of the earl of Eſſex with his counteſs, that lady's ſecond marriage with Robert Carr, viſcount Rocheſter, the king's favourite, and the violent death of ſir Thomas Overbury. In order to ſet theſe incidents in a clear light, it will be requiſite to relate ſome things already paſſed, which we purpoſely deferred, that the thread of this extraordinary ſtory might not be interrupted.

The late earl of Eſſex, to whom Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, was a mortal enemy, and one of the chief inſtruments of his ruin, left a ſon, who, being but nine years old, gave Cecil little uneaſineſs, though the king, on his coming to England, had reſtored him to his paternal honours and eſtates. However, the ſharp-ſighted Cecil was apprehenſive that ſome time or other he might be called to an account for his proceedings againſt that nobleman; therefore, in order to preſerve the king's favour, he judged it neceſſary to unite cloſely with the Howard family, by marrying his own ſon, Edward Cecil, viſcount Cranburn, to the lady Catherine, third and youngeſt daughter to the earl of Suffolk; and as the young earl of Eſſex began to grow towards man's eſtate, he looked upon it as neceſſary for him to be reconciled to that young lord; with which view he completed a match between him and the lady Frances Howard, the earl of Suffolk's ſecond daughter: thus the three families of Cecil, Devereux, and Howard, were united in the ſtricteſt connexion. But as the earl of Eſſex and his bride, at the time of their marriage, were thought too young for cohabitation, the earl was ſent on his travels, and in the Low Countries he had an opportunity of completing himſelf in the art of war, in which he afterwards made ſo great a figure. Upon his return he found his counteſs the moſt finiſhed beauty of the age, as he himſelf, now about twenty years old, was one of the moſt promiſing young noblemen in Europe; but he was ignorant that the lord Rocheſter was his rival in the heart of his lovely bride. In effect the young favourite preſuming ſuming on his great power, had the impudence to ſolicit the lady to criminal love, and ſhe the weakneſs privately to yield to his addreſſes. The return of Eſſex in the preceding year interrupted the enjoyment of the two lovers; that nobleman, fired with the charms of his young conſort, claimed the privilege of a huſband with all the impatience of youthful ardour; but, to his inexpreſſible diſappointment and mortification, when he approached her he met with nothing but coldneſs and indifference, and a flat refuſal of any intimate freedoms. Provoked at this unaccountable behaviour, which he for ſome time exerted all his endeavours to alter, he at laſt abandoned the attempt, and, ſeparating from his wife, left her to follow her own will and inclination: to this, indeed, he was particularly induced by having diſcovered her intrigue with Rocheſter, which became every day, more and more notorious.

But the counteſs, not ſatisfied with being the miſtreſs of Rocheſter, eagerly wiſhed to become his wife; and being by this time loſt to all manner of ſhame, ſhe prevailed on her paramour to uſe his influence with the king to procure for her a divorce from Eſſex. Rocheſter imparted this ſcheme to ſir Thomas Overbury, who had for nine years been his moſt intimate friend and monitor. That faithful counſellor was alarmed at the propoſal, and employed every argument that the nature of circumſtances offered, to divert his friend from ſo fooliſh and baſe an attempt; and, in the warmth of his honeſt expoſtulations, went ſo far as to threaten Rocheſter that he would break off all correſpondence with him, if he could ſo forget his honour and intereſt as to proſecute the intended marriage with ſo abandoned a woman. Rocheſter had the weakneſs to impart this converſation to the counteſs, who inſtantly vowed vengeance on this bold arraigner of her honour and conduct; and the favourite was by this time ſo infatuated by her charms, that he joined with her in reſolving the ruin of Overbury. With this view he went to the king, and, after extolling Overbury's abilities, took occaſion to inſinuate that he was grown of late inſupportably inſolent, and therefore requeſted that he might be removed by ſome honourable employment, ſuch as being ſent ambaſſador to the court of France or Bruſſels, or, as others ſay, to that of Ruſſia. James, far from ſuſpecting the truth, inſtantly appointed Overbury to the embaſſy: this latter, on receiving notice of his appointment, conſulted with Rocheſter how he ſhould proceed, as he looked upon this as no better than a genteel baniſhment from the court, Rocheſter, under pretence of not being able to ſupport his abſence, perſuaded him to reject the proffered miſſion; and then poſting away to the king, repreſented this refuſal as ſuch an inſtance of inſolence and diſreſpect, that James, who could not brook the ſlighteſt contempt of his authority or power, gave an order for committing the unhappy Overbury priſoner to the Tower, the lieutenancy of which had been lately beſtowed on ſir Jervaiſe Elwis, one of the favourite's creatures.

The troubleſome counſellor being thus removed, and ſequeſtered from all intercourſe with his friends and acquaintance, the earl of Northampton, who had been brought over to favour the deſigns of his niece and Rocheſter, ſolicited the king in behalf of the counteſs, who demanded a divorce from her huſband, the pretence of which was his incapacity to fulfil the conjugal duties; and the earl, who was willing to embrace any decent opportunity of ſeparating from ſo profligate a woman, readily acknowleged, upon the trial, that, with regard to the counteſs, he was conſcious of ſuch an infirmity, though he was not ſenſible of it with regard to any other woman. A jury of matrons was impannelled to inſpect the counteſs, who reported her a virgin. In conſideration of her great modeſty, ſhe obtained premiſſion to appear before them with a veil, and it is ſaid a young woman of her own ſhape and ſtature was ſubſtituted, and underwent the examination in her place. The confeſſion of the huſband, and the report of the matrons, were deemed ſufficient reaſons to declare the marriage a nullity*.

After ſuch a trial, aſſiſted by court-influence, and ſupported by the ridiculous opinion of faſcination and witchcraft, the ſentence of divorce was awarded between the earl of Eſſex and his lady; and the king not only gave his favourite leave to marry the counteſs, but alſo created him earl of Somerſet, on the fourteenth of November this year, that her ſecond huſband might be of equal rank with the firſt. The nuptials were ſolemnized in the moſt oſtentatious manner, in the beginning of the following month, and nothing was now wanting to complete their triumph but the death of Overbury, without which that implacable woman could not be ſatisfied; and ſhe engaged her huſband, as well as her uncle the earl of Northampton, in the atrocious deſign of taking him off ſecretly by poiſon. Many attempts were made for this purpoſe, but the ſtrength of Overbury's conſtitution as often rendered them abortive, till at laſt nature gave way to the repeated attacks, and the unhappy gentleman died in the Tower by an envenomed clyſter. He was buried in the place of his confinement with the greateſt diſpatch and ſecrecy, under pretence that he died of ſuch a loathſome diſeaſe as rendered his corpſe unfit to be ſeen; and although it occaſioned a ſtrong ſuſpicion immediately in the public, the crime was not diſcovered till ſome years after. It is but doing juſtice to the memory of James to ſay, that he was impoſed upon by the artifices of Rocheſter and the Howard family in the whole of this black affair: he indeed had been a little too forward in the matter of the divorce between the earl of Eſſex and the counteſs; but it was no wonder if, when he ſaw himſelf ſupported by the opinions of his nobility, his clergy, and his lawyers, he too readily gave way to a ſentence which completed the happineſs of a favourite, whom he ſo entirely loved as he did Rocheſter; and that he was ſtruck with terror when he diſcovered that he had been unwittingly made the promoter of ſuch a ſcene of barbarity.

It was now four years ſince the king had called a parliament, and it was a great comfort to him to have no diſputes with the houſe of commons, ever ready to complain of grievances, and take occaſion to examine the conduct of the ſovereign or his mi-

* The archbiſhop of Canterbury was the only perſon of note who was diſſatisfied with the ſentence of divorce. Bilſon, biſhop of Wincheſter, having ſtrenuouſly ſupported its expediency, his ſon was knighted, by the intereſt of Rocheſter, and ever after diſtinguiſhed in deriſion by the name of ſir Nullity Bilſon.

niſters. He was much better ſatisfied with governing abſolutely, though this was attended with very great inconvenience: he was continually obliged to invent new methods to raiſe money, which, being founded on abſolute authority, produced murmurs and complaints amongſt the people; neither did theſe methods bring in ſufficient ſums for the king's occaſions, who loved magnificence, and was always fond of giving. Hence ſprung his wants, which inceſſantly increaſed, his revenues, as well ordinary as extraordinary, not being ſufficient to defray his expences.

The king being thus continually reduced to ſtraits, he had at laſt recourſe to a project formed by the late earl of Saliſbury, namely, to create knights baronets, a kind of middle nobility between barons and knights bachelors: their number was not to exceed two hundred, but the king at firſt made but ninety, of whom ſir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave in Suffolk, was the firſt. To purchaſe this honour, which was to be hereditary, every baronet was obliged to pay to the king a thouſand pounds; but, in order to give ſome colour to this new inſtitution, every baronet was obliged by his patent to maintain thirty foot-ſoldiers in Ireland for three years, at eight pence per diem each ſoldier; afterwards it was hinted to them, that if they would compound with the king, and pay the whole ſum at once, part ſhould be abated, and the king would maintain his troops in Ireland himſelf, and every one accepted this offer. There were alſo other methods made uſe of to fill the king's coffers, without being obliged to have recourſe to parliament; each rank of nobility had its price affixed to it; privy-ſeals were iſſued to the amount of two hundred thouſand pounds; benevolences were demanded, to the amount of fifty-two thouſand pounds; and ſome monopolies of no great value were eſtabliſhed.

Though the earl of Somerſet looked upon it as a great advantage to have diſpatched Overbury, yet he found himſelf much more embarraſſed in the management of affairs ſince he was no longer aſſiſted by that faithful counſellor. As his ſmall experience rendered every thing difficult, he grew completely odious at the court of England; and though the king's partiality continued, yet his inſolence and weakneſs gave his enemies ſuch advantage, that it ſoon appeared he muſt be removed. Somerſet's favour, however, with the king, appeared ſo great, that none durſt openly attack him; and, on the death of the earl of Northampton, which happened in the following year, Thomas Howard, earl of Suffolk, his brother, was made lord high-treaſurer, whilſt the favourite ſucceeded Suffolk as lord-chamberlain. Somerſet had been for ſome time labouring to bring about a match between Charles, now prince of Wales, and a daughter of France, and this negociation had been carried on with ſuch great ſecrecy, that ſcarcely a lord of the Engliſh court knew any thing of it before Edmonds, the Engliſh ambaſſador at Paris, brought the propoſal over to England in his pocket, ready to be ſigned. This gave infinite diſguſt to the lords of the council, and they made ſo violent an oppoſition to the match, that James ſaw he muſt either break with his favourite or his council: in proportion as the favourite's intereſt ſecretly or viſibly declined, the neceſſity of calling a parliament appeared the ſtronger, all the money raiſed by loans, benevolences, and the ſale of the new order of baronetage, being now ſpent*.

James, who heartily hated the nonconformiſts, readily liſtened to a propoſal for ſending them out of the kingdom, by tranſporting them to the waſtes of America, belonging to, but not cultivated by, the Engliſh: ſeveral ſhips were accordingly freighted, ſome by the government, and ſome by private perſons, for carrying over adventurers or planters; and great numbers at this time entered themſelves for Newfoundland and Virginia. But the clergy were not fond of thoſe colonies, and repreſented them to James as ſo many ſeminaries of puritaniſm, which would in time form not only a ſeparate church, but a ſeparate ſtate; James therefore, after ſeveral ſhips full had gone, ordered thoſe who were on board other ſhips to be ſtopped, and examined concerning their principles, and, upon their not giving ſatisfaction, they were reſtrained from going abroad: but James lived long enough to ſee the ill effects of this caution, and, when it was too late, would gladly have retrieved his error.

On the fifth of Auguſt, 1614, the new parliament met; the miniſtry had exerted their utmoſt efforts in order to procure a majority in the houſe of commons; but the meaſures of the court were ſo generally diſagreeable to the nation, that all their endeavours proved ineffectual, and, inſtead of granting a ſupply as deſired by the king, who made them ſeveral cajoling offers of grace, they reſumed the ſubject which had been canvaſſed in the laſt parliament, and declaimed againſt the regal uſurpation in levying new cuſtoms and impoſitions by the mere authority of prerogative. To prevent, if poſſible, the like practice for the future, they applied to the lords for a conference on this topic, in order to concert meaſures for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubject, and circumſcribing the exorbitant and unlimited power of the crown. James, informed of this circumſtance, immediately diſſolved the parliament (on the ſeventh of June), after a ſeſſion of about two months, wherein not one ſtatute was enacted; and he even carried his reſentment ſo far as to impriſon ſome of the members, who had been moſt forward in the oppoſition; a ſtep by which he expoſed himſelf ſtill farther to the hatred of the nation.

Soon after the diſſolution of the parliament, the king of Denmark came to England on a ſecond viſit to his ſiſter and brother-in-law; but having a mind to ſurprize them, he came privately and with a ſmall company, ſo that he appeared before the queen at Somerſet-houſe moſt unexpectedly. But James being then on a progreſs in Bedfordſhire, and hearing of his arrival, came preſently back; and, after he had entertained his royal gueſt with all the diverſions his court could afford, prince Charles, on the firſt of Auguſt, conducted him on board his ſhip, and he returned home.

* His frantic liberality went ſo far as to give ſir Henry Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, then a young man, diſtinguiſhed by no merits or ſervice, three thouſand pounds in ſpecie, which was carrying to the privy-purſe, for no other reaſon but becauſe Rich, as the money was paſſing by, was heard to ſay, ſuch a ſum would make him very happy. James was much delighted in reporting, or hearing that others reported, thoſe acts of his generoſity; but the nation thought he had no right to be laviſh at their expence.

The king of Denmark had not long departed, when an ambaſſador arrived from the czar of Muſcovy, to deſire the mediation of James in a quarrel between him and the king of Sweden.

This year is remarkable for the completion of two projects which proved of great advantage to the city of London: the one was performed by ſir Hugh Middleton, citizen and goldſmith of London, a native of Denbighſhire, who having the authority of parliament for his warrant, with infinite coſt and indefatigable labour brought water to the city from the two great ſprings of Chadwell and Amwell, in Hertfordſhire, having cut a channel from thence to a place near Iſlington, where he conveyed it to a large reſervoir (now called the New River Head), and from thence in wooden pipes to all parts of the city. The other project was about this time completed on the north ſide of London, called Moorfields, which being before environed with ſtinking ditches and unhealthy common-ſewers, was now not only entirely cleanſed from its collection of filth, but levelled and formed into gravel-walks, adorned with handſome rows of trees, that rendered it the moſt healthy and pleaſant place in the city. The next year alſo brought an addition of beauty and benefit to the capital, by the paving of Smithfield, which was before a miſerable dirty place, and the ſeparating the middle part of it by rails into a fair walking place, fit for a market, or any other uſe. This year alſo the lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinſwoman to the king, who had ſome time before, without the king's privity, ſecretly married William Seymour, the earl of Hertford's youngeſt ſon, for which they were both committed to the Tower, ended her life there, and was buried in the chapel royal of Weſtminſter.

Hitherto the earl of Somerſet had been in ſo full poſſeſſion of the king's heart, that the queen herſelf began to be alarmed, and conceived a violent hatred againſt him. Whether the king's fondneſs for him had been the occaſion of her averſion, or that ſhe ſuſpected him of having been concerned in the death of her ſon, prince Henry, ſhe reſolved, if poſſible, to effect his ruin: for this purpoſe ſhe intereſted in her reſentment ſir Ralph Winwood, who enjoyed the title of ſecretary of ſtate, though all the functions of that office were diſcharged by the expreſs direction of Somerſet: Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was alſo drawn in to join in the ſcheme for ruining the favourite: he was a well-meaning prelate, a moſt zealous enemy to popery, and had conceived an inſuperable diſguſt to Somerſet on account of the match which that miniſter had propoſed between the prince of Wales and a daughter of France. After many conſultations upon the means of effecting the downfal of this object of their averſion, it was concluded on all hands, that none carried ſo fair a proſpect of ſucceſs as to introduce to the king a new minion, which was George Villiers, a youth of one-and-twenty, younger brother of a good family, returned at this time from his travels, and diſtinguiſhed by the advantages of an handſome perſon, genteel air, and elegant dreſs; ſnares which they knew the weak heart of James could never reſiſt. Their ſcheme was crowned with the deſired ſucceſs; James beheld this gaudy object at a comedy which was acted at Cambridge, in the beginning of the year 1615, where he was placed full in the royal eye, and immediately engaged the attention, and in the ſame moment the affection, of the monarch. The junto perceived that James was touched; they followed their ſucceſs; even the queen and the grave primate themſelves condeſcended to recommend the young man to the king's farther notice, who, overjoyed to receive this ſanction to his wiſhes, no longer reſtrained his affections, but, calling Villiers to court, knighted him, and appointed him gentleman of the bed-chamber, into which office he was ſworn on the tenth of April, and had a yearly penſion of a thouſand pounds aſſigned him. Here he daily ſtole the hearts of the courtiers and petitioners from his rival, by his noble and generous way of promoting their ſuits, and James's fondneſs for him was carried even to a degree of folly; but ſtill he thought it requiſite to keep up ſome ſhew of complacency for Somerſet, his natural puſillanimity making him fearful of puſhing things to extremity with a favourite who was maſter of moſt of his private thoughts and actions.

Somerſet, however, now looked upon himſelf as irretrievably loſt in the affections of his royal maſter, and thought it prudent, upon pretexts that may be eaſily gueſſed, to ſolicit James for pardon. James conſented, and the drawing the pardon was left to the care of ſir Robert Cotton; who, copying after a pardon granted by Henry VIII. to Wolſey, drew it up with the following clauſe, "that the king, out of his mere motion and ſpecial favour, did pardon all and all manner of treaſons, miſpriſions of treaſon, murders, felonies, and outrages whatſoever, by the ſaid Robert, earl of Somerſet, committed or to be hereafter committed." This pardon, after being ſigned by the king, was carried to the great-ſeal, where it ſtuck; for the lord-chancellor Bacon, who was Somerſet's enemy, refuſed to paſs it, and informed the queen of the contents. Upon conſultation, the whole party againſt Somerſet concluded they muſt now make their laſt puſh; and the plot now thickened ſo much, that in every company dark, though confident, ſurmiſes were heard, that Overbury had been poiſoned, and by thoſe whoſe greatneſs ſet them above the ſtroke of juſtice.

Winwood, the ſecretary of ſtate, had come to the knowlege of Overbury's murder by the apothecary's boy, who had been employed in the affair of the poiſoned clyſter, and had fled to Fluſhing, where falling ſick, he diſcovered all he knew of the matter to ſome correſpondent of Winwood. This latter had for ſome time prudently concealed his intelligence, as a diſcovery, which, if unſeaſonably made, might have overwhelmed himſelf; but now he made no ſecret of what the boy had confeſſed: his diſcoveries were confirmed by ſome converſation he had with the counteſs of Shrewſbury, a prying intriguing lady, and then a priſoner in the Tower on account of the lady Arabella Stuart's marriage. This lady had rendered herſelf ſo intimate with ſir Jervaiſe Elwis, that ſhe drew from him part of the ſecret, which ſhe whiſpered ſo artfully about, that, before any durſt name Somerſet, Elwis was charged with being an accomplice in Overbury's murder. It was not long before this reached the ears of James; and the lieutenant being queſtioned on the fact, could not help being viſibly ſhocked; and acknowleged that he did indeed know of ſome attempts made againſt Overbury. James, upon this, ordered one of the privy-council to take, under the lieutenant's own hand, all he knew of the matter:

ter: which being brought to court, Weſton, who had given Overbury the poiſon in tarts and jellies, and at laſt in a clyſter, Mrs. Turner, who was the chief counſellor to the counteſs of Somerſet, Franklin the apothecary, who had prepared the poiſon, and ſir Jervaiſe Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower, were ordered to be apprehended: and ſoon after, with the king's privity, a warrant was made out for arreſting Somerſet and his counteſs; and they, with the other accomplices in Overbury's murder, were, upon the fulleſt evidence and moſt impartial trial, convicted of that dreadful act. Sir Jervaiſe Elwis, Weſton, Turner, and the reſt, ſuffered the puniſhment due to their crime; but the king granted a pardon to the principals, Somerſet and his counteſs; and, to mitigate the ſeverity of their fall, after ſome years impriſonment, he reſtored them to their liberty, and indulged them with a penſion, upon which they retired into the country, and languiſhed out old age in infamy and obſcurity; for their guilty loves were converted into moſt deadly hatred, and they lived ſeveral years in the ſame houſe, without any intercourſe or correſpondence with each other.

Having thus finiſhed this diſagreeable ſubject, which has carried the narrative twelve months too forward, I now reſume the thread of the hiſtory.

The marriage of the young king of France, Lewis XIII. with the princeſs Anne of Auſtria being ſolemnized in the year 1615, James ſent ambaſſadors to France and Spain, to congratulate the two kings. The lord Hay, a Scotch nobleman, was made choice of for the French embaſſy, and the lord Roſs for the Spaniſh: they had both orders to ſound the two courts with regard to the prince of Wales's marriage, either with the princeſs eldeſt ſiſter of Lewis XIII. or with the infanta Maria, daughter of Philip III. The lord Hay ſoon diſcovered that his negociation would be fruitleſs, becauſe the princeſs of France was already promiſed to the prince of Piedmont, ſon to the duke of Savoy.

During theſe tranſactions, and before the lord Roſs arrived in Spain, ſir John Digby, his majeſty's ambaſſador to Philip III. informed the king that the duke of Lerma had made an overture of marriage between the infanta Maria and the prince of Wales, deſiring private inſtructions on this head; accordingly he ſent orders to ſir John Digby to begin the negociations with Spain. At the ſame time count Gondemar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, received a commiſſion to treat with the king concerning the marriage.

King James had no ſooner taken this reſolution than his extreme deſire of accompliſhing it grew too ſtrong to be concealed; hence he gave occaſion to the Spaniard, who had then no deſign to treat ſeriouſly of this affair, to feign that he paſſionately wiſhed to conclude it to his ſatisfaction, in order to gain conſiderable advantages for the houſe of Auſtria and the catholic religion.

Whilſt the king was entirely taken up with this marriage, his miniſters were deviſing new methods to raiſe money; but all means ſeemed to be exhauſted, and a parliament could not ſafely be called, the wound of the impriſoned members being ſtill too freſh to hope it was yet healed. Mean while the above treaty of the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta procured an unexpected ſupply: queen Elizabeth had ſettled with the ſtates of the United Provinces the arrears they owed her, which amounted to eight millions of florins, which ſum became due to James as her ſucceſſor: the ſtates would long ſince have paid this debt, had they not found their account in remaining debtors to England, as they by this means engaged the kingdom to ſupport them. But having made a truce with the king of Spain, they no longer wanted the protection of the Engliſh, and being encouraged by the preſent neceſſitous condition of James's finances, they employed Carou, their miniſter at London, to offer a little more than a third of the ſum that was owing to England, and which amounted in the whole to eight hundred and eighteen thouſand four hundred and eight pounds, on condition that the king would reſtore the three important fortreſſes of Fluſhing, the Brille, and Rammekins, which had been delivered by the ſtates to Elizabeth, as pledges for the money ſhe had advanced them; at the ſame time Carou intimated, that the ſtates would do their utmoſt in time to diſcharge the whole debt: this intimation had the deſired effect; the king having no money, and there being a proſpect of drawing a much larger ſum from the ſtates, readily determined him to grant their requeſt, and the cautionary towns were accordingly delivered on the fourteenth of June. From this period we may date the full liberty of the Dutch commonwealth.

This money in a ſhort time was vaniſhed without the leaſt poſſibility of gueſſing what was become of it: none of the king's debts were paid, the navy was ſuffered to decay for want of money to repair it, and nothing had been ſent to the army in Ireland, which had not received a penny for ſeveral years, and whoſe wants were made uſe of as a pretence to treat with the ſtates.

At length it was diſcovered that the lord-treaſurer Suffolk had converted great part of the money received from the ſtates to his own uſe. As he was father-in-law to the earl of Somerſet, and conſequently no friend to the favourite, this opportunity was readily embraced; the lord-treaſurer was therefore accuſed in the Star-chamber of ſundry miſdemeanors in the execution of his office, and particularly with having ſecreted part of the money recovered from the ſtates: ſir Edward Coke, who was again reconciled to the king, was his accuſer; he aggravated his miſdemeanors, his extortions, his miſmanagement of the king's treaſure, his boldneſs in applying it to his own uſe, the corruptions of his counteſs, who took bribes with both hands, and the artifices of his deputy Bingley, to enſnare ſuch as had buſineſs with his maſter; after that, he urged many precedents of treaſurers who had been puniſhed for ſlighter crimes than thoſe of the earl of Suffolk, and ſhewed the dangerous conſequences reſulting from the ill adminiſtration of the treaſurerſhip when managed by corrupt perſons. Had the lord-treaſurer thrown himſelf upon the king's mercy, he would have been eaſily acquitted; but he endeavoured to juſtify himſelf, and not ſucceeding to the ſatisfaction of his judges, he was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and condemned to impriſonment during the king's pleaſure, and Bingley was fined two thouſand pounds.

After the fall of Somerſet the royal favour was wholly engroſſed by the youthful Villiers, who began the firſt exertion of his influence by filling all the places about court with his own creatures, ſo that the dependants of the old miniſter were diſmiſſed of courſe. It was in the beginning of Villiers's miniſtry niſtry that lord chief-juſtice Coke was diveſted of his office on pretence of ſome trivial miſdemeanors, though the real cauſe of his diſgrace was his oppoſing the king in beſtowing a vacant biſhopric in commendam. His place was filled by Montagu; and the lord-chancellor Elleſmere being ſeized with a dangerous illneſs, reſigned the ſeals into the hands of his majeſty, who kept them till the death of Elleſmere, and then they were given to Bacon, who was afterwards promoted to the dignity of chancellor. He was an able lawyer, an excellent philoſopher, but abject, irreſolute, and of an unguarded diſpoſition, which was practiſed upon to the prejudice of his character. In the courſe of this year the king's only ſurviving ſon, Charles, was created prince of Wales. On the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt Villiers was created baron of Whaddon and viſcount Villiers; and on the firſt of January following earl of Buckingham; he was afterwards raiſed to the title of marquis and duke of Buckingham, inſtalled knight of the Garter, appointed maſter of the horſe, chief-juſtice in eyre, warden of the Cinque Ports, ſteward of Weſtminſter, conſtable of Windſor, and lord high-admiral of England: his mother was created counteſs of Buckingham, his brother viſcount Purbeck, and a numerous train of his needy relations were brought into places of truſt and profit.

Though king James, upon the death of queen Elizabeth and his acceſſion to the crown of England, came to reſide here, yet he forgot not that Scotland was his native country; and therefore, having now ſpent ſome years among his Engliſh ſubjects, to acquaint himſelf with the ſtate of their conſtitution, in March this year, 1616, he made a journey into Scotland; for though he had left very able miniſters to ſit at the helm there in his abſence, yet, having formed a ſcheme of reducing the Scottiſh clergy to a conformity with the Engliſh church, he thought his preſence abſolutely neceſſary for that purpoſe. He had ſent the following articles to be inſerted in their canons: "I. That they ſhould receive the communion kneeling. II. That the ſacrament ſhould be adminiſtered in private to ſick perſons. III. That they ſhould keep the feſtivals of Chriſtmas, Eaſter, Aſcenſion, and Whitſuntide. And, IV. That children, at a certain age, ſhould be confirmed by the biſhop." He met with many difficulties, during a ſtay of ſix months in that country, to get the aſſembly of the Scottiſh kirk to comply with his views; but he at length prevailed upon them to receive his four articles, though this impoſition ſowed the ſeeds of thoſe troubles which afterwards brought ruin upon his ſon and ſucceſſor. Having carried his point, and made ſome regulation in the civil government of the kingdom, he returned to London on the fifteenth of September,

During his journey from Scotland to London, he was preſented with a petition by a great number of peaſants, tradeſmen, and ſervants, requeſting that they might, as uſual, be allowed to take their diverſions on Sundays, after divine ſervice. James being perſuaded thoſe were puritans who forbad ſuch diverſions, and that they were Jewiſhly inclined, becauſe they affected to call Sunday the Sabbath, reſolved to re-eſtabliſh the vulgar in the privilege which they had loſt: he therefore publiſhed a performance, intitled the Book of Sports, recommending all diverting exerciſes after ſermon; and ordered it to be read publicly in all churches; and ſuch miniſters as refuſed to obey this injunction were ſeverely puniſhed by the high-commiſſion court. Whatever his motives might have been for enforcing this practice, it was not a bad preſervative againſt the deſperate effects of gloomy fanaticiſm, which had already taken full poſſeſſion of one kingdom, and made conſiderable progreſs in the other.

The year 1617 was rendered remarkable for the laſt expedition of ſir Walter Raleigh, which produced great murmurs againſt the government, and ended in the death of that gallant ſeaman. We ſhall give an account of this remarkable tranſaction as we find it in Wilſon, a cotemporary writer. Sir Walter Raleigh had been a priſoner twelve years, ever ſince his condemnation, during which time he had employed himſelf in completing his Hiſtory of the World: at laſt he obtained his liberty, though without the king's pardon. As his eſtate was all forfeited, and given to the earl of Somerſet, he was very much embarraſſed when he came out of priſon; the court, where he was entirely unknown, was like a ſtrange country to him; for this reaſon he formed the project of ſeeking his fortune in diſtant climates. He had formerly traverſed the ſeas of America, and knew all the coaſts, eſpecially that of Guiana; nay, it is ſaid he ſet up marks to direct him again to a certain place, where was a gold mine, and that Keymis, his old attendant, brought him from thence a piece of ore, which made him think the mine very rich: however, as he knew not where to lay his head, he found means to inform the king that he knew of a very rich mine in America, from whence he hoped to bring immenſe quantities of gold, if his majeſty would be pleaſed to grant him a private commiſſion. The mine lying in a country belonging to the Spaniards, it could not be ſeized without breaking the peace with Spain; nevertheleſs, the king, tempted no doubt by the golden hopes inſpired by Raleigh, granted him a commiſſion, directed to "our beloved and faithful Walter Raleigh, knight," &c. It was ſaid afterwards, the king granted the commiſſion with this limitation, that he ſhould not injure the ſubjects of Spain: but how was it poſſible to bring away gold from a mine belonging to the Spaniards without doing them damage?

However, Raleigh, by virtue of his commiſſion, engaged ſeveral perſons in the project. He was ſupplied with money to fit out twelve ſail, and departed in Auguſt, 1617, in ſearch of the mine. At his arrival on the coaſt of Guiana he found not the marks he had left there, neither could he know again the place he thought he had ſo well obſerved. He detached however his ſon and captain Keymis, with five ſhips, to ſail up the river Oronoque as high as poſſible, in order to diſcover the mountain in which the ſuppoſed mine lay. The mountain not appearing, the Engliſh landed, and, putting the Spaniards to flight who oppoſed their deſcent, purſued them to the town of St. Thomas, which they took and plundered: ſir Walter Raleigh's ſon was killed in the aſſault. Then, leaving a garriſon in the place, they advanced farther into the country, without being able to find the ſo much deſired mine. At laſt, weary with ſearching, they returned to ſir Walter, who, finding himſelf diſappointed in his hopes, threatened Keymis with the king's indignation, and ſome days after Keymis was found dead in his cabbin. The ſailors, vexed at this ill ſucceſs loudly complained of their being drawn into a chimerical project, and compelled ſir Walter to ſail back for England: when they arrived at Kinſale, in Ireland, he would have perſuaded them to go with him to France; but, inſtead of liſtening to his propoſal, they carried him, againſt his will, to Plymouth, where he was arreſted by the king's orders, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

During his abſence, don Diego de Sarmento, count de Gondemar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, making great complaints about ſir Walter's commiſſion, which was become public; the king found no better way to appeaſe him than by diſowning it; or at leaſt by aſſuring him that Raleigh had expreſs orders not to act againſt the Spaniards. Raleigh returning without gold, his cauſe was ſo much the worſe; beſides, the ambaſſador openly inſiſted upon his being puniſhed, and told the king there was no other way to continue the treaty of the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta; wherefore the king reſolved at length to ſacrifice Raleigh to the Spaniards: but as he could not be tried upon his late expedition, for which he had a commiſſion in form, it was determined he ſhould loſe his head by virtue of the ſentence paſſed upon him fourteen years before. In vain did he plead his commiſſion, wherein the king ſtyled him "faithful ſervant," and gave him power of life and death over thoſe who were under his command, was equivalent to pardon: the judges told him, "that treaſon could not be pardoned but by expreſs words;" ſo that, without being called to an account about his late expedition, it was ordered that the former ſentence ſhould be executed. He was not, however, executed till the twenty-ninth of October in the following year, 1618.

The Engliſh nobility and the beſt Engliſh patriots beheld the fate of Raleigh with ſilent indignation. Moſt certain it is, he fell a ſacrifice to the mortal hatred conceived by the Spaniards againſt him in queen Elizabeth's time, and to the king's unhappy deſire to accompliſh the prince his ſon's marriage with the infanta of Spain. Weldon ſcruples not to declare, "that the Spaniſh faction and Spaniſh gold betrayed his life; as they had done the kingdom before; and it was one of Gondemar's greateſt maſter-pieces to purchaſe Raleigh's head; yet (adds this writer) had not the earl of Briſtol, who was poſſeſſed of Sherborn caſtle, formerly ſir Walter's, co-operated, the king would never have conſented *." All the powers of government were by this time concentrated in Buckingham, who, rather to keep James eaſy than to anſwer any ends of his own, conſented to Raleigh's death.

All this while the lord Digby was negociating the Spaniſh match; and Gondemar informing his court of the reſolution which had been taken in England for cutting off Raleigh's head, the negociation was carried on with greater application than ever: at laſt, after many formalities and ſcruples had been diſcuſſed by the Spaniſh council, certain articles were preſented to Digby, to be tranſmitted to James for his approbation. They were as follow †:

"That the pope's diſpenſation be firſt obtained, by the mere act of the king of Spain.

"That the children of this marriage be not conſtrained in matters of religion, nor their titles prejudiced in caſe they be catholics.

"That the infanta's family, being ſtrangers, may be catholics, and ſhall have a decent place appointed for all divine ſervice according to the uſe of the church of Rome; and the eccleſiaſtics and religious perſons may wear their proper habits.

"That the marriage ſhall be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the inſtructions of the council of Trent; and, after the infanta's arrival in England, ſuch a ſolemnization ſhall be uſed as may make the marriage valid according to the laws of this kingdom.

"That ſhe ſhall have a competent number of chaplains, and a confeſſor, being ſtrangers, one of whom ſhall have power to govern the family in religious matters."

Though theſe articles have been exclaimed againſt by ſome writers, yet, except that part which gives leave to the religious and eccleſiaſtics to wear their habits, they differ but little from the articles afterwards agreed upon by the ſame prince and the princeſs of France, which were approved of by parliament. The remarks of the king upon thoſe articles were as follow:

"Seeing this marriage is to be with a lady of a different religion from us, it becomes us to be tender, as on the one part to give them all the ſatisfaction convenient, ſo on the other to admit nothing that may blemiſh our conſcience, or detract from the religion here eſtabliſhed."

Hitherto the Spaniard, in prolonging the negociation, had in view only the ſucceſſion of Cleves, but this year the affairs of Germany and Bohemia began to give occaſion to fear a religious war would break out in thoſe countries: hence the Spaniards had freſh reaſons for amuſing king James, in order to prevent his determining in favour of the proteſtants, and ſending them a powerful aid. In order to underſtand the ſequel, it will be neceſſary to know the ſituation of affairs in Germany and Bohemia.

Notions of liberty never prevailed more ſtrongly in Europe than at this time; even Hungary, Bohemia, and Auſtria, were as jealous of their rights as the Engliſh themſelves. This ſpirit had reigned in Germany ever ſince the time of Charles V. The example of the United Provinces was continually preſent with thoſe people, who pretended to the ſame independence, and even thought themſelves more in a condition to command it than even the Hollanders. The emperor Matthias having this year, 1618, gotten his couſin Ferdinand of Auſtria elected nominal king of Hungary and Bohemia, and made the other archdukes yield him Auſtria, the people of Hungary, Bohemia, and Auſtria, joined in complaining that ſufficient regard had not been ſhewn to their privileges as ſtates: religion made a part of the grievances of the Bohemians, who ſoon became furious. The proteſtants wanted to rebuild the churches which had been thrown down by the catholics; the council of ſtate iſſued a declaration againſt the proteſtants, upon which theſe broke into the town-hall, and threw three of the emperor's officers out of the windows; Auſtria ſided with the Bohemians. Matthias dying in the midſt of theſe troubles, Ferdinand of Auſtria was choſen emperor in his ſtead: this new dignity, however, made no impreſſion upon the proteſtants of Bohemia, who were at that time very conſiderable; they looked upon themſelves as entitled to depoſe the king whom they had not elected, and actually made a tender of their crown to Frederick the elector Palatine, ſon-in-law to the king of England, who accepted of it, and was thereupon actually elected. James complained of this proceeding in the elector as diſloyal, imprudent, and diſhonourable: he could not digeſt the maxims of elective governments, and thought that Ferdinand, by a kind of preſcriptive right, had acquired a lawful title to Bohemia; he upbraided his ſon-in-law for putting him upon the dilemma of either deſerting him, or breaking his flattering negociation with Spain; and he complained of his double-dealing, in having ſent to him for his advice concerning his accepting the crown of Bohemia, and yet accepting it before his meſſenger could arrive in England. Notwithſtanding theſe reproaches, the popularity of Frederick's cauſe was ſo great in England, that James found himſelf under a kind of neceſſity of doing ſomewhat in his favour; nevertheleſs he for the preſent denied his ſon-in-law the title of king of Bohemia, and forbad him to be prayed for in the churches under that appellation.

Thoſe diſturbances abroad were attended with equal diſtractions in England: Buckingham continued ſtill the king's favourite and ſole miniſter, and the old earl of Nottingham was in a manner obliged to reſign to him the office of lord high-admiral. Buckingham's inſolence was as uncontrouled as his power, and an abject ſpirit was to him the beſt recommendation: hence aroſe that motley ſet of under-miniſters which diſgraced the remaining part of this reign. Of the two ſecretaries of ſtate, Naunton was a puritan, and Calvert a papiſt, but in all other matters had no other conteſt than who ſhould be moſt devoted to the will of the miniſter. Sir Richard Weſton was about the ſame time introduced to court, recommended by his fine perſonage and portly behaviour, which he taught to ſtoop to Buckingham; but in his heart he was a papiſt, and deſtitute of any great natural abilities. Sir Edward Conway, a rough ignorant ſoldier, buffooned himſelf into the good graces of James and his favourite. The lord Doncaſter ſtill kept his footing by his eaſy manners, his magnificent way of living, and his pliant counſels. But the moſt riſing man at this time about court was Dr. John Williams, afterwards lord-keeper of the great-ſeal and archbiſhop of York: this young man was of good parentage; with a grave demeanor he had a ſprightly converſation, great learning, and ſound knowlege; but it was for none of theſe qualities that Buckingham threw his eyes upon him: his fortune, which lay in Wales, had been but low, and he owed his education to the munificence of the lord Lumley, one of the greateſt ornaments and patrons of learning in his age; this dependency had given him pliable habits, and rendered him a fit tool for Buckingham. Such was the ſituation of James's court when his queen died, on the firſt of March, 1619, in the forty-ſixth year of her age. The character of this queen is variouſly drawn; ſome repreſent her as a vicious lewd woman, but this, upon a ſtrict inquiry, appears to be only calumny: Wilſon more juſtly affirms that ſhe was poſſeſſed of many virtues, and no ſmall ſhare of underſtanding. About the beginning of this year the earl of Northumberland, who had been confined in the Tower ever ſince the Gunpowder-plot, obtained his liberty by the interceſſion of the lord Hay, who had married one of his daughters, and had been lately created viſcount Hay. James was ſo affected with the death of his queen, that he was ſeized with a dangerous illneſs, which brought him almoſt to the brink of the grave. Happy would it have been for his reputation if he had indeed died at this time; for the reſt of his reign, which laſted ſix years longer, was not much to his honour.

The new emperor, Ferdinand II. who was endowed with greater abilities than is commonly poſſeſſed by the Auſtrian princes, prepared himſelf with great diligence for the recovery of his authority. Beſides the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects who adhered to the catholic religion, he attached to his ſide a powerful combination of the neighbouring potentates; all the catholic princes of the empire had declared in his favour; even Saxony, the moſt powerful of the proteſtants, and the kingdom of Poland, had eſpouſed his quarrel; and, above all, the Spaniſh monarch, conſidering his own intereſt as inſeparably connected with that of the younger branch of his family, ſent him powerful ſuccours from Italy and from the Low Countries, and alſo furniſhed large ſums of money for the ſupport of Ferdinand and of the catholic religion: Gondemar was alſo ordered to maintain the deluſion of the marriage with James, and that artful miniſter, by means of his inſinuating manners and a large ſum of money judiciouſly diſtributed, ſoon gained the aſcendancy over the king, the favourite, and the miniſters; ſo that, in effect, he governed the whole kingdom. James, who above all things dreaded the breaking off a match his affections were ſo warmly fixed upon, and, moreover, greatly affecting the title of the Pacific King, inſtead of taking any vigorous meaſures to ſupport his ſon-in-law, fell again to his ruinous negociations, and ſent the lord Doncaſter to mediate, in his name, a pacification in the empire; but Ferdinand would ſcarce favour him with an audience, and the embaſſy produced no effect.

It was now the year 1620, and affairs in Germany haſtened toward a criſis. Ferdinand having collected a mighty force under the command of the duke of Bavaria and the count de Bucquoy, marched againſt Frederick in Bohemia. In the Low Countries Spinola aſſembled a veteran army of thirty thouſand men: when Edmonds, the king's reſident at Bruſſels, demanded of the archduke Albert the meaning of thoſe preparations, he was told, that the orders for this armament had been ſent to Spinola from Madrid, and that he alone knew the purpoſe for which it was intended: in the mean while the emperor put the Palatine to the ban of the empire, and the execution of it was committed to the elector of Saxony, who entered Luſatia, which he ſubdued. The war now raged with great fury in the bowels of Germany; and now James, unable longer to reſiſt the ſolicitations of his ſubjects, who offered to open their purſes in ſupport of the elector Palatine's right to the crown of Bohemia, gave leave to ſir Edward Cecil to command a regiment for the preſervation of the Palatinate; but ſir Horace Vere coming over to England, and offering his ſervice, it was accepted, and Cecil was laid aſide. The regiment, which conſiſted of two thouſand two hundred men, was one of the fineſt that Europe had ever ſeen: it was compoſed moſtly of volunteers, with the brave earls of Oxford and Eſſex at their head; the company of the latter conſiſted of three hundred gentlemen, fifty of whom he paid out of his own pocket: and a kind of promiſe was extorted from James, that he would ſuffer two other regiments to be ſent after them. Theſe brave volunteers were tranſported to Holland, paſſed the Rhine below the Weſel, were eſcorted to Frankfort by a body of troops under prince Frederick Henry of Naſſau, and, on the firſt of October, joined the army of the Palatine and his allies, conducted by the margrave of Anſpach. Theſe gallant men, however, arrived only in time to be the melancholy witneſſes of the overthrow of that cauſe they eſpouſed; for the duke of Bavaria joining the count de Bucquoy, the Imperial general, in Bohemia, they advanced towards Prague, in the neighbourhood of which Frederick was poſted. On the eighteenth day of November a battle was fought, and the Palatine, being totally defeated, fled, with his wife and family, to Holland; the inhabitants of Prague opened their gates to the Imperialiſts, and the unfortunate Frederick ſaw himſelf abandoned by all his friends and allies, except count Mansfeldt, who ſtill preſerved his fidelity. Loud were now the complaints of the people againſt the king's timid and puſillanimous conduct, by which he had not only deprived the Palatine of all that aid and aſſiſtance which the Engliſh were both willing and able to afford him, but had alſo deterred other princes from eſpouſing his quarrel. It cannot be ſuppoſed that James did not really wiſh to preſerve the Palatinate to his ſon-in-law; but his weakneſs was cajoled in ſuch a manner by Gondemar, that he believed no expedient could be ſo effectual for that purpoſe as the match of his ſon with the infanta of Spain; and that this ſcheme would miſcarry, ſhould he attempt to take any vigorous ſteps in the elector's favour; beſides, his averſion to war was inſuperable. He never dreamed that his peaceable diſpoſition, the more highly it was praiſed, expoſed him only to the greater contempt and deriſion; he conſidered not that the Spaniſh match was itſelf attended with ſuch difficulties, that all his art of negociation could hardly be able to bring it to effect, much leſs that this match could be ſafely depended upon as the means of procuring the mighty advantages he expected from it.

James reſolved, however, to ſeem bent on vigorous meaſures, in hopes that he ſhould receive ample ſubſidies from the parliament, which met on the twenty-firſt of January, in the year 1621. The king, as uſual, made a long ſpeech to both houſes, explaining the duty of parliaments, expatiating on his own merit and neceſſities, and demanding ſupplies for the relief of the Palatinate, in defence of which he declared he would hazard his crown, and even the life of his own ſon, ſhould he miſcarry in his endeavours to procure a reaſonable pacification. The houſe of commons, taking into conſideration the urgency of the occaſion, and being extremely incenſed againſt the houſe of Auſtria, immediately granted two ſubſidies, with which the king was ſatisfied for the preſent. This affair being diſcuſſed, the commons received petitions againſt the increaſe of popiſh recuſants, monopolies, and projectors. The king had farmed to certain individuals the power of licenſing taverns and public houſes, and granted to ſir Giles Mompeſſon and Francis Michel, an excluſive patent for the ſale of gold and ſilver lace; by virtue of this privilege they had been guilty of ſuch ſcandalous fraud and oppreſſion, that, upon complaint to the upper houſe, they were committed to priſon, though Mompeſſon, who was Buckingham's creature, found means to eſcape: but he was degraded from the dignity of knight, and his eſtate confiſcated; the other was ſentenced to do public penance in the ſtreet, ſitting on horſeback with his face to the tail, to pay a fine of one thouſand pounds, and to be impriſoned for life.

James perceiving with what eagerneſs the two houſes proceeded againſt theſe delinquents, began to be afraid for his favourite Buckingham, who had been the author of theſe monopolies; he therefore went to the houſe of peers, and ſoothed the parliament with the moſt affectionate expreſſions, aſſuring them, upon the faith of a Chriſtian king, that if he had known of theſe grievances, he would have puniſhed the authors of his own accord; and cautioning them againſt giving ear to thoſe who ſhould accuſe the innocent inſtead of the guilty. They underſtood his meaning, and forebore to trace the enormity to its fountain. James afterwards underſtanding that the commons had impeached chancellor Bacon, baron Verulam and viſcount St. Alban's, he again harangued both houſes, repreſenting the neceſſity of puniſhing corrupt judges, and ſoliciting farther ſubſidies, as the former ſupplies granted by the commons were already expended for the ſubſiſtence of the Palatine and his family, who had taken refuge in Holland. He obſerved, that great ſums would be required to defray the expence of extraordinary ambaſſadors to all the courts of Europe, as well as for an army to march into the Palatinate, in caſe his negociations ſhould prove ineffectual; and laſtly, he proteſted before God, that he would not diſſolve the parliament, until the affairs which were then under conſideration ſhould be fully determined.

The celebrated Bacon, created lord Verulam and viſcount St. Alban's, was a man equally admired for the greatneſs of his genius, and beloved for his courteous and affable demeanour. His want of œconomy, and his indulgence to ſervants, had involved him in debt; and, in order to ſupply his neceſſities, he had been tempted to take bribes, and that in a very open manner, from ſuitors in Chancery.

It is affirmed, that, notwithſtanding this enormous abuſe, he had ſtill, in the ſeat of juſtice, maintained the integrity of a judge, and had given ſuch juſt and equitable decrees, that none of them afterwards were ever queſtioned or reverſed. Being, however, committed to the Tower, the chancellor, conſcious of guilt, implored the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confeſſion, to avoid the ſhame of a ſtricter enquiry. But the lords were inexorable, and inſiſted on a full acknowlegment of all his corruptions. He owned twenty eight articles; and was ſo very particular that he mentioned a dozen of gold buttons, which his ſervant had taken as a gift from a ſuitor. He was condemned to pay a fine of forty thouſand pounds, to be impriſoned in the Tower during the king's pleaſure, to be for ever incapable of any office, place, or employment; and never again to ſit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court. This dreadful ſentence he ſurvived five years; and being in a little time reſtored to liberty, his genius, yet unbroken by calamities, ſupported itſelf amidſt involved circumſtances and a depreſſed ſpirit, and ſhone out in literary productions, which, notwithſtanding all his failings, have made him be juſtly conſidered as the glory and ornament of his age and nation.

The commons ſtill proceeded in their laudable career, and carried their ſcrutiny into many grievances which, though of no great conſequence, could not be diſcuſſed without ſenſibly affecting the king and his miniſters. The king's prerogative ſeemed each moment to be attacked; his authority, in every article, diſputed; and James, who was willing to rectify the abuſes of his power, would by no means ſuffer his power itſelf to be either queſtioned or denied. After the houſe, therefore, had ſat near ſix months, without bringing any buſineſs of importance to a final concluſion, the king determined, under pretence of the advanced ſeaſon, to interrupt their proceedings, and ſent a meſſage to inform them, that, in a few days, he would adjourn them till next winter. The commons, eager to complete the ſalutary work of redreſſing all the public grievances, applied to the lords, and intreated them to join in a petition for delaying the adjournment; but the upper houſe refuſed their concurrence. While theſe matters were in agitation, the king's commiſſion for an adjournment came down to the houſe, and the ſpeaker, in obedience to it, pronounced the houſe to be adjourned to the fourteenth of November.

In this parliament it was that the parties of court and country, or, as they are uſually called, Tories and Whigs, were firſt regularly formed. All thoſe who favoured the hierarchy of the church, and the prerogative of the crown, adhered to the former; the puritans, to a man, engaged in the latter; and as the court, in order to diſcourage all parliamentary oppoſition, affixed the name of Puritans to its antagoniſts, the religious puritaniſts readily adopted this diſtinction, which was ſo advantageous to them, and which confounded their cauſe with the patriots, or country party.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, the king publiſhed a proclamation, declaring "that as ſeveral grand affairs, debated in parliament, could not in ſo ſhort a time be brought to perfection, the commons thought it convenient to continue the ſeſſions in courſe of adjournment: that as for the grievances, he would reform them of himſelf, and had ſooner done it, had he been informed of them; adding, that by his royal authority he had annulled and revoked the patent for gold and ſilver thread, and ſome others mentioned in the proclamation." A ſecond proclamation was alſo publiſhed at the ſame time, prohibiting perſons from ſpeaking of ſtate affairs.

Before we proceed any farther in our narrative of affairs of England, it will not be foreign to our purpoſe to relate briefly what paſſed in Bohemia and the Palatinate after the battle of Prague.

Count Tilly, the emperor's general, was making great progreſs in reducing the kingdom of Bohemia. Prague had ſurrendered to him at diſcretion, and the emperor proceeded in the way of juſtice, with vaſt ſeverity againſt the friends or abettors of the elector Palatine. In like manner count Bucquoy, the Imperial general, ſubdued all Moravia, and marched into Hungary againſt the party who had choſen Bethlem Gabor, prince of Tranſylvania, for their king. The unfortunate king of Bohemia had retired into Breſlau, in Sileſia; but Bohemia, Moravia, and Luſatia, being now in the enemies hands, he retired to the marquiſate of Brandenburgh: the brave count Mansfeldt, however, ſtill made a ſhift to keep his army together, and this ſummer James made a great merit with his people for having ſent his ſon-in-law ſix thouſand pounds. The Dutch about this time ſent the king of Bohemia one hundred and fifty thouſand florins, and he ordered Mansfeldt to abandon Bohemia, and march into the Upper Palatinate, into which Tilly had fallen with an army of twenty-five thouſand men. All that Mansfeldt could do, was to ſtop the progreſs of Tilly, who made a treaty with him, by which Mansfeldt was to withdraw his army from the Palatinate, and to receive two hundred thouſand florins: but this treaty was only made to amuſe Tilly, and the war ſtill went on, though Mansfeldt was obliged to march into the Lower Palatinate, where the progreſs of the Imperialiſts was oppoſed with great vigour and good conduct by Vere, Burroughs, and other officers, who ſtill headed the ſmall body of Engliſh in that country. But the truce between Spain and the States General being now almoſt expired, Spinola was obliged to lead back his army to the Netherlands; and the archduke, to give the emperor time to replace them in the Lower Palatinate, had agreed to the truce mentioned by James in his ſpeech to the parliament. Before the expiration of this truce, which was but for five weeks, the Spaniſh general, don Gonſales de Cordova, whom Spinola left to command in the Lower Palatinate, was at the head of ten thouſand men: this obliged Vere to retire, firſt towards Worms, and next to Frankendale, while Gonſales took Stein, Ladenburgh, and Keyſers-lautern; and in October he beſieged Vere in Frankendale: Mansfeldt, however, marched time enough into the Lower Palatinate to prevent the loſs of that important fortreſs for that time. But Tilly, as we have already mentioned, falling into the Lower Palatinate, obliged Mansfeldt to withdraw to Alſatia. Thus, at the end of the campaign, the king of Bohemia found himſelf ſtripped of all his towns in the Lower Palatinate, except Frankendale, Manheim, and Heidelberg, which were held by three Engliſh officers, Vere, Herbert, and Burroughs. Such was the unhappy ſtate of the king of Bohemia's affairs at this juncture; while the emperor, the archduke, and the king of Spain, availing themſelves of James's weakneſs, entered into an infamous confederacy for abuſing him, by ſhewing diſpoſitions for reſtoring the Palatinate; but in reality to keep James from declaring himſelf for the States, in caſe they ſhould renew the war with Spain. It would tire the reader, ſhould I inform him of every inſtance of mean juggling on one part, and groſs credulity on the other; it is ſufficient to ſay, that James, finding himſelf bewildered in the mazes of negociation, was at laſt obliged to give way to the meeting of his parliament.

Notwithſtanding that the king had, during the receſs of the parliament, revoked ſeveral of his oppreſſive patents, and remedied many other articles of grievance which had been mentioned by the commons, yet, when that houſe reaſſumed its ſeſſion, on the twentieth of November, they ſhewed that they were far from entertaining any favourable idea of the diſpoſitions of their ſovereign; and one of their first acts was to draw up a remonstrance, which they proposed to present to his majesty, wherein they represented, "that the power of the house of Austria threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progress of the catholic religion in England begat the most alarming apprehensions, lest it should once more gain an ascendant in the kingdom; that the king's lenity towards the professors of that religion had increased their arrogance and presumption; that the uncontrouled conquests made by the Austrian family, mightily raised the expectations of the English papists; and especially that the prospect of the Spanish match inspired them with the most sanguine hopes of procuring, if not the final establishment, at least the entire toleration, of their religion." Then they proceed humbly to offer to his majesty remedies against these growing evils, which are these: "that he would immediately undertake the defence of the Palatine, and support him by force of arms; that he would declare war against Spain, whose arms and riches were the chief bulwark of the catholic interest in Europe; that he would engage in no negociation for the marriage of his son but with a protestant princess; that the children of popish recusants should be taken from their parents, and committed to the care of protestant teachers and school-masters; and that the fines and confiscations to which the catholics were by law subject, should be exacted with the utmost rigour."

James was absent from London when this spirited petition or remonstrance was offered to him; and being highly irritated thereat, and vexed with the ill state of his affairs in which he had involved himself, in a fit of despair he resolved to menace his parliament and people.

He had imprisoned sir Edwin Sandys for being too free about affairs of state without doors; when the above petition was offered to him, he not only rejected it, but sent the following letter to the speaker of the house of commons.

"To our trusty and well-beloved sir Thomas Richardson, knight, speaker of the house of commons.

"Mr. Speaker,

"We have heard, by divers reports, to our great grief, that our distance from the house of parliament, caused by our indisposition, hath emboldened and fired the popular spirits of some of the house of commons to argue and debate publicly of matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high dishonour and breach of prerogative royal. These are therefore to command you to make known, in our name, to the house, that none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our government or deep matters of state; and namely, not to deal with our dearest son's match with the daughter of Spain; nor to touch the honour of that king, nor any other of our friends and confederates; and also not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in our ordinary courts of justice. And whereas we hear they have sent a message to sir Edwin Sandys, to know the reasons of his late restraint, you shall, in our name, resolve them, that it was not for any misdemeanors in parliament; but, to put them out of doubt of any question of that nature that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them, in our name, that we think ourselves free and able to punish any man's misdemeanors in parliament, as well during their sitting as after; which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there, that shall be ministered to us; and if they have already touched any of those points which we have forbidden, in any petition of theirs which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure that you shall tell them, except they reform it before it comes into our hands, we will not deign the hearing nor answering it.

"Dated at Newmarket, December 3, 1621."

This letter, however, was far from producing the effects intended by it; the commons knew their own strength too well to regard James's menaces. Instead of retracting what they had done, they entered with greater freedom than ever upon the national grievances, and the dangerous state of the reformed religion at home and abroad. It would swell this work too much, should I discuss the particulars of all the debates upon these important points; the result of the whole was, that the house resolved again to present their former petition, or rather remonstrance, and to back it with another.

This new paper was conceived in very respectful words, but it was no less bold then respectful: after having reminded him of the chearfulness with which they undertook to assist him in the defence of the Palatinate, they observed, "that their zeal for the protestant religion and the interest of his majesty's family, had induced them to represent the dangers with which both were threatened, and to point out remedies for those evils: that, by his letter to the speaker, he seemed bent upon depriving them of the parliamentary liberty to speak freely in the house, as well as of the jurisdiction which the house exercised over its own members; they therefore begged he would not violate a privilege which was their undoubted right, and which they inherited from their ancestors; a right which he himself had confirmed in his speeches to parliament, and without which it would be impossible to discuss and determine the affairs which might fall under their cognizance."

So resolute and determined a spirit shewn by the commons, roused every spark of kingly pride in the composition of James. His answer was short, peremptory, and suitable to the sentiments which he then breathed: after explaining his intentions in regard to the prerogative very clearly, without using ambiguous expressions, as he had hitherto done, he concluded his reply in regard to the rights and privileges of parliament as follows:

"And although we cannot allow the style calling it your undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished you had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for most of them grew from precedents, which rather shew toleration than inheritance); yet we are pleased to give our royal assurance, that, as long as you continue yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges as any of our ancestors were, nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative; so as your house shall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and the flowers of his crown. But of this we hope there will never be cauſe given."

This anſwer, which was dated at Newmarket, December 11, 1621, breathes all the ſpirit of deſpotiſm; and now the prerogatives of the crown and the privileges of the ſubject ſeemed to be drawn up againſt each other in formal array. The parliament reſolved to proceed in their career, and to grant no ſupply till they received ſatisfaction from James for the breach of their privileges, and they drew up a proteſtation, in which they inſiſted on their former claims for freedom of ſpeech, and an unbounded authority to interpoſe with their advice and counſel. And they affirmed, "that the liberties, franchiſes, privileges, and juriſdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the ſubjects of England."

James no ſooner underſtood what had been done, than he haſtened to town, and ſending for the journals of the houſe of commons, tore out with his own hand the proteſtation, which he declared null and void, on account of the manner in which it had been framed, and the matter it contained. In a few days after this effort of his prerogative, he diſſolved the parliament by proclamation, and then wreaked his vengeance upon thoſe members of the houſe of commons who had taken freedoms with his power and adminiſtration: Cook, Philips, Selden, Pym, and Mallory, were committed to priſon; Diggs, Crew, Rich, and ſir James Perrot, were exiled to Ireland, on pretence of executing ſome commiſſion in that country, and a pretext was found for confining the earls of Oxford and Southampton in the Tower.

James, ſtill peſtered with the itch of negociating, continued his fruitleſs attempts with regard to the recovery of the Palatinate. In the beginning of the year 1622, he diſpatched Digby as his ambaſſador to the emperor, deſiring a ceſſation of hoſtilities. That miniſter was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Auſtrian armies, and who told the Engliſh envoy very frankly, that there needed no treaty for that purpoſe, ſince hoſtilities were already ceaſed by his having got firm poſſeſſion of the Palatinate, which he intended to keep till a final accommodation ſhould be made between the contending parties. Notwithſtanding this groſs inſult, and that every circumſtance concurred to convince James that the emperor induſtriouſly eluded all his application, our weak monarch had the meanneſs to attend Ferdinand through all his ſhifts and evaſions, and renew the conferences at Bruſſels.

In the mean time the king of Bohemia, finding all his father-in-law's pacific endeavours prove ineffectual, laid hold of ſome favourable circumſtances, ariſing from the expiration of the truce between the Spaniards and the States General, and the jealouſies in Germany againſt the houſe of Auſtria, to make a final effort for recovering his dominions. Three armies were raiſed under three commanders, Chriſtian, duke of Brunſwick, the prince of Baden, and count Mansfeldt; but the ſame ill ſucceſs attended the unfortunate Frederick: the two former generals were defeated, one after the other, by count Tilly and the Imperialiſts; Mansfeldt, though generally inferior in numbers, ſtill continued the war, but with no equal ſupplies of money either from the Palatine or the king of England. Theſe misfortunes, joined to the perſuaſions of James, who was for the king of Bohemia's laying down his arms, quite diſheartened that prince, and he retired, at firſt, to Sedan, where he remained an unwelcome gueſt with his uncle the duke of Brunſwick: count Mansfeldt was diſmiſſed from the Palatine's ſervice; and that famous general retired, with his army, into the Low Countries, where he was received into the pay of the United Provinces. It has been juſtly obſerved, that vigorous acting bids faireſt to obtain good terms; and though the king of Bohemia was over-perſuaded by James to diſregard this maxim, yet his enemies ſtrictly obſerved it; for count Tilly, after the advantages he had gained over Mansfeldt, did not loſe a moment in harraſſing the Palatinate; and at laſt he beſieged and took Heidelberg, the richeſt town in it, and ſent to Rome (where it ſtill remains) its fine library. The caſtle of Heidelberg was bravely defended by Herbert, an Engliſh colonel, who was killed, after doing wonders in his own perſon. Tilly next blockaded and took Manheim, notwithſtanding all that ſir Horace Vere could do to defend it; and then beſieged Frankendale. All the concern that James took in thoſe misfortunes, was to redouble his pacific applications; and to make them go on ſmoother, he extended ſtill farther graces to the popiſh recuſants, as appears from the following copy of a writ, ſent by the lord-keeper to the judges.

"That the king having, upon deep reaſons of ſtate, and in expectation of the like indulgence from foreign princes to the profeſſors of our religion, reſolved to grant ſome grace to the impriſoned papiſts, had commanded him to paſs ſome writs under the broad-ſeal for that purpoſe: wherefore it is his majeſty's pleaſure, that they make no niceneſs or difficulty to extend this princely favour to all ſuch as they ſhall find priſoners in the jails of their circuits for any church-recuſancy that ſhall concern religion only, and not matters of ſtate."

The truth is, that James did not now much expect the reſtoration of the Palatinate from the emperor; his eyes were entirely fixed on Spain, and, if he could accompliſh his ſon's marriage with the infanta, he fondly imagined, that, after ſo cloſe an alliance, this other point might eaſily be ſettled: but, to put that matter out of diſpute, the emperor, whoſe power in Germany was now fully confirmed, aſſembled a diet at Ratiſbon in the following year, in which he declared, "that the elector Palatine having been guilty of high-treaſon, his eſtates, goods, and dignities, were fallen to the Imperial demeſnes; but that, being unwilling to diminiſh the number of the electors, he wills, commands, and orders Maximilian of Bavaria to be inveſted with the electorate Palatine." He beſtowed this inveſtiture from his throne, his vice-chancellor declaring aloud that the emperor conferred this dignity "in the plenitude of his power*."

The eyes of England were now ſullenly turned towards Spain, where Digby had the whole management of the negociation for the marriage.

This

This nobleman had been lately dignified with the title of earl of Briſtol, and diſpatched as James's ambaſſador to Philip IV. who had lately ſucceeded his father Philip III. on the Spaniſh throne. Briſtol was a miniſter of great abilities, and had formerly diſapproved of all alliance with Spain, but now appeared ſo convinced of the ſincerity of that court, that he wrote over to James, felicitating him on the entire accompliſhment of his views and projects: a daughter of Spain, whom he repreſents as extremely amiable, would ſoon, he ſaid, be conducted into England, and would bring with her an immenſe fortune of two millions†, a ſum four times greater than Spain had ever given with any other princeſs. The fact is, that the court of Spain had hitherto fed James with hopes of the marriage only to amuſe him; but, as they ſaw that the king of England was determined at any rate to conclude this alliance, they thought this fair opportunity of reſtoring the catholic religion in England was not to be miſſed, as it was very probable it might be effected by means of the infanta, and her numerous train of popiſh domeſtics and dependants, who were to be allowed the uninterrupted exerciſe of their religion here: accordingly the Spaniſh court ſuddenly altered its mind, and appeared as eager to conclude, as it had been dilatory and unwilling before; the only difficulty was, to extort from the Engliſh monarch ſuch terms as ſhould lead to what was intended, and which the impatience of James gave great reaſon to expect.

The articles concerning religion were the only obſtacles to the marriage. The earl of Briſtol had been diſputing the ground inch by inch ever ſince his arrival in Spain, and Philip IV. was not diſpleaſed with it, becauſe it gave him an opportunity of gaining time. In Auguſt, 1622, the Spaniard demanded certain articles in favour of the Engliſh catholics, to which the ambaſſador only anſwered, that he would acquaint the king his maſter therewith: at the ſame time the pope put his poſtils, or notes, to the articles that were agreed upon. Hence it is eaſy to conclude that the court of Rome and Spain acted in concert, both tending to the ſame end. The king received about the ſame time the pope's poſtils, and the court of Madrid's demands in favour of the Engliſh catholics: he kept theſe laſt, out of ceremony, ſome months without giving an anſwer; but at length, on the fifth of January 1623, he ſigned all, and, after making the prince do the ſame, ſent the articles to the earl of Briſtol, who received them the twenty-fifth of the ſame month. Such of our readers as may be deſirous of knowing what value James ſet upon the proteſtant religion, may ſee theſe articles at lengh in Ruſhworth's Collections. Among many other ſhameful conceſſions made to the catholics to the prejudice of our religion, none gave greater diſguſt than the article in which the king engaged that the children of the prince and the infanta ſhould be educated by their mother till they had attained the age of ten years: this condition could only be ſtipulated with a view of implanting in their minds prejudices in favour of the Romiſh faith; and though ſo tender an age might ſeem little ſuſceptible of any ſtrong impreſſions, yet the ſame motives which prompted the pope to inſert it, ſhould have induced the king to reject it. Beſides the public treaty, there were ſeveral private articles, to which the king and the prince of Wales both ſwore, and in which a promiſe was given to ſuſpend the execution of the penal laws againſt the catholics, to procure a total repeal of them from the parliament, and to tolerate the exerciſe of the popiſh religion in private houſes.

Every previous ſtep being therefore adjuſted, nought was wanting to the concluſion of the marriage but the pope's diſpenſation, which might be eſteemed as a mere formality. The king, elated by this ſucceſs, now triumphed in his pacific counſels, and conſoled himſelf for the contempt he had incurred throughout Europe for looking on with unconcern while his ſon-in-law was ſtripped of his eſtate and dignity, by boaſting of his ſuperior wiſdom and ſagacity; when all his flattering proſpects were ruined by the raſhneſs of a man, whom he had raiſed from a private ſtation to be the curſe of himſelf, of his family, and his people.

Buckingham was now as much in favour with the prince of Wales as he was with the king, and both father and ſon implicitly followed his counſels, and adopted his opinions; while that artful favourite made the moſt of their complacency to ſerve the purpoſes of his own unbounded ambition. He had long ſwelled with envy at ſeeing the earl of Briſtol have the ſole management of ſo great an affair, and ſo deſirable a one to the king his maſter, as that of the Spaniſh match, and was reſolved to exert all his influence to procure a ſhare of the honour of that negociation: with this view he perſuaded prince Charles to undertake a journey to the court of Madrid in perſon, to fetch home his miſtreſs, the infanta, repreſenting to him that the romantic nature of the adventure could not fail to captivate the admiration and affection of that monarch and his ſubjects, and introduce him to the princeſs under the character of a fond lover rather than of a ſtately huſband; that, in regard to the reſtitution of the Palatinate, the preſence of ſo illuſtrious an interceſſor would do more in three days, than ambaſſadors would do in as many years, as it was not to be doubted that the Spaniſh generoſity, moved by ſuch an inſtance of truſt and confidence, would be induced to make greater conceſſions than could be expected from political views and motives." In a word, he ſo artfully repreſented the project to the young prince, naturally of a warm and ſanguine complexion, and who had early taken a liking to romances, where heroes break forth with double luſtre out of diſtreſſes, dangers, and diſguiſes, that he looked upon this as an adventure worthy his blood, his courage, and his paſſion. He immediately agreed to ſolicit the permiſſion of his father, and, in concert with Buckingham, choſe the time when James was in the moſt kind and jovial humour, and, more by their importunities than the force of their reaſons, they extorted an haſty and unguarded conſent to their undertaking.

Many pages would be taken up, ſhould I attend the two adventurers from their mournful parting with James (who would fain have retracted his raſh permiſſion) to their unexpected arrival in Spain. I muſt therefore refer my readers to learn from other authors, the celerity of their diſpatch from England; their being happily unobſerved at Paris, where they had the indiſcretion to venture into a court-ball, where Charles ſaw the princeſs Henrietta, whom he afterwards married; their happy eſcape out of that country, where they had no reaſon to think themſelves in ſafety; and their arrival on the ſixth of March, 1623 (eleven days only from their leaving London), at Madrid, where they ſurprized every one by their unlooked-for preſence. From the like motive of conciſeneſs, I ſhall omit the particulars of the reception of the Engliſh prince at that court, which was ſuch as might be expected from a rich, generous, and powerful monarch, who had a full ſenſe of the confidence repoſed in him, and who was ſtudious to employ every expedient to ſhew the reſpect he had for his royal gueſt; and ſhall now haſten to the material part, the prince's conduct and negotiation there, both with regard to the marriage and the reſtitution of the Palatinate.

The imperious temper of Buckingham was on this occaſion of ſervice; for he bluntly broke through all the formal evaſions of the conde Olivarez, by demanding at once, "whether they intended to give the infanta to the prince, and upon what terms?" The Spaniſh miniſter finding himſelf beaten out of his guard, frankly told him, that it was expected in Spain, that the prince ſhould change his religion, and that it was generally ſuppoſed that he had come to Spain on that account. Buckingham cut off all hopes of this kind, and gave Olivarez a laſting hatred for his perſon by his impetuous manner of proceeding, and preſſing for a peremptory anſwer, without any regard to the tergiverſations and ſhufflings of the court of Rome or Madrid.

We find that Olivarez, and ſome other of the Spaniſh miniſtry, were for making the beſt of the prince, now they had him in their power; but the king, having more virtue, rejected this propoſal, though he was not againſt bringing the prince to as near a conformity in religion as poſſible. They were encouraged in this by a kind of correſpondence entered into between James, the prince, and Buckingham, on the one part, and the court of Rome on the other: in this correſpondence they go hand in hand with his holineſs (to uſe James's expreſſion) "uſque ad aras—to the very altar." But I will not venture to give, as genuine, thoſe letters from one to the other which have been publiſhed as ſuch by hiſtorians and collectors: certain it is, that both James and his ſon laboured to diſguiſe and dreſs up the deformities of popery; and that it had been reſolved by them, with the privacy of Buckingham, to make ſome farther conceſſions than had ever yet appeared in public. This appears from the many extracts from the letters between James, his ſon, and his favourite, publiſhed by Dr. Wellwood.

Mean while pope Gregory XV. who had granted the diſpenſation, died, and Urban VIII. ſucceeded in his place. Upon this event the papal nuncio at the court of Spain refuſed to deliver the diſpenſation until it ſhould be confirmed by Urban. This was made uſe of as an argument for farther delay. The affair of the Palatinate was another obſtacle which the Spaniards made uſe of for their own conveniency. The prince honeſtly made it an indiſpenſable condition of this marriage; but the Spaniards ſometimes pretended, that when the marriage was ſettled, that would follow of courſe; ſometimes, when they ſaw the prince inclined to be ſatisfied on that head, they preſſed to have it ſettled before the marriage; and ſometimes they offered him carte blanche, to make his own conditions.

The prince was greatly chagrined at this delay; he and Buckingham deſpaired of ſucceſs ſo much, that they were thinking of privately withdrawing from Spain, when they received intelligence, that the roads to the frontiers of France and the ſea-ports were beſet with troops, to intercept the prince in caſe he ſhould attempt to make his eſcape. Alarmed at this advice, Charles ſent a meſſage, by one Graham, to James, which Graham was to deliver if he ſhould hear the prince was arreſted, "that if his majeſty ſhould receive any advertiſement that he was detained by that ſtate as a priſoner, he would be pleaſed, for his ſake, never to think on him any longer as a ſon, but to reflect with all his royal thoughts upon the good of his ſiſter, and the ſafety of his own kingdoms." But the true deſign of the Spaniards was to keep the infanta in Spain till next year, in hopes of his converſion. However, it is upon all hands agreed, that the prince, by his prudence, affability, and modeſty, endeared himſelf ſo much to the court and people of Spain, that he was as popular as Buckingham (who had received a patent from James, creating him duke) was odious amongſt them; and this popularity wrought out his deliverance from them. Buckingham, ſenſible that he had incurred the hatred of the Spaniards, by his ſhameful and debauched pleaſures, his haughty, arrogant, and overbearing temper, which he either could not or would not diſguiſe, and which all of them were qualities that to the Spaniards were peculiarly hateful and diſguſting, and dreading the influence which that nation would naturally have after the arrival of the infanta, determined to employ all his credit to defeat the marriage: but by what arguments he could perſuade the prince to offer ſuch an inſult to the Spaniſh nation, from whom he had received ſuch generous treatment, and, above all, by what arts he could prevail with James to relinquiſh a project, which, during ſo many years, had been the object of his wiſhes, and which he had now ſo nearly brought to a ſucceſsful and happy iſſue; theſe are circumſtances which have never tranſpired to the public. However this might be, we find that all at once, whether alarmed with the report that the court of Spain intended to detain the prince, or whether wrought upon by the inſinuations of his favourite, James peremptorily wrote to Buckingham, charging him to bring home the prince immediately, and forthwith diſpatched veſſels to St. Andero, in Biſcay, to take them on board. The duke immediately communicated this order to Philip, alleging the prince's return was abſolutely neceſſary to quiet the fears and ſuſpicions of the Engliſh people; but in the mean time he would leave a proxy to eſpouſe the infanta, as ſoon as the confirmed diſpenſation ſhould arrive. The king of Spain made no objection to his return, but offered to be the prince's proxy. A procuration was for this purpoſe drawn up, and ſigned by the prince of Wales, who delivered it to the earl of Briſtol, with orders to put it into the hands of Philip ten days after receipt of the diſpenſation. The Spaniſh monarch accompanied his gueſt as far as the Eſcurial, where he was royally regaled, and erected a pillar on the ſpot where they parted, as a monument of their friendſhip. The prince, before he embarked, diſpatched one of his domeſtics with a letter to the earl of Briſtol, at Madrid, deſiring that he would not part with the procuration until he (Charles) ſhould be ſatisfied that the infanta, after the ceremony, ſhould not take the veil.

Upon this the prince and Buckingham embarked, and after eſcaping a dangerous ſtorm, arrived at Portſmouth on the fifth of October, and from thence he and the duke poſted immediately to James, who received them with infinite joy, which was diffuſed throughout the whole nation. The firſt deliberation in the cabinet at Royſton, where the court then reſided, was how to break off the match (for that was now fully reſolved upon) with a good grace. Luckily, the pope's approbation came from Spain, but ſomewhat altered, which gave James a better pretext for his proceedings than he could have expected; but he received a more material one from the Spaniards altering the ſum of the infanta's portion, which, from ſix hundred thouſand pounds in ready money, they now brought down to eighty thouſand, ſome jewels, and a penſion of twenty thouſand pounds a year. Briſtol would have ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, had it not been that the Spaniards neither could nor would undertake for the reſtitution of the Palatinate; and Buckingham, having the prince's concurrence, made his own uſe of this circumſtance, and drew a peremptory order from James to Briſtol for breaking off all negociations, juſt at the time when that miniſter had, to all appearance, accommodated all differences between the contracting parties, and the Spaniards were ready to deliver up the infanta. Philip perfectly well comprehended the meaning of theſe proceedings: he had been informed of the diſguſt conceived by Buckingham, and the animoſity ſubſiſting between him and Olivarez; and judging him a man capable of ſacrificing to his own ungovernable paſſions the greateſt intereſts of his king and country, he ſuſpected that the unbounded ambition of that favourite would be employed to foment a quarrel between the two nations. Reſolved, however, to throw the whole blame of the rupture on the Engliſh, he ſent to the earl of Briſtol a written promiſe, dated the eighth of January, 1624, by which he engaged to procure the reſtoration of the Palatinate, either by treaty, or by any other poſſible means; but when he found that this conceſſion was utterly diſregarded, he ordered the infanta to lay aſide the title of princeſs of Wales, which ſhe had borne ever ſince the arrival of the diſpenſation from Rome, and to drop the ſtudy of the Engliſh language, which ſhe had been learning for a conſiderable time; and thinking that ſuch precipitate counſels as now influenced the court of England, would not ſtop at the violation of the marriage-treaty, he ordered preparations for war to be made throughout all his dominions.

Thus terminated the affair of the Spaniſh match, after having employed all James's attention for upwards of ſix years. His reſolution to break it off at laſt was no ſooner known to the people, than they celebrated the rupture with bonfires and other demonſtrations of joy. The two houſes, then ſitting, petitioned the king to execute the laws againſt Jeſuits and Roman prieſts; to give order for ſeizing the arms of popiſh recuſants, and obliging them to retire from London; to revoke all licences granted to ſuch recuſants, and put a ſtop to the great concourſe of people who reſorted to maſs in the chapels of ambaſſadors; to deprive all papiſts of the poſts which they enjoyed; and not to relax the laws againſt popiſh recuſants on any account whatever. To this petition the king ſent a very complaiſant anſwer, aſſuring them in general that he would comply with their demands; but he artfully avoided explaining himſelf touching thoſe articles that mentioned the removal of the papiſts from London, and their being diveſted of all employments. Buckingham's mother and wife, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and many perſons poſſeſſed of very conſiderable offices, were either profeſſed or reputed Roman catholics: the commons preſented a liſt of fifty-ſeven to the king, but he would not ſignify his ſentiments on this ſubject, and they did not inſiſt upon ſatisfaction.

In the mean time the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg grew extremely uneaſy at the growing greatneſs of the houſe of Bavaria, and at the untractable haughtineſs of the emperor. They had proteſted againſt the tranſlation of the electoral dignity; and James, after renewing his round of negociation, brought matters to ſuch a criſis, that he wrote a letter to the king of Bohemia, wherein he urged him to lay down his arms, and ſubmit to an arbitration between him and the emperor; but Frederic would not hearken to ſuch advice, and James now ſeemed inclinable to have aſſiſted him powerfully, could he have been ſure of the Dutch or the French; but, amidſt theſe good diſpoſitions, difficulties intervened which blaſted all their efforts, for in February 1623, a cruel ſcene was acted at Amboyna, in the Eaſt Indies: a treaty was concluded in 1619 between England and the United Provinces, whereby, among other things, it was agreed, that in regard to the great trouble and coſt pretended to have been beſtowed by the Dutch in gaining the trade to the Molucca iſlands, Banda, and Amboyna, from the Spaniards and Portugueſe, the Dutch ſhould enjoy two thirds of that trade, and the Engliſh one third. In conſequence of this agreement Engliſh factories were erected at the Moluccas, at Banda, and at Amboyna: the latter is the principal place in the Eaſt-Indies where nutmegs, mace, cinnamon, cloves, and other ſpices grow. Here the Engliſh had been ſettled about two years; when the Dutch, in order to deprive them of their ſhare of the ſpice-trade, pretended a plot was formed between the Engliſh and the natives, to take poſſeſſion of the Dutch fort at Amboyna; whereupon the Engliſh were tortured by the Dutch, both with fire and water, in a moſt cruel and barbarous manner; and, on February the twenty-ſeventh, captain Gabriel Towerſon, and nine other Engliſhmen, with nine Japoneſe and one Portugueſe, were ignominiouſly executed for this pretended conſpiracy, though they proteſted their innocency to the laſt. For this inſolent affront no reparation was obtained till the year 1654, when Cromwell made the Dutch pay three hundred thouſand pounds upon that account.

Much has been blindly ſaid concerning a paper of accuſation put into James's hand by the marquis of Inviosa and don Carlos, the Spaniſh ambaſſadors; the truth is, James by this time was fully convinced that Buckingham had been the author of the failure of the marriage treaty; and though he diſſembled his reſentment, he now began to eſtrange himſelf from a man, who, through his ambition or vanity, was perpetually traverſing all his meaſures; he affected, in ſpeaking to the prince and duke, to uſe broken and myſterious expreſſions, which ſhewed that ſomething lay heavy on his mind: at laſt, the king going one day to Windſor, and taking coach at St. James's, ordered the duke, on ſome ſlight pretence, to ſtay behind; the duke looking upon this as a certain ſign of his approaching diſgrace, returned to his own houſe, overwhelmed with anxiety; but, by the advice of ſome of his friends, he ſoon followed the king to Windſor, where he found means to remove his majeſty's diſguſt, at leaſt to outward appearance; but in reality James only diſſembled his ſentiments through fear of the duke's reſentment; he impatiently longed for the arrival of Briſtol, and it was by the advice of that miniſter, whoſe fidelity he knew, and whoſe abilities he reſpected, that he hoped to extricate himſelf from thoſe difficulties in which he was at preſent involved. It was the intereſt of Buckingham to exert his utmoſt endeavours to keep Briſtol at a diſtance from the king and the prince, leſt the voice of truth, enforced with that oratory which the earl poſſeſſed in an eminent manner, ſhould diſcloſe ſcenes which it was his intereſt to wiſh buried beyond the reach of their knowlege. Accordingly, he no ſooner heard of the earl's arrival in England, than he made uſe of all that deſpotiſm he had acquired over the mind of his weak ſovereign to procure an order for committing Briſtol to the Tower, till he had anſwered certain queſtions which ſhould be put to him by the council. He was, however, ſoon after releaſed, but ordered to retire to his own houſe, and not approach the king and court. The earl wrote to James, loudly demanding an opportunity of vindicating himſelf, and of laying his whole conduct before his maſter on all occaſions; he aſſerted his own innocence, and caſt on Buckingham the blame of every miſcarriage. Hereupon the favourite thought it conſiſtent with his honour and intereſt to defend his tranſactions, and he preſented, to a committee of both houſes, a long narrative, which he affirmed to be full and complete, of every ſtep taken in the treaty with Philip: but, partly by concealing ſome facts, and partly by miſrepreſenting others, the narrative was calculated to deceive the parliament, and to load the court of Spain with the reproach of artifice and inſincerity.

He alleged, that, after a negociation of many years, the king ſtill found himſelf as far from his purpoſe as ever, and that Briſtol had never brought the matter beyond general promiſes and profeſſions: that the prince, ſuſpecting the intentions of Spain, determined, at laſt, to go to Madrid, and put the matter to a final trial: that he there met with ſuch artificial dealing, as convinced him that all the ſteps taken towards the marriage were falſe and deceitful: that the reſtoration of the Palatine, which had ever been conſidered by the king as an eſſential article, was never ſeriouſly intended by Spain: and that, after ſuffering much ill treatment, the prince was forced to return to England, without any hopes either of procuring the infanta, or of reinſtating the Palatine in the poſſeſſion of his dominions. This narrative, which, conſidering the importance of the ſubject, and the auguſt nature of that aſſembly to which it was preſented, deſerves great blame, was yet vouched for truth by the prince of Wales, who was preſent; and even the king himſelf ſeemed tacitly to approve it, by aſſuring the parliament that Buckingham had laid the matter before them by his expreſs order; and notwithſtanding that ſo many extraordinary circumſtances appeared therein, yet ſo agreeable was it to the bent and inclination of the parliament, that they received it without heſitation, and even joined in an addreſs to the king in favour of Buckingham, which concludes as follows: "And ſo, without your further trouble, we do humbly beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty to interpret fair of this our repreſentation, which we hold ourſelves bound to offer unto your majeſty for the clearing of ſo amiable a perſon, who, as we verily believe, hath in his negociation well deſerved of your majeſty and the commonwealth." Had Briſtol been heard in parliament, he would undoubtedly have given a new complexion to affairs; for many, out of hatred to Buckingham, would gladly have laid hold of the ſmalleſt opportunity to oppoſe him; and had James, ſituated as he then was, ſeen but the ſhadow of an oppoſition, he would have put himſelf at its head, in which caſe it would have quickly become a majority; but Buckingham ruled the cabinet, and dictated to the inclinations of a king who now feared, if he did not hate, him. He was the idol of a parliament to whom the name of a ſole miniſter was execrable. Though in his actions and converſation he had every mark of vice, yet he was the boſom favourite of a young prince who was the very pattern of modeſty and virtue.

The parliament being prorogued on the twenty-ninth of May, it was neceſſary to make ſome preparation to oppoſe the warlike armament fitting out by the court of Spain, and alſo to aſſiſt the elector Palatine. The aid granted the king was very conſiderable; three fifteenths and tenths from the laity, and four intire ſubſidies from the clergy. Of the laity's aid, eight citizens of London were appointed to be treaſurers, and ten other perſons of his majeſty's council for war; without whoſe warrant no money was to be iſſued out by the treaſurers, nor upon any other account but for the war, and both were to be accountable to the commons in parliament. With this money it was computed that the king might ſend twenty-five thouſand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an Engliſh general. However, only ſix thouſand men were ſent into Holland, to ſerve in the army of the States under the command of the prince of Orange, and other troops were levied by count Mansfeldt, who was, during the war, to open himſelf a paſſage into the Palatinate.

During theſe tranſactions, the earl of Holland, who had been diſpatched into France, having ſent word that Lewis XIII. was inclined to liſten to an overture of marriage between the prince of Wales and his ſiſter, the princeſs Henrietta Maria, the king appointed the earl of Carliſle to go and negociate the affair, jointly with the earl of Holland. The two ambaſſadors repairing to Compeigne, where the court of France was, commiſſioners were appointed to treat with them, of whom the marquis de la Vieuville, ſuperintendant of the finances, was the firſt. When theſe conferences began, the king, purſuant to his promiſe, was putting the laws in force againſt popiſh recuſants, particularly againſt friars and prieſts, ſome of whom were thrown into priſon; but James was now become apprehenſive leſt his ſon ſhould be altogether diſappointed of a bride; and therefore, as ſoon as the moſt Chriſtian king interpoſed his mediation in behalf of thoſe of his own faith, James gave orders for the releaſe of all the popiſh recuſants who had been impriſoned ſince the parliament's petition. In ſhort, ſuch was the earneſtneſs of the Engliſh monarch to terminate this affair, that by the tenth of November this year, the marriage articles were ſigned at Paris, and were in ſubſtance much the ſame as thoſe which had been concluded with Spain; for as Lewis only required, for the honour of his crown, the ſame conditions which had been granted to the catholic monarch, James made no ſcruple to comply. And as the prince, while in Spain, had given a verbal promiſe to leave the infanta the education of her children till the age of thirteen, this article was alſo inſerted in the treaty; and to that imprudent conceſſion is generally, and perhaps juſtly, aſcribed the preſent diſtreſſed condition of the Stuart family.

While this affair was depending, count Mansfeldt came over to England, where he was received with extraordinary careſſes, and lodged by the prince in his palace of St. James's. After ſome conferences, it was agreed that Mansfeldt ſhould have twelve thouſand men to carry the war into the Lower Palatinate. During the negociation with France, the miniſtry of that court had made mighty promiſes, though in general terms, not only of affording a free paſſage to the Engliſh troops, but alſo of reinforcing them with powerful ſuccours in their march towards the Palatinate; but, on the arrival of thoſe troops, under the command of count Mansfeldt, before Calais, they found that no orders had come for their admiſſion. This occaſioned many diſpatches backward and forwards; but the French inſiſted that they had given no poſitive orders under their hands, and that the granting the count a paſſage through France was a matter not to be haſtily reſolved upon: in fine, this debate laſted ſo long, that a peſtilental diſeaſe crept aboard the ſhips, and carried off great numbers of the Engliſh; and thoſe who remained, weakened by ſickneſs and diſcouraged by misfortunes, appeared too ſmall a body to lead into the Palatinate. Such was the ſhameful iſſue of this expedition, which reflected the higheſt diſgrace on the Engliſh miniſtry, who were ſo weak as to conſider Gallic profeſſions as ſolemn engagements: juſtice, however, obliges us to confeſs, that this was the only public diſaſter that befel England, during the quiet reign of the peaceful James.

We cannot conclude the hiſtory of this reign, which draws to its period, without taking ſome notice of the ſtate of affairs in Ireland, where the Spaniards kept a conſtant intelligence with the diſaffected papiſts, and put the Engliſh government under perpetual alarms. The earl of Tyrone having been received into favour by James, at the beginning of his reign, and aſſured of the royal protection, provided he did not relapſe into his former traitorous practices, returned to his own country; but conſtruing all the marks of liberality he had received as the effects of fear, he had the boldneſs, ſoon after, to petition the king for a toleration of the popiſh religion: his requeſt being refuſed, he, with the earl of Tyrconnel, and other heads of the Iriſh Roman catholics, began to intrigue anew againſt the Engliſh government, and a deſperate confederacy was formed amongſt the Iriſh of Ulſter, for murdering the lord-deputy (then ſir Anthony Chicheſter) and the council, and extirpating the Engliſh out of Ireland. This conſpiracy was diſcovered by a letter dropped in the council-chamber, and Tyrone, Tyrconnel, M^c^ Guire, and other chief conſpirators, fled to France; but the moſt Chriſtian king not giving them any great encouragement, the rebels retired, without going to Paris or ſeeing the French monarch, to Bruſſels. The archduke was not ſo reſerved; he gave them a noble reception, and ſettled upon them large penſions, by order of the court of Spain, who ſoon found its intereſt in furniſhing them with money to blow up another rebellion, which Tyrone, in the year 1613, actually undertook to effect; and his deſign appeared ſo practicable, that the marquis Spinola, one of the beſt officers of the age, offered to head an expedition: but the deſign was diſcovered, and Tyrone's correſpondents were taken and executed in the year 1615.

Sir Oliver St. John, afterwards viſcount of Grandiſon, was ſworn in lord-deputy of Ireland, in the year 1616, and acted with ſo much vigour againſt the papiſts, that he procured himſelf many enemies even at the court of England. Though he was a brave and active magiſtrate, and James knew him to be ſo, yet he made a handle of the complaints againſt him, to iſſue out the commiſſion we have already taken notice of, to ſome diſcontented members of the houſe of commons; viz. ſir Dudley Diggs, ſir Thomas Carew, ſir Nathaniel Rich, ſir James Perrot, and others, "to enquire of ſundry matters concerning his majeſty's ſervice in Ireland, as well in the point of government eccleſiaſtical and civil, as of revenue, and to inſpect the ſtate of the kingdom, propagate religion, ſettle the government, and improve the Exchequer." Before theſe commiſſioners arrived in Ireland, the differences between the lord-deputy and the privy-council there aroſe ſo high, that the latter demanded of James that he ſhould be removed. James obſtinately refuſed this for a long time; but at length the party againſt the lord-deputy prevailed, and lord viſcount Falkland was ſworn lord-deputy in his ſtead. In the mean time the commiſſioners were buſied in endeavouring to improve the revenue; but, although all of them were men of experience in the genius and manners of the Iriſh, all their attempts were rather plauſible than practicable. The papiſts, ſupported by Rome and Spain, ſtill continued to act with great inſolence, and in ſome churches exerciſed their own religion. This drew a ſevere proclamation from the government towards the end of this reign, ordering all the regulars to depart out of Ireland; and the famous Dr. Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh, was highly ſerviceable to the proteſtant intereſt, by his learned and vigorous ſermons againſt popery.

In the ſpring of the year 1625, James was ſeized with a tertian ague; but though ſuch agues are not held dangerous in that ſeaſon of the year, he was ſo reduced by repeated fits, that he died at Theobalds, his favourite reſidence, on the twenty-ſeventh of March, 1625, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after reigning over England twenty-two years and three days, and over Scotland almoſt from his cradle. Authors in general have been extremely extremely ſevere on Buckingham, as if he had haſtened the end of James by poiſon; but this reſts only on the credit of ill-informed ſpiteful writers: it cannot, indeed, be denied that improper applications were made to James during his laſt illneſs; and perhaps even the phyſicians themſelves miſtook his diſeaſe. What confirms this ſuſpicion is a note of biſhop Laud's, entered into his Diary, and which, I think, has never been obſerved by any hiſtorian of this reign, in which "he fears the king's diſeaſe, though to all appearance it was a tertian ague, was the gout, and that a wrong application of medicines had driven it from his feet to his inward vital parts." The counteſs of Buckingham, and ſome other ladies, who had no opinion of regular phyſicians, but thought that life might be rendered immortal by the ſecrets of mountebanks, attended James, who, being impatient for health, fell into the ſame fatal miſtake. Buckingham had been, ſome time before, ill of an ague, and had been cured by a vomit, a plaſter, and a poſſet-drink; which James inſiſted ſhould now be adminiſtered to himſelf: according to Buckingham's defence againſt the charge on this head brought againſt him by the commons, he did all he could to diſſuade the king from taking any thing that was not preſcribed by his phyſicians; but James obſtinately ſent for the plaſter and the drink, which were applied in Buckingham's abſence. If James (as ſome paſſionate authors pretend he did) entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion of Buckingham, he would not have failed to communicate it to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the lord-keeper Williams, who attended him on his death-bed, nor (as both of them hated Buckingham) would they have failed to have divulged it afterwards.

The character of James has been variouſly handled by different hiſtorians, moſt of whom appear to have wrote under the influence of favourable prepoſſeſſions or extreme prejudice: ſome repreſent him as the perfect pattern of a good king; others have loaded him with reproaches by aggravating his failings. The reaſon of this diverſity proceeds from the hiſtory of this reign being penned at a time when the animoſity of parties was at a great height; therefore the character of this prince muſt not be formed either on the praiſes of the one, or the invectives of the other, but upon the manner of his governing, upon his ſpeeches and actions; and this our readers will be perfectly able to do for themſelves, by recollecting the principal circumſtances of his reign: we ſhall therefore content ourſelves with obſerving in general, that he was endowed with many virtues, but no one of them pure or free from the contagion of the neighbouring vices. His liberality degenerated into profuſion, his learning into pedantry, his love of peace into puſillanimity, his wiſdom into cunning, and his friendſhip into light fancy and boyiſh fondneſs. He was certainly a great diſſembler; this failing accompanied him even in the moſt common tranſactions of life, and made him paſs for a worſe man than he really was; he frequently miſſed a favourite point by his duplicity, which he might have ſecured by openneſs and reſolution. His too great averſion to war, which has from ſome got him the reproach of want of courage, was certainly a defect productive of the moſt happy conſequences to the nation he governed; the people were bleſſed with a moſt profound peace, which no troubles interrupted; they were enriched by an extenſive commerce, which few taxes oppreſſed; and, freed from the care of foreign affairs, they had leiſure to attend to their own concerns, and ſecure their liberties by many excellent and wiſe regulations*.

James, by his wife, Anne of Denmark, had ſeven children:

1. Henry, already mentioned.
2. Robert, who died in his infancy.
3. Charles, who ſucceeded him on the throne.
4. Elizabeth, married to the elector Palatine.
5. Margaret,
6. Mary, and
7. Sophia, who all died infants.

He had no illegitimate iſſue; and what may appear ſurprizing, though he is ſaid to have been extremely fond of obſcene and immodeſt language, he never diſcovered the leaſt tendency towards a paſſion for any miſtreſs.

Remarkable Occurrences.

What chiefly diſtinguiſhes the reign of James, is the commencement of the Engliſh colonies in America, which have now increaſed to ſuch an amazing height of power and grandeur. Queen Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the continent of Virginia; and after her planting one feeble colony, which ſoon decayed, that country was entirely abandoned. In 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a ſettlement; which the company, eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe in London and Briſtol, took care to furniſh with yearly ſupplies of proviſions, utenſils, and new inhabitants. About 1609, Argal diſcovered a ſhorter and more direct paſſage to Virginia, than had hitherto been known, and left the tract of the ancient navigators, who had firſt directed their courſe ſouthward to the tropic, ſailed weſtward by means of the trade-winds, and then turned northward till they arrived at the Engliſh ſettlements. The ſame year, ſir Thomas Gates and ſir George Somers ſet ſail with a company of five hundred perſons for Virginia: Somers, being attacked by a ſtorm, was driven into Bermudas, and laid the foundation of a ſettlement in thoſe iſlainds.

Lord Delawar afterwards undertook the government of the Engliſh colonies: but notwithſtanding all his care, aſſiſted by ſupplies from James, and by money from the firſt lottery ever known in England, the ſettlement of theſe countries was attended with ſuch difficulties, that, in 1614, there were not alive above four hundred men of all that had been ſent thither. After ſupplying themſelves with proviſions more immediately neceſſary for the ſupport of life, the new planters began to cultivate tobacco; and James, notwithſtanding his averſion to that drug, gave them leave to import it into England; and forbad, by a public proclamation, all importation from Spain. By degrees more colonies were planted on that continent, and gave names to the places where they were eſtabliſhed, leaving that of Virginia to the province firſt ſettled. The iſland of Barbadoes was alſo planted in this reign.

In the fourth year of king James, A. D. 1607, there was ſo great an inundation from the river

Severn, in ſome parts of Somerſetſhire and Gloceſterſhire, that the water roſe above the tops of the houſes, inſomuch that there periſhed by this fatal accident no leſs than eighty perſons, and the damages done upon the whole amounted to upwards of twenty thouſand pounds.

In his ſixth year, 1609, a froſt began in December, which laſted till April following, with ſuch violence, that not only the Thames was ſo frozen that heavy carriages paſſed over it as on dry land, but many animals, eſpecially birds, periſhed; and almoſt all the garden herbage was deſtroyed.

CHARLES I. The ſecond King of ENGLAND of the Houſe of STUART. A.D. 1625.

THE death of James cauſed very little alteration in the Engliſh court, as that monarch had, before his deceaſe, been altogether under the guidance of the prince and Buckingham: their friends were in full poſſeſſion of the court and cabinet, and all the great officers of ſtate were continued. The council meeting immediately after notice given of the king's deceaſe, they cauſed Charles prince of Wales, his only ſon, then living, and now in the twenty-fifth year of his age, to be proclaimed king, to the univerſal ſatisfaction of the nation, as a prince of admirable endowments both of mind and body. The funeral obſequies of the deceaſed king were celebrated on the ſeventh of May, being carried from Somerſet-houſe (to which palace it had been conveyed from Theobalds) to Weſtminſter, where it was interred in St. Peter's church with great funeral pomp and ſolemnity: the young king himſelf performed the office of chief mourner, which, though it was contrary to the cuſtom of crowned heads, yet he choſe rather to relinquiſh ſome part of his ſtate, than be ſeen wanting in filial piety.

No ſooner were the funeral obſequies performed, than the king ſent to haſten the coming over of the princeſs Henrietta Maria of France, his deſtined conſort, to whom, on Sunday the firſt of May, he had, by his proxy the duke of Chevreuſe, been eſpouſed, in the church of Nôtre Dame, at Paris, the cardinal de Richelieu performing the nuptial ceremony. Soon after the queen began her journey towards England, being accompanied as far as Amiens by the queen her mother, the duke of Orleans her brother, and the duke and ducheſs of Chevreuſe, and a great train of French nobility, together with the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Carliſle, Holland, Montgomery, and many of the Engliſh gentry, who were ſent over for that purpoſe. From Amiens they proceeded to Boulogne, where a fleet of twenty-one Engliſh ſhips were waiting to take her on board, with the ducheſs of Buckingham and other Engliſh ladies of quality, to ſerve her as attendants. On Trinity Sunday, June 12, late at night, ſhe arrived at Dover; which being ſignified to the king, then at Canterbury, he went the next morning to meet her, and that evening the marriage was conſummated at Canterbury. The ſixteenth of the ſame month, the king and queen made their entry into London; but the plague then raging in the capital, abated conſiderably of the pomp and ſolemnity. But neither that, nor any thing elſe could divert the king's attention from the weighty concerns of the realm; for the great aſſembly of the nation meeting two days after his arrival in London, he went thither, and opened his firſt parliament with the following ſpeech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"You are not ignorant, that, at your earneſt intreaty, March 23, 1623, my father (of happy memory) firſt took up arms for the recovery of the Palatinate; for which purpoſe, by your aſſiſtance, he began to form a conſiderable army, and to prepare a goodly armada and navy royal: but death intervening between him and the atchievement, the war, with the crown, is devolved upon me; to the proſecution thereof as I am obliged both in nature and honour, ſo I queſtion not but the ſame neceſſity continuing, you will cheriſh the action with the like affection, and further it with a ready contribution. True it is, you furniſhed my father with affectionate ſupplies, but they held no ſymmetry or proportion with the charge of ſo great an enterprize: for thoſe your donatives are all diſburſed to a penny, and I am enforced to ſummons you hither to tell you, that neither can the army advance, nor the fleet ſet forth, without farther aid. Conſider, I pray you, that the eyes of all Europe are fixed upon me, to whom I ſhall appear ridiculous, as though I were unable to outgo muſter and oſtentation, if you now deſert me: conſider, it is my firſt attempt, wherein if I ſuſtain a foil, it will blemiſh all my future honour. If mine cannot, let your reputation move you to deliver and expedite me fairly out of this war, wherewith you have encumbered me (let it never be ſaid, whereinto you have betrayed me): I deſire, therefore, your ſpeedy ſupply. The ſun you know is entering into his declining point, ſo it will ſoon be too late to ſet forth, when it will be rather not too ſoon to return. Again, I muſt mind you of the mortality regnant in this city, which ſhould it (as ſo it may, and no breach of privilege neither) arreſt any one member of either houſe, it would ſoon put a period both to the conſultation and ſeſſion; ſo that your own preſervation neceſſitates an early reſolution; in ſum, three of the beſt rhetoricians, Honour, Opportunity, and Safety, are all of a plot, and plead, you ſee, for expedition. Perhaps it may be expected I ſhould ſay ſomething in way of account of my religion, as alſo of the temper and tenor of my future government; but as I hope I have not been guilty of any thing which may juſtly ſtart the leaſt queſtion in either, ſo I deſire you would repoſe in this aſſurance, that I will in neither vary from thoſe principles wherein I have been inſtituted at the feet of that eminent Gamaliel, my late father."

This ſpeech was very well received, and though it did not produce ſo great a ſupply as the exigency of affairs required, yet the commons gave two ſubſidies without any condition, and the clergy three; and in the grant of the laity, the papiſts were to pay double. The king very graciouſly accepted the gift, as an earneſt of the good affections of his people, in reference to greater ſums which he expected to follow; but the plague increaſing in London, the parliament, on the eleventh of October, was adjourned to Oxford, to be held there on the firſt of Auguſt.

King James, a little before his death, promiſed to ſend the king of France five or ſix ſhips, to be employed againſt the Genoeſe; but, afterwards, Lewis XIII. wanting theſe ſhips for the ſiege of Rochelle, prevailed with Charles I. by Buckingham's means, that he might employ them where he pleaſed; and, accordingly, they were ſent to Dieppe, under the command of vice-admiral Pennington. The commanders of theſe ſhips diſcovering that they were to go againſt Rochelle, weighed anchor, and ſailed back to England. Pennington informing the duke of Buckingham of it, received an expreſs order, confirmed by another from the king himſelf, to return to Dieppe with the ſhips, and put them into the hands of the French; which was done accordingly: but the mariners all deſerted, utterly refuſing to ſerve againſt Rochelle.

This affair made a great noiſe at Oxford, where the parliament was to be aſſembled. Buckingham's ill conduct in this, and other reſpects, was loudly complained of, and the commons put in a very ill humour. On the day appointed, the king ſent for the two houſes, to attend him in Chriſt-church hall; where, in a ſhort ſpeech, he acquainted them with his wants for fitting out the fleet, and other neceſſary matters; adding, that the eyes of all Chriſtendom were fixed upon his conduct.

The commons, upon their return from the king to their houſe, had ſeveral long debates upon the ſubſtance of his ſpeech, and the preſent condition of the kingdom, all tending to arraign the meaſures of government. The truth is, that Charles had, in his ſpeech, ſuffered thoſe arbitrary principles which he inherited from his father, and which at length wrought his own ruin, to eſcape from him too clearly for any one to miſtake them. While he meant to beg, he ſeemed to threaten; by declaring, as he did, that civil treatment would endear to him the uſe of parliaments, he might be ſuppoſed to inſinuate, that harſh treatment would eſtrange him from thoſe popular aſſemblies, and perhaps induce him to diſcontinue them intirely: a power, which, however deſirous he might be to uſurp, the commons were by no means willing to allow him; and their great ſecret was now to ſtraiten the king, as the only way to make themſelves of importance. On this occaſion, ſir Edward Coke took the lead: he obſerved, "that if the king's neceſſities aroſe through improvidence (which he proved to be the caſe in many inſtances), the parliament had no cauſe to give:" he then fell upon the management of the court, the frauds in the cuſtoms, the miſmanagement of the treaty with Spain, large fees annexed to the new invented offices, old uſeleſs offices continued, the multiplicity of offices in one man (meaning the duke of Buckingham), the vaſt increaſe of penſions, and the immoderate luxury of the courtiers. He enforced all theſe, and many more political abuſes with ſo great keenneſs, that they reſolved to appoint a committee to conſider of the preſent ſtate of the nation, and to invite the duke of Buckingham to it, to anſwer the objections againſt him. But it was very viſible, from the ſpirit the houſe ſhewed, that the duke was to expect little favour there; for though they contended for an immediate declaration againſt the king of Spain, for the neceſſity of recovering the Palatinate, and of reforming the king's council, yet they abſolutely refuſed to ſaddle the nation with any more ſubſidies, or to anticipate their grants of money. This drew a ſmart ſpeech from one Clark, a member, (perhaps the ſame who had been employed by Buckingham in Spain), as if the ſpeeches thrown out on that occaſion had too much invective bitterneſs in them, and were unſeaſonable for the time. Though thoſe are the only expreſſions charged in the Journal of the houſe upon Clark, yet, the friends to the freedom of ſpeech in the parliament would have expelled him the houſe, had it not been for ſome moderate members, who prevailed to have him only committed to the ſerjeant at arms for two nights, and acknowlege his error at the bar of the houſe upon his knees. In fine, before they would agree to any anſwer to what the king requeſted of them, they proceeded to the redreſs of grievances, and drew up a petition againſt popiſh recuſants, which was preſented to his majeſty by their ſpeaker, who returned the parliament a very gracious and ſatisfactory anſwer. Nevertheleſs, this condeſcenſion in the king did not at all win upon them; for, when the matter of a ſupply came again to be debated, the ſame oppoſition was made, and the majority inſiſted on a redreſs of grievances before granting a ſupply. The king, ſeeing what courſe the commons were taking, was extremely offended; firſt, as by their ſlowneſs they broke all his meaſures for the preſent campaign; ſecondly, he deemed it a manifeſt affront and contempt of his perſon, to preſume openly to attack his ſervants and miniſters, or rather himſelf under their name: ſo, perceiving no likelihood of a ſpeedy ſupply, which was the ſole end of calling the parliament, he was determined to diſſolve it, and thereupon went to the houſe for that purpoſe. The commons were reſolved into a grand committee, when the uſher of the black rod came to demand their preſence in the lords houſe; but having notice of his errand, before they would admit the ſpeaker to reſume the chair, to ſit as a houſe, Mr. Glanville, one of the members, ſtood up, and declared the ſenſe of the houſe in theſe words; "That thanks be given to his majeſty for his gracious anſwer to our petition for religion; next, for the care of our health, in giving us leave to depart at this dangerous time; laſtly, we make the moſt dutiful declaration of our affection and loyalty, and purpoſe to ſupply his majeſty in a parliamentary way in a fitting and convenient time." This being done, the uſher was called in, and delivered his meſſage; and the diſſolution of the parliament immediately enſued *.

* On the twelfth of Auguſt, not having ſat full three weeks to do buſineſs, both at Weſtminſter and Oxford.

Soon

Soon after this, a proclamation was iſſued for putting in execution the laws againſt popiſh recuſants; commanding the return, by a prefixed day, of children of noblemen, and others, ſent to be educated in popiſh ſchools, or ſeminaries, abroad; and all of the king's ſubjects under the pay of the emperor, the king of Spain, and the archduke, who then governed the Spaniſh Netherlands, were ſpeedily enjoined to return to their native country, to be employed in the king's ſervice; for the refractorineſs of the parliament did not hinder the king from purſuing his deſign of continuing, or rather of beginning, the war with Spain. For though the late king had taken ſome meaſures which tended to a war, there had not, however, been any hoſtilities committed ſince the breach of the treaty. Charles reſolving therefore to undertake this war, ſent the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Holland ambaſſadors to the United Provinces; where they met, at the Hague, the ambaſſadors of France and Denmark, and concluded a league with them and the States for reſtoring the liberties of Germany. In the mean time, to ſupply the want of parliamentary aids, Charles iſſued privy-ſeals for borrowing money from his ſubjects. The advantage derived from this expedient, was but a poor compenſation for the odium with which it was attended. By means, however, of that ſupply, the king was at laſt enabled to fit out his fleet.

It conſiſted of eighty good ſhips, with the addition of ſome Dutch veſſels; and ſhould have been ſent out early in the ſummer, to make an attempt upon the coaſt of Spain; but, through want of money, and other obſtacles, it was the beginning of October before it was ready to leave the ports. Sir Edward Cecil, lately promoted to the title of viſcount Wimbleton, was appointed commander: and had under him the earl of Eſſex as his vice-admiral.

After putting to ſea, they were overtaken by a ſtorm, which not only diſperſed them, but alſo the Engliſh ſhips which blocked up Dunkirk: the fleet, however, met at the rendezvous off Cape St. Vincent, where a council of war was held; for ſo undetermined was the whole expedition, that the officers were yet ignorant of their deſtination. The brave earl of Eſſex naturally gave his voice for attacking Cadiz, the ſcene of his father's glory; and his propoſal being carried by a majority of voices, they bore towards that port. But by this time all Spain was alarmed, and ſo dreadful to the Spaniards was the Engliſh valour under Elizabeth, that their king was ready in perſon to have marched down, at the head of a royal army, to the defence of his coaſt. When the Engliſh arrived at the place, they found every thing in readineſs to give them a warm reception; and the attack of Port Puntal was, with twenty Engliſh and five Dutch ſhips, committed to the earl of Eſſex, who was ſo eager upon it, that he was afterwards accuſed by lord Wimbleton of ſuffering the ſhipping which lay under its guns, and which drew out to fight him, to eſcape. Whatever ground there might be for this charge, it is certain that the ſhipping of the Spaniards, which conſiſted of ſeventeen ſtout ſhips and eight or ten gallies, finding that they were an unequal match for the whole of the Engliſh fleet, if it ſhould come up, retired to Port Real; and the earl of Eſſex, after ſpending a great deal of powder and ſhot, found it impracticable to take Puntal on that ſide. Upon this, ſir John Burroughs, an old Engliſh officer, landed with his regiment, and driving ſome companies of Spaniards, who had oppoſed his landing, back to the fort, the Spaniſh governor ſurrendered it. But the taking of this fort was of no other conſequence than as it opened a paſſage to Cadiz itſelf; and it commanding a large extent of villages and country round, the raw Engliſh troops could not reſiſt the deliciouſneſs of the Spaniſh wines, which proved a loſs to the expedition; for when a ſquadron, under the command of ſir Samuel Argale, was ſent to attack the ſhips that had retired to Port Real, the deſign miſcarried; whilſt diſſenſions amongſt the officers increaſing with diſeaſes amongſt the ſoldiers, the lord Wimbleton abandoned the fort they had taken, and reimbarked his troops, which were now greatly weakened by ſickneſs. The fleet then, in purſuance to inſtructions, cruiſed for ſome days off St. Vincent, for the Spaniſh plate-fleet, then on its return from America; and, after narrowly miſſing it, Wimbleton brought back nothing but infected crews, ſickly companies, a broken reputation, diſheartened officers, leaky ſhips, and national diſhonour, about the beginning of December.

Charles, having miſſed ſo rich a prize, was again obliged to have recourſe to parliament, though his authority was weakened by this miſcarriage of his enterprizes, and the imprudence of the Spaniſh war became every day more apparent: but though his growing neceſſities encreaſed his dependence, and made him leſs liable to withſtand the encroachment of the commons, he was determined to try once more that regular and conſtitutional method of ſupply; however, the ſolemnity of his coronation was firſt to be performed, which was celebrated on the ſecond of February, 1626. To ſave expence, and to prevent the danger of popular concourſe, as the plague, though greatly decreaſed, was not quite gone, the king omitted the riding in ſtate from the Tower to Whitehall. Sir Thomas Coventry an able lawyer, who had ſucceeded Williams as keeper of the great ſeal, officiated as ſuch on this occaſion.

Four days after the coronation, viz. on the ſixth of February, the parliament met, and was opened by a very miniſterial ſpeech from the new lord-keeper, greatly extolling the piety and wiſdom of the king, and acquainting the two houſes, that as his majeſty intended the ſeſſion ſhould be very ſhort, he expected they would make all imaginable diſpatch in granting ſupplies. But the commons, with their ſpeaker, ſir Heneage Finch, being returned to their houſe, inſtead of paying any regard to the lord-keeper's ſpeech, thanked his majeſty for his zeal for religion, and began, where they had left off at Oxford, with an enquiry into the national grievances, and the malverſations of government. In order that the grievances might be examined with more regularity and clearneſs, committees were appointed; one for ſecret affairs, one for grievances, and one for religion. The latter, of which Mr. Pym was chairman, called in queſtion certain books written by Mr. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, which they reported to the houſe to be erroneous, falſe, and full of papiſtical and Arminian opinions, contrary to the articles of the Engliſh church. The grievances, as reported by Mr. Whitby, chairman of that committee, were ſtated under four heads.

"I. The

" I. The ſtate of the king in the conſtant revenue of the crown.

" II. The condition of the ſubject in his freedom.

" III. The cauſe of the nation's good ſucceſs in former times.

" IV. The preſent condition of the kingdom."

Under the firſt head was conſidered the great diſpoſitions of lands and penſions, " mero motu," and other exorbitant expences. In the ſecond, the bringing in of new impoſitions, the multiplying monopolies, and the levying tonnage and poundage without an act of parliament. Under the third they aſcribed the great renown and reputation of the nation in former times, to the wiſdom and gravity of the counſellors, when nothing was ordered but by public debate; whence aroſe readineſs in the ſubject to aſſiſt their ſovereign in purſe and perſon. In the fourth was repreſented the loſs of the nation's wonted reputation, in the expedition to Cadiz, and others, which was imputed to the want of ſuch counſels as were heretofore uſed; foraſmuch as men, through difference in ſucceſs, were backward either to venture their perſons or their purſes.

From generals the houſe proceeded to particulars, and at laſt Buckingham was openly named as the ſource of all the national grievances and indignities. Nothing could ſhew the mutability of human affairs, and how little dependence is to be placed on the affections of the people, more than this conduct of the commons; for in the laſt parliament of king James, this very duke of Buckingham, againſt whom every voice was now open, was extolled as the great ornament and honour of the Engliſh nation, and the chief preſerver of the kingdom from the Spaniſh practices; and no honour was thought great enough to requite his merits. No ſooner, however, was the preſent diſpoſitions of that houſe divulged, than informations from all the officious buſy heads in the kingdom flocked in againſt Buckingham; and the commons proceeded with the greateſt warmth and acrimony in the enquiries againſt the duke, who had notice ſent him of what they were about. In the courſe of theſe debates, Dr. Turner, a phyſician, propoſed the following queries againſt Buckingham:

" I. Whether the duke, being admiral, be not the cauſe of the loſs of the king's royalty in the Narrow Seas?

" II. Whether the unreaſonable, exorbitant, and immenſe gifts of money and lands beſtowed upon the duke and his kindred, be not the cauſe of impairing the king's revenues, and impoveriſhing the crown?

" III. Whether the multiplicity of offices conferred upon the duke, and others depending upon him (whereof they were not capable), be not the cauſe of the evil government of this kingdom?

" IV. Whether recuſants in general, by a kind of connivance, be not borne out and increaſed by reaſon of the duke's mother and father-in-law being known papiſts?

" V. Whether the ſale of honours, offices, and places of judicature and eccleſiaſtical livings and promotions (a ſcandal and hurt to the kingdom), be not through the duke?

" VI. Whether the duke's ſtaying at home, being admiral and general in the fleet of the ſea and land-army, were not the cauſe of the bad ſucceſs and overthrow of that action; and whether he did give good direction for that deſign?"

In the mean while the ſpeaker received a letter from the king, in which he repreſented his neceſſities to the houſe, and demanded a ſupply; and at the ſame time promiſed to do every thing in his power to ſatisfy his faithful commons, and redreſs the grievances they complained of. To give the more ſtrength to this letter, ſir Edward Weſton, chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered to the houſe of commons a meſſage, in which he laid before them five articles of expence to be provided for. Upon the receipt of this letter and meſſage, the commons returned an anſwer full of reſpect, ſubmiſſion, expreſſions of zeal for his majeſty's ſervice, and even promiſes of aſſiſting him in his wants; however they artfully intimated to him, that redreſs of grievances ought to precede the ſupply they intended to grant him, and that this was the only condition on which he could expect any aſſiſtance. It was the misfortune of Charles to conſider this anſwer of the commons as the reſult, not of duty, but of fear; and he thought that a few additional big words in reply, would quiet all oppoſition; he therefore ſent the ſpeaker the following letter.

" Mr. Speaker,

" The anſwer of the commons, delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and ſatisfactory anſwer, and I thank them for it; and I hope you will, with all expedition, take a courſe for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good as well as mine: but for your clauſe therein for preſenting of grievances, I take that but for a parentheſis in your ſpeech, and not a condition; and yet, for an anſwer for that part, I will tell you I will be as willing to hear your grievances as my predeceſſors have been, ſo that you will apply yourſelves to redreſs grievances, and not to enquire after grievances: I muſt let you know, that I will not allow any of my ſervants to be queſtioned amongſt you, much leſs ſuch as are of eminent place, and near unto me. The old queſtion was, What ſhall be done to the man the king will honour? but now it hath been the labour of ſome, to ſeek what may be done againſt him whom the king thinks fit to honour. I ſee you eſpecially aim at the duke of Buckingham: I wonder what hath altered your affections towards him. I do well remember, that in the laſt parliament in my father's time, when he was an inſtrument to break the treaties, all of you (as yet I cannot ſay all, for I know ſome of you are changed, but yet the houſe of commons is always the ſame) did ſo much honour and reſpect him, that all the honour conferred upon him was too little; and what he hath done ſince to alter and change your minds, I cannot ſay; but can aſſure you he hath not meddled or done any thing concerning the public or commonwealth, but by ſpecial direction and appointment, and as my ſervant; and is ſo far from gaining or improving his eſtate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the ſame. I would you would haſten my ſupply, or elſe it will be worſe for yourſelves; for if any ill happen, I think I ſhall be the laſt that ſhall feel it."

And leſt this ſtyle, which was rather that of an eaſtern monarch than an Engliſh ſovereign, ſhould not be ſufficiently underſtood, he ſent to demand ſatisfaction of Mr. Cook for certain words he had ſpoken, and of Dr. Turner for the queries he had preſented. At the ſame time he prohibited them from touching his miniſter and ſervant, Buckingham, and commanded them to finiſh in a few days the ſubſidy-bill, otherwiſe they muſt expect to be immediately diſſolved. Theſe proceedings ſet the whole houſe in a flame; and though Buckingham, a few days afterwards, endeavoured to ſoften the rigour of theſe harſh commands by a plauſible and ſpecious oration, the impreſſion which they made was not ſo eaſily effaced, and produced a remonſtrance from the commons to this effect:

"That, with extreme joy and comfort, they acknowleged the favour of his majeſty's moſt gracious expreſſion of affection to his people and this preſent parliament: that, concerning Mr. Cook, it is true he let fall ſome few words that might admit an ill conſtruction, and that the houſe was diſpleaſed therewith, as they declared by a general check at the very time he ſpoke them; and though Mr. Cook's explanation of his mind more clearly, did ſomewhat abate the offence of the houſe, yet were they reſolved to take it into farther conſideration, and ſo have done; the effect whereof had appeared ere this, had it not been interrupted by this his majeſty's meſſage; and the like interruption in the buſineſs of Dr. Turner.

"As concerning the examination of the letters of his ſecretary of ſtate, as alſo of his majeſty's own, and ſearching the ſignet-office, and other records, they had done nothing therein not warranted by the precedents of former parliaments upon the like occaſions.

"That concerning the duke, they did humbly beſeech his majeſty to be informed, that it hath been the conſtant and undoubted uſage of parliaments, to queſtion and complain of any perſon, of what degree ſoever; and what they ſhould do in relation to him, they little doubted but it would redound to the honour of the crown and ſafety of the kingdom.

"Laſtly, as to the matter of ſupply, that if a petition may be made of other things, importing his ſervice, then in conſultations amongſt them, they were reſolved ſo to ſupply him, as might evidence the truth of their intentions, and make them ſafe at home and formidable abroad."

To this the king anſwered briefly, that he would have them conſult about matters of the greateſt importance in the firſt place, and that they ſhould have time enough for other matters afterwards: but this ſtopped not the proceedings againſt the duke of Buckingham, to which the earl of Briſtol alſo contributed not a little in the houſe of lords.

As long as James lived, Briſtol, ſecure of the ſecret favour of that monarch, behaved with great duty and ſubmiſſion; in hopes that an opportunity would ſome time occur of regaining his former credit and authority; nor did he entirely deſpair, even after the acceſſion of Charles. In obedience to the king's order he continued at his country-ſeat, and refrained from attending in parliament. Many attempts he made to recover the good opinion of his maſter; but finding them all ineffectual, and perceiving Charles to be entirely ruled by Buckingham, his inveterate enemy, he determined no longer to keep any meaſure with the court. When the parliament was ſummoned, Charles, by a ſtretch of prerogative, had ordered, that no writ, as uſual, ſhould be ſent to Briſtol. That nobleman preſented a petition to the lords; and entreated their good offices with the king for obtaining what was his due as a peer of the realm. His writ was accordingly ſent him; but accompanied with a letter from the lord-keeper Coventry, forbidding him, in the king's name, to attend in parliament. This letter Briſtol tranſmitted to the lords; and begged their advice with regard to his conduct in ſo delicate a matter. The king's prohibition was ſuperſeded, and Briſtol took his ſeat in the houſe. Enraged at theſe repeated inſtances of courage, which the court called contumacy, Charles cauſed his attorney-general to prefer an impeachment of high-treaſon againſt Briſtol. In return Briſtol accuſed Buckingham of high-treaſon. The earl's defence of himſelf and accuſation of the duke are both extant; and, together with ſome original letters, which are likewiſe preſerved, exhibit the cleareſt and moſt diſtinct views of all the negociations with Spain. From the whole it appears, that the duke had been guilty of many acts of folly and preſumption; but it would be difficult to collect thence any action which in the eye of the law could be held a crime; much leſs could convict him of high-treaſon.

The impeachment of the commons was ſtill leſs dangerous to the duke, if it be examined by the ſtandard of law and equity. The houſe, after having voted, upon the queries of Dr. Turner, "that common fame was a ſufficient ground of accuſation by the commons," proceeded to draw up a ſet of articles againſt Buckingham.

They accuſed him "of having engroſſed many offices in his perſon; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the ſeas, inſomuch that many merchant ſhips had been taken by the enemy; of furniſhing ſhips to the French king, in order to ſerve againſt the Huguenots; of being concerned in the ſale of honours and offices; of procuring extenſive grants from the crown; of obtaining many titles of honour for his kindred; and of giving phyſic to the late king without the knowlege of his phyſicians." All theſe articles appear, from a careful compariſon of the charge and reply, to be either frivolous or falſe, or both.

The only article of importance was, "that he had compelled the Eaſt India company to pay him the ſum of ten thouſand pounds; that he had confiſcated ſome goods belonging to French merchants, on pretence of their being the property of Spaniſh ſubjects." The trial was never brought to full concluſion; ſo that it is difficult for us to form any diſtinct opinion with regard to theſe articles: but it muſt be acknowleged, that the duke's anſwer, in theſe particulars, as in all the reſt, is abundantly clear and ſatisfactory.

In the mean while Charles having ordered ſir Dudley Diggs, who had introduced the impeachment againſt Buckingham, and ſir John Elliot, who had wound it up with great violence and vehemence, to be committed to priſon; the commons immediately declared that they would deſiſt from all farther buſineſs, till ſatisfaction ſhould be given them for this violation of their privileges. Charles alleged in excuſe, that thoſe members, in their accuſations of the duke, had dropped ſome ſeditious expreſſions touching majeſty itſelf: upon enquiry it appeared, that no ſuch expreſſions had been uſed; the members were diſcharged, and the king inſtead of gaining any advantage by this attempt, only exhibited a freſh inſtance of his arbitrary diſpoſition, and expoſed himſelf ſtill more to the reſentment of the commons.

The ill temper of the lower houſe ſeems to have infected the peers, though not to ſo great a degree. The Stuart family imitated their great predeceſſor Elizabeth in ſome of her weakneſſes, and Charles, upon a ſuſpicion that the earl of Arundel had conſented to a marriage between lord Maltravers and the ſiſter of the duke of Lenox, had ordered him, without expreſſing his offence in the commitment, to the Tower. The lords looking upon this as a breach of their privileges, began to conſider the caſe, when Charles, according to his wonted but fatal policy, made the affair perſonal to himſelf, by ordering the lord-keeper to inform the houſe, "that the earl of Arundel was reſtrained for a miſdemeanor which was perſonal to his majeſty, and lay in the proper knowlege of his majeſty, and had no relation to matters of parliament. Notwithſtanding this meſſage, the houſe continued to ſearch for precedents, and the ſame meſſage was renewed from the king by the lord-treaſurer. The houſe ſtill proceeded in their enquiry, and found themſelves deprived of five proxies by the impriſonment of the earl of Arundel, and that there was but one precedent of a peer being committed, the parliament ſitting, without trial or judgment of the peers in parliament. After ſome reſearches, the houſe preſented a petition and remonſtrance to his majeſty, ſetting forth, "that it was their undoubted right, that no peer, ſitting in parliament, is to be impriſoned without orders from the houſe of peers, unleſs it be for treaſon, felony, or refuſing to give ſecurity for the peace." Many debates paſſed in the houſe of lords upon this petition, and upon ſundry meſſages from the king about this privilege, which laſted from the fourteenth of March till the eighth of June: at length they voted to proceed upon no buſineſs, and even refuſed to hear the duke of Buckingham's defence (whoſe impeachment was then depending), until they were righted as to their privileges in that matter. This unuſual firmneſs of the peers, which they ſeemed to have copied from the commons, at laſt produced the deliverance of the earl of Arundel. This was the ſecond inſtance in which the ſpirit of the two houſes had triumphed over the authority of the king; and it is hard to ſay, whether the unſeaſonable obſtinacy or compliances of Charles did him moſt hurt.

The commons made another attack this ſeſſion, which, had it ſucceeded, would have given a ſevere blow to the royal prerogative: they were forming a remonſtrance againſt the practice of levying tonnage and poundage without conſent of parliament. This article, together with the new duties laid on merchandize, compoſed near one half of the crown-revenue; and by ſtripping the king of theſe reſources, they would have reduced him to a total dependence on his ſubjects. Charles being informed of theſe vigorous proceedings, immediately determined to diſſolve the parliament. When this reſolution was known, the peers, who had all along behaved with great loyalty and ſubmiſſion to his majeſty, endeavoured to employ their good offices between him and the commons, and prepared a moſt excellent petition, intreating the king to allow the parliament to ſit ſome time longer; but Charles had ſuch a diſlike to this parliament, that he would not admit the lords into his preſence to preſent their petition; and, on the fifteenth of June, cauſed the parliament to be diſſolved by a commiſſion under the great-ſeal. Shortly after, the king publiſhed a declaration concerning the reaſons for the diſſolution of this and the former parliament: and a few days after, he commanded all perſons who had any copies of the commons remonſtrances, to burn the ſame, on pain of his higheſt diſpleaſure. The ſecond proclamation contained very expreſs commands not to preach or diſpute upon the controverted points of Arminianiſm, either for or againſt them, as it only tended to breed contention.

Mean while an information was preferred, by the king's ſpecial command, in the Star-chamber againſt the duke of Buckingham, for applying a plaſter to the late king: but it was ſo managed that the cauſe never came to a hearing.

As the king had received no aid from the parliament, he was reduced to great ſtraits for want of money: he had a war with the houſe of Auſtria to maintain, beſides ſupplying his allies with the promiſed ſuccours, and to put his kingdom in a poſture of defence; all this could not be done with the ordinary revenues, recourſe was therefore to be had to expedients for raiſing money.

A freſh incumbrance happened from the king of Denmark, his majeſty's uncle, whom he had engaged in a war with the emperor, but was entirely defeated on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, by the Imperial troops, and loſt all his baggage and train of artillery. This accident obliged Charles to ſupport the Daniſh monarch, who was in a very ill ſituation, and could not avoid making peace with the emperor, unleſs ſpeedily relieved. The method judged moſt proper to raiſe money on this urgent occaſion, was by a general loan from the ſubject, according as every man was aſſeſſed in the rolls of the laſt ſubſidy.

The council on this occaſion iſſued a proclamation in the king's name, wherein, among other articles, is the following very remarkable one: "If any perſon or perſons whatſoever ſhall refuſe to pay the duties, cuſtoms, ſubſidies, or impoſts aforeſaid, unto our farmers, collectors, or officers, in manner aforeſaid, then our will and pleaſure is, and we do farther grant, by theſe preſents, unto the lords and others of our privy-council for the time being, or unto the lord-treaſurer of England, or chancellor of the Exchequer, now or for the time being, full power and authority to commit all and every ſuch perſon and perſons to priſon, who ſhall diſobey this our order and declaration, there to continue until they, and every of them, ſo diſobeying, ſhall have conformed and ſubmitted themſelves unto due obedience concerning the premiſes."

The reader is to obſerve, that this proclamation and thoſe powers were only to be enforced "until ſuch time as by parliament, as in former times, it might receive an abſolute ſettling:" and in another part of the proclamation the taxes are ordered "to be received as fully as heretofore they have been levied, gathered, and renewed, by authority of parliament." From thoſe clauſes two things are fairly deducible; firſt, that there was no ſhadow of authority from parliament for levying theſe taxes; and ſecondly, that Charles expreſly declared clared his proclamation to have the force of an act of parliament.

In order to advance the loan, care was taken to publiſh a liſt of ſuch as had freely ſubſcribed, for a good example to others; and all the peers and gentlemen were ordered to repair to their country-ſeats, that their abſence might cauſe no delay or obſtacle to the ſubſcriptions. Sir Randolph Crew, lord chief-juſtice, ſhewing no zeal for advancing this loan, was removed, and his place given to ſir Nicholas Hide.

This example of the king's diſpleaſure was not, however, ſufficient for the purpoſe; ſo that the court was obliged to uſe violent remedies in order to force thoſe that were obſtinate. The common people who refuſed to ſubſcribe to the loan were enrolled as ſoldiers, and ordered to ſerve in his majeſty's troops; as for perſons of birth and rank, they were ſummoned to appear before the council, and, upon a ſecond refuſal to lend money, were confined to places at a great diſtance from their habitations; and ſuch as refuſed to be ſo confined, were committed to the ſeveral priſons in London. Sir Thomas Wentworth, who was afterwards earl of Strafford, and a moſt zealous adherent to the king, was among the impriſoned.

At the ſame time, in order to fit out a fleet, the maritime towns were commanded, by an order of council, to equip a certain number of veſſels: the city of London was rated at twenty ſhips. This is the firſt inſtance in Charles's reign of ſhip-money; a taxation which had been impoſed by Elizabeth, but which, after being puſhed ſome ſteps higher by Charles, occaſioned ſuch violent murmurs. The court had alſo means from whence they expected great advantages, but which proved more detrimental than beneficial to the king; this was to cauſe miniſters to preach, as a Scripture doctrine, that ſubjects were obliged to obey the king's commands without examination. Among theſe preachers Dr. Sibthorp and Dr. Manwaring diſtinguiſhed themſelves. On this occaſion, the king, by a lordly ſtretch of prerogative, ſequeſtered Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, from his juriſdiction, and confined him to his houſe at Ford, for refuſing to licenſe the printing the ſermons of theſe tools of arbitrary power.

While theſe things were tranſacting at home, the French king, in order to improve the difference between the Dutch and the Spaniards, and promote a war between them, concluded a treaty at the Hague, by the baron de Coupet, concerning the equipping a fleet of twenty ſhips, under the admiral Hautin, with a deſign to block up Genoa by ſea, while the conſtable Leſdiguieres ſhould beſiege it by land; and the French ambaſſador in London obtained of king Charles an Engliſh man of war and ſeventeen merchant ſhips, to be employed in the ſame expedition; but ſhortly after theſe Engliſh ſhips were received into the pay of France, monſieur de Soubiſe, taking advantage of the French army's advance towards Italy, invited the proteſtant inhabitants of Rochelle to take arms againſt the French government, by whom they had of late been greatly oppreſſed; and he, with ſome ſhips he got together, ſeized on the Iſle of Rhé, as alſo on ſeveral ſail of French ſhips lying in the harbour. Lewis XIII. was ſo incenſed at this act, that, abandoning his deſign upon Italy, he turned all his thoughts towards reducing the rebellious Rochellers: and this occaſioned another treaty at the Hague, between d'Epeſſes, the French ambaſſador, and the States, which was concluded on the twelfth of April this year, whereby it was agreed, that the twenty ſhips under Hautin were to be employed againſt Rochelle and the prince de Soubiſe. The proteſtants of France, with juſt reaſon, took great offence at the Dutch, for giving their aſſiſtance againſt the Rochellers; but their alliance with France, and intereſts of ſtate, prevailed over all other conſiderations with the ſelfiſh Hollanders. The French admiral, Montmorency, being thus ſtrengthened with the Dutch fleet and the ſeven Engliſh ſhips, ſoon obliged Soubiſe to take refuge in the Iſle of Oleron, and retook moſt of the ſhips from him; at the ſame time they formed the blockade of Rochelle by ſea, whilſt the French army marched to inveſt it on the land-ſide. Charles was greatly offended that the ſhips he had lent the court of France ſhould be employed in this manner, having granted them upon condition only of their being uſed againſt the Spaniards; and, accordingly, ſent an expoſtulatory meſſage to the king of France, demanding reſtitution of the ſhips; and the French not returning a ſatisfactory anſwer, he cauſed a rich French ſhip, named the Newhaven, to be ſeized here in England. This occaſioned great clamour in France; and that court, by way of retaliation, laid an embargo upon the Engliſh merchant ſhips and goods in their harbours; but in a ſhort time matters were compromiſed, and the Engliſh ſhips were ſent home: thus affairs remained upon a pacific footing for ſome time. But, towards the end of this year, the king, upon ſome diſguſt againſt the queen's chaplains and domeſtics, diſmiſſed them all, after paying them their wages and ſalaries. The king of France, highly reſenting this breach of the marriage articles, ſeized on all the merchant ſhips which lay in the river of Bourdeaux; and the Engliſh miniſtry laid hold of this event to engage Charles in a war with France, at a time they were ſenſible he hardly knew how to continue that he had begun againſt the houſe of Auſtria. The duke de Soubiſe, and Mr. St. Blancard, a gentleman of Languedoc, came over to England in the beginning of the following year, to manage this affair, and to engage Charles to aſſiſt the Rochellers with a fleet, who were now threatened with a ſiege.

It was not till the month of May that this fleet was fitted out: and now every thing was made ready for the expedition, it required no little art to draw up a declaration of war againſt France: which declaration was, however, at laſt, iſſued; and imported in ſubſtance, "That the houſe of Auſtria (conſpiring the ruin of all thoſe of the reformed religion throughout Chriſtendom, as he ſaid plainly appeared in the affairs of Germany) had ſuch an influence upon the council of France, as to prevail with them to obſtruct the ſending of the count of Mansfeldt's army, contrary to promiſe, with whom the French ſhould have joined forces, for the relief of the Palatinate and the German princes; which failure of performance in them proved the ruin of that army, the greateſt part whereof periſhed, and was, by conſequence, the loſs of the whole proteſtant party in Germany.

"His majeſty farther declared, that having, by his mediation, prevailed for a peace between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects, and engaged his word that the proteſtants ſhould obſerve the articles of agreement; nevertheleſs, the king of France, contrary to the ſaid articles of agreement, blocked up their towns, garriſons, and forts, and had committed many ſpoils upon them, when they had done nothing in violation of the edict of peace. And that the king of France had committed an example of great injuſtice, in full peace to ſeize upon one hundred and twenty Engliſh ſhips, with all their merchandize and artillery: for which reaſons, the king was reſolved to ſend a powerful army and navy to require ſatisfaction."

The command of the fleet was then given to the duke of Buckingham, by whoſe inſtigation the rupture with France had been reſolved upon: however, in his commiſſion, no mention was made of France, but that the expedition was intended for the relief and reſtoration of the king of Bohemia and his family; and that the fleet was to be employed as well by way of offence as defence, as ſhould be moſt conducive to the ſervice of the ſaid prince; which plainly ſhews its true deſtination was to be a ſecret.

This fleet, conſiſting of above an hundred ſhips, having on board ſeven thouſand ſoldiers, ſailed from Portſmouth the ſeventh of June, 1627, and on the twentieth of July appeared before Rochelle. At the duke's approach, the Rochellers ſhut their gates, for fear of a ſurprize, as having no notice an Engliſh fleet was to come ſo near them. Preſently after arrived the duke de Soubiſe, with Sir William Becher, who told them, from the duke of Buckingham, that the king of England, out of compaſſion to their ſufferings, had ſent a fleet and army to their aſſiſtance; and if they refuſed his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his engagements of honour and conſcience for their relief. The mayor replied, in the name of the inhabitants, that they moſt humbly thanked his majeſty for his care of them, but being in ſtrict union with all the reſt of the proteſtants in that kingdom, they could not receive into the city the offered ſuccours, without conſulting their friends, and without the previous conſent of the whole body of the Huguenots. The duke of Buckingham, finding by this anſwer it would be difficult to get his troops into Rochelle, directed his courſe to the iſland of Rhé, where Foiras commanded; who, at firſt, endeavoured to hinder the landing of the Engliſh troops; but, his forces being few, he was obliged to retreat to his citadel of St. Martin's, which was in a good ſtate of defence. Had the duke underſtood the art of war, he would, without loſing a moment, have marched to the fort, and by that means prevented Foiras from getting his proviſions; but he ſpent ſo much time in landing his men, and in preparing to march, that Foiras had leiſure to get a large quantity of proviſions and ammunition into the place. At laſt the duke marched to St. Martin's, and beſieged it in form, but with very little ſucceſs; for Foiras, being a man of more experience than his antagoniſt, found means to keep him employed in the ſiege till November; he then ſent the king word he ſhould be maſter of it in eight days. Mean while, the French king, who had not expected this invaſion, ordered his troops to march with all expedition towards the ſea, and came in perſon to haſten the relief of the iſland of Rhé. When every thing was ready, count Schomberg paſſed into the iſle at the head of ſix or ſeven thouſand men, without any oppoſition from the Engliſh fleet, and immediately marched to St. Martin's; the ſiege whereof the duke of Buckingham raiſed with precipitation, being vigorouſly puſhed by the French to the ſea-ſide; and it was with great difficulty that he re-embarked the remainder of his troops. Thus ended the expedition to the Iſle of Rhé, in which it is ſaid near five thouſand men periſhed, and amongſt the reſt major-general Burroughs, the beſt officer in England.

The ſhameful miſcarriage of this expedition contributed ſtill farther to inflame the ill humour of the people. Their liberties they believed were deſtroyed, illegal taxes impoſed, their commerce, which had ſuffered extremely by the Spaniards, was in a manner ruined by the French war; all theſe misfortunes were imputed to the obſtinacy of Charles, in following the counſels of Buckingham; a man, who neither by his birth, age, ſervices, or merit, appeared to have any title to that unbounded authority which he now poſſeſſed.

It will readily be imagined, that neither the king or the duke were deſirous of convoking a parliament, while the tide of popular diſcontent ran ſo rapidly againſt them; but, totally unable to procure the means of executing the other military operations they had in view without a conſiderable aid of money, neceſſity compelled them to have recourſe to that diſagreeable expedient; and it was at length reſolved that Buckingham ſhould be the firſt perſon to propoſe in council the aſſembling a new parliament; as it was hoped that by this popular act he might be excuſed and pardoned former offences, and regain ſome part of his loſt credit with the nation. His advice was followed; and the duke having acted his part, the parliament was ſummoned, by the unanimous reſolution of the council, to meet on the ſeventeenth of March following. Immediately after, warrants were ſent to all parts, to releaſe the gentlemen who had been impriſoned for the affair of the loan-money; and the king had the mortification to ſee almoſt all of them, to the amount of twenty-ſeven, choſen to ſerve as repreſentatives in the enſuing parliament. Writs of ſummons were alſo ſent to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had been confined to his country-houſe for refuſing to licenſe Sibthorpe's ſermons, and to Williams, biſhop of Lincoln, late lord-keeper, who was priſoner in the Tower for having oppoſed the court meaſures; and every thing was done that could be deviſed, to bring the great aſſembly of the nation together in good humour.

The two houſes being met on the ſeventeenth of March, 1628, were addreſſed by Charles in a ſpeech, in which he pathetically ſets forth the neceſſities of the times, and requires the aſſiſtance of his parliament; but, with the ſame breath, he moſt impoliticly uſes the following expreſſions: "Every man muſt now do according to his conſcience; wherefore if you (which God forbid) ſhould not do your duties, in contributing what the ſtate at this time needs, I muſt, in diſcharge of my conſcience, uſe thoſe other means God hath put into my hands, to ſave that which the follies of particular men may otherwiſe hazard to loſe. Take not this as a threatening, for I ſcorn to threaten any but my equals, but as an admonition from him, who by nature and duty has moſt care of your preſervation and proſperity."

When Charles had ended his ſpeech, the lord-keeper began a long harangue upon the ſtate of affairs in Europe, ſetting forth the dangerous power of the houſe of Auſtria, and the motives (which the reader has already ſeen in the declaration of war) of England's interpoſing between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects. Having expatiated on thoſe matters, he concludes his ſpeech thus; "his majeſty, as he has told you, hath choſe this way of parliamentary ſupplies, not as the only way, but as the fitteſt; not becauſe he is deſtitute of others, but becauſe it is moſt agreeable to the goodneſs of his own gracious diſpoſition, and to the deſire and will of his people: if this be deferred, neceſſity, and the ſword of the enemy, may make way to the other. Remember his majeſty's admonition; I ſay, remember it."

Theſe two ſpeeches need no comment, ſince they plainly ſpeak both the king's principles concerning the uſe of parliaments, and his intention in caſe he received not from the preſent parliament the ſatisfaction he expected; but, notwithſtanding the provocation this great aſſembly received from this manner of treating it, the commons reſolved to proceed with the utmoſt calmneſs and moderation, in redreſſing the grievances of the public, in reſtraining the exerciſe of arbitrary power, in fixing the limits of the royal prerogative, and in aſſerting the rights and privileges of the people.

But before they entered into debate, the two houſes petitioned the king for a faſt, which being over, the commons proceeded to buſineſs; when it ſoon appeared with what ſpirit they were met; for in ſettling the proper committees for the diſpatch of buſineſs, great complaints were made concerning the influence of the deputy-lieutenants and ſome juſtices of the peace, particularly in Cornwall, in violating the freedom of elections by quartering ſoldiers, and other oppreſſions, upon electors who oppoſed the court: they then ordered all their members to lay before the houſe the names of the popiſh recuſants within their ſeveral provinces of repreſentation; and reſolved to proceed upon the king's ſupply, but ſo as it ſhould go hand in hand with the redreſs of grievances. The chief ſpeakers upon this important debate were ſir Francis Seymour, ſir Thomas Wentworth (afterwards the famous earl of Strafford), ſir Benjamin Rudyard, ſir Edward Coke, Mr. Cromwell, ſir Humphrey May, and Mr. ſecretary Cook; which two laſt were for poſtponing the redreſs of grievances, and immediately granting the ſupply. It would ſwell this work too much was I to inſert all that was ſaid on this great occaſion; it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that the ſpeeches made by the gentlemen of the oppoſition are perhaps the fineſt extant in any language, and may be found in a collection intitled, "The Sovereign's Preſervative and the Subjects Privilege," printed in 1657, to which Mr. Ruſhworth has been greatly obliged, and has copied from it great part of his Collection: it is from them that the Engliſh reader can collect the trueſt notion of the Engliſh conſtitution, and the nobleſt ſentiments of liberty, both perſonal and political.

In the courſe of theſe debates, it was found that when ſir John Hevingham, and ſome other gentlemen, impriſoned on the ſubject of the loan, brought their Habeas corpus, they were, notwithſtanding, remanded back to priſon, upon this principle, laid down by the attorney-general, that perſons committed by the king and council, were never bailed till his majeſty's pleaſure was firſt known. This produced many long and warm debates upon the liberty of the ſubject; and on the third of April, the following reſolution appears entered upon the Journals:

"Firſt, Reſolved upon queſtion, that no freeman ought to be committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, by the command of the king or the privy-council, or any other, unleſs ſome cauſe of the commitment, detainer, or reſtraint, be expreſſed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained: without one negative.

"Secondly, Reſolved upon queſtion, that the writ of Habeas corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, though it be by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, he praying the ſame: without one negative.

"Thirdly, Reſolved upon queſtion, that if a freeman be committed or detained in priſon, or otherwiſe reſtrained, by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, no cauſe of commitment, detainder, or reſtraint, being expreſſed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or reſtrained, and the ſame being returned upon a Habeas corpus granted for the ſame party, that the man ought to be delivered or bailed: without one negative.

Fourthly, Reſolved upon queſtion, that the ancient and undoubted right of every freeman is, that he hath a full and abſolute property in his goods and eſtate, and that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded or levied by the king, or any of his miniſters, without common aſſent by act of parliament: agreed, nemine contradicente."

While theſe diſpoſitions were making by the commons to defend their civil and perſonal liberties, they were equally zealous concerning religion, and both houſes preſented a petition to his majeſty on the thirty-firſt of May, againſt recuſants; who was pleaſed to return for anſwer, "That he recommended to them to think of a law againſt popery; and aſſures his parliament, that the lenity hitherto ſhewn to the Engliſh papiſts, was only with a view to procure ſuitable advantages to Engliſh proteſtants in popiſh countries, in which expectation he had been deceived; and promiſes, that unleſs he ſaw better fruits for the future, he would execute the laws againſt the papiſts to a greater degree of ſeverity than was craved in that petition." This anſwer ſo pleaſed the commons, that they forthwith proceeded to the buſineſs of the ſupply; and in order to convince his majeſty that they were ſufficiently diſpoſed to relieve his neceſſities, provided he would gratify them in their juſt demands, they voted him no leſs than five entire ſubſidies; whereof when ſecretary Cook informed the king, Charles aſked him by how many voices it had been carried, "By one," replied the ſecretary; at which perceiving the king change countenance, "Sir, added he, your majeſty hath herein the greater cauſe to rejoice, for the houſe was ſo unanimous as to make but one voice;" at which the king was exceedingly pleaſed; and charged the ſecretary to tell the houſe, in his name, "that he would deny them nothing of their liberties which any of his predeceſſors had granted."

The ſupply, however, thus voted, was not yet paſſed into a law; and the commons determined to employ the interval in providing ſome barrier to their rights and liberties: forced loans, benevolences, taxes without conſent of parliament, arbitrary impriſonments, billeting ſoldiers, and martial law, which were the chief grievances the nation complained of, and againſt which a permanent remedy was to be provided by ſome act that was to receive the ſanction of the whole legiſlature. On the fourth of April therefore, the commons reſolved to deſire a conference with the lords, concerning certain ancient and fundamental liberties of England; and four members, each of whom was to chuſe two aſſiſtants, were appointed to manage the conference. The managers were ſir Dudly Diggs, who choſe for his aſſiſtants ſir Benjamin Rudyard and Mr. Pym; Sir Edward Coke, who made choice of Mr. Rolles and Mr. Hackwill to aſſiſt him; Mr. Selden, whoſe aſſiſtants were Mr. Herbert and Mr. Whitby; and Mr. Littleton, who had with him Sir Robert Philips and Mr. Charles Jones. Thus the management of this conference, which may be ſaid to be deciſive of the laws and liberties of England, was committed to men of as much ſpirit and learning as ever the nation produced.

The king was no ſooner informed of the intention of the commons than he employed every expedient in order to divert them from their purpoſe; and all the time the conference was depending, endeavoured to amuſe them by repeated meſſages, begging them to leave off talking of grievances, and to proceed upon the ſupplies; promiſing, upon his royal word, that they ſhould then receive all due ſatisfaction. It would tire the reader, ſhould I repeat the particulars of all thoſe meſſages which the commons received, with a ſeeming deference to the king's perſon, but with a manifeſt contempt of his menaces, and an invincible diſtruſt of his promiſes. The peers, who, though during the whole of theſe violent ſtruggles they aſſumed in the main a laudable impartiality, were yet, as is natural, ſomewhat prejudiced in favour of monarchy, began to apprehend that the commons would go too far in their projected reform, and therefore recommended to them to conſider of his majeſty's aſſurances, and depend upon them: this occaſioned ſeveral debates, and many arguments were urged on both ſides of the queſtion; but ſir Thomas Wentworth reconciled all parties, by ſaying, "That never houſe of commons, ſo far as concerned themſelves, had greater confidence than the preſent in the goodneſs of their ſovereign: but we are all ambitious, ſaid he, that his majeſty's goodneſs ſhould deſcend to poſterity, and we are accountable for a public truſt. There hath been a public violation of the laws, by the king's miniſters; and nothing can ſatisfy the nation, but a public reparation. Our deſire to ſecure the ſubjects right by bill, will carry us no farther than what is contained in former laws, with ſome modeſt proviſion for inſtruction, performance, and execution." Theſe ſentiments were ſo agreeable to the whole houſe, that the ſecretary was deſired to conſider them as an anſwer to his meſſage. And now the commons went upon two petitions for the king, one againſt billeting of ſoldiers, and the other, the famous Petition of Rights, which was the reſult of all the conferences they had held with the lords upon the point of perſonal liberty. As the ſubſidy-bill was not yet paſſed, Charles was greatly perplexed how to behave; but he was at laſt obliged to receive the petition concerning billeting of ſoldiers, which was drawn up in very ſtrong and affecting terms, complaining of the miſeries which the kingdom ſuffered by the ſubjects being obliged to lodge and maintain ſuch numbers of diſſolute fellows. Charles could not help expreſſing his diſcontent in pretty ſtrong terms, upon their preſenting this petition; and, inſtead of anſwering it, he exhorted them to proceed, without loſs of time, upon the ſupplies. Their obſtinacy increaſed in proportion to his impatience: they determined not to gratify the king till he had done them juſtice; and the Petition of Right being by this time finiſhed, they ſent it up to the lords for their peruſal and concurrence. The upper-houſe, for reaſons I have already given, deſirous to abate the over-zeal of the commons, propoſed the plan of a remonſtrance more moderate, which they recommended to their conſideration; but the lower-houſe was by no means ſatisfied with this plan, which they aſſerted would leave their liberties in a ſtill more precarious ſituation than at preſent, and therefore abſolutely rejected it; but not without giving the lords ample and ſatisfactory reaſons for ſo doing: and all obſtacles being finally removed, the Petition of Right paſſed the commons, and was ſent up to the lords for their approbation, who immediately paſſed the ſame, without any material alteration. This petition, which may be called the ſecond Great Charter of England, is of ſo great importance, and forms ſo eſſential a part of the Engliſh conſtitution, that we ſhould deem ourſelves inexcuſable ſhould we deny our readers the ſatisfaction of peruſing it at full length, which they may do in the ſubjoined note *.

The

* This petition, as agreed to by both houſes, ſtood as follows.

"I. Humbly ſhew unto our ſovereign lord the king, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament aſſembled, that whereas it is declared and enacted, by a ſtatute made in the reign of king Edward I. commonly called "Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo," that no tallage or aid ſhall be laid or levied by the king, or his heirs in this realm, without the good-will and aſſent of the archbiſhops, biſhops, earls, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and, by authority of parliament held in the twenty-fifth year of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that, from henceforth, no perſon ſhould be compelled to make any loans to the king againſt his will, becauſe ſuch loans were againſt reaſon, and the franchiſe of the land: and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none ſhall be charged with any charge or impoſition called a benevolence, or by ſuch like charge: by which the ſtatutes beforementioned, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of this realm, your ſubjects have inherited this freedom, that they ſhould not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not ſet by common conſent in parliament.

II. Yet, nevertheleſs, of late, divers commiſſions directed to ſundry commiſſioners in ſeveral counties, with inſtructions, have

The petition was delivered on the twenty-eighth of May, and on the second of June the king gave the following answer: "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the performance whereof he holds himself in conscience as well obliged, as of his prerogative." This answer proved very unsatisfactory to the parliament, for, on the seventh of June, after great debates in both houses, the lords desired a conference with the commons, and it was agreed that they should join together in a petition to his majesty, "for a clear and satisfactory answer to the Petition of Right, in full parliament." While these debates subsisted, another message came to the commons, acquainting them, that his majesty designed in a few days to put an end to the session, and pressing them not to enter on any new matter. This was occasioned by the commons vigourously prosecuting Dr. Manwaring, a favourite of the king's, whom they obliged to make an abject submission, and recant the detestable doctrines of absolute power and non-resistance, which he had preached up*: but more particularly by a motion made in the house by sir Edward Coke, for impeaching the duke of Buckingham as the author of many of those grievances under which the nation laboured. The commons, enraged at this message from the king, which they looked upon as prescribing to them their method of proceeding, immediately fell in with sir Edward's motion, and the matter was carried on so warmly, that a remonstrance was almost finished against the duke, when Charles, apprized of the storm that threatened his favourite, resolved, if possible, to divert it by gratifying their wishes with regard to the Petition of Right. Accordingly, on the seventh of June, he came to the house of peers, and have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty; and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privy-council, and in other places; and others of them have been, therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

III. And whereas also, by the statute called "The Great Charter of the Liberties of England," it is declared and enacted, that no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be out-lawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. And in the eight-and-twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, that no man, of what estate or condition soever that he be, should be put out of his land or tenement, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

V. Nevertheless, against the tenour of the said statutes, and others the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed: and when for their deliverance, they were brought before a justice, by your majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy-council, and yet, were returned back to their several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to law.

VI. And whereas of late, great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. And whereas also, by authority of parliament, in the five-and-twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that no man should be fore-judged of life or limb, against the form of the Great Charter and the law of the land; and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death, but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of this realm or by acts of parliament; and whereas no offender, of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, under your majesty's great-seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever, and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in the time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death, according to law martial.

VIII. By pretext whereof, some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death: when and where, if, by the laws and statutes of the land, they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. And also sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forborn to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said officers were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid: which commissions, and all other of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm.

X. They, therefore, humbly pray your most excellent majesty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament: and that none be called to make an answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: and that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be so burthened in time to come: and that the aforesaid commissions, for proceeding by martial law, be revoked and annulled: and that, hereafter, no commissions, of like nature, may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid; lest, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

XI. All which they must humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that, in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom. Stat. 4 Car. I. cap. xiv.

* Manwaring had preached a sermon, which appeared, upon enquiry, to have been printed by the special command of his majesty; and, when examined, it was found to contain doctrines destructive of all civil liberty. It was there affirmed, "that though property was commonly lodged in the hands of the subject; yet, upon any urgent necessity, all property was transferred to the king; that the sovereign might impose taxes without consent of parliament; and that the divine law enjoined compliance with every demand, however unjust, which the prince should think proper to make upon the people."

pronouncing the uſual form of words, "Soit droit fait comme il eſt deſiré--Let it be law, as deſired," gave full ſanction and authority to the petition.

This conceſſion was received with loud acclamations and public rejoicings; and the commons could no longer delay the bill of ſubſidies, which was immediately paſſed; but their ill humour did not abate: though they had granted the king this aid, yet they ſtill retained a pledge in their hands, which, they imagined, would enſure the ſucceſs of all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had artfully concealed their intention of attacking that branch of revenue, till the royal aſſent had been given to the Petition of Right, which they juſtly conſidered as of the utmoſt importance. They then boldly affirmed, that the levying tonnage and poundage without conſent of parliament, was an evident violation of all the ancient privileges of the people; and they propoſed to preſent a remonſtrance to that purpoſe. They next reſumed their cenſure of Buckingham's conduct, againſt whom they had conceived the moſt implacable hatred, and drew up a remonſtrance of ſeveral late miſcarriages in the government, in the concluſion whereof they aſſerted, "the excluſſive power of the ſaid duke, and the abuſe of that power, to be the principal cauſe of all the evils and dangers therein maintained; and therefore they humbly ſubmitted it to his majeſty's wiſdom, whether it can be ſafe for himſelf, or for his kingdom, that ſo great power, both by ſea and land, as reſts in him ſhould be truſted in the hands of any one ſubject whatſoever."

On the ſeventeenth of June this addreſs was preſented to the king, with the bill of ſubſidies, at the Banqueting-houſe, at Whitehall, who received it with the moſt ſenſible chagrin, and afterwards gave the lower-houſe to underſtand, that he would ſhortly put an end to the ſeſſion. The commons hereupon ſet about putting the finiſhing hand to the remonſtrance againſt tonnage and poundage. Great was the indignation of Charles, when he heard of this remonſtrance; and well knowing, by experience, what effects it would have, if completed by the commons and rejected by him, he reſolved to cut the ſeſſion ſhort before it could be perfected: he therefore, on the twenty-ſecond of June, while the remonſtrance was reading in the lower houſe, ſuddenly came to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, prorogued the ſeſſion to the twentieth of October. On this occaſion he addreſſed himſelf to both houſes in the following ſpeech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It may ſeem ſtrange that I come ſo ſuddenly to end this ſeſſion, therefore, before I give my aſſent to the bills, I will tell you the cauſe (though I muſt avow I owe an account of my actions to none but God alone.) It is known to every one, that awhile ago the houſe of commons gave me a remonſtance; how acceptable every man may judge, and for the merit of it I will not call that in queſtion, for I am ſure no wiſe man can juſtify it. Now, ſince I am certainly informed that a ſecond remonſtrance is preparing for me, to take away my profit of tonnage and poundage (one of the chief maintenances of the crown), by alleging that I have given away my right thereof by my anſwer to your petition.

"This is ſo prejudicial to me, as I am forced to end this ſeſſion ſome few hours before I meant it, being willing not to receive any more remonſtrances to which I muſt give an harſh anſwer.

"And ſince I ſee that even the houſe of commons begins already to make falſe conſtructions of what I granted in your petition; leſt it be worſe interpreted in the country, I now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

"The profeſſions of both houſes in the time of hammering this petition, was no ways to trench upon my prerogative, ſaying, they had neither intention nor power to hurt it.

"Therefore it muſt needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my ſubjects; yet, to ſhew the clearneſs of my intentions, that I neither repent nor mean to recede from any thing I have promiſed you, I do here declare, that thoſe things which have been done, whereby men had cauſe to ſuſpect the liberty of the ſubject to be trenched upon (which indeed was the true and firſt ground of their petition), ſhall not hereafter be drawn into example for prejudice, and in time to come (on the word of a king) you ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain.

"But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to aſk, never meant (I am ſure) by me to grant. To conclude: I command you all that are here, to take notice of what I have ſpoken at this time, to be the true meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but eſpecially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of the laws; for none of the houſes of parliament, either joint or ſeparate (what new doctrine ſoever may be raiſed), have any power either to make or declare a law without my conſent."

The reader of himſelf will be apt enough to make reflections upon the infatuation which poſſeſſed both the king and commons in the latter part of this ſeſſion. If, on one hand, Charles has been taxed with a deſign to render himſelf abſolute, it muſt likewiſe be owned that the leaders in the parliament ſeemed bent upon infringing and reducing his undoubted prerogative. His confirmation of their rights and privileges was ſo well received in all parts of the kingdom, that the violent party began to fear the king would become popular; they therefore reſolved, in drawing up the remonſtrance, to inſert in it every ſhadow or ſuſpicion of a grievance, which might help to inſpire the ſubject with an hatred and contempt of the ſovereign. In ſhort, I can by no means think the commons are to be juſtified in preſſing their remonſtrances before they ſaw ſome freſh invaſion of their national liberty, or ſome freſh abuſes of regal power, on which they could ground their proceedings. Poſſibly Charles, upon ſuch forbearance of the commons, might have followed his too great propenſity to arbritary rule, and have given them cauſe of complaint; but I am inclined to believe, that had they forborne theſe remonſtrances, they would then have left all the blame with Charles, nor would the public have been ſo much divided in their ſentiments, as they afterwards were, to the deluging their country

The Duke of Buckingham Stab'd by Felton.

Marquis of Rockingham, country with the blood of her own ſons and the utter overthrow of the conſtitution.

Rochelle had been for ſome time beſieged by the French; and it appeared, by cardinal Richelieu's taking the conduct of it upon himſelf, that he intended to exterminate the Huguenots, whoſe whole dependance lay now upon Charles. In May, this year, the preſence of Buckingham being neceſſary in parliament, at the preſſing inſtances of the duke of Soubiſe, and deputies ſent from Rochelle, the earl of Denbigh was diſpatched, with a fleet, to the relief of this place; but neglecting to attack the French fleet, had returned with diſhonour. In order to wipe out this ſtain, the duke of Buckingham reſolved to take the command upon himſelf, and repaired to Portſmouth, where the fleet and forces were rendezvouſed: but before he could ſet out on his expedition, he met with that fate from the hand of an aſſaſſin, which, had he ſurvived much longer, he would probably have ſuffered from the general reſentment of the nation. This aſſaſſin was John Felton, a gentleman by birth, who had been a lieutenant of infantry, and diſappointed in his expectation of a captain's commiſſion, which Buckingham had beſtowed upon another. This man was a fanatic in religion, and in this caſe his revenge ſeems to have co-oporated with his enthuſiaſm. The duke was walking with ſir Thomas Fryer, through an entry, from one apartment to another, when Felton, coming behind him, ſtabbed him with a knife, which he left ſticking in the wound; Buckingham exclaimed, "The villain hath killed me!" and, pulling out the knife, dropped down and died on the floor. The aſſaſſin might have eſcaped, but ſeemed to glory in his crime, and ſurrendered himſelf immediately to juſtice.

Charles was at a gentleman's ſeat, within four miles of Portſmouth (whither he had come, by his preſence to haſten the preparations) when his favourite was killed, and he received the news of it while he was at church; but he was ſo intent in his devotions, that no diſcompoſure appeared in his action, nor alteration in his countenance, till the ſervice was over, when he threw himſelf on his bed, and poured forth a flood of tears, and the moſt paſſionate expreſſions, for the memory of his beloved Buckingham, whom he always cheriſhed, and ſhewed his regard for, by a noble train of munificent acts towards his widow and family. When the firſt tranſports of grief were a little ſubſided, he ſent Dr. Hutcheſon, one of his chaplains in ordinary, to try if he could learn from the aſſaſſin by what inducement he had committed the horrid fact. Felton ſtrenuouſly denied his having been dealt with by any one for that purpoſe, declaring his only motive to have been, that the duke had been declared an enemy to the common-wealth in the late remonſtrances tendered to the king by the parliament; and this he perſiſted in, both at the time of his examination before the lords of the council and at his execution: that which excited this wretch to ſo horrid a murder, ſeems likewiſe to have influenced the people in general, who rejoiced at the death of the duke as of the greateſt enemy of their country.

Thus in the flower of life, being but thirty-ſix years of age, fell George Villers, duke of Buckingham, whoſe riſe was ſudden, his promotions rapid, and his end untimely. Notwithſtanding the load of public cenſure heaped upon this great favourite and miniſter, there appears good reaſons to induce us to believe that he meant well to both his maſter and his country; and that his chief misfortunes proceeded from jealouſy in others, who thought the great and extenſive power he enjoyed dangerous to the rights of a free people. It is poſſible, if he had lived a few years longer, he might have ſeen through the temptations of greatneſs, and have proved as great a pillar of this ſtate as any that ever went before him. He was of a moſt noble and generous diſpoſition: he ſeldom ſtudied to conceal his reſentments, either of love or hatred; in the former he was immoderate, in the latter he was not ſanguinary; but once offended, he never could forget: his courage was great, but it ſometimes tranſported him too far, for if he had a little yielded to the times, and withdrawn from thoſe ſtorms he could neither prevent nor allay, he might perhaps have found a milder fate.

The fatal event of the duke's death, which happened on the twenty-third of Auguſt, proved little or no obſtacle to the proceedings of the fleet; the next day the command of the expedition was given to the earl of Lindſey; and they ſet ſail from Portſmouth on the eighth of September; but by this time cardinal Richelieu had finiſhed his famous Digue, or mote, which entirely blockaded Rochelle; and the Engliſh fleet being unable to force the barricadoe, or gain entrance into the harbour, were obliged to return without effecting any thing for the relief of the beſieged, who, unable to hold out any longer, threw their gates open to the cardinal's army.

The ill humour this diſgraceful expedition threw the nation into, made Charles think it improper to let the parliament meet according to their adjournment, in the month of October this year, and therefore he farther prorogued that aſſembly to the twentieth of January following; and in the mean time archbiſhop Abbot was admitted to kiſs the king's hand, and commanded not to fail of his attendance at the council-table; which was done at this conjuncture to moderate the heats of certain eccleſiaſtics who made great diſturbance in the church by their ſcholaſtical controverſies concerning free-will, predeſtination, and the like. Both parties were countenanced by ſeveral biſhops, and each of them would inſiſt on their opinion being the true doctrine of the church, when in truth they were but the opinions of private men; for nothing can be called the doctrine of the church, that is not declared by the whole clergy lawfully aſſembled in convocation. Theſe ſectariſts were diſtinguiſhed by the names of Calviniſts and Arminians: the Calviniſts (which were the ſame with the Puritans) were countenanced by the commons in parliament and ſome few of the biſhops; while the Arminians had the greater part of the epiſcopal order, and even the king himſelf, on their ſide, as they were zealous aſſertors of the prerogative royal and the court-doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance. Charles, however, would gladly have put an end to theſe feuds, and reconciled both parties: with this view he cauſed the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England to be publiſhed, with a proclamation reſtraining all diſputes on the points controverted: he alſo iſſued an order for calling in a book written by one Montagu, in the late king's time, called an Appeal to Cæſar, for which he had been made a biſhop. At the ſame time Dr. Potter, a known Calviniſt, was promoted to the ſee of Carliſle.

Not all thoſe acts of conceſſion on the part of the court could, however, molify the acrimony of the oppoſition; for the parliament aſſembling on the twentieth of January, 1629, the grand committees, which are uſually the firſt things ſettled at the opening of that aſſembly, were very buſy and active in traverſing whatever views they thought the council might have adopted: that of religion made great complaints of invaſions upon the church, which they pretended was much endangered by the growth of popery and Arminianiſm. They ſolicited the king to proclaim a faſt, and preſented an addreſs, containing a ſort of apology for their preferring the affairs of religion to any other article of buſineſs in their deliberations. Buckingham, the great object of their hatred, being now removed, their reſentment glowed with a double rancour againſt Laud, biſhop of London, who, as the king's ſpiritual director, encouraged all his high notions of hierarchy and prerogative. He was branded as a ſuperſtitious eccleſiaſtic, chief of the Arminian ſect, by whoſe intereſt Montagu, Cozens, Sibthorp, and Manwaring, had been pardoned, and even promoted to biſhoprics, or rich benefices; and they exclaimed againſt him as an implacable foe, not only to the puritans, but alſo to the liberty of his country.

While the committee was thus employed in examining religious grievances, the reſt of the houſe were no leſs active in their inquiſitions into the miſcarriages in civil affairs. Though the remonſtrance againſt tonnage and poundage had not been preſented to the king, it was, however, public, and ſufficient to ſhew the people what was the ſenſe of the houſe of commons. Upon this foundation, three merchants, among others, refuſed to pay this duty to the king; one of them, by name Rolles, a merchant of London and a member of the houſe of commons, had refuſed it, as contrary to law; whereupon his warehouſe had been ſealed up by the officers of the cuſtoms; and Chambers and Vaſſal, the other two merchants, were condemned by the barons of the Exchequer, who ordered their goods to be detained. The affair of Rolles was, by the commons, adjudged a breach of the privilege of their houſe, for which the cuſtom-houſe officers were ſummoned before the houſe, to anſwer their miſdemeanor therein. The king, willing to ſupport his authority, interpoſed in this matter, and ſent a meſſage to the houſe, informing them, that what had been done by the officers, was only in obedience to the orders they had received: "that as to himſelf, he did not mean to levy theſe duties as belonging to him by hereditary right, but out of a full perſuaſion that the houſe of commons, ſuitable to their large profeſſions, would grant them by bill, which he deſired they would diſpatch, to put an end to the diſpute."

The commons, however, were far from being ſatisfied with this acknowlegement of the king; they ſtill inſiſted, as an indiſpenſible condition, that he ſhould entirely forbear the levying of thoſe duties; after which they would take into conſideration upon what terms they would reſtore to him a revenue, which he had once fairly reſigned. On this occaſion debates in the houſe ran very high, and they reſolved to proceed to a remonſtrance againſt the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, "not being granted by act of parliament." Charles finding the commons thus refractory, immediately adjourned them to the twenty fifth of February, and afterwards to the ſecond of March. When they met again, the ſame affair was brought upon the carpet; and ſo eager were they to vent their paſſion, that they locked the door of the houſe, and gave the key to ſir Miles Hobart, one of their members, to keep, and refuſed to admit the uſher of the black rod, whom the king had ſent with a meſſage to them; whereat he was ſo much offended, that he ſent for the captain of the band of penſioners, and the guards, to force an entrance. In the mean time the heads of a remonſtrance were offered to ſir John Finch, the ſpeaker, to be put to the queſtion, which he refuſed, declaring that the king had given him an order to adjourn the houſe to the tenth of March, and to put no queſtion, nor admit of any debate; upon which he roſe and left the chair. The whole houſe was now in an uproar; the ſpeaker was forced back into the chair, and held in it by Mr. Denzil Holles, and ſir Peter Hayman, till the following proteſtation was drawn up and read.

"Proteſtation of the Houſe of Commons.

"I. Whoſoever ſhall bring in an innovation of religion, or by favour ſeek to introduce popery, or Arminianiſm, or other opinions diſagreeing from the true and orthodox church, ſhall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

"II. Whoſoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the taking or levying, of the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or ſhall be an actor or inſtrument therein, ſhall likewiſe be reputed a common enemy to the commonwealth.

"III. If any man ſhall voluntarily yield to pay the ſaid ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, ſhall be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to this commonwealth."

This being paſſed in a tumultuous manner, they roſe before the penſioners and guards came, and the houſe was adjourned to the tenth of March. In the intermediate time a proclamation was drawn, but not publiſhed, for the diſſolution of the parliament, and on the third of March, Denzil Holles, eſq. ſir Miles Hobart, ſir John Elliot, ſir Peter Hayman, John Seldon, eſq. William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroude, and Benjamin Valentine, were ordered next day to appear before the council. Theſe gentlemen had diſtinguiſhed their zeal through the whole ſeſſion, but more particularly on the laſt day: and Mr. Holles, ſir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton, and Mr. Valentine, attended the council, but refuſing to anſwer out of parliament, which was ſtill ſitting, they were committed cloſe priſoners to the Tower. Warrants were then iſſued for apprehending the reſt, and for ſealing up their ſtudies.

On the tenth of March the king came in his robes to the houſe of lords, who attended in theirs; and made a ſpeech, in which he twice called the gentlemen in the oppoſition "vipers," and commended his own party, and the houſe of in particular for their dutiful demeanor; and then diſſolved the parliament.

These are all the proceedings of this famous parliament, that are worthy either of praise or imitation. Their heats concerning religion, their protestations relating to it, and their bitterness against all who were suspected of what they termed Arminianism, were as unjustifiable and undutiful, as the noble stand they made for the personal liberties and properties of the subject, was memorable and glorious. However, Charles, that he might not seem to exert a despotic power of punishing those who headed the opposition against his measures, and to persuade the people that he intended to conform himself to the law as much as possible, appointed the judges to assemble, on the twenty-first of April, at Serjeant's Inn, where he caused certain questions to be proposed to them; and, according to their answers, ordered the attorney-general to raise a process against the imprisoned members, for their violent, unlawful, and seditious behaviour in the house of commons. Alderman Chambers was prosecuted in the Star-chamber, for having said "that the merchants were more oppressed in England than in Turky," and was condemned to an exorbitant fine, the payment of which reduced him to extreme poverty. Long was sentenced to pay two thousand pounds for having violated his oath in sitting as a member of the lower-house, after he had been sworn sheriff of Wiltshire. The imprisoned members demanded the privilege of the Habeas corpus; they were detained in confinement from March to October; and then the court of King's Bench decreed, that they should remain in prison during the king's pleasure: Ellot was moreover cast in a fine of two thousand pounds; Valentine in one of five hundred; and Holles obliged to pay one thousand marks.

Charles, deprived of all hopes of supply from parliament, was now obliged to conclude a peace with the two crowns against whom he had hitherto carried on a war, begun without necessity, and conducted without glory. The crown of France, though victorious over its protestant subjects, was weakened by civil dissentions among the princes of the blood: it was threatened by the greatness of the house of Austria, and upon the point of being engaged in a war with Italy; in short, Lewis wanted a peace as much or more than Charles did; and it was privately agreed, that the Venetians should interpose their good offices for a peace between the two crowns. Georgi and Castarini, the two ministers employed by the republic for that purpose, had therefore very little more to settle than mere matters of form in their negotiation. At last, on the fourteenth of April, the articles were agreed on; but contain nothing in them remarkable enough to claim a place here. In Charles's present circumstances, he could not pretend to insist on any terms for the Huguenots; and they were accordingly left to the mercy of their sovereign.

Peace was soon after made with Spain. It is said that Reubens, the famous Flemish painter, who was then in England, painting a kind of apotheosis of James, for the roof of the noble banqueting-house of Whitehall, was ordered by the archduchess to sound the inclinations of Charles. This is by no means unlikely. The war, which about two years before had broke out in Italy on account of the successions to the duchies of Mantua and Montferrat, had been unfavourable to the Spaniards; and that court, suspecting they should be deserted by the emperor, and being assured of the dispositions of Charles for peace, gave a public character to don Carlos de Colomos, for putting an end to the negociations which Reubens had begun. It required very little dexterity to conclude this peace; the articles of which only confirmed the former treaties we have already seen, and was sworn to on the seventeenth of December, sir Francis Cottington being sent to Spain to take that sharp oath and ratification of the same.

In this peace nothing was stipulated in favour of the prince Palatine, except that Philip III. promised in general to employ his good offices for the restoration of the elector. Charles, however, did not desist from his endeavours to procure some relief to that unhappy family; he had a great affection for his sister, and had supported her husband and her in a court at the Hague, at a vast expence, and had expended large sums, as subsidies, in her service. Having settled his plan of governing without a parliament, he now imagined it would be in his power to give them effectual assistance. With this view, in the Spring of the year 1630 *, in conjunction with France, he brought about a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, in hopes of inducing the former to undertake the cause of the protestants in Germany.

This was the famous Gustavus Adolphus, whose heroic genius, assisted by the wisest policy, rendered him, in a little time, the most celebrated monarch of the age. To encourage and support him in his intended invasion of Germany, Charles engaged to furnish him with six thousand men; but, that he might save appearances with the house of Austria, he employed the name of the marquis of Hamilton, a nobleman allied to the crown. Hamilton entered into an agreement with Gustavus; and, having levied these troops in England and Scotland, at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe.

Soon after was fought the important battle of Leipsic; where the Imperial army, under count Tilly, was totally defeated by the victorious Swede. Gustavus proceeded in his conquests with such an amazing and rapid progress, as is scarce to be paralleled either in ancient or modern history; and, in a short time, made himself master of the greatest part of Germany.

Charles was all this while studying the means of raising money, and establishing his own power by making examples of those who durst oppose it. Among other methods practised by Charles to raise money, was that of appointing commissioners to compound with those who, though summoned at his coronation to come and receive the honour of knighthood, had neglected to appear. In the reign of Edward II. an old custom was enacted into a law, importing, that every man possessed of twenty pounds a year in land, should be knighted: almost all the succeeding monarchs had put this law in execution. Charles, considering the difference of value in money between that reign and the preſent time, ſummoned thoſe only whoſe yearly rent amounted to forty pounds; yet, even this mitigation was deemed a hardſhip, becauſe the value of twenty pounds in the days of Edward, was equal to four times that ſum in the reign of Charles: a great number had therefore refuſed to obey the mandate, and theſe were now fined for their diſobedience. A conſiderable ſum was likewiſe exacted, by way of compoſition, from thoſe who declined the order.

If theſe proceedings cauſed great diſcontents and murmurings among the people, they were not a little encreaſed by Charles's giving orders for tonnage and poundage to be levied with great rigour. The cuſtom-houſe officers were empowered to enter houſes, and break open warehouſes, cheſts, and cloſets, to ſearch for goods which had not paid the duty: and, on this pretence of ſearching, they committed numberleſs acts of fraud and oppreſſion. In order to prevent the popular clamours from producing inſurrections, the council iſſued orders for arming and reviewing the militia, that the people might be intimidated by their appearance; while, on the other hand, they were amuſed with public orders for putting the laws in execution againſt papiſts. At the ſame time, the king endeavoured to fill his coffers by granting excluſive privileges for the ſale of commodities and proviſions; ſo that the whole kingdom was filled with monopolies, to the unſpeakable prejudice of trade and manufactures. Preſbyterianiſm having made great progreſs in England, the king, by the advice of biſhop Laud, ſent inſtructions to the prelates of the kingdom, enjoining them, among other things, to take eſpecial care that no puritan miniſter ſhould be admitted into the church; and to diſcover all ſuch as ſhould neglect the rites preſcribed by the canons. The preſbyterians conceived the moſt implacable hatred againſt Laud, for this, and other inſtances of his enmity; and he ſeverely felt their reſentment in the ſequel.

In the ſpring of the year 1631, Mervin Touchet, lord Audley in England, and earl of Caſtlehaven in Ireland, was tried before his peers, for rapes and practices upon the body of his wife, which he partly forced and partly invited others to commit; which out-did the moſt ſhocking ideas of luſt and infamous contrivance; and was found guilty. He was a nobleman deſcended from the illuſtrious lord Audley, the friend and companion in all his wars to Edward III. He had been ingenious enough to debauch the mind, as well as proſtitute the body, of his lady; for, after his execution, ſhe was pardoned for adultery, in terms not very advantageous to her virtue. On this occaſion, Charles ſhewed a ſeaſonable piece of juſtice, as he would grant no other favour to the criminal, than to change his puniſhment from hanging into beheading. But neither this exhibition of impartiality, nor the great zeal which Charles diſcovered in repairing and rebuilding the cathedral church of St. Paul (which had been lately burnt down), atoned, with men of ſenſe and property, for his other impolitical and unpopular meaſures. Laud was ſo much in favour with him, that he acted as if his head had been turned, by introducing into religious worſhip many popiſh fopperies: for the particulars of which the reader may conſult the common collections and hiſtories of the times.

In giving an account of the third parliament held in this reign, we have often mentioned ſir Thomas Wentworth, knight of the ſhire for the county of York: this gentleman ſeveral times, in the houſe of commons, gave proof of his zeal for the maintenance of the liberties of the people, and the privilege of parliament. By this means he became formidable to the court; though he took care not to run into any exceſs with regard to the king and his miniſter; on the contrary, he always ſoftened his opinion with ſome honourable and reſpectful expreſſions, though he ſeldom failed to oppoſe the pretenſions of the court. As he was one of the greateſt geniuſes then in England, the king ſoon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very ſerviceable to him, if he could gain him to his intereſt; he endeavoured it, therefore, after, or perhaps before, the diſſolution of the parliament, and ſucceeded ſo well, that Wentworth became one of the moſt zealous promoters of the royal authority. About the ſame time alſo were gained ſir John Saville, who was made a lord, and comptroller of the houſhold; ſir Dudley Diggs, who was promoted to the maſterſhip of the Rolls, and was alſo made attorney-general; and ſir Edward Littleton, who was made ſollicitor. Sir John Elliot, ſome time before his death, was tampered with, but he was proof againſt the temptation.

As ſir Thomas Wentworth, ſince his converſion, had ſhewed himſelf a zealous defender of the prerogatives of the crown, the king thought him the fitteſt perſon to be truſted with the preſidentſhip of the council in the North; a court of judicature eſtabliſhed at York in the reign of Henry VIII. for the relief of poor ſuitors in the counties of York, Cumberland, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, and the biſhopric of Durham, who could not afford to bring their cauſes into the courts of Weſtminſter. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, beſides ſome innovations introduced by James, Charles ventured, at this time, to enlarge its powers, and to inveſt it with a kind of civil juriſdiction, which, in ſome reſpects, was even unparliamentary. In conſequence of this illegal meaſure, all the northern counties were deprived of the protection of the common-law, and ſubjected to an authority which was wholly arbitrary.

It was now the year 1632, in which the great Guſtavus, continuing his victorious projects through Germany, at laſt brought the elector Palatine to Munich. This unfortunate prince now ſaw himſelf on the point of being reſtored to his palatinate, and even to the crown of Bohemia, by the hand of the conqueror; when, in the ſecond battle near Leipſic, fought in the plains of Lutzen, on November the ſixth, this year, Guſtavus was ſlain in the midſt of a victory he had already gained.

His death proved fatal to the palatine Frederic, who now deſpairing of any farther reſource, fell into a fever, occaſioned by his immoderate grief, which, in a few months, put a period to a life of continual croſſes and diſappointments. This year Wentworth was created viſcount Wentworth, and ſent over lord-lieutenant of Ireland; where affairs were ſtill in great diſorder, through the inſolence of the Roman catholics, who greatly abuſed the royal clemency in relaxing certain penal ſtatutes againſt them.

The king having now governed the nation three or four years without a parliament, began to find himſelf more at eaſe than he had ever been ſince his acceſſion to the throne; and therefore choſe this ſeaſon of tranquility to viſit his ancient kingdom of Scotland: he accordingly ſet out for that kingdom in the month of May, 1633, where he was received with great magnificence; and the Scottiſh parliament, aſſembled at Edinburgh, granted a larger ſubſidy than ever had been given to any other king of that realm. Charles inherited his father's deſign, of bringing religion in Scotland to a conformity with the Engliſh church; and biſhop Laud accompanied him in his journey, to facilitate the execution of his ſcheme. As a preparatory ſtep, he paſſed two acts in the Scottiſh parliament, the firſt intituled, "An act concerning the king's prerogative, and the habit of the clergy:" this was no other than the confirmation of a ſtatute enacted in the preceding reign, impowering the king to give ſuch directions as he ſhould think proper, with regard to the dreſs of the clergy. The other ratified and improved all the ſtatutes which had been made concerning the liberties and franchiſes of the true church of God, and of the religion at preſent profeſſed in the kingdom. Both theſe acts met with oppoſition from the preſbyterians; they looked upon the firſt as a prelude to the uſe of the ſurplice, which was an abomination to their eyes; and the words "at preſent profeſſed," they conſidered as an equivocal expreſſion, calculated to reſtore epiſcopal government. Their church was governed by provincial ſynods and general aſſemblies; but the biſhops ſtill ſubſiſted, though without the leaſt juriſdiction or influence. The bills were paſſed, but they produced heats and diſcontent in the nation.

The Scottiſh religioniſts were not miſtaken in their conjectures; the king's purpoſe was really to introduce the rites of the Engliſh church, and reeſtabliſh epiſcopacy in its former power and ſplendor. Biſhop Laud preached, in the royal chapel at Edinburgh, on the benefit of conformity, and the reverend ceremonies of the church. He propoſed to the Scottiſh biſhops, that the Engliſh liturgy ſhould be received into their ſervice. They objected to this propoſal, that ſuch a ſtep would alarm the jealouſy of the nation, which would be apt to look upon the Engliſh liturgy as the forerunner of Engliſh laws, and an encroachment upon the independency of the kingdom: they therefore deſired that another might be compoſed for the uſe of the Scottiſh church, that ſhould be the ſame in ſubſtance, but different in ſome immaterial particulars. The king embraced this advice, though contrary to the inclination of Laud: he was himſelf jealous of the independency of his native kingdom, and appointed a ſelect number of the Scottiſh biſhops to form a new liturgy for their own ſervice. He erected Edinburgh into a biſhopric, created the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's chancellor of the kingdom, and he admitted ſeveral other prelates to ſeats in the privy council, and in the college of juſtice; a very unſeaſonable mark of his regard for the hierarchy; for the biſhops, by this promotion, incurred the hatred and envy of the noblemen, who, though they reſpected them in their eccleſiaſtical capacities, could not bear to ſee them in civil ſtations, to which they thought themſelves better entitled.

Charles returning to England in the autumn of this year, beſtowed the dignity of archbiſhop of archbiſhop of Canterbury (vacant by the death of Abbot in his abſence) on his favourite Laud; who, by this acceſſion of authority, was now enabled to ſupport eccleſiaſtical diſcipline with great rigor: and to inflame the general diſcontent of the nation, the Book of Sports to be uſed on Sundays after evening prayers, was again ordered to be read in churches; and many miniſters, for refuſing to read it, were either ſuſpended, deprived, or proſecuted, before the high-commiſſion. The articles of viſitation publiſhed by Neale, biſhop of Wincheſter, one of Laud's party, were no other than ſo many traps, contrived for bringing all whom Laud hated into the eccleſiaſtical den, where they ſeldom met with mercy. Writers in proſe and verſe, in polemics and politics, were treated with the like ſeverity; of which the reader will find particular inſtances in the collections of thoſe days.

There is little more to add to the tranſactions of this languid year, unleſs it were to ſwell the work with proclamations, which now ſupplied the place of acts of parliament. As to the concerns of Charles's family, he had this year ſent the earl of Ormond with a generous invitation for the queen of Bohemia and her family to come into England; but the loſs that princeſs had ſuſtained by the death of her huſband, was too recent for her ſorrows to ſuffer her to accept of the invitation for that time. It muſt not be forgotten, that on the thirteenth of October, this year, the ſecond ſon of Charles, afterwards the unhappy James II. was born.

We ſhall begin the year 1634 with an account of a cauſe which came to a ſolemn hearing in the month of February, which made a great noiſe, and which ſhewed the extreme ſeverity of the court againſt ſuch as were thought to fail ever ſo little in the ſubmiſſion expected from them; the caſe was this: Mr. William Prynne, a barriſter of Lincoln's Inn, had compoſed a large quarto, of a thouſand pages, which he entitled Hiſtrio Maſtyx. Its profeſſed deſign was to decry tragedies, comedies, interludes, muſic, and dancing; but the author had likewiſe directed his ſatire againſt hunting, public feſtivals, Chriſtmas-keeping, bonfires, and May poles.

He had obtained a licence from archbiſhop Abbot's chaplain, for printing this book; yet he was indicted in the Star-chamber as a libeller. It was thought ſomewhat hard, that general invectives againſt plays, ſhould be conſtrued into ſatires againſt the king and queen, merely becauſe they frequented theſe amuſements, and becauſe the queen ſometimes acted a part in paſtorals and interludes, which were repreſented at court.

The author, indeed, had taken occaſion, in the moſt violent manner, to condemn the hierarchy, the ceremonies, the innovations in religious worſhip, and the ſuperſtitions introduced by Laud. In the courſe of his work, he gave ſuch evident ſpecimens of his fanaticiſm, or rather, indeed, of his frenzy, that his moſt proper puniſhment would have been to have ſent him to Bedlam; but he was condemned to be put from the bar; to ſtand on the pillory in two places, Weſtminſter and Cheapſide; to loſe both his ears, one in each place; to pay a fine of five thouſand pounds to the king; and to be impriſoned during life.

The Dutch were at this time improving, equally with the Engliſh, in matters of commerce; and they were plainly rivals to one another in trade: flushed with ſucceſs, the Hollanders, about this time, flatly aſſerted a right to fiſh on the Britiſh coaſts, founded upon immemorial poſſeſſion. Charles, ſhocked at the independent airs of that haughty republic, which had been nurſed by the blood, and fed by the bounty, of England; and glad of a juſt and popular pretext for humbling her, reſolved to fit out a fleet which ſhould drive her ſubjects out of the Narrow ſeas. But the vigorous preparations neceſſary for this undertaking required to be ſupplied by a proportionable income, which Charles was by no means maſter of; he therefore referred it to Mr. Noy, attorney-general, to find out the ways and means; and Noy fell upon an expedient for raiſing an extraordinary ſupply, without the aſſiſtance of a parliament; which was, by the impoſition of a tax upon the people, for furniſhing a certain number of ſhips, for the defence of the ſeas. Noy died before the effects of his projects were known, after having engaged his maſter in an affair, which made him loſe his people's confidence, and was one of the principal cauſes of his ruin.

The death of the attorney-general did not, however, hinder the king from putting his ſcheme in practice: to that end, writs were iſſued in October, this year, to all the port-towns and maritime counties of the kingdom, to furniſh a certain number of ſhips, manned, victualled, and furniſhed with all neceſſary ammunition, for the defence of the realm. With theſe writs went inſtructions and directions, from the lords of the council, for the aſſeſſing and levying the ſhip-money. Theſe inſtructions were directed to the ſheriffs of the ſeveral counties; and by them it appears, that the ſhips aſſeſſed on the counties of Middleſex and Hertford were to coſt three thouſand pounds; and thoſe who refuſed payment of their portion, were to be diſtreſſed, and their goods ſold for the payment; and this without any reſpect of perſons. The reſt of thoſe inſtructions contain only the particular manner of levying the tax, and gave very arbitrary powers to the officers of the peace. The writ being ſerved on the lord-mayor of London, he immediately called a common-council, who voted the following petition to be preſented to the king.

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

"The humble petition of your faithful ſubjects, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, of your city of London, moſt humbly ſhewing,

"That whereas your writ, bearing teſte 20 Octobris laſt, commanded your petitioners, at their charge, to provide ſeven ſhips of war, furniſhed with men, victuals, and all warlike proviſions, to be at Portſmouth the firſt of March next, and continue thence by the ſpace of twenty-ſix weeks in your majeſty's ſervice, upon the defence of the ſeas, and other cauſes in the ſaid writ mentioned.

"Your petitioners do, in all ſubmiſſive humbleneſs, and with acknowledgments of your ſacred majeſty's favours unto our ſaid city, inform your majeſty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliaments (which they are ready humbly to ſhew forth) they are exempt, and uſed to be freed from that charge.

"And do moſt humbly pray,

"That your majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed, that the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the ſame privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing the ſaid ſhips and proviſions.

"And they ſhall pray, &c."

Notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the city of London, Charles went on as if ſhip-money had been a matter of courſe, and not likely to give any diſguſt; and, his neceſſities increaſing, he reſolved that this tax ſhould be extended to the inland, as well as the maritime, counties; but ſo great was the diſlike that the nation ſhewed to this meaſure, which they thought to be againſt law, and a direct contradiction, on the part of Charles, of the Petition of Right he had granted in their favour, that the court thought itſelf under a neceſſity to quiet the people, by the uſe made of the money; for, in May of the following year, 1635, a fleet of forty ſail was fitted out, under the command of the earl of Lindſey, admiral; ſir William Monſon, vice-admiral; ſir John Pennington, rear admiral: and a ſquadron of twenty ſhips was fitted out, under the earl of Eſſex. The admiral's inſtructions were to ſecure the Narrow ſeas, and the trade of England; and, on the twenty-ſixth of May, the fleet ſet ſail, in queſt of the French and Dutch fleets, who were joined off Portland, as if they would have fought the Engliſh fleets: but Richelieu was too well informed by his ſpies, not to know that the real deſign of Charles was to drive the confederates out of the Narrow ſeas, and to deſtroy the growing marine of France, whom he conſidered as the prompter of the Dutch in all their inſolencies: he looked upon the preſervation of the ſea-ports in Flanders to the crown of Spain, as being now of importance to his own crown; and his people likewiſe began to be extremely uneaſy at Richelieu's ambition. The united fleets, at the approach of that of England, withdrew towards their own harbours; and the Engliſh admiral ſent after them a bark, on the coaſt of Brittany, to obſerve their motions; which were all this year ſo pacific, that the Engliſh remained indiſputed maſters of the Narrow ſeas, to the infinite benefit of the nation. For the court of Spain reverted now to its natural connexions with England, who this year had, in all probability, ſaved the Auſtrian Netherlands from being over-run; and the immenſe benefits which the commons of England received by this friendſhip with Spain, would, if any thing could, have made the people overlook the proceedings of the court in the caſe of ſhip-money

The king finding ſome inconvenience in the management of his treaſury by commiſſions, which he had appointed on the death of the lord treaſurer Weſton, earl of Portland, laſt year, gave the office to Juxton, biſhop of London, a creature of Laud's, who had perſuaded the king, that he could not make a better choice than of that churchman, who having no family to raiſe, nor dependants to provide for, might better manage the income of the treaſury to his advantage than had formerly been done by thoſe who ſought only to create vaſt eſtates to themſelves. We ſhall conclude the tranſactions of this year, with obſerving, that Laud attempted to bring all the foreigners ſettled ſettled in England to a conformity with her church, notwithſtanding all the privileges and indulgences they had received from former princes, and the infinite benefit the nation acquired by their ſet tling here. This attempt was vigorouſly oppoſed by the French and Dutch churches, who were joined by all the puritans; and they refuſed to pay any deference to Laud's authority, on account of the exemptions and privileges they had received from the crown. After many debates, Laud prevailed ſo far, that though the foreigners of the firſt deſcent were ſuffered to continue in their own way, yet, their deſcendants, born in England, of foreign parents, were ordered by the king, to repair to their ſeveral pariſh churches, under the penalty of being proceeded againſt by the eccleſiaſtical laws. In like manner, Laud endeavoured to oblige the factories abroad to conform themſelves to the worſhip and exerciſe of the Engliſh church; but many of the merchants neglecting ſuch conformity, he obtained the king's orders for it.

I ſhall only add, that Charles, prince elector Palatine, ſon of the deceaſed king of Bohemia, came this year into England, to viſit his uncle, and to conſult with him concerning his reſtitution to the Palatinate; and ſhortly after him arrived his brother, prince Rupert, whom, in the courſe of a few years, we ſhall find making a conſiderable figure, in the defence of Charles, againſt his rebellious ſubjects.

The great figure which Charles had made upon the ſeas in the year 1635, raiſed his hopes to a great pitch; and nothing could have defamed him, but his having made ſhip-money a tax aſſeſſible upon the inland, as well as the maritime, counties, and enjoined the collectors to levy it in the ſame manner, and with the ſame rigor, as if it had been a tax impoſed by parliament: however, this expedient had, for the preſent, ſo far ſucceeded, that, in the ſpring of the year 1636, he was enabled to ſend to ſea a fleet of ſixty ſail of large ſhips, which was the greateſt naval force that England had ever ſeen of her own; the command of this fleet was given to Algernoon Piercy, Earl of Northumberland, who, for the great attachment of his anceſtors to the Stuart family, was, by Charles, created lord high-admiral of England. The earl, ſetting ſail in May, came up with ſome of the Dutch ſhips, and ſunk all he met who refuſed to leave the Britiſh coaſts, and to diſcontinue their fiſhing. This ſpirited conduct ſtruck ſuch a terror into all Europe, that even the haughty Richelieu was obliged to drop his ſcheme of ſetting the Dutch and French up as rivals to the Engliſh upon the ſea. The Dutch themſelves applied to Charles in the moſt earneſt manner; and, at laſt, conſented to pay thirty thouſand pounds for licence to fiſh that year, until a proper regulation ſhould be made, by fixing an annual tribute for the like licence for the future.

But no advantages of commerce, reputation, or tranquility, could now make the people digeſt the odious tax of ſhip-money. Charles finding that doubts, difficulties, and dangers, multiplied every day, and was at length become ſo general, that there was an evident diſpoſition in the nation, rather to ſubmit to the inſults of foreigners, than to chaſtize them at the expence of law and liberty; he endeavoured to remove all manner of objections, by getting the deciſion of the judges on his ſide; he therefore ſent the caſe to be reſolved by them, which he thus ſtated:

"Carolus Rex.

"Where the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, whether may not the king, by writ under the great-ſeal of England, command all the ſubjects of our kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furniſh ſuch a number of ſhips, with men, victuals, and munition, and for ſuch a time as we ſhall think fit, for the defence and ſafeguard of the kingdom, from ſuch danger and peril, and by law compel the doing thereof, in caſe of refuſal or refractorineſs; and whether, in ſuch a caſe, the king is not the ſole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the ſame is to be prevented and avoided?"

To which they returned the following opinion.

"May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty.

"We have, according to your majeſty's command, every man by himſelf, and all of us together, taken into ſerious conſideration the caſe and queſtion ſignified by your majeſty, and incloſed in your royal letter; and we are of opinion, that when the good and ſafety of the kingdom is in danger, your majeſty may, by writ under the great-ſeal of England, command all your ſubjects of this your kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furniſh ſuch a number ſhips, with men, victuals, and munition, and for ſuch a time that your majeſty ſhall think fit, for the trafic, defence, and ſafeguard of this kingdom from ſuch danger and peril; and that by law your majeſty may compel the doing thereof, in caſe of refuſal or refractorineſs; and we are all of opinion, that in ſuch caſe, your majeſty is the ſole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the ſame is to be prevented and avoided.

This deciſion Charles took eſpecial care to have publiſhed and circulated through the kingdom. Notwithſtanding this opinion, one Mr. Hampden, being taxed in twenty ſhillings, for an eſtate he had in Buckinghamſhire, reſolved to ſtand ſuit rather than comply with an impoſition ſo contrary to the laws of the realm and the liberties of the ſubject. The cauſe was pleaded in the court of Exchequer, before all the judges, with great ſolemnity; and was, undoubtedly, the moſt important diſpute that ever was handled in any court of juſtice; for the buſineſs was to aſcertain or deſtroy one of the moſt valuable privileges of the ſubject; as ſuch it was conſidered by every ſenſible individual of the nation; it became the univerſal topic of converſation, and people expected the iſſue with the moſt anxious impatience. After ſeveral hearings, protracted from November till June, the judges decreed that Mr. Hampden ſhould pay the tax; and the whole kingdom was filled with indignation. Burton, a divine, and Baſtwick, a phyſician, were condemned by the Star-chamber to the ſame puniſhment which Prynne had undergone, for having publiſhed ſeditious and ſchiſmatical libels: and Prynne himſelf, for a ſecond offence, was ſentenced to pay a fine of five thouſand pounds, and loſe the mutilated remainder of his ears *.

While the intereſting affair of Mr. Hampden and ſhip-money was depending, the public uneaſineſs was farther encreaſed by a torrent of diviſions in the church of Scotland.

Charles reſolved to perfect his deſigns with reſpect to religion as well as the ſtate; epiſcopacy had not been aboliſhed in Scotland at the time of the reformation before Mary Stuart, but the proteſtant biſhops had always been kept in ſubjection by the preſbyterians. The Scots were governed by a kind of republic of prieſts, who were all upon an equality with one another: this was the only country, perhaps, in the world, where riches and honours did not make the higher clergy powerful. The biſhops retained their ſeats in parliament, their honorary rights, and the revenues of their ſees; but they were paſtors without flocks, and peers without credit. The Scottiſh parliament, which was wholly compoſed of preſbyterians, only ſuffered the biſhops to retain their dignity, in order to debaſe them. The ancient abbyes were all in the hands of ſeculars, who had ſeats in parliament in virtue of the title of abbot. By degrees, the number of theſe titular abbots was diminiſhed. James I. (and VIth of Scotland), reſtored epiſcopacy, with all its privileges. The king of England was not acknowle ged as head of the church of Scotland; but being born in that country, and having laviſhed Engliſh money in penſions and places to ſeveral of its members, he was more maſter at Edinburgh than at London. The preſbyterian (or, as it is called, the general) aſſembly, ſtill ſubſiſted as before, notwithſtanding the reſtoration of epiſcopacy; theſe two different bodies were always threatening each other; and the ſynodic republic generally got the better of the epiſcopal hierarchy. James, who looked upon the biſhops as a body devoted to the crown, and the preſbyterians as enemies to the regal prerogative, thought that he ſhould be able to reconcile his Scottiſh ſubjects to epiſcopal government, by bringing their church to a perfect conformity with the Engliſh. With this view he had, in the year 1616, obtained an act of the general aſſembly, for the compiling a liturgy, or book of common-prayer, which was to be firſt preſented to the king, and, after his approbation, univerſally received through the kingdom. This book was accordingly framed, and ſent up to the king; who having peruſed and conſiderably altered it, in conjunction with his Engliſh clergy, it was returned to Scotland, to be recommended to the uſe of that church. His death prevented the accompliſhment of his deſign, which his ſon reſumed; and in order to effect this purpoſe with greater eaſe, he endeavoured to encreaſe the authority of the prelates, and had even made an attempt to revive the firſt inſtitution of the college of juſtice, that divided equally between the clergy and laity the whole judicial authority.

The liturgy which Charles, of his own authority, intended to introduce into Scotland, was copied from that of England; but, not to ſhock the pride of his ancient ſubjects by a ſervile imitation of their ſouthern neighbours, he cauſed a few alterations to be made in it, by the aſſiſtance of archbiſhop Laud and others, and in that form tranſmitted it to the biſhop of Edinburgh, with orders to begin the uſe of it. Eaſter-day, 1637, was by proclamation, appointed for the firſt reading of the ſervice; but, in order to ſound the diſpoſitions of the people, the council poſtponed the matter till the twenty-third day of July, and they even gave notice the Sunday before of their deſign to commence the uſe of the new liturgy. As this intimation had been received quietly, they imagined that they might ſafely proceed in their purpoſe, and accordingly, in the cathedral church of St. Giles, the dean of Edinburgh, arrayed in his ſurplice, began the ſervice; both archbiſhops, many of the privy-council, and others of the beſt quality in Edinburgh, being preſent.

But no ſooner had the dean opened the book, than a number of the meaner ſort, with clapping their hands and outcries, made a great uproar; and one of them, called Jane or Jannot Gaddis, flung a little folding ſtool, whereon ſhe had ſat, at the dean's head, ſaying, "Out, thou falſe thief! doſt thou ſay the maſs at my lug!" which was followed with ſo great a noiſe and confuſion, that none could hear or be heard; whereupon the biſhop of Edinburgh ſtept into the pulpit, and, hoping to appeaſe the people, by putting them in mind that the place in which they were was holy ground, and by intreating them to deſiſt from the profanation of it, they were the more enraged, throwing at him cudgels, ſtools, and what elſe was at hand, even to the endangering his life. Upon this the biſhop of St. Andrew's, the chancellor, called down the provoſt and bailiffs of the city from their ſeats to their aſſiſtance, who (not without ſome difficulty) put the unruly people out of the church, and made faſt the doors. This done, the dean proceeded to read the liturgy, the multitude the mean while rapping and pelting the windows with ſtones, to diſturb the ſervice; but, notwithſtanding all their clamour the ſervice was ended; though not the people's rage, who waiting the biſhop's retiring to his lodging, ſo aſſaulted him, as (had he not been reſcued by a ſtrong hand) he had probably periſhed by their violence.

The ſame morning the ſervice-book was read in the next church to St. Giles's, though not without noiſe and tumult, yet not ſo great as in the latter: in the Gray Friars church, Mr. Ramſey refuſed to read it, and was afterwards ſuſpended for the ſame; but the elect biſhop of Argyll, his colleague began to read it, but was ſo menaced, curſed, and exclaimed againſt, that he was forced to give over.

In the college-church of Rollock, one of the preachers, who the Sunday before, at the intimation of the reading, had much commended the book, and undertaken this day to read it, upon notice how it was received at the church of St. Giles, broke the promiſe he had made to read it, chuſing rather to incur the cenſure of thoſe of his fraternity, than to offend the multitude, whoſe favour he ſought: but he was likewiſe ſuſpended. The morning this paſſed, the council aſſembled at the lord-chancellor's lodgings, and ſent for the provoſt and bailiffs, to adviſe with them how to prevent the like tumults in the afternoon; which they promiſed to endeavour, and was ſo effected that the book was read in the church of St. Giles, and ſome other churches, without any ſuch diſturbance as it had in the morning; only the biſhop of Edinburgh, in his return to his lodging, was rudely treated by the populace.

No perſon of any rank was concerned in theſe violent proceedings, and every one affected to condemn the licentiouſneſs of the giddy multitude: it was judged imprudent, however, to hazard a new inſult, by any freſh attempt to read this liturgy, and the populace ſeemed for the preſent to be perfectly ſatisfied; but when it was known that the king, notwithſtanding repreſentations made to him on this head, ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution of eſtabliſhing that worſhip, men began to contract a more inveterate prejudice againſt it; and the concourſe of all ranks of people to Edinburgh on the firſt of October (the day on which the term begins there) was ſo great, that the council began to fear another riot, and publiſhed proclamations, ſignifying that the council ſhould be transferred to Dundee; commanding all ſtrangers to quit the city; and prohibiting a book, written againſt the Engliſh and popiſh ceremonies impoſed upon the church of Scotland. Theſe proclamations rather fomented than allayed the flame then begun; and the day after their publication, October 18, the populace broke out into the moſt violent diſorder: they aſſaulted the biſhop of Galloway, the earl of Traquair, lord high-treaſurer, in the ſtreets, and chaſed them into the chamber where the privy-council were ſitting, and attacked the council itſelf: they treated the town-council in the ſame manner; and had it not been for the interpoſition of ſome popular lords, who had great influence with them, they would probably have proceeded to acts of the moſt deſperate outrage. In this ſedition the actors were of ſome better condition than in the former; though no perſon of rank ſeemed, as yet, to countenance them. Nevertheleſs the ſpirit of the people appeared ſo alarming, that the earl of Traquair repaired to London, in order to acquaint the king more fully of the matter: but Charles, liſtening only to the counſels of Laud, a man who ſeemed born for his deſtruction, reſolved to carry every thing with a high hand, and to puniſh ſeverely the authors of the late tumults, and ordered the earl of Traquair, on his return to Scotland, to publiſh a proclamation "declaring his abhorrence of popiſh ſuperſtition, and his intention to introduce nothing but what ſhould tend to the advancement of religion in the kingdom of Scotland." He afterwards ſent another to the council, which had been removed to Stirling, ſignifying his being willing to pardon the crime which the people had committed, in aſſembling, compoſing, ſigning, and preſenting ſuch petitions to the chancellor, provided they would return to their own houſes, and live for the future as good and faithful ſubjects. He forbad them to aſſemble again, on pain of treaſon; ordered that no perſon ſhould preſume to approach Stirling without permiſſion; and commanded all the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, not belonging to the council, or courts of juſtice, to quit that town in ſix hours; otherwiſe they ſhould be declared traitors.

In the mean while the council had removed to Stirling, at a greater diſtance from Edinburgh.

Immediately after the publication of the proclamation, the earl of Hume and the lord Lindſey, accompanied by many other noblemen and a great concourſe of people, repaired to the market-croſs (of Stirling), and, without regarding the preſence and authority of the council, read publicly a proteſt, importing, "that they inſiſted upon preſenting their grievances to the king: that they would not ſubmit to the biſhops or judges, until they ſhould have acquitted themſelves of the crimes laid to their charge: that no proclamation, or act of council, reſolved upon in preſence of thoſe prelates, ſhould prejudice the proteſtors: that none of their aſſociates ſhould be expoſed to any dangers in their lives and fortunes, nor incur any penalty, civil or eccleſiaſtical, for having refuſed to acquieſce in the ſaid acts, books, canons, rites, juriſdictions, and proclamations, compoſed and publiſhed contrary to the decrees of the general aſſembly, or againſt the laws of the realm: that in caſe this diſpute ſhould occaſion any diſorder, it ſhould not be imputed to them, inaſmuch as the council refuſed to receive a remonſtrance and declinatory, which they had lately preſented: and that their petitions tended to nothing but the maintenance of the true religion in Scotland and to the honour of his majeſty." The ſame proteſt was read at Linlithgow and Edinburgh.

This was the firſt time that the men of quality had appeared to countenance the proceedings of the people; but the ſpirit of diſcontent, which had been gradually ſpreading among all ranks of men, now blazed out at once, and the authority of the king and council were treated with equal contempt; for the next ſtep of theſe mutineers was to eſtabliſh four tables, as they called them, at Edinburgh; one was compoſed of nobility, another of gentry, a third of miniſters, and a fourth of burgeſſes: the table of gentry conſiſted of ſeveral ſubordinate tables, according to their different counties; orders were iſſued by them, and every where executed with the moſt implicit obedience. Among the very firſt acts of this new-fangled inſtitution was the Solemn League and Covenant, as if all laws, divine and human, were about to be aboliſhed; and thus the natural deſire of the great to ſupport their own ſchemes on one ſide, and the fury of popular oppoſition on the other, lighted up the flames of civil war, which ſoon after deſolated this wretched iſland.

The Solemn League and Covenant was no ſooner publiſhed, than the people ran in crowds to ſubſcribe it, and it was ſigned by almoſt all the perſons of conſequence in the kingdom, except the privy-counſellors, the judges, the biſhops, and thoſe who enjoyed places under the crown. There was prefixed to it the confeſſion of faith of the kirk of Scotland, which had been ſigned by the late king James and his houſhold, when he was about fourteen years of age, and had been renewed ten years afterwards: then, after a long recital of the acts of parliament, and a great deal of jargon againſt popery, and in praiſe of preſbyterian purity and of proteſtant perſecution on religious accounts, this inſtrument mentions the coronation-oath, which obliges the king "carefully to root out of his empire all heretics and enemies to the true worſhip of God, who ſhall be convicted by the true ſpirit of God of the aforeſaid crimes:" and then it declares the true worſhip of God and the regal authority to be ſo ſtrongly joined, as that they had the ſame common enemies, and did ſtand and fall together. The aſſociates then proceeded to declare, but in general terms, againſt all innovations in religion that had been introduced ſince the eſtabliſhment of preſbytery in that country; but without taking notice that the chief of thoſe innovations had as much ſanction, both from eccleſiaſtical and civil authority, as that eſtabliſhment had, if not more. They then proceeded as follows to the material part of this aſſociation "We promiſe and ſwear, by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profeſſion and obedience of the foreſaid religion; that we ſhall defend the ſame, and reſiſt all thoſe contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the utmoſt of that power which God hath put in our hands, all the days of our life. And in like manner, with the ſame heart, we declare before God and men, that we have no intention nor deſire to attempt any thing that may turn to the diſhonour of God, or to the diminution of the king's greatneſs and authority; but, on the contrary, we promiſe and ſwear that we ſhall, to the uttermoſt of our power, with our means and lives, ſtand to the defence of our dread ſovereign the king's majeſty's perſon and authority, in the defence and preſervation of the foreſaid true religion, liberties, and laws of the kingdom; as alſo to the mutual defence and aſſiſtance of every one of us of another, in the ſame cauſe of maintaining true religion and his majeſty's authority with our beſt counſel, bodies, means, and whole power, againſt all ſorts of perſons whatſoever; ſo that whatſoever ſhall be done to the leaſt of us for that cauſe, ſhall be taken as done to us all in general, and every one of us in particular: and that we ſhall not directly or indirectly ſuffer ourſelves to be divided or withdrawn, with whatſoever ſuggeſtion, combination, allurement, or terror, from this bleſſed and loyal conjunction; nor ſhall caſt in any lett or impediment that may ſtay or hinder any ſuch reſolution, as by common conſent ſhall be found to conduce for ſome good ends: but, on the contrary ſhall, by all lawful means, labour to further and promote the ſame. And if any ſuch dangerous and deluſive motion ſhall be made to us, by word or writ, we, and every one of us, ſhall either ſuppreſs it, or, if need be, ſhall incontinent make the ſame known, that it may be timeouſly obviated. Neither do we fear the foul aſperſions of rebellion, combination, or what elſe our adverſaries, from their own craft and malice, would put upon us, ſeeing what we do is ſo well warranted, and ariſeth from an unfeigned deſire to maintain the true worſhip of God, the majeſty of our king, and the peace of the kingdom, for the common happineſs of ourſelves and poſterity."

I thought it indiſpenſably neceſſary to give the reader ſome idea of this famous Solemn League and Covenant, which was ſo much extolled by its admirers, and decried by its oppoſers. Some writers have been pleaſed to repreſent it as a juſtifiable national effort, in defence of religion, and liberty; as the eſtabliſhment of epiſcopal authority in Scotland had, according to them, been impoſed by arbitrary power, the recognition of the people obtained by compulſion, in diametrical oppoſition to the ſenſe of the nation: but, by the favour of theſe gentlemen, the civil liberties of the Scots had, ſo far as can be found by records, never been attacked by power; nor had prerogative (as in England) encroached upon the privileges handed down to them by their anceſtors. The ſtory of this famous Covenant lay in a kind of latent defeaſance to the royal authority, when not employed in defence and propagation of what they called, or fancied, the true religion; the king muſt not only comply with all the abſurdities of the aſſociators, but he muſt draw the ſword againſt every man who ſhould preſume to differ from them in point of religion. This was a matter ſo endleſs, that it is plain the Covenant, conſidered as an act of the people, independent of the royal authority, was calculated for a pretext to withdraw their obedience from lawful government, by giving them the power to preſcribe their own terms for their return to it: nor can I apprehend the reproach or cenſure of men of candor and enlightened underſtanding, in declaring it as my opinion, that it was as daring an inſult as ever was offered to a king, and as rebellious a meaſure as ever was formed by a people. But to return from this digreſſion, which I hope the reader will the more readily pardon, as it is meant to remove the miſt of prejudice, aud weaken the power of ſounds, which are too often found to captivate the vulgar and unwary.

It was not then known who fomented the diſturbances in Scotland, that prepared the way for the tragical end of Charles I. It was cardinal Richelieu, the moſt daring and moſt inſolent miniſter that perhaps ever appeared in Europe. He had formed connexions with the prince of Orange and the States General for reducing the houſe of Auſtria; but deſpairing of ſucceſs, unleſs he could prevail on Charles to ſtand neutral, he ſent the count d'Eſtrades to England, the laſt year, to offer Charles his own terms, if he would engage in the intereſts of France; but having received a refuſal from that monarch, rather more haughty than politic, it had exaſperated him. There is a letter of the cardinal to d'Eſtrades (dated December 2, 1637,) in which are theſe remarkable words: "before the end of twelve months, the king and queen of England ſhall repent their having refuſed the offers you made them from his majeſty, and ſhall ſoon know that I am not deſpicable." He had a prieſt, one Chambers by name, and by birth a Scotchman, who was his almoner; this man he ſent to London and Edinburgh, in order to ſtir up a ſpirit of diſcontent among the preſbyterians, partly by his rhetoric, and partly by the proper application of certain ſums of money: all which is inconteſtably proved by the above letter.

It was now the year 1638. The king began to be apprehenſive for the conſequences of the commotions in Scotland; he therefore ſent the marquis of Hamilton as his high-commiſſioner, and empowered him to treat with the covenaters, and offered them, in his name, a ſuſpenſion of the canons and the liturgy, until they could be introduced in a fair and legal manner. Nothing is ſo deſpicable as a hated government when it becomes impotent: the covenanters, now ſixty thouſand ſtrong, knew that Charles poſſeſſed no regular forces in either of his kingdoms; and therefore, when Hamilton propoſed their renouncing and aboliſhing the Covenant, as a rebellious and undutiful aſſociation againſt their ſovereign, they plainly told him, that "they could not acknowlege that they had ever departed from their obedience; and for their Covenant, they would rather renounce their baptiſm than abate one ſyllable thereof." Hamilton, finding all his endeavours to re-eſtabliſh quiet ineffectual, effectual, returned to London, made another journey to Edinburgh, returned again to London, and was immediately ſent back with ſtill more ſatisfactory orders, importing, "that the king revoked the Liturgy, the Book of Canons, the High Commiſſion, and the Five Articles of Perth; that, for the future the biſhops ſhould be cenſurable by the general aſſembly; that all ſubjects of Scotland ſhould ſubſcribe the confeſſion of faith, with an oath annexed, very different from that of the Covenant." Then he convoked a general aſſembly at Glaſgow, for the month of November; and a parliament at Edinburgh, to meet in May of the following year. The tables proteſted againſt the proclamation, becauſe the new oath, obliging them to maintain the religion at preſent profeſſed, would operate in favour of the innovations which had been confirmed by acts of parliament. An accuſation ſigned by a great number of noblemen, gentlemen, miniſters, and burghers, was preſented by the preſbytery of Edinburgh againſt the biſhops, alleging, "that they had not adhered to the conditions on which the general aſſembly at Montroſe, in the preceding reign conſented to their being admitted to parliament." By theſe they were obliged only to act as deputies of the church; to propoſe nothing without expreſs orders of the church: to conſent to nothing but what ſhould be to the advantage of the church, on pain of deprivation; and to be accountable to the general aſſembly for their conduct in parliament. When the day of meeting arrived, the commiſſioner plainly perceived that the lay intereſt predominated in the aſſembly, in the number of elders that were returned; and all that he could do for the ſervice of the king, was to encourage and promote diſputes, that would furniſh him with a pretence to diſſolve them. The biſhops preſented a declinatory, pronouncing the aſſembly null; and the commiſſioner entered a number of proteſts againſt their proceedings: at length, finding them determined to ſit in judgment upon the biſhops, he on the ſeventh day of their ſeſſion, diſſolved the aſſembly as illegal, "becauſe they had not introduced lay elders to vote in their deliberations; becauſe the members had been choſen by lay elders, contrary to cuſtom; becauſe thoſe few members to whom the tables were averſe, had been rejected, without reaſon; and the biſhops were in danger of being tried by thoſe who were their profeſſed enemies." Notwithſtanding this ſentence of diſſolution, the aſſembly of Glaſgow continued itſelf by virtue of its own authority, and paſſed acts, by which they not only condemned the liturgy, canons, and high-commiſſion, excommunicated fourteen biſhops, and abjured epiſcopal government; but they likewiſe preſumed to reverſe divers acts of parliament in favour of epiſcopacy, and to annul the ſubſcription of thoſe who had ſigned the confeſſion of faith, according to the king's order; nay, they even explained that confeſſion as virtually implying an abolition of epiſcopacy. The commiſſioner publiſhed another explanation, to prove that epiſcopacy did ſubſiſt, and that every perſon who ſigned the commiſſion was bound to ſupport it: and this again was anſwered by the aſſembly. In a word, the whole fabrick, which Charles and James, in a long courſe of years, had been rearing with ſo much care and induſtry, was at once thrown to the ground; the Covenant was alſo ordered to be ſubſcribed by every one, under pain of excommunication.

The marquis ſeeing all things tending to a preſent ruptute, ſent to deſire leave of the king to return to England, which he obtained: but before he went he ſaw an end to the Glaſgow aſſembly, which broke up after having, by their own authority, ordained annual aſſemblies, the firſt whereof was appointed to meet at Edinburgh, the firſt day of July in the following year. As ſoon the marquis was gone the aſſociators drew up a declaration, addreſſed to all good Chriſtians of England, to juſtify their intentions and actions, which had ſo many undutiful expreſſions in it, that it was ſuppreſſed by the king's authority, who publiſhed a declaration to ſatisfy his faithful ſubjects of the ſeditious practices of thoſe in Scotland who had, under pretext of religion, deſigned the ſubverſion of his royal authority; which was commanded to be read in all churches.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Scotland at the end of the year 1638. As to the tranſactions in England, they are hardly worth mention, but ſo far as they relate to Scotland.

On the laſt of October this year, Mary de Medicis, widow of Henry IV. of France, and mother to the reigning monarch, Lewis XIII. having, by the cabals of cardinal Richelieu, the prime miniſter, been driven out of France, came into England, where ſhe met with a noble reception from Charles and his queen. While ſhe ſtaid here, ſhe was lodged in the king's palace of St. James's; but finding the king likely to be involved in great trouble to reduce his rebellious ſubjects in Scotland, after ſome months ſtay ſhe departed for Holland.

Laud this year commenced a proſecution againſt Williams, biſhop of Lincoln, late lord-keeper, to whom he was an implacable enemy; and, upon the ſhameful pretence of his having concealed a letter written to him by one Mr. Oſbaldiſton, in which mention was made of a "little urchin" and "a great man" which Laud interpreted to have been himſelf, was fined eight thouſand pounds for receiving libellous letters: and Oſbaldiſton, who was maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool, by flight eſcaped his cenſure, which was, to have his ears nailed to the pillory, before his own ſchool, and to be deprived of all his preferments, and fined five thouſand pounds to the king. This unjuſtifiable ſeverity ſwelled the load of popular clamour againſt Laud.

The laws of hiſtorical truth will not permit me to conceal, that Charles appears to have no great ſincerity in the conceſſion he had made to the Covenanters; and that he waited only for a fair opportunity to retract them. He had, for ſome months, by Hamilton's advice, been making warlike preparations, though with infinite caution and ſecrecy. When we conſider the intriguing genius of rebellion, and that Charles had commiſſioned his arms and ammunition from Holland, we can ſcarcely ſuppoſe the heads of the Covenanters not to have received, both from France and England, information of Charles's deſigns: this may account for their proceedings during the latter part of the preceding year, and the beginning of 1639, when they began to make vigorous preparations for war on their ſide. They ſent for ſuccours to ſuch of the neighbouring princes and ſtates from whom they could expect any aſ-

ſtance. They alſo invited home many eminent commanders of their nation from Sweden and Holland, to take employment in their armies; many of whom, at the beginning of the year came to them: they ſeized upon the caſtles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton, and all other places of ſtrength in the kingdom; and took out of Dalkeith all the king's arms and ammunition, laid up there the year before by the marquis of Hamilton. Next they choſe Alexander Leſly, an old experienced officer, to be captain-general of their armies, to whom all the chief of the confederates (who took arms) ſolemnly ſwore obedience in all orders of war; and he ſwore in like manner faithfully to exerciſe his charge. The marquis of Argyll was ſent to take care of the frontiers oppoſite to Ireland; the earl of Montroſe had the charge of Aberdeen and the moſt northern parts; and colonel Monro was ſent towards the Borders of England, to keep all things quiet till the levies were perfected.

When Charles found that his deſigns were diſcovered, and had received the copy of their laſt declaration, he loſt all patience, and formed a reſolution of proceeding openly in the way of arms, and on the twenty-ſixth of January, 1639, a writ was ſent to the nobility to attend the royal ſtandard at York. On this occaſion the king had recourſe to the Engliſh clergy, and even to the catholics of the kingdom, who equally hated the preſbyterians, and only furniſhed the king with money, becauſe they looked upon this as a religious war. The Engliſh nobility in general ſhewed great alacrity for his ſervice; and thoſe who ſecretly wiſhed well to the Covenanters were obliged to diſſemble, and vie with the others in forwardneſs; but nothing could exceed the generoſity and loyalty of thoſe noblemen who compoſed the king's privy-council, who, on this occaſion, contributed the greateſt part of their fortunes for their maſter's ſervice. Laud and the marquis of Hamilton ſignalized themſelves particularly by their contributions; and Wentworth, the lord-deputy of Ireland (about the ſame time created earl of Strafford) alone gave twenty-thouſad pounds; he alſo drew down a body of men towards the ſea-coaſts of that kindom, oppoſite to the earl of Argyll's country, who had now joined the Covenanters, and thereby prevented a very dangerous junction between the diſaffected of both kingdoms. Charles himſelf, by regular œconomy, had amaſſed a ſum of two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, which he reſerved for any ſudden emergency; and by all theſe means he was enabled to equip a very conſiderable fleet and army: the former conſiſted of ſixteen large ſhips, was furniſhed with five thouſand land forces, and was commanded by the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to ſail to the Firth of Forth, and to make a diverſion in the forces of the enemy.

The army amounted to about twenty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, and was conducted by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but diſtinguiſhed neither for his military nor political abilities; the earl of Eſſex, a man of ſtrict honour, and extremely beloved by the ſoldiers, acted as lieutenant-general; and the earl of Holland was general of the horſe.

The king himſelf repaired to the camp, and ſummoned all the noblemen of England to attend him. The whole had rather the appearance of a ſplendid court than a military armament; and in this ſituation, carrying more ſhow than real force with it, the army arrived at Berwick on the twenty-eighth of May, with the king at its head, and there encamped. The Scottiſh army, which was nearly equal in number to that of the king, marched, at the ſame time, under general Leſly, towards the borders of England, and encamped within four miles of Berwick.

The king had, in the beginning of this year, ſet forth a declaration, containing his reaſons for this expedition, in which he diſplayed the inſolent treatment he had met with from the Covenanters, and his own readineſs to heal the diſorders of the ſtate, in ſuch terms, that it had a wonderful effect in his favour in Scotland. The marquis of Huntley declared for him, and this was no ſmall acceſſion of ſtrength, for Huntley had a large eſtate, but a much larger following; and was looked upon to be the only nobleman who could balance the numbers which Argyll could bring into the field. But, to the inexpreſſible misfortune of Charles's affairs, this nobleman was at this time, when he was moſt wanted, taken from his ſovereign; for the marquis of Montroſe, having enticed him to a conference, and poſitively refuſing to ſign the Covenant, he and his eldeſt ſon were ſent priſoners to the caſtle of Edinburgh. This unlucky accident was generally attributed to Hamilton, who having ſecured Holy Iſland to the king's obedience, had entered the Forth, and publiſhed a proclamation from Charles, offering pardon to the rebels who ſhould lay down their arms, but with orders to proſecute all others with fire and ſword. Hamilton continued a ſhameful inactivity; and, while in Holy Iſland, he received a viſit from his mother, a moſt rigid Covenanter. This, with the general tenor of his conduct, made many of the king's friends ſuſpect his integrity; and the Scots themſelves were commonly heard to ſay, "they knew the ſon of ſuch a mother would not do them hurt."

The troops under Leſly were but ill armed, for they had not three thouſand muſquets amongſt them all; ſo that, notwithſtanding their vapouring, they were much better prepared for a treaty than a battle. But their countrymen about the king's perſon and in his army, moſt infamouſly betrayed him, by magnifying the ſtrength of the rebels, and at the ſame time giving them intelligence of every thing that was tranſacted between Charles and his council; and the king ſeeing his noblemen and followers as generally averſe to the proſecution of the war, expreſſed his wiſhes for an opportunity to terminate it without bloodſhed. The Covenanters, apprized of his inclinations, wrote in a very humble ſtrain to the earls of Arundel, Eſſex, and Holland, imploring their good offices with his majeſty, and proteſting that nothing was farther from their thoughts than any deſign to invade England. Eſſex, who both hated and deſpiſed the Scots, would not deign to anſwer their letter, which he ſent to the king: but the other two noblemen were differently affected; they thought the Covenanters had reaſon on their ſide, and turned their thoughts towards a pacification. When thoſe letters had produced their effect, the lord Dumfermling arrived from the Scottiſh camp with a trumpet, and preſented to the king an humble application, beſeeching his majeſty to appoint commiſſioners for a treaty. Charles deſired that the laſt proclamation he ſent to Edinburgh ſhould be read in the Scottiſh army; general Leſly complied with this requeſt; and then he appointed ſix commiſſioners to treat with the inſurgents. The conferences ſoon produced the following convention for peace, which was ſigned on the ſeventeenth of June.

"I. The forces of Scotland to be diſbanded and diſſolved within twenty-four hours after the agreement of the king's declaration.

"II. The king's caſtles, forts, and ammunition, to be delivered up, after the ſaid publication, ſo ſoon as he ſhall ſend to receive them.

"III. His ſhips to depart preſently after the delivery of the caſtles; and in the mean time no interruption of trade.

"IV. All perſons goods and ſhips detained by the king ſince the firſt of November, to be reſtored."

"V. No meetings, treatings, conſultations, or convocations, of any of the Scots, but ſuch as are warranted by act of parliament.

"VI. All fortifications to deſiſt, and to be remitted to the king's pleaſure.

"VII. To reſtore to every one therein, liberties, lands, houſes, goods, and means whatſoever, taken and detained from them by whatſoever means, ſince the firſt of November laſt."

The next day the king, on his part, ſigned a declaration, in which he was pleaſed to confirm all that had been granted by the marquis of Hamilton, and "that all matters eccleſiaſtical ſhall be determined by the aſſemblies of the kirk, and matters civil by the parliament, and other inferior judicatories eſtabliſhed by law; which aſſemblies ſhall be kept once a year, or as ſhall be agreed upon by the general aſſembly, and our commiſſioner for the time being."

"That a free and general aſſembly be kept at Edinburgh the ſixth day of Auguſt next, where we intend (God willing) to be perſonally preſent; and thereafter a parliament the twentieth of Auguſt, and there an act of oblivion to be paſſed; and that upon their diſarming and diſbanding of their forces, diſſolving and diſcharging all their pretended tabernacles and conventicles, and reſtoring to the king all his caſtles, forts, and ammunition, as alſo his royal honours; and to every one of his good ſubjects, their liberties, lands, houſes, goods, and means whatſoever, taken and detained ſince the late pretended general aſſembly; the king will, preſently thereafter, recall his fleet, and retire his forces, and cauſe reſtitution of their ſhips and goods, taken ſince the aforeſaid time."

The pacification being thus agreed, the king ſent for ſome of the Scots lords, and informed them, that he had given orders to the marquis of Hamilton to draw off the fleet, and did intend to have been at Edinburgh at the opening of the aſſembly; but that he had received letters from the queen, which intimated a neceſſity of his preſence in London about ſome parliamentary affairs; but he would depute the earl of Traquair, with full power and authority, as his high commiſſioner, to hold the aſſembly and the parliament.

It was generally thought, that the conceſſions made by the king would have brought the male-contents to a perfect ſubmiſſion, but they ſoon appeared to have entertained very different thoughts, and to have entered into treaty only to temporize, and that the overtures they made for a pacification were partly out of deference to their correſpondents in England, and partly with a view to fix the odium of any ſubſequent rupture upon the king and his council, for they did not punctually perform any one article; they diſbanded their troops in ſuch a manner that they could be re-aſſembled with the utmoſt facility and diſpatch. A great part of the walls of the caſtle of Edinburgh being fallen down, and the lord Ruthven, who held that fortreſs for the king, ſetting about to repair the breach, the covenanters would not ſuffer the workmen and materials to enter; at the ſame time that they themſelves went on repairing the ſtrong holds in their hands, continuing their meetings and conſultations, and terrifying or proſecuting all who were not their friends; and, in order to get the populace ſtill more on their ſide, they publiſhed and diſperſed a ſcandalous libel, intitled, "Some conditions of his majeſty's treaty with the ſubjects of Scotland before the Engliſh nobility."

This paper conſiſted of eight heads, which were pretended to be drawn out of notes taken upon the ſeveral diſcourſes held with the king about the ſubject of his declaration: the matter of it was highly ſcandalous, and derogatory to the king's honour; for all the ſubſtance of the royal declaration was thereby altered, and the intention of it perverted. This affair gave Charles great diſquiet; and on the fourth of Auguſt he called a council, in which the paper was read; and the counſellors who had been preſent at the conference upon the treaty, unanimouſly agreed, that the contents of the paper were "notoriouſly falſe, and contrary to what his majeſty clearly expreſſed at the pacification." His majeſty likewiſe declared (as appears by the minutes of the council which were afterwards turned into a proclamation) "That before his coming from Berwick, he ſhewed a copy of this ſcandalous paper to the earl of Lindſey, the earl of Holland, maſter treaſurer, and maſter ſecretary Cook, who fully concurred in the aforeſaid opinion with the lords; all which lords, and particularly the earl of Holland, avowed the falſeneſs thereof before the faces of thoſe Scottiſh lords who were believed to be the divulgers of it (the lords of the council of Scotland being there likewiſe preſent); all which conſidered, the whole board became humble petitioners to his majeſty, that this falſe and ſcandalous paper might be publicly burned by the hangman; and that his majeſty's pleaſure might be publiſhed by proclamation, "that no perſon or perſons hereafter, of what degree or condition ſoever, preſume to keep any copy thereof; but that within five days after the ſaid proclamation publiſhed, every ſuch perſon and perſons ſhall deliver to the next juſtice of the peace, at his or their dwelling, all and every copy and copies thereof; the ſame to be by the ſaid juſtices of peace immediately brought or ſent to one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries, on penalty of incurring the uttermoſt of ſuch puniſhment and penalties as by the law of this realm are to be inflicted upon thoſe that keep ſuch ſcandalous and ſeditious papers."

Upon the ſixth of Auguſt (old ſtile), the general aſſembly met at Edinburgh, according to the royal proclamation, and ſat till the twenty-fourth: the chief matters were, the confirmation of the act of the Glaſgow aſſembly, the aboliſhing of epiſcopacy, the five articles of Perth, the high-commiſſion court, the liturgy, and the book of canons; and it ended with an addreſs of thanks to the king, for his indulgence towards them, in the aſſent of his commiſſioner to their acts; and then another aſſembly was appointed to be held at Aberdeen the next year, in the month of July.

The aſſembly now riſen, the parliament, which had been prorogued from the twentieth to the thirtieth of Auguſt, came together; the firſt four days of its ſeſſion produced a high debate about ſettling their conſtitution, to determine what eſtate ſhould ſupply the order of biſhops, now aboliſhed; which being at laſt agreed, they fell upon other matters and meaſures, tending rather totally to eclipſe the royal power, and new model the government, than to reform abuſes or reſtore the public tranquility; in fine, they were proceeding to the moſt unwarrantable, as well as undutiful, lengths, when Charles ſent orders to Traquair, the high commiſſioner, to interrupt their proceedings, by proroguing them till the ſecond day of June, in the following year; and, ſhould he meet with any oppoſition, to declare thoſe members who ſhould continue ſitting, guilty of high-treaſon. The parliament, upon receiving the order, immediately ſeparated; but not before the members had drawn up a declaration, importing, "That the earl of Traquair and the council had violated the privileges of parliament; that though they had a right to ſit, notwithſtanding the prorogation, they were willing to ſeparate, in order to give the king a proof of their obedience. Nevertheleſs, they left a committee to preſent an humble petition to his majeſty, which was accordingly tranſmitted to London by the earl of Dumfirmling and the lord Loudon, appointed their deputies for that purpoſe; but the king would not favour them with an audience, becauſe they had undertaken their journey without the leave of the high-commiſſioner. After their return to their own country, Traquair being called to court, reported to the council the tranſactions which had paſſed in Scotland; and it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the Scots ſhould be reduced to their duty by force of arms. And thus matters ſtood between the king and that people at the cloſe of the year 1639. Let us now look a little back to the affairs of England.

Charles, prince palatine of the Rhine, arrived at the court of England in July this year, in proſecution of a deſign he had to get the command of the army of Bernard duke of Saxe Weymar, lately dead; which conſiſted of a great number of Swedes, Germans, and other nations: the king approving the deſign, propoſed it to the French ambaſſador, offering that the prince ſhould join in a perpetual league with France, and that he would contribute what he could to his aſſiſtance. The French ambaſſador ſeemed to be very well pleaſed with the offer; and told the king that he doubted not but his maſter would approve of it, and that cardinal Richelieu, the chief miniſter of ſtate, would be willing to ſerve the king and the prince therein; and thereupon he diſpatched a meſſenger to Paris, to acquaint the French king with the matter: but in the mean while it was ſuggeſted to the king, that Richelieu clandeſtinely fomented the troubles in Scotland, whereby the confederate Covenanters had been encouraged to write a letter to that king for aſſiſtance; ſo that the good faith of Richelieu was not to be depended on: wherefore the prince was adviſed to go privately through France to the duke's army; but Richelieu getting intelligence of his being on the way, and deeming this ſecret act a contravention of the treaty then depending, he had the prince arreſted at Lyons, and kept under a ſtrict guard.

In the ſummer of this year, while Charles was ſettling the affairs of Scotland, an accident happened upon the coaſt of England, which is of too great conſequence to be paſſed over in hiſtory, this was a ſea-fight between the two navies of Spain and Holland, in the Downs; which we ſhall inſert in the words of ſir John Pennington, the king's vice-admiral, who has left us the following narrative thereof.

"The Spaniſh Fleet, conſiſting of near ſeventy ſail, bound and deſigned for Dunkirk, in Flanders, with a recruit both of men and money, met with the vice-admiral of the Holland fleet, having in his company ſeventeen ſmall ſhips, September 7, and entered a very fierce diſpute with them, until the Hollander, perceiving himſelf too weak, got to the windward, ſailing alone towards Dunkirk, and continually firing their ordnance, to give warning to their admiral, who lay before that town with the reſidue of the fleet. In the firſt encounter the Hollanders had two ſhips ſunk; and the next morning, by two o'clock, the admiral came up, and joining the vice-admiral between Dover and Calais, they attacked the Spaniards, and continued a very ſharp fight till paſt noon, wherein they had much the better, having taken two galleons, ſunk another, and much ſhattered the reſt; though they were but twenty-five ſail to ſixty and upwards, and at length forced them upon the Engliſh coaſts near Dover, where they left them, and bore off for the coaſt of France, not willing to attempt any thing againſt them within the king of England's liberties.

"The Spaniards being now got, as thought, under the lee of England's protection, began to plot how to get rid of their bad neighbour; and the Spaniſh reſident importuned the king's protection two tides, that in the interim they might have an opportunity for ſlipping away for Spain; but the king being in amity with both nations reſolved to ſtand neuter; and whereas the Spaniards had hired ſome Engliſh ſhips to tranſport their ſoldiers to Dunkirk, the king, upon the complaint of the Dutch ambaſſador, ſtrictly commanded that none ſhould take in any Spaniards, nor paſs beyond Graveſend without licence: but the Spaniards and Hollands, plotting a great while counter the one to the other, the Spaniard at length ſomewhat outwitted his enemy, and, by a ſtratagem, in the night conveyed away fourteen Dunkirk ſhips, having on board four thouſand men.

"In the beginning of October the king ſent the earl of Arundel to the admiral of Spain, don Antonio d'Oquendo, deſiring him to depart by the firſt fair wind, becauſe he would not that they ſhould engage within his ſeas; but the wind continued eaſterly ſo long (a thing not uſual in that ſeaſon) as the Hollanders got daily freſh ſupplies from Zealand, ſo at length their fleet was completed to an hundred ſhips, wherewith they encompaſſed their enemies within piſtol-ſhot, for four days: but that which was ſo long an interview of thoſe two fleets at length turned to an engagement.

"On the eleventh of the ſame month Van Trump, the Dutch admiral, charged the Spaniards with cannon and fireſhips ſo furiouſly, as made them all cut their cables; and being fifty-three in number, twenty-three ran on ſhore and were ſtranded in the Downs, whereof three were burned, two ſunk, and two periſhed on the ſhore; one of theſe was a a great galleon, the vice-admiral of Gallicia, commanded by don Antonio de Caſtro, which mounted fifty-two pieces of braſs ordnance: the remainder of the twenty-three, ſtranded and deſerted by the Spaniards, were manned by the Engliſh, to ſave them from the Dutch. The other thirty Spaniſh ſhips, under the command of the admiral, don Antonio d'Oquendo, and Lopez, admiral of Portugal, put to ſea, and kept in cloſe order till a great fog fell upon them, when the Dutch, taking the advantage thereof, interpoſed between the admirals and their fleets and fought them valiantly till the fog cleared up, when the admiral of Portugal was ſet on fire by two Dutch fire-ſhips; which d'Oquendo perceiving, he preſently took his courſe towards Dunkirk, with the admiral of that place and ſome few ſhips more, for moſt of the reſt were taken; of theſe thirty-two were ſent to Holland, three periſhed on the coaſt of France, one near Dover, five ſunk in their flight, and only ten eſcaped."

Charles did not fail to repreſent this conduct of the Dutch as an inſult upon the Britiſh flag, and made uſe of it as an argument for enforcing the payment of ſhip-money, ſo as to be able to keep a ſufficient fleet at ſea, to curb the inſolence of thoſe republicans: accordingly new writs were iſſued throughout all the counties of England and Wales for collecting this hateful tax. Some time before this the lord-keeper Coventry, having with an unuſual good fortune kept the great-ſeal many years, died in the exerciſe of that high office, upon which the great-ſeal was given to ſir John Finch, chief-juſtice of the Common Pleas, a devoted tool to Laud, by whoſe violent counſels, and that of his faction, Charles was entirely guided, and puſhed on to go forward, through all difficulties, to the eſtabliſhment of prerogative. We now come to the year 1640.

The king having determined upon the war with Scotland, tried every expedient to raiſe a powerful army; but ſoon found that, his Exchequer being exhauſted, and great debts contracted, his ordinary revenues would not be ſufficient to maintain his forces; a parliament therefore, after above eleven years intermiſſion, after trying many irregular expedients, after many and great diſguſts given to the nation by arbitrary impoſitions, muſt now be aſſembled, in order to ſupply the exigences of the crown; and it was reſolved by Laud, Wentworth earl of Stafford (now returned from the government of Ireland), and Hamilton, who were Charles's principal friends and counſellors, to iſſue writs for the great aſſembly of the nation to ſit in the enſuing April. In the mean time the Dutch ſent a ſplendid embaſſy, with excuſes for the late conduct of their fleet on the Britiſh coaſts, and a propoſal of marriage between the prince of Orange and Charles's eldeſt daughter, of which more hereafter. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general of the army deſtined to act againſt Scotland.

The parliament meeting on the twenty-third of April, was opened by a ſpeech from the lord-keeper Finch, to which Charles made a ſhort preface, concerning the neceſſity of their meeting. When Finch had ended his ſpeech, Charles informed them, that ſome time before the earl of Traquair having intercepted a letter wrote to the king of France by the Scottiſh malecontents, had tranſmitted it to him, and that he had thereupon committed to the Tower the lord Loudon, commiſſioner from the Covenanters, one of the perſons who had ſubſcribed the treaſonable letter, which he now produced, hoping thereby to inflame the parliament by the indignity, and alarm them by the danger of this application to a foreign power. This letter, which was indeed a convincing proof that there was nothing too deſperate for the Covenanters to ſtick at, for compaſſing their ends, was conceived in the follow terms;

"Sir,

"Your majeſty being the refuge and ſanctuary of afflicted princes and ſtates, we have found it neceſſary to ſend this gentleman, Mr. Colvil, to repreſent unto your majeſty the candour and ingenuity as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions, which we deſire to be engraven and written in the whole world with a beam of the ſun, as well as to your majeſty. We therefore moſt humbly beſeech you (ſir) to give faith and credit to him, and to all that he ſhall ſay on our part, touching us and our affairs, being moſt aſſured (ſir) of your aſſiſtance equal to your wonted clemency heretofore, and ſo often ſhewed to this nation, which will not yield the glory to any other whatſoever, to be eternally, ſir, your majeſty's moſt obedient and moſt affectionate ſervants,

Rothes, Montroſe, Leſley;
Marr, Montgomery, Loudon, Forreſter."

When the commons returned to their houſe, they choſe ſerjeant Glanville to be their ſpeaker. The arguments of the king and his miniſter to get from them a ſpeedy aid, and adequate to the great projects he had formed of reducing the malecontents of Scotland to a ſtate of perfect ſubmiſſion, made no impreſſion upon them: they knew, from former experience, that Charles would remember his promiſes no longer than he could be compelled by neceſſity, they therefore reſolved to adhere to their old and conſtitutional maxim of redreſſing the grievances of the nation before they ſhould grant a ſupply to the crown. This untoward diſpoſition in the commons was chiefly imputed to the machinations of ſir Henry Vane, who had been made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of old Cooke, who, with many others had been turned out for adviſing the late pacification with the Scots. Vane, it ſeems, bore an inveterate grudge to the earl of Strafford, on whom the king had, at his creation, beſtowed the additional title of baron Raby, to which the former aſpired, as being a manor granted him, together with Barney caſtle, from the crown; and becauſe he ſaw Strafford (at whoſe inſtance the parliament had been principally called) deſirous for the king to gain the affections of the commons, in order to obtain from them the neceſſary ſupplies; he reſolved to exert his utmoſt endeavours to fruſtrate this deſign. He had, in the king's name propoſed to the houſe, that if they would vote twelve ſubſidies, amounting to about ſix hundred thouſand pounds, to be made payable in three years, and paſs it into a law immediately, with a clauſe that it ſhould not determine the ſeſſion, his majeſty would not only abſtain from levying ſhip-money, but even conſent to its being utterly aboliſhed, in any manner they ſhould judge convenient. Vane, inſpiring Charles with an idea of making this propoſal, ſeems to have been perfectly well acquainted with the diſpoſition of the members of the houſe of commons, and how favourable it was to his deſign of embroiling the king with them. This propoſal produced violent debates: the commons thought no argument, more unfavourable, could poſſibly be urged for a ſupply, than an offer to aboliſh ſhip-money; a taxation the moſt illegal, and the moſt dangerous, which had ever, in any reign, been impoſed on the nation: and they imagined, that, by bargaining for the remiſſion of that duty, they would ſeem, in a manner, to acknowlege the authority by which it had been levied; or, at leaſt, give encouragement for aſſuming new claims of a like nature, in hopes of reſigning them on like advantageous terms: and, for theſe reaſons, they reſolved to pay no regard to the king's ſolicitations, but to continue the examination and redreſs of the public grievances.

Things were now come to the criſis Vane wiſhed for: Charles was incenſed to the higheſt degree at the unreaſonable obſtinacy of the commons; and this treacherous member, taking advantage of his perturbation, inſinuated that he had it from good authority, that in a day or two the commons intended to paſs a vote againſt the war with Scotland; and Charles unhappily believing the report, which, by all that appears by the journals of the proceedings of the houſe, was entirely groundleſs, repaired on the morrow (being the fifth of May) to the houſe of peers, where he diſſolved the parliament. The marquis of Hamilton has not eſcaped the cenſure of ſome well-informed hiſtorians on this action, which in the end proved fatal to Charles, in order to embroil the king's affairs, to confirm the Scots, and diſtract the Engliſh, with a view to work his own advantages on both.

Indeed no ſtep could have been taken more proper to exerciſe the reigning ſpirit of diſcontent among the people, who uſually repoſe the moſt entire confidence in their repreſentatives, and expect from them the redreſs of all their grievances. But as if this had not been thought enough to ruin Charles in the minds of his ſubjects, he was, by his violent counſellors, prevailed on to renew thoſe acts of arbitrary power which, from former experience, he might have learned were ſo dangerous and unpopular. Bellaſis and ſir John Hotham were cited before the council; and refuſing to give any account of their conduct in parliament, were thrown into priſon. Crew, the chairman of the committee of religion, was ordered to deliver up all the complaints and petitions preſented to the committee; and on his refuſing to produce them, he was ſent to the Tower. The ſtudies and even the pockets of the earl of Warwick and lord Brooke were ſearched, before the expiration of privilege, in hopes of finding ſome treaſonable papers.

Though the parliament was diſſolved, the convocation continued ſitting, under the name of a ſynod, to the twenty-ninth of May, and enacted certain canons. Among theſe there was one that obliged all eccleſiaſtics, and ſuch as had received degrees in the univerſities, to take an oath, importing, that they approved of the doctrine and diſcipline of the church of England; and that they never would conſent to any alteration of the church-government, by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, archdeacons, &c. After having ſettled their canons and this oath, which they had no legal power to impoſe, they granted a large ſubſidy, for the maintenance of the Scottiſh war, and then ſeparated.

The diſſolution of this parliament was by the people thought to be the work of the archbiſhop of Canterbury; this raiſed the popular hatred againſt him to the higheſt pitch: and on the ninth of May a paper was poſted upon the Old Exchange, by one John Lilburne, exciting the apprentices to riſe and riſle his houſe at Lambeth on the Monday following; of which the archbiſhop having notice, made proviſion of ſome quantity of arms and ammunition for his defence. In the dead of the night preceding the appointed day, five hundred of the rabble beſet his houſe, and ſtrove to force an entrance, but were repulſed, and forced to depart with only denouncing their anger in ſeditious language againſt him, and breaking the windows of his palace. The next day many of them were apprehended, and confined in the White Lion priſon, in Southwark: but within three days after, a number of their accomplices aſſembled, broke open the priſon, and reſcued them: nevertheleſs one of the ringleaders of the firſt riot was retaken, arraigned, condemned, hanged, drawn, and quartered on the twenty-firſt of May.

It ſeemed as if Charles had ſtudied to ſet all ranks of people againſt him, for inſtead of ſoothing the city of London in the preſent delicate ſituation of circumſtances, he proſecuted it in the Star-chamber for certain miſdemeanors committed at Londonderry, in Ireland, which had been peopled by the city, and condemned it in a very heavy fine. He continued to raiſe all the taxes which had been ſo loudly inveighed againſt in parliament. Such a conduct in an abſolute prince would have occaſioned a revolt among his ſubjects, much more in a limited monarch. Unſupported by his parliament, he was now obliged to have recourſe to the generoſity of individuals, and ſo much intereſt did he poſſeſs among the courtiers and miniſters, that above three hundred thouſand pounds were ſubſcribed in a few days.

The earl of Northumberland had been appointed general of the king's army, now augmented to twenty thouſand men, the earl of Strafford lieutenant-general, and lord Conway general of the horſe; but Northumberland being about this time ſeized with a dangerous illneſs, could not take upon him the command; as to Strafford, it ſeems his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary in England, to direct the affairs of the council; Charles therefore went himſelf in perſon ſo ſoon as the queen, then great with child, was delivered of her ſon Henry, who was born at Oatlands, on the twentieth of July. But in the mean time the army was ordered to march northward; and lord Conway marched with the van ſome days before the reſt could come up: and as he was advancing, news was brought him, that the Scottiſh army, under general Leſly, was marched to Dunce, not far from Berwick, where they had taken up their quarters the preceding year. Upon this advice he ordered the army to haſten towards Newcaſtle; but before they reached that place, intelligence came that the Scottiſh army had entered England on the twentieth of Auguſt. The king received advice of this on his way to York, and diſpatched orders to Conway to do what he could to impede their march till the army could come up. Upon this Conway called a council of war, the reſult of which was, that they ſhould ſeize the paſs at Newborne upon Tyne, to prevent the Scots poſſeſſing themſelves of Newcaſtle, where ſir Jacob Aſtly had newly entered with his regiment, but had not time to erect any fortifications. The king made all the haſte he could; but by that time he reached North Allerton, about two days march on this ſide Newcaſtle, the lord Conway ſent to him an account of the defeat of the forces under his command, which he received at Newborne, on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt.

In conſequence of their ſucceſs at Newborne, the Scots entered Newcaſtle without oppoſition: as for Conway, he retired with precipitation to Durham, and thinking himſelf not ſafe in that place, returned to North Allerton, where he found the main army, which alſo retreated to York. In the mean while, the Scots entered Newcaſtle peaceably and under the moſt ſolem proteſtation of friendſhip, which they ſoon violated by treating the inhabitants of the town and neighbouring country in all reſpects as a conquered people; nor does it even appear that any precautions were taken by the Engliſh officers to prevent the king's magazines of powder and ammunition from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Charles arrived at York on the twenty-third of Auguſt: and, after aſſembling the gentlemen there, he and the earl of Strafford did all they could to animate them to the ſervice of their country. They had advanced as far as North Allerton with their whole army, when they heard of lord Conway's defeat, on which they retreated to York, that they might be joined by the troops that were marching from Newcaſtle to Durham; and the whole to all appearance, compoſed a very fine army.

It was doubtleſs mortifying to Charles to be reduced to ſubmit to the inſolence of rebels, and hold a parley with the avowed enemies of his royal ſtate and dignity; but what could he do? he ſaw a viſible coldneſs in the officers and common men of his army, which gave him the moſt dreadful apprehenſions that they would not fight againſt the Scots: the great county of York, inſtead of raiſing men for his ſervice, preſented a petition againſt his meaſures: in fine, he ſaw no other method of ſtopping the progreſs of the Covenanters, than by complying with their propoſal.

While theſe things were in agitation, an addreſs was preſented from the city of London, petitioning for a parliament, as the only method of healing the diſtempered ſtate. This petion encouraged the earls of Bedford, Eſſex, Hertford, Warwick, Briſtol, and Mulgrave, the lords Say and Seale, Howard of Eſcrick, Bolingbroke, Mandeville, Brooke, and Paget, to preſent another of the like tendency. In theſe, and a thouſand other diſtracting circumſtances, the only expedient that Charles and his friends could think of, was ſomewhat between a parliament and a council, and was revived from very remote antiquity; this was, to ſummon a council of the Engliſh peers at York.

On the twenty-fourth of September this great council met, and Charles opened it with a ſpeech, in which he demanded their advice upon two points: the firſt was, what anſwer to be given to the rebels, and in what manner they were to be treated; the ſecond, how to get money for keeping his army together until a parliamentary ſupply ſhould be raiſed. After various debates, it was reſolved to name commiſſioners for treating with the Scots; theſe were, the earls of Bedford, Hertford, Eſſex, Saliſbury, Warwick, Briſtol, Holland, and Berkſhire, viſcount Mandeville, the lords Wharton, Paget, Brooke, Pawlet, Howard, Savile, and Dunſmore: the earls of Traquair, Morton, and Lanerk, were named as aſſiſtants to theſe commiſſioners, to remove any difficulties that could ariſe from their ignorance of the conſtitution and affairs of Scotland; and ſecretary Vane, Mr. Lewis Stuart, and ſir John Burroughs, were to aſſiſt in like manner upon the part of the Engliſh commiſſioners. It was firſt propoſed, as moſt conſiſtent with the king's dignity, that the treaty ſhould be held at York; but the Scots, not ſo much from any real apprehenſions they had of danger, as to increaſe the odium againſt Strafford, refuſed to come to any place where he had power; and, after various conſultations, Rippon was appointed to be the place of meeting. All this while the inhabitants of the northern counties, that had been laid under contribution by the Scots, made dreadful complaints to Charles of their oppreſſion; and, in order to keep the Engliſh army together, inſtructions were given by the great council to the earls of Manchеſter, Pembroke, and Clare, the viſcount Camden, with the lords Coventry and Goring, to treat with the city of London for the loan of two hundred thouſand pounds. The commiſſioners for the Scots were the earl of Dumfermling, lord Loudon, ſir Patrick Hepburn, ſir William Douglas, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wedderburn, Mr. Henderſon, and Mr. Johnſton.

The conferences were opened at Rippon on the firſt of October, and the Scots commiſſioners preſented the following propoſitions, in the form of a petition: "That his majeſty would be pleaſed to cauſe the acts of the laſt general aſſembly to be ratified in parliament: that the caſtle of Edinburgh, and all places of ſtrength in Scotland, ſhould be employed for no other purpoſe but the defence of the kingdom: that the Scots in England and Ireland ſhould not incur any penalty for having ſubſcribed the Covenant, nor be ſubjected to oaths or ſubſcriptions contrary to the laws of the realm: that the authors of theſe troubles ſhould be puniſhed as incendiaries, according to their demerits: that the ſhips taken from the Scots ſhould be reſtored with all their merchandize; and all damage to be repaired: that they ſhould be indemnified for all the loſſes they had ſuſtained ſince the beginning of the troubles: that the proclamations declaring them traitors, ſhould be revoked; and that his majeſty would, with the advice of the Engliſh parliament, withdraw the garriſons from the frontiers: that a free communication and commerce between the two nations be reſtored." They likewiſe demanded, in an inſolent manner, forty thouſand pounds per month for maintaining their army, during the treaty. Charles would gladly have conſented that both armies ſhould have been diſbanded, but he could not prevail; and he now ſaw that nothing advantageous to him could reſult from the interview at Rippon: he therefore endeavoured to transfer the conferences to York, where the great council continued ſitting; but he was again diſappointed through the refuſal of the Scots. His own commiſſioners preſſed him to remove the treaty from Rippon to London, to which he was obliged to comply, and alſo to a ceſſation of arms, by which the Scots were aſſured of maintenance for their army; and the river Tees was made the boundary for both parties. This ceſſation was concluded on the twenty-ſixth of October, and the commiſſioners returned to York, where Charles found himſelf obliged to ratify all they had done in granting the demands of the Scots. Thus was this unhappy prince humbled, to receive law from his rebels, and directions from his ſubjects.

Charles finding the general ſenſe of the nation was ſo declared for a parliament, had in his ſpeech to the great council acquainted them that he intended to ſummon one to ſit on the third of November enſuing, and writs had accordingly been iſſued out for that purpoſe. There remained, therefore but a ſhort time for him to return to London before the meeting of the parliament, which he did, leaving Strafford, who had joined his army, to provide for the peace of the North; and an army of rebels, whom he paid, to domineer in the bowels of his country; for it was underſtood that the Scottiſh army was neither to return, or be diſbanded, till the treaty, begun at Rippon, was finiſhed at London.

The parliament met, according to its ſummons, on the third of November, and the commons choſe Lenthall, a lawyer of ſome reputation, for their ſpeaker. The parliament at meeting was unuſually numerous, every member looking upon this conjuncture as a national criſis: the ſpeech of Charles, as uſual contained reflections on the incredulity of thoſe who had refuſed to truſt to his perſonal aſſurances: he recommended to his parliament, firſt to drive out the Scottiſh rebels, and then he promiſed them a redreſs of grievances; and laſtly he recommended to them to provide money for the payment of the army, which otherwiſe muſt be diſbanded, while that of the rebels was kept on foot.

It would ſwell theſe ſheets too much, were we minutely to ſet down the ſeveral ſteps taken by this parliament in the purſuit of the favourite object of humbling the kingly authority; we ſhall content ourſelves with given a ſummary account of their proceedings, but ſo as not to omit any material incident worthy the knowlege of the reader. And here we ſhall beg leave to premiſe a general reflection on the characters and circumſtances of men and things at this juncture.

The long intermiſſion of parliaments had produced many miſchiefs and inconveniences in the government, by the remiſſneſs of ſome and the rigor of others, in church and ſtate, which inflamed the zeal of many good patriots of both houſes to be very urgent for the redreſs of their errors: the eye of the whole nation was fixed on the proceedings of a parliament ſummoned at ſo critical a juncture, and during ſuch general diſcontents as now rent the whole nation; a parliament which was to complete every thing left unfiniſhed by former parliaments. Notwithſtanding the vigorous efforts of the courtiers and miniſters, the elections had run almoſt entirely in favour of thoſe in the oppoſition: the members were generally bent upon an alteration in the government; the few moderate men amongſt them ſought only to aſcertain the liberties of the nation; others reſolved to humble the royal prerogative; and there was a more violent party that extended their views to an utter extirpation of the hierarchy and monarchical government, but theſe at firſt carefully concealed their deſigns under the profeſſion of rigid preſbyterianiſm, and were afterwards known by the name of Independents. The two latter parties were in confederacy with the Scots, and ſought, by fomenting the diſtractions of the ſtate, to lift themſelves into places of power and truſt: the purſuit of theſe things made them exceed the methods and proceedings of their predeceſſors, and, by inſpiring jealouſies, countenancing and procuring tumultuous petitions and aſſemblies by menaces and force, they often obtained the accompliſhment of their purpoſes, contriving without-door in private meetings, what they deſigned to carry within. The ſucceſs they met with in theſe their proceedings enlarged their views and extended their ambition; it bred thoughts in them they had never entertained before; and this was that which drew on the ruin of the king, and with him, for ſome time, the ſubverſion of all monarchy: but many of thoſe who were in the beginning moſt active for reformation, had not in their proſpect the calamity that enſued, and too late repented the error of having lent their aſſiſtance to thoſe actions, when they could no longer ſtem the tide that the breath of violence and diſaffection had ſwelled to ſo great an height. Theſe matters will more plainly appear as we proceed in the hiſtory of this reign, whoſe horrors we are now about to deſcribe.

The earl of Strafford was conſidered as the firſt miniſter of ſtate, both on account of the great intereſt which he had with his maſter, and his own uncommon abilities. By a concurrence of untoward circumſtances he had expoſed himſelf to the hatred of all the three nations, which compoſed the Britiſh empire. The Scots, whoſe authority was now very great, regarded him as the capital enemy of their country, and one, whoſe councils and influence they had moſt reaſon to dread. He had perſuaded the parliament of Ireland to furniſh large ſupplies, in order to proſecute a war againſt them: he had raiſed an army of nine thouſand men, with which he threatened to invade their weſtern coaſt: he had compelled the Scots, who lived under his government, to renounce the Covenant, which they ſo much adored: he had in Ireland denounced the Scottiſh Covenanters rebels and traitors, even before the king had taken any ſuch ſtep againſt them in England: and he had ever given his opinion againſt the late treaty and ſuſpenſion of arms, which he conſidered as dangerous and diſhonourable. So highly were the Scots incenſed at all theſe meaſures, that they had abſolutely refuſed to ſend commiſſioners to treat at York, as was firſt propoſed; becauſe, they ſaid, the lieutenant of Ireland, their capital enemy, being general of the king's forces, was there poſſeſſed of the chief command and authority.

Strafford, firſt as deputy, then as lord-lieutenant, had managed the affairs of Ireland for the ſpace of eight years. His government had been extremely vigilant and active, but very far from being popular. His authority and influence, however, during the time of his proſperity, had kept his enemies in awe; but no ſooner was he ſeized with adverſity, then the concealed averſion of the Iriſh blazed out at once, and the parliament of that kingdom employed every expedient in order to aggravate the charge againſt him.

All the grievances which the Engliſh had ſuffered for a number of years, were univerſally aſcribed to the pernicious councils of Strafford; becauſe he was known to be the miniſter whom the king moſt favoured and conſulted.

Though deſcended from an ancient family, and born to a conſiderable eſtate, his ſudden and great elevation was not exempted from envy; and his former aſſociates in popular meaſures, finding that he owed his advancement to the deſertion of their cauſe, purſued him with the moſt implacable hatred, and reſolved to exert their utmoſt efforts in order to effect his ruin*.

The firſt five days of this ſeſſion was taken up in ſettling the five ſtanding committees for grievances, religion, courts of juſtice, trade, and privileges and elections; and in ſeveral declamatory ſpeeches againſt the maladminiſtration of government, both in church and ſtate, the chief part of which were aſcribed to the councils of the earl of Strafford and archbiſhop Laud: fanaticiſm ſeems to have taken poſſeſſion of the minds of almoſt all ranks of people: at this time religion was become an univerſal faſhion; the moſt eloquent ſpeakers in the houſe introduced a kind of holy cant and jargon into their ſpeeches, and all their alluſions being ſcriptural, ſtamped them with an air of prophecy or inſpirarion.

The Scottiſh commiſſioners were now arrived in London, in order to put a finiſhing hand to the treaty that had been begun at Rippon. Theſe had many conferences with their friends of the houſe of commons; and it was agreed by them, that the earl of Strafford ſhould be impeached at his firſt coming to the houſe of peers, for he was as yet at York. This meaſure was thus ſuddenly reſolved on, to prevent an impeachment that nobleman had ready againſt Mr. Pym and ſome others of the leading members of both houſes, for holding intelligence with the Scots, which he intended to have offered in the houſe of peers as ſoon as he had taken his ſeat amongſt them. It was the tenth of November, early in the morning, while the houſe of commons was in a debate about papiſts, that it was certainly known that Strafford was come to town; upon this a motion was immediately made, "that no member ſhould leave the houſe; that the outward room, or lobby, be kept clear from ſtrangers; and the outer door, upon the ſtair-head, be kept locked;" and all this upon pretext of examining Newton and Grey, two meſſengers, who had been concerned in taking up and diſcharging papiſts. This ſecrecy was ſomewhat interrupted by a meſſage from the lords, who demanded a meeting with the commons, which the latter refuſed; and Pym and Clotworthy, with the other enemies of Strafford, were ſo vehement in their ſpeeches, and ſo quick in their diſpatch againſt him, that his impeachment, upon the notoriety of the facts contained in it, was carried up that very day by Pym, who at the bar of the houſe of peers accuſed him of high-treaſon. The earl was thereupon required to withdraw, and it was very warmly debated by the peers, whether he ſhould be impriſoned on a general accuſation as this was, without any particular act of treaſon charged againſt him; but, upon the queſtion, it was carried in the affirmative, and the earl, upon being called in, was put into the cuſtody of the black-rod, until the houſe of commons ſhould exhibit a more particular charge againſt him.

The next day the commons, conſidering the great preſſures of the northern counties by the two armies that lay upon them, reſolved that two hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed for their maintenance; and, till it could be regularly levied, one hundred thouſand pounds were borrowed in the city of London, upon the credit of ſome of the members of the houſe of commons. Many petitions from all parts were now brought in for redreſs of grievances, and to be relieved againſt orders and decrees of the Council-table, Star-chamber, and High-commiſſion court; which were referred to the proper committees: ſeveral perſons alſo were releaſed out of priſon upon their petitions, among whom were Prynne, Burton, and Baſtwick: and a while after, by the interceſſion of the lords with the king, Williams, biſhop of Lincoln, was alſo freed from his impriſonment in the Tower, and admitted to reſume his ſeat in the upper-houſe. In the mean time the king, willing to be rid of the Scottiſh army, haſtened the commiſſion to the lords who were employed in the treaty of Rippon, or any ten of them, to treat with the Scottiſh commiſſioners, or any ſeven of them, to take into conſideration their demands, and compoſe all differences ariſing thereupon; which commiſſion was paſſed under the great-ſeal of England on the twenty-third of November: and in a ſhort time after the Scots preſented their demands, which were eight in number; and afterwards they put in ſeventeen heads, wherein one (and that not the leaſt conſiderable) was, that ſome Scotchmen of reſpect might enjoy places of truſt about the king, queen, and prince. This was that which all their pretences aimed at, notwithſtanding all their zeal to the reformation of religion: and though all they deſired elſe was granted, they never attained to their ends in this; for the troubles which they raiſed, did not only bring after them a miſery to this nation, but them alſo, and the ringleaders of them wanted not their part thereof: ſir Francis Windebank, ſecretary of ſtate, was aimed at, as one of the great delinquents in the opinion of the parliament, being ſuſpected in his religion, a great favourer of the prieſts of the Romiſh church, for whom he had obtained many reprieves, and was thought to be guilty of miſdemeanors of a higher nature; but he, thinking himſelf not ſufficiently provided to ride out the approaching ſtorm, made his eſcape into France, where he died a Roman catholic. In the conſideration of grievances, the charge impoſed upon the ſubject for providing and furniſhing of ſhips, and the aſſeſſments for raiſing money for that purpoſe, commonly called ſhip-money, were voted by both houſes to be againſt the laws of the realm; and all proceedings in the caſe, both at Council-table, Star-chamber, and courts of juſtice, declared null and void.

The debate of ſhip-money led the houſe to conſider of the firſt occaſion of raiſing it, which was, becauſe the parliament immediately preceeding the laſt, was diſſolved without granting the ſupplies the king

expected from them; and from hence they were led into an enquiry of ſeveral violations of the priveleges of parliament, by the commitment of divers members, and a judgment againſt them in the King's Bench: and then all the inconveniences were ſummed up, that happened through the long intermiſſion of parliaments; to provide againſt which, it was reſolved to bring in a bill for eſtabliſhing triennial parliaments. The debates took up many days, and whilſt theſe conſultations were held for the reformation of the civil ſtate, the Scottiſh commiſſioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, were not idle in their endeavours to alter the hierarchy or eccleſiaſtical ſtate: by the fanatical diſcourſes of themſelves and their emiſſaries they ſo worked upon the minds of the deluded people, that a great number of petitions were preſented to the commons againſt eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, the ceremonies of the church, and the government of it by biſhops: amongſt which was one preſented by alderman Pennington, ſubſcribed by fifteen hundred citizens of London. This petition did not a little alarm the moderate party in the houſe of commons, who were not unwilling to have the abuſes of church-government reformed, but could not approve of the alteration of that government itſelf; ſo that, after ſome debate, the petition was ordered to lie upon the table for farther conſideration. The puritans however, though unſucceſsful in this effort, fell a while after upon another expedient, more plauſible, which was an inquiſition into the legality of the new canons, the oath, and the tax upon the clergy, which had been created and impoſed by the convocation, after the parliament had been diſſolved, and it was voted by a great majority, "That ſuch an aſſembly had no power to frame conſtitutions, canons, or any other acts, without conſent of parliament; that the late canons contained matters contrary to the king's prerogative, the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the rights of parliament, and the liberty and property of the ſubjects; that therefore they tended to ſedition, and were of the moſt dangerous conquences."

The very ſame day that the canons were thus voted down (December 17) the commons appointed a committee of thirty-nine members, to enquire who were the principal promoters of thoſe canons, and to prepare an impeachment againſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury, for having endeavoured to overturn the laws and religion of his country. The Scottiſh commiſſioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, at the ſame time preſented to the lords an accuſation againſt that prelate, charging him with being the author of all the troubles in Scotland, by impoſing the book of canons and the liturgy upon the natives of that kingdom, and exciting a war between his majeſty and his ſubjects. The archbiſhop being likewiſe impeached by the commons, was taken into cuſtody, and afterwards committed to the Tower. Matthew Wren, biſhop of Ely, being ſuſpected of a deſign to quit the kingdom, was obliged to give ſecurity for ten thouſand pounds. The lord-keeper Finch being threatened with a proſecution, fled into Holland and was declared a traitor by a vote of the houſe of commons, and the king committed the ſeals to the cuſtody of ſir Edward Littleton. Brampſton, Davenport, and Crawley, three of the judges, were obliged to give bail. Such was the method taken to overawe the king's miniſters: but what ſtill more contributed to intimidate his adherents, was the practice of paſſing votes againſt any part of their conduct as contrary to law. From want of power, rather than inclination, to reſiſt, the king was obliged to remain a paſſive ſpectator of all thoſe violent proceedings. He hoped to regain his loſt authority by a little flexibility, but herein he was miſtaken: he imagined that the parliament would aſſiſt him in taking vengeance upon the Scots for their irruption into England; but inſtead of that, this very parliament made them a preſent of three hundred thouſand pounds, to defray the expences they had been at in carrying on a civil war. He flattered himſelf likewiſe with ſuppreſſing the puritanical party in England: almoſt all the members of the houſe of commons were puritans. He had a tender affection for the earl of Strafford, who had devoted himſelf ſo generouſly to his ſervice; and the commons ſoon after obliged him to ſign the fatal warrant for his death, and thereby ſhew his ſubjects the way to ſhed blood ſtill more precious.

We have already obſerved, that the States had propoſed to Charles a marriage between his eldeſt daughter and the young prince of Orange. In the beginning of the year 1641, this prince renewed the demand, and the ambaſſadors had orders to propoſe to Charles, at the ſame time ſuch a league as ſhould be found moſt conducive to the intereſts of both people. Charles readily agreed to both propoſitions, and the articles of marriage were ſoon drawn up; but he thought proper to impart the whole to the houſe of peers, which he accordingly did, and the marriage was ſhortly after concluded, to the great ſatisfaction of the public.

About this time, or a few days before, the particular charge againſt the earl of Strafford was carried up to the lords by Mr. Pym, under twenty-eight articles. They had, on the twenty-eighth of November, in the preceding year, exhibited ſome general articles, to which he could not be forced to anſwer; but upon this farther impeachment the lords required him to anſwer to the whole: and though the charge was very long, yet were the commons ſo preſſing for his anſwer, that, by the twenty-fourth of February, he delivered it to the lords. It appears that the Iriſh houſe of commons had by this time ſent over a committee to aſſiſt in the proſecution of this unfortunate nobleman, who had been their governor; and, in a word, the three kingdoms ſeemed bent upon his deſtruction. Upon the carrying up the impeachment laſt-mentioned, he was taken out of the cuſtody of the uſher of the black-rod, and committed to the Tower. He moved the lords to have counſel allowed him, which was much oppoſed by the commons; but his accuſation being found to have many points of law in it, he was at length indulged with a grant of his requeſt.

The bill for triennial parliaments having paſſed both houſes, was, on the ſixteenth of February, offered to the king, under the title of "An act for the preventing inconveniencies happening from the long intermiſſion of parliaments," and at the ſame time the commons preſented an act for the relief of his majeſty's army and the northern parts of the kingdom, to both which the king gave his royal aſſent. No act that had ever paſſed ſeemed better calculated for preſerving the liberties of the ſubject, than the act for triennial parliaments; for it it provided, "that in caſe the king ſhould refuſe to ſummon a parliament at the time therein limited, the chancellor or keeper might iſſue out writs to ſummon the peers, and for election of the commons; and if the chancellor or keeper ſhould not do it, any twelve of the peers might ſummon the parliament; and if the peers ſhould omit the iſſuing out of ſummons, the ſheriffs in counties, and other magiſtrates, reſpectively, might cauſe elections to be made; and if the ſheriffs ſhould refuſe, the freeholders in the counties might make elections of members; and the members ſo choſen were, under great penalties, obliged to attend:" with many other clauſes to accompliſh the end deſigned by the act.

It muſt be confeſſed, that this act had in it ſeveral expreſſions too much reflecting upon the prerogative; but Charles ſeems by this time to have been ſenſible of the many miſchiefs ariſing from the too long intermiſſion of parliaments, and ſeems to have reſolved to communicate more freely and frequently in that way with his ſubjects. In a word, his ſo readily giving his aſſent to this act was highly pleaſing to the people in general, who every where expreſſed their ſatisfaction by bonfires and other rejoicings: both houſes alſo waited upon the king at Whitehall, with an addreſs of thanks on the occaſion. On the ſame day theſe bills were ſigned; the charge againſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury was carried up to the lords by ſir Henry Vane, the younger, whereupon Laud was ordered to be ſent to the Tower; but, upon his humble ſuit to the lords, his commitment was reſpited to the firſt of March.

The Scottiſh commiſſioners were all this while exerting their utmoſt endeavours for the overthrow of the hierarchy, and the introduction of their preſbyterian diſcipline into the church of England, and had, by their confederates, made an active party in the houſe of commons, which was almoſt filled with puritans, who took every occaſion of aſperſing the biſhops, and in their ſpeeches ſpared not the epiſcopal order itſelf. The city petition, already mentioned, was now taken a ſecond time into conſideration, and, in the courſe of the debates, ſeveral motions were made for entirely aboliſhing the order of biſhops: among thoſe who argued for this meaſure, none diſtinguiſhed themſelves with ſo much vehement eloquence as Nathaniel Fiennes, the younger ſon of the lord Say and Seale; but the lord Falkland, the lord Digby, and many other noblemen of conſummate integrity and deep erudition, ſo warmly oppoſed the motion, and by the ſtrength and eloquence of their reaſoning, ſo far prevailed, that the order of epiſcopacy was yet preſerved, though its power was much leſſened by a vote paſſed in the houſe of commons, preparatory to a bill, reſolving, "that no biſhop ſhall have any vote in parliament, or any judicial power in the Star-chamber, nor bear any ſway in temporal affairs; and that no clergyman ſhall be in the commiſſion of the peace."

About this time Charles, who ſeems to have had nothing elſe in view but the reſtoring the confidence of his ſubjects, by endeavouring to ſatisfy his parliament and ſmooth his meaſures, agreed to ſeveral conſiderable alterations in his court: he admitted into his council the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Eſſex, Briſtol, and Warwick, the lords Say, Saville, and Kimbolton; Juxon, biſhop of London, had, with leſs envy than could be expected, for ſome years held the treaſurer's ſtaff, but he now reſigned it. Oliver St. John was appointed ſolicitor-general: the king intended that Denzill Holles ſhould have filled the places of ſecretary of ſtate, vacated by the flight of Windebank; that Pym ſhould be made chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of the lord Cottington, who reſigned for that purpoſe; lord Say, maſter of the wards; the earl of Eſſex governor, and Mr. Hampden tutor, to the prince of Wales: but the marquis of Hamilton, who had a great eſteem for Strafford, whom Charles ardently wiſhed to have preſerved, perſuaded the king that the delaying theſe promotions would be a ſtrong bait in Strafford's favour, or that it was neceſſary to make ſome previous terms before the vacancies were filled up, for ſecuring his life. This advice was fatally followed, and blaſted the whole ſcheme: thus Charles loſt the opportunity of at leaſt making the oppoſition eaſy, by thoſe popular acts, for that time, if not for ever.

The ſops with-held from the Cerberuſſes of the party, and the ſacrifices Charles had already made, did not one moment retard the proſecution of Strafford. That nobleman was conſidered as the chief ſupport of the prerogative; the commons looked upon him as an apoſtate; the Scots, as the implacable and avowed enemy of their country. On the thirtieth of January, twenty-eight freſh articles had been given in againſt the earl, the particulars of which are foreign to a general hiſtory; it is ſufficient to ſay, that they charged him with having exerciſed illegal power and oppreſſions in many inſtances, both as preſident of the North and as lord lieutenant of Ireland; with having been the cauſe of the war with the Scots (whom the commons had lately ordered to be ſtyled on all occaſions "our brethren of Scotland"), againſt whom he had unjuſtly irritated his majeſty; with having levied an army of Iriſh papiſts to enſlave the kingdom; and with having adviſed the king to eſtabliſh an abſolute government on the ruin of the conſtitution.

Weſtminſter-hall was formed into a large court of judicature for the important trial; the earl of Arundel preſided as high-ſteward, the peers ſat in their robes as judges, the commons appeared as accuſers, on which account it was determined that the impeachment ſhould be managed by commoners: theſe were George lord Digby, (an Iriſh peer), John Hampden, eſq. John Pym, eſq. Oliver St. John, eſq. ſir Walter Erle, knight, Geoffrey Palmer, eſq. John Maynard, eſq. and John Glynn, eſq. Whitlock was appointed chairman of this committee: we muſt not forget that the biſhops declined being preſent, agreeable to the canon law, which forbids their aſſiſting at any trial for life: at the upper end of the hall was a chair and cloth of ſtate for the king, and on each ſide a cloſe gallery, in which his majeſty and the queen ſat in private. The trial began on the twenty-ſecond of March: the articles of accuſation were enforced with all the virulence of malice. The earl behaved with great dignity, courage, and compoſure; his defence was noble, ſpirited, and effectual; he acquitted himſelf of every accuſation, except a few acrimonious expreſſions, and ſome inſtances of indiſcretion, which ought to have been forgiven, as the infirmities of human nature. Nothing had appeared againſt him to juſtify the charge of treaſon, when, on the twelfth of April, Pym produced in the houſe of commons a paper of ſome notes taken by ſecretary Vane, of opinions delivered at the council-table. Young Vane pretended he had found them by accident in his father's cabinet; and, as they were thought to bear teſtimony againſt the earl, his accuſers the next day read them openly at his trial. They were entitled "No danger of a war with Scotland, if offenſive, not defenſive." The earl had adviſed the king to borrow a ſum of money: he ſaid his majeſty was abſolved by all rules of government, as having tried all legal ways, and been repulſed; and that he had an army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience. The earl, in his defence, obſerved "that it was hard meaſure to be proſecuted, under the notion of treaſon, for opinions given in council: that his uſing the expreſſion "this kingdom" was not proved, as the marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Northumberland, the lord-treaſurer, and the lord Cottington, who were preſent at the board, declared upon their honours that they never heard him ſpeak ſuch words. But, granting he had uſed the expreſſion, the word this could not rationally imply England, which had not been guilty of diſobedience; but Scotland, which was the immediate object of their deliberation, and in a ſtate of actual rebellion." After making this anſwer, he re-capitulated the ſeveral parts of his former defence, and in his concluſion ſaid, "My lords, I have troubled you longer than I ſhould have done, were it not for the intereſt of theſe dear pledges a ſaint in heaven hath left me." Here he made a pauſe, pointing to his children and ſhedding ſome tears: then proceeded in theſe words; "What I forfeit myſelf, is nothing; but that my indiſcretion ſhould extend to my poſterity, woundeth me to the very ſoul.—You will pardon my infirmity: ſomething I ſhould have added, but am not able, ſo therefore let it paſs.—And now, my lords, for myſelf; I have been taught, by the bleſſings of the Almighty God, that the afflictions of this preſent life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which will be revealed hereafter; and ſo, my lords, even ſo, with all tranquility of mind I freely ſubmit myſelf to your judgment; be it life or death, "Te Deum laudamus." The very chairman of the committee ſays, this great and good perſon ſpoke with ſuch pathetic grace and eloquence as moved the hearts of all his auditors (a few excepted) to pity and remorſe.

The accuſation and defence laſted eighteen days: Strafford, in his replies was obliged to reſerve a ſeeming reſpect for his moſt implacable enemies, the Scottiſh nation and the Iriſh parliament. He took only a ſhort time to anſwer each article urged againſt him, yet he made ſuch a noble and ſatisfactory defence, that the commons ſaw it impoſſible, by a legal proſecution, ever to attain their purpoſe againſt him. But the death of Strafford was conſidered as a matter of too great importance to be left unaccompliſhed. A bill of attainder was therefore introduced into the lower-houſe immediately after the concluſion of this pleadings, which paſſed the houſe on the twenty-firſt of April, after very warm debates, fifty-nine votes only diſſenting, and was immediately ſent up to the lords. On the firſt of May the king went to the houſe of peers, and, in a ſpeech, earneſtly requeſted both houſes that they would not proceed ſeverely againſt the earl of Strafford, whom, in his own conſcience, he ſaid, he could not condemn of high-treaſon; but declared at the ſame time, that, for his miſdemeanors, he ſhould never ſerve him or the kingdom in any place of truſt, "no not ſo much as a conſtable."

This ſpeech was highly offenſive to thoſe who thirſted for the blood of this nobleman; and they were ſo hot in the purſuit of their deſigns, that the commons voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the houſe. At the ſame time they employed their emiſſaries without doors to ſpread about the city, and other parts of the town, papers containing the names of the fifty-nine members who voted againſt the bill of attainder: thoſe names were affixed to public places, under the denomination of Straffordians and betrayers of their country, and thus expoſed to the fury of the ungoverned multitude, made at this time ſo mad and violent, that, on the the third of May, vaſt numbers from the city appeared at Weſtminſter, armed with ſwords and cudgels, crying aloud for juſtice againſt the earl of Strafford; and ſuch as were ſuſpected of attachment to that unfortunate nobleman, were afraid to appear in public. About eighty peers had conſtantly been preſent at Strafford's trial, but ſo much were they intimidated by the popular tumults, that only forty-nine were in the houſe of lords when the bill of attainder was introduced; yet even nineteen of theſe had the courage to vote againſt it: a ſtrong preſumption that, had liberty of debate been allowed, the bill would have been rejected by a great majority. A new diſcovery, made about this time, increaſed ſtill farther the fury of the people, and haſtened the fate of the devoted Strafford: ſome principal officers of the king's army, partly from their attachment to the crown, and partly from an averſion to the parliament, had formed a plan for engaging into the king's ſervice the troops under their command; with this view they entered into an aſſociation, bound themſelves by an oath of ſecrecy, and maintained a cloſe correſpondence with the king's ſervants: the form of a petition to the king and parliament was compoſed, and it was reſolved to procure the ſubſcription of the army to this petition, in which, after repreſenting the great danger to which the ancient conſtitution of the kingdom was ſubject, by the inſolent proceedings of certain factious and turbulent ſpirits, the army offered to come up and protect his majeſty and the parliament, "ſo ſhall the nation (as they allege in concluſion) not only be vindicated from preſent innovations, but be ſecured from the future which are threatened, and which are likely to be more pernicious than the former." The draught of this petition was tranſmitted to the king, who unhappily was perſuaded to counterſign it, as a mark of his approbation. One of the parties concerned (Goring), imagining the affair could not be kept long a ſecret, diſcovered the whole to the lords Newport and Dungarvon, and they to Pym, who inſtantly imparted the matter to the houſe. This diſcovery could not fail to excite the moſt violent indignation among the people. It was now given out that there was a wicked concert, a moſt dreadful plot, between the court and the army, to cut the throats of the parliament, and of all thoſe who ſtood up for their liberties. The puritanical faction among the commons naturally improved this ſingular ſingular advantage: they inſtantly got the houſe to vote, that a proteſtation ſhould be ſigned by all the members, to maintain the proteſtant religion againſt popery, to defend the king's perſon, the power of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the ſubject; and the commons, by their ſole authority, iſſued orders that it ſhould be ſubſcribed by the whole nation.

It is incredible with what alacrity this proteſtation was taken, and what a ſpirit it raiſed againſt the earl of Strafford. A bill was next brought in for continuing this parliament, which ſhould not be prorogued, adjourned, or diſſolved without the conſent of both houſes, until the grievances ſhould be redreſſed; but have credit to take up money. There can be no doubt, that by this bill the parliament diſſolved the conſtitution, and henceforward are with juſtice to be conſidered as a faction againſt the commonwealth. The ſame day (Friday May 5), the commons ſent to the king, deſiring acceſs to him, which was granted; and, about four o'clock, they attended in the Banqueting-houſe, at Whitehall, where they preſented to him the bill of attainder againſt the earl of Strafford, and that for the continuance of the parliament, with an intimation that the preſent ſtate of the kingdom would not admit of delay; and therefore they humbly beſought him to give the royal aſſent to thoſe bills: the king told them they might expect his anſwer on Monday, and ſo diſmiſſed them.

Where ever the king turned his eyes he ſaw no remedy nor relief: his caſe, it is certain, called aloud for pity; he was racked with the pangs of conſcience, about putting to death a miniſter whom he had eſteemed, and whom he believed to be innocent; not a counſellor about him, Juxon excepted, had the courage to ſpeak their mind, and all concurred in maintaining (a moſt manifeſt falſhood) that the king ought to ſatisfy his people in this demand, which would, it was preſumed, finally content them. The good biſhop, with a virtuous reſolution, becoming the ſacred character he bore, adviſed the king, if in his conſcience he thought the bill unjuſt, by no means to give his aſſent to it. Strafford, informed of the extreme peplexity his royal maſter was in, carried his loyalty to ſuch a height as to write a letter to the king exhorting him to conſent to his death. "In this (ſaid he) my conſent will more acquit your majeſty to God, than all the world can do beſides. To a willing mind there is no injury. And as, by God's grace, I freely forgive all the world, with a calmneſs and meekneſs of infinite contentment to my departing ſoul; ſo, ſir, to you, I can reſign the life of this world with the utmoſt chearfulneſs, in the juſt ſenſe of your many, great, and exceeding favours." Charles had the weakneſs to take this truſty ſervant at his word, and he aſſented to paſs the act, though he thought he was doing what merited eternal reproach here, and the vengeance of a juſt God hereafter; for it appeared that Charles, notwithſtanding his paſſing the bill, had violent pangs about Strafford, ſince we find that, on the tenth of May, he ſent the prince of Wales to the houſe of peers with a letter, in which he enjoined them to interpoſe their good offices with the commons, in order to procure a mitigation of Strafford's ſentence, or at leaſt a ſhort delay; but, to the indelible diſgrace of loyalty, humanity, and every ſocial or religious virtue; both his requeſts were flatly refuſed: could he, indeed, expect any other from the ſpirit of that oppoſition? A committee of twelve lords was appointed to ſatisfy the king, that even a delay of this illuſtrious criminal's execution would endanger his own and his family's ſafety; and Charles, with a reluctance to be felt but not deſcribed, yielded to the neceſſity of the juncture, and it was reſolved that the earl ſhould die on the twelfth of May.

He was aſſiſted in his laſt moments by archbiſhop Uſher, but was barbarouſly denied the comfort of ſpeaking with Laud; and on the day appointed was brought to Tower-hill, where his head was cut off. It is hard to ſay whether he ſhewed himſelf more pious or brave in his death, or whether he was more blameable or laudable in his life; but it is certain, that, however great his perſonal failings or political demerits were, the abilities and virtues he poſſeſſed, with the penalty of his head which he paid, ought to claim the pity of impartial poſterity for his fate, which, to his dying day, ſat heavy upon his royal maſter. Even a few weeks after Strafford's execution, this very parliament, as if conſcious of the iniquity, at leaſt illegality, of his ſentence, paſſed an act for reſtoring his children in blood and honour, and inveſted them with the poſſeſſions of their father's eſtates.

The commons having thus, by the death of the earl of Strafford, removed the grand obſtacle, as they imagined, to their intended reformation of the ſtate, proceeded to proſecute their projected plan with the utmoſt induſtry and vigour. All the taxes which the king had impoſed, the Star-chamber and High-commiſſion court, the extenſion of the foreſts, and the practice of impriſoning thoſe who refuſed to comply with ſuch impoſitions, were voted contrary to law, and the greater part of monopolies ſuppreſſed. The judges had hitherto enjoyed their patents only during his majeſty's pleaſure; the commons now petitioned the king to grant them patents during thrir good behaviour: and Charles was preſuaded to comply with their requeſt. The marſhal's-court, which took cognizance of offenſive words, and was extremely arbitrary in its proceedings, was for that reaſon, ſuppreſſed. The ſtannary courts, which exerciſed juriſdiction over the miners of Cornwall, being liable to a like objection, underwent the like fate. The council in the North, and that of Wales, were both aboliſhed on the ſame principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, who had a right to inſpect all the weights and meaſures throughout the kingdom, was tranſferred to the mayor, ſheriffs, and ordinary magiſtrates. In a word, if we examine the proceedings of this memorable parliament during the firſt period of its operations, we ſhall find that we are indebted to it for many valuable liberties we enjoy at this day.

The treaty with the Scots being brought to a concluſion, Charles allowed the parliament of Scotland to aſſemble, and declared his intention of aſſiſting at it in perſon. The commons, ſuſpecting that he deſigned to put himſelf at the head of his army in the North, on pretence of his viſiting his kingdom of Scotland, demanded a conference with the lords, and propoſed that both armies ſhould be diſbanded before his departure, which the king at their requeſt, poſtponed till the tenth of Auguſt,

Both were accordingly diſbanded at the ſame time, and the Scots returned to their own country, very well ſatisfied with their expedition. Then the king ſet out on his journey; but their diſtruſt ſtill ſubſiſting, the parliament propoſed that a committee from both houſes ſhould attend the king in Scotland, on pretence of conferring with the Scottiſh parliament, though in reality to be ſpies upon his majeſty's conduct. The earl of Bedford being nominated as one of the peers, declined the office, ſo that lord Howard of Eſcrick was the only member of that houſe who undertook the journey; and of the commons the committee conſiſted of Nathaniel Fiennes, ſir William Armye, ſir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden. The commons ſtill continued ſitting, and took ſeveral grievances into conſideration; then they reſolved to adjourn from the ninth of September to the twentieth of October. This reſolution was no ſooner taken, than a great number of members from both houſes retired to the country; and ſome rigid preſbyterians took this opportunity to propoſe an alteration in the Book of Common Prayer, which was ſo vigorouſly defended by Mr. Hyde (afterwards earl of Clarendon), that no ſtep was taken on the ſubject. The lords, during this diſpute, voted that the Common Prayer ſhould be uſed without any alteration. This vote produced a conference between the houſes: the commons deſired the lords would concur with them in publiſhing a declaration for ſuppreſſing all the late innovations in the church, and all diverſions on the Lord's Day. The lords, on the other hand, demanded the concurrence of the commons in publiſhing an order of their houſe, prohibiting all change in divine worſhip as eſtabliſhed by law: the lower-houſe abſolutely rejected this propoſal, and ordered their declaration to be printed and publiſhed through the whole kingdom; they at the ſame time appointed a committee of forty-three members to manage affairs of importance during their adjournment; the lords eſtabliſhed another for their houſe, and then the parliament adjourned to the twentieth of October.

The king, attended by the duke of Lenox, lately honoured with the additional title of duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, and lord Willoughby, ſet out for Scotland on the tenth of Auguſt. On his arrival at Edinburgh, he was received there with great demonſtrations of affection by the people; and, in return for this reception, he confirmed not only the articles of the treaty between the two nations by act of parliament, but all his former conceſſions alſo, and all ſuch things as had been tranſacted by them in their general aſſemblies; and likewiſe, the more effectually to gain their eſteem, he conferred titles of honour and dignity on ſome, and places of power, truſt, and profit, on others; amongſt theſe the marquis of Hamilton was created duke of Hamilton; and general Leſly was created earl of Leven, who was ſo tranſported with the ſenſe of the king's favour and bounty to him, that he often proteſted, and once, at Perth, upon his knees, in the houſe of the earl of Kinnoul, that he would never bear arms againſt the king.

A while after, ſome information was given to the marquiſſes of Hamilton and Argyll, that there was ſome deſign upon their perſons, which made them for ſome few days withdraw themſelves from the parliament and retire from Edinburgh: but their perſons were of ſuch quality and eſtimation in Scotland, that great pains were taken to diſcover the grounds thereof; and, after full examination by the parliament, they themſelves and the great council were ſatisfied, that the information given to them could not be made good to the proof of any deſign againſt their perſons; but the king, who was a little reflected upon in the firſt information, could not conceal his reſentment of this carriage in Hamilton; and when he delivered his patent to the duke in parliament (according to the cuſtom of that nation), he told him he had not deſerved to be miſtruſted by him, for he knew well, when he was accuſed to him of high-treaſon, he permitted him even to be in his bed-chamber. This reproof made no great impreſſion upon the new duke, though he ſeemed outwardly much troubled for having given the king ſo juſt a cauſe of diſpleaſure; yet, upon the firſt report of the buſineſs at London (without ſtaying to hear the opinion of the parliament of Scotland, who had fully examined it) ſtrange interpretations were made upon the matter, as highly and nearly concerning the peace of England; and a ſudden reſolution was taken, firſt by the committee during the receſs, and after by the parliament, to have a guard for the defence of London and Weſtminſter; and both houſes of parliament inſtilled freſh apprehenſions of danger into the minds of the people, when they were ſo lately freed from the fears of two armies.

While Charles reſided in Scotland, he employed all his time and endeavours to compoſe the troubles of that kingdom; and he was now preparing to return to England, in order to perfect the ſame ſalutary work here, when he received intelligence of a rebellion which had broke out in Ireland. The catholics of that country thought they had found the faireſt opportunity of ſhaking off the Engliſh yoke; and religion and liberty, thoſe two ſources of the greateſt actions, hurried them into a deſign the moſt cruel hiſtory hath recorded. They plotted to riſe throughout all the provinces in one day, and murder every proteſtant in the kingdom, after having ſurprized the caſtle of Dublin, which, though the grand magazine of the kingdom, and a place of ſuch importance, was provided with no more than fifty men for its garriſon. The execution of this ſcheme was delayed till the approach of winter, that there might be greater difficulty of tranſporting troops from England. Cardinal Richelieu had promiſed the conſpirators a conſiderable ſupply of men and money, and many Iriſh officers had given aſſurance that they would heartily concur with their catholic brethren as ſoon as an inſurrection ſhould be raiſed. The deſign upon the caſtle of Dublin, which was to have been put in execution the twenty-third of October, was prevented by a timely diſcovery of the plot to the two lord-juſtices, the very night only before; and thus the capital was preſerved; but the bloody part of the conſpiracy was paſt prevention, for the conſpirators were in arms the day affixed in all the counties of the kingdom, and actually maſſacred upwards of forty thouſand defenceleſs proteſtants. It would ſhock the feelings of humanity to deſcribe the particulars of this bloody tragedy; it may ſuffice to ſay, that death was the ſlighteſt puniſhment which thoſe bigoted and blood-thirſty catholicks inflicted upon the unhappy proteſtant victims.

Charles

Charles received intelligence of this inſurrection by a meſſenger diſpatched from the North of Ireland. He forthwith imparted the matter to the Scottiſh parliament, and demanded immediate ſuccours for the ſuppreſſion of the rebels, but the Scots referred the buſineſs to the Engliſh parliament, alleging, with juſtice, that Ireland depended upon England, who would undoubtedly provide for its ſecurity. The king therefore returned in haſte to London, where, to his infinite mortification, he found that the Iriſh catholics, in excuſe for this barbarous maſſacre, pretended to have received a commiſſion from the king himſelf to take up arms; and thus Charles, who was ſoliciting aſſiſtance againſt them, both from his Engliſh and Scottiſh ſubjects, ſaw himſelf accuſed of the crime he was endeavouring to puniſh. The frenzy of the Iriſh gave their enemies infinite advantage: had they applied to Charles for relief from their grievances, had they drawn the ſword in the juſt defence of theſe natural liberties, which no difference between papiſts and proteſtants ought to affect, and had they not at once ruſhed into barbarities which no provocation can juſtify, Charles might have found an aſylum in them, and they a protector in him: for though I am as ſtrongly convinced as any the moſt zealous partizans of that monarch's memory, that he deteſted the maſſacre of innocents that had been committed, yet I am entirely ſatisfied that he did not at all in his heart diſapprove of their taking up arms upon the principles they profeſſed: if they could have ſubmitted to have been directed by him, I am farther of opinion, that, had they not put off the characters of men, he would have thought a public indulgence in matters either of religion or liberty, much ſafer with a papiſt than a puritan or preſbyterian.

The king arrived in London on the twenty-fifth of November. The houſe of commons thinking, or at leaſt pretending to think, that he was concerned in the Iriſh rebellion, ſent but very ſlender ſupplies of men and money to that kingdom; and at the ſame time reſuming the diſpoſitions in which they had parted, they diſcovered in every vote their determined reſolution to extend their own authority, and to abridge the power of the ſovereign; and this they thought could not be ſo effectually brought about as by exaſperating the people againſt the government. With this view, a few days after his arrival from Scotland, they preſented to him at Hampton-court, that remonſtrance which has made ſo much noiſe, and which was ſoon after productive of the moſt important conſequences: it was not addreſſed to the king, but was plainly declared to be an appeal to the people; and the ſeverity of the matter was exceeded only by the acrimony of the ſtyle. It was, indeed, a recapitulation of all the wrong meaſures and provoking ſteps that Charles had committed ever ſince the commencement of his reign, for which he had ſo ſeverely atoned by the conceſſions he made, and the mortifications he had undergone. Amongſt other things, they pointed ſtrongly againſt the popiſh lords and the Engliſh prelates in the houſe of peers, to whom they attributed all the difficulties they met with from the peers in their meaſures. In concluſion, they petitioned the king for farther reſtraints and puniſhments upon the papiſts and their favourers; and they told him plainly, that unleſs he made uſe of ſuch miniſters, both at home and abroad, as they could confide in, they would give him no ſupport: they even let his majeſty know, that he was to gueſs at their meaning, though they neither named nor impeached perſons; and that it was enough to diſqualify any man for his ſervice if they diſtruſted him, or if he had ever been known to defend or countenance thoſe who had been queſtioned in parliament.

Had all the oppreſſions complained of here ſtill continued under Charles, this remonſtrance had been the braveſt and wiſeſt meaſure that any parliament ever purſued, and muſt have done immortal honour to its framers; but as all thoſe grievances had been already redreſſed; as the land-marks of the conſtitution had now been refixed; as Charles had been as liberal in granting, as his ſubjects had been importunate in aſking: all this, I ſay, being the caſe, what can any unprejudiced perſon imagine the true end of this remonſtrance to be? The anſwer is obvious! No wonder, therefore, that an appeal of ſuch an invidious and malignant nature, ſhould meet with a ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of commons, where it paſſed by a majority of only eleven, viz. one hundred and fifty-nine againſt one hundred and forty-eight. Indeed it was eaſy to ſee that the road muſt now divide, and that the well and the ill intentioned could no longer journey together. The proceedings of the oppoſition were very diſtaſteful to many of their own friends in the houſe, who began more and more to miſtruſt their intentions. Mr. Capel, member for Hertfordſhire, a perſon of great integrity and authority in parliament, had been very warm in the oppoſitition, and had been as forward as any gentleman in the houſe for removing the real grievances of his country: the like may be ſaid of the lords Falkland and Digby, ſir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde, and many others, whoſe concurrence againſt the court had given vaſt credit to the oppoſition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and perhaps farther than in duty, they could require, and that oppoſition ought to ceaſe. They made no ſecret of theſe ſentiments, and Mr. Capel had been called up to the houſe of peers; treaties were likewiſe on foot with many other noblemen and gentlemen, who were quite wearied out by the incroachments of the faction, but none had yet the courage, the lord Digby excepted, to break with the faction in the houſe of commons. It is ſaid that Oliver Cromwell, who was at this time a member of the houſe, declared, that if the remonſtrance did not paſs, he would ſell the little eſtate he had, and retire from England. I take notice of this ſpeech, only to prove that this extraordinary man was then an enthuſiaſt for that liberty which his ambition afterwards trampled upon.

When this remonſtrance was preſented to Charles, he received it with ſome impatience, but with great politeneſs and civility. It is remarkable, that it was carried to the king by ſir Ralph Hopton, who became afterwards ſo great a convert to his cauſe. But the faction thought they could not completely effect their ends, unleſs they could have the biſhops out of the upper-houſe: they eaſily ſtirred up the populace to their purpoſe, who filled the whole city with ſedition, and, aſſembling in great multitudes before the houſe of lords, exclaimed "No biſhops! no biſhops!" Twelve prelates, intimidated by thoſe riotous proceedings, reſolved to retire, after ſubſcribing a proteſt againſt all laws, votes, and reſolutions which ſhould be made in their abſence. The lords, upon receiving this proteſt, committed them to the Tower; upon which the reſt of the biſhops afterwards withdrew from the houſe. The tumults about Whitehall became every day more violent and outrageous, inſomuch that the royal perſon itſelf ſeemed in danger from the mad licentiouſneſs of the mob. In this ſcene of anarchy and confuſion, ſome reduced officers, and gentlemen of the inns of conrt, offered their ſervice to his majeſty. Between them and the rabble there happened frequent ſkirmiſhes, which were ſometimes attended with bloodſhed. By way of reproach, theſe gentlemen ſtigmatized the rabble with the appellation of Roundheads, on account of the ſhort, cropt hair, which they wore; and theſe, in return, gave the others the name of Cavaliers: and thus the nation, which was before ſufficiently exaſperated, as well by civil as religious quarrels, was likewiſe provided with party-names, under which the oppoſite leaders might range their adherents, and ſignalize their mutual hatred and reſentment. The countenance which Charles gave to the diſbanded officers to oppoſe the inſults of the mob, proved a fatal meaſure to him, as it gave the commons an handle for publicly encouraging the tumults, and for making a formal demand to the king for a guard, commanded by the earl of Eſſex, to be ſet over the parliament. The king refuſing the demand of a guard, they appointed a committee to ſit at Guildhall, the center of the factious rout that now protected them. A few days afterwards the king committed another indiſcretion, which was attended with more fatal and dangerous conſequences; an indiſcretion which, if it did not abſolutely cauſe, at leaſt greatly, accelerated all the diſorders and civil wars in which the kingdom was ſoon after involved. Lord Digby, a man of great abilities, but of a warm and paſſionate diſpoſition, ſhocked at the growing inſolence of the oppoſition, repreſented to Charles, that if he exerted the authority, and diſplayed the majeſty of a monarch, his inſolent ſubjects would inſtantly ſhrink before him: the queen, and ſome of the courtiers, enforced this topic; and Charles, who, though commonly moderate in his temper, was ever indeed too haſty, and had moreover lately received inſults, that no private gentleman, much leſs ſo great a prince, could well bear with patience, at laſt yielded to the fatal importunity of his friends and ſervants. He was encouraged to think that he could give the laſt blow to the popularity of the faction by producing evidences of their inviting the Scots to invade England; accordingly, on the third of January, 1642, Herbert, attorney-general, at the clerk's table in the houſe of peers, preſented the following articles of high-treaſon againſt the lord Kimbolton and five commoners (the moſt active of thoſe in the oppoſition), Mr. Denzil Holles, ſir Arthur Haſlerigg, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode. The articles exhibited againſt them were theſe:

"I. That they have traitorouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England; to deprive the king of his royal power, and to place in the ſubjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and eſtates of his majeſty's liege people.

"II. That they have traitorouſly endeavoured, by many foul aſſertions upon his majeſty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majeſty odious to them.

"III. That they have endeavoured to draw his majeſty's late army to diſobedience to his majeſty's command, and to ſide with them in their traitorous deſigns.

"IV. That they have traitorouſly invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majeſty's kingdom of England.

"V. That they have traitorouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the rights and very being of parliaments.

"VI. That for completing of their traitorous deſigns, they have endeavoured, ſo far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traitorous deſigns; and to that end have actually raiſed and countenanced tumults againſt the king and parliament.

"VII. And that they have traitorouſly conſpired to levy, and actually have levied war againſt the king."

The king ſeconded this attack, by another ſtill more raſh and inconſiderate: a ſerjeant at arms repaired to the houſe of commons, and demanded, in the king's name, the five impeached members; but he was diſmiſſed without any poſitive anſwer: meſſengers were ordered to ſearch for, and apprehend them; their trunks, chambers, and lodgings were ſealed and locked. The houſe declared all theſe proceedings to be a breach of privilege; and enjoined every one to defend the liberty of the members. The lords concurred with the commons in theſe reſolutions. Charles, ſtung with the united intention of the two houſes, did the moſt unadviſed thing that, perhaps, had ever been done by a king of England; he determined to ſupport what he had begun, by one vigorous ſtroke of authority: unhappily, he forgot that this was a conjuncture in which he ought not to expoſe that authority to any new affront. He went the next day, attended by his ordinary retinue, conſiſting of about two hundred perſons, armed as uſual, ſome with halberts, others with ſmall arms; and, leaving them at the door, advanced alone through the hall, while all the members ſtood up to receive him; and ſeating himſelf in the ſpeaker's chair, he, in a ſpeech he made to the houſe, inſiſted upon their delivering up the five members he had impeached; but looking round, and not ſeeing the accuſed perſons, who had previouſly withdrawn themſelves, he concluded his ſpeech with telling the houſe, that ſince the birds were flown, he expected, as ſoon as they did come to the houſe, they ſhould be ſent to him, "otherwiſe, ſaid he, I muſt tell you, that I ſhall take my own courſes to find them."

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the fury into which this act of Charles threw the houſe; the roof reſounded with the cry of, Privilege! Privilege! Charles, like a bewildered perſon, who knows not whither to turn himſelf, went that ſame afternoon to Guildhall, in order to demand aſſiſtance of the city: the common-council, inſtead of complying with his deſire, the next day preſented a remonſtrance againſt himſelf. On the eighth of January a new committee was appointed to ſit at Guildhall; and this, perhaps, was the moſt maſterly ſtroke of the party, becauſe it encreaſed the panic of the public, as if the members were not ſafe without the

the city. This committee, in which all who ſhould come were to have voices, made ſtrict ſcrutiny into every circumſtance attending the king's entrance into the houſe: every paſſionate expreſſion, every menacing look and geſture of any, even the meaneſt, of his attendants, was repreſented in the blackeſt and moſt odious colours; and an intention was thence inferred of offering violence to the parliament, of arreſting the impeached members in the very houſe, and of murdering all thoſe who ſhould make any reſiſtance; and they immediately produced a paper to be voted, as it was by the whole houſe, declaring the late act of the king to be "an high breach of the rights and privileges of parliament; and that the houſe cannot, with ſafety to their own perſons, or regard to the ſaid rights and privileges, continue to ſit there any longer, without full ſatisfaction being made to them for this inſult." Public directions were at the ſame time given for drawing down the train-bands of the city to Weſtminſter on the ſecond of January, to guard and bring in triumph the perſons of the accuſed members (who had taken ſhelter in the city), as ſuch worthy patriots that the commonwealth, at preſent, could not ſubſiſt independent of them.

The king being informed of theſe proceedings, and thinking his wife's, his children's, and his own life, in danger from the enraged multitude, took the fatal reſolution of removing from Whitehall to Hampton-court, with his queen and family, which he did on the afternoon of Monday the tenth of January; and now, become ſenſible of the extreme folly of his late conduct, and dreading the farther effects of popular reſentment, he endeavoured, if poſſible, to repair his errors, and to atone for the wrong ſtep he had taken, and which he found himſelf incapable of ſupporting. He accordingly ſent a meſſage to the commons on Wedneſday the twelfth of January, giving them to underſtand, "That he deſiſted from his proſecution of the five members, and that he would be as careful of the privileges of parliament as of his life or crown." He likewiſe, on the twentieth following, ſent another meſſage to parliament, deſiring them "to digeſt into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and to ſend them to him, promiſing his favourable aſſent to thoſe means which ſhould be found moſt effectual for redreſs; wherein he would not only equal, but exceed the moſt indulgent prince." There ſurely cannot, with any man of candour or common ſenſe, remain the leaſt doubt that theſe conceſſions were more than ſufficient to have quieted the apprehenſions of men whoſe inclinations were peaceable; but, unhappily, Charles had, by the violence of his former conduct, rendered himſelf odious to his parliament, and his preſent conceſſion made them deſpiſe him.

The commons began now to take the whole management of the kingdom into their own hands; they ordered the governors of Hull and Portſmouth, to admit no man into thoſe towns or forts, without an order ſigned by the parliament; they aſſumed the regal power of diſpoſing the militia, and trained-bands of the city of London, and even to name lord-lieutenants for the ſeveral counties, nay, ſo much as the captains that were appointed to command the ſhips of war. During this confuſion, the rebellion in Ireland triumphed over the weak oppoſition which had been made to it; and the inſurgents, reeking with the blood of their countrymen, carried on their barbarities under the king's name, and that of the queen his conſort, eſpecially the latter, as ſhe was a catholic. Both houſes now propoſed to raiſe the militia, but, at the ſame time, inſiſted that it ſhould be commanded by ſuch officers only as they ſhould nominate. Charles was now come from Hampton court to Greenwich, where the earls of Pembroke and Holland waited on him with a thundering declaration of the parliament, which conſiſted of a preamble of the cauſe of the preſent diſtractions, and the remedies for them, and in which they treated the king with their uſual inſolence. This declaration was delivered to him on the fifteenth of March; and the next day he delivered his full anſwer, in which he endeavoured to exculpate himſelf of the charge urged againſt him, and concluded with the following pathetic expreſſion: "God ſo deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true proteſtant religion, and for the obſervation and preſervation of the laws of this land; and I hope God will bleſs and aſſert theſe laws for my preſervation."

The two earls, upon the king's delivering his anſwer, renewed their requeſt, but all in vain, that he ſhould come nearer his parliament; and the earl of Pembroke preſſed him to grant the militia, as was deſired by the parliament, for a time. "By God (replied Charles), not for an hour: you have aſked that of me, in this, which was never aſked of any king; and with which, I would not truſt my wife and children." Charles then reproached the parliament for their conduct in the affairs of Ireland, and ſaid that "had he been truſted with the management of them, he would have pawned his head to have finiſhed that work; and though I am a beggar myſelf, concluded he, I can find money for that."

In the foregoing month of February, Charles's queen, Henrietta of France, daughter to Henry IV. had gone over to Holland, on pretence of accompanying her daughter, the princeſs Mary, to the prince of Orange, her huſband; but, in reality, to ſollicit ſuccours from that ſtate, in caſe of emergency; as it was pretty evident, from the proceedings on both ſides, that the appeal muſt ſoon be made to arms: ſhe negociated likewiſe at the northern courts; in a word, ſhe ſought every where for aſſiſtance, except in her own country, where cardinal Richelieu, her avowed enemy, and the king, her brother, were both dying. But to return.

Charles, now that he apprehended nothing from his queen, anſwered the numerous declarations, meſſages, and the like, that he was plied with from the parliament, with a ſpirit that drove the two houſes into new perplexities; and having ſent for the prince of Wales and the duke of York to come to him, he ſet out for York, which he was reſolved for ſome time to make the place of his reſidence, till the tumults in his capital were ſomewhat ſubſided. Hither the principal nobility and gentry repaired from all quarters of England, to pay their reſpects to their ſovereign, and to promiſe him their aid and aſſiſtance. As ſome ill meaning or ill informed hiſtorians of thoſe times have, with an air of confidence, aſſerted, that all the people of the kingdom were enemies to the king, except ſome officers of the army, the biſhops, the catholics, and thoſe who had been engaged in the Gunpowder-plot, we think it neceſſary to refute the calumny, by enumerating the principal perſons who attended Charles at York, and declared in his favour: theſe were, lord Littleton, keeper of the ſeals, the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton, Devonſhire, Clare, Monmouth, Caernarvon, Cumberland, Saliſbury, Cambridge, Weſtmoreland, Rivers, Newport, Lindſey, Bath, Dorſet, Northampton, Briſtol, Berkſhire, and Dover; the lords Falkland, Newark, Rich, Coventry, Capel, Grey of Ruthven, Pawlett, Saville, Dunſmore, Mowbray, Maltravers, Howard of Carleton, Lovelace, Mohun, and Seymour. Many other noblemen were employed in behalf of the royal cauſe, in different parts of the kingdom; a great number of the moſt powerful commoners eſpouſed it; and it was ſupported by the two univerſities: all in general, whoſe manners were poliſhed, and whoſe minds were enlarged by a liberal education, adhered to the king. The oppoſite faction conſiſted of thoſe whom the court had perſonally diſobliged; of ſuch as wanted to fiſh in troubled waters; of republicans and diſſenters, comprehending a great number of corporations, manufacturers, and the lower claſs of people, inflamed with the ſpirit of fanaticiſm.

The civil war was not yet declared. The parliament had, by its own authority, appointed one ſir John Hotham governor of Hull, a fortreſs on the ſea-coaſt of Yorkſhire, and which had, for a long time been a magazine for arms and ammunition: on the twenty-ſecond of April, Charles, attended with three hundred horſe, came before the place, and prepared to enter; but Hotham refuſed to open the gates of his garriſon to admit him. At firſt he ſent Charles a reſpectful meſſage, deſiring him not to approach; but his majeſty continuing to advance, Hotham ordered the bridge to be drawn up, the gates to be ſhut, and the garriſon to be drawn out in a poſture of reſiſtance. When Charles came near enough to be heard on the walls, he called for Hotham, and demanded entrance, which Hotham refuſed, under pretext of his being appointed to that truſt by the authority of parliament. It was in vain for Charles to repeat the demand of admittance; all he could obtain, was that his ſon and friends in the place ſhould be ſent out to him; for the governor would not admit him, though he offered to reduce his train to twenty perſons: and when he had tarried upwards of five hours before the place, he retired, about four o'clock in the afternoon, to Beverley, after proclaiming Hotham a traitor by two heralds at arms.

I ſhall not attempt to trouble the reader with thoſe papers which flew between Charles and his parliament, after the former had demanded from the latter juſtice upon Hotham; it is ſufficient to ſay that Hotham was not only vindicated, but rewarded for what he had done; and we are from this period to date the actual commencemt of that unhappy civil war which afterwards followed.

The nation was at this time in a very miſerable ſituation. The king iſſued out commiſſions of array all over the kingdom, and the execution of them was voted to be treaſonable by the parliament. The parliament made an ordinance, by which they took the militia into their own hands; and the execution of that was proclaimed to be treaſon by Charles: it was impoſſible for any man to be neutral between the two parties; but the parliament was amazed to find themſelves miſtaken in their own ſtrength, and that ſo great a part of the kingdom held with Charles. Lord-keeper Littleton, when he repaired to the king at York, had brought with him the great-ſeal of England, without which it was ſuppoſed there could be no law enacted: however, the parliament continued to enact laws, which were obeyed by their partizans as effectually as if they had the royal ſanction. The proceedings of the two parties being thus incompatible, both ſides made themſelves ready to decide the conteſt by force of arms. A little before, the parliament had ſent to Charles nineteen propoſitions, which containing ſuch demands as no crowned heads could accede to, he rejected; and, in a declaration he publiſhed, wrote ſuch an anſwer as muſt have ſatisfied every perſon whoſe judgment was not biaſſed by rancour and prepoſſeſſion: but he had to deal with a ſet of men who had planned a total revolution of government, and who had proceeded too far in this deſign to recede with ſafety; for this reaſon, they no ſooner received the king's anſwer, than they iſſued a declaration, repreſenting the abſolute neceſſity of putting themſelves in a poſture of defence againſt the violent deſigns of the king. They ordered an army to be raiſed for their defence, the command of which they gave to the earl of Eſſex, and they voted the earl of Bedford to be general of the horſe; but both theſe and the other officers were to be under the inſpection of a committee of the two houſes, who were to fill up all commiſſions. Great names were engaged on their ſide: Hampden, Whitlock, Maynard, Grimſton, St. John, and Selden, all of them great authorities in the law and conſtitution, accepted of parliament's commiſſions under the ordinance of the militia; but the great weight of landed intereſt operated for the king. Charles was furniſhed with money from the queen, on the jewels ſhe had ſold or pawned: but the parliament had a much better reſource in public credit, upon which great ſums were raiſed on loan; and little hoſtilities were already commenced between the royal and parliamentary party all over England. Luckily for the parliament, they had found means to get the important garriſon of Portſmouth into their hands, and to ſecure the fleet; but Charles was baffled in an attempt to ſecure Hull, where the great magazine of arms ſtill continued, and which, by a private concert between the lord Digby and Hotham, who now repented of his inſolence to his ſovereign, was to be delivered up to the king; but Hotham, either not having power or ſincerity enough to perform his engagements, the matter came to nought.

On the firſt of Auguſt the king ſummoned the principal gentry of the county of York, and acquainted them with the parliament's preparations for war, and deſired their advice and aſſiſtance: for the parliament had now publiſhed a declaration for the raiſing all power and force, by trained-bands or otherwiſe, to make head againſt all traitors and their adherents that oppoſed the parliament, and them to kill and ſlay as enemies to the peace of the kingdom; and in it they named moſt of the king's lord lieutenants and commiſſioners of array in the ſeveral counties. The king then recommend to them the completing of a regiment for the prince; and that he might not be behind hand with the parliament, he publiſhed a proclamation, wherein the earl of Eſſex was pronounced a rebel and traitor to the king and crown; and all colonels and officers, authorized by the parliament, that ſhould not inſtantly lay down their arms, were declared guilty of high-treaſon. To obviate this the parliament had declared, "that whoſoever ſhall return from the king to the parliament's army, within ten days after publication, ſhould have reception and pardon, excepting perſons impeached of delinquency or treaſon, or ſuch as have been eminent actors againſt them, and except the duke of Richmond, the earls of Briſtol, Cumberland, Newcaſtle, Rivers, and Caernarvon, the viſcounts Newark and Falkland, ſecretary Nicholas Endymion Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde. The king hearing the parliament intended ſending an army weſtward, gave commiſſion, under the great-ſeal of England, to the marquis of Hertford to be his lieutenant-general within the counties of Devon, Cornwall, Somerſet, Dorſet, Wilts, Southampton, Berks, Oxford, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecknock, Glamorgan, Caernarvon, Pembroke, and Cardigan; and ſent to encourage colonel Goring, who commanded in Portſmouth at that time for him. Charles ſoon after left York, and nothing remarkable happened to him, excepting that thecity of Coventry ſhut her gates againſt him and his troops; and, on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, he ſet up his ſtandard at Nottingham, but very few appeared, except a body of militia and about three hundred relugar troops, and thoſe very ill armed. Thus diſappointed, he once more turned his thoughts to peace, and ſent a meſſage to the two houſes by the earls of Southampton and Dorſet, and ſome other gentlemen, in order to a treaty of accommodation. In this meſſage the king ſignified, "that many miſtakes had ariſen by the meſſages, petitions, and anſwers, between him and the two houſes of parliament, which might be prevented by ſome other way of treaty, wherein the matters in difference might be more clearly underſtood, and more freely tranſacted; he propoſed that a certain number of perſons might be ſent, and enabled by the parliament to treat, in ſome indifferent place, with a like number authorized by him." Charles then, in a very pathetic manner, diſclaimed all intentions to injure his people's liberties, and lays the guilt at the door of the parliament, if they refuſe his offer. The parliament returned for anſwer, that they could agree to no terms, unleſs he would immediately take down his ſtandard and recal his proclamations againſt them by a certain day. And here the correſpondence broke off. This negotiation, unſucceſsful as it was, did Charles no ſmall ſervice; every one ſaw by what ſpirit the parliament was influenced: they had treated the earl of Southampton, and the other meſſengers from the king, with infinite indignity, and without paying even common civility to their perſons. The purport of the king's meſſage was ſufficiently public; and the parliament, inſtead of thinking upon peace, ordered all their officers to repair to their reſpective poſts immediately, and Eſſex himſelf ſet out with all haſte to the army: this was not all, for they publiſhed a moſt inſolent declaration in vindication of their own conduct, and vilely aſperſing the character of the king and his friends. This, with many other papers that continued to paſs between the king and the parliament, turned the tide of popular affection ſtrongly in favour of Charles, whoſe wants and weakneſs were inexpreſſible, while the parliament had in their hands all the revenues of the crown, his biſhops, the dignitaries of the church, the friends of his perſon, and an uncontracted power of raiſing what money they pleaſed. The earl of Eſſex had now drawn his army together at Northampton, and found it to amount to about ſixteen thouſand men, well armed and well provided with artillery, cloaths, money, and in high ſpirits. Charles had ſent ſir John Byron into Oxfordſhire, with a ſmall party of horſe, to bring him the plate which had been preſented him by that univerſity: the lord Hertford and the loyaliſts in the Weſt at firſt had vaſt appearance of ſucceſs; and he now received intelligence from all hands of great levies that were making for his ſervice: this gave Charles ſome hopes amongſt many diſcouragements, and at laſt he reſolved to leave Nottingham, and to put the iſſue to the fate of arms.

On the appearance of troubles in England, the princes Rupert (or Robert) and Maurice, ſons to the unhappy Palatine, had made a tender of their ſervice to the king, and the former at this time commanded a body of horſe, which had been ſent to Worceſter, in order to watch the motions of Eſſex, while the king ſet out upon his march for Shrewſbury, which, indeed, was the moſt convenient part of the kingdom for his rendezvous. While he was upon his march every hour brought him great acceſſions of ſtrength; and when he arrived at Wellington, within a days march of Shrewſbury, he ordered his army to be drawn up, and on reviewing it, found it to amount to about ten thouſand men. Lord Lindſey, who in his youth had learned the art of war in the Low Countries, was general; prince Rupert commanded the horſe; ſir John Aſtly, the foot; ſir Arthur Aſton, the dragoons; ſir John Heydon, the artillery. The lord Bernard Stuart was at the head of a troop of guards; their ſervants, under the conduct of William Killegrew, compoſed another troop, and always marched with their maſters. On this occaſion Charles made to them a ſpeech, ſo full of affectionate expreſſions, as rendered him to their thoughts an injured prince; and moved their compaſſion and loyalty ſo much, that they ſwore one and all to conquer or die in his cauſe. Some little time after his arrival at Shrewſbury, he received the news of an action, the firſt which had happened in theſe wars, and wherein his troops were ſucceſsful.

The earl of Eſſex had by this time marched with his army towards Worceſter, upon intelligence that the king himſelf intended to ſecure that place: luckily ſir John Byron had firſt taken poſſeſſion of that city for the king, in ſpite of the endeavours of captain Fiennes, who ſtrove to diſlodge him with ſome troops of the parliament and county-volunteers, with whom he aſſaulted the town on the weſtern ſide of the Severn: while they were engaged, prince Rupert arrived, with his brother Maurice, and had ſcarce alighted when he perceived five hundred horſe of Eſſex's army, commanded by colonel Sandys, advancing through a defile juſt at hand: he and his company immediately mounted, and, with admirable courage and preſence of mind, attacked the enemy juſt as they came out of the ſame, and totally routed them, with the loſs of their commander and thirty men killed on the ſpot, and took ſeveral of their officers priſoners. The ſucceſs of this firſt skirmiſh wonderfully ſpirited the royaliſts, and impreſſed the enemy with a terror of prince Rupert, who gave ſuch an early proof of his extraordinary courage and bravery. The prince, after the engagement, threw himſelf into Worceſter; but hearing that Eſſex was marching thither with his whole army, he quitted it, and retired to Ludlow, twenty miles from thence: nor was this intelligence ill founded, for, immediately after the prince's retreat, Eſſex came to Worceſter with his army, where he continued a month: from whence he detached the earl of Stamford, with a party, to Hereford, in order to impede the king's levies in South Wales; and ſent other detachments to take poſſeſſion of Gloceſter and Briſtol. The parliament began now to apprehend the king's ſtrength; for many began to appear for him in ſeveral parts of the kingdom: in the northern parts of Yorkſhire, the marquis of Newcaſtle, the earl of Cumberland, ſir Marmaduke Longdale, ſir Francis Wortley, and many others, had raiſed a great number of ſoldiers; and were ſo powerful, that the lord Fairfax, ſir Thomas Fairfax his ſon, ſir John Hotham and his ſon captain Hotham, who had aſſembled ſome men for the ſervice of the parliament, were not able to make head againſt them. In Cornwall, a body was forming under ſir Bevil Grenville, and ſir Nicholas Stanning; and ſir Ralph Hopton, a gentleman of good conduct and courage, was haſtening to them, to aſſiſt in their levies: and many others in ſeveral parts of the kingdom were arming on both ſides. Whilſt the affairs of England were in a military poſture, Ireland was neglected: ſome few regiments were ſent over from Scotland, and the earl of Leiceſter's regiment, under colonel Monk, from England, but in no proportion to the neceſſities of that kingdom; nevertheleſs they made many impreſſions upon their enemies in Leinſter and Ulſter, but Munſter was but meanly ſupplied.

It was now about the middle of October when the king, having raiſed ſuch an army as he thought would enable him to act upon the offenſive, began his march from Shrewſbury towards London; and in two days after his departure, the earl of Eſſex put himſelf in motion to attend his rear. On the twenty-ſecond of October the two armies were within ſix miles of each other: the king, having received intelligence that Eſſex had advanced to Kempton, a village on the borders of Warwickſhire, drew up his army on Edge-hill, about two miles from the enemy, and on Sunday the twenty-third of the month, gave the earl battle. The engagement, which was carried on with great bravery on both ſides, laſted till night parted the combatants: the next day both parties claimed the victory, but neither ſeemed inclined to renew the battle. Eſſex, however, firſt drew off, and retired to Warwick; the king returned to his former quarters. Each ſide had now time to diſcover its loſs, but it was greateſt on the ſide of the parliament; and no leſs than five thouſand are ſaid to have fallen of both armies in the fight. The earl of Lindſey, whoſe ſon, the lord Willoughby, was taken priſoner in attempting to reſcue his father, was carried in his wounds to a barn, where he expired with great magniminity, and with high ſentiments of the juſtice of the cauſe he died for, before the ſurgeons could arrive, whom the earl of Eſſex humanely ſent to dreſs his wounds. The lord Aubigny, brother to the duke of Richmond, and ſir Edward Verney, the king's ſtandard-bearer, were likewiſe among the number of the ſlain, on the king's part, and ſeveral other officers, but none of diſtinction. On the ſide of the parliament were killed the lord St. John and colonel Eſſex, one of their officers The chief priſoners on the king's ſide were the lord Willoughby, ſir Thomas Lundsford, ſir Edward Stradling, and ſir William Vavaſor: no gentleman of diſtinction, except ſir William Eſſex, father to the colonel was taken priſoner by the king.

The news of this action reaching London, the commons and their adherents were at firſt greatly alarmed; but expreſſes arriving from the army ſoon convinced them that their cauſe had received but a ſlight check; nay, they even aſſumed the merit of the victory, and ordered public thankſgivings for the ſame. Their next ſtep was to order the king's children to be removed from St. James's into the city; orders were given to fortify the neck of land over againſt Durham-houſe; and that the papiſts in Lancaſter ſhould be ſecured. An ordinance, both by the lords and commons, paſſed for providing a maintenance for the wounded ſoldiers, and the families of thoſe who ſhould be killed, in their ſervice. The priſoners in and about London were confined more ſtrictly than ever; and all ſhops were ordered to be ſhut up, that the ſhopkeepers and apprentices* might be at greater freedom to attend the defence of the kingdom.

After the royal army was ſufficiently refreſhed, it was again put in motion. A party of horſe advanced to Reading, which Mr. Martin commanded for the parliament; at the approach of which, both the governor and garriſon were ſeized with a ſudden panic, and fled precipitately to London. Charles, imagining that every thing would now yield before him, conducted his whole army to Reading; and, in a few days after, advanced to Colnbrook. While he lay here, the parliament

† As the body of London apprentices are frequently mentioned in the hiſtory of theſe troubles, and alſo in the ſucceeding reign, as a formidable corps of militia, it may not be amiſs to inſert the following character of them, as drawn up by a modern hiſtorian. "The London apprentices were a ſet which gained great honour to their party at this juncture: thoſe hot-beds of education, ſo common now-a days, which ripen childhood into youth, and youth into manhood, were then but little known; and apprentices were young men from ſixteen to twenty-four years of age, vigorous in their bodies, and unbroken in their conſtitution, through temperance, regular diet, and moderate exerciſe. They borrowed their notions of religion and government from their parents and maſters: and the parliament had given them a manumiſſion from their ſervices in the ſhop, to encourage their appearing in the field: they had been for ſeveral months daily exerciſed by Skippon, major-general of the parliament forces, and were now become ſo familiar with the ideas of war, that they thought its greateſt hazards, in what they imagined to be the defence of their country, to be preferable to the toils of the counter. A body of active, ſtout, young men, thus taught, thus fed, thus principled, and thus diſciplined, was far from being that awkward contemptible enemy modern writers have repreſented."

ſent a meſſage to him, by the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, with three commoners, requeſting his majeſty to fix on ſome convenient place for his reſidence near London, till commiſſioners ſhould attend him, with propoſals for healing the preſent unhappy breach between him and his parliament. Charles named Windſor; and required that the garriſon ſhould be withdrawn, and his own troops received into the caſtle. Northumberland, and the reſt, immediately poſted back with this anſwer; and, on his arrival at Weſtminſter, prevailed with the parliament to write a letter to the king, intimating a ceſſation of arms on their part, and requiring the like on his; but it happened that ſame night (November 11) that Charles had diſpatched the parliament's meſſengers, news was brought, that Eſſex had, by long and haſty marches, advanced with his army and artillery, and had poſſeſſed himſelf of Windſor, Hampton, and Acton; and that he was now fortifying himſelf in Brentford; which if he was ſuffered to do, the king's army would be ſo ſtreightened, that it could neither make any motion, nor, indeed, ſubſiſt. Whereupon a council of war being called, prince Rupert was ordered to attack the parliament's regiments and works at Brentford; which he did with irreſiſtible fury; and notwithſtanding the noble reſiſtance the regiment of Holles made, they were all cut off, drowned, wounded, or taken priſoners; and prince Rupert remained maſter of Brentford. Loud were the complaints raiſed againſt this attack by the parliament party, as being an inſtance of the moſt apparent perfidy, and a breach of the treaty then negociating on both ſides. Inſpired with reſentment, as well as concerned for its own ſafety, the city marched its trained-bands, in excellent order, to reinforce the army under Eſſex; who drew up his forces, now amounting to twenty-four thouſand men, at Turnham-green *, to oppoſe the march of the king towards London, for which Charles was now preparing; but finding the number of the enemy ſo greatly ſuperior to his own, he thought it moſt prudent to retire over the bridge at Kingſton to Oatlands, and from thence to Reading, where he left a good garriſon; and then marched with his army to Oxford.

While matters paſſed thus in the neighbourhood of the capital, the king's forces in the North became very conſiderable; the earl of Newcaſtle and the earl of Cumberland having joined each other with their troops, made up a little army of eight thouſand horſe and foot, which were daily encreaſing; ſo that lord Fairfax and his ſon, Sir Robert Fairfax, and others who commanded for the parliament in thoſe parts, were not able to make head againſt them, eſpecially after the arrival of colonel Goring at Newcaſtle, with a ſupply of two hundred men and ammunition from Holland. Upon this, Fairfax applied to the parliament for aſſiſtance, and they found means to engage the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, Cambridge, and the city of Norwich, in an aſſociation, to ſtand by them with their arms and fortunes; and the lord Grey, of Werk, received a commiſſion from Eſſex, appointing him commander in chief in thoſe parts, with an authority to raiſe forces.

About the beginning of February, 1643, the queen landed from Holland, at Burlington bay, with a conſiderable ſupply of artillery, arms, and ammunition; and, very ſhortly after, ſet out again in queſt of new ſuccours. Sir Hugh Cholmley, who had the government of Scarborough for the parliament, declared for the king, and with him three hundred men of his garriſon. Sir John Hotham alſo, and his ſon, were at this time inclined to play the double traitor, and deſert the parliament's ſervice; but their intentions being diſcovered, they were both ſeized at Hull, and ſent up priſoners to London, where they afterwards paid the forfeit of their treaſons with their lives. The parliament, having fortified Gloceſter with a good garriſon, thought of enlarging their quarters towards Oxford; and had, in order thereto, thrown a ſtrong body of forces into Cirenceſter. Charles, not liking this neighbourhood, ordered prince Rupert, with four thouſand horſe and foot, to make himſelf, if poſſible, maſter of that town. That active commander readily undertook the ſervice, and ſucceeded, by taking the town by ſtorm, cutting in pieces a whole regiment of the parliament's forces, taking eleven hundred priſoners, about four thouſand ſtands of arms, and the enemy's whole magazine. Notwithſtanding this ſucceſs, Charles ſtill hoped to relieve the calamities of his people, and wiſhed to recover his own broken fortune by an equitable peace, and therefore propoſed a treaty to the parliament; to which, after many debates, they conſented; and about the beginning of March, the earl of Northumberland, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. William Armyne, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Bulſtrode Whitlock, attended him at Oxford with propoſitions of peace; but they were dictated in ſuch an arbitrary ſtile, and ſo debaſed the very eſſence of majeſty, that they ſeemed to breathe the language of ſucceſsful traitors, not the deſires of patriotic or peaceful ſubjects. Charles, however, reſolved to have them diſcuſſed; but he found the commiſſioners ſo ſtraitened in time, and tied to ſuch particular inſtructions by the two houſes, that nothing could be brought about that could conduce to compoſe the reigning diſorders of the commonwealth, without abſolutely ſacrificing the kingly character; inſomuch, that, after many meſſages between London and Oxford, the commiſſioners returned to the parliament on the ſeventeenth of April; upon which, the earl of Eſſex was ordered to advance with his army to beſiege the king's garriſon in Reading.

Eſſex had under him twenty thouſand fine well-appointed troops; the town was but indifferently fortified, and had in it a garriſon of three thouſand foot, and about three hundred horſe, commanded by Sir Arthur Aſton, and under him colonel Fielding. The largeneſs, and ill condition of the place, but, above all, the conſumption of powder which its defence muſt require, and with which Charles was very ill provided, had given him ſome thoughts of drawing the garriſon and magazines off to Oxford; but before this could be done, the

* We cannot here omit the oration major-general Skippon made at the head of his Londoners, to animate them, as it is ſo characteriſtical, both of the man and the ſpirit of the party: "Come my boys, ſays he, my brave boys, let us pray heartily and fight heartily; I will run the ſame fortunes and hazards with you; remember the cauſe is for God, the defence of yourſelves, your wives and children: come, my honeſt brave boys, let us pray heartily and fight heartily, and God will bleſs us."

place was inveſted by Eſſex. His approaches were ſo indifferently carried on, that the parliament's engineers appeared to be very little acquainted with the buſineſs of beſieging towns. They had, however, ſuch advantages by the ſituation of the place, that their cannon played directly into the town, and one of their ſhot diſabled Aſton, to the irreparable loſs of the king, who was now preparing to relieve the place; but while he was upon his march, the garriſon, under Fielding, who had ſucceeded Aſton in command, after killing, in their ſallies, a great number of parliamentarians, found themſelves obliged to capitulate, and to deliver up the town; for which, Fielding was afterwards ſentenced to loſe his head by a council of war at Oxford, but he was pardoned by Charles. The articles of capitulation were extremely advantageous for Charles, by giving him back his whole garriſon; but they were very ill obſerved by the parliamentarians, which occaſioned ſevere repriſals afterwards by the royal party.

At this time ſcarce one county in England was free from the horror of civil war; the royaliſts were victorious in moſt parts; in Warwickſhire, Northamptonſhire, and Staffordſhire, many encounters paſſed between the king's forces under prince Rupert, and the earl of Northampton, the the lord Brooke, Sir John Gill, and Sir William Brereton, for the parliament; in one of which, fought on Hopton heath, the earl of Northampton loſt his life, and the lord Brooke was ſlain before the town of Litchfield, which was afterwards taken by his forces, and again retaken by prince Rupert. In Yorkſhire, and the more northern parts, the lord Fairfax and his ſon, Sir Thomas, afterwards ſo famous under the title of General Fairfax, had ſucceſs greater than could be expected from the ſmall force they had with them; but at length the whole county was reduced by the king's troops, and Fairfax, with his followers, were obliged to ſhut themſelves up in Hull. The greateſt part of Wales remained firm to the royal cauſe; the parliament, therefore, in order to check the king's good fortune in that part of the country, diſpatched the earl of Stamford with an army into the Weſt, where Sir Ralph Hopton, with his forces, lay before Plymouth, in the parliament's poſſeſſion. Sir Ralph, hearing of the earl's approach, drew forth his troops and gave him battle, in which he defeated the greateſt part of his forces; and then a truce was agreed upon between the earl and him for three weeks; during which time ſir George Chudleigh, who had been very active and ſucceſsful for the parliament in Denbighſhire, upon a due reflection on the views of both parties in the preſent unnatural conteſt, quitted the oppoſition, and joined himſelf to the king; but, to ſatisfy his friends of the reaſons of of this tergiverſation, he publiſhed a ſhort declaration, which we are perſuaded our readers will be pleaſed to ſee, not only as it is doing great honour to the underſtanding, integrity, and patriotic loyalty of this gallant officer, but as it ſpeaks the ſentiments of moſt of the moderate part of the oppoſition, in regard to the ſtate of affairs between the king and parliament at this juncture.

"That petitions of right, ſays he, are commendable, and remonſtrances may be uſeful; but arms, though defenſive, are very doubtful. My lot (ſays he) fell to caſt on the parliament ſide, by a ſtrong opinion of the goodneſs of their cauſe, which, to my judgment, then appeared to be ſo. Religion, and the ſubjects liberty, ſeemed to me to be in danger; but the deſtruction of kingdoms cannot be the way to ſave it, nor can the loſs of Chriſtian ſubjects, nor the ſubjects loſs of their eſtates by plunder or aſſeſſment, concur with piety, nor yet with propriety: as for religion, which is the chief, his majeſty (whom God long preſerve) has given us unqueſtionable ſecurity. I have caſt myſelf at my ſovereign's feet, and implored his gracious pardon; I will contend no more in word or deed. And this my reſolution, with the indiſputable grounds thereof, I thought good to declare to my friends and countrymen, that they may underſtand that my change doth proceed from no compulſion."

The parliamentarians, however, were not diſcouraged; they knew they had powerful reſources, and though for the preſent unſucceſsful, they ſtill acted as maſters againſt whom the king had rebelled. They condemned and executed for treaſon ſeveral of their fellow-ſubjects, who had delivered up to the king his own towns*; while the king, on his ſide, refrained from all cruel repriſals on his priſoners. This conduct may ſerve to juſtify, in the opinion of poſterity, a prince who has been repreſented ſo criminal towards his people, and teach us to pity the unnatural perſecution he ſuffered from his ſubjects, while we blame the cauſes of offence he had given them; for which, however, he had offered every atonement, every reparation, that majeſty could make.

The two capital armies, that under Charles, and that under Eſſex, lay all this while inactive; the former about Abingdon and Oxford, the latter about Reading. Eſſex, in the whole of his operations againſt the king, ſeems to have been under the conſtant check of rencountering loyalty. According to the account given of the battle of Edge-hill by the earl of Clarendon himſelf, he could have taken the king and the two princes priſoners, but forbore, moſt probably from the motives already aſſigned; in fine, a ſtrong probability ariſes, that he was not yet in earneſt in the oppoſition, and that he never intended to carry hoſtilities farther againſt the king and his party than was neceſſary for his own defence in the ſervice he had embraced. However this might be, his conduct appeared very doubtful to his beſt friends, and the violent party in parliament could not help diſtruſting him; they now openly blamed him for not marching againſt Oxford; and, as the parliament officers who ſerved under him were daily improving in military knowlege, he could find no pretext for longer inactivity, being lately joined by Sir William Waller, who had by this time reduced Hereford, and made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Worceſter; he made a march towards Oxford, and fixed his head quarters at Thame, upon the borders of Buckinghamſhire, in order to over-awe that county, which now grew turbulent in favour of Charles.

* Yeamans and Bourcher were executed at Briſtol, for endeavouring to ſeize that town for the king; the like happened to ſeveral gentlemen and citizens of London, for a deſign laid to ſeize the city and ſeveral members of parliament, in order to have put a period to the civil war, by ſtopping the iſſues of it in the fountain. Edmund Waller, the famous poet, was on this occaſion expelled the houſe of commons, of which he was a member, impriſoned a year in the Tower, fined ten thouſand pounds, and baniſhed to France for ten years; the others concerned with him were publicly executed. See Journals of the Houſe of Commons, anno 1643.

While he remained in this poſt, colonel Urrey, a Scotch officer, who had ſerved in Germany with general Ruthven, now created earl of Brentford, took this opportunity of deſerting to the king, and perſuaded prince Rupert to beat up the quarters of the enemy, after having particularly informed him of their diſpoſition. To demonſtrate the practicability of ſuch an exploit, he propoſed to go as a volunteer with a detachment, which he conducted to part of theſe quarters, where he defeated ſome regiments and brought a great number of priſoners to Oxford. Prince Rupert, encouraged by his ſucceſs, complied with his advice in making a more vigorous attack upon that part of their army, which was quartered at Thame. They departed from Oxford with a ſtrong body of horſe, and taking a long circuit in the night, arrived, by break of day, at Wickham, where they cut in pieces two regiments of the enemy; they attacked another quarter with the ſame ſucceſs, and attempted to retire by a bridge, at which they had left a ſufficient guard. By this time the earl of Eſſex had taken the alarm and detached part of his cavalry to detain the prince till he ſhould be able to advance with the infantry. They overtook him at the ſkirts of Chalgrave-field, where he wheeled about, and charged them with ſuch impetuoſity, that they betook themſelves to flight, after having loſt ſome of their beſt officers, and among the reſt the celebrated John Hampden, who had acted as colonel of a regiment, ſince the beginning of the war, and proved in many encounters that his courage was equal to any other of his extraordinary endowments. The candour and moderation for which this gentleman was diſtinguiſhed in the beginning of the oppoſition to the king's meaſures, had given way to a violent animoſity againſt the ancient conſtitution, and the perſon of his ſovereign, by whom he had been declared guilty of high-treaſon. This was an affront he never could forgive. He became paſſionate, and even ferocious; diſcouraged all overtures towards an accommodation, and now his death ſtruck a damp into the hearts of the whole faction. Other officers were ſlain or taken priſoners. The army under Eſſex was diſpirited by theſe checks, diminiſhed by diſtempers and want of neceſſaries, ſo that he thought proper to remove from Thame and put his troops into quarters of refreſhment at St. Alban's, Uxbridge, and other places in that neighbourhood. On the other hand, prince Rupert returned in triumph to Oxford, and recommended Urrey to the king in ſuch warm encomiums of his courage and conduct, that he received the honour of knighthood, and was preferred to the command of a regiment.

The king's affairs ſtill wore a favourable aſpect in the weſtern counties, where the neutrality was over-ruled as in the North by the votes and declarations of the parliament. Major Chudleigh, with a body of the enemy, made an attempt upon Launceſton, but being repulſed, retired to Kingſton. About the middle of May, the earl of Stamford marching into Cornwall, at the head of ſeven thouſand horſe and foot, with a train of artillery, encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton, and detached ſir George Chudleigh, with twelve hundred cavalry, to ſurprize the ſheriff of the county at Bodmin. The Corniſh loyaliſts, under lord Mohun and ſir Ralph Hopton, ſeized this opportunity of attacking their infantry in the abſence of their horſe: they formed their ſmall army into four diviſions, and attacked the hill in as many different parts; after a very warm conteſt, they met upon the ſummit, diſarmed major-general Chudleigh, routed the parliamentarians, and took poſſeſſion of their cannon and camp, while the earl of Stamford retired with precipitation to Exeter, and ſir George Chudleigh, with their cavalry, took the ſame route from Bodmin, as ſoon as he was informed of the earl's diſaſter. The victorious loyaliſts, having received orders to join prince Maurice and the marquis of Hertford, who had advanced as far as Somerſetſhire, began their march, and joining the marquis at Chard, the two bodies united, amounted to above ſeven thouſand men, in excellent order, with a good train of artillery: thus ſtrengthened, they took Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunſter caſtle, almoſt without oppoſition.

The reputation which the Corniſh men obtained in this action, gave infinite ſpirits to the king's party; and the affair of the Weſt became now the principal object both with Charles and the parliament; the latter put Sir William Waller at the head of a new army, to march into Somerſetſhire and retrieve their affairs. Waller was a man of ſpirit and fortune, and had ſerved the parliament ſo effectually on many occaſions, that, in the city of London, he obtained the name of William the Conqueror; he was a thorough paced republican, and was conſidered by the violent of the parliament party as the moſt proper officer to ſucceed Eſſex, if it ſhould be found neceſſary to lay that general aſide: in this expedition, however, he proved very unfortunate, for, in leſs than a fortnight, he loſt two battles, one at Lanſdown, on the fifth of July, wherein Sir Bevil Grenville was ſlain; and another at Roundway-down, on July the tenth; in the latter of which, his army was entirely routed, and ſo diſperſed, that it was no longer ſerviceable; Waller himſelf fled to Briſtol.

The affairs of the king in the North at this time went on very proſperouſly; the queen had again returned to England with a ſecond ſupply of men, and a ſum of money ſhe had raiſed by pawning the crown-jewels in Holland; for which the parliament, agreeable to the uſual ſpirit of their proceedings, had voted her guilty of high-treaſon. Matters, however, were ſo ſucceſsful for Charles, that the queen ventured to obey him, by marching ſouth, with all the troops, artillery, and ammunition, under her command, and found her royal conſort at Edge-hill, on the very day his troops gained the battle of Roundway-down: from Edge-hill they entered Oxford in a triumphant manner, while the Corniſh forces reduced Bath, and then marched to form the ſiege of Briſtol, in conjunction with the troops under prince Rupert. It was the twenty-fourth day of July, before the approaches began; the place was rich, and garriſoned by two thouſand five hundred foot, and a regiment of horſe, under the command of Fiennes, who was but an indifferent ſoldier. After ſome deliberation, the city was aſſaulted by the loyaliſts with ſuch incredible courage, that the garriſon beat a parley, and ſurrendered upon terms. Beſides this important ſucceſs, Charles, at this time, gained another, by prince Rupert's ſeizing the ſhips in which the moſt wealthy citizens of Briſtol had embarked their riches, with a view of conveying them to London.

All this time Charles had ſubſiſted his forces by contributions and aſſeſſments, or by loans, and voluntary preſents from all parts of the kingdom; but the ſupplies, even including thoſe brought him by his queen, were ſtill very diſproportionable to his preſſing neceſſities. The reſources of the parliament were more numerous, and more conſiderable: and, of conſequence, all their military preparations were in much greater order and readineſs. Beſides a tax levied in London, amounting to the twenty-fifth part of every one's ſubſtance, they impoſed on that city a weekly aſſeſſment of ten thouſand pounds, and another of twenty-three thouſand five hundred and eighteen, on the reſt of the kingdom: and as their authority was very great in moſt counties, they levied theſe taxes with the utmoſt regularity.

A few days after the taking of Briſtol, Charles went to view that city, in which he had not long arrived before he received news of the ſurrender of Dorcheſter to the earl of Caernarvon; and a day or two after, Portland, Weymouth, and Melcombe, ſubmitted likewiſe; ſo that by the end of this ſummer, the royal party was in poſſeſſion of all the weſtern counties from the fartheſt part of Cornwall, except ſome few garriſons that were blocked up. In the North, even to the borders of Scotland, there was no army in the field to oppoſe the king, and his forces marched whitherſoever they pleaſed. London was now greatly divided between the two parties; many of the wealthier and more creditable citizens favoured the king's cauſe; and moſt of the gentry of the aſſociated counties already mentioned, were ready, upon the firſt appearance of the king at the head of his army, to have ſecured thoſe counties for him. Theſe conſiderations ſeemed naturally to point out, as the only rational ſtep, that the king ſhould have marched with his army to London, and have diſpatched the earl of Newcaſtle, at the head of his victorious band, into the aſſociated counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, whereby a ſpeedy end would, in all probability, have been put to this civil war. But, in the midſt of theſe hopes, the king calling a council at Briſtol, to deliberate how he was next to employ his arms, it was reſolved, that the Weſtern army ſhould be ſent back to protect the loyaliſts in their own counties, and that the ſiege of Gloceſter ſhould be forthwith undertaken. Nothing could be more fatal to the king's affairs than this laſt reſolution; a few days after which, the earl of Newcaſtle ſat down before Hull, where the lord Fairfax had taken refuge, after ſeveral repeated defeats; and who, aſſiſted by one colonel Meldrum, a Scotchman, defended the place with great bravery and conduct for ſeveral weeks, though he was vigorouſly attacked; at laſt, on the eleventh of October, the beſieged made a grand ſally, and after a very obſtinate fight, which was ſeveral times renewed, drove the beſiegers from their trenches, and ſeized upon their cannon; whereupon Newcaſtle was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. The ſame day this ſally was made by the garriſon of Hull, part of the earl of Newcaſtle's army, commanded by the lord Widdrington, was routed at Horncaſtle, by the earl of Mancheſter, a general of the parliament's forces, who had with him Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell, which latter, by a painful obſervance of the duties of the field, and a remarkable zeal for the cauſe, was now become a lieutenant-colonel under the parliament: he had never been in foreign ſervice; and, if we may believe his cotemporaries, his courage was rather the reſult of experience and reaſon, than the effect of his natural diſpoſition; as he was a perfect judge of human nature, he began now to put in practice his favourite ſcheme, of inſpiring thoſe under him, and about him, with an enthuſiaſm that might overballance all the ſentiments of honour, loyalty, and duty, in the other party. How well this ſucceeded, the ſubſequent part of this hiſtory will demonſtrate to us.

To the fatal ſiege of Gloceſter the king in perſon, with his army, marched in the beginning of Auguſt; and about the tenth of that month he ſat down before it, with about eight thouſand horſe and foot, and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which were frequently interrupted by the ſallies of the beſieged. The parliament greatly fearing the loſs of this place, diſpatched the earl of Eſſex inſtantly to its relief, who began his march from Hounſlow Heath on the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt. The rendezvous of his troops was at Ayleſbury, where being joined by the lord Grey and reinforcements from the aſſociated counties, he found himſelf at the head of eight thouſand infantry, and half that number of horſe; then he continued his march by Brackley, though he was a little incommoded by a detachment of the king's horſe, ſent on purpoſe to harraſs him with light skirmiſhes. He proceeded, however, with great expedition, and the king's forces abandoning their works at his approach, he entered Gloceſter in triumph, when the garriſon was reduced to extremity. Having ſupplied the city with proviſion, ammunition, and reinforced the garriſon, he marched to Tewkeſbury, whence he made a ſudden motion to Cirenceſter, where he ſurprized two regiments of the royaliſts, and ſeized a great quantity of proviſions prepared for the kings army: then he took his route through the northern parts of Wiltſhire, having marched twenty miles before the king was informed of his motions. Prince Rupert was immediately ſent after him, in order to intercept his march till the king could come up in perſon, with the reſt of the army. This general came up with the earl as he was marching over Aubourn Chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night: a ſharp conflict enſued, prince Rupert charged the earl's rear with ſuch fury that it was put into great diſorder. The marquis de la Vieuville, a French officer, who had attended the queen out of Holland, and ſerved the king as a volunteer, was killed in this action, which, by its ill ſucceſs obliged Eſſex to take up his quarters at Hungerford. The next day he continued his marched towards Newbury, but found that the king had prevented him by two hours, and had poſted himſelf near that town. Prince Rupert, after the action of the foregoing day (September 18), went and joined the royal army. It is certain that

Charles was poſſeſſed of advantages in conſequence of this ſituation, which, had he known how to preſerve them, muſt have proved deciſive in his favour; but his officers had ſuch a contempt of the London apprentices, which compoſed a great part of Eſſex's army (and whoſe character we have already mentioned), that, forgetting all the advantages they had, they attacked the parliamentarians in ſtrong parties, till a general engagement became unavoidable; for Eſſex, finding his ſoldiers eager to return the affronts of the royal army, led them on in perſon to the fight, about ſix o'clock in the morning of the twentieth of September, which was continued with great gallantry on both ſides till night put an end to the diſpute. In this engagement, which was known by the title of the Firſt Battle of Newbury, the royal army ſuffered greatly, and its loſs was much aggravated by the quality of thoſe that fell in the fight, there being ſlain, beſides twenty officers of note, Ralph Dormer earl of Caernarvon, Henry Spencer earl of Sunderland, and Lucius Carey viſcount Falkland ſecretary of ſtate, a nobleman univerſally reſpected by all who knew him, for his great parts, ingenuity, and honour; he was a zealous promoter of all endeavours towards peace between the king and parliament: he fell in the thirty-fourth year of his age. Whatever lord Clarendon may pleaſe to aſſert, the victory was certainly on the ſide of the parliament: Charles recalled his troops from the field, and left Eſſex to purſue his march to Reading unmoleſted, where he arrived, after the battle of Newbury, to be at hand to protect the city of London, the very thing Charles wanted to prevent him from doing. Upon the whole, it was no wonder if Eſſex, at his arrival at Reading, on the twenty-ſecond of September, ordered public thanks to be given in the town, and was moreover welcomed with his army into London with triumphal honours by the city and parliament; while the king, with a diſconcerted, diſconſolate army, took up his winter quarters about Oxford. It appears, by the Journals of the Houſe of Commons, that the faction there were unwilling their army ſhould quit Reading; nor, indeed, does it appear to me why it was abandoned to the royaliſts, unleſs it was owing to the impatience of the Londoners to return home. Maſſey and the garriſon of Gloceſter were nobly rewarded, and the ſeveral committees were appointed to look to the recruiting the army, as if their intention had been that very winter to have attacked Oxford itſelf, where every thing was in the utmoſt confuſion and deſpair.

During the interval between the king's laying ſiege to Gloceſter and the battle of Newbury, ſeveral tranſactions happened, which we ſhall now briefly mention. The two houſes received Waller, after the defeat in the Weſt, with the warmeſt expreſſions of eſteem: he was appointed commander in chief of the forces and militia of London; and they declared they would enable him to take the field again, to relieve their diſtreſſed friends in the Weſt. They paſſed an ordinance to raiſe a new army under the command of the earl of Mancheſter, to oppoſe the earl of Newcaſtle, and protect the aſſociated counties of Eſſex, Hertford, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, and Lincoln: then they ſent a committee of both houſes to ſoothe the earl of Eſſex, who had been for ſome time diſguſted, and had indeed conferred with the moderate party upon expedients to force the two houſes into pacific meaſures. Whatever arguments the committee uſed, he was perſuaded to re-adopt their ſentiments; and his other friends, fearing he would diſcover their deſign, withdrew themſelves from the parliament. The earl of Portland, lord Lovelace, and lord Conway, repaired to Oxford; and their example was followed by the earl of Clare; the earls of Bedford and Holland eſcaped to the king's garriſon at Wallingford; and the earl of Northumberland retired to his own houſe at Petworth, in Suſſex.

While the king was employed in the ſiege of Gloceſter, the towns of Dorcheſter, Weymouth, and Portland ſurrendered to the earl of Caernarvon, who left his army under the command of prince Maurice, and repaired to the king, in diſcontent for ſome outrages which the troops had committed with impunity. Sir John Digby routed a party of the parliament's forces at Torrington; Barnſtaple and Biddeford were ſurrendered to him without oppoſition; and prince Maurice undertook the ſiege of Exeter, which was delivered into his hands by capitulation by the earl of Stamford. About the time we are now ſpeaking of, the parliament reſolved upon a very extraordinary action, which was the making a new great-ſeal: this innovation was at firſt very warmly oppoſed, but at length it was reſolved upon by a majority of voices in both houſes; yet, to preſerve ſome colour of decency, they paſſed an order, "that if the lord-keeper Littleton did not, upon ſummons, return with the great-ſeal within fourteen days, he ſhould loſe his place; and whatever ſhould be ſealed therewith by him, after that time, ſhould be null and void in law." But this menacing vote did not bring the great-ſeal from Oxford, ſo that the new great-ſeal was made, and ſome few months afterwards the uſe of it authorized by ordinance of both houſes.

The court of France penetrated with the helpleſs ſituation of Charles, ſent the count d'Harcourt (a prince of the houſe of Lorraine, and a great general) as ambaſſador to England, to offer the mediation of France to compoſe the differences between the king and the parliament. He came firſt to London, and addreſſed himſelf to both houſes for a ſafe-conduct to Oxford, to the king, which they granted; and on the eighteenth of October he made his entry into that city, and three days after he had a public audience in the great hall at Chriſt-church, where the king and queen received him with great ſtate and magnificence; and, whilſt he ſtaid at Oxford, he and his retinue were lodged in St. John's college: but finding himſelf unable to effect any thing by his embaſſy, after a few months ſtay he returned.

The parliament continued ſtill ſtubborn and inflexible; and, what is very extraordinary, an aſſembly of a few men conducted their deſigns with more ſteadineſs, than a king at the head of his army. The puritans having got the majority in both houſes, threw aſide the mask; they entered into a ſolemn league with Scotland, and ſigned the famous Covenant with that people. By this Covenant the ſubſcribers bound themſelves to ſupport the reformed religion in the three kingdoms; to eſtabliſh a uniformity in doctrine and diſcipline; to extirpate popery and prelacy; to maintain the privileges of the parliament and people; to defend his majeſty's perſon and authority, in the preſervation and defence of the true religon and liberty of the kingdom; to diſcover and puniſh incendiaries and malignants; to eſtabliſh a firm peace and union to all poſterity; and to renounce neutrality and reſiſt temptation: to repent of their ſins, amend their lives, and vie with each other in the great work of reformation." This Covenant was read in St. Margaret's church, at Weſtminſter, in preſence of both houſes, by whom it was ſubſcribed; and the commons ordered that it ſhould be taken the following Sunday by all perſons who lived under their juriſdiction.

It was plain by this covenant that the Scottiſh and Engliſh puritants wanted to erect themſelves into a republic: this was the ſpirit of Calviniſm, which had long been at work in France upon the ſame good deſign; it ſucceeded in Holland, but in France and England this darling ſcheme of the people could not be effected without ſheding oceans of blood. The rage of civil war was cheriſhed by the gloomy and auſtere behaviour, which was affected by the puritans. The parliament took this opportunity to oblige their Scottiſh friends by ordering the Book of Sports, compoſed by king James I. to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman; they thought by this action to ſhew their religion, and to offer a ſtabbing inſult to the reigning prince. In the courſe of this year the parliament likewiſe ordered that each family ſhould deprive itſelf of one meal in the week, and contribute the value of it for carrying on the war. One of the ſtrongeſt proofs of the inflexible ſtiffneſs which had taken poſſeſſion of all minds at this time, is the puniſhment of William Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was condemned by the parliament, after having been four years in priſon: when this prelate was brought to his trial, he made ſuch a vigourous defence, that the commons perceiving that he could not be capitally convicted in the common courſe of evidence, declared him guilty of high-treaſon by an act of attainder; although it remains a fact upon record, that the chief crime proved upon him, was his having made uſe of ſome of the ceremonies of the Romiſh communion at the conſecration of a church in London. He pleaded the king's pardon, which had been conveyed to him from Oxford; but it was declared null by both houſes. Being ſentenced to the death of a common felon, he petitioned that, as he was a biſhop, a privy-counſellor, and a peer of the realm, he might be indulged with decapitation, a requeſt which the commons granted with difficulty. He ſuffered on the tenth of January, 1644, in the ſeventy-third year of his age.

Both kingdoms having agreed to the Covenant, the ſtates of Scotland appointed commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh, concerning the aid they deſired, which was that they would bring into England to their aſſiſtance an army conſiſting of twenty-one thouſand horſe and foot; towards the raiſing of which the parliament ſent one hundred thouſand pounds into Scotland, and great levies of men were made for this army, which entered England the beginning of the year 1644, and took poſſeſſion of Berwick: they were commanded by Leſly, an old officer under the earl of Leven. Charles finding the parliaments of England and Scotland both united againſt him, and being hard preſſed between the two armies, thought it neceſſary to conclude a truce with the Roman catholics of Ireland; and prince Maurice and the earl of Antrim were ſent to Ireland to bring over two thouſand troops from thence to the weſt of Scotland by the firſt of April, where they were to be joined by the king's friends, and commanded by the earl of Montroſe. At the ſame time the marquis of Ormond was ordered to ſend over ſome of the beſt regiments to the weſt of England. Lord Byron at the head of the forces brought over from Ireland, ſoon reduced the caſtles of Howarden, Breeſton, Acton, and Dedington. Sir Thomas Fairfax, informed of theſe proceedings collected a body of four thouſand men in Yorkſhire, and, being reinforced by ſir William Brereton, advanced againſt the enemy: the ſwelling of a rivulet, by an exceſſive rain, divided one part of Byron's army from the other; that part oppoſed to Fairfax being driven from their poſt, took ſhelter in the church of Acton, and were all made priſoners; the other fled with the utmoſt precipitation: and thus was diſperſed and rendered uſeleſs that body of forces which had been tranſported from Ireland; and the parliament recovered their former footing in the north-weſt of England.

In the mean time the king, that he might weaken the authority of the parliament, iſſued a proclamation requiring the parliament to aſſemble at Oxford, at the ſame time recounting all the tumults, by which he and his partizans in both houſes had been driven from London: and he thence inferred, that the aſſembly at Weſtminſter was no longer a free parliament, and, till its liberty was reſtored, had no right to exact obedience to any of its orders. As this declaration was an obſtacle to all treaty, of which, however, the king was extremely deſirous, it became neceſſary to elude it by ſome kind of contrivance. A letter was accordingly ſent to the earl of Eſſex, and ſubſcribed by the prince, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen. They intreated him to uſe his endeavours for reſtoring peace to the country, and to promote that happy end with thoſe by whom he was employed. Eſſex, though much diſſatisfied with the conduct of the parliament, though apprehenſive of the extremities to which they were driving, though willing to agree to any reaſonable accommodation; yet was more anxious to diſcharge with fidelity the truſt repoſed in him. He replied, that as the paper ſent him, was neither addreſſed to the two houſes of parliament, nor acknowleged the authority of that aſſembly, he could not, by any means, impart it to them. Like propoſals were repeated by the king during the enſuing campaign, and ſtill met with a like denial from Eſſex.

In order to make another attempt towards a treaty, the king ſent a letter directed to the lords and commons of parliament convened at Weſtminſter: but as he likewiſe mentioned, in the letter, the lords aud commons of parliament convened at Oxford, and expreſſed his deſire that all the members of both houſes might ſafely meet in a free and full aſſembly; the parliament, perceiving the concluſion which he meant to draw from this diſtinction, refuſed all treaty upon ſuch terms. And the king, who deſpaired of all hopes of accommodation, would not forgo the pretenſions, which he had aſſumed, nor acknowlege the two houſes, more openly, for a parliament. About this time died the celebrated Pym; a man as much eſteemed by one party, as hated by the other. The parliament conſidered him as the victim to national liberty, who had impaired his conſtitution and ſhortened his life by his conſtant and unwearied application. The royaliſts believed him to have been ſtruck with an uncommon diſeaſe, and to have been conſumed with vermin; as a mark of divine vengeance for his numerous crimes and treaſons.

The invaſion of the Scots was productive of the moſt important conſequences. They had entered England on the nineteenth of January, with an army of eighteen thouſand foot, three thouſand horſe, and between five and ſix hundred dragoons; Alexander Leſly earl of Leven was general, John Bowley lieutenant-general of the horſe. Leven advanced to Newcaſtle, on the twenty-ſecond of February, and having in vain ſummoned the town, which was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, he croſſed the Tyne, to force the earl (lately created marquis) of Newcaſtle, who was encamped at Durham, with an army of fourteen thouſand men to ſtop the progreſs of the Scotiſh army, and he would have ſucceeded in all probability but for a great misfortune which happen to his forces in Yorkſhire: colonel Bellaſis, whom he had left with a conſiderable body of troops, was entirely defeated at Selby, on the nineteenth of April, by ſir Thomas Fairfax, who had returned with his victorious forces from defeating the army under the lord Byron. Apprehenſive of being ſhut up between the two armies, Newcaſtle retired, and Leven joined his troops to thoſe of lord Fairfax. They inveſted York, in which the army of the royaliſts had taken ſhelter: but as the Scottiſh and parliamentary forces were not ſufficient to beſiege in form ſo large a city, divided by a river, they contented themſelves with forming a kind of blockade; and affairs remained for ſome time in ſuſpenſe between theſe oppoſite armies.

Mean while the other parts of the kingdom were not free from the calamities of war: the lord Hopton was beat by general Waller, at Alresford, in Kent; and prince Rupert, on the other hand, gained a ſignal victory over the parliamentary forces who had formed the ſiege of Newark, under the lord Willoughby and ſir John Meldrum, by which he preſerved a free communication between the king's northern and ſouthern conqueſts. After this the prince attacked Liverpool, a ſea-port town on the edge of Cheſhire, of which he made himſelf maſter: here he received a letter from the king, preſſing him to relieve York, the ſiege of which was by this time begun, the earl of Leven and general Fairfax having been joined by the earl of Manchester, with a numerous body of infantry, who, on their march, had reduced the city of Lincoln. On the approach of prince Rupert, the parliament's generals immediately raiſed the ſiege; and drawing up their troops on Marſton Moor, reſolved to prevent the junction of the royaliſts; but prince Rupert approached the town by another ſide, and keeping the river Ouſe between him and the enemy, ſafely joined his troops to thoſe of the marquis of Newcaſtle. In a conference between the two generals the latter endeavoured to demonſtrate that the Scots and Engliſh, being at variance, would ſeperate in a few days of their own accord, and that he expected a reinforcement of five thouſand men from the North: the prince on this occaſion behaved in ſo imperious a manner as greatly incenſed the marquis, who the next day, when the prince ordered the troops to be in readineſs to engage, told him that he ſhould not heſitate to obey his majeſty's nephew, but inſiſted on reſigning his authority, and ſerving only as a volunteer. On the third day of July the prince advanced againſt the enemy, and about two o'clock in the afternoon the action began, and laſted for ſome hours with great fury, and victory ſeemed ready to crown the efforts of the royal army, when the battle was reſtored by Oliver Cromwell (now made a lieutenant-general), who commanded the choice troops of the parliament, enured to danger under that undaunted leader, actuated by fanatic zeal, and regulated by the moſt ſevere diſcipline: in a word, after a very ſharp conflict, in which the marquis of Newcaſtle, at the head of his regiment, performed miracles of valour, the royal army was entirely broken and diſperſed, and a moſt complete victory was obtained by the parliament. The prince loſt ſix thouſand men, half of whom fell in the battle, together with all his artillery, baggage, and ammunition. After the battle the marquis of Newcaſtle, ſtill reſenting the inſult he had received by the haughty carriage of prince Rupert, took ſhipping at Scarborough, and repaired to the continent, where he remained till the Reſtoration. Prince Rupert, confounded at his late overthrow, retired with the remains of his army into Lancaſhire abandoning York to its fate, which was in a few days yielded up to the parliament's forces by Glenham, the deputy-governor; Fairfax, entering the place, ſupplied it with a ſtrong garriſon, and detached a thouſand horſe into Lancaſhire, to reinforce the parliamentary army in that quarter, and attend the motions of prince Rupert: the Scottiſh army retired northwards, in order to meet the earl of Calender, who was coming to join them with ten thouſand additional forces; and to beſiege the town of Newcaſtle, which they took by ſtorm: the earl of Manchester, with Cromwell, who had a capital ſhare in gaining this great victory, and who was wounded in the action, repaired to the Eaſtern aſſociation, in order to recruit his army.

During theſe tranſactions in the North, the king's affairs wore a tolerable aſpect in the South: two armies, under Eſſex and Waller, being by this time completed, thoſe generals were ordered to advance with their combined forces towards Oxford, and, if the king took refuge in that city, to inveſt it, and by one enterprize finiſh the war. The king, leaving a ſufficient garriſon in Oxford, paſſed the enemy unnoticed, and bent his route to Worceſter, and thereby the two parliament generals poſted their armies between him and Oxford. The condition of Charles was now looked upon as deſperate; and was certainly ſo, had he not been ſaved by the differences which, happily for him, ſubſiſted between Eſſex and Waller, by the former taking upon him to proſecute the expedition to the Weſt, which had been allotted to Waller, and ordering him to purſue Charles. Waller complained bitterly of Eſſex thus uſurping his command, and produced his orders from the committees of both kingdoms (for the Scots were now indulged with having a committee in the Engliſh parliament, to act in conjunction with their friends there); but Eſſex was abſolute, and threatened to try Waller by a council of war, if he ſhould diſobey. While they were debating this point, Charles got full two days march of the parliament army, and had reached Worceſter; but fearing to be ſhut up there by Waller, who by this time, was got as far as Eveſham in purſuit of him, he went weſt with his army to Bewdly, as if he had intended to gain Shrewſbury, were it was practicable for him to have joined prince Rupert. Waller, who expected a large reinforcement, moved towards Broomſgrove and Kidderminſter, and, extending his quarters all along the eaſt ſide, by degrees got between Charles and the town of Shrewſbury. By this he did the very thing which Charles wiſhed for; for he immediately returned to Worceſter, and from thence to Eveſham, breaking down the bridges as he paſſed along, by which means he left Waller two days march behind him, in a heavy country. Upon his coming to Eveſham he puniſhed ſome of its magiſtrates for their ſo readily admitting Waller into that place, and marched that ſame day towards Camden, from whence he ſent to his friends in Oxford, where he had left moſt of his foot in garriſon, to meet him with his cannon and infantry, being determined to fight Waller if he ſhould come up. In a few hours he was joined by his forces from Oxford, and then went in queſt of Waller, in his turn. On the twenty-ninth of June the two armies approached each other at Cropedy bridge, and were only divided by the Charwell. Next day the king diſlodged and proceeded towards Daventry. Waller ordered a large detachment to croſs the bridge, and attack the rear of the royaliſts. They were repulſed, routed, and chaſed to a conſiderable diſtance. Stunned and diſcouraged by this blow, his troops began to deſert in great numbers; and the king thought he might ſafely leave them, and march weſtward againſt Eſſex.

Five days after the fight of Cropedy bridge, the king, being at Eveſham, cauſed to be drawn up a meſſage for peace, to both houſes of parliament; a copy whereof was ſent to the earl of Eſſex by the marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to the parliament, it being intimated that the French agent had the original to deliver, if required. This meſſage, directed "To the Lords and Commons of Parliament, aſſembled at Weſtminſter," contained a general offer to treat of peace; and if commiſſioners ſhould be ſent to him, he would grant them a ſafe-conduct. The two houſes, ever jealous of the king, thought there was ſome artifice concealed in ſending them only a copy of his meſſage, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original of the French agent; beſides, they did not conceive themſelves to be owned, by the direction of the meſſage, as the two houſes of parliament; and therefore imagined the king had a mind to reſerve to himſelf the power of ſaying he did not acknowlege them for the true parliament of England; and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, ſince he had publiſhed the forementioned declaration againſt them: wherefore they reſolved to take no notice of the meſſage, nor return any anſwer.

Eſſex having compelled prince Maurice, who commanded the king's forces in the Weſt, to abandon the ſiege of Lyme, and having reduced Weymouth and Taunton, proceeded ſtill in his conqueſts without meeting with any interruption; but hearing that the king was marching into the Weſt againſt him, he retired into Cornwall, and ſent to the parliament, deſiring them to diſpatch an army to attack the king in the rear. General Middleton was ſent with a good body of troops, for that purpoſe; but arrived too late to do any effectual ſervice. On the firſt of Auguſt, the king entered Cornwall, where he was joined by prince Maurice with his army; and now Eſſex ſaw himſelf cooped up in a narrow corner, at Leſtwithiel; deſtitute of forage and proviſion, and deſpairing of all hopes of relief, he was reduced to the laſt extremity. The king preſſed him on one ſide; prince Maurice on another; ſir Richard Grenville on a third. On the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, Eſſex, Robarts, and ſome of the principal officers, got on board a boat, and fled to Plymouth: Balfour with his cavalry eſcaped the king's guards in a thick miſt, and arrived ſafely at the garriſons of his own party. The infantry, under major-general Skippon were obliged to ſurrender their arms, artillery, baggage, and ammunition; and, being led to the parliamentary quarters, were ſet at liberty.

By this time the earl (now created marquis) of Montroſe, was very ſucceſsful for the king in Scotland, having obtained a great victory over the Covenanters upon Newbiggin Moor, and taken Perth; and within fourteen days after that, he gained another victory near Aberdeen, ſoon after took that city, and marched from thence into the earl of Argyll's country, which he waſted with fire and ſword, and performed many great ſervices, even to admiration conſidering the ſmallneſs of his beginning, and the little aſſiſtance he had from England. But we ſhall leave a while the narrative of his forturn, to return to the tranſactions in England, which were, the remaining part of this year, proſecuted in ſeveral places with various ſucceſs. In the Weſt, after the great victory over Eſſex's army, Ilfracomb, Branſtaple, and Saltaſh ſubmitted to the king's arms; and Baſing-houſe, which had been eighteen weeks beſieged, was relieved by a party from Oxford, under ſir Henry Gage: and a little after, he, with the earl of Northampton, raiſed the ſiege of Banbury caſtle, which had been a month inveſted by colonel Fiennes, and ſlew and took many of his men and one piece of ordnance. But the good fortune of the parliament in ſeveral parts balanced this ſucceſs with advantage: Monmouth was, in September, taken by colonel Maſſey; and the town and caſtle of Newcaſtle, which had long ſuſtained the utmoſt efforts of the Engliſh and Scottiſh armies, was taken by ſtorm, to the great loſs of the aſſailants, on the twenty-ſeventh of October; and a while after Liverpool, in Lancaſhire, was ſurrendered to ſir John Meldrum. But the great buſineſs that concluded this year were the important battle of Newbury and the treaty at Uxbridge, which will come next to be related, interwoven with ſome other of the moſt remarkable occurrences that then happened.

Though the earl of Eſſex might have been juſtly upbraided for the two errors he had committed, in obſtinately purſuing his march into the Weſt, contrary to the orders of both houſes, and prepoſterouſly going into Cornwall, he was not inſulted for his misfortunes, but, at his return, was very civilly received: it was then no proper time to examine his conduct, the point was to recruit and arm his ruined army, as well as that of Waller; and accordingly both houſes applied themſelves to it with all poſſible diligence. They ordered alſo colonel Middleton to repair ſpeedily to the earl of Eſſex's army, and the earl of Mancheſter to march the ſame way with his forces. On the twenty-firſt of October the three armies joined, and were far ſuperior to that of the king, who was by this time come out of the Weſt, and was advanced as far as Newbury, while the parliament forces lay at Reading. Eſſex, either through diſguſt or indiſpoſition, or both, abſented himſelf, on the twenty-third from the parliament army, and there was little or no unanimity in their counſels: however, the proximity of the oppoſite armies would not permit them to be long inactive; and on the twenty-ſeventh of October was fought the ſecond battle of Newbury, one of the moſt obſtinate that had happened during the whole courſe of this war. The royaliſts were defeated: the loſs on Charles's ſide, however, was not very conſiderable; the parliament loſt about a thouſand men. After the battle the king retreated to Wallingford, from whence he marched to Bath, near which place he was joined by prince Rupert, and then they put their troops into winter-quarters, as did the parliament on their ſide.

Oliver Cromwell, who had already ſignalized himſelf by ſeveral acts of extraordinary valour, was a great inſtrument of gaining the late advantage over the king's army. It is ſaid, that at this battle of Newbury, the corps, commanded by the earl of Mancheſter, having given way, the earl likewiſe being carried along with the reſt in their precipitate flight, Cromwell, who was himſelf wounded, rode up to him, and cried "You are miſtaken, my lord, the enemy is not this way," and immediately brought him back to the charge: in a word, moſt writers agree, that the fortune of this day was chiefly owing to Cromwell. This is certain, that Cromwell had as much influence in the houſe of commons as he had reputation in the army; and publicly accuſed his general of not having done his duty.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the queen retired into France; and the elector Palatine, who had withdrawn to Holland in the beginning of the troubles between the king (his uncle) and the parliament, came over in the month of Auguſt, and put himſelf under the protection of the parliament; the king hearing of it, wrote to him, to know the reaſon of ſo extraordinary a proceeding. It does not appear what anſwer the elector returned; but probably, not knowing how to ſubſiſt, and conſidering the king (his uncle) was not able to maintain him, he believed he ſhould find more aſſiſtance in the parliament, which had ever expreſſed a great affection for his houſe. He was not deceived in his expectations, for the parliament granted him an honourable penſion, which was more regularly paid than the former from the king. He afterwards deſired, and obtained leave, to hear the debates in the aſſembly of the divines: probably, he did not care to be concerned in military affairs, but ſought to ſpend his time in converſing with the learned, and improving himſelf in matters of religion.

Amongſt the many tentatives for peace this ſummer, one was made by the States General, whoſe ambaſſadors came to London about the ſixth of July. Upon their arrival, they wrote (being three in number, Boreel, de Reede, and Joachimim) to the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, to demand an immediate audience in full parliament. As they had addreſſed the letter to him as ſpeaker of the commons of England, and as their credentials ran in the ſame ſtile, the commons were ſo well pleaſed, that they ordered them a very ſplendid introduction, with no leſs than ten coaches to attend them to both houſes, and in their audience they offered the mediation of their maſters between the king and his parliament: at the ſame time, they complained of the detention of ſome of their ſhips by thoſe of the parliament; and the whole, after a very ceremonious audience, was referred to a committee of both houſes. Thoſe maritime differences ſeem to have been very complicated, and of ſo great importance, that neither ſide choſe to proceed, at this time, in the mediation, till they were previouſly ſettled.

The fondneſs of the Engliſh for every thing new or ſtrange, brought to light, the latter end of this year, a new ſcheme of a moſt extraordinary nature, and which perfectly explained Cromwell's true character, and proved at once the ſource of his greatneſs, the downfal of the parliament and hierarchy, the murder of the king, and the abolition of monarchy. The ſect of independents began now to make ſome noiſe *. The moſt violent of the preſbyterians had joined this ſect, which reſembled that of the quakers, in condemning the ordination of miniſters, and allowing every one to preach and expound the ſcriptures according to the talents he had received from nature; but they were at the ſame time as turbulent as the quakers were mild and peaceable. They gave a looſe to the wildeſt imaginations they had formed, the extravagant deſign of levelling all deſtructions among men, and, in order to eſtabliſh this projected equality, they had recourſe to force, which ever implies a ſuperiority on the one ſide. Oliver Cromwell looked upon theſe people as fit inſtruments to be made uſe of in the great plan he was mediating.

The city of London, which was divided into ſeveral factions, complained bitterly that the parliament had loaded it with all the burthen of the

* The independents, called at firſt congregationaliſts, owed their riſe chiefly to Goodwin, Nye, Bridge, Sympton, and Burroughs; who tranſported themſelves into Holland, for liberty of conſcience; from whence, upon the downfall of epiſcopacy, they returned to England, and addreſſed the parliament with an apologetical narrative for indiſturbance and toleration. In this apology they declare, That they conſulted the ſcriptures without any prepoſſeſſion; they look upon the word of Chriſt as impartially and unprejudicedly, as men of fleſh and blood are like to do at any juncture of time they having no temptation to any biaſs; as to church government, they ſaid they confined themſelves to ſcripture precept and precedent, leaving room for alterations upon farther enquiry. Purſuant to theſe grounds, they held a middle courſe, between preſbyterianiſm and Browniſm; the firſt they counted too arbitrary, the other too looſe. Their main characteriſtic was the diſallowing parochial and provincial ſubordinations, and forming all their congregations upon a ſcheme of co-ordinancy. As to the manner of their ſervice, they prayed publicly for kings and all in authority: they read the ſcriptures, and expounded the leſſons upon proper occaſions; they adminiſtered the ſacraments, they ſung pſalms, and made collections for the poor every Lord's day. Their public officers were paſtors, teachers, ruling elders (which were eccleſiaſtics), and deacons. As for church-cenſures, they had none but admonition and excommunication. The five abovementioned independents were all, or moſt of them, members of the aſſembly of divines. Rapin ſeems to confound them with the Browniſts. See their Apologetical Narrative, and Collier's Eccleſ. Hiſt. tom. ii p. 829. —— They were called Independents, from their declaring againſt the dependency of churches, which, as has been already ſaid, was their main characteriſtic.

war; and not only ſo, but that they had of late greatly neglected the city. This circumſtance occaſioned ſome warm debates in the houſe of commons; and Cromwell took the opportunity to expoſe, with great freedom, the licentiouſneſs and ill government of the army, the officers of which, he ſaid, could not well be called to an account, by reaſon that moſt of them were members of the houſe of commons. He then made a motion for taking into conſideration the new modelling the army; in which he was warmly ſeconded by Sir Harry Vane, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, and Oliver St. John, the ſollicitor-general, all of them furious independents. In order to effect this ſcheme, it was propoſed that the members of both houſes ſhould reſign all their employments, civil and military. Almoſt all the offices of profit were in the hands of the members of one or the other houſe; the three generals of the parliament's army were peers *; the greateſt part of the colonels, majors, the treaſurers, the purveyors, and commiſſioners of all departments, were members of the lower-houſe. How improbable then did it appear, that ſo many perſons in power could be prevailed upon, by the ſoothings of a religious cant, to reſign their poſts and incomes; and yet this was effected in a very ſhort ſpace of time: the commons, in particular, were dazzled with the proſpect of gaining an aſcendancy over the minds of the people, by this rare example of diſintereſtedneſs. The lords, at firſt, refuſed to concur in paſſing the bill, but were ſoon overpowered by the commons; and on the nineteenth of December, this year, was paſſed the act called, the Self-denying Ordinance, by which the members of either houſe were deprived of all offices whether civil or military, except a few, which were particularly mentioned. The earls of Eſſex, Denbigh, Mancheſter, and the lord Fairfax, finding they could not ſtem the torrent, voluntarily reſigned their commands; and the army, being augmented to twenty-two thouſand men, the chief command was beſtowed on ſir Thomas Fairfax, he not being a member of parliament.

This was juſt what Cromwell wanted; he had an abſolute aſcendancy over this new general, as indeed he had over the whole houſe of commons, who continued him in the command of his regiment, notwithſtanding he was a member; and even ordered the general to give him the command of a detachment of horſe, which was directed to march to Oxford. This very man, who had ſo artfully deprived all the preſbyterian members of their military employments, had likewiſe the addreſs to get the independent party continued in their poſts; and thus the latter, though much inferior in number, obtained a complete victory over the preſbyterians; and from that time it was eaſy to perceive that the army could give law to the parliament; for though the power of the ſword was, in appearance, conferred on Fairfax, in reality it reſted with Cromwell. By his aſſiſtance Fairfax new modelled his whole army, incorporated ſome regiments into others, made a total change in all the military departments, and eſtabliſhed a new diſcipline. All this, which at any other time would have excited a revolt, now paſſed without the leaſt reſiſtance.

In the mean time, a treaty of peace was begun and carried on between the king and parliament, but with little hopes of ſucceſs. Upon his majeſty's return to Oxford, after putting his army in winter quarters, the two houſes required and procured a ſafe-conduct for their deputies, with propoſals of accommodation, which they had framed in the ſummer. Charles, on their being preſented to him, required, in his turn, a ſafe-conduct for the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton, who ſhould carry his anſwer to the two houſes; but this favour he could not obtain, until he had addreſſed himſelf to them by the title of The two Houſes of Parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and to the Scottiſh Commiſſioners. On this occaſion, Charles employed an artifice which does no honour to his ſincerity, and which his warmeſt advocates will find it difficult to juſtify or excuſe. He entered a ſecret proteſt in his council-book, importing, that though he had called them a parliament, he did not acknowlege them as ſuch. This ſpirit of equivocation had always brought ruin upon Charles's affairs, and was indeed ſhameful. On the nineteenth of December, the parliament and the Scottiſh commiſſioners returned their anſwer to the king, in which they conſented to a treaty. Uxbridge, a town betwixt London and Oxford, was named for the place of treaty, and Charles, on his part, appointed the following commiſſioners: the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earl of Southampton, the earl of Kingſton, the earl of Chicheſter, the lord Capel, the lord Seymour, the lord Hatton, the lord Culpepper, ſecretary Nicholas, Mr. chancellor of the Exchequer, ſir Edward Hyde, the lord chief-baron, ſir Edward Lane, ſir Orlando Bridgeman, ſir Thomas Gardiner, Mr. Joſeph Aſhburnham, Mr. Geoffery Palmer, Dr. Steuart, and their attendants; in all, the number of one hundred and eight. The commiſſioners for the parliament were, Algernoon earl of Northumberland, Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, William earl of Saliſbury, Bazil earl of Denbigh, Thomas lord viſcount Wenman, Denzil Holles, William Peirpoint, ſir Henry Vane, junior, Oliver St. John, Bulſtrode Whitlock, John Crew, and Edward Prideaux, for the lords and commons aſſembled in the parliament of England, at Weſtminſter; and John earl of Loudon, lord chancellor of Scotland, Archibald marquis of Argyll, John lord Maitland, John lord Balmerino, ſir Archibald Johnſon, ſir Charles Erſkine, George Dundas, ſir Joſeph Smith, ſir Hugh Kennedy, and Mr. Robert Berkley, for the eſtates of the parliament of Scotland, together with Mr. Alexander Henderſon.

The conferences were opened on the thirtieth of January, 1645; by mutual agreement they were to laſt twenty days; and the propoſitions were reduced to the three articles, of religion, the militia, and Ireland. The propoſitions offered by the two houſes were no other than the moſt ſevere conditions they could have impoſed upon a prince, whom they intended to ſtrip of all the power, and indeed of all the enſigns, of royalty. In a word, they demanded that the hierarchy ſhould be aboliſhed, and preſbyterianiſm eſtabliſhed in both kingdoms; that the king ſhould ſubſcribe the covenant; abandon his beſt friends as traitors; give up the militia, and even his own children, to the direction of the two houſes; which engroſſed the whole ſovereign authority. Though no peace was to be expected from ſuch propoſals, the king's commiſſioners, in the courſe of the conferences, agreed that every perſon ſhould enjoy liberty of conſcience touching the ceremonies of the church; that no biſhop ſhould exerciſe any ſort of juriſdiction; that no perſon ſhould be admitted into holy orders without the conſent of the preſbytery; that epiſcopal juriſdiction, with reſpect to marriages and wills, ſhould be regulated by the king and the two houſes; that proper laws ſhould be enacted for the regulation of epiſcopal viſitations, the expence of eccleſiaſtical ſuits, frivolous excommunications, and other abuſes of the ſpiritual courts; that the militia ſhould be put into the hands of twenty commiſſioners, one-half to be named by the king, and the other by the two houſes; and, that the commiſſion ſhould continue for three years. Theſe conceſſions were deemed not ſatisfactory by the two houſes: nothing material was propoſed relating to the affairs of Ireland, and the twenty days being expired, the conferences broke up without having produced any proſpect of accommodation.

The diſpoſition of the forces on both ſides, at the beginning of the year 1645, was as follows: part of the Scottiſh army was engaged in reducing Pomfret, and other towns in Yorkſhire; part of it inveſted Carliſle, bravely defended by ſir Thomas Glenham. Cheſter, where Byron commanded, had been long beſieged by ſir William Brereton, and was now almoſt on the point of ſurrendering. The king, reinforced by the princes Rupert and Maurice, lay at Oxford, with an army of fifteen thouſand men. Fairfax and Cromwell were ſtationed at Windſor, with the new-modelled army of twenty-two thouſand men. Taunton, in the county of Somerſet, defended by Blake, ſuſtained a long ſiege from ſir Richard Grenville, who headed an army of eight thouſand men; and though the defence had been very vigorous, the garriſon was now deſtitute of almoſt every neceſſary. Goring, in the Weſt, conducted an army of nearly the ſame number.

The parliament's army was by this time new modelled according to the plan of Cromwell, and was compoſed entirely of a ſet of fanatics, inſpired with that blaze of enthuſiaſm which makes men fight with the moſt eager zeal, even in the worſt of cauſes, and die in full confidence of obtaining the crown of martyrdom. It was with a detachment of ſuch warriors that Cromwell marched from Windſor, on the twenty-fourth day of April. In the neighbourhood of Iſlip, he cut in pieces four regiments of the king's cavalry; Buckingham was ſurrendered to him, at the firſt ſummons, by colonel Windebank (ſon to the ſecretary of that name), who was thereupon tried by a court-martial, and ſhot for cowardice; but Cromwell was repulſed in his attack upon Farringdon. Taunton, beſieged by ſir Richard Grenville, was relieved by colonel Welden, one of the parliament's officers, with a body of horſe and foot; but ſir Richard, being afterwards reinforced by a ſtrong party under Goring, he reſumed his operations againſt the place, in which the detachment under Welden was now ſhut up. The king opened the campaign on his ſide, by marching with about eight thouſand men towards Cheſter, to relieve that place, beſieged by ſir William Brereton; but hearing by the way the ſiege was raiſed, he marched to Leiceſter, which he took by ſtorm, on the thirtieth of May. Here Charles received advice, that Fairfax was ordered to beſiege Oxford; he therefore marched to Harborough, where he was informed that general had abandoned his deſign upon Oxford, and had been repulſed with great loſs in aſſaulting the garriſon of Borſtal-houſe (in Buckinghamſhire). The king continued his march, in expectation of being joined by colonel Gerard, with two thouſand men from Wales; as well as by Goring, at the head of three thouſand cavalry. In this ſituation of affairs, prudence ſeemed to dictate the waiting for the coming up of theſe ſupplies, and, till then, to act only on the defenſive; but the head-ſtrong and impetuous temper of prince Rupert, and the fiery and impatient humour of the young nobility under Charles, rendered fruitleſs the advice of the more grave and experienced officers of the council; and it was reſolved, by a majority of voices in the cabinet, to attack Fairfax. The royal army accordingly marched back; and, on the fourteenth day of June, came in ſight of the enemy, who were drawn up in order of battle, on a riſing ground in the neighbourhood of Naſeby, a village near Rothwell, in Northamptonſhire.

At this place was fought, with forces nearly equal, that great and important battle between the king and parliament. The main body of the royaliſts was headed by the king, the right wing by prince Rupert, the left by ſir Marmaduke Langdale. Fairfax, aſſiſted by Skippon, commanded the main body of the parliamentarians; Cromwell conducted the right wing: Ireton, Cromwell's ſon-in-law, the left. The charge was begun by prince Rupert, with his uſual impetuoſity, and his uſual ſucceſs: notwithſtanding the brave reſiſtance of Ireton, who, even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, ſtill continued to fight with undaunted courage, till he was taken priſoner, that whole wing was totally broke, and chaſed to a conſiderable diſtance by Rupert: he was even ſo imprudent as to waſte time in attacking the artillery of the parliament, which had been left behind with a ſtrong guard of infantry. Mean while the king, at the head of his main body, attacked Fairfax and Skippon; and the fight was, for ſome time, maintained with equal bravery on both ſides. Skippon, being dangerouſly wounded, was deſired by Fairfax to quit the field; but declared he would not retire ſo long as one man kept his ground. At laſt the infantry of the parliament was thrown into diſorder, and hard puſhed by the king; till Fairfax, with great prudence, brought up the reſerve, and reſtored the battle. By this time Cromwell, with his right wing, having fallen upon Langdale, had repulſed the royaliſts, and by his conduct improved that advantage, which he had obtained by his valour. Having chaſed the enemy about a quarter of a mile, and detached ſome troops to continue the purſuit, he turned back upon the king's infantry; and, at the firſt onſet, threw them into the utmoſt confuſion. One regiment alone, though twice aſſaulted by Fairfax, ſtill maintained its ranks unbroken; and that general, provoked at ſo ſtubborn a reſiſtance, commanded Doyley, the captain of his life-guards, to aſſail them once more in front, while he himſelf attacked them in rear. By theſe united efforts the regiment was broke. Fairfax, with his own hands, ſlew an enſign, and having taken the colours, gave them to a ſoldier to keep for him. The ſoldier afterwards pretending that he had gained the ſpoil himſelf, was reprimanded by Doyley, who had ſeen the action: "Let him retain that honour (ſaid Fairfax) I have to day acquired enough beſide."

Prince Rupert, convinced too late of his error, abandoned the fruitleſs attack on the enemy's artillery, and returned to the king, whoſe infantry was now totally defeated. Charles endeavoured to animate this body of cavalry to a freſh attack, and cried aloud to them, "One charge more, and we recover the day." But the danger of ſuch an attempt was too great and apparent; and they could by no means be perſuaded to renew the battle. At the ſame time, the Scottiſh earl of Carnwarth, who rode by his majeſty's ſide, ſeizing the bridle of his horſe, turned him round, ſaying, "Will you go upon your death in an inſtant." The troops ſeeing this motion, wheeled off to the right, and immediately fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Charles, finding it impoſſible to make any farther reſiſtance, was obliged to quit the field, and abandon the victory to his enemies. The number of killed on the ſide of the parliament was greater than on the ſide of the king: they loſt a thouſand men; he not above eight hnndred. But Fairfax took five hundred officers, and four thouſand private men, priſoners; ſeized all the king's artillery and baggage, and totally diſperſed his infantry: ſo that no victory could be well more complete, than that which was now obtained by the parliament.*

It would be as irkſome as improper, in this hiſtory, to enter upon a detail of all the little actions and ſkirmiſhes, the ſieges of caſtles, and the taking of houſes, that happened during this active year. Let it ſuffice then to inform the reader, that Charles, having eſcaped from the fatal field of Naſeby, gathered together ſome part of his ſcattered forces, but never was able to make head againſt the conquerors; loſing this year one garriſon after another, till his whole ſtrength was almoſt reduced to Oxford. We ſhall only mention ſome of the principal places taken from him by the victorious parliamentarians, namely, Leiceſter, Carliſle, Pomfret caſtle, Bridgewater, Scarborough, Hereford, Weſt Cheſter, and Briſtol; on which a great part of his affairs chiefly depended. This latter place was well ſupplied with men, proviſions, and ammunition; and every body concluded, from the known valour of prince Rupert, that he would make a very vigorous defence. He even wrote to the king, that he ſhould be able to hold out four months, unleſs mutiny ſhould compel him to ſurrender. Notwithſtanding this promiſe, and the general expectation, he offered to capitulate at the firſt ſummons; and actually delivered up the place before the beſiegers had begun to make their approaches. The unhappy monarch, in the firſt tranſports of his grief, ordered his nephew to quit the kingdom, and revoked all his commiſſions.

During theſe tranſactions, the unfortunate king underwent a ſurpriſing ſeries of dangers, mortifications, and diſtreſſes, which he bore with uncommon fortitude and dignity. Amongſt his other misfortune was that of loſing his cabinet of papers, which was taken from the lord Digby, in an engagement near Newark, and ſent up to the parliament; and from which they made great diſcoveries to the king's prejudice. It was no little aggravation to the calamities which Charles ſuffered, that his forlorn eſtate encouraged ſome of his principal officers to forget all reſpect to the perſon of their general and their ſovereign; of which the following is a melancholy inſtance. While Charles lay at Newark, on his march back to Oxford, prince Rupert and prince Maurice, with a train of their friends and officers, contrary to the expreſs orders of Charles, came to that town, and even forced their way into his preſence, with an intention that prince Rupert might be cleared for the ſurrender of Briſtol. Charles thought proper to ſuffer a council of war to acquit him both of cowardice and treachery; but as he behaved to the prince with great coldneſs, the latter entered into a conſpiracy with ſir Richard Willis, the governor of Newark, who was ſo extremely diſagreeable to the gentlemen of the county, that Charles was forced to give his government to the lord Bellaſis. Though Charles was ſo far from intending this as any affront to Willis, that he had appointed him to command his life-guards, in the room of the earl of Litchfield, who had been killed at Cheſter; yet, it was ſo far reſented by him, the two princes, and all his friends, that they broke into the king's bed-chamber in a body, and demanded public reparation for the injury that had been done to Willis, in taking from him his command. Charles behaved on this occaſion with ſo great ſpirit and preſence of mind, that the mutineers were aſhamed of what they had done, and left his preſence covered with confuſion. Charles, next day ſent them paſſes, to carry them whereſoever they would go. After their departure, he put in execution an admirable plan: he had formed his retreat to Oxford, at which city he arrived, through infinite dangers and difficulties, in the beginning of November.

The year 1646 began as unfortunately for Charles as the preceding one had concluded. After the reduction of Briſtol, Fairfax and Cromwell having divided their forces, the former marched weſtward, in order to finiſh the conqueſt of Devonſhire and Cornwall, where the prince of Wales commanded the royal forces. After a rapid and uninterrupted ſucceſs, during which he twice obliged the prince of Wales to retreat before him, he at length obtained a complete victory over the lord Hopton, at Farrington, on the tenth of February; and, puſhing that nobleman in his retreat, he improved the advantage he had gained, cooped up the royaliſts in Truro, and compelled the whole army, amounting to five thouſand men, chiefly cavalry, to ſurrender, on the fourteenth of March, upon terms: then laying ſiege to Exeter, he obliged that city to capitulate on the ninth of April. This finiſhed the conqueſt of the Weſt. And the victorious Fairfax returned with his army to the center of the kingdom, and pitched his camp at Newbury. The king, ſeeing his affairs irretrievable ruined, wrote to the prince of Wales, to conſult his own ſafety by flying the kingdom; and accordingly the young prince withdrew to Scilly, then to Jerſey, from whence he went to Paris, where he found the queen his mother, who had eſcaped thither from Exeter, at the time the earl of Eſſex firſt led the parliamentary forces into the Weſt.

and

In the mean while, Montroſe, who acted for the king in Scotland, having penetrated into the ſouthern counties, the covenanters, having collected their whole force, oppoſed him with a numerous army, and gave him battle at Kilſyth, but without ſucceſs. This was the moſt important victory which Montroſe ever gained. The royaliſts killed above ſix thouſand of their enemies, and left them no appearance of an army in Scotland. The whole kingdom was rent with theſe repeated convulſions; and many noblemen, who were ſecretly attached to the royal cauſe, now eſpouſed it openly, when they ſaw a force able to ſupport them. The marquis of Douglas, the earls of Annandale and Hartfield, the lords Fleming, Seton, Maderty, Carnegy, with many others, immediately joined the royal army: Edinburgh opened its gates to them, and releaſed all the priſoners whom the covenanters had confined in that city: amongſt the reſt was the lord Ogilvy, ſon to Airly, whoſe family had a principal ſhare in the victory gained at Kilſyth.

The covenanters, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of Montroſe, recalled David Leſley from the army in England; and this able general immediately repaired to the relief of his diſtreſſed friends in Scotland. Montroſe continued to penetrate ſtill farther into the ſouthern provinces, encouraged by the vain hopes of exciting to arms the earls of Hume, Traquair, and Roxborough, who had engaged to aſſiſt him, and of procuring from England ſome ſupplies of cavalry, which he much wanted: but Leſley, at Philip-hough, in the Foreſt, came ſuddenly upon him, and obliged him to give battle. After a ſharp conflict, in which Montroſe performed the moſt heroic acts of valour, his troops were entirely defeated by Leſley's cavalry, and he himſelf forced to fly, with the ſcattered remains of his army, into the mountains; where he again prepared himſelf for attempting ſome new enterprize.

After all theſe repeated calamities, which every where befel the royal party, there remained only one body of troops on which fortune could exerciſe her cruelty. Lord Aſtley, with a ſmall army of three thouſand men, chiefly cavalry, was advancing to Oxford, in order to reinforce the king; when he was encountered, at a place called Donnington, near Stow on the Would, on the twenty-firſt of March, by colonel Morgan, by whom he was entirely routed, and himſelf taken priſoner; and, with him, all the king's hopes of preſerving Oxford, till he could better his condition, were loſt.

It is now time to ſee what paſſed in the Scottiſh army, whilſt the parliament forces were employed in reducing the places which held for the king in the ſouthern and weſtern parts of the kingdom. The Scots, having taken Newcaſtle in October, 1644, divided themſelves into two bodies, one whereof beſieged Carliſle, which ſurrendered upon articles in June, 1645.

The other part of the army durſt not engage in a ſiege, becauſe the marquis of Montroſe, who ſerved the king in Scotland, having had great ſucceſs there, it was to be feared the king would be ſending him reinforcements; wherefore the Scots always kept in a readineſs to oppoſe it. This became ſtill more neceſſary after the battle of Naſeby; there being great likelihood of the king's reſolving to join the earl of Montroſe with his cavalry. Beſides, the Scots, by keeping thus in the middle of the kingdom, prevented the king from making new levies in thoſe parts. At laſt, after the taking of Carliſle, the two bodies being joined, they beſieged Hereford, about the end of July; but, after having in vain carried on the ſiege above a month, they raiſed it in the beginning of September. The earl of Leven, their general, publiſhed, upon this occaſion, a ſort of apology, wherein, amongſt other things, he ſaid, that for ſix or ſeven months paſt, they had received but one month's pay; that they had been promiſed to be ſupplied with all things neceſſary for a ſiege; in which they had been extremely diſappointed, ſince they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty balls to each; that they had but few horſe; and being informed the king was marching towards them with three thouſand horſe, it was impoſſible to continue the ſiege. Laſtly, that general Leſley was obliged to go into Scotland with his whole party of horſe and dragoons, to oppoſe Montroſe.

After the ſiege of Hereford was raiſed, the Scotch army retired into Yorkſhire, complaining pretty openly of being entirely neglected; whereupon the parliament aſſigned them thirty thouſand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark upon the firſt of November; and ordered that the eaſtern aſſociation ſhould pay them fourteen hundred pounds a week. The Scots agreeing to theſe terms, the ſiege of Newark was begun about the end of October, 1645, and laſted till May, 1646.

The king, during the whole courſe of the preceding winter, and great part of this ſpring, was in the moſt wretched and deplorable ſituation; all the attempts which he made for a reaſonable accommodation with the parliament, anſwered no other purpoſe, than to ſhew that victory was entirely in their hands, and that they were determined to uſe it as conquerors. From the fifteenth of December to the twenty-third of March following, Charles had ſent nine or ten meſſages to the parliament, with offers of peace; and for the better accompliſhment thereof, he even propoſed to have a perſonal treaty with them at Weſtminſter. At laſt, on the thirtieth of March, a meſſage came to him from the parliament, in which they told him, "That it would be unſafe for him then to return to Weſtminſter, until he had aſſented to the propoſitions which they were framing," &c. And, to prevent his coming to London without their knowledge and conſent, they voted, "That if the king ſhould come, or attempt to come, within the lines of communication, that then the committee of the militia of London ſhould have power, and were thereby enjoined, to apprehend and ſecure ſuch as ſhould come with him, to prevent reſort unto him, and to ſecure his perſon."

Fairfax was all this time advancing with a numerous army, and, it was well known, with an intention to form the ſiege of Oxford, which muſt of neceſſity fall into his hands. In this moſt dreadful ſituation, no wonder that he embraced a meaſure which at any other time would have been looked upon as fooliſh or imprudent. Monſieur Montreuil, the French ambaſſador, had always eſpouſed the king's intereſt with all the warmth of humanity that his ſtation would admit; he had lately ſounded the Scottiſh generals and commiſſioners, who were greatly diſguſted at the treatment they had met with from the parliament; and as the preſbyterians were great enemies to the independent party, who now aſſumed the management of all affairs, he had received many general promiſes and profeſſions of their affection to their diſtreſſed ſovereign, and their inclination to protect him, if he thought fit to place his confidence in them. In conſequence of the report of Montreuil, and by his earneſt advice, Charles was induced to adopt the reſolution of quitting Oxford, and repairing to the Scottiſh army, which at that time lay before Newark. Accordingly, on the night of the twenty-ſeventh of April, this year, he left Oxford in diſguiſe, attended by Mr. Aſhburnham, and one Hudſon, a clergyman, who knew the bye ways; and after travelling, in the garb of their ſervant, a great deal of the country, he arrived, on the fifth of May, at the Scottiſh camp.

The Scottiſh generals and commiſſioners were confounded at the ſudden appearance of his majeſty; they, however, behaved as well as could be expected. The earl of Leven received him reſpectfully; and general Pointz, who commanded the Engliſh forces before Newark, was ſo apprehenſive of their intentions, that he cut off the communication between his and the Scottiſh camp. The Scottiſh commiſſioners, however, were exceſſively puzzled how to behave; but, at laſt, they reſolved to join in a letter with the earl of Leven, informing the parliament of the king's being in their hands. The parliament, before they received this letter, or another from Pointz, to the ſame purpoſe, knew of the king's eſcape from Oxford, but being ignorant how he directed his courſe, they paſſed ſeveral ſevere votes againſt concealing his perſon, and againſt all his party who ſhould be found within the lines of circumvallation about London.

Charles had little reaſon to be ſatisfied with his condition; he was ſo narrowly watched, under the ſhew of reſpectful attendance on his perſon, that not one of his friends could get to the ſpeech of him in private. The Scottiſh generals repreſented to him, that it would be proper, for the ſafety of his perſon, for the army to remove farther North, and that as this could not be done before the reduction of Newark, they deſired him to order that town to ſurrender. The king, perſuaded by this reaſon, gave orders to lord Bellaſis, the governor, to ſurrender; which was accordingly done, on the ninth of May; and then the Scottiſh army decamped, and marched with the king to Newcaſtle. Here they deſired him to ſend orders to Oxford, and all his other garriſons, both in England and Scotland, to ſubmit to the parliament; and the king, conſcious that it was in vain to make any reſiſtance, readily complied with their requeſt. His orders were readily obeyed; and thus was concluded a moſt cruel war, which had now continued almoſt four years, during which, the Britiſh nations had been engaged, by their civil and religious quarrels, in ſhedding the blood of their friends and relations, and in waſting and deſtroying their native country.

We muſt not forget to mention, that Montroſe, after a variety of other attempts, in which he ſometimes failed, and ſometimes ſucceeded, threw down his arms and abandoned the kingdom.

I ſhall nor here trouble the reader with the numerous manifeſtos and declarations that paſſed between the Scottiſh army and the parliament, on the ſubject of the king; nor their diſputes about the diſpoſal of his perſon; nor with the repeated conceſſions of the latter towards bringing his rebellious ſubjects to ſome equitable terms, for reſtoring the tranquility of the nation, which were as often rejected with the moſt inexcuſable inſolence on the part of the independents, now the prevailing faction in both houſes: I ſhall only obſerve, that the life of the unfortunate Charles now hurried to its cataſtrophe.

As the Scots agreed with the parliament in enforcing all the ſevere conditions they required of the king, it is not probable that they ever really intended to ſet him at liberty; nor indeed, had they been ſo inclined, could they have carried their ſcheme into execution: they therefore reſolved to deliver him up to his Engliſh ſubjects, but not, however till they had obtained thoſe arrears to which they laid claim, and which they were not likely, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, to procure by any other expedient. After much debate and controverſy, concerning the demands of the Scots, which were very exorbitant, it was agreed by the houſe of commons to give them four hundred thouſand pounds, one half to be paid immediately, and the other within a twelvemonth. This agreement, which was accepted on the part of the Scots, paſſed the houſe on the ſixteenth of December, by a majority of one hundred and forty-nine againſt one hundred and one; for the independents oppoſed every vote for getting rid of the Scots by way of treaty, adopting the maxim of Camillus, the Roman general, that it was for the dignity of their country to drive out an unwelcome gueſt rather by ſteel than by gold. Matters being thus compromiſed between the Scots and the Engliſh, and the firſt payment of the money being made at Newcaſtle, according to the compact, the former delivered the royal captive, on the thirtieth of January, to the earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the lord Montagu, ſir James Harrington, ſir John Holland, ſir Walter Erle, ſir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and major-general Brown, who were appointed by the parliament their commiſſioners to receive him. The two houſes had voted that his majeſty ſhould reſide at his houſe at Holmby, in the county of Northampton, where he arrived on the ſixteenth of February, 1647. The commiſſioners had inſtructions to keep the king cloſe priſoner, and to ſend to Fairfax for what forces were neceſſary for that purpoſe, All this was oppoſed by the independents, who wanted that he ſhould, without any other ceremony, be delivered up to Skippon. His majeſty was allowed no more than nine ſervants, and thoſe of the parliament's chuſing, to attend him: he was treated by the commiſſioners and ſir Thomas Fairfax, who eſcorted him from Newcaſtle to Holmby, with all the marks of outward reſpect; but very ſtrict care was taken to deprive him of all intercourſe with his friends, which

Charles often attempted privately, but was as often diſappointed by the vigilance of the committee. The parliament of Scotland ſent up a declaration conſenting to his reſiding at Holmby, or in any other of his houſes near London, "provided (ſay they) no violence ſhould be offered to his perſon; that no new change ſhould be made in the government; and that his poſterity ſhould ſuffer no prejudice in their ſucceſſion to the throne of England."

The Scots having now completely done their buſineſs, marched from Newcaſtle, which was taken poſſeſſion of by an Engliſh garriſon; and ſhortly after they put Berwick and Carliſle into the parliament's hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland.

All the writers in the royal cauſe have repreſented this tranſaction of the Scots as highly injurous to the character of that nation, as if they had ſold their king to his inveterate enemies, and bargained the life of their ſovereign for money. That the delivery of this ill-fated prince to the two houſes was a private ſtipulation between them and the Engliſh parliament, is ſcarce to be queſtioned: that it was criminal in the Scots, muſt in ſome meaſure be allowed; but the candour and impartiality which ought ever to be the guide of the hiſtorian, obliges me to obſerve, that what has chiefly rendered this meaſure odious, are the fatal conſequences with which it was at laſt attended; and that it ought to be remembered, that theſe conſequences were neither natural nor neceſſary, nor, indeed, at this time probable: neither the Scots, nor the majority of the Engliſh parliament themſelves had the leaſt intention of proceeding to the violent extremities which were afterwards purſued. It was, as a modern writer * very juſtly obſerves, the independents, determined enemies both to the king, the parliament, and the Scots, who twice ſeized the king by force, and at laſt brought him to a cruel and ignominious death, at the very time when the Scots and the preſbyterians, which latter now compoſed the majority in parliament, were exerting their utmoſt endeavours, and even riſking their lives and fortunes by riſing in arms, in order to reſtore him to his throne.

Pitiable indeed was now the condition of the fallen Charles, and of his family. His queen was in France; his eldeſt ſon, after being a vagabond between Cornwall, Jerſey, and Scilly, had been delivered into the hands of the ſame perfidious neighbours; his ſecond and third ſons (the dukes of York and Gloceſter), with the princeſs Henrietta, his youngeſt daughter, were priſoners in London, ſubſiſting on a ſcanty penſion allowed them by their enemies: the princes Rupert and Maurice, after leaving Newark, wandered from place to place, aſhamed of abandoning their uncle and generous benefactor, and retired to Oxford, where they had the benefit of the capitulation of that city, and retired beyond ſea. He himſelf was immured by the deteſted rebels; denied all the comforts of this life, and even that which his ſoul moſt loved, the exerciſe of religion according to his own faith; for we are told, that not any of his chaplains were ſuffered to have acceſs to him, nor ſo much as a Common Prayer Book allowed him for his own private uſe.

During the king's reſidence in the Scottiſh camp, died the earl of Eſſex, the diſcarded but ſtill popular and powerful general of the parliament. His death at this critical juncture was a great loſs to the public, and made it eaſier for Cromwell to carry on the deſtructive deſigns he had concerted; for doubtleſs, had Eſſex lived, he would have exerted all his influence and authority, to give a check to the fury that was going to prevail.

The parliament having now the perſon of the king in their poſſeſſion, and all his armies and garriſons ſubdued by their forces, were rioting in the fulneſs of power: nor could the moſt frantic among them form a wiſh which they did not enjoy. But diſſention, the never-failing attendant on anarchy and miſrule, ſoon made its way among them, and blaſted all their towering proſpects.

Cromwell and his independents were now maſters of the ſoldiery, who no longer looked upon themſelves as ſervants to the parliament, but as its lawgivers. Fairfax, who had been the unhappy, and, as far as appears, the unwilling inſtrument of his country's miſery, was not proof againſt the arts of Cromwell, who, on every occaſion, molded him to his purpoſe. The parliament, though ſtill all powerful in London, had, for ſome time, been apprehenſive that the army was aiming at the ſupreme authority, and therefore wanted to get rid of theſe troubleſome ſervants; an opportunity now ſeemed to offer, convenient for effecting their deſign: the toops in almoſt all parts of the kingdom made loud complaints for money, and the army under Cromwell eſpecially backed their remonſtrances with ſomewhat that looked like threatening; hereupon that whole body was threatened to be ſent to Ireland; and the preſbyterian faction in the houſe politically ſuffered them to live at free quarters, that the diſbanding them, which was reſolved upon, might be leſs unpopular, though they received little or nothing of their arrears †.

The head-quarters of the army was at St. Edmundſbury, in Suffolk, while theſe matters were debating in parliament. Cromwell looked upon this as the critical minute for perfecting his great deſigns: nevertheleſs he continued to practiſe the moſt exquiſite diſſimulation in the houſe; he ſmote his breaſt; he threw up his eyes; he ſhed tears; and poured out ſuch a torrent of paſſionate aſſeverations concerning his fidelity to the houſe, the patience and reſignation of the army under their oppreſſions, and the unwearied labours which he and his aſſociates had employed in making them eaſy, that he impoſed even on thoſe who had themſelves been thoroughly verſed in the ſame arts: he recommended every ſevere expedient for repreſſing the mutiny which now began to encreaſe among the ſoldiery; and by theſe deſperate counſels, he at once ſeemed to prove his own ſincerity, and increaſed thoſe diſcontents which he propoſed to convert to his own advantage. In the mean time he carefully pointed out to Fairfax, the diviſions and diſtractions both in church and ſtate; he repreſented to him, that the army was now the only principle of unity, and the center to which all lines muſt point; that the ſoldiers were the choſen of God, and had with them that unerring light of grace which ſet at nought all ſublunary inſtitutions, and corrected all human errors: in a word, he engaged Fairfax to countenance a petition from the army againſt their being diſbanded.

† It will perhaps amaze the reader to know, that the horſe and dragoons were no leſs than forty-three weeks in arrears, amounting to two hundred and fifty-two thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-ſix pounds; and the foot eighteen weeks, amounting to ſeventy-eight thouſand two hundred and fifty pounds; in all three hundred and thirty-one thouſand pounds. See Journ. of the Houſe of Com. March 26. I mention this important particular, becauſe moſt hiſtorians have adopted a wild notion, as if the army without any provocation, had all of a ſudden ſtarted out in rebellion againſt the parliament.

Matters ſtood thus between the parliament and army when the former, encouraged by the aſſurances they had from Cromwell, Jackſon, Skippon, and other officers, of the fidelity of their reſpective troops, determined, by one bold ſtroke, to attempt to preſerve their authority. Accordingly on the twenty-firſt of May, eleven regiments were voted to be disbanded, at different times and places, under the direction of Fairfax and Skippon; and that the others ſhould be ſent to Ireland. Inſtead of the obedience which the parliament flattered itſelf would have been paid to this decree, a council of officers met at St. Edmundſbury, to conſider thereof; at the ſame time ten ſoldiers out of each regiment of horſe and foot were choſen as agitators (or agents) for their reſpective regiments; and theſe all conſulting together, it was unanimouſly reſolved not to ſubmit to this decree; and the council of the army appointed a general rendezvous for all the regiments, in order to provide for their common ſafety. The independent party began now to prevail more and more in parliament, and the preſbyterians were ſo much intimidated, that many of them joined with the former in giving a commiſſion to Cromwell to go to the head-quarters of the army, in order to quiet the diſſatisfied ſoldiers; and a declaration was iſſued, that if the ſubſcribers to the petition againſt diſbanding the army, ſhould proceed no farther in their oppoſition to that meaſure, now reſolved upon by the houſe, they ſhould be retained in the parliament's good graces; and that thoſe who ſhould continue their preſent diſorderly conduct, ſhould be proceeded againſt as enemies to the ſtate.

In the mean time the council of agitators ſtruck a blow of the laſt importance, and which muſt be allowed to be the moſt ſenſible meaſure that men in their circumſtances could purſue. They thought they had as much right as the parliament to be jailors to the king, and that his perſon was the only pledge they could have for their ſafety, in their deſign of coming to an open rupture with their maſters. This was ſuggeſted by the genius of Cromwell, who endeavoured to perſuade the agitators (who were a body of men diſtinct from the council of war, and acted for the common ſoldiers), to take both the glory and the danger of the enterprize. Accordingly, on the fourth of June, a party of five hundred horſe was detached in private to Holmby (where the king then reſided), under the command of one Joyce, who, before the commencement of the war, had followed the trade of a taylor, but was now raiſed to the rank of a cornet, and was an active agitator in the army. Though it was late at night when they arrived, and the king was gone to bed, Joyce, having gained admiſſion into the houſe, went with very little ceremony into the king's room, with a piſtol in his hand, and told his majeſty he muſt forthwith go with him to the army. It was in vain to reſiſt: the king, after protracting the time as long as he could, ſtepped into his coach, and was immediately conveyed to the army, which was now on its march to the general rendezvous, at Triplo heath, near Cambridge. The parliament apprized of this event by their commiſſioners, who had the charge of the king at Holmby, were ſtruck with fear and conſternation. Fairfax himſelf was no leſs confounded at the king's arrival: that bold exploit performed, by Joyce, had never been imparted to the general; but Cromwell, by whoſe direction it had been done, and who was now arrived from London, cleared up all doubts and difficulties. The army being thus maſters of the king's perſon, in a little time became maſters of the parliament likewiſe, and managed all things juſt as they pleaſed, agreeable to what Cromwell is reported to have ſaid to ſome of his intimate friends, "that now he had the king in his hands, he had the parliament in his pocket."

On the ſixteenth of June the army drew up a charge of treaſon againſt eleven members of the houſe of commons, the chief of the preſbyterian party, accuſing them with betraying the cauſe of the parliament, endeavouring to break and deſtroy the army, &c. theſe were Denzil Holles, eſq. ſir Philip Stapleton, ſir William Lewis, ſir John Coltworthy, ſir William Waller, ſir John Maynard, major general Maſſey, Mr. recorder Glyn, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls. This round dealing of the army with the parliament, frightened the city of London ſo much, that, in great hurry, they ſent a deputation of the aldermen and common-council to St. Alban's, into the neighbourhood of which the mutineers were now advanced, to diſclaim any intention to raiſe forces or oppoſe the army. The parliament had ſettled the militia of London, according to the deſire of the citizens, in the hands of the preſbyterians, but being now over-awed by the army, they revoked their ordinance, and ſettled it as was before; upon this the common-council petitioned to have it ſettled their own way; and at the ſame time (July 26) a great multitude of the city apprentices, ſtirred up, no doubt, by the leading presbyterians in the city, came in a tumultuous manner to the parliament-houſe, and compelled them by threats and violence to do it, and alſo to vote that the king ſhould come to London. The crafty Cromwell enjoyed this ſtorm, which he ſaw would ſoon ſweep before it the obſtacles to his ambition: and indeed the tranſactions of the parliament at this time were ſo inconſiſtent, ſo tumultuous, and ſo contradictory, that they deſerve no mention in hiſtory: to-day the independents mob, to-morrow that of the presbyterians prevailed. The parliament had no longer with it thoſe able men who could direct the tumult, for the tumult now directed the parliament, which really had no will of its own. The commons, on the twenty-ſeventh of July adjourned to the thirtieth; and in the mean while not only Lenthall, ſpeaker to the houſe of commons, but the earl of Mancheſter, who was ſpeaker to the houſe of peers, with a great number of the members of both houſes, fled with their regalia to the army, which, upon their arrival, and the news of the Weſtminſter tumults, immediately directed its march towars London, in order, as they gave out, to reſtore the violated privileges of parliament.

Lenthall

Lenthall and Manchester were both presbyterians, and such a step in them was altogether unaccountable; but they probably thought that the army must in the end prevail, and they were willing to secure the interest of that party which was likely to have the ascendant.

The parliament, driven from their temporizing maxims, and obliged, either to abandon at once, or support by force, their power and liberty, prepared themselves for a vigorous defence, and resolved to oppose the violence of the army. On the thirtieth of July both houses met, and immediately elected new speakers, lord Hunsdon, and Henry Pelham; they repeated their former orders for levying troops: they constituted Massey commander: they ordered the trained-bands to guard the lines; and nothing was to be heard through the whole city but the sound of military preparations. It soon appeared, however, that all their resources were unequal to the present occasion. As the army advanced, Rainsborow, being sent over the river with a party of horse, presented himself before Southwark, and was readily admitted by some soldiers who were posted there for its defence, and who were determined not to divide their interests from those of the army. It was in vain to attempt resistance. The army marched through the city in triumph on the sixth of August; but observed the greatest order and regularity. They conducted to Westminster the two speakers, who took their seats without opposition. The eleven secluded members, being charged as the authors of the tumult, were expelled the house; and most of them abandoned the kingdom: seven peers were accused of high treason: the mayor, one sheriff, and three aldermen, committed to the Tower: several citizens and officers of the militia confined in other prisons: every decree of the parliament reversed from the time of the tumult till the return of the speakers: the lines about the city levelled: the independents re-established in the command of the militia: regiments stationed in Whitehall and the Meuse: and, in a word, the parliament reduced to a state of the most abject and deplorable slavery.

As to the king, he was obliged to attend the motions of the army since his late seizure, till, upon their approach to London, he was conducted to Hampton-court, where he was treated with great respect and civility by the heads of the army, and had all due honours paid him; though, in reality, he was no better than their prisoner. The parliament, or rather the army, who directed all their votes, put the command of the Tower into Fairfax's hands, declaring him at the same time generalissimo, with a power to put in or displace such officers as he pleased: but they were still at a loss how to dispose of the king's person. The independents had him in their power at Hampton-court. Cromwell and the presbyterian party both entered into treaty with him; the Scots likewise, by the earls of Lauderdale, Loudon, and Lanerk, their commissioners, proposed to carrying him off. Charles, who equally dreaded all those parties, was under a dreadful perturbation of spirit: at last perceiving that he had been the dupe of Cromwell, and being secretly apprized that the latter was forming dangerous designs against his life, resolved to withdraw himself from the army, and, accompanied only by sir John Berkeley, Ashburnham, and Legg, he privately left Hampton-court, in the night-time, on the thirteenth of November, and his escape was not discovered till near two hours after his departure, when those who entered his chamber found on the table some letters addressed to the general and the officers who had attended him.

The parliament was struck with the news of Charles's escape, and made it high-treason and death without mercy for any one to conceal him. But on the fifteenth they were eased of their fears by a letter from Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, acquainting them that the king was then at Cowes. This Hammond had espoused a daughter of the famous Hampden, and was entirely devoted to the interest of Cromwell; but as he was at the same time a nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite chaplain, and was generally reputed a man of honour and integrity, it had been judged proper by Charles and the companions of his flight, to apply to him in the present necessity, when no other expedient could be devised. Accordingly Charles went over to the Isle of Wight, and put himself under Hammond's protection, hoping there to find an asylum, instead of which he only met with a new prison.

Some historians have imagined that the king's retreat to the Isle of Wight was entirely voluntary; others think his going thither was the effect of Cromwell's artifice, who tried to urge him to this measure by groundless alarms, purposely conveyed to him, as if the agitators had sworn to take his life. Be this as it will, certain it is Charles was never guilty of a weaker step, nor one more agreeable to Cromwell and his enemies. He was now, by orders of the parliament, confined in Carisbrook castle, with orders that none of his friends or adherents should be admitted to his presence, or to remain on the island. He was now in a place removed from his friends, at the disposal of the army, whence it would be almost impossible to deliver him, either by force or stratagem. Charles, however, in this melancholy situation, was not without an appearance of a resource: he held a secret correspondence with the lord Inchiquin, who commanded for the parliament in Ireland; he had private assurance of a strong support from abroad; he was even at this time, by his agents, tampering with the chief officers of the navy; he was carrying on intrigues with the presbyterians in the city; by Cromwell's connivance he held intelligence with officers about his (Cromwell's) own person; and he had now concluded a treaty with the Scots, in all respects disadvantageous and dishonourable; and therefore, by the vicious logic of the Scottish commissioners, who persuaded him to sign it, not to be observed farther that as it served the present turn. By this treaty he approved of their solemn league and covenant, and confirmed all they had done against episcopacy in Scotland; and made some other concessions, which in his soul he abhorred; in consideration of which the Scots engaged themselves to pour a new army into England, and the king was to protect all his subjects of his three kingdoms who should join him.

During the anarchy which now prevailed, the fatal consequence of a divided capital, an insolent army, and the flight and imprisonment of their lawful sovereign, the same spirit which had so long animated the independents, on a sudden took possession of several of the common soldiers of the army, who formed themselves into a body under the

the name of Levellers, an appellation which ſignified their deſign of reducing every thing to an equality, and acknowleging no ſuperior in church, army, or ſtate. They did no more indeed than what the commons had done before them; they copied the examples of their officers, and their pretenſions ſeem to be full as well founded as thoſe of the others. Their numbers were conſiderable: Cromwell, finding that they were likely to become very dangerous, as they acted upon his own principles, and that, if they were ſuffered to go on, they might deprive him of the fruit of all his policy and labour, formed the ſudden reſolution to quell them at the hazard of his own life. He repaired to a meeting of thoſe levellers, with a guard of choſen men, with whom he had always been victorious, and began to expoſtulate with the mutineers, in a canting ſpeech, about the reaſon of their violent proceedings. Receiving an inſolent anſwer from one of the moſt licentious, he knocked down two or three of them with his own hand, and falling on the reſt with incredible fury, he diſperſed the whole body, cauſed ſome of them to be hanged by ſentence of a court-martial, and ſent a conſiderable number priſoners to London. By acting with the ſame vigour and intrepidity on ſeveral other occaſions, he ſubdued the mutinous ſpirit of this dangerous ſect, and reduced the army to ſubmiſſion.

While theſe things were in agitation, Charles, in order if poſſible, to ſatisfy the wiſhes of his people, had promiſed, by a meſſage ſent from Cariſbroke caſtle, to relinquiſh, during his own life, the power of the militia, and the appointment of all the officers of ſtate; on condition that, after his death, theſe prerogatives ſhould be reſtored to the crown: but the parliament, directed by the independents and the army, inſtead of agreeing to theſe terms, drew up four propoſitions, which they ſent him as preliminaries, and to which they demanded his poſitive aſſent before they would engage in any treaty.

By the firſt of theſe he was deſired to beſtow upon the parliament the military power for twenty years, together with an authority to raiſe whatever money ſhould be found neceſſary for ſupporting the forces; and, even after the expiration of the twenty years, they reſerved a right of reſuming the ſame authority, whenever the ſafety of the kingdom ſhould ſeem to require it. By the ſecond, he muſt revoke all the proclamations and declarations which he had iſſued againſt the parliament, and acknowlege that aſſembly to have taken arms for their own juſt and neceſſary defence. By the third, he was to repeal all the acts, and cancel all the patents of peerage, which had paſſed the great-ſeal, from the time of its being carried to Oxford by the lord-keeper Littleton. By the fourth, he muſt grant the two houſes power to adjourn as they pleaſed: a demand, in appearance of no great moment; but calculated by the independents with a view of removing the parliament to places where it would be wholly under the direction of the army. The king thought it hard, that he ſhould be obliged to make ſuch conceſſions, while nothing was ſtipulated in his favour; and to depend entirely on the generoſity of his enemies, for what he ſhould afterwards obtain. He requeſted, therefore a perſonal treaty with the parliament, and begged that the terms, on both ſides, ſhould be previouſly ſettled, before any conceſſions were demanded.

The refuſal of Charles ſo exaſperated the independent party, that many bitter ſpeeches were made againſt him in the houſe of commons, particularly by Cromwell and his ſon-in-law Ireton, the former of whom ſeemed now to have reſolved upon the taking the life of Charles. He durſt not, however, impart the depth of his deſign to any but Ireton, and one or two boſom favourites; but though he concealed it from Fairfax, yet he ſoon preached and prayed him and the other officers into a ſpirit that was fit for his purpoſes. Having thus fixed the army, he knew he ſhould have no difficulty with the parliament, where, upon the king's rejecting the propoſitions, ſir Thomas Wroth had the boldneſs to move, not only that he ſhould be removed cloſe priſoner to ſome inland caſtle, but that articles of impeachment ſhould be drawn up againſt him, himſelf deprived of the government, and a new form of government eſtabliſhed. This motion was ſeconded by Ireton and Cromwell, with great warmth, but in general terms; for they only recommended it to the houſe to ſettle the kingdom without the king, who had rejected all there propoſitions, promiſing the army in ſuch a caſe would ſtand by the parliament: "but (ſays Cromwell, with a ſtern look, clapping his hand to his ſword) teach not the army, through deſpair to ſeek their ſafety by ſome other means than adhering to you who will not ſtick to yourſelves; and how deſtructive ſuch a reſolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge."

In fine, the houſe, over-awed by his menaces, reſolved, on the third of January, 1648, "that no more addreſſes ſhould be made to the king, nor meſſages received from him: and to this the lords ſome days after agreed; the army now promiſing, in an addreſs to both houſes, to ſtand by the parliament againſt the king, on whom Hammond was ordered to have a ſtricter guard than ever, upon an information that a fleet of Dutch ſhips had anchored near the Iſle of Wight, with a deſign to reſcue him.

The king being reduced to this melancholy condition, by the inſolence of the army, began to be deeply pitied by the more moderate part of his ſubjects, many of whom began to ſtir for him in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in which they were joined by the presbyterians, from their hatred to the independents. Even the parliament, who were ſtill moſtly presbyterians, though they had loſt their leaders, had not gone ſuch lengths againſt the king, if they had not been over-awed by the army. What much encouraged the inſurrections in England, was a proſpect of a powerful aſſiſtance from Scotland; for the Scottiſh commiſſioners having entered a ſtrong proteſtation againſt forcing upon the king the four propoſitions already mentioned, and their proteſt being diſregarded, provoked at this and many other indignities to which they were expoſed, and touched with compaſſion for the misfortunes and ſufferings of their ſovereign, had undertaken to arm Scotland in his favour. In this they ſucceeded ſo well that they procured a vote of the Scottiſh parliament to raiſe forty thouſand men for the reſcue of the king's perſon, and to give the command thereof to the duke of Hamilton, contrary to the ſentiments of the kirk commiſſioners and the the zealous covenanters under the marquis of Argyll; who were apprehenſive; that if this ſcheme ſhould ſucceed, it would effect the reſtoration of monarchy without the eſtabliſhment of presbytery.

While the Scots were preparing for the invaſion of England, every part of that kingdom was filled with tumults, inſurrections, conſpiracies, and diſcontents. The presbyterians, who, by their credit and intereſt, had chiefly ſupported the war, were provoked to find themſelves over-reached and over-powered by the fraud and chicanery of the independents. The royaliſts, incenſed at the cruel treatment which the king ſuffered from the army, were ſtrongly prompted to reſtore him to liberty, and to regain the advantages, which they had formerly loſt, All orders of men were fired with indignation at ſeeing the civil ſubjected to the military power, and the king and parliament at once inſlaved by a mercenary army. But though the whole nation ſeemed to unite in their hatred of military uſurpation, the views entertained by the ſeveral parties were ſo different, that little concert was obſerved in theſe inſurrections.

Langhorne, Poyer, and Powel, presbyterian officers, who headed bodies of troops in Wales, were the firſt who declared themſelves, and, early in the beginning of the year 1648, aſſembled a conſiderable army in thoſe countries, which were warmly attached to the royal cauſe: young Hales and Goring, who had been made earl of Norwich, excited commotions in Kent: an inſurrection was raiſed in Eſſex by lord Capel, ſir Charles Lucas, and ſir George Liſle: the earl of Holland, who, ſince the beginning of the civil wars, had frequently ſhifted ſides, endeavoured to collect forces in Surry: Morrice had ſurprized the caſtle of Pomfret, in Yorkſhire.

What ſeemed of the greateſt importance, was the general ſpirit of diſcontent that had ſeized the navy. No leſs than ſeventeen ſhips, lying in the mouth of the river, declared againſt the army; and ſetting Rainsborow, their admiral, on ſhore, ſailed over to Holland, and put themſelves under the command of the prince of Wales. About the ſame time the king's ſecond ſon, the duke of York (afterwards king James II.) who was then about fifteen years old, and was a kind of a ſtate priſoner in St James's palace, eſcaped more fortunately from his confinement than his father had done from Hampton-court, and retired to Holland, where he joined his brother the prince of Wales. All theſe events however ſeemed only as the means to haſten the ruin of the unhappy king.

The genius of Cromwell, or the anger of Heaven upon a nation ſo beſpotted with crimes of the fouleſt dyes as England now was, prevailed over every human precaution. Cromwell marched in perſon into Wales; and, after taking Pembroke caſtle, which ſtood a ſiege of four weeks, he put an end to the commotions in that part of the country: Langhorne, Poyer, and Powell, who ſurrendered priſoners at diſcretion, were tried by a court-martial, and condemned to draw lots for their lives; the lot falling on Poyer, he was accordingly ſhot to death. General Fairfax (now a lord by the death of his father) ſucceſsfully oppoſed the royal party in Kent, under the earl of Norwich: he defeated him at Maidſtone, and drove him with his men into Eſſex, where thoſe who had taken arms under lord Capel, ſir Charles Lucas, and ſir George Liſle, were forced to ſhut themſelves up in Colcheſter, where they endured a long ſiege, and at laſt were compelled to ſurrender. Lucas and Liſle were ſhot to death; Goring (earl of Norwich) and Capel were ſent priſoners to Windſor caſtle: In the courſe of this ſummer the earl of Holland, Villiers duke of Buckingham, and his brother Francis, were defeated at Kingſton upon Thames, by colonel Liveſey: the earl was taken priſoner, the duke fled into France, and the lord Francis was ſlain.

Cromwell now ſaw his bloody policy of governing by the ſword, ſucceed beyond expectation: it was not now as formerly, when he had the unarmed authority of parliament, and the timorous citizens of London to deal with, for the nation now on every ſide was in a blaze, which could be quenched only with ſtreams of blood. Beſides Kent, Eſſex, Wales, and the northern counties; the Corniſhmen were up in arms, but were defeated at Penzance by ſir Hardreſſe Waller, who afterwards took poſſeſſion of Exeter. In like manner the inhabitants of Rutlandſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Northamptonſhiere, and the neighbouring counties; took arms, and were aſſembled near Stamford. Sir John Owen had renewed the war in Wales, and beſieged Caernarvon caſtle; but was defeated and taken priſoner by colonel Carter. From theſe circumſtances the reader may conclude how expert ſix or ſeven years daily experience had made the parliament's army in the trade of murder, ſince about thirty thouſand of their troops could keep upwards of a million in ſubjection, for the army was now actually at war with all the people of England. Its moſt determined enemies were thoſe who had been moſt active againſt Charles in the beginning and progreſs of the war, and were therefore conſidered by the army as apoſtates, and they were on all occaſions hated with greater ſeverity than the royaliſts themſelves.

The invaſion from Scotland ended no leſs fatally than the other attempts made this year in behalf of the royal cauſe. The Scottiſh army, under duke Hamilton, amounting to near twenty thouſand men, entered England on the thirteenth of July, and were joined by five thouſand Engliſh, under ſir Marmaduke Langdale; and falling upon the parliament's army, under major-general Lambert, near Appleby, in Weſtmoreland, they forced him to retire into the town, from whence he retreated to Kirby Steven, and afterwards to Bowes leaving ſome of his forces behind to defend the caſtle, which was beſieged, and taken on the ſeventh of Auguſt, by ſir Philip Muſgrave. The Scots ſtaid ſome time at Kendal, and major-general, Lambert's arny increaſed daily with additional forces: at length Cromwell, having quietted the commotions in Wales, marched with his forces to join him, and in his way took the town of Pomfret, but the caſtle ſtill held out for the king, but was reduced by Lambert before the end of the year. Hamilton leaving Kendal, directed his march into Lancaſhire, with an intent to advance to London: this Cromwell was reſolved to prevent at all hazards, and therefore marched to Preſton, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their forces. Here Cromwell ventured to attack them with a body not amounting to half their number; and though the royaliſts behaved with uncommon bravery, yet, not being properly ſupported by their confederates, were on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, entirely routed, and moſt of them put to the ſword. Hamilton and his troops were alſo ſhamefully defeated, and chaſed to Uttoxeter, where the duke himſelf was taken priſoner by the lord Grey of Groby, and ſent in ſafe cuſtody to Aſhby de la Zouch, in Leiceſterſhire: ſir Marmaduke Langdale was apprehended in an inn.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the prince of Wales, having ſent his brother, the duke of York, to the Hague, went on board the fleet at Helvoetſluys, and ſet ſail for England, in order to join and head the Scottiſh army when it ſhould enter that kingdom. When he arrived at Yarmouth, the inhabitants refuſed him admittance; then he directed his courſe to the river Thames, and took ſeveral rich veſſels belonging to the Londoners, which were afterwards reſtored. Mean while the earl of Warwick aſſembled a ſquadron, with which he ſailed in queſt of the prince, and anchored his ſhip ſo near him in the river, that an engagement was thought unavoidable. The prince of Wales was eager for battle, and accordingly weighed in order to attack the earl; but the wind failing, and afterwards blowing full in his teeth, he could not execute his reſolution: Warwick being reinforced with ſome freſh ſhips, and the royal fleet being in want of proviſions, young Charles was perſuaded to return to Helvoetſluys, whether he was followed by the enemy.

Cromwell improving the ſucceſs he had obtained over the Scottiſh army, marched directly to Edinburgh; by which vigorous ſtep he broke the the meaſures of the royaliſts ſo much, that Berwick and Carliſle, which Hamilton had taken, were reſtored to the Engliſh parliament: and leaving Lambert in Scotland with ſome troops, he returned with his army to England, where his preſence was now much wanted by his party, who by this time had firmly reſolved the death of their ſovereign.

For at the beginning of theſe troubles the preſbyterian party in the houſe, in the city, and other places of the kingdom, began to reſume their courage. Several petitions were preſented for a perſonal treaty with the king; and when the army was removed from London into different parts of the kingdom to quell the riſings of the people, the ſecluded members, and others who had abſented themſelves, having returned to their ſeats, the votes of no more addreſſes were repealed, and it was reſolved by both houſes "to enter into a perſonal treaty with the king; and Newport, in the Iſle of Wight, ſhould be the place of treaty; and that his majeſty ſhould be there with, honour, freedom, and ſafety; and five lords and ten commoners were appointed commiſſioners for managing the negociation, which was allowed to laſt for forty days from the day of its commencement*." This laſt was an artful proviſion thrown in by the independents in the houſe, who wanted to ſpin out matters till the re-approach of the army to the neighbourhood of London, when they knew they could carry every thing they wiſhed. Accordingly, ſir Henry Vane, junior, who was one of the commiſſioners for the commons, ſo delayed the treaty by ſtarting new difficulties, that it was not began till the fifteenth of September, a month after Cromwell had defeated the Scots, and the army was every where victorious. By the ſame means the treaty itſelf was prolonged till Cromwell was returned out of Scotland, and at hand to ſupport Fairfax and the reſt of the army, which being now collected together, after its various ſucceſſes, had its head-quarters at Windſor, and none remained to ſtem the torrent of its bloody rage, but the helpleſs king and parliament. At Cromwell's inſtigation the general officers agreed upon that execrable remonſtrance, which in effect took off the head of Charles. On the twentieth of November, after ſome debates had paſſed between the two houſes concerning the perſons to be excepted from pardon, colonel Ewers, at the head of ſeven other officers, preſented to the commons this remonſtrance. It began with a demand to drop the treaty with the king, and to bring him to juſtice; to declare the prince of Wales and the duke of York to be incapable of government; that the army be ſatisfied out of the eſtates of delinquents; that juſtice be done to the capital cauſes of war; that a period be put to that parliament; that the frequent returns of annual or triennial parliaments be ſecured; that there be a more equal repreſentative of the people in the houſe of commons; that all who had borne arms for the king ſhould be diſabled from electing or being elected; that the ſupreme power of government ſhould be inveſted in the repreſentatives of the people, among whom there ſhould be liberty of entering diſſents; that all future kings ſhould be elected by the people, but without any negative voice; that all matters of general ſettlement ſhould be eſtabliſhed by the general contract of the people; but that none ſhould have a ſhare in it, who ſhould oppoſe the matters contained in that remonſtrance.

The parliament, though on all hands ſurrounded with the moſt imminent danger, and though unable to reſiſt the uſurpations of the army, nobly determined to oppoſe them to the laſt; and rather involve the nation in anarchy and confuſion, than give their authority to thoſe violent and deſperate meaſures which were now projected. They deigned not to return any anſwer to the remonſtrance of the army; but the latter had concerted meaſures to put it out of the power of the parliament to obſtruct their deſigns: for colonel Hammond received an order, on the twenty-ſecond of November, from Fairfax to attend him, and to reſign to colonel Ewers (the ſame who had preſented the army's remonſtrance) the cuſtody of the king's perſon, which was accordingly done, and the helpleſs king was, on the thirtieth of the ſame month, carried over to Hurſt caſtle†, where he was again ſhut up from all his attendants, and continued cloſe priſoner. The preſbyterians exerted themſelves anew on this occaſion againſt the army, which they perceived to be upon the point of giving law to the parliament, On the fourth of December they voted "that the removal of the king out of the Iſle of Wight was without the knowlege and conſent of the houſe." Next day it was voted by a majority of one hundred and twenty-nine againſt eighty-three, "that the anſwers of the king to the propoſitions of both houſes (during the treaty at Newport) are a ground for the houſe to proceed upon, for the ſettlement of the kingdom."

This vote brought matters to a criſis between the parliament and the army; the officers, conſcious of their own ſtrength, reſolved no longer to keep meaſures: employing the name of Fairfax (for he ſtill ſuffered them to make uſe of his name) they conducted the army to London on the ſixth of December, and poſted guards in Whitehall, the Meuſe, St. James's, Durham-houſe, Covent-garden, and Palace-yard. Next day colonel Pride, formerly a dray-man, had ſurrounded the houſe with two regiments, by whom above forty members, as they were coming to the parliament, were ſeized, and committed to the cuſtody of the guards in ſeveral inns in Weſtminſter and the parts adjoining: and, not ſatisfied with this, they preſented a paper to the houſe, wherein they accuſed major-general Brown and ninety members, for inviting the Scots into England the laſt ſummer, and therefore required they might be excluded the houſe. Even this violent outrage was not ſufficient to ſubdue the parliament: they adjourned for four or five days, in which ſpace the army was buſied in completing their form of government.

Upon re aſſembling the two houſes, it was found that above one hundred and ſixty members were excluded; and none were now ſuffered to enter but the moſt fierce and deſperate of the independents who hardly amounted to ſixty in number. This flagarant violation of the liberties of parliament was commonly known by the name of Colonel Pride's Purge. The tranſactions of the remaining part of the parliament, if this inſignificant aſſembly deſerves that honourable appellation, were ſuch as might naturally be expected from the frantic members of which it was compoſed: they forthwith annulled the former vote, and declared the king's conceſſions unſatisfactory. They reſolved, that no members, abſent at this laſt vote, ſhould be admitted until they had ſigned it, as agreeable to their judgment. They confirmed their former vote of non-addreſſes; and they ordered into cuſtody ſir William Waller, ſir John Clotworthy, the generals Maſſey, Brown, Copley, and other leaders of the preſbyterians. The excluded members having publiſhed a paper, repreſenting the outrages which had been offered to them, and proteſting againſt all acts, which, from that time, ſhould be paſſed in the houſe of commons; the independent members oppoſed it by a declaration, in which they declared it a falſe, ſcandalous, ſeditious libel, and tending to the ſubverſion of the fundamental liberties and privileges of parliament*.

And now the fall of the unhappy king came on apace. Cornwall, who was then returned to his ſeat in the houſe of commons, and had been thanked for his ſervices in Scotland, had now no other difficulty in completing the murder of Charles, but to diſguiſe the horror of the deed from Fairfax, who began to fear he had gone too far, nor could all the arts of Cromwell reſtore him to perfect quiet. The remnant of the houſe of commons, conſiſted of a ſet of men raiſed from the loweſt claſs of life, the ſlaves of the army, whoſe officers exerciſed unlimited power in all proceedings: the city itſelf was in ſubjection to them. Cromwell, who could do what he pleaſed with the ſoldiers, got them to preſent petitions againſt the king; and the counties of Somerſet and Norfolk, with the fleet under the earl of Warwick, ſent a declaration in which they joined with the army: the common-council of London, which had ſo lately declared for the king, now wholly under the direction of the victorious party, concurred in the petition to have him brought to trial. At length this bold refuſe of the houſe of commons preſumed to form a reſolution which far tranſcended all former acts of treaſon and fanaticiſm: on the twenty-third of December they appointed a committee to draw up a formal accuſation or impeachment of his majeſty. Colonel Harriſon, the ſon of a butcher, was commanded to conduct the royal victim from Hurſt caſtle to Windſor. On the twenty-eighth of December, the committee having made its report, an ordinance for trying the king was brought into the houſe of commons by Scot, an independent miniſter. This was founded on a vote which made it "high treaſon in a king of England, for the time being, to levy war againſt the parliament and kingdom of England." This ordinance, with many deteſtable particulars, was very quickly carried through the commons, and on the ſecond of January, 1649, it was carried up to the houſe of peers by the lord Grey of Groby.

The houſe of peers, during the whole courſe of the civil wars, had poſſeſſed little authority or influence; but ſince the king's fall, it had been wholly inſignificant; and moſt of the members, diſguſted at the public proceedings, declined to give their attendance. It happened, however, that day, to be more full than uſual, and they were convened to the number of ſixteen. Without the leaſt doubt or heſitation, they unanimouſly rejected the vote of the lower-houſe, and adjourned themſelves for ten days; hoping by this means, to reſtrain the furious career of the commons.

But the commons were not to be diverted from their purpoſe by ſo ſmall an obſtacle: they voted to proceed in trying the king, and in all other matters, without the concurrence of the lords; and on the fourth of January they paſſed the following votes, which will beſt ſpeak for themſelves as to the purpoſe they were to ſerve:

"Reſolved, &c. That the commons of England in parliament aſſembled, do declare that the people are, under God, the original of all juſt power.

"And alſo declare that the commons of England in parliament aſſembled, being choſen by, and repreſenting, the people, have the ſupreme power in this nation.

"And do alſo declare, that whatever is enacted, or declared for them, by the commons in parliament aſſembled, hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the conſent and concurrence of the king, or houſe of peers, be not had thereunto."

They alſo voted, "That all members and others, appointed to act in any ordinance with peers, were empowered and enjoined to ſit, act, and execute, notwithſtanding the peers joined not therein." And ſo earneſt were both the commons and the army about the king's trial, that the queen, deſiring to ſee her huſband before his arraignment, could not obtain a paſs for her ſecure coming and returning.

On the ſixth of January, the ordinance for the king's trial was turned into an act of the commons alone, and engroſſed: and proclamation was made two days after, in Weſtminſter hall, Cheapſide, and the Old Exchange, for witneſſes to come in againſt him; and commiſſioners were appointed for trying him. At firſt it was propoſed to name ſome of the houſe of peers to be commiſſioners for that purpoſe; but, upon ſecond thoughts, that intention was laid aſide, and Thomas lord Fairfax, general, Oliver Cromwell, eſq. lieutenant-general, Henry Ireton, eſq. commiſſary-general, major-general Philip Skippon, ſir Hardreſſe Waller, knight, and other perſons, to the number of one hundred and forty-five, were appointed commiſſioners and judges on this ſurprizing trial.

When thoſe commiſſioners met, they choſe ſerjeant Bradſhaw for their preſident. He was a bold inſolent lawyer, and voted into the preſidentſhip, not for his abilities, of which he is ſaid not to have been deſtitute in his profeſſion, but becauſe he was void of all tenderneſs towards names, perſons, or offices, and was dauntleſs enough to go coolly through the impious work. Dr. Doriſlaus, Steele, Aſhe, and Cooke, were appointed aſſiſtants to the court, for drawing up and managing the evidence: the former of thoſe was a civilian; the other three were common lawyers, and Steele appears to have been a man of parts. The court in which they were to act was chriſtened by the name of the High Court of Juſtice, and provided with proper officers and decorations, to give it an auguſt appearance. Bradſhaw was attended by a guard, had a ſword of ſtate, and a mace, emboſſed with the king's own arms, carried before him; and he behaved with that gravity which became a ſupreme magiſtrate.

On the nineteenth of January the king was brought from Windſor to St. James's houſe, and all things were prepared for his fatal tragedy, in which the commons proceeded with unabated earneſtneſs, notwithſtanding the houſe of lords, and the remonſtrance of the parliament of Scotland, now convened, againſt it.

On Saturday, January 20, 1649, the king was brought before the high court of juſtice, in Weſtminſter hall, having been guarded thither by colonel Hacker and about thirty officers armed. I ſhall not detain the reader with the particulars of this execrable trial, which are to be found in every hiſtory of thoſe times; they are neither intereſting nor inſtructive: it is ſufficient to ſay that Charles's deportment before his infamous judges was very majeſtic; he looked undauntedly on the array of troops that attended him, and the pageantry of the court; and, without moving his hat, or ſhewing the regicides the ſmalleſt mark of reverence, he ſeated himſelf in a chair of crimſon velvet, prepared for him within the bar. It may be thought ſtrange by ſome readers, that as a great number, if not the majority, of the commiſſioners who were impowered to act on this occaſion, deteſted the guilt of the court, they did not attend and endeavour to prevent the ſentence*: but the truth is, the furiouſneſs of the army was ſuch, that had any difficulty occurred in condemning Charles, it would have purged the court as it had done the parliament.

The ſubſtance of the charge againſt the king was, "that he had endeavoured to ſet up a tyranical power, and to that end had raiſed and maintained a cruel war againſt the parliament." The king, on the hearing this charge read by the clerk of the court, made no other anſwer but by denying the authority of the court; the ſame he did on the twenty-ſecond and twenty-third. At length being brought before them a fourth time, on January 27, he earneſtly deſired before ſentence, to be heared before the lords and commons (intending, as it was thought, to have reſigned his crown to his eldeſt ſon Charles, prince of Wales), but his requeſt was not granted; and ſo ſtill perſiſting in diſowning the juriſdiction of the court, and conſequently in his refuſal to anſwer the charge, his ſilence was taken for confeſſion; ſentence of death was paſſed upon him, after an inſolent ſpeech made by Bradſhaw, all the members preſent ſtanding up by way of approbation: their names were as follows; Bradſhaw, preſident, Liſle, Say, Cromwell, Ireton, Hardreſſe Waller, Bourchier, Hevening-ham, Pennington, Martin, Purefoy, Barkſtead, Tomlinſon, Blackiſton, Millington, Conſtable, Ludlow, Hutchinſon, Liveſey, Tichburn, Roe, Lilburne, Smith, Edwards, Clement, Wogan, Norton, Harvey, Venn, Scot, Andrews, Fleetwood, Mayne, J. Temple, Scrope, Dean, Okey, Hewſon, Goffe, Holland, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Allen, Pelham, Blagrave, Walton, Harriſon, Whalley, Pride, Ewers, Grey of Groby, Danvers, Maleverer, More, Alured, Cawley, Stapley, Downs, Horton, Hammond, Love, Potter, Garland, Dixwell, P. Temple, Waite. The ſentence ran: "That he, Charles Stuart, king of England, having been convicted and attainted as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy, ſhould be put to death, by ſevering his head from his body." This ſentence, and the warrant for execution, in conſequence thereof, were ſigned and ſealed by all the commiſſioners above mentioned, except ſuch of them whoſe names are printed in Italic characters. And here it will be neceſſary to take notice, that colonel Richard Ingoldſby's hand and ſeal were, againſt his conſent, put to the death-warrant, by Oliver Cromwell; but his early diſclaiming the fact, and his active and ſucceſsful endeavours for the reſtoration of king Charles II. to his crown and kingdoms, not only obtained his pardon, but alſo gained him the king's favour, who conferred on him the dignity of a knight of the Bath at his coronation.

* It was a remark, that in calling over the court the firſt day of the king's trial, when the crier pronounced the name of lord Fairfax, which had been inſerted in the number, a voice came from the gallery, crying, "He has more wit than to be here." When the impeachment was read, "in the name of the good people of England; "That is a lye," ſaid the ſame voice, in a ſhriller tone, "Not a half, nor a quarter: where are the people or their repreſentatives? Oliver Cromwell is a rogue and a traitor."

Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, gave orders to fire at the place from whence theſe inſolent ſpeeches proceeded, calling out, "Down with the whores; ſhoot them:" but it was ſoon found, that the lady Fairfax was there, and that it was ſhe who had the courage to utter them. She was a perſon of very noble birth, the daughter of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury; but, being miſled by the prejudices of the times, ſhe had long encouraged her huſband's zeal againſt the royal cauſe, and was now, as well as he, filled with abhorrence at the fatal and unexpected conſequences of all his victories and ſucceſſes. humbly Inscribd.

By this time Pau, and another ambaſſador from the States General, had arrived in England, and had preſented to the houſe of commons letters from their maſters, demanding a reſpite of Charles's ſentence, which was flatly denied them: in like manner the Scottiſh commiſſioners at London gave in very warm remonſtrances to the houſe in favour of the king; but they were laid aſide without being read, and the commiſſioners were voted to go from England to Scotland, to preſerve a good intelligence between the two kingdoms.

Fairfax now found himſelf truly miſerable, for contributing ſo much to the woes he could not prevent; and had even formed a deſign, which, if it had been executed, would have freed him from the load of diſloyalty under which he laboured: this was, to aſſemble ſome of the officers moſt attached to him, and forcibly reſcue the king from the hands he was in. Underſtanding the death-warrant was ſigned, in order to gain time he repaired to Cromwell, to procure a reſpite, for ſome days at leaſt, of the execution; but Cromwell penetrated into his deſign, and, knowing Fairfax's weak ſide, ſeemed to approve of the motion, but requeſted his excellency to join with him and his brother officers in ſeeking God for a bleſſing upon their endeavours. This happened on the morning of the king's execution; and Fairfax was ſo plied with prayers, that after the king's head was ſtruck off, meeting Herbert in one of the galleries of Whitehall, he aſked how his majeſty did? and was amazed and confounded when he heard of his being beheaded.

Three days were allowed the king between his ſentence and his execution; this interval he chiefly employed in reading and devotion, having obtained leave for Juxon, biſhop of London, for whom he had a great regard, to attend him: all his family that remained in England were ſuffered to viſit him: it conſiſted only of the princeſs Elizabeth and the duke of Gloceſter. Their meeting was extremely tender: Charles cautioned them both againſt popery, and the young duke againſt accepting the crown during the lives of his brothers: Charles then gave them a few jewels, which he told them was all that he could bequeath them: and the reader may eaſily conceive their parting to be the moſt moving that could happen.

On the thirtieth of January he was conducted on foot through St. James's Park to Whitehall, accompanied by Dr. Juxon, and guarded by a regiment of foot, under the command of colonel Tomlinſon. He had taken the ſacrament in the morning; and continued in his devotions at Whitehall till noon, where he drank a glaſs of wine and eat a morſel of bread: then he went through the Banqueting-houſe to the ſcaffold, erected adjoining to that edifice. It was covered with black cloth; in the middle of it appeared the block and ax, with two executioners in vizors; ſeveral troops of horſe and companies of foot were drawn up on each ſide, and the palace was ſurrounded by a multitude of ſpectators. The king eyed the apparatus of death with great compoſure, and aſked if there was not a higher block: then addreſſing himſelf to the colonels Tomlinſon, Hacker, and ſome other perſons who were on the ſcaffold, he declared himſelf innocent of having commenced war againſt the parliament: he owned that his fate was a juſt judgment from Heaven, for having conſented to the execution of an unjuſt ſentence againſt the earl of Strafford: he forgave all his enemies, exhorted the people to return to their obedience, and acknowlege his ſucceſſor as their lawful ſovereign; and ſignified his inviolable attachment to the proteſtant religion as profeſſed by the church of England. While he prepared himſelf for the block, Dr. Juxon told him there was but one ſtage more, which, though troubleſome, was ſhort, and would convey him to heaven, where he ſhould find ineffable joy and comfort: "I go (ſaid the king) from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no diſturbance can be." "You are exchanged (replied the good biſhop) from a temporal to an eternal crown; a good exchange!" Charles, having taken off his cloak, delivered his George to the prelate, pronouncing the word "Remember!" Then he laid his neck upon the block, and ſtretching out his hands as a ſignal, one of the men in vizors ſevered his head from his body at one blow, and the other holding it up, ſtreaming with blood, exclaimed, "This is the head of a traitor!" The ſpectators teſtified their ſorrows in ſighs, tears, and lamentations; and a great number attempted to dip their handkerchiefs in the blood of their murdered prince. The body was put into a coffin covered with black velvet, and removed to an apartment in Whitehall, then embalmed, and expoſed for ſeveral days at the palace of St. James's: at length the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, and the earls of Southampton and Lindſey, obtained permiſſion to bury it in the church of Windſor, where it was privately interred, without any funeral ceremony.

Thus fell Charles I. king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the murderous decree of his own ſubjects, and the ignominious hand of a common executioner. There had been ſeveral inſtances formerly of kings of England depoſed by act of parliament, and of the wives of kings who had fallen by the ſtroke of the executioner; Mary, queen of Scots, had been ſentenced to death by Engliſh commiſſioners, who had no other right over her life than what a robber has over the defenceleſs perſon who falls into his hands: but there had never yet been an inſtance of any people bringing their own ſovereign to the block, with all the pomp and ſolemnity of juſtice: we muſt go back three hundred years before our æra to find an example of the like cataſtrophe, in the perſon of Agis, king of Lacedemon.

There have been, through the courſe of this reign, ſo many opportunities for the reader to make himſelf acquainted with the character of Charles, that I ſhall be as conciſe as poſſible in what I have to ſay on that head. King Charles was certainly poſſeſſed of great abilities, and was endowed with many excellent qualifications: he was ſtrictly ſober, chaſte, temperate, and conſtant in his devotions, both public and private. Happy had it been for himſelf and the nation, had he been as good a King as he was a Man! his aiming at more power than the conſtitution allowed, was the firſt cauſe of his misfortunes. The falſe ſteps he afterwards committed, the aſcendancy the queen and thoſe he truſted had over him, increaſed the diſtempers of his reign; and his loſing entirely the confidence of his people, with the claſhing intereſt of parties, violent and furious in their oppoſition to each other, at laſt completed his ruin, after a trouble-a troubleſome reign of twenty-three years, ten months, and three days.

Matters of religion make up great part of Charles's hiſtory: ſome have impiouſly charged him with being a friend to popery: and others, from the conceſſions he made in favour of preſbytery, will not allow him to have died in the faith of the church of England. It is to his immortal honour that we can ſay, that all his tenderneſs for his queen's perſon never brought him to harbour the ſmalleſt thought of adopting her religion; and we have it from unqueſtionable authority, that when he was at Oxford, he made the following declaration, as he was going to receive the ſacrament from the hands of archbiſhop Uſher: "My lord, I copy here many reſolved proteſtants, who may declare to the world the reſolution I do now make. I have, to the utmoſt of my power, prepared my ſoul to become a worthy receiver; and may I receive comfort from the bleſſed ſacrament, as I do intend the eſtabliſhment of the true reformed proteſtant religion, as it ſtood in its beauty in the happy days of queen Elizabeth, without any connivance at popery. I bleſs God, that, in the midſt of theſe public diſtractions, I have ſtill liberty to communicate; and may this ſacrament be my damnation, if my heart do not join with my lips in this proteſtation.*"

Charles, by his queen Henrietta, daughter of Henry IV. of France, had four ſons and five daughters, namely:

1. Charles James, who died in the cradle.
2. Charles, prince of Wales, by whom he was ſucceeded.
3. James, duke of York.
4. Henry, duke of Glocceſter, who died after the Reſtoration.

1. Mary, who eſpouſed William of Naſſau, prince of Orange, by whom ſhe was left a widow.
2. Elizabeth, confined by the regicides in Cariſbrook caſtle, where ſhe died of grief.
3. Ann, and
4. Catherine, who died in their infancy.
5. Henrietta Maria, who was carried in her infancy, by the counteſs of Dalkeith, into France, where ſhe married Philip, duke of Anjou and Orleans, brother to Lewis XIV †.

The COMMONWEALTH of ENGLAND. A. D. 1649.

THE parliament, for ſuch we muſt now call the ſmall inconſiderable part of the houſe of commons that continued ſitting, having murdered their ſovereign in the manner already related, proceeded to ſettle the government of the ſtate. The firſt ſtep they took after the execution of the king, was to iſſue a proclamation, forbidding all perſons, on pain of incurring the penalty of treaſon, to acknowlege or declare Charles Stuart, commonly called the prince of Wales, as ſovereign of England: they likewiſe voted that thoſe members of the houſe of commons who had, on the fifth of December, approved, by a vote, of the late king's conceſſions for a peace, at the Iſle of Wight, ſhould never again be re-admitted; and that even ſuch others who had given their negatives to the ſaid conceſſions, were ordered not to ſit in parliament till they had entered their diſſent to them.

The houſe of peers continued yet ſitting, and as the commiſſions of the judges were determined by the king's death, they ſent to the commons for a conference about that, and other matters relating to the ſafety of the government; but they, without returning an anſwer, paſſed a vote the ſame day (February 5), by which they declared "the kingly office to be unneceſſary and burthenſome, and that the houſe of peers was dangerous and uſeleſs, and therefore to be laid aſide." But that they might not be totally excluded from government, it was declared, "that they might be capable of being elected into the houſe of commons," of which three of them only afterwards accepted, the earls of Pembroke and Saliſbury, and the lord Howard of Eſcrick; but the reſt of the lords in general, burning with indignation at this inſult put upon them by this fag-end of the houſe of commons, publiſhed a proteſtation in the name of all the peers and barons of the realm, in which they proteſted againſt all

* Dr. Wellwood ſays of king Charles, that he had a good taſte for learning, and a more than ordinary ſkill in the liberal arts, eſpecially painting, ſculpture, architecture, and medals: he acquired the nobleſt collection of any prince of his time, and more than all the kings of England before him. He ſpoke ſeveral languages very well, and with a ſingular good grace. The book which he wrote during the height of his troubles, and which he entitled Icon Baſilike, is a collection of the prayers and meditations of the king in the exerciſe of his private devotions, and reflections. The ſtyle of this book is ſtrong, elegant, and perſpicuous; and it abounds with ſuch manly ſentiments of piety and good ſenſe, as do great honour to the royal author. Charles was not only a man of letters himſelf, but a judge of literary merit, and a generous patron of learning and ingenious men. He was very liberal to the celebrated Flemiſh painter ſir Peter Paul Rubens, by whoſe advice he purchaſed the cartoons of Raphael (which were lately removed from Hampton-court to the Queen's Palace in St. James's Park); together with many excellent pieces of painting from foreign countries. He likewiſe careſſed Vandyke, who was the pupil of Rubens, and even beſtowed on him his own kinſwoman in marriage. His architect was the famous Inigo Jones, an artiſt that far ſurpaſſed all his cotemporaries, and left many monuments of his inimitable genius, that ſtill remain in England. Laws the muſician was a particular favourite with Charles, who uſed to call him the Father of Muſic. He beſtowed particular marks of favour upon the renowned Hervey, who, to the eternal honour of the Engliſh nation, diſcovered the circulation of the blood, by his own ſagacity aſſiſted by experiments.

During the peaceable period of this reign, the commerce of England increaſed conſiderably to the Eaſt Indies, Guinea, Spain, and Turkey. The colony of New England became populous; for great numbers of puritans fled thither in conſequence of being ſeverely treated by Laud and his high-church party: the catholics afterwards, to avoid the ſame kind of perſecution from the puritans, reſorted to America, and ſettled the colony of Maryland.

acts, acts, votes, and orders of parliament, that ſhould be made during their excluſion.

This made little impreſſion on the commons; and, to prevent the aſſembling of the lords, the army, by their appointment and connivance, ſet a guard upon the door of that houſe; and, in further proſecution of their former votes againſt monarchy, they framed and paſſed "An act for the exhæredation of the royal line, and the abolition of monarchy in that kingdom," by which it was decreed, that the nation ſhould be henceforth governed by the repreſentatives of the people, under the form of a commonwealth.

Sir Abraham Reynoldſon, then lord-mayor, a perſon of great integrity and loyalty, refuſed to publiſh this act in the city of London, for which he was forthwith diſcharged from his office, and, with three of the aldermen that had joined him, was committed priſoner to the Tower; and one Andrews being choſen by the common-council mayor in his ſtead, he, with Pennington and other aldermen, proclaimed this moſt audacious act in the city. But this ſubverſion of the conſtitution not being reliſhed by the people in general, the parliament thought fit to give them ſome ſatisfaction, by publiſhing a declaration, in which they endeavoured to ſhew the reaſons of their proceedings; wherein ſeveral plauſible pretences were exhibited: among others, they made a promiſe of "deliverance from the bondage introduced by the Norman conqueſt, and of maintaining the ancient laws (which they extolled for their excellency and equality); adding, that they might well conſiſt with the preſent government of a republic, upon ſome eaſy alterations of form, only leaving the ſubſtance entire, and reforming the abuſes thereof. They promiſed likewiſe the eſtabliſhment of a firm and ſafe peace, the advancement of the true proteſtant religion, and the liberal maintaining of a godly miniſtry; the ſettling of treaties and alliances with foreign princes and eſtates; the encouragement of the manufactories, for the increaſe and flouriſhing of trade, and the maintaining of the poor in all places of the land."

About the time of publiſhing this declaration, to complete the model of their government, they aboliſhed all the ancient forms of ſovereignty in the ſtile and teſts of writs, commiſſions, and other public inſtruments; and ordered for the future all of them to be iſſued "in the names of the keepers of the liberties of England, by authority of parliament." They next cauſed the old great-ſeal to be broken, and a new one to be made, having on one ſide a red croſs and harp quartered, as the arms of England and Ireland, with this inſcription, THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND; and on the other ſide the repreſentation of the houſe of commons aſſembled, with this motto, IN THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM, BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED, MDCXLVIII. And, as another enſign of their dominion, they appointed that all the money which from that time was to be coined, ſhould, inſtead of the king's impreſſion, bear the croſs and harp, with this motto, GOD WITH US. The clauſes in the firſt of Elizabeth, and the third of James I. which enjoined taking the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance to the king and his ſucceſſors, were now repealed, and a new oath, called "the engagement," was enjoined to be taken by all who were put into places of public truſt, "to be true and faithful to the government eſtabliſhed, without king or houſe of peers". The ancient judicial and legiſlative power of the king and both houſes of parliament they aſſumed to themſelves; but the executive part of government they committed to a council of ſtate, conſiſting of thirty-nine perſons *, whoſe places were to continue for one whole year, and then a new council of ſtate to be choſen; and thus the commonwealth government was fully eſtabliſhed.

In the mean while, the parliament of Scotland, who, by their commiſſioners here, had in vain proteſted againſt any violent meaſures being purſued with regard to the captive king, no ſooner heard of his horrid murder, than they, on the third day of February this year, proclaimed his ſon Charles at the Croſs of Edinburgh. They afterwards called home their commiſſioners in England, who, juſt at their departure, ſent an expoſtulatory declaration to the houſe of commons, wherein they put them in mind of all their vows, obligations, and proteſtations for the maintenance of the king's perſon and juſt rights, and upbraided them with their ſhameful abjurations and infringement of the ſame, by their late bloody proceedings. This was ſo ill received by the parliament, that they impriſoned the meſſenger that preſented it, and voted the paper ſcandalous and ſeditious, and all ſuch perſons traitors who ſhould join with them, or adhere to the ſubſcribers. They likewiſe ſecured the perſons of the commiſſioners, till a copy of the paper was ſent into Scotland, to ſee if the parliament and eſtates there would acknowlege the ſame; upon which a meſſenger was ſent from the parliament of Scotland, to juſtify what their commiſſioners had done, and to complain of their detention as a breach of the law of nations. The Engliſh parliament, unwilling to embroil themſelves in a war with Scotland, ordered the commiſſioners to be releaſed, and they returned home; but theſe proceedings increaſed on both ſides the diſtruſt and jealouſy they had of each other.

In March, a new high court of juſtice was erected, of which Bradſhaw was again preſident, for the new trial of duke Hamilton (as earl of Cambridge in England) the earls of Holland and Norwich, the lord Capel and ſir John Owen, who had been principally active during the preceding ſummer, in the attempts made to free the king out of the hands of his enemies by force of arms. They were all convicted, and ſentenced to die; but, upon their petitioning the parliament, their pardon or execution was to be determined by the votes of the houſe, when duke Hamilton and lord Capel were caſt, and ſir John Owen ſaved by a conſiderable majority. The houſe being equally divided as to the two earls, the former was caſt, and the latter ſaved, by the ſingle vote of the ſpeaker. Accordingly Hamilton, Holland, and

* Theſe were the chiefs of the army, and others of deſperate fortunes, and the moſt active in the late rebellious tranſactions, viz. the earls of Denbigh, Muſgrave, Pembroke, and Saliſbury, the lords Grey, Fairfax, Grey of Groby, Liſle, Rolles, and St. John, Wilde, Bradſhaw, Cromwell, Skippon, Pickering, Maſſam, Hazelrig, Harrington, Vane, jun. Danvers, Armine, Mildmay, Conſtable, Pennington, Wilſon, Whitelocke, Martin, Ludlow, Stapleton, Heveningham, Wallop, Hutchinſon, Bond, Popham, Valentine, Walton, Scot, Purefoy, and Jones.

Capel, were beheaded the twenty-ninth of March, on a ſcaffold before Weſtminſter-hall.

It was now thought fit to aboliſh the council of agitators, who were at firſt ſet up by Cromwell and his aſſociation, to oppoſe the presbyterians in their project of disbanding the army. They had now done their maſter's work, and had been the chief inſtruments in all the late tranſactions; and leſt they ſhould take it in their heads to carry matters farther than the preſent rulers, between whom and the officers of the army there was now a perfect agreement, cared they ſhould, thoſe who had firſt ſet them up, judged it expedient to put them down; but this could not be effected without ſome effuſion of blood; for thoſe ſons of rapine and miſrule having notice of what was intended againſt them, after having in vain drawn up and preſented a remonſtrance to the parliament for continuing them as a council, had recourſe to arms; and about four thouſand met at Burford, under the direction of Thomſon, a man formerly condemned for ſedition by a court-martial, but pardoned by his colonel. Their reſiſtance was not long-lived; Fairfax and Cromwell attacked them ſuddenly; four hundred were taken priſoners; ſome of them put to death, and the reſt pardoned; and this mutinous ſpirit was for the preſent totally ſuppreſſed. Let us now attend the ſteps of the lawful heir to the crown, deprived of his right, and turned out a wanderer to the wide world.

Charles prince of Wales, now Charles II. by the death of his father, no ſooner heard of that tragical event, than he took the title of king, being then eighteen years of age. He at that time reſided at the Hague, whither two gentlemen had been ſent by the parliament of Scotland, to acquaint him with their proceedings in his behalf, and to invite him into their kingdom; upon which Charles reſolved to go to France, that from thence he might more eaſily paſs into ſome part of his own dominions, to receive their commiſſioners. With this view he left Holland in the month of April, and came to St. Germains, near Paris, where the queen his mother then was; and all the way as he paſſed through the cities of the United Provinces and the Spaniſh Netherlands, he was very ſplendidly entertained. The duke of Lorraine met him on the frontiers of France, and the king of France came in perſon to Champagne to receive him, and accompany him to Paris, and from thence to St. Germains, where he ſtaid a few months, together with his brother the duke of York, who came to him out of Holland, where we will leave him for the preſent, and turn our eyes towards the new government in England.

The parliament, notwithſtanding their inconſiderable number, found every thing at home compoſed into a ſeeming tranquility, by the terror of their arms. Foreign powers, conjoined in mutual hoſtilities, had neither leiſure nor inclination to interfere in the domeſtic quarrels of this iſland. Scotland had, indeed, in open defiance of the new republic, proclaimed the ſon of the murdered king; but the Engliſh having no pretext to intermeddle in the affairs of that kingdom, ſuffered the Scots for the preſent to ſettle their government after their own manner. Ireland being ſubject to the dominion of England, demanded a more anxious and more immediate care.

When the marquis of Ormond, in obedience to the command of his late majeſty, ſurrendered Dublin and the other fortreſſes to the parliamentary forces, he came over to England, was admitted to the king's preſence at Hampton-court, received a grateful acknowledgment for all his paſt ſervices, and, during ſome time, lived in tranquility near London. But being ſoon after baniſhed, together with other royaliſts, to a diſtance from that city, and ſeeing the cauſe of his maſter actually ruined, he thought proper to withdraw into France, where he joined the queen and the prince of Wales. As ſoon, however, as he heard of the tragical death of his ſovereign, he inſtantly returned into Ireland; and forming a confederacy of the catholics, as well as of ſuch proteſtants as adhered to the royal cauſe, he aſſembled ſixteen thouſand men, with which he advanced upon the parliamentary garriſons; and having taken Dundalk, Tredagh, Newry, and other fortreſſes, he prepared, in the ſpring of this year, to lay ſiege to Dublin. In fine, the affairs of the royaliſts in a ſhort time appeared in ſo proſperous a condition, that it was thought by every one that the young king would repair in perſon into Ireland.

In this exigency, the governors of the new commonwealth thought it behoved them to take the moſt vigorous meaſures for the preſervation of that valuable iſland; and it was voted to ſend over a conſiderable body of forces for its defence. On this occaſion there were ſtruggles betwixt the ſeveral parties in the government: the preſbyterians endeavoured to procure the lieutenancy of Ireland for Waller, the independents for Lambert. After the execution of the king, Cromwell himſelf began to aſpire to a government, where ſo much glory, he ſaw, might be gained, and ſo much intereſt acquired. In his abſence, he took care to have his name mentioned in the council of ſtate; and both friends and enemies united immediately in voting him into that honourable poſt. The former imagined, that the motion had been made at his own requeſt; the latter wanted to remove him to a diſtance, and flattered themſelves that, during his abſence, they ſhould be able to open the eyes of Fairfax, whom he had hitherto blinded by his hypocritical profeſſions.

Oliver being now appointed general for this expedition, and lord-governor (that was the title given him) of that iſland, both for civil and military affairs, for three years, he loſt no time in making all the neceſſary preparations for his departure, and in the mean time ſent over conſiderable ſuccours to colonel Jones, the parliamentary governor of Dublin; by the help of which that officer made ſuch vigorous and ſucceſsful ſallies, that he not only forced the marquis of Ormond, who had by this time formed the ſiege of the Iriſh capital, to abandon his enterprize; but falling upon him in his retreat, put his army to the rout.

This was in the beginning of Auguſt, 1649; and a few days after Cromwell ſet ſail from Milford-haven, and arrived ſafe at Dublin with his whole army, conſiſting of fifteen thouſand men, to the inexpreſſible joy of the king's enemies in Ireland. Having refreſhed his men, he entered immediately on the great work he came about. His firſt attempt was upon Drogheda, a ſtrong town, and well garriſoned with the flower of Ormond's forces, under under the command of ſir Arthur Aiton, which he reſolutely took by ſtorm, and put all that he found in arms therein to the ſword; an act of terror that much facilitated his future conqueſts, and after this many places ſubmitted to him without ſtriking a ſtroke.

In October he took Wexford by ſtorm in the like manner, and with the like effect as he had done Drogheda. In ſhort, Cromwell carried on his conqueſts with ſuch amazing rapidity, that in about nine months time he almoſt completed the reduction of the whole iſland; when, about the middle of May 1650, he was recalled by the parliament, in order to enter upon a new ſcene of artifice in another place. Leaving therefore his ſon-in-law Ireton, his deputy, to finiſh what remained to be done, he embarked for England; and landing at Briſtol, proceeded in perfect triumph to London, where he arrived amidſt the loud acclamations of the people, and had all imaginable honour and reſpect paid him by the members of parliament, officers of the army, the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and other perſons of diſtinction in the ſtate.

In the mean time, the young king had removed, in September, from St. Germains, and came over to the iſland of Jerſey, where his authority was ſtill acknowleged by colonel Clavering, governor of that place: and now finding that Ireland was on the point of being irrecoverably loſt, he fixed his thoughts entirely upon Scotland; to which country he had been again and again invited over by the violent covenanters, but ſtill upon their own terms. Though thoſe were exceſſively diſagreeable to Charles, yet he had ſeveral conferences with Windram, who was ſent about the latter end of this year (1649) from Scotland to Jerſey. The ſubſtance of the propoſitions from the Scots to Charles were as follow:

"I. That he would ſign the covenant, and paſs an act for all perſons in Scotland to take it, and to ratify all that had been done there concerning the ſame. II. That he would paſs divers acts of the parliament of Scotland, which were ratified by their two laſt ſeſſions; as for his approbation of their diſclaiming Dr. Hamilton's deſign for receiving the ſeveral acts made by the Engliſh for the militia, and for the kings of Scotland to have no negative voice in that parliament. III. That he would withdraw his commiſſioners to Montroſe for raiſing forces, to be ſent from beyond ſeas into Scotland, and to give preſent orders for the ſtopping thereof. IV. That he would put away all papiſts from about him, and let none be of his council but known proteſtants. V. That he would appoint ſome place about Holland to treat with commiſſioners from the eſtates of Scotland, who would ſend eminent lords to him, to treat and conclude there upon all particulars; and from the time he ſhould come into Scotland, they would provide for him what was neceſſary to make him and his train to reſide in a regal manner. VI. That he would give a ſpeedy anſwer to their deſires."

This is the mildeſt form of the Scottiſh conditions; for they were afterwards loaded with many odious particulars againſt the beſt friends of the royal family in both kingdoms, and with many intolerable indignities to the perſon of Charles himſelf. When the propoſitions came to be debated in Charles's council, it was reſolved to put off the acceptance of them for a few months longer, when the king was to give the commiſſioners from Scotland a final hearing at Breda, a place much more commodious for treating than Jerſey was. Charles made uſe of this reſpite in encouraging the marquis of Montroſe to haſten the preparations in which he was at that time actually engaged, to reſcue the king his maſter from the neceſſity of ſubmitting to the earl of Argyle and his party of rigid covenanters. Montroſe having laid down his arms, in conſequence of the late king's orders, had retired to France, after being degraded by the Scottiſh parliament. Charles, after the tragical death of his father, had ſent Montroſe a renewal of his commiſſion, as captain-general of Scotland; and ordered him to endeavour to raiſe a body of forces in Germany, and make a deſcent in Scotland; chuſing rather to come in by force of arms than upon the ſlaviſh conditions offered him. Montroſe having completed his levies, landed in the north of Scotland, in the beginning of April, 1650, hoping that he ſhould be ſoon ſtrengthened by the coming in of the people, in conſequence of a declaration he had cauſed to be publiſhed, previous to his deſcent, inviting his countrymen to join him in revenging the late king's murder, and in reſtoring his preſent majeſty: but herein he was diſappointed, and the Scottiſh government took ſuch effectual meaſures in oppoſing him, that before the end of April he was entirely defeated by colonel Strachan, who commanded a body of troops, independent of Leſly. This defeat was owing to the rawneſs and inexperience of his troops; two hundred of whom were killed, and one thouſand two hundred taken priſoners. The whole Scottiſh army ſoon after advanced againſt them under Leſly. As to himſelf, he ſeems to have been ſomewhat defective in point of intelligence, and to have been ſurprized by Strachan ſo ſuddenly, that he had no opportunity of diſplaying his wonted conduct and courage. He eſcaped however from the rout of this field; and, if we are to believe the tradition of the Scots themſelves, he was betrayed by a gentleman of the country who owed him ſingular obligations. All I am certain of is, that he was ſent up priſoner to Edinburgh, where he was put to death, with ſuch circumſtances of cruelty and ignominy, as barbarians would not have offered to a man whoſe virtues did honour to the human ſpecies.

After the death of Montroſe, Charles finding himſelf abſolutely without reſource, he in a manner gave the Scots a charte blanche, agreed to all their mortifying propoſitions, quitted Holland (whither he had lately gone from Jerſey), and putting himſelf in the power of thoſe who had ſo lately hanged his general and faithful friend and protector, he embarked for Scotland in the beginning of June, where he arrived, after a very hazardous voyage, having been once in danger of ſhipwreck, and more than once, of falling into the hands of Popham, admiral of the parliament fleet, which had been ſent out to intercept him in his paſſage. Before he was permitted to ſet foot on ſhore, he was required to ſign the covenant, and with this requeſt he thought proper to comply. Duke Hamilton, the earls of Lauderdale, Dunfermlin, and other noblemen attached to the royal cauſe, were immediately removed from his preſence, and were obliged to withdraw to their eſtates, where they lived without any truſt or authority. None of his Engliſh friends who had ſerved under his father were ſuffered to remain in the kingdom, the duke of Buckingham excepted; whoſe attendance on his perſon, Charles, by the moſt earneſt intreaties, did with great difficulty obtain.

The parliament of Scotland now entered into deep conſultation about forming an army for the ſervice of the king, as they pretended; and an act was publiſhed for the rating of every fourth man through the kingdom, capable of bearing arms. Leſly, earl of Leven, was appointed general of the foot, and Holbourn major-general; David Leſly lieutenant-general of the horſe, and Montgomery major-general; the ſupreme command of the whole army being reſerved for Charles himſelf, whom, on the 15th of July, they again ſolemnly proclaimed king at the Croſs of Edinburgh; and it was even intended to have crowned him the following month, but certain obſtacles interpoſed which prevented it. Charles himſelf, though treated with great reſpect and deference, was totally debarred from all exerciſe of regal power, and was allowed to indulge in no kind of amuſement; and the ſpirit of the Scots in religious matters being at that time remarkably gloomy and ſevere, the young king was forced to ſubmit to many auſterities that were extremely diſagreeable to his natural temper, and which probably produced, or at leaſt ſtrengthened, that indifference for religion, which, during the remaining part of his life, he always diſcovered.

The Engliſh parliament was no ſooner informed of the king's arrival in Scotland, than they immediately began to prepare for a war, which they plainly perceived muſt now prove inevitable; and they reſolved not to ſuffer one half of the iſland to be an aſylum for a perſon who pretended to be king of the other likewiſe. The rulers of the new commonwealth had hitherto ſupported the change of government with as much prudence and conduct, as they had ſhewn rage and fury in bringing it about: and it was the aſtoniſhment of all Europe, to behold a handful of private men, without any chief to command them, keep the peers of the realm at a ſilent and inactive diſtance, ſtrip the biſhops of their dignity, reſtrain the multitude within the bounds of order and obedience, maintain an army of ſixteen thouſand men in Ireland, and the like number in England, ſupport a formidable fleet, well provided, and punctually pay all demands, without any one member of the houſe enriching himſelf at the nation's expence. To provide for ſo great a charge, they obſerved the ſtricteſt œconomy in the management of the revenues formerly annexed to the crown, and made a ſale of the forfeited lands of the biſhops and chapters for ten years. In ſhort, the nation paid a tax of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds per month; a tax ten times greater than that of ſhip-money, which Charles I. had attempted to raiſe by his own authority, and which was the firſt cauſe of the diſaſter and bloodſhed which followed.

This parliament was not under the direction of Cromwell, he being at that time on an Iriſh expedition; but it was chiefly guided by the independent party, who ſtill bore a great ſway. It having been reſolved by the houſe to aſſemble an army againſt the Scots, they reſolved that Cromwell ſhould be ſent with it, next in command under Fairfax: accordingly, he received orders to quit Ireland, which he had almoſt ſubdued, and he returned in triumph to London. Fairfax, on having the chief command offered him, refuſed to accept of it; for though he had ſuffered the army to make uſe of his name in murdering their ſovereign, and enſlaving their fellow-ſubjects, yet he could not entertain the thoughts of invading the Scots, whom he regarded as zealous preſbyterians, and united to England by the ſacred bond of the ſolemn league and covenant. The parliament in vain ſolicited him to act as their general; he was peremptory in his refuſal; and, to put a ſtop to their importunities, he reſigned his command, and retired to end his days in peace. This was no extraordinary reſolution, at a period and in a country where every one acted by his own rules. This however proved the æra of Cromwell's greatneſs, who, on the reſignation of Fairfax, was appointed "general and commander in chief of all the armies of the commonwealth;" a poſt of the utmoſt importance in a ſtate which ſtood entirely by arms.

The army being modelled and appointed after Cromwell's own mind, and all the grimace of faſting and praying being over, Cromwell, on the 29th of June, left London, and on the 22d of July entered Scotland, at the head of near twenty thouſand men; and in the way he marched, he found the country deſerted by its inhabitants, and every thing carried away that might ſerve to ſubſiſt his army; ſo that he could procure no proviſions but what were ſent him by ſhipping from England. It was therefore neceſſary for him to come to an engagement as ſoon as poſſible. The diſpoſition of the Scottiſh generals were ſuch as might have rendered all Cromwell's experience and valour uſeleſs, had it not been for the inſolence of their men. The Scots were poſſeſſed of Edinburgh caſtle, and their army under Leven and Leſly, which was more than equal to that of the Engliſh, poſted ſo advantageouſly near that city, that it could not be attacked. Cromwell had all the country between Dunbar and Edinburgh, a ſpace of about eighteen miles; but though he marched and counter-marched his army, and though his men had all advantages in all ſkirmiſhes, yet he ſaw nothing before his eyes but famine, for the ſtormy weather did not admit his receiving any proviſions from his ſhips. He ſtill endeavoured, by acts of humanity to the Scots who fell into his hands, and of juſtice upon his own ſoldiers who were found plundering the country, to make a party among the Scots. But all was in vain; and their preachers already began to triumph from the pulpits, as if the whole Engliſh army was upon the point of being deſtroyed. Matters remained in this ſituation till the beginning of September, when Cromwell was forced to march from his camp on Pentland-hills, in order, as Whitelock expreſſes, to fight for his victuals; and, on the firſt of September, marched to Dunbar, hoping at that place to receive ſome proviſions from his fleet; but Cromwell, to his great joy, perceived that the Scots had left their ſtrong camp between Edinburgh and Leith; and on the firſt of September, ber, they took poſſeſſion of another ſtrong camp near Dunbar, from whence he found means to draw them into the level ground.

This was regarded by Cromwell as the omen of a ſure victory; and one body of the Scots coming down to ſupport another, the engagement, on the third of September, became general, but the diſpute unequal; for the Scots were ſo far from ſtanding the ſhock of Cromwell's veterans, that though their forces were become by this time much ſuperior to his, they ſuffered themſelves, almoſt without reſiſtance, to be cut in pieces: according to the relation made to the houſe of commons by major White, who was diſpatched by Cromwell to London with the news of the victory, the defeat of the Scots was owing to the impatience of their preachers, who had the whole power over the private men, and who drove their generals from their wiſe conduct, which muſt have obliged Cromwell either to have laid down his arms, or to have fought under the moſt ruinous diſadvantages. The chief diſpute was about a paſs between Dunbar and Edinburgh, which the Engliſh gained, and thereby opened their way to the Scottiſh army upon equal terms. Upwards of four thouſand of the Scots were killed in the battle, and in their flight towards Edinburgh ten thouſand were taken priſoners, one half of whom were deſperately wounded, or unfit for ſervice, and the other half ſent to London, to be marketed for as common ſlaves to the Engliſh plantations in America: and all their colours, artillery, arms, ammunition, tents and baggage, were taken by Cromwell, with moſt of their officers of note, whoſe names deſerve no particular mention in hiſtory. The Scots immediately, in conſternation, quitted Edinburgh and Leith, when Cromwell took poſſeſſion of them, and then laid ſiege to Edinburgh caſtle, which he became maſter of about the end of December.

The covenanters, humbled by their late defeat, began to relax in their ſeverity to their ſovereign: Hamilton, Lauderdale, and all his other friends, were ſuffered to approach him, and his coronation was performed with great pomp and ceremony at Scone, on the firſt of January, 1651.

Upon the news of the defeat of the Scots at Dunbar, the king of Spain ordered Cardinas to take upon him the character of his ambaſſador, and to demand an audience of the parliament; he ſent notice at the ſame time to Charles's ambaſſadors that they muſt immediately leave his court and dominions. Affairs between France and the new republic were upon a leſs amicable footing; the trading friends of the parliament having ſuffered great hardſhips in France: cardinal Mazarine, who had then the government of the ſtate during the minority of Lewis XIV. in vain endeavouring to amuſe Augier, who was reſident in France on the part of the parliament, that miniſter was called home; repriſals were granted upon the French ſhipping, and all Europe thought a war between the two nations unavoidable; but they were deceived in their conjectures, ſuch a war being by no means conſiſtent with the plan the parliament had laid down. This year alſo the court of Portugal, after ſuffering ſeverely for giving ſhelter to prince Rupert with his ſquadron of ſhips, ſent an ambaſſador to make their conceſſion, who was admitted to audience in the parliament-houſe, with great ſtate.

Early in the ſpring of the year 1651, the Scots had aſſembled another army, under the duke of Hamilton and general Leſly; and encamped at Torwood, in the neighbourhood of Stirling. The king himſelf was preſent in the army, and his generals determined to purſue the ſame prudent and cautious meaſures, which, ſo long as they were embraced, had been ſo ſucceſsful during the former campaign. With this view they entrenched themſelves much in the ſame manner as before the battle of Dunbar, and were well ſupplied with proviſions from the county of Fife. This made Cromwell, then at Edinburgh, reſolve, at all events, to cut off the communication with thoſe parts; and having ſent over a good body of troops into Fife, under the generals Lambert and Overton, on the fourth of June, they totally routed a ſtrong party of the king's, which was ſent againſt them. Cromwell, ſoon after, viz. in the month of July, alſo paſſed over with his whole army, and then marching northward, he made himſelf maſter of Perth, or St. Johnſtoun, and thus poſted himſelf at the king's back.

Charles now found himſelf under the neceſſity, if he ſtaid in Scotland, either to fight the Engliſh army, or to ſtarve in his camp: reduced to this extremity, he embraced a reſolution worthy a prince contending for empire; the way to England being perfectly clear, he determined immediately to advance into that country, where he imagined that all his friends, and all who were diſſatisfied with the preſent government, would repair to his ſtandard. He prevailed on the generals to agree to his propoſal, and, with one conſent, the army, amounting to the number of fourteen thouſand men, quitted their camp, and, on the ſixth of Auguſt, entered England by Carliſle. The king immediately cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed at the head of the army, as he did at all the market-towns he paſſed through.

Cromwell foreſaw and foretold the fate of this march; and his conqueſts in Scotland were now rapid and important: for, after making himſelf maſter of Perth, and ſeveral other forts, he ſaw the whole country, excepting Stirling, quite open before him, and therefore detached Lambert to follow upon the ſkirts of the king's army, with a conſiderable party, and leaving colonel George Monk (then an officer under him, and afterwards the famous general Monk) to command in Scotland, he began his march in perſon with the main body of the army in purſuit of the king.

The parliament exerted themſelves to the utmoſt on this occaſion: they not only publiſhed an act ſtrictly forbidding the abetting Charles Stuart, or any of his adherents, on pain of high-treaſon, but ordered the militia of the ſeveral counties to be drawn out to obſtruct his march; and the lord Fairfax, quitting his retirement, took the field with a conſiderable body for the ſame purpoſe; ſo that in a few days Charles had as great an army to encounter before him, as that which followed him at his heels; he alſo found that his friends did not come in to him ſo faſt as he had expected: he had ſome hopes that Shrewſbury and Gloceſter would have declared for him; but in this likewiſe he was diſappointed; and Lambert had made ſuch diſpatch, that, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, he was within half a day's march; and in two days after he was joined by major-general Harriſon with a body body of troops, making in the whole ſix thouſand horſe beſides three thouſand foot, which were poſted to defend Warrington bridge, to ſtop the paſſage of the royal army; but when Charles came to Warrington, he attacked the troops which had been poſted to defend the bridge with ſo much ſucceſs, that Lambert was obliged to retire, and the royaliſts took poſſeſſion of the town on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt. Though there was no great matter in this advantage, yet it made a great noiſe in London, and threw all things into confuſion. News coming to Charles's army of the diſtracted condition of that city, it occaſioned a debate in council concerning the immediate march of the army thither; but, upon the reſult, it was reſolved to make good all the paſſes that were thereabouts, for their better ſecurity, and to march forthwith to Worceſter, of which place the king eaſily made himſelf maſter, by means of the warm ſide which the inhabitants there had for his cauſe.

I ſhall not trouble the reader with all the manifeſtoes, proclamations, and the like publiſhed by Charles after his entering England, nor with the particulars of the many wiſe precautions made uſe of by the parliament to defeat his invaſion: it is certain that very little regard was paid to any thing that came from the king. General Maſſey had received a wound, which diſabled him from being ſo uſeful as he had promiſed to be to Charles; and Cromwell, after his army had ſuffered incredible fatigues in its march, was joined by lieutenant-general Fleetwood and colonel Deſborough, at Warwick, on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, from whence they made diſpoſitions to inveſt Worceſter, which Charles was fortifying while his army lay near the town. He had by this time been joined by the lord Talbot, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Shrewſbury, and the lord Howard; but he ſtill remained in a very deſperate condition, being on the firſt of September, hemmed in on all ſides by the parliament's troops.

The earl of Derby, ever ſince the death of the late king, had lived in the Iſle of Man, without acknowleging the authority of the parliament; but hearing of Charles's march into England, he came over, and began to exert himſelf with great ſucceſs in Lancaſhire and Cheſhire: he got together about fifteen hundred horſe, but, before he could join the king, he was ſet upon by colonel Lilburne, with a body of parliament forces, and entirely defeated, himſelf with difficulty eſcaping to the royal army before Worceſter.

On the third of September, being that day twelve-month that the battle of Dunbar was fought, Cromwell charged the king's army ſo furiouſly, that, after ſome hours diſpute, they were driven back on both ſides the Severn, and retiring into the city in the utmoſt confuſion, were followed by Cromwell's men, who made a dreadful ſlaughter of the royal troops, and obtained a complete victory. According to the beſt accounts two thouſand royaliſts were cut in pieces, and upwards of ſeven thouſand taken priſoners on that and the ſucceeding days. The chief of the priſoners were the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Derby, Cleveland, Lauderdale, Ruthen, Carnwarth, and Kelly, the lord Spynie, ſir John Packington, ſir Ralph Clare, ſir Charles Cunningham, colonel Graves, Fanſhaw, ſecretary to Charles, ſix colonels of horſe, thirteen of foot, nine lieutenants-colonels of foot, ſix majors of horſe, thirteen majors of foot, thirty-ſeven captains of horſe, ſeventy-two captains of foot, fifty-five quarter-maſters, eighty of the king's domeſtics, with his coach and equipages, and a collar of SS. and ſtandard. The king himſelf muſt have been taken, had not the earl of Cleveland, ſir James Hamilton, colonel Careleſs, and a few other gallant officers, prevailed with the foot to keep the enemy a little in play till Charles could have time to eſcape, which he did, with about ſixty horſe, by one of the gates of the city in the duſk of the evening. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Shrewſbury, Cleveland, and Derby, with ſome other Engliſh and Scottiſh noblemen. His eſcape was chiefly favoured by the greedineſs of the parliament army, who immediately fell to plundering the town and lodgings of the royaliſts. We muſt not forget to obſerve, that the brave duke of Hamilton was mortally wounded in the engagement, and died a few days after. Cromwell, after the battle, ordered the walls of Worceſter to be levelled with the ground. Charles having fled as far as Kidderminſter, he was adviſed, by the earl of Derby, to make the beſt of his way to a place called Boſcobel, in Shropſhire, but upon the confines of Staffordſhire, inhabited by William Penderel and his wife, truſty perſons on whom he might depend. Thither Charles was conveyed, while the lords and others in his train took leave of him, and made the beſt of their way to join Leſly, who was on his march northwards; but in their route thither the earls of Derby and Lauderdale, with ſome other perſons of diſtinction, were taken priſoners by the enemy. The earl of Derby was carried to Cheſter, where being condemned by a council of war, he ſuffered death at Bolton ſoon after. Sir Timothy Fetherſtonehaugh, with ſeveral other loyal perſons, underwent the ſame fate, about the ſame time. The earl of Lauderdale was ſent priſoner to Windſor caſtle; and the earl of Cleveland, with the lords Wentworth and Kenmure, and the generals Maſſey and Middleton, having been taken at the ſame time, were ſent to different priſons; but the duke of Buckingham, with the lords Levingſton and Talbot, eſcaped beyond ſea. It muſt not be forgot that the eſcape of Charles was greatly facilitated by colonel Careleſs, who kept ſeveral of the purſuing parties in play with a ſmall handful of men he picked up upon the road.

The proper agents for ſecreting Charles being provided, he was inſtantly diſguiſed in the moſt homely cloaths their ſeveral habitations would afford, and transformed into a woodman; but the enemy had got ſo good intelligence, that, the day after the battle, ſome of the parties were at the neighbouring villages in ſearch of him, and actually paſſed very near the place where he abſconded. Three brothers, of the name of Penderel, acted as ſcouts upon the skirts of the adjoining fields; a fourth brother acted as an inſtructor of his majeſty in his new ſtate; and one or two other perſons behaved with equal fidelity. In a few days finding his ſafety there to be precarious, he made an attempt, with his faithful conductors, to paſs into Wales, where he thought he would be more in ſecurity, but he found it impracticable, through the vigilance of his enemies: their ſoldiers lay upon all the roads, and guarded all the paſſes upon the rivers, and though all imaginable care was taken to diſguiſe the perſon and diſcolour the skin of Charles, yet he was ſeveral times in danger of being taken. Being obliged to return to Boſcobel, his ſtrength and ſpirits were quite exhauſted; but being joined by colonel Careleſs, he betook himſelf next day to a neighbouring wood, where he mounted the oak, which the devotion of his family's friends have ſince idolized under the name of Royal. This umbrageous tree for ſome time protected Charles from the purſuit of his enemies, and thus for ſeveral days he led a kind of woodland life, not without ſome diverting adventures too minute for this hiſtory, until he was diſcovered by the lord Wilmot, who had been concealed by Mr. Whitegrave and Mr. Huddelſton, both of them papiſts, the latter a prieſt. By their advice he changed his lodging to Mr. Whitegrave's houſe, being guarded thither on horſeback by the five brothers Penderel. All this time the parliament officers were very inquiſitive about Charles in the neighbourhood of thoſe parts; and perhaps it would have been more difficult to have concealed him, had not the houſes where he abſconded generally belonged to Roman catholics, and contained many ingenious lurking holes in the walls, wainſcotting, and the like, for the benefit of their prieſts when hard beſet by the officers of juſtice. In the neighbourhood of this place lived colonel Lane, a loyal gentleman, who was well known to the lord Wilmot, and therefore truſted by him with the ſecret of the king's concealment: after ſome conſultation it was reſolved to make uſe of a paſs that Mrs. Jane Lane, the colonel's ſiſter, had obtained for herſelf and a ſervant to go to Briſtol. Upon this Charles was equipped as a ſervant-man, and was mounted on the ſame horſe before the lady, another gentleman and his wife being in company, and the lord Wilmot attending them at a diſtance as a ſervant, with a hawk on his fiſt; in this equipage they travelled, not without Charles running many risks of being diſcovered, till they came to a gentman's houſe within three miles of Briſtol. From thence he removed to colonel Windham's houſe, at Trent, and endeavoured to procure a paſſage from Charmouth to France; but being not only diſappointed, but almoſt diſcovered, he was obliged to return to Trent; and his dangers every hour multiplying, he went to Heale, near Saliſbury, and from thence to Brighthelmſtone in Suſſex, and, on the fifteenth of October, went on board a ſmall bark at Shoreham, which landed him in Normandy, near Havre de Grace.

Cromwell in the mean time returned in triumph to London: he was met a few miles from the city by the ſpeaker of the houſe in his formalities, accompanied by ſeveral of the members, and the lord-mayor and magiſtrates of London, in their formalities. The firſt thing they did after his return, was to perſuade the parliament to an abuſe of the victory their troops had gained, and which was ſo flattering to the Engliſh; for Monk having in a ſhort time completed the reduction of Scotland, the Engliſh republic had diſpatched ſir Henry Vane, St. John, and other commiſſioners, to ſettle the government of that kingdom, and an act paſſed including the Scots in the commonwealth with England; the Scots, who in general were more favourably inclined to the parliament than to the king, not being diſpleaſed with this eſtabliſhment.

During theſe tranſactions in England, Ireton, Cromwell's ſon-in-law, after many ſucceſſes in Ireland, died at Limerick of the plague, and the command of the army in that kingdom was given to lieutenant-general Ludlow: the adminiſtration of civil affairs was truſted to commiſſioners. Ludlow continued to proſecute the war with equal vigour and good fortune, and every where defeated the diſpirited Iriſh.

Never had England been more powerful than ſince it had become a commonwealth. The parliament, which was wholly compoſed of republicans, formed the extraordinary project of joining the ſeven United Provinces of Holland to England, as it had lately incorporated Scotland. The ſtadtholder, William II. ſon-in-law to Charles I. was lately dead, after having attempted to make himſelf abſolute in Holland, as Charles I. had attempted to do in England, and with no better ſucceſs: he left an infant ſon behind him, and the Engliſh parliament hoped that the Dutch would as eaſily give up their ſtadtholder as England had done its king, in which caſe the united republic of England, Scotland, and Holland, might hold the ballance of Europe: but the friends of the houſe of Orange oppoſed this project with all their might, and repreſented the propoſed union as ſo detrimental to the freedom and commerce of their own nation, that the ſtates not only refuſed to come into it, but the Engliſh ambaſſadors were very much affronted by the populace. The parliament finding they could not bring the Dutch to their terms, ſought all occaſions of breaking with that republic; and to this end, in the beginning of the year 1652, they paſſed an act, forbidding all commodities that were not of the growth and manufacture of the country from whence they came, to be brought to England in any other than Engliſh bottoms; which put an end to the commerce between England and Holland.

The ſtates of the United Provinces hereupon ſent ambaſſadors to requeſt the repeal of this act; but the Engliſh parliament were ſo far from anſwering their deſire, that they inſiſted on ſatisfaction for ſeveral old injuries done by the Dutch to the Engliſh, in particular the maſſacre of Amboyna, in the reign of James I. A war therefore neceſſarily enſued, in which were fought ſeveral of the moſt terrible and bloody ſea-fights that ever had been known, between the Dutch under the famous Van Tromp, and the Engliſh under the renowned Blake. It would be neither pleaſing nor inſtructive to the reader, were we to particularize the ſeveral circumſtances of thoſe ſcenes of bloodſhed and raging animoſity, which took up the chief part of the year 1652: let it ſuffice then to obſerve, that the Dutch were generally worſted, though the Engliſh alſo ſuffered great loſs.

The expences of this war made the parliament contrive all ways they could to huſband their finances; and becauſe they thought the entertainment of the duke of Gloceſter (whom, ſince the murder of the king, they had kept as a kind of ſtate priſoner at St. James's) too great an expence, they reſolved to ſend him abroad: and, about the beginning of February, 1653, they ſent him with two ſervants to Dunkirk, promiſing to allow him a ſmall penſion for his maintenance, if he would not go near his brother nor any of his relations: but as ſoon as he arrived on the other ſide of the water, he was received according to his birth and quality; and from Bruſſels he was attended to the princeſs of Orange, at Breda, from whence he was conducted to Paris, to the king his brother. His ſiſter, the princeſs Elizabeth, died a few days before he left England, in the Iſle of Wight, where ſhe had been confined ever ſince the murder of her father.

It is commonly obſerved, that it is much eaſier to obtain a conqueſt than ſecure it; and in nothing was this more viſible than in the preſent poſture of affairs in England, where the new commonwealth, now advanced to the very pinnacle of power and proſperity, began to ſink under its own weight, and, by inteſtine diviſions at home, to meet that ruin, which all the ſtrength and power of their enemies abroad, or their confederates, could not effect.

Some of the wiſeſt and moſt diſcerning of the houſe of commons had, for ſome time, began to dread Cromwell's great influence and power, and had concurred in carrying on the war by ſea, that they might have a pretence for increaſing the national expence, which might oblige the parliament to diſband the army, and thus by degrees overthrow the dangerous power of the general. Cromwell ſaw into theſe ſchemes, as they had penetrated into his, and, without heſitation, reſolved to prevent them; and as he never lingered in the execution of his projects, he forthwith proceeded to effectuate his purpoſe. His influence in the army being altogether unlimited, he knew he might ſafely depend on their aſſiſtance in whatever he ſhould attempt: he accordingly called a council of his officers, in which it was reſolved (and carried into execution) to preſent a petition to the houſe, demanding the payment of their arrears, and affirming that the public revenues, if rightly and honeſtly managed, would be ſufficient for the regular ſubſiſtence of the land army, as well as for all the other neceſſary expences of government. The parliament ordered the officers to be reprimanded for this inſolent addreſs, and forbid to intermeddle in the adminiſtration. Then the petitioners produced another remonſtrance, importing that the members had not performed their promiſe of diſſolving their aſſembly, that there might be a regular ſucceſſion of parliaments; they therefore deſired they would put an end to their adminiſtration, after having convoked another parliament, and named a council of ſtate to adminiſter affairs in the mean time. This propoſal was ſeconded by all the members who enjoyed employments in the army, as well as by the preſbyterians, who had been admitted into the houſe, in conſequence of having ſworn to the engagement; but the majority was of a different opinion: they reſolved, that it was not a proper time to diſſolve the parliament, while the nation had a war and a great many important affairs upon its hands; but that the vacant ſeats ſhould be filled up by new elections. At the ſame time they appointed a committee to prepare a bill for an act prohibiting all perſons to preſent ſuch petitions, on pain of being guilty of high treaſon.

Cromwell finding the parliament thus warm, knew he had no time to loſe, therefore on the twentieth of April (1653) while the commons were ſitting and debating on thoſe matters, and the diſbanding of the army, he went, attended by a detachment of choſen men, to the houſe, and, having ſet a guard about the doors and avenues, he entered, followed by a number of officers who were moſt at his devotion, and having taken his place, and liſtened for ſome time attentively to the debates; he whiſpered to Harriſon, that he now thought the parliament ripe for a diſſolution. Harriſon requeſted him to think ſeriouſly before he undertook ſo dangerous an action. "You ſay well," replied Cromwell, and ſat ſtill for about a quarter of an hour. When the debates were finiſhed, and the ſpeaker was going to put the queſtion, he ſuddenly roſe up, reviled the parliament in the moſt opprobrious terms for their tyranny, cruelty, and oppreſſion: then ſtamping with his foot, which was the ſignal for the ſoldiers to enter, he ordered the ſpeaker to leave the chair, telling the houſe to be gone, that they were no longer a parliament, that the Lord had done with them, and had made choice of other inſtruments. After this fanatic ſpeech, he reviled ſeveral of the members preſent by name, reproaching one as a drunkard, another as a whoremaſter, &c. then pointing to the mace, he bade one of his ſoldiers to take away "that fool's bauble," as he termed it. Major-general Harriſon then went up to the ſpeaker, who ſtill kept his chair, and pulled him out of it by violence: Cromwell then turning to the members, "it is you (ſaid he) that have forced me to this: I have prayed to the Lord night and day, that he would rather ſlay me than put me upon this work." Having ſaid this, he turned out all the members one by one, locked the doors of the houſe himſelf, and carried away the keys in his pocket.

Thus, by one bold effort of power, Cromwell in a few minutes effected a work, which would have coſt a common plodding politician his whole life to have brought about, and in the end he might have been the victim of his own intrigues. What is ſtill more ſtrange, is, that the parliament being thus diſſolved by force, and there being no acknowleged legiſlative authority, every thing did not fall into confuſion. Cromwell's genius had foreſeen and provided againſt ſuch a conſequence. At firſt he made ſome cunning eſſays to procure an invitation from the chief of the members of parliament to take upon himſelf the government. But in this he was unſucceſsful, and by his own authority he appointed a new council, compoſed of men whom he thought moſt likely to advance his deſign: "Oliver Cromwell, eſq. captain-general, lieutenant-general Fleetwood, major-general Lambert, lord-commiſſioner Liſle, major-general Harriſon, colonel Deſborough, colonel Hewſon, colonel Montagu, colonel Tomlinſon, colonel Jones, colonel Sydenham, colonel Lawrence, Anthony Stapely, eſq. ſir Charles Wolſey, John Carew, eſq. Walter Strickland, eſq. Mr. Hope, Mr. Norton, Mr. Bennet, Mr. Broughton, Mr. Holliſter, Richard Major, eſq. Mr. Courtney, Mr. St. Nicholas, Mr. Meyer, and Mr. Williams."

At Cromwell's inſtigation, this council nominated one hundred and forty-four perſons to repreſent the nation in parliament: theſe were chiefly taken from the loweſt claſs of people, ſuch as ſhopkeepers and journeymen handicrafts: one of the moſt active members of this ridiculous aſſembly was was a leatherſeller in Fleet-ſtreet, called Praiſe God Barebones*, whence this parliament was called, by way of deriſion, Barebones Parliament. Cromwell, by his own authority, ſent a written order to all theſe members, requiring them to come and take upon them the ſovereign power, and to govern the nation: this order, or writ, is too curious to with-hold it from the reader's peruſal. It ran in the following terms:

"Foraſmuch as, upon the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, it became neceſſary that the peace, ſafety, and good government of this commonwealth ſhould be provided for; in order whereunto divers perſons, fearing God, and of approved fidelity and honeſty, are by myſelf, with the advice of my council of officers, nominated, to whom the great charge and truſt of ſo weighty affairs is to be committed, and having good aſſurance of their love to and courage for God, and intereſt of his cauſe, and of the good people of the commonwealth:

"I, Oliver Cromwell, captain-general and commander in chief of all the armies and forces raiſed, and to be raiſed, within this commonwealth, do hereby ſummons and require you,— —— (being one of the ſaid perſons nominated) perſonally to appear at the council-chamber, commonly called by the name of the Council-chamber in Whitehall, within the city of Weſtminſter, on the fourth day of July next enſuing the date hereof, to take upon you the ſaid truſt, unto which you are hereby called, and appointed to ſerve as a member for the county of——; and hereof you are not to fail.

"Given under my hand and ſeal the ſixth day of June, 1653.

"Oliver Cromwell."

This aſſembly, after ſitting about five months, during which time it became the object of ridicule and contempt to the whole nation, came to a reſolution to diſſolve itſelf, and a motion was made and carried, on the ſecond of December, "that the ſitting of this parliament any longer, as now conſtituted, will not be for the good of the commonwealth, and that therefore it was requiſite to deliver up unto the lord-general, Oliver Cromwell, the power which they received from him. And that motion being ſeconded by ſeveral of their members, the houſe roſe; and the ſpeaker, with ſeveral of the members of the houſe, departed out of the houſe to Whitehall, where they, being the greater number of members ſitting in parliament, did, by a writing under their hands, reſign unto his excellency their ſaid powers; and Mr. Speaker, attended with the members, did preſent the ſame accordingly." By this means the politic Cromwell, who had all along managed matters in ſuch a manner as to bring on this iſſue, was again in poſſeſſion of the ſupreme power. Calling a council of his officers, he adviſed with them how the government ſhould be carried on; when his creature, Lambert, propoſed another ſcheme of government, which was to temper the liberty of a commonwealth by the authority of a ſingle perſon, who ſhould be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Protector. This was agreed to, and it was unanimouſly voted, that the captain-general, Oliver Cromwell, ſhould be choſen into that high office: at the ſame time a paper, called the Inſtrument of Government, was produced and read to them, which contained as it were the pacta conventa of the future conſtitution. This inſtrument conſiſted of forty-two articles, which would be too long for inſertion here; I ſhall therefore content myſelf with giving the heads of the principal articles, which were:

"I. A parliament to be called every three years.

"II. The firſt to aſſemble on the third of September, 1654.

"III. No parliament to be diſſolved till it hath ſat five months.

Cromwell was inſtalled into his high office on the ſixteenth of December, by the title of His Highneſs the Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with prodigious ſolemnity, in the court of Chancery, attended by the commiſſioners of the great-ſeal, the barons of the Exchequer, the judges in their robes, the council of ſtate, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, and all the officers and other perſons of diſtinction of his party in and about London.

The new protector now proceeded to nominate a council, in purſuance of the article for that purpoſe in the inſtrument of government already recited; theſe were, colonel Edward Montague (afterwards earl of Sandwich), colonel John Lambert, Philip lord viſcount Liſle, colonel John Deſborough (newly made alſo one of the generals

The firſt act of theſe counſellors, after their eſtabliſhment, was to iſſue the following proclamation, notifying the new form of government.

"Whereas the late parliament diſſolving themſelves, reſigned their powers and authorities, the government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in a lord protector and ſucceſſive triennial parliaments, now eſtabliſhed: and whereas Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this commonwealth, is declared lord-protector of the ſaid nations, and hath accepted thereof; we have therefore thought it neceſſary (as we hereby do) to make publication of the premiſes, and ſtrictly to charge and command all and every perſon or perſons, of what quality and condition ſoever in any of the ſaid three nations, to take notice hereof, and to conform and ſubmit themſelves to the government ſo eſtabliſhed. And all ſheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. are required to publiſh this proclamation, to the end none may have cauſe to pretend ignorance in this behalf."

Thus did a private gentleman, by an amazing conjunction of courage and hypocriſy, riſe to the kingly power, though under another name. Cromwell was near fifty-three years of age when he attained the ſovereign power, forty-two of which he had paſſed without having had any employ civil or military. He was hardly known in 1642, when the houſe of commons, of which he was a member, gave him a commiſſion of horſe in the army they levied againſt the king: from this beginning he roſe, by the ſteps we have ſeen, to be maſter of that houſe; and, after having humbled and ſubdued Charles I. and his ſon, he now ſtepped into the royal ſeat, and, without being king, reigned more abſolutely and fortunately than any king had ever done. As ſoon as he was inveſted with the protectorſhip, he ordered the army to be paid one month's advance; the magazines of all kinds were ſupplied; in the treaſury (of which he had the ſole management), there were three hundred thouſand pounds, and about half as much in that of Ireland. This year, the Dutch having ſuffered a ſevere defeat in a ſea-fight, in which admiral Van Tromp, the glory of their nation, was ſlain, and half their fleet deſtroyed, they ſued to the new protector for peace; and he dictated the conditions, which were, that they ſhould pay him three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling; that the ſhips of the States General ſhould pay the compliment to the Britiſh flag; and that they ſhould never reſtore the young prince of Orange to the office of ſtadtholder. This treaty was finally concluded and ſigned on the fifth of Auguſt, 1654. All the nations of Europe ſeemed to vie with each other in courting this riſing ſtar: the Spaniſh ambaſſador was as early as any to congratulate him on his new dignity; as did alſo the queen of Sweden; the conde or count de Saa, lord-chamberlain of the kingdom of Portugal, arrived in ſplendid embaſſy from that court, to ſue for his alliance; nor were the French behind-hand in owning his power, having given to monſieur Bourdeaux, their reſident here, the dignity of ambaſſador, to qualify him more highly for entering into a negociation with the lord-protector, and added to him the baron de Bas.

An accident, which happened about this time, made great noiſe all over Europe, and ſhewed the ſpirit with which Cromwell intended to govern: don Pantaleon de Saa, brother to the Portugueſe ambaſſador above-mentioned, being full of his own exploits as a ſoldier, and of his high quality, reſented an affront which he imagined had been offered him upon the New Exchange, by ordering his ſervants to his aſſiſtance, and, after wounding ſome Engliſh, he ſhot Mr. Greenaway dead, an Engliſh gentleman, who was innocent of the fact. The murder being committed, the Portugueſe thought to elude the ordinary officers of juſtice by retiring to, and barricading themſelves within the Portugueſe ambaſſador's houſe, which they threatened to defend againſt all attempts to take them; but the fact being notorious, colonel Whaley inveſted the houſe with a party of horſe. Upon this the ambaſſador ordered his domeſtics to their arms, and ſent to complain to Cromwell of a breach of the law of nations: Cromwell with great magnanimity anſwered, that juſtice muſt be done, and that blood muſt be ſatisfied with blood. All the other foreign ambaſſadors in and about London, took a very warm concern in the matter, not being able to conceive that a man of quality, an ambaſſador's brother, and a knight of Malta, as don Pantaleon was, ought to be queſtioned for the murder of a mechanic, for ſo they eſteemed an Engliſh gentleman to be; but all remonſtrances to Cromwell were ineffectual, and the ambaſſador's brother, to the admiration of the world, was tried, condemned, and publicly executed for the murder. Cromwell proceeded ſo coolly in this affair, that he concluded a treaty with the ambaſſador almoſt the very hour that his brother was carrying to execution. By this treaty his Portugueſe majeſty bound himſelf to pay a very large ſum of money by way of indemnification to England, and gave Cromwell all the ſatisfaction in other reſpects he required. Upon the ſame day (July 10, 1654,) and ſcaffold, were executed two gentlemen of the names of Gerard and Vowel, for being concerned in a conſpiracy for killing Cromwell, ſurprizing his guard, and altering the new-eſtabliſhed form of government.

Cromwell being now at peace with all the proteſtant powers of Europe, proceeded with great firmneſs in his government. His fleet and army were more powerful than ever; he never appeared abroad but with an attendance and ſplendor that equalled or exceeded the majeſty of kings; but ſtill the inſtrument of government, by which he reigned, had not been complied with, and a parliament muſt neceſſarily be called in terms of the ſaid inſtrument: the writs were acccordingly iſſued by the protector, and the parliament met on Sunday the third of September, when the protector went in great ſtate, and opened it with a ſpeech, in which he informed them of the ſteps he had taken for modelling the new government; aſſured them of his upright intentions; recapitulated what he had done for the nation; told them he had convoked a free parliament, and that he did not pretend to be their maſter, but their fellow-labourer. Notwithſtanding all the pains he had taken to procure a favourable parliament, he ſoon found himſelf ſelf diſappointed in his endeavours: they choſe Lenthall their ſpeaker, at his recommendation; but their firſt deliberations were employed in examining the nature of that authority by which they were convoked. Cromwell had too many friends in the houſe to believe this enquiry would be brought to any determination; nevertheleſs he would not tamely ſuffer his power to become the ſubject of diſpute, he therefore ſummoned them to the Painted Chamber, where he talked to them in a ſtyle quite different from that which he had uſed in his firſt harangue: he ſaid, they aſſumed too much liberty in queſtioning the eſtabliſhed government, from whence they derived all their authority; for if they were not lawfully aſſembled, they had no power to deliberate. At their return to the houſe they found a guard at the door, which would not ſuffer any member to enter till he had ſigned a recognition, by which he promiſed to be faithful to the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and that he would never conſent to a change in the government eſtabliſhed under a protector and a parliament. A good number, who refuſed to ſign the engagement, were excluded from the houſe, and many ſigned it with no other view than that of having opportunities to thwart Cromwell's meaſures. Several members engaged in a conſpiracy, formed chiefly by the cavaliers, to take arms in different parts of the kingdom: Cromwell having received intelligence of the ſcheme from his ſpies, anticipated the purpoſe of his enemies by diſſolving the parliament, eleven days before the expiration of the time fixed by the act of government; and he gave them to underſtand at parting, that he knew ſeveral members were engaged in a plot againſt his adminiſtration.

The meeting of a diſcontented parliament is always a ſure ſign of a diſcontented nation: the haſty and abrupt diſſolution of ſuch a parliament never fails to inflame the diſcontent to a higher degree of malignity. The members of this aſſembly returning to their ſeveral counties, carried along with them that ſpirit of diſaffection which they had diſcovered in the houſe.

The royaliſts ſeeing this general diſaffection towards the government, could no longer be held in ſubjection; they raſhly imagined that every one that was diſpleaſed, like them muſt have adopted the ſame views and intereſt. This falſe notion urged them on to practices which, in the end, ſubjected them and their friends to the ſevereſt vengeance.

The cavaliers (for by this name we are henceforth to diſtinguiſh the royal party) had deſigned two inſurrections, one in the North, and another in the Weſt. The former, which was to have been headed by Wilmot, earl of Rocheſter, was wholly laid aſide before it was well begun: but the year 1655 was opened by a riſing in the Weſt. Sir John Wagſtaff, colonel Penruddock, Grove, and Jones, entered Saliſbury, with about two hundred horſe, at the time of the Lent aſſizes, ſeized the judges and the ſheriff, and proclaimed the king. But finding the people not in a diſpoſition to join them, they marched farther weſtward, and being purſued by a troop of horſe that lay in the neighbourhood, under colonel Butler, they were defeated on the fifteenth of March, and moſt of them taken priſoners. Penruddock and Grove were executed at Exeter, and ſeveral were tried and hanged both there and at Saliſbury; but Wagſtaff luckily made his eſcape. The remainder of the inſurrection, which, if properly carried on, might have gone a good way towards reſtoring the royal authority, was cruſhed with ſtill greater eaſe to the government. Cromwell had ſo exact intelligence, that neither ſir Thomas Harris in Shropſhire, nor ſir Henry Slingſby in Yorkſhire, nor the earl of Rocheſter in the North, nor many thouſand noblemen and gentlemen who had engaged to riſe, gave the government any farther uneaſineſs than to be at the trouble of ſecuring their perſons, or chaſing them beyond ſea to their diſconſolate king, who remained all this while concealed at Terveer, with an intention to embark for England; but returned to Cologne as ſoon as he underſtood the confederacy was defeated.

Cromwell, enraged at theſe attempts of the royaliſts, determined to humble their mutinous ſpirit by ſome ſevere chaſtiſement. With this view he iſſued an edict for levying the tenths of all cavaliers, and to inflict other ſevere taxes upon thoſe concerned. The moſt obnoxious of the royal party, who eſcaped death, were tranſported to the Engliſh colonies in America. In order to levy the cruel and oppreſſive impoſition he had laid upon thoſe who remained at home, the tyrant appointed twelve major-generals, among whom he parcelled out the whole kingdom of England: theſe men, in conjuction with commiſſioners, were empowered to decimate whoever they pleaſed, to raiſe all taxes impoſed by the protector and his council, and to ſeize and impriſon any perſon who ſhould incur their jealouſy or ſuſpicion; nor was there any appeal from their deciſion, but to the protector himſelf and his council. Veſted with ſuch unlimited powers, theſe major-generals became ſo many tyrants, and ſo oppreſſed the people, that Cromwell thought it neceſſary firſt to reſtrain, and afterwards totally to aboliſh them; but not till they had anſwered his ends on the wretched royaliſts, not one of whom, fooliſh and forward as they generally were, durſt publicly avow his principles.

Cromwell having now reduced the kingdom, if not to a perfect obedience, at leaſt to a total ſubjection, had leiſure to look abroad and attend his concerns in foreign countries. He had for ſome time been equipping a very formidable fleet, the deſtination of which was known to no one, not even the commanders themſelves; only it was given out that they were going on an expedition that would bring great increaſe of honour to the nation, and of wealth to thoſe concerned in it. Before we proceed to unravel this ſecret, it will be neceſſary to give the reader a curſory view of the ſituation of the ſeveral powers of Europe, at that time connected with England.

The famous war of Germany, occaſioned by the Palatine's acceptance of the crown of Bohemia, and which had now raged with great violence for the ſpace of thirty years, was at laſt terminated by the treaty of Weſtphalia. In 1648, the young Palatine was reſtored to part of his dominions; and the rights and privileges of the ſeveral members of the Germanic body were thoroughly fixed and aſcertained.

Guſtavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, who had hitherto ſupported the proteſtant intereſt in Germany, was ſucceeded on the throne by his daughter

Chriſtina; and that princeſs, tired of the fatigues of royalty, had reſigned the crown to her kinſman Charles Guſtavus, who trod in the ſteps of the great Adolphus, and carried his arms to the ſouth ſide of the Baltic.

In France, cardinal Richelieu, deſirous of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, had artfully encouraged the troubles againſt Charles I. of England. His ſucceſſor Mazarine purſued the ſame plan of politics too far; for, inſtead of maintaining the balance between the king and parliament, he ſuffered Charles to be totally ſubdued, and a much more formidable power to be erected on his ruins. He ſacrificed the intereſts of Charles II. to his fear of diſobliging the new republic, by which he was ſo little regarded, that their fleet attached the French navy on their way to the relief of Dunkirk, which was beſieged by the Spaniards, and which by that means, fell into the hands of the enemy. The cardinal thought proper to digeſt this affront: and even ſent ambaſſadors to London to ſolicit the protector's friendſhip.

The court of Spain had obſerved the ſame conduct with regard to the troubles of England; and had diſcovered a ſtrong partiality in favour of the parliament. True it is, that, after the death of Charles I. they received lord Cottington and chancellor Hyde, as ambaſſadors from the young king; but they received them coldly, and diſappointed them in the purport of their embaſſy, which was to procure ſome ſupply of money for their indigent prince. Aſcham, ſent thither as the parliament's envoy, was murdered by ſome Iriſh officers at Madrid; and the court of Spain either could not or would not deliver up the author of this outrage; though one of them was actually ſeized *.

Whether the protector was provoked at this incident, or whether he was cajoled and encouraged by Mazarine, is not now to be determined; what we know for certain is, that he reſolved to adhere to the intereſts of France, and to declare war againſt the Spaniſh monarchy. The king of Spain (Philip VI.) had by this time gotten intelligence that the great naval preparations making in England were deſigned to make an attempt upon his dominions in the Weſt Indies; and therefore, after having diſpatched expreſſes into thoſe parts, to put them upon their guard, he ſent the marquis de Leda in a ſpendid embaſſy to the protector, to divert or prevent the proſecution of his hoſtile deſigns. The marquis arrived at London on the twenty-ſecond of May, 1655, but had ſo cold a reception, and was ſo much diſcouraged in his negociation, that he quickly returned home.

In the mean while a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips, having on board Venables, with five thouſand ſoldiers, ſet ſail for the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, under the command of admiral Penn, to whom Cromwell delivered his orders ſealed up, that he ſhould not know their purport till he had reached a certain latitude: by theſe he was directed to make a deſcent upon the iſland of Hiſpaniola, and attack the capital, St. Domingo. They arrived there in ſafety and good health; but, by ſome miſconduct in landing the troops, the deſign miſcarried, and they were repulſed to their ſhips with great loſs. In order to make ſome amends for this miſcarriage, the fleet ſailed to Jamaica, which they conquered almoſt without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of it in the name of the Engliſh republic, on the ſecond of June, 1655. Having left ſome troops on this iſland, they returned to England about the beginning of September; and the protector was ſo exaſperated at their having failed in their attempt upon Hiſpaniola, that he ordered Penn and Venables to be ſent to the Tower; from whence, however, they were not long after releaſed. In the mean time care was taken to reinforce the garriſon of Jamaica, and that colony ſoon after became what it ſtill continues, a flouriſhing and wealthy colony.

The king of Spain was no ſooner informed of theſe hoſtilities, than he iſſued orders for confiſcating all the effects belonging to the Engliſh in his dominions, and the Spaniſh trade thereby fell into the hands of the Dutch, who were thereby ſoon indemnified for the loſſes they had ſuſtained in the war with England. On the twenty-third of October, this year, Oliver publiſhed a treaty of peace which he had concluded with France: one principal condition of this treaty was the excluſion of Charles II. and all his relations and adherents, out of the king of France's dominions. Cardinal Mazarine governed in France, during his ſovereign's minority, as abſolutely as Cromwell now did in England: and having entered into a cloſe connexion with the uſurper, he was determined to deny him nothing. Charles II. had actually ſolicited one of the cardinal's neices in marriage; but the bad condition of the royal fugitive's affairs, which obliged him to take ſo humiliating a ſtep, was the only cauſe of his meeting with a refuſal; and the cardinal is ſaid to have formed the deſign of marrying the very niece he had refuſed to the king of England, to one of Cromwell's ſons. Henrietta of France, the mournful relict of Charles I. and mother to his exiled children, ſaw herſelf reduced to beg of the cardinal to intercede with Cromwell that ſhe might at leaſt receive her jointure. It was certainly the moſt extreme and grievous of all humiliations, to be obliged to ſue for ſubſiſtence to the man who had ſpilt her huſband's blood on a ſcaffold. Mazarine, after ſome few remonſtrances in the queen's favour to the protector, acquainted her that he had not been able to obtain any thing: ſhe therefore continued in very low circumſtances at Paris, with the ſhame and mortification of having implored Cromwell's pity. As to the young king, he having foreſeen what the connexion between France and England would end in, had ſome time before retired into Germany, and lived at Cologne, with the duke of Gloceſter, his younger brother: the duke of York, in conſequence of the above-mentioned treaty, now left the French court, and entered into the army commanded by the prince of Condé and don John of Auſtria, to learn the art of war againſt France, which had thus infamouſly abandoned his family.

Cromwell, immediately after his elevation to the protectorſhip, had ſent the gallant admiral Blake, with a fleet, into the Mediterranean, to chaſtize the corſairs of Barbary, who had committed depredations on the Engliſh traiders: upon this command he exerted himſelf in ſo vigorous and effectual a manner, that thoſe piratical ſtates were obliged to implore the mercy of the Engliſh republic, and to ſubmit to every condition which her admiral was pleaſed to impoſe, the fame of whoſe valour was now diffuſed all over Europe.

Upon the diſmiſſion of Penn from the navy, colonel Montagu (afterwards the famous earl of Sandwich), one of the commiſſioners of Cromwell's treaſury, was appointed to ſucceed him; and, early in the year 1656, was ſent out with a ſtrong ſquadron to reinforce Blake, and to carry him orders for acting vigorouſly againſt the Spaniards. Having joined Blake in the Mediterranean, the two admirals anchored with their fleet, on the twentieth of April, before Cadiz, and it was deliberated in a council of war to attack that port; but it was judged impracticable, for want of a ſufficient body of land forces: the admirals therefore divided their fleet into two ſquadrons; one under captain Stayner, was left to cruize before Cadiz, with a view to intercept the Spaniſh plate fleet on its return home; the other, under the two admirals, ſtood for the coaſt of Portugal, to revictual and refit their ſhips. On the ſeventeenth of September, captain Stayner diſcried the Spaniſh homeward-bound Weſt India fleet, conſiſting of eight large ſhips. Though Stayner had with him but ſeven frigates, yet he immediately attacked the Spaniards; and, though he could bring but three of his ſhips to act, he took two of the Spaniſh ſhips, ſunk and burnt three, and three eſcaped, according to the account ſent by the admirals to the government of England. In the admiral's ſhip, which they took, they found an immenſe quantity of ſilver; and proper care being taken to prevent embezzlements, Montagu returned with the booty and part of the fleet to England, carrying with him the ſon of the marquis de Badajox priſoner, his father, a Spaniſh Weſt India governor, his mother and ſiſter, being burnt to death in the engagement: but himſelf was nobly treated and ſympathized with by Montagu.

While the Engliſh nation was thus acquiring glory abroad, at home Cromwell continued to rule with deſpotic ſway: he had deprived Harriſon, Overton, Rich, Okey, and others, of their commiſſions, becauſe they had great influence in the army, and ſtrenuouſly oppoſed him from the time of his aſſuming the office of protector: on the other hand, conſcious of his own unpopularity, he endeavoured to engage the affections of the people by an impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. The benches were filled with judges of incorruptible integrity, who gave their deciſions without reſpect of perſons; and he laid aſide his major-generals, who had now incurred the hatred and reſentment of the whole nation. And now thinking that he had eſtabliſhed his authority on a firm foundation, and that, in order to make it as laſting as it was extenſive, it wanted nothing but the conſent of a national aſſembly; he therefore convoked a parliament: but as he had no great confidence in the good-will of the people, he employed every art to influence the electors, and to fill the houſe with his own creatures. By thoſe and many other arts and contrivances the protector ſecured an undiſputed majority, and fully imagined he ſhould now be able to accompliſh all his ambitious projects.

Among the firſt acts paſſed by this obſequious parliament, which ſat down on the ſeventeenth of September this year, was one "for renouncing and diſannulling the title of Charles Stuart unto the ſovereign dominions of the nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland." This was the firſt act of that nature which had the leaſt appearance of a parliamentary ſanction. An act was alſo paſſed "for the ſecuring his highneſs the lord protector's perſon, and the continuance of the nation in ſecurity and peace." This act was occaſioned by the diſcovery of a plot ſome time before, that had been entered into by the Fifth Monarchy men, or Anabaptiſts as ſome call them, among whom was major-general Harriſon, to depoſe Cromwell; but it was timely diſcovered by the vigilance of the protector's ſpies; as was alſo another conſpiracy formed this year againſt his life by one Miles Sandercome, a leveller. In a word the members of this parliament proceeded in every thing juſt as Cromwell would have them: they approved of the war with Spain, and granted large ſums of money for carrying it on; and, after they had ſat ſome months, a formal motion was made by alderman Pack, one of the city members, for advancing Cromwell to the royal dignity: this propoſal occaſioned great diſorders, and threw the whole houſe into parties. The chief oppoſition proceeded from the major-generals, and ſuch officers as were attached to their intereſt. Lambert, Deſborough, and the other officers, made no ſcruple openly to declare, that if Cromwell accepted the crown, they would inſtantly reſign their commiſſions, and would no longer have it in their power to ſerve him: but, notwithſtanding all their oppoſition, the motion was approved by a great majority in the houſe; and a bill was brought in and paſſed, on the fourth of April following, for that purpoſe.

Cromwell was undoubtedly deſirous of obtaining the crown; and it was more than probable that the motion for offering him the title of King, was made with his own knowlege, and carried through by the intereſt of his dependents in the houſe; but he was extremely diſconcerted by the oppoſition of Lambert and the other officers. He dreaded a mutiny in the army, and indeed a general inſurrection throughout the whole kingdom; he therefore declined accepting the regal title, when it was firſt offered him by a committee of the houſe, and deſired ſome time to conſider of it. Hereupon another committee was appointed to reaſon with the protector, and overcome any ſcruples that might prevent him from accepting this offer. The conference laſted for ſome weeks, all which was apparently done to gain time, in order to bring the army to approve of the deſign; which Oliver finding he could not do, he, with great ſhew of humility, on the eighth of May, told the parliament, that he could not undertake the government with the title of King. This plainly implying, that he was willing to hold the reins of government with any other title, the houſe formally confirmed him in his dignity of Protector, and aſcertained his authority by a ſolemn act, entitled, "the Humble Petition and Advice*." Cromwell having obtained this ſanction of his authority, reſolved to conſecrate his title by a new auguration, which was performed on the twenty-

* By this deed, which conſiſted of forty-two articles, the authority of the protector was in ſome things augmented, in others it was conſiderably diminiſhed. He was empowered to name his ſucceſſor; he had a perpetual revenue ſettled on him of Chriſtina; and that princeſs, tired of the fatigues of royalty, had reſigned the crown to her kinſman Charles Guſtavus, who trod in the ſteps of the great Adolphus, and carried his arms to the ſouth ſide of the Baltic.

On the twenty-third of October, this year, Oliver publiſhed a treaty of peace which he had concluded with France: one principal condition of this treaty was the excluſion of Charles II. and all his relations and adherents, out of the king of France's dominions. Cardinal Mazarine governed in France, during his ſovereign's minority, as abſolutely as Cromwell now did in England: and having entered into a cloſe connexion with the uſurper, he was determined to deny him nothing. Charles II. had actually ſolicited one of the cardinal's neices in marriage; but the bad condition of the royal fugitive's affairs, which obliged him to take ſo humiliating a ſtep, was the only cauſe of his meeting with a refuſal; and the cardinal is ſaid to have formed the deſign of marrying the very niece he had refuſed to the king of England, to one of Cromwell's ſons. Henrietta of France, the mournful relict of Charles I. and mother to his exiled children, ſaw herſelf reduced to beg of the cardinal to intercede with Cromwell that ſhe might at leaſt receive her jointure. It was certainly the moſt extreme and grievous of all humiliations, to be obliged to ſue for ſubſiſtence to the man who had ſpilt her huſband's blood on a ſcaffold. Mazarine, after ſome few remonſtrances in the queen's favour to the protector, acquainted her that he had not been able to obtain any thing: ſhe therefore continued in very low circumſtances at Paris, with the ſhame and mortification of having implored Cromwell's pity. As to the young king, he having foreſeen what the connexion between France and England would end in, had ſome time before retired into Germany, and lived at Cologne, with the duke of Gloceſter, his younger brother: the duke of York, in conſequence of the above-mentioned treaty, now left the French court, and entered into the army commanded by the prince of Condé and don John of Auſtria, to learn the art of war againſt France, which had thus infamouſly abandoned his family.

Cromwell, immediately after his elevation to the protectorſhip, had ſent the gallant admiral Blake, with a fleet, into the Mediterranean, to chaſtize the corſairs of Barbary, who had committed depredations on the Engliſh traiders: upon this command he exerted himſelf in ſo vigorous and effectual a manner, that thoſe piratical ſtates were obliged to implore the mercy of the Engliſh republic, and to ſubmit to every condition which her admiral was pleaſed to impoſe, the fame of whoſe valour was now diffuſed all over Europe.

Upon the diſmiſſion of Penn from the navy, colonel Montagu (afterwards the famous earl of Sandwich), one of the commiſſioners of Cromwell's treaſury, was appointed to ſucceed him; and, early in the year 1656, was ſent out with a ſtrong ſquadron to reinforce Blake, and to carry him orders for acting vigorouſly againſt the Spaniards. Having joined Blake in the Mediterranean, the two admirals anchored with their fleet, on the twentieth of April, before Cadiz, and it was deliberated in a council of war to attack that port; but it was judged impracticable, for want of a ſufficient body of land forces: the admirals therefore divided their fleet into two ſquadrons; one under captain Stayner, was left to cruize before Cadiz, with a view to intercept the Spaniſh plate fleet on its return home; the other, under the two admirals, ſtood for the coaſt of Portugal, to revictual and refit their ſhips. On the ſeventeenth of September, captain Stayner diſcried the Spaniſh homeward-bound Weſt India fleet, conſiſting of eight large ſhips. Though Stayner had with him but ſeven frigates, yet he immediately attacked the Spaniards; and, though he could bring but three of his ſhips to act, he took two of the Spaniſh ſhips, ſunk and burnt three, and three eſcaped, according to the account ſent by the admirals to the government of England. In the admiral's ſhip, which they took, they found an immenſe quantity of ſilver; and proper care being taken to prevent embezzlements, Montagu returned with the booty and part of the fleet to England, carrying with him the ſon of the marquis de Badajox priſoner, his father, a Spaniſh Weſt India governor, his mother and ſiſter, being burnt to death in the engagement: but himſelf was nobly treated and ſympathized with by Montagu.

While the Engliſh nation was thus acquiring glory abroad, at home Cromwell continued to rule with deſpotic ſway: he had deprived Harriſon, Overton, Rich, Okey, and others, of their commiſſions, becauſe they had great influence in the army, and ſtrenuouſly oppoſed him from the time of his aſſuming the office of protector: on the other hand, conſcious of his own unpopularity, he endeavoured to engage the affections of the people by an impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. The benches were filled with judges of incorruptible integrity, who gave their deciſions without reſpect of perſons; and he laid aſide his major-generals, who had now incurred the hatred and reſentment of the whole nation. And now thinking that he had eſtabliſhed his authority on a firm foundation, and that, in order to make it as laſting as it was extenſive, it wanted nothing but the conſent of a national aſſembly; he therefore convoked a parliament: but as he had no great confidence in the good-will of the people, he employed every art to influence the electors, and to fill the houſe with his own creatures. By thoſe and many other arts and contrivances the protector ſecured an undiſputed majority, and fully imagined he ſhould now be able to accompliſh all his ambitious projects.

Among the firſt acts paſſed by this obſequious parliament, which ſat down on the ſeventeenth of September this year, was one "for renouncing and diſannulling the title of Charles Stuart unto the ſovereign dominions of the nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland." This was the firſt act of that nature wnich had the leaſt appearance of a parliamentary ſanction. An act was alſo paſſed "for the ſecuring his highneſs the lord protector's perſon, and the continuance of the nation in ſecurity and peace." This act was occaſioned by the diſcovery of a plot ſome time before, that had been entered into by the Fifth Monarchy men, or Anabaptiſts as ſome call them, among whom was major-general Harriſon, to depoſe Cromwell; but it was timely diſcovered by the vigilance of the protector's ſpies; as was alſo another conſpiracy formed this year againſt his life by one Miles Sandercome, a leveller. In a word the members of this parliament proceeded in every thing juſt as Cromwell would have them: they approved of the war with Spain, and granted large ſums of money for carrying it on; and, after they had ſat ſome months, a formal motion was made by alderman Pack, one of the city members, for advancing Cromwell to the royal dignity: this propoſal occaſioned great diſorders, and threw the whole houſe into parties. The chief oppoſition proceeded from the major-generals, and ſuch officers as were attached to their intereſt. Lambert, Deſborough, and the other officers, made no ſcruple openly to declare, that if Cromwell accepted the crown, they would inſtantly reſign their commiſſions, and would no longer have it in their power to ſerve him: but, notwithſtanding all their oppoſition, the motion was approved by a great majority in the houſe; and a bill was brought in and paſſed, on the fourth of April following, for that purpoſe.

Cromwell was undoubtedly deſirous of obtaining the crown; and it was more than probable that the motion for offering him the title of King, was made with his own knowlege, and carried through by the intereſt of his dependents in the houſe; but he was extremely diſconcerted by the oppoſition of Lambert and the other officers. He dreaded a mutiny in the army, and indeed a general inſurrection throughout the whole kingdom; he therefore declined accepting the regal title, when it was firſt offered him by a committee of the houſe, and deſired ſome time to conſider of it. Hereupon another committee was appointed to reaſon with the protector, and overcome any ſcruples that might prevent him from accepting this offer. The conference laſted for ſome weeks, all which was apparently done to gain time, in order to bring the army to approve of the deſign; which Oliver finding he could not do, he, with great ſhew of humility, on the eighth of May, told the parliament, that he could not undertake the government with the title of King. This plainly implying, that he was willing to hold the reins of government with any other title, the houſe formally confirmed him in his dignity of Protector, and aſcertained his authority by a ſolemn act, entitled, "the Humble Petition and Advice *." Cromwell having obtained this ſanction of his authority, reſolved to conſecrate his title by a new auguration, which was performed on the twenty-twenty-ſixth of June, 1657, in Weſtminſter-hall, with the like pomp and magnificence as at a coronation. Then the parliament adjourned itſelf to the twentieth of January. After the adjournment the protector ſtripped Lambert of all his commiſſions, which he beſtowed on his own ſon-in-law, Fleetwood; but he ſtill indulged Lambert with a penſion of two thouſand pounds a year, as a bribe for his quiet and peaceable behaviour. Being thus confirmed protector by the authority of his parliament, and having fortified himſelf by alliances abroad, he began to make it his next care, for the better eſtabliſhing his intereſt at home, to advance his neareſt friends and relations, and to match his children into the nobleſt families: his eldeſt ſon Richard Cromwell, he called out of the country, where he led a private life, to bring him acquainted with a court, and to initiate him into the knowlege of public affairs. Soon after his arrival he prevailed on the univerſity of Oxford to elect him their chancellor, in which honour he was ſolemnly inſtalled at Whitehall. His ſecond ſon Henry Cromwell, he made lord lieutenant of Ireland: his two younger daughters, Mary and Frances, he matched to the lord Falconbridge, and Mr. Robert Rich, grand-ſon to the then earl of Warwick; the nuptials of both being kept with great pomp and ſplendor, at Whitehall and Hampton-court.

According to the conditions of the late treaty between England and France, by which each power was to aſſiſt the other, if attacked by an enemy, the French court ſent this year to demand auxiliary forces from England, to aſſiſt it in its war with the Spaniards in Flanders; which requeſt was readily granted by the protector, and ſix thouſand foot forthwith ordered to be ſent over under the command of ſir John Reynolds, an officer remarkable for his courage and other military accompliſhments, who had been ſome time commiſſary-general of Ireland, under Ireton. The arrival of theſe forces enabled the French to make themſelves maſters of two very important places in the Spaniſh Netherlands, Montmedi and St. Venant: and ſoon after of the ſtrong fort of Mardyke, which afforded them an eaſy paſſage to the conqueſt of Dunkirk, which followed not long after. The fort was by the French delivered into the hands of major-general Morgan and the Engliſh, who fortified it in ſuch a manner, that the Spaniards, ſenſible how much it imported to the preſervation of Dunkirk to recover this fort, made an attempt, with a very numerous body of forces, to take it by ſtorm, but were beaten off with great loſs.

King Charles having reſided at Cologne ever ſince he left France, now entered into a treaty with the court of Spain, by which he was allowed to reſide privately at Bruſſels, with a penſion of ſix thouſand livres a month, and half as much for his brother, the duke of Gloceſter, who, after his father's death, had been ſent to Holland by order of the parliament; beſides, the court of Spain engaged to furniſh Charles with ſix thouſand men as ſoon as he ſhould be poſſeſſed of a good port in England. This treaty being ratified, the king quitted Cologne, and repaired to the Low Countries, at the ſame time that Leopold reſigned that government to don John of Auſtria, natural ſon to Philip IV. Lord Muſkerry, who commanded an Iriſh regiment in France, abandoned that ſervice at his majeſty's deſire, and joined the Spaniſh army; and four other regiments, conſiſting of Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh, followed their example. About this time there was a plot laid for an inſurrection in England, in favour of the king, and the marquis of Ormond came over to London to favour the deſign; but Cromwell, having notice of it by his ſpies, publiſhed a proclamation for apprehending the conſpirators before they could form a body: the marquis narrowly eſcaped, but Dr. Hewit, ſir Henry Slingſby, Mr. Mordaunt, and ſeveral others were ſeized; and the two former being tried by an high court of juſtice, were condemned and executed.

During the whole of this year the Spaniards were greatly diſtreſſed by the remarkable good fortune of the Engliſh arms, eſpecially at ſea: for in the ſpring of this year, the gallant Blake, who had been for a long time cruizing in the Mediterranean, to intercept the Spaniſh plate-fleet, having received advice that it had got ſafe into the bay of Santa Cruz, in the iſland of Teneriffe, he ſailed thither with his fleet, reſolved to give a good account of them. On the twentieth of April he had an opportunity of obſerving the ſituation of the enemy, whom he found diſpoſed in a very formidable poſture: the bay was defended by a ſtrong caſtle, well furniſhed with cannon, beſides ſeven forts in ſeveral parts of it, all united by a line of communication, and ſupplied with a good number of muſqueteers. Don Diego Diagues, the Spaniſh admiral, had moored his ſmaller veſſels cloſe to the ſhore, and the larger galleons farther off, with their broadſides to the ſea. Blake was rather animated than diſcouraged by this warlike appearance. Favoured by a briſk gale, which blew full into the bay, he inſtantly ruſhed in among the thickeſt of the enemy. After an obſtinate ſtruggle of four hours, the Spaniards yielded to the Engliſh valour, and quitted their ſhips, which were ſet on fire, and conſumed with all their treaſure. The greateſt danger ſtill remained to the Engliſh. They were expoſed to the fire of the caſtle and forts, which muſt, in a ſhort time, have done them conſiderable damage: but the wind ſhifting, ſo as to blow from the ſhore, enabled them to weather the bay; where they left the Spaniards equally confounded at their own loſs, and the happy temerity of their undaunted victors.

This was the laſt and greateſt action of the illuſtrious Blake, for he died on ſhip-board on his return home: the protector, to ſhew his eſteem for his memory, gave him a pompous interment in Henry VII's chapel, at Weſtminſter.

We cannot cloſe the hiſtory of this year without taking notice of the memorable trial of one James Naylor, the great champion and ringleader of one hundred thouſand pounds a year, a million a year for the fleet and army, and three hundred thouſand pounds for the civil government; beſides what ſums ſhould be occaſionally raiſed by the parliament: and he was allowed to appoint another houſe, the members of which ſhould enjoy their ſeats during life, and exerciſe ſome functions of the former houſe of peers. But he relinquiſhed the authority, which he had formerly claimed, of enacting laws with the conſent of the council; and he engaged, that no member of either houſe ſhould be excluded without the conſent of that houſe, to which they belonged. In other reſpects the Humble Petition was the ſame with the Inſtrument of Government.

of the ſect called Quakers*, who, having ſpread his doctrine, and gained many proſelytes to it, in divers parts of the nation, was more eſpecially taken notice of at Briſtol, and was from thence brought up to London, attended by ſeveral men and women of his opinion, who all the way they came (the women eſpecially) are ſaid to have ſung hoſannahs to him, and to have uſed the ſame expreſſions towards him as anciently the people of the Jews did to our Saviour, when he rode triumphant into Jeruſalem. The parliament took it upon them to judge him themſelves, before whom being convened, he was accuſed of blaſphemy, for aſſuming to himſelf divine honours, and ſuch attributes as were due to Chriſt only; and tho' he uſed many cunning ſophiſms and evaſions to clear himſelf, ſuch as argued him not altogether ignorant of human letters, he was nevertheleſs ſentenced by the houſe to be firſt publicly whipped, pilloried, and ſtigmatized as a blaſphemer; then to be reconveyed to Briſtol, there to be alſo whipped; laſtly, to be brought back to London, to remain in Bridewell during pleaſure; which ſentence was punctually inflicted on him.

The parliament met again according to the adjournment on the twentieth of January, 1658. This ſeſſion, which differed from the other as much as one diſtinct parliament could poſſibly have done from another, gave more diſturbance to Cromwell's ambition and ſafety, than he, with all his policy and foreſight, was aware of.

In the firſt place, the admiſſion of thoſe members who had been excluded the houſe of commons the laſt ſeſſion, and who now returned to their ſeats in conſequence of the following article in the Humble Petition, "that the perſons who are legally choſen, by a free election of the people, to ſerve in parliament, may not be excluded from doing their duties, but by the conſent of the houſe whereof they are members." Cromwell would gladly have eluded this article if he could; but there was no poſſibility for him to do it without coming to extremities with the nation. The next thing which proved prejudicial to his high towering views of arbitrary power, was the erecting of a new aſſembly, intended, in imitation of the monarchical conſtitution, to anſwer to the houſe of peers; but it was not thought proper to give it that name, but to diſtinguiſh it only by the title of the Other Houſe: it conſiſted partly of ſuch whom the protector principally relied upon, in the army and other departments, many of whom were picked out of the houſe of commons, to be called (by his writ of ſummons) to the Other Houſe; partly of the late excluded commonwealthmen, and ſuch alſo of the army whom he thought hereby to win over to his party; and about half a ſcore of the old nobility were nominated, but refuſed to attend. Now in this contrivance, whatever his expectations might be, Cromwell found himſelf wretchedly diſappointed, ſince by the coming in of great numbers of the lately excluded members, and the tranſlation of ſeveral of his warmeſt friends among the commons into the Other Houſe, his intereſt was greatly weakened; and ſir Arthur Haſelrig, and the reſt of the ſtaunch republicans, diſdaining to accept of Cromwell's offered baronage, took their places among the commons, in order by their preſence to ſtrengthen their own party, by which means the republican faction grew ſo powerful, that an undiſputed majority appeared againſt the protector, and the commons refuſed to acknowlege the authority of his Other Houſe, which had been ſummoned: even the legality of the Humble Petition and Advice was queſtioned, as being enacted by a parliament which was deprived of its liberty by a great number of its members having been excluded by military force, for not agreeing to take the oath of recognition.

Cromwell, apprehenſive of ſome ſecret combination between the parliament and the malecontents of the army, determined once more to try a ſtrain of authority, and therefore acquainted the commons, that he expected they ſhould pay the ſame regard to the Other Houſe, and give it the ſame appellation as had been given to any former houſe of peers in England. But the commons, inſtigated by Lambert and Haſelrig within doors, and Harriſon and the fifth-monarchy-men without, paid no regard to his threats or his authority, but again reſumed their ſtrictures upon the late Humble Petition and Advice. Hereupon Cromwell determined to allow them no leiſure for carrying their ſchemes into execution, and therefore, without conſulting any one, on the fourth of February flung himſelf into a mean coach, and going to the houſe ſent for the commons into the Painted Chamber, where, after reproaching them with their factious ſpirit, and charging them with being privy to conſpiracies againſt his authority, and in favour of "the king of Scots (as he affected to call Charles); ſince ſuch (ſaid he) is your purpoſe, and ſuch are your proceedings, I think it high time to put an end to your ſitting: I therefore declare this parliament diſſolved: and God be judge between me and you." "Amen," replied the members, with no leſs vehemence than the protector. Thus was Cromwell driven from one inconvenience to another; from the inconvenience of a parliament that croſſed him, to the inconvenience of no parliament at all, whereby he found himſelf equally ſtraitened for want of thoſe ſupplies of money which he expected. Soon after the diſſolution of the parliament, he caſhiered ſeveral officers of the army whom he thought not ſufficiently devoted to his purpoſe. Reynolds, the protector's

* Among the various ſects produced in the laſt twelve years of civil diſcord and anarchy, one of the moſt remarkable was that of the quakers, which was founded by George Fox, ſon of a weaver, at Drayton, in Lancaſhire. This enthuſiaſt was bound apprentice to a ſhoe-maker; but having a turn to ſpiritual contemplations, he quitted his mechanical profeſſion, and ſtrolled about the country in a leathern doublet, that he might not be interrupted in his ſublime meditations. He wandered in woods, lodged in hollow trees, and read the Bible without ceaſing: at length he believed himſelf inſpired, and began to diſregard the ſcripture as a dead letter. He now aſſumed the character of an apoſtle, returned to the world, and exerted his talents in making proſelytes. The fanatics of theſe times aſſiſted his endeavours with extraordinary ſucceſs. He and his diſciples were ſeized with ſuch violent tranſports of enthuſiaſm as threw them into contortions and univerſal trepidation, from whence they acquired the name of Quakers. Their peculiarities in manners and doctrine are too well known to need any deſcription. They were ſeverely perſecuted, confined in priſons and madhouſes, reviled, ſcourged, and ſet in the pillory; but they ſuffered with ſuch patience and equanimity, as excited the admiration of mankind. They renounced all rites and ceremonies of religion, and pretended to be directed by the illumination of the Spirit. One of this ſect periſhed by attempting to faſt forty days as Chriſt faſted in the wilderneſs. A female quaker appeared naked in the church before Cromwell, the protector, ſaying ſhe was moved by the Spirit to appear as a ſign to the people. A good number believing that the renovation of all things had commenced, threw away their cloaths as ſuperfluities.

ambaſſador and general in France, being unfortunately drowned in the ſpring of this year, in his paſſage to England, was ſucceeded in command by Lockhart, a native of Scotland, who reſided as ambaſſador at Paris*.

The king about this time received a petition ſigned by ſeveral independents, quakers, and anabaptiſts, profeſſing their deteſtation of Cromwell, and offering to riſque their lives and fortunes in his majeſty's ſervice, provided he would aſſent to ſome propoſitions joined to the addreſs. In theſe they demanded that he ſhould reſtore the long parliament, confirm the conceſſions which his father had made in the treaty of Newport, and allow every man to worſhip God in his own way. Charles, who did not reliſh their demands, and had no great opinion of their intereſt, returned a general anſwer, importing he was not of a humour to perſecute any perſon on account of his religion; and that thoſe who were diſpoſed to ſerve him effectually, might always depend upon his favour.

On the third of June, this year, marſhal Turenne, who commanded the French army, undertook the ſiege of Dunkirk, which was but indifferently provided for defence. Don John of Auſtria, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, drew together all his troops, and amongſt the reſt the Britiſh and Iriſh under the duke of York, to relieve it. The Engliſh under Lockhart were full ſix thouſand at the ſiege, and lay with a brigade of French horſe on the Mardyke ſide, as marſhal Turenne did on the Nieuport ſide, a communication being kept up between the two bodies. After the ſiege had continued about twelve days, intelligence came that don John and the Spaniſh generals were at hand to relieve it: upon which it was reſolved to fight the enemy, and to unite both armies upon the Nieuport ſide. In the mean while the marquis de Leyda, who commanded in the place, made two deſperate ſallies, one upon the French and another upon the Engliſh quarter, but was repulſed in both; and Turenne acknowleged that the Engliſh performed wonders on this occaſion. The junction of the two armies being formed, though Lockhart was very ill of the ſtone, yet he appeared at the head of the Engliſh, who, with the French horſe, formed the left of the army. The Spaniards likewiſe were in two bodies; their left wing was commanded by the prince of Condé, and their right by don John, the duke of York, and the marquis of Caracene: each army conſiſted of about eighteen thouſand, but the diſpute lay between the Engliſh under Lockhart, and the old Spaniſh infantry under don John. Lockhart drew up the men, and formed the attack with the Engliſh upon the flank of the Spaniards, whom he defeated after a very deſperate engagement, in which only two officers of his own regiment eſcaped being killed or wounded: it is certain that the glory of the day was chiefly owing to the Engliſh, who, not content with routing the right wing of the Spaniards, fell upon their left wing, which had put Turenne into ſome diſorder. About two thouſand of the Spaniards were killed and taken priſoners, with the loſs of about two hundred of the Engliſh under Lockhart, beſides great numbers who were wounded. The dukes of York and Gloceſter were preſent in this battle, and ſhewed great perſonal courage, but the Engliſh in the Spaniſh army were far from behaving ſo well as thoſe in the French. The defeat of the Spaniards put an end to their hopes of ſaving Dunkirk. The marquis de Leyda, finding his condition deſperate, made a ſally with all the forces he could collect, but was repulſed with loſs, and received a wound, of which he died in a few days after. On the twenty-fifth of June Dunkirk ſurrendered, and immediately, according to treaty, was given up to Lockhart, who took poſſeſſion of it in the name of the lord-protector of England. Cromwell placed a ſtrong garriſon in this important fortreſs, and made Lockhart governor of it.

While the diſpoſitions were making for the ſiege of Dunkirk, the French monarch, Lewis XIV. endeavoured to cultivate the friendſhip of the protector by every mark of eſteem and regard. Lord Falconbridge, Cromwell's ſon-in-law, was ſent over to Lewis, then in the camp before Dunkirk; and was received with the ſame reſpect which is uſually ſhown by the French court to foreign princes.

Mazarine diſpatched to London his nephew Mancini, along with the duke of Crequi; and expreſſed his ſorrow, that, on account of the multiplicity of public affairs, he could not enjoy the pleaſure which he had ſo long deſired, of paying his compliments, in perſon, to the greateſt man in the world. It appears, however, from good authority, that theſe were not the real ſentiments of the cardinal, who uſed to ſay of Cromwell, that he was no better than a fortunate madman†.

But all the homage paid to his perſon and authority, and all the ſucceſſes which attended his army, were not able to preſerve him from the poignant cares which now preyed upon his mind. Oppreſſed with the burden of public affairs, perpetually apprehending ſome fatal accident in his precarious government, and under continual dread of being aſſaſſinated by the hands of fanatical or intereſted perſons, he felt ſuch a perturbation of ſpirit as left him not a moment's eaſe. He wore defenſive armour under his cloaths, always kept a loaded piſtol in his pocket, and never lay twice in one room. It is ſaid that the death of his favourite daughter, Mrs Claypole, with that of Mr. Rich, his ſon-in-law, and his old friend the earl of Warwick, ſhortened the days of the tyrant: be this as it may, we know that about the middle of Auguſt this year, he was ſeized with the gout, which confined him for ſome days, and ſhifted from his foot into his body; and about the twenty-fourth of Auguſt it appeared he had a tertian ague, upon which, by the advice of the phyſicians, he removed from Hampton-court to Whitehall. It is incredible into what phrenzies of praying, faſting, revelation, and the like, the preachers and retainers about Cromwell's perſon fell during his illneſs: his own imagination, indeed, ſeems to have been ſo tranſported with enthuſiaſtic ravings, that, inſenſible of his danger, he affirmed "that God had reſerved him to greater attempts than ever he had yet undertaken,

* Colonel Saxby, who was a priſoner in the Tower, upon ſome deſign againſt Cromwell, on republican principles, died about this time, and his death was not without ſuſpicion of poiſon. He was a conſtant enemy to the late king and all the royal line, and ſuppoſed to have acted the horrid murder upon him, by cutting off his head, or aſſiſting therein, diſguiſed with a vizor; for upon that action he was promoted from a private trooper to the command of a regiment. † Hume.

ken, and that he was assured he should not die of this sickness." Goodwin, one of his favourite chaplains, had the following expression in one of his prayers, "Lord, we beg not for his recovery, for that thou hast already granted and assured us of, but for his speedy recovery." Nay even Thurloe, his secretary, has the following expression in his dispatch to Henry Cromwell, then in Ireland, "that which is some ground of hope, is, that the Lord, as on some former occasions, hath given to himself (Oliver) a particular assurance that he shall yet live to carry on the work he hath put into his hands." After this frantic stuff coming from the pen of so great a man as Thurloe, we cannot wonder at any thing done or said by the preachers and divines of Cromwell's court; as to himself, I am inclinable to think, with other writers, that in this affair he only acted the hypocrite, as he must know that he hazarded nothing by his prediction of his recovery; for if he did not survive, the rumour of his recovery, which began now to be diffused through the whole kingdom, would keep the minds of men in suspence, and prevent his enemies from coming to any certain resolutions; on the other hand, if he should recover, it would add new credit to his government, and the bulk of the people would actually have believed him to be a prophet.

On the thirty-first of August all the symptoms began to wear a mortal aspect, and the physicians declared he could not withstand the next fit with which he was threatened: the council was no sooner informed of this circumstance, than they immediately sent a deputation to know his will with regard to his successor. He was now become delirious, and altogether incapable of expressing his intention: they asked him if he did not mean that his eldest son Richard should succeed him in the government? A simple affirmative was all he was able to utter. Soon after, viz. on the third of September, he expired, at three o'clock in the afternoon, amidst a storm, so dreadful all over Europe, that it seemed to threaten the wreck of nature, after living fifty-nine years. The day on which he died was likewise much taken notice of, it being the anniversary of his most glorious successes at Dunbar and Worcester.

Historians are not more particular in their accounts of the minute actions of any great man than those of Oliver, and perhaps never man commanded so particular an attention to all his words and ways, deeply politic as he was in all he said and did. We shall endeavour to preserve the middle path between uninstructive brevity and tedious prolixity, in what we have to say of this glorious usurper.

Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntingdon, of a good family of Welsh extraction, their name being originally Williams; but one of his ancestors marrying the sister of the famous Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, in the reign of Henry VIII. a son by that marriage took that name, and transmitted it to his posterity. Oliver made no figure in the world before the breaking out of the civil war. We have seen by what steps and incidents he mounted afterwards to power, which he could not have done, unless he had been endowed with a most extraordinary genius and capacity to discern the favourable incidents as they happened, and dexterously convert them to his own advantage; and with a courage and perseverance in the prosecution of his measures which no danger could appal, no difficulties weary out. After he rose to sovereignty, under the name of protector, though his government was arbitrary, and supported only by military force, he did many things worthy of praise: he encouraged trade and commerce, maintained the honour of the nation, and in many instances shewed himself a magnanimous and intelligent governor. The English nation certainly never made a greater figure abroad since the days of Elizabeth, than it did under Cromwell.

Cromwell was in his disposition morose; he was sober, temperate, parsimonious, though not greedy of another's possessions; he was diligent and punctual in all public affairs. By his dexterous management he kept well with all sects; he did not persecute those of the Romish communion, nor those of the church of England; he had chaplains of all parties; he was an enthusiast with the fanatics, whom he had cheated, subdued, and no longer feared; and would laugh at these with the deists, placing confidence only in the independents, who could not subsist but through him. By this conduct he preserved to the last an authority which had been cemented with blood, and supported by fraud and artifice. Upon the whole, his greatest enemies allow, that had he not employed his great parts to evil ends, and by the most impious and traitorous practices usurped the government which did not belong to him, he might have filled the first posts in it with dignity and reputation to himself, and advantage to his country.

Cromwell was married to Elizabeth, daughter to sir James Bourchier, by whom he had two sons, Richard, who succeeded him, and Henry, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and four daughters, viz. Bridget, married to lieutenant-general Ireton, Elizabeth, to John Claypole, of Northamptonshire, esq. Mary, to the lord viscount Falconbridge; and Frances, to the honourable Robert Rich; all of them ladies of incomparable accomplishments.

Cromwell had a most pompous funeral bestowed upon him, and his body was in all appearance interred in Westminster abbey: but some say it was wrapped in lead, and sunk below-bridge in the river Thames; and others affirm it to have been buried in Naseby field.

Notwithstanding the jarring interests which prevailed at this time, Richard, Cromwell's eldest son, was, immediately on the death of his father, proclaimed protector in London. Far from meeting with any opposition, the whole nation seemed to acknowlege his authority: Fleetwood and Desborough, though secretly discontented with the preference that had been shewn to Richard, as well as to his father, in the government, made the most abject professions of duty to the new protector: Henry Cromwell, Richard's brother, who governed Ireland with great ability, secured him the obedience of that kingdom: general George Monk, who was, with the army under his command, absolute master in Scotland, being greatly attached to his family, immediately proclaimed him in that kingdom: the army, the navy, recognized his title: above ninety addresses were sent up from different counties and corporations, felicitating him on his succession: foreign ministers vied with each other in the usual compliments, and treated him with the same respect as they had done his father. But we shall soon have occasion to see that all this compliance, eſpecially on the part of the Engliſh, was no better than a deceitful calm, which ſuited the views of all parties, as a breathing-time for concerting their own ends. No one perſon could have been found more unexceptionable for this purpoſe than Richard was; who, not having the talents of his father, could not have the ſame fortune; his ſceptre was not ſupported by the ſword; and as he wanted the reſolution and diſſimulation of Oliver, he knew not either how to make himſelf feared by the army, nor how to manage the different ſects and parties which divided the nation.

Richard ſoon found himſelf treated with contempt, and even inſolence, by his father's council, and therefore thought to ſecure his authority by convoking a parliament, which ſat on the twenty-ſeventh of January, 1659. It conſiſted, like the former, of two houſes, one of which was formed of the principal officers, repreſenting the peers, and the other of deputies from the counties of England, Scotland, and Ireland, repreſenting the three kingdoms; and although there were a great many republicans in the houſe of commons, who held long debates about the Other Houſe, and other points in the Humble Petition and Advice; yet Richard's friends at laſt prevailed, and he was recognized protector by the parliament. But, before it met, ſeveral cabals had been ſet on foot by diſcontented perſons againſt his government. His uncle Deſborough was a republican, and his brother Fleetwood a violent fanatic preſbyterian; conſequently both averſe to the government of a ſingle perſon. Fleetwood was the idol of the army, whom Richard had diſobliged by the promoting ſome officers they diſliked: Lambert and Ludlow, with many other officers whom Oliver had laid aſide, came forth from their retreats, and joined the council againſt the new protector. Some of theſe, under a ſhew of friendſhip, adviſed him to call up to London as many officers as could be ſpared from the regiments quartered in different parts of the country, for the better ſupporting him in his authority, if the parliament ſhould not prove favourable to him.

Richard fell into the ſnare, never ſuſpecting that it was deſigned only to ſtrengthen the combination againſt him, and ordered all the officers that could be ſpared to repair to London. Theſe conſtituted a numerous aſſembly, which met frequently at Fleetwood's houſe, and becauſe he dwelt in Wallingford-houſe, the party were known by the name of the Wallingford-cabal. As ſoon as they were all aſſembled, they aſſumed the name of the Great Council of the Army; and being actuated by Fleetwood, Deſborough, and their aſſociates, they preſented a petition to the protector, demanding "that no member of the army ſhould be ſubject to the civil magiſtrate; and that the officers ſhould enjoy the privilege of chuſing their own general." Richard, ſhocked at their preſumption, and perceiving that their deſign was to make themſelves independent of him, rejected their petition, and even threatened to diſmiſs them from the ſervice, ſhould they make ſuch extravagant propoſals for the future. Had this firmneſs been followed by a proper ſpirit, it might have put an end to all the intrigues of the cabal; but it went no farther than words, and rather encouraged than daunted the petitioners, who preſented a remonſtrance to the parliament, demanding that Fleetwood ſhould be appointed general of the army.

The commons, dreading their deſigns, paſſed a vote, that there ſhould be no aſſembly or general council of officers without the protector's conſent or by his authority; and that no perſon ſhould be permitted to exerciſe an employment in the army, until after he ſhould have taken an oath that he would not interrupt the deliberations of the commons. This meaſure immediately brought matters to a criſis. The officers, conſcious of their own power, reſolved to compel Richard to part with this parliament, ſo unfavourable to their views. They brought up their forces to Whitehall, ſeized all the avenues, and Deſborough, a man of a rough and clowniſh diſpoſition, attended by a ſtrong guard, demanded an audience of the protector, and required him, in the name of all the officers, to diſſolve the parliament. Richard at firſt refuſed; but upon Deſborough's threatening him that they were reſolved to obtain their requeſt by ſome means or other, he complied; and the parliament having adjourned for three days, he publiſhed a proclamation, on the twenty-ſecond of April, 1659, declaring them diſſolved. By this act the protector was conſidered by every one as effectually depoſed.

The council of officers having thus aſſumed the ſupreme authority, began to conſider what form of government they ſhould eſtabliſh; and, after much debate, it was reſolved to retain the appearance of civil authority, and to reſtore the long parliament, which, having brought Charles I. to the block, had been ſo diſgracefully diſmiſſed by Oliver Cromwell, in 1658. This parliament, which was entirely at the devotion of the army, met on the eighth of May in the houſe (having choſen Lenthall their old ſpeaker) to the number of forty-two; and the preſbyterian members who had been excluded, attempted to re-aſſume their ſeats; but they would not admit of ſuch troubleſome aſſociates, and the army ſupported them in their renunciation of thoſe members. This aſſembly was ſo hated for their former tyranny, that the people in general could not forbear deriding them under the denomination of the Rump, in alluſion to their being the moſt inconſiderable and ignoble part of the parliament.

One of the firſt public acts of this parliament, was to ſummon all their members together who were at a diſtance from London, and to publiſh a declaration concerning their meeting, and of their intentions to proceed in the government, without a ſingle perſon, kingſhip, or houſe of peers. They next choſe a committee of ſafety (to which all officers, ſoldiers, and miniſters of juſtice, were to give due obedience), conſiſting of Fleetwood, Haſelrig, Vane, Ludlow, Sydenham, Salaway, and Jones, members of the houſe; to thoſe were added Lambert, Deſborough, and Berry, who were not of the houſe; and Scot, another member: and the time of their continuance was to be for five days, that is, till they could agree upon a council of ſtate.

Richard Cromwell ſtill remained at Whitehall, and many of the Wallingford-houſe officers continued to tamper with him. This came to the ears of the chief republicans; upon which the lord chief-juſtice St. John and ſir Gilbert Pickering were ordered by the houſe of commons to repair to him, to require him to ſign a formal abdication of the government. Had Richard poſſeſſed one ſpark of ſpirit, he had ſtill a fine game to play: the Daniſh ambaſſador, Petrum, offered him any terms if he would declare for Charles, and to bind himſelf and his maſter to make them good. Richard, it is true, had at this time little or no influence in the public councils: but there ſtill was a party in the army who would have been ready, under the ſanction of his name, to have declared againſt the parliament: even Fleetwood and Sydenham, two of the council of ſtate, with ſeveral other members, refuſed to take the oath preſcribed by the parliament againſt the government of a ſingle perſon; and a vote of the houſe paſſed for diſpenſing with their taking it. Several warm ſpeeches had been made in the houſe in his favour, and great oppoſition was made to the promotion of all officers who were known to be enemies to the Cromwell family, or the government of a ſingle perſon. Richard, however, ſigned his abdication, gave in a liſt of his debts, and ſent a very dutiful letter to the parliament, expreſſing his deſire to live quietly under their allegiance and protection.

Thus fell ſuddenly from the pinnacle of fortune, but, by rare felicity, without any hurt or injury, the family of the Cromwells. Richard continued to enjoy an eſtate, which was very ſmall, and loaded too with a large debt, which he had contracted for the funeral of his father. After the Reſtoration, though he eſcaped with impunity, he choſe to retire to the continent, till the ſpirit of party faction ſhould in ſome meaſure be abated. Some time after he returned to England, where he lived to a great old age, not dying till towards the latter end of queen Anne's reign*.

There being a great number of republicans in the army and among the inferior officers, and both Fleetwood and Lambert having been diſappointed in their expectation of ſucceeding Oliver, will account for the ſtrong and early combination againſt Richard. Lambert was ambitious of being a ſecond Cromwell, but as he could not compaſs his end whilſt Fleetwood was general, he complied with the reſt in reſtoring the rump-parliament, in hopes that he ſhould be able to manage Fleetwood as Cromwell had managed Fairfax. But to follow the parliament in their proceedings.

Upon the reſignation of Richard Cromwell, they proceeded to appoint Fleetwood commander in chief; they ordered that all commiſſions ſhould be ſigned by the ſpeaker of the houſe; they voted that Ireland ſhould be governed by commiſſioners appointed in parliament, and recalled Henry Cromwell to London. He obeyed the order with a good grace, though he might have given them abundance of trouble, for he had a great influence among the troops in that kingdom, and was beloved by the people for his mild and upright adminiſtration. The parliament dreading the power of the ſuperior officers, whom they knew were averſe to their government, began to new-model the army; the committee for examining commiſſioners caſhiered many officers whom they ſuſpected, and filled their places with others in whom they could confide: they would have practiſed the ſame method with the troops under Monk, but he was no ſooner apprized of their intentions than he wrote letters to the parliament, complaining of their deſign to ſap his authority, and hinting that it would not be for their intereſt to drive him to extremities. They did not think it prudent to quarrel with an officer of his ability, at the head of twelve thouſand veterans, ſupported by the whole Scottiſh nation; and therefore they recalled the commiſſion they had granted. They continued the tax of thirty-five thouſand pounds a month, which had been impoſed by the parliament during Oliver's protectorſhip; they appointed commiſſioners for the civil government of Ireland, and beſtowed the chief command of the forces of that kingdom upon Edmund Ludlow, an experienced officer and a rigid republican.

We purpoſely omit many particulars of theſe tranſactions, and others in the Journals of the parliament, as their conſtituting a council of ſtate for the more immediate executive power of the commonwealth, the nomination of judges, commiſſioners of the great-ſeal, and commiſſioners of the navy, and colonel Henry Cromwell's letter to the parliament when he ſubmitted to its authority, as not very eſſentially pertinent to this hiſtory.

Fleetwood and his friends were troubled at the reſtriction of his commiſſion, yet he diſſembled his paſſion, and yielded to neceſſity, till a more favourable conjuncture might give him opportunity to enlarge his power; however, both he, Deſborough, Lambert, and many of them, were diſſatisfied with the way of receiving their commiſſions from the hands of the ſpeaker, and would have remonſtrated againſt it; but by enquiring into the temper of the inferior officers, they found them well enough affected towards it, and therefore did not proceed againſt it for that time: and Fleetwood himſelf, to diſſemble his acquieſcence with great ſubmiſſion and proteſtation of obedience to the parliament, received his commiſſion in the houſe, from the hands of the ſpeaker, as did all the reſt of the officers in and about London, who had commands in the army.

The parliament, however, had not ſat long before differences began to ariſe, as uſual, between them and the principal officers of the military. The parliament meditated no leſs than to bring the army under abſolute ſubjection to their authority, while the commanders, aware of their deſign, bent their whole ſtudy to preſerve their poſts and influence over the inferior officers and ſoldiery.

But before this animoſity aroſe to any height, they had information of divers plots forming by the royaliſts, in different parts of the kingdom, with whom the preſbyterians from this time ſeem to have joined, in hopes of freeing themſelves from the reſtraints the independents kept them under. The deſigns of the king's party were, however, fruſtrated by means of the timely intelligence Thurloe, the ſecretary of ſtate, had from Richard Willes, who, being in great confidence with the king and his little court, was entruſted by them with all their cabinet-ſecrets. This man had ſuffered himſelf to be bribed by Oliver, and continually betrayed all the reſolves of Charles and his friends. The only riſing of any conſequence was in Cheſhire, where ſir George Booth having got together about five hundred men, ſeized the city of Cheſter, and publiſhed a manifeſto againſt the parliament. In the mean time his majeſty removed from Bruſſels to Calais, to be ready if any fortunate event ſhould invite him over; and the duke of York joined him from Breda. Colonel Ireland at the ſame time declared for the king at Liverpool; and Mr. Brooks, one of the members of the long parliament, willing to expiate his former miſtakes, cordially joined with them for the freedom of his country.

The parliament, alarmed at theſe proceedings, cauſed all the horſes in and about London to be ſeized, and all the avenues to the city to be guarded, and ſeveral detachments of horſe and foot to be placed in the roads from the weſt and north-weſt parts of the kingdom. Lambert was ſent, about the beginning of Auguſt, with a brigade, againſt ſir George Booth and his party: the lord Mordaunt, who was ſuſpected of being a principal agent for the king, was ſummoned, on great penalty, to appear; and Brooks and ſome other members of the houſe, whom they ſuſpected to be engaged in the royal cauſe, were, on the penalty of one hundred pounds each, required to attend the ſervice of the houſe. The parliament next ſent to Dunkirk for three regiments, to ſtrengthen the army; and colonel Zanchy brought out of Ireland his regiment of horſe and Axtell's regiment of foot, which landing in Angleſey, marched to join Lambert, who, at his leaving London, had not above fifteen hundred men with him, but by the conjunction of theſe and other troops, on his march, increaſed to about five thouſand. Sir George Booth had not above half that number; and thoſe he had were without any order or diſcipline, moſt of them being noblemen and gentlemen of quality, aſpiring every one to command, whilſt nobody obeyed. Sir George Booth having intelligence of Lambert's drawing near to him, thought to have got a day's march before him into Lancaſhire, to have increaſed his numbers; and to gain time, he and ſir Thomas Middleton ſent a trumpeter with two miniſters, to ſhew the ground of their raiſing an army, and deſired a treaty to ſave the effuſion of blood, to which Lambert agreed, on condition they would firſt lay down their arms, and ſurrender to him the garriſons in their power. To this there was no reply; but ſome of Lambert's men preſſed ſo hard upon Booth, that, at a bridge near Northwich, a ſharp encounter enſued between the forces of each party: the royaliſts defended the paſs very courageouſly, till they were overpowered by numbers. Captain Morris, a gallant loyal gentleman, was killed, and ſome few others of Booth's party; of Lambert's very few fell, and thoſe of no great note. All the vanquiſhed diſperſed themſelves: ſir George Booth and ſir Thomas Middleton made their eſcape; the lord Kilmurry, Mr. Brooks, major-general Egerton, ſir William O' Neil, and others, were taken priſoners, and all the garriſons immediately ſubmitted to Lambert. Sir George Booth was, however, ſoon after ſeized at Newport Pagnel, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

In the mean time Dr. Nicholas Monk, an eminent divine, brother to the general, and a moſt zealous friend to the royal family, came over from Holland to London, in his way to Scotland, where he was ſent to ſee if he could engage his brother to promote his majeſty's cauſe, and was directed to receive farther inſtructions from ſir John Grenville. He firſt applied to Mr. Clarges, brother-in-law to Monk, and communicated his buſineſs to him; and afterwards to Grenville, who much encouraged him in his undertaking, and ſhewed him two letters he had received from his majeſty, one to general Monk and the other to himſelf. Clarges had been ſent by the parliament, upon the reſignation of Richard, to Scotland, to perſuade the general to acknowlege their government, and therefore he did not chuſe to appear openly in this affair, well knowing that the leaſt ſuſpicion of his actions from thoſe in power, might make him uſeleſs to the ſervice he wiſhed well to; however, when the doctor arrived in Scotland, he found means to prevail ſo far on his brother, the general, not a little encouraged by the news of ſir George Booth's ſucceſs, that the latter reſolved to march into England in ſupport of the loyaliſts under arms; but as he had many ſeditious officers in his army, who were ſpies upon all his actions, he was obliged to be very wary and circumſpect in his proceedings; and the news of the fatal defeat of ſir George Booth arriving, he laid aſide for the preſent all deſign of declaring himſelf.

But the ſucceſs which Lambert had met with in quelling the riſing of the loyaliſts was ſo far from eſtabliſhing the authority, that it ſerved only to precipitate the ruin of the parliament. Lambert, conſcious of his own ſtrength, and of the extreme weakneſs of the rump, was no leſs dangerous to them than Booth: he made uſe of a thouſand pounds, voted him as a reward for his ſervice, in bribing the officers under his command, who all ſwore to ſtand true to his intereſts. In purſuance of his advice they framed a petition, and ſent it ſigned to the parliament, demanding that they would comply with the contents of the addreſs formerly preſented by the council of Wallingford-houſe; that they would eſtabliſh general Fleetwood in his command, which, according to his preſent commiſſion, would expire in a few months; that Lambert ſhould be appointed lieutenant-general, Deſborough general of the cavalry, and Monk general of the infantry; that they would take vengeance on thoſe communities which had aſſiſted the enemy in the late inſurrections; and regulate the corporations in ſuch a manner as to exclude from the magiſtracy all ſuch as had expreſſed their affection for a commonwealth. This petition, dated at Derby, was communicated to Fleetwood for his approbation, before it ſhould be preſented to parliament. But ſir Arthur Haſelrig having received intimation of their ſcheme, communicated his intelligence to the houſe; Fleetwood being interrogated on the ſubject, owned the deſign, and three officers, who brought it to town, delivered a copy of the petition to the ſpeaker. The houſe having taken the ſubſtance of it into deliberation, voted, "that to have other officers than thoſe appointed by parliament, would be uſeleſs, chargeable, and dangerous to the commonwealth."

Monk's conduct was all this while ſo impenetrable, that it can only be accounted for by ſuppoſing him to have reſolved to be determined by events, and to chuſe his party as they ſhould preſent. He knew himſelf to be hated on many accounts by Fleetwood and Lambert, and that all their courtſhip to him had proceeded from their fear of what he could do againſt them. He had therefore again and again aſſured the parliament of his reſolution to ſtand by them at all hazards. At the ſame time his behaviour in regard to thoſe whom he knew to be the king's friends, gave Charles great hopes that he meant him no ill. The parliament however, encouraged by his profeſſions, and extremely incenſed at the above petition, immediately diſmiſſed Lambert, Deſborough, and ſome other officers who had ſigned it; revoked Fleetwood's commiſſion, and appointed commiſſioners to govern the army for a limited time: but the army paid no regard to their acts or reſolutions. Lambert, drawing ſome regiments into the city, ſecured all the avenues to Weſtminſter-hall; and when the ſpeaker arrived in his coach, he in perſon laid hold of the horſes, and, turning them round, very politely conducted him home. The other members were prevented meeting by the like ſtratagem, and two regiments which the parliament had ordered to mount in Old Palace-yard, as a guard to the houſe, finding they could not ſtem the torrent, quietly departed to their quarters.

Thus the rump-parliament was again depoſed by the army, on the thirteenth of October, five months after they had been reſtored. And now there was a ſecond anarchy of a few days, which was rendered tolerable by the army's being kept in exact diſcipline, and by the officers, who had now the ſupreme authority, appointing a council of ten perſons, out of their own body, to take care of ſuch affairs as were moſt preſſing. Then they declared Fleetwood their general, Lambert their lieutenant-general, and Deſborough commiſſary-general of the horſe. At length, on the twenty-ſixth of October, they eſtabliſhed a committee of ſafety, conſiſting of twenty-three perſons, and entruſted to them the government, who were to conſider farther of a ſettlement, "without a king, ſingle perſon, or houſe of peers."

During theſe diſtractions in England, the king, diſheartened by the miſcarriage of every enterprize in his favour, was determined to try the weak reſources of foreign aid; and he repaired to the Pyrenees, where the miniſters of France and Spain were about this time engaged in conferences for compoſing all diſputes between the two crowns, by a final treaty. Don Lewis de Haro, the Spaniſh plenipotentiary, gave the young monarch a very kind and cordial reception, and expreſſed his inclination, had the low condition of Spain permitted him, to furniſh aſſiſtance to the unhappy king. The politic Mazarine, pretending the alliance of France with the Engliſh commonwealth, would not ſo much as deign him an interview; nor could Charles, even by conceſſions that, if true, do him no great credit, obtain aught but empty profeſſions of reſpect and friendſhip. But, while every thing wore ſuch an unfavourable aſpect, blind chance (or what at leaſt we blindly call ſo), by a ſurpriſing revolution, was now preparing the way for Charles to mount the throne of his anceſtors.

Monk, who hated Lambert, no ſooner heard of that demagogue's proceedings in London, and that he governed the army and nation in the name of Fleetwood, than he reſolved to march out of Scotland, with the beſt of his troops, and reſtore the rump-parliament. This meaſure rendered him generally ſuſpected of having formed ſome deep deſigns, either in his own favour, or that of the king, yet nothing certain could be fixed upon, as he all along uſed the moſt profound diſſimulation, and opened himſelf only as circumſtances offered. He now wrote letters to Fleetwood and Lambert, wherein he complained "of their violation of faith to the parliament, and declared his reſolution to endeavour to reſtore them to their power, againſt all oppoſition whatſoever. Fleetwood, Lambert, and Deſborough, were ſtruck with conſternation at this reſolution, ſo peremptorily ſignified to them, and ſent to deſire Clarges to come to them: who, when he came, after ſome queſtion of his knowlege of the general's proceedings (to which he gave very cautious anſwers), they deſired him to go into Scotland, with colonel Talbot (whoſe regiment was then at Edinburgh), to prevail with Monk for a treaty of mediation, to prevent the effuſion of blood: they ſaid they choſe Talbot to accompany him becauſe he was grateful to the general. Clarges was very glad of this opportunity to get away (for he feared to be much worſe treated), and they were ſo preſſing for his departure, that they allowed him but three hours preparation for his journey. Monk, on his ſide, was indefatigable in carrying his deſign into execution: he aſſembled all his officers, the chief of whom he knew to be devoted to his ſervice, having occaſionally, and from time to time, purged his army of all malecontents or ſuſpicious perſons, and laid before them his reſolution to march into England, and reſtore the parliament; to which they unanimouſly gave their conſent, promiſing to ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes: and every precaution was taken by the general and his friends to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the prevailing faction in England.

During theſe preparations colonel Talbot and Clarges arrived at Edinburgh, on the ſecond of November, with the propoſals for a treaty between general Monk and the committee of ſafety: they were both very well received by Monk, eſpecially Clarges, his brother-in-law, whom he thought himſelf happy to have with him to aſſiſt his deſign. By this gentleman's advice he conſented to a negociation, in order to gain time, and ſent three of his officers, namely, Wilkes, Cloberry, and Knight, as commiſſioners to treat with the committee, though they were expreſly ordered to ſtart ſuch obſtacles as ſhould protract the negociation. They found Lambert at York, with a body of forces, to oppoſe the progreſs of Monk, whom he hated as a rival in military fame and preferment. He ſaid he was ſufficiently authorized to treat with them; but when they demanded the reſtoration of the parliament, he owned he had no inſtructions on that head, and they proceeded to London, where the committee immediately aſſented to all their propoſals. The treaty was accordingly ſigned on the fifteenth of November, both ſides engaging to act vigorouſly in oppoſition to Charles Stuart.

The nation, mean while, had fallen into a ſtate of perfect anarchy; and by refuſing the payment of all taxes, reduced the troops to the greateſt extremities. While Lambert was collecting his forces at Newcaſtle, Haſelrig and Morley entered Portſmouth, and declared for the parliament. A party ſent to quell the inſurrection, were induced by their commander to embrace the ſame intereſt. The city apprentices roſe in a body, and inſiſted on a free parliament. Though they were ſuppreſſed by colonel Hewſon, a man who had once been a cobler, but was now poſſeſſed of a high rank in the army, the city ſtill retained its ill-humour, and diſcovered

diſcovered marks of the higheſt diſſatisfaction. It even erected a kind of ſeparate government, and exerciſed a ſupreme authority within itſelf. Admiral Lawſon with his ſquadron entered the river, and declared for the parliament. Haſelrig and Morley, informed of theſe events, quitted Portſmouth, and haſtened towards London. The regiments in the neighbourhood of that city, were perſuaded by their old officers, who had been diſmiſſed by the committee of ſafety, once more to eſpouſe the cauſe of the parliament. Deſborough's regiment, which was ſent to Lambert to aſſiſt his friends, no ſooner reached St. Alban's, than it declared for the ſame aſſembly.

Lenthall, the ſpeaker, at the deſire of the officers, reſumed his former authority, and, on the twenty-ſixth of December, aſſembled the parliament, which had already been twice expelled with ſo much contempt and ignominy.

Their firſt ſtep was to annul the act againſt the payment of exciſe and cuſtoms: they next choſe commiſſioners for aſſigning quarters to the ſoldiers: and, without taking the leaſt notice of Lambert, they enjoined the forces under his command to repair directly to thoſe garriſons which were allotted them.

Lambert's ſituation was now totally deſperate; by theſe orders of the parliament his army was rendered entirely uſeleſs to him; and, which was ſtill worſe, the few troops that remained with him, thinking to make their court to thoſe in power, or perhaps to gratify ſome pique of their own, put their general under an arreſt, and he was brought up to London, and committed priſoner to the Tower.

Monk having received a ſupply of thirty thouſand pounds from the Scots, and taken proper precautions for maintaining the peace of that kingdom, entered England on the ſecond of January, 1660. On his way he heard of the diſbanding of the army, as alſo that the lord Fairfax, with ſome of the chief gentlemen in Yorkſhire, were in arms, demanding a free parliament. This was going a ſtep farther than Monk had yet propoſed to do; however, he was received with open arms by the lord Fairfax and all his friends, who had taken poſſeſſion of that city for a free parliament. The rump now grew to be more the public deteſtation than the army had been before, and every ſtep which Monk advanced forwards, occaſioned ſome freſh declaration or aſſociation of the counties for a free parliament. The rump then began to think that they had made the breach between themſelves and the Wallingford officers too irreconcileable; they ſuſpected that Monk had ſomething farther in view than reſtoring them, and would have been better pleaſed had he remained in Scotland: however, to put a good face upon the matter, and if poſſible to ſtop his farther progreſs, the houſe ſent him a letter, wherein they informed him of their having re-aſſembled, and attributed the reſtitution of their authority wholly to his fidelity, care, and courage. This meſſage was far from being pleaſing to the general; on the contrary, he looked upon the event it announced as one of the croſſeſt accidents that could have befallen him. He was under a thouſand perplexities how to act; for by the parliament's over-haſty reſumption of their power, backed with a great army newly returned to their obedience, he deſpaired of being able to compaſs his deſigns, and thought no longer of continuing in arms than till the firſt opportunity ſhould be offered him to lay them down, and retire; for he expected they would not have thought their ſitting ſafe till his arrival in London with his army, and then he would have reſtored all the other members with them, without undertaking to judge the difference between them. Nevertheleſs he found pretences to continue his march, ſtill profeſſing it was purely for the ſervice of the parliament. At Lancaſter he was met by a deputation from London, with an addreſs praying the reſtoration of the members who had been excluded in 1648, when the army put a force upon the parliament, in order to accompliſh their deſigns upon the late king.

In this, and the other numerous addreſſes ſent to him upon the road, the preſbyterians ſeemed to have had a great ſhare; as thoſe ſecluded members were moſtly of the preſbyterian ſtamp, they were deſirous now to reſcue themſelves out of the power of the independents at any rate. Oliver had, indeed, ſuffered their church-government to continue, but with a full liberty to the other ſects, which was their great grievance. The parliament finding that Monk was in no humour to ſtop his march, and well knowing themſelves incapable to give him law, thought it moſt prudent to temporize. Accordingly, on the twelfth of January, an act was voted to juſtify Monk's marching into England; and on the ſixteenth they voted a thouſand pounds a year to be ſettled on him, and that Scot and Robinſon, two of their members, ſhould be ſent to compliment him on the road. Scot and Robinſon were deſigned as no better than ſpies upon Monk, and their obſervation of thoſe who ſeemed to be chiefly in his favour, and reſorted moſtly to him, with the univerſal diſpoſition of the country of England for a free parliament, being communicated to the heads of the faction, gave them great uneaſineſs. His army was not quite ſix thouſand ſtrong: had the members of parliament been united among themſelves, or had they dared to truſt the experienced officers under them, they might have effectually ruined his ſcheme: inſtead of that, upon his approach to St. Alban's, the parliament tamely complied with a letter ſent from him to the houſe, deſiring that the regiments quartered in and about London might be ordered to retire to a greater diſtance, to make room for his troops. Lambert was now in the Tower, and Fleetwood and the reſt loſt their courage, as doubting whether they ſhould be able to preſerve the command over their inferior officers, and therefore tamely acquieſced in the orders of the parliament for leaving London; but the common men were leſs ſubmiſſive, for about four thouſand of them mutinied, and were with difficulty prevented either from joining with the royaliſts in the city, or from marching out againſt Monk. The parliament conſidering this mutiny as a freſh inſult upon their authority, in great terror preſſed Monk to haſten his march, and he entered London the fourth of February. The next day he was introduced to the houſe with great ſolemnity, and received, by the mouth of Lenthall, the public thanks for the great ſervices which he had done his country.

During the late diſtractions, the payment of taxes had been interrupted; and though the parliament, upon their reſtoration, had renewed their orders for all collections and impoſitions, yet ſo little little authority did they poſſeſs in the nation, that the people obeyed their commands with great backwardneſs and reluctance. The common council of London abſolutely refuſed to ſubmit to an aſſeſſment demanded of them; and openly declared, that, till a free and legal parliament was aſſembled, they would never conſent to make any payment. This refuſal would immediately have deſtroyed the authority of the parliament; they were, therefore, reſolved, upon this occaſion, to make at once a full trial of their own ſtrength and of the general's fidelity.

On the ninth of February orders were given that part of the northern army ſhould be quartered in London; that its poſts and chains ſhould be taken away, and its portcullices deſtroyed: Monk was ordered to execute theſe reſolutions againſt the city, and to ſeize the perſons of ſome of the moſt obnoxious amongſt the citizens, that is to ſay, ſuch as had been loudeſt in demanding a free parliament. Monk knew ſo well how to diſſemble, that he marched into the city, and in part obeyed the orders; but thinking that he ought to make himſelf ſure of one party before he entirely broke with another, he therefore, after ſome ſecret conſultations with the diſaffected citizens, ſent a letter to the parliament, informing them of what he had done, and begging they would mitigate the ſeverity of their order; but the parliament, on receipt of this letter, repeated their orders, that the gates and portcullices of the city ſhould be forthwith deſtroyed by Monk, and they diſſolved the common-council by a vote. On the eleventhof February they voted that no perſon, engaged in any conſpiracy or deſign in behalf of the royal family, ſhould either elect or be elected into parliament. In the afternoon of the ſame day they received a petition from Praiſe God Barebones, ſigned by a great number of perſons, deſiring that every individual of the kingdom ſhould be compelled to take the oath of abjuration*; and returned the fanatic thanks for his affection towards the commonwealth. At the ſame time the commiſſion for the army being expired, a freſh commiſſion was given to Monk, Haſelrig, Morley, and Allured; but it was voted, that there ſhould be a quorum of the commiſſion, who might act without Monk.

That general now began to think he had carried his diſſimulation to the fartheſt ſtretch, having punctually complied with the laſt order of the houſe, to diſmantle the city; and therefore, after making many apologies for what he had done, declaring it to have been purely in compliance with the orders of the odious rump, whom now he ſaid he found to be a ſet of mercileſs unrelenting tyrants, he and his officers joined in a letter to the parliament, peremptorily requiring them to iſſue out writs for filling up the vacancies in their own body, and to declare a period to their own ſitting, ſo that they might make room for a free parliament. After this he threw off the maſk with the parliament, and declared his reſolution to the city, begging that they would join with him in his attempts for the ſettlement of the nation. This declaration turned the late mourning of the city into a rapture of joy, which was demonſtrated by the ringing of bells, illuminations, and bonfires†.

The parliament foreſeeing the approaching danger, reſolved to make another effort for the preſervation of their power; they diſpatched a committee to the general, and endeavoured, if poſſible, to gain him to their ſide; they even went ſo far as to offer him the ſupreme authority. But Monk would not truſt them, and retired to his own friends in the city, where he formed and modelled a new militia, but tho' without doing any farther than declaring for a commonwealth, under a free parliament, and for re-admitting the excluded members. Ludlow, and thoſe members at Weſtminſter who had any ſpirit left, were for adjourning to the Tower; but their motion was diſregarded. In ſhort, on the twelfth of February, the ſecluded members attended the general in a body to Whitehall; from whence, after receiving their promiſe to call a free parliament, and then diſſolve themſelves, he gave them a guard to the parliament-houſe, where they took their ſeats. The leaders of the independent and republican party, ſurprized at the ſudden appearance of the excluded members amongſt them, withdrew from the houſe.

The parliament, thus altered, repealed the act for abjuring Charles Stuart, as alſo the engagement to be faithful to the commonwealth without a king or houſe of peers; paſſed ſeveral other votes tending to the reſtoration of monarchy; and then, having iſſued out writs for calling a new parliament, and appointed a new council of ſtate, compoſed of men of prudence and moderation, they diſſolved themſelves on the ſixteenth of March.

Scot, Haſelrig, and ſome others of the zealous republicans, were greatly alarmed at theſe proceedings of the parliament, which they took to be an inevitable prognoſtic of introducing the king; and though they ſo much affected power as to endure no rival in it, yet they choſe rather to have the general take the dominion of the three kingdoms upon himſelf, than to have the king reſtored, from whoſe juſt reſentment they thought they had every thing to fear. They conſulted privately with ſome officers of the army, whom they moſt truſted; and thoſe approved ſo well of the expedient, that they waited on the general at Whitehall, to treat with him about it; but Monk would by no means encourage any temptations of that kind, and ſent them away with a ſevere reprimand. Probably the experience of Cromwell's fate gave him reaſon to avoid the rock on which that family had ſplit.

Before the new parliament met, Lambert, having eſcaped out of the Tower, put himſelf at the head of ſome diſcontented troops, in Northamptonſhire. But Ingoldſby, being immediately ſent againſt him by Monk, came unawares upon them, diſperſed them, and took Lambert priſoner, who was again ſent to the Tower.

* The oath was in the following words: "I do hereby ſwear, that I do renounce the pretended title of Charles Stuart, and of the whole line of the late king James, and of every other perſon, as a ſingle perſon, pretending, or which ſhall pretend, to the crown or government of theſe nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any of them, and the dominions and territories belonging to them: and that I will, by the grace of Almighty God, be true, faithful, and conſtant to the parliament and commonwealth; and will oppoſe the bringing in, or ſetting up, any ſingle perſon, or houſe of lords, and every of them, in this commonwealth."

† The moſt comical expedients were employed to ridicule that odious aſſembly. At every bonfire rumps were roaſted; and when theſe could no longer be found, pieces of fleſh were cut into that form; and the funeral of the parliament, the populace ſaid, was ſolemnized by theſe marks of hatred and deriſion.

Soon after the diſſolution of the parliament, Monk, by the intervention of one Morrice, a gentleman of Devonſhire, nearly allied to Monk, and one in whom he had always repoſed the moſt unlimited confidence, opened himſelf to ſir John Grenville, whom he engaged to be an agent between himſelf and Charles; and, to diſtinguiſh himſelf above all others of his profeſſion or religion who preſſed for the reſtoration, he ſecretly agreed that Charles ſhould be brought in without any limitation; and imparted to him an important piece of intelligence, which he had caſually learned by the Portugueſe ambaſſador, from which he had underſtood that Charles was not ſafe in the territories of Spain, and that he ought to remove to Breda, becauſe the court of Spain intended to detain him until either Jamaica or Dunkirk, or both, were reſtored to that crown. The reader may eaſily conceive the joy of the king upon this meſſage. Notwithſtanding the high ſpirits in which his followers were, he, and the wiſeſt about him were extremely damped at being in a manner forſaken by all the powers of Europe, with nothing but the proſpect of want before their eyes; he knew that the kindneſs of the Spaniards would ſoon be at an end, when he could no longer be uſeful to their intereſts. He heard of the re-ſettlement of the rump, of their triumphs over the army, of Monk's warm declaration for a commonwealth: and he had been ſo often deceived by the ſanguine hopes of his friends, that they added to his dejections.

The council of ſtate was all this while ſitting, and though Monk daily ſent to, and received meſſages from the king, and now acted under his commiſſion; nay, though Montagu, who was at the head of the fleet, offered himſelf, and all under his command, without any reſerve, to the king; yet ſuch was Monk's caution, that all the officers of the militia, before they were put in commiſſion, were obliged to ſwear ſolemnly to acknowlege the lawfulneſs of the parliament's war againſt the late king. This gave Charles little or no diſturbance: he had by this time removed to Breda, where he received applications from all parts of England, and the court was as ſplendid as if he had been already on the throne. It was with no ſmall ſatisfaction he heard of Lambert's defeat, and his impriſonment, with that of Cobbel, Creed, and others of his fanatical officers; of the quaſhing the meetings of the army; and diſplacing all the ſuſpected officers in the fleet; and, above all, of the favourable proſpect of the elections into parliament. His only difficulty now was, how to comply with Monk's advice, which, in his ſituation, was little leſs than a command, that all might remain in poſſeſſion of what they had; that liberty of conſcience ſhould be granted for all religions; and that an act of grace ſhould be paſſed, ſo extenſive as to comprehend even the murderers of his father. Charles ſhewed both great virtue and great wiſdom, by neither denying nor granting thoſe matters, but referring all to the conſideration of the enſuing parliament. This was very agreeable to Monk; and Grenville received the following letters from Charles, to be by him delivered, viz. one to the general and the army, one to the houſe of commons, one to the houſe of lords (no notice of whom had been taken in the ſummons to parliament), one to the fleet, one to the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and a declaration for the ſatisfaction of all his ſubjects. The letters themſelves are to be found in all our common hiſtorians, but the ſubſtance is contained in the Declaration for the ſatisfaction of all ſubjects who ſhould return to their allegiance, excluſive of thoſe who ſhould be hereafter excepted by parliament. As to matters of religion, he declared free liberty of conſcience, and that no man ſhould be diſquieted, or called in queſtion, for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not diſturb the peace of the kingdom. As to matters of property, liable to actions at law on account of their titles, he leaves to the ſame authority from which they were derived, that of a parliament; and, to quiet the army under general Monk, he promiſed them all their arrears, and to continue the ſoldiers in his ſervice on the ſame pay and condition they then had.

The elections for the approaching parliament, which all this time was carried on in favour of the king's party, being completed, and every thing appearing ripe for the reſtoration, the new parliament aſſembled on the twenty-fifth of April, in two houſes, that of lords and commons. The houſe of lords conſiſted at firſt of no more than ten peers, and all, or moſt of them preſbyterians, viz. the earls of Mancheſter, Northumberland, Lincoln, Suffolk, and Denbigh, the viſcount Say and Seale, and the lords Wharton, Hunſdon, Grey of Wark, and Maynard. The writs that had iſſued being in the name of the keepers of the liberties of England, had made no mention of the houſe of lords; but the latter thought nothing that had happened could diſquiet them, and the preſent temper of the times gave them no reaſon to apprehend any objection.

The houſe of commons choſe ſir Harbottle Grimſtone for their ſpeaker. This gentleman, with other preſbyterians, had gone as far as he could in contributing to the ruin of the late king; but ſtopped when his perſonal death was under conſideration. On the firſt day of their meeting, the commons received a meſſage from the lords; and on the ſecond day Grimſtone, by order of the houſe, gave thanks to Monk for conquering all their and the kingdom's enemies without the effuſion of blood. On the twenty-ſeventh of April they ordered, that the great buſineſs of the ſettlement of the nation ſhould be taken into conſideration on the firſt day of May, to which time they adjourned. It was, in the mean while, generally underſtood that the reſtoration of the royal family was to take place; but how, or in what manner, none had ventured to pronounce: every mouth, however, was now filled with invectives againſt the memory of Cromwell, and in expreſſing a deteſtation and abhorrence of the inhuman murder of their ſovereign.

On the firſt of May, when the houſe re-aſſembled after its adjournment, Mr. Anneſley was the firſt who mentioned ſir John Grenville's having delivered a letter from the king to the council of ſtate; and the houſe being informed that ſir John was at the door, he was immediately called in, and at the bar of the houſe preſented all the letters and the Declaration, which he had from the king. Theſe being ſeverally read in each houſe, both lords and commons concurred in paſſing a vote, "That by the the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the government ought to be by the king, lords, and commons." It is incredible with what ardour both houſes ſtrove to expreſs their affection and loyalty to the king on this occaſion; but as the moſt ſubſtantial proof of their attachment, they voted a preſent of fifty thouſand pounds to the king, ten thouſand to the duke of York, and five thouſand to the duke of Gloceſter. A committee of lords and commons was appointed to draw up a dutiful and thankful anſwer to the king's letters and Declaration, and to invite his majeſty to return and take poſſeſſion of his dominions.

In a word, every ſtep relating to this important event was taken with ſuch zeal and unanimity, that, according to the expreſſion of the noble hiſtorian of thoſe times†, "one could not but wonder where thoſe people dwelt, who had done all the miſchief, and kept the king ſo long from enjoying the comfort and ſupport of ſuch excellent ſubjects. The king himſelf ſaid, that it muſt ſurely have been his own fault, that he had not ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the throne, ſince every body was ſo zealous for reſtoring him to it."

On the eighth of May the king was proclaimed in Palace-yard, Whitehall, and at Temple-bar, the two houſes attending at the ſolemnity, and the people rending the air with acclamations of joy. The intermediate time between the eighth and the twenty-ninth, which was the day of the king's entering London, was ſpent in preparing every thing for his reception. All imaginable methods were taken for ſtopping the farther waſte of the lands of the king or the royaliſts; and great aſſiduity was ſhewn in ſecuring the perſons of the regicides, and the moſt criminal of thoſe concerned in the late troubles.

The reſpect of foreign powers ſoon ſucceeded the ſubmiſſion of the king's ſubjects: Spain importuned him to return to the Low Countries, and take ſhipping in any of her maritime ports; Mazarine, the lately inſulting and inſolent miniſter of France, preſſed him with the greateſt earneſtneſs to accept of Calais for the ſame purpoſe: Charles civilly declined them both, and after making a tour to the Hague, where he was magnificently received, he embarked on board the Engliſh fleet, which lay to receive him, under the command of admiral Montague; and made his public entry into London on the twenty-ninth of May (his birth-day), where he was received with the moſt extravagant demonſtrations of joy.

Thus was this great revolution effected without any effuſion of blood: but what is ſtill more the object of wonder, is, that whereas ſo much blood had been ſpilt to compel Charles I. to come into terms with his people, to which it is certain he at laſt made large conceſſions, his ſon Charles II. ſhould be received without any conditions at all. Upon this biſhop Burnet, in his Hiſtory of his own Times, tells us that Hale, afterwards lord chief-juſtice, did move, that a committee might be appointed to look into the propoſitions that had been made, and the conceſſions that had been offered by the late king, and that ſomething ſimilar thereto might be demanded of Charles, previous to his reſtoration. This motion was ſeconded, but by whom the biſhop had forgot. Monk, it ſeems, was apprized of ſuch a motion, and prepared for an anſwer to it: he obſerved, that if they ſtood debating and lingering longer before they declared themſelves, he could neither anſwer for the peace of the nation, nor the diſpoſition of the army; that the preſence of the king muſt be immediate; and that being without an army or money, it was as much in the parliament to bind him down to conditions after he was reſtored, as before; and that thoſe conditions, if obtained after the reſtoration, would be more binding, becauſe agreed to by the king upon his throne, and not in a manner under the reſtraint of exile. That the two houſes were afterwards too remiſs in not pointing out the proper limitation of the king's authority, is not to be diſputed; and to that remiſſneſs, ſays the biſhop, may well be imputed all the errors of the ſucceeding reign *.

* This æra had the honour of producing the celebrated Milton, whoſe poems do honour to the nation that gave him birth, and indeed to human nature. He was Cromwell's ſecretary for the Latin tongue; though his genius ſeems to have been very little known to his employers, for he is mentioned by Whitlock as an obſcure blind man, very unfit for his office. About the ſame time flouriſhed ſir William Davenant, ſir John Denham, Waller, and Cowley, who, though but indifferent poets, acquired a good ſhare of reputation. The republican principles of the age gave riſe to the Oceana of Harrington, containing the idea of a perfect commonwealth: and the controverſies and abſurdities that deformed religion, encouraged Hobbes to write and publiſh his Leviathan. Among the eminent perſons who died under Oliver's protectorſhip were the famous Mr. John Selden, the great antiquarian; the venerable Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh, who came over to England a little before the breaking out of the Iriſh maſſacre; and Dr. Harvey, the diſcoverer of the circulation of the blood. The Reſtoration of King CHARLES II. to the REVOLUTION, which, with the foregoing Part, contains the Tranſactions of Eighty-ſeven Years.

PART XI.

CHARLES II. The third King of ENGLAND of the Houſe of STUART. A. D. 1660.

KING Charles I. being deprived of life by the hands of his rebellious ſubjects, on the thirtieth of January, 1649, in the manner already related, his eldeſt ſon prince Charles, then in the eighteenth year of his age, by unqueſtionable right ſucceeded to the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, immediately on that fatal event. Proclamation and coronation, the uſual ceremonies attending royal ſucceſſion, could not then have their due courſe, nor are they in this kingdom neceſſary circumſtances of monarchy; for by our law, which admits of no interregnum, the ſucceſſor to the crown has all the rights thereof from the firſt moment of the death of his predeceſſor. We are to conſider Charles II. therefore, at the time of his reſtoration, in the twelfth year of his reign.

With monarchy the ancient order and diſcipline was reſtored both in church and ſtate, and a round of magnificence and pleaſures ſucceeded the gloomy ferocity which had ſo long taken poſſeſſion of all minds. Charles introduced an exceſs of gallantry and diverſions into the palace, yet ſtained with the blood of his father. The independents were ſhortly heard of no more; the puritans hid themſelves; the ſpirit of the Engliſh nation underwent ſo total a change, that the late civil war became a ſubject of ridicule: the auſtere and gloomy ſectariſts, who had filled the kingdom with their enthuſiaſtic notions, were now the butts of raillery to the gay and licentious courtiers. Cautious deiſm, which the king himſelf ſeemed openly to profeſs, became the reigning religion among the many others then in the kingdom.

If we would know the ſource of the principal events of this reign, it will be neceſſary to conſider not only the character of Charles II. but that of the duke of York his brother, who bore the chief ſway in the royal councils.

King Charles was endowed with many engaging qualities and excellent talents, which might have rendered his reign glorious, if he had made a better uſe of them. He was affable and good-natured, had a ſurpriſing ready wit, a ſolid judgment, and a deep penetration. But his other qualities were by no means correſpondent: he was careleſs, indolent, and ſo immoderately addicted to pleaſure, that he would ſacrifice any thing to it, even the good of his kingdom. His court was filled with his miſtreſſes, and his whole time and treaſure were in a manner devoted to them: add to this, that, though he had embraced the popiſh religion abroad, in hopes of having the aid of the catholic princes towards the recovering the throne of his anceſtors; yet he was ſo totally indifferent to all religion, that he mattered not whether popery or proteſtantiſm was the religion of England, ſo that he could be left to purſue his pleaſure unmoleſted.

James, duke of York, the king's eldeſt brother, was of an active, violent, and vindictive temper, and ſuch a confirmed bigot to popery, that he would would ſtick at nothing to promote its eſtabliſhment; and with this view laboured to extend the prerogative, and to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government. This then, joined with the indolence of the king, of which the duke of York made his advantage to favour the ſchemes he had formed, was the chief occaſion of the diſtractions and animoſities in the latter part of this reign; for it was ſome time after the Reſtoration, and as it were by inſenſible degrees, that theſe deſigns diſcovered themſelves. After theſe remarks, it will be no longer neceſſary to detain the reader with any occaſional comments on the principal tranſactions and events we are now about to relate.

Charles had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the throne, than he began to turn his attention towards the affairs of the public. The firſt object that ingroſſed his care was the choice of his council, into which were admitted the moſt ancient men of the nation, without diſtinction of parties. The preſbyterians, as well as the royaliſts, ſhared this honour; Anneſley was made earl of Angleſey; ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, lord Aſhley; Denzil Holles, lord Holles; the earl of Southampton, lord-treaſurer; Edward Montagu, who had been one of Cromwell's admirals in conjunction with Blake, was made commander in chief of the fleet, and ſhortly after earl of Sandwich; George Monk, who had been made a knight of the garter at the king's landing, was continued general of all the forces, and created duke of Albemarle *. Sir Edward Hyde, a ſworn enemy to the preſbyterian party, and who had conſtantly attended the king in his exile, was created earl of Clarendon, and made high-chancellor and prime miniſter; the marquis, created duke of Ormond, ſteward of the houſhold; the earl of Mancheſter, lord high chamberlain; ſir Edward Nicholls and Sir William Morrice, ſecretaries of ſtate; and in order to gratify the preſbyterians, Calamy and Baxter, two of their favourite prelates, were appointed the king's chaplains.

As the parliament had been ſummoned without the king's conſent, they received on his arrival only the title of Convention; but two days after, viz. May 31, the king went to the houſe, and gave his aſſent to an act for changing the convention into a parliament.

In the next place, ſpecial care was taken for the committing all military as well as civil affairs of great truſt, into the hands of ſuch perſons as were judged moſt faithful to the king's ſervice; ſo that the governments of all the moſt important fortreſſes in the kingdom, and the firſt commands of the ſeveral regiments of the army, were by the lord-general conferred upon ſuch lords and other perſons of honour as the king was pleaſed to recommend unto the lord-general for that purpoſe, until the army could conveniently be diſbanded. Likewiſe, for the further ſettling of the militia of the nation, noblemen of the firſt rank and abilities were conſtituted lord-lieutenants of the ſeveral counties, each having under him, as deputy-lieutenant, ſuch gentlemen of the ſame counties as had been moſt eminent for their loyalty and affection to his majeſty and his royal houſe.

The king, in his declaration from Breda, had promiſed an indemnity to all criminals, but ſuch as ſhould be excepted by parliament. He now iſſued a proclamation, importing, that ſuch of the late king's judges as did not ſurrender themſelves within fourteen days, ſhould have no pardon. Nineteen complied with this proclamation; ſome were taken in attempting to eſcape; others fled to the continent.

The act of obliviion or indemnity hung for ſome time in the houſe, owing to the oppoſition of the lords, who, enraged by the cruel treatment they had received from the republican party, were determined, beſides the late king's judges, to condemn every one who had ſat in any high court of juſtice; and this rigor made them begin to ſuſpect that there was ſome court intrigue to invalidate the king's merciful declaration; but his majeſty ſoon removed their ſcruples. He came to the houſe of peers, and in the moſt pathetic terms preſſed them to paſs the general indemnity. He alſo ſent repeated meſſages to both houſes to the ſame purport. At length the act paſſed, and received the royal aſſent on the 29th of Auguſt. Thoſe who had an immediate ſhare in the late king's death were then executed: even Cromwell, Ireton, Pride, and Bradſhaw, and twenty others already dead, were attainted, and their eſtates confiſcated. Philips and Haſelrig underwent the ſame fate. Hutchenſon and Laſcelles were condemned in a fine, and declared incapable of exerciſing any employment. Vane and Lambert, two more of the king's judges, were likewiſe excepted. St. John and ſeventeen perſons more were deprived of all benefits from this act, if they accepted or executed any office, either eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military. All who had ſat in any illegal high court of juſtice, were diſabled from bearing office. In a few days the regicides were tried and condemned. The indignation entertained againſt the atrocious crime which thoſe men had committed, made the people rejoice and triumph in their puniſhment; while they, on the other hand, juſtified what they had done to the laſt, and looked upon themſelves as martyrs in a glorious cauſe. Lambert, who was tried and condemned at the ſame time, was reprieved from death, but impriſoned for life in the iſland of Guernſey. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, Bradſhaw, and Pride, were taken up and hanged for a whole day at Tyburn, and then buried under the gallows. This may be true as to the three laſt, but whether the body taken up for Cromwell's was really his, may be doubted, from the uncertainty of the place of his burial, as before mentioned.

At the ſame time that the king paſſed the act of indemnity, he gave his aſſent to an act for a perpetual anniverſary thankſgiving on the twenty-ninth of May, the day of his arrival in England. Mean while the parliament were employed in ſettling the

* As alſo earl of Torrington, baron Monk of Potheridge, Beauchampe, and Teyes, and ſummoned by writ to the houſe of peers. The titles of Albemarle and Beauchampe were conferred on him, becauſe he was deſcended from Margaret, one of the daughters and coheirs of Richard Beauchampe, earl of Albemarle and Warwick, who was married to the famous warrior John Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, well known in France in the reign of Henry V. whoſe ſon, John, had one daughter, married to Edward Grey, viſcount Liſle; whoſe daughter and heir, Elizabeth Grey, was married to Arthur Plantagenet, a natural ſon of king Edward IV. who was in her right viſcount Liſle; and Frances, one of the daughters and coheirs of the ſaid viſcount Liſle, was married to ſir Thomas Monk, great-grandfather to the preſent duke of Albemarle. king's revenue. In this work they ſhewed an equal regard for maintaining the liberties of the nation and ſupporting the dignity of the crown.

The tenures of wards and liveries had long been conſidered as a public grievance. During the reign of James ſeveral attempts had been made to purchaſe this prerogative from the crown. In the time of the commonwealth, wardſhips and liveries had been utterly aboliſhed: and even in the preſent parliament, before the king's reſtoration, a bill had been introduced, offering him an equivalent for theſe revenues. An hundred thouſand pounds a year was the ſum which the parliament propoſed; and the king, ſenſible that theſe imports did not yield ſo much profit, readily accepted the offer. Half of the exciſe was granted in perpetuity to the crown as the fund for producing that revenue. Tonnage and poundage, and the other half of exciſe, were ſettled upon the king during life. The parliament went ſo far as to vote that the yearly revenue of the crown, for all charges, ſhould amount to twelve hundred thouſand pounds; a ſum greater than any Engliſh monarch had ever before enjoyed. This revenue, however, was only voted: no funds were appointed, which would furniſh above two thirds of that ſum: the fulfilment of theſe engagements was left to the future conſideration of parliament.

To diſband the forces, ſo formidable by their numbers and valour, and ſo much accuſtomed to violence and outrage, was abſolutely neceſſary for the public tranquility; and, in order to enable his majeſty to effect that purpoſe, an aſſeſſment was impoſed of ſeventy thouſand pounds a month. Having taken theſe ſteps towards compleating the ſettlement of the nation, the parliament thought proper to adjourn on the thirteenth of September, to the ſixth of November following*.

In the midſt of the joy for the Reſtoration, the king and the kingdom met with a ſenſible loſs in the death of Henry, duke of Gloceſter, his majeſty's younger brother, which happened on the thirteenth of September, in the twenty-firſt year of his age. The king was never ſo deeply afflicted by any incident of his life: Gloceſter was a young prince of many amiable qualities, had a clear judgment and a quick perception, and was warmly attached to the religion and conſtitution of his country; a quality in which his two brothers, the king and the duke of York, were unhappily very deficient.

The hierarchy, which had ſuffered the ſame fate with the monarchy, was now to be reſtored with it. His majeſty judging the form of church-government which had been eſtabliſhed in England, from the time of the Reformation until the late troubles, to be the moſt ancient and decent way of worſhip and diſcipline, and tending to uniformity in religion, made it one of his firſt buſineſſes to reſtore the late extruded epiſcopacy to the dignity and authority they formerly exerciſed in the church of England; to which end he ſpeedily proceeded to the nomination of ſuch perſons as were moſt eminent for their piety and learning, for ſupplying thoſe ſees which were become vacant ſince the firſt time of the abrogation of their power. Reynolds, Calamy, Baxter, Moreton, Bates, and Bowles, all eminent preſbyterian miniſters, were offered biſhoprics and deaneries, though none accepted but Reynolds, who was made biſhop of Norwich.

In October the princeſs dowager of Orange came over to England, to congratulate the king her brother on his reſtoration; and the queen-mother arrived in the following month, bringing with her the princeſs Henrietta, her youngeſt daughter, who, by the king her brother's conſent, was married to the duke of Orleans. The princeſs of Orange had been but about two months in England, when ſhe was taken ill of the ſmall-pox, and died on the twenty-fourth of December, leaving only one ſon, William, prince of Orange, about ten years old, who was afterwards king of England by the name of William III.

The king now thought it high time to ſettle the peace of Scotland as well as that of his other dominions; and in order thereunto he ſummoned a parliament to meet at Edinburgh on December 12, and, by his proclamation in that kingdom, ſignified to all, that he relied ſo much on the loyalty, prudence, and care of his parliament, as abſolutely to commit to them the trying and judging the conduct of his ſubjects during the late troubles, concerning which he declared himſelf ready to receive addreſſes and informations from his parliament or committee of ſtate in Scotland, and no others; at the ſame time he aſſured them in the ſtrongeſt terms, that he deſired nothing ſo much as that his people ſhould be ſettled in happineſs, peace, and plenty, under his government; and that his own honour and the ancient prerogatives of the crown being vindicated, he purpoſed to grant a full and free pardon, by an act of indemnity.

For the government of Ireland, he made ſir Maurice Euſtace Kerl lord-chancellor, Roger, earl of Orrery, lord-preſident of Munſter, and Charles Coote, earl of Montrath, lord preſident of Connaught, lords high-juſtices of that kingdom, who governed affairs there with great credit and moderation.

* Upon this occaſion his majeſty gave the royal aſſent to fourteen private and eight public acts; among the latter was the famous Act of Navigation, entitled, "An act for encouraging ſhipping and navigation, wherein it is enacted, that, from the firſt of September, 1660, no commodities ſhall be imported or exported out of any lands, iſlands, plantations, or territories, belonging unto, or which may belong to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, in Aſia, Africa, or America, in any other veſſel but ſuch as ſhall belong unto the people of England, Ireland, Wales, or Berwick, or are of them built, or do belong to them as the right owners, and whereof the maſter and three fourths of the mariners are Engliſh; and under penalty of all the goods imported or exported in other veſſels, with all their guns, furniture, tackle, ammunition, and apparel, one third to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors; one third to the governor of ſuch lands, iſlands, plantations, or territories, in caſe the ſhip or goods be there ſeized; and the other third part to him that ſhall ſeize, inform, or ſue for the ſame, in any court of record, by bill, information, plaint, or action, wherein no eſſoign, protection, or wager of law ſhall be allowed. And all captains or commanders at ſea, by commiſſion from the king, or his ſucceſſors, are required to bring in all ſhips or veſſels ſo offending, and deliver them into the court of admiralty, there to be proceeded againſt; and in caſe of condemnation, one moiety is to be divided to the uſe of the admiral and commander, and their companies, according to the rules in caſe of a prize; and the other to the king and his ſucceſſors. With many other clauſes and proviſoes, tending much to the advancement of the Engliſh manufacture.

After

After an interval of near two months, the parliament re-aſſembled, and reſumed the conſideration of public affairs. They eſtabliſhed the poſt-office, wine-licences, and other branches of the revenue; they continued the aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds per month, for paying the arrears of the army. Buſineſs being conducted with great unanimity, as ſoon as finiſhed, and after a ſeſſion of near ten months, the king, in a ſpeech full of the moſt gracious expreſſions, thought proper to diſſolve them on the twenty-ninth of December.

The confidence the people had in the king, from the extraordinary good opinion they had been prepoſſeſſed with in his favour, and their tranſports of joy at being delivered from the late confuſions and diſtractions by means of his reſtoration, will account for the exceſſive complaiſance that was ſhewn to the court, at the beginning of this great event, ſo that the parliament could ſcarce deny the king any thing: we wiſh that a regard to truth would permit us to conceal, that the ill uſe made of this confidence was the great cauſe of the oppoſition that was afterwards made to the court.

Sir Edward Hyde, whom the king had lately created earl of Clarendon, was generally conſidered as his majeſty's chief counſellor; and ſo long as the advice of that able ſtateſman was followed, the conduct of Charles, in moſt reſpects, may be ſaid to be unexceptionable. He now applied himſelf to the paying and diſbanding the army. When he reviewed theſe veteran troops, he was charmed with their beauty, order, diſcipline, and martial appearance; and thinking, as was too natural, that regular forces were a neceſſary implement of royalty, he expreſſed a deſire of ſtill retaining them in his ſervice. But the chancellor ſet before him the dangerous conſequences of ſuch a meaſure. All the forces, therefore, were immediately diſbanded, except a few guards and garriſons, amounting to a thouſand foot. This was the firſt appearance, under the monarchy, of a regular ſtanding army in England. The fortifications of Glouceſter, Taunton, and ſome other towns, which had oppoſed the king during the civil wars, were likewiſe diminiſhed.

Clarendon was now cloſely connected with the royal family. His daughter Anne Hyde, a woman of great beauty and ſpirit, had hearkened, while abroad, to the addreſſes of the duke of York, and, under promiſe of marriage, had indulged him in the privileges of a huſband. Her pregnancy appeared ſoon after the Reſtoration; and though the duke ſeemed unwilling to contract ſo unequal an alliance, the king, in pity to his friend and miniſter, who had been totally unacquainted with theſe engagements, compelled his brother to eſpouſe her. Clarendon expreſſed great uneaſineſs at the honour which had been beſtowed upon him; and frequently ſaid, that, by being raiſed ſo much above his rank, he thence apprehended a more terrible downfall*.

Of all the manifold ſects and ſeparations that ſprung up from the licentiouſneſs and anarchy that prevailed during the late civil war, there were ſcarce any that dreaded not the name of monarchy, as apprehending the conſequence thereof to tend to uniformity in church and ſtate. It is not therefore to be wondered at, that they who had ſet themſelves up as profeſſed enemies to the king and his right of government, ſhould, after his coming in, be agitated with a reſtleſs ſpirit of impatience and diſaffection, which was ever and anon breaking forth in ſuch attempts as, had not a timely ſtop been put to them, by the prudent and vigilant care of his majeſty and his council, might have embroiled the nation in a new civil war. The firſt alarm was given by the fifth-monarchy-men, a ſet of people, however ſo called, the moſt inveterate enemies to the ancient ſettled monarchy of the nation, of all the whole Hydra. Of theſe, about fifty or ſixty wretches broke forth into open hoſtility, under the conduct of one Thomas Venner, a cooper, a frantic enthuſiaſt, who had often attempted the life of Cromwell. That which firſt gave him and his followers a pretence for their treaſon, was the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, which they loudly exclaimed againſt, as alſo againſt all oaths in general. The madneſs of theſe men went ſo far as to expect the perſonal reign of Chriſt upon earth; they believed that they and the reſt of their ſect were called by God to reform the world, and make all the earthly powers (which they termed Babylon) ſubſervient to the kingdom of king Jeſus; and in order thereunto they were never to ſheathe the ſword till the carnal powers of the world became a hiſſing and a curſe; and in the frenzy of their zeal they taught and believed, that one of them was alone ſufficient to ſubdue ten thouſand of their adverſaries; and had very gravely planned, after having led captivity captive in England, to march into France, Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world, there to proſecute their holy deſign.

On Sunday the ſixth of January, 1661, they ſallied forth, in number about ſixty perſons, completely armed, from their meeting in Coleman-ſtreet, and firſt marched to St. Thomas Apoſtle's, to call ſome of their party, and from thence to Biſhopſgate, and afterwards to White-croſs-ſtreet.

Sir Richard Brown, the lord-mayor, having notice of their being abroad, got together ſome files of the trained-bands, but not ſufficient, as was ſuppoſed, to make any impreſſion upon them, they being imagined more numerous than they were; by which means they eſcaped to St. John's Wood, and from thence to Cane Wood, between Highgate and Hampſtead.

By this time the alarm being come to Whitehall, and the general's regiment drawn up, the duke of York and he, with the earl of Oxford and ſome others, and a detachment of the guards, marched into London, where they were informed the rebels were diſperſed, except a party that was ſeen to go towards Cane Wood, whither ſir Thomas Sandys was ſent, with a party of the guards and a company of foot; but, by the darkneſs of the night, they got away: and on the Wedneſday morning came again into the city, and divided themſelves into two parties, one whereof, about five or ſix in the morning, appeared about Leadenhall, and from thence marched to Little Eaſtcheap, where they fought obſtinately enough, but were diſperſed by the trained bands. Venner and another party came to my lord mayor's houſe, thinking to have taken him priſoner; but miſſing him, they marched into Woodſtreet, where they were met by colonel Cor-bet, and about twenty horſe. Corbet and nine of his party charged through the rebels and broke them, whereby the trained band foot had little more to do than to purſue them. They fought with courage to admiration; and if they had not been hindered by the care of the lord-mayor from increaſing their numbers, a thouſand men ſo reſolved might have cauſed ſuch a diſturbance in the city, as might have had an influence much further. Venner himſelf was very much wounded before he was taken, and about five or ſix killed that refuſed quarter; of which ſome of them were ſo obſcure, that their names were not known: and about eight or ten days after, Venner, with about ſixteen or ſeventeen of the moſt notorious, were arraigned at Juſtice-hall in the Old Bailey, found guilty, and executed in ſeveral parts of London. This inſurrection ſerved as an handle to the court to ſuppreſs the preſbyterians, and all other ſects, who were begun to be confounded under the general name of Diſſenters and Nonconformiſts.

Meaſures had been taken laſt year to ſuppreſs the kirk party in Scotland, and this year epiſcopacy was reſtored in that kingdom, and the parliament there, wholly devoted to the court, abrogated the ſolemn league and covenant, the idol of the majority of the Scottiſh nation, and made ſeveral acts in favour of the king's prerogative, and againſt the preſbyterians. Sharpe, who was deputed by that body to manage their affairs in England, was perſuaded to abandon their party; and as a reward for his compliance, was created archbiſhop of St. Andrews. The conduct of eccleſiaſtical affairs was committed to him; and as he was eſteemed a traitor and apoſtate by his old friends, he became on that account, as well as from the violence of his meaſures, extremely odious to the nation. As Charles, in his declaration from Breda, had not come under any engagements to the Scots, he reſolved, very ungenerouſly, to take advantage of that circumſtance, and to wreak his vengeance on ſome of thoſe whom he ſuppoſed to be the principal authors of the late commotions. The marquis of Argyle, and one Guthrie, a miniſter, were the unhappy victims.

The preſbyterians, finding themſelves confounded with other ſectaries whom they mortally hated, deſired a conference with ſome of the epiſcopal perſuaſion, in order, if poſſible, to effect a thorough accommodation. A conference was accordingly opened on March 25, 1661, in the Savoy, between twelve biſhops, and as many leaders among the preſbyterians; and great hopes were entertained, that ſome ſcheme might be deviſed which would finally give contentment to both parties; but this conference had the fate uſual with moſt conferences of the like nature: it came to nothing, both parties being too rigidly tenacious of their own way and opinions not to ſay that the party, which ſoever it be, that is uppermoſt, has ſeldom a ſincere deſire of a coalition.

On the 23d of April, being St. George's day, the ceremony of his majeſty's coronation was performed with great ſolemnity in Weſtminſter-abbey; on which occaſion he created ſixty eight knights of the Bath, ſix earls, and as many barons.

Writs had been iſſued for a new parliament to meet on the 8th of May, and the court had influenced the elections ſo ſucceſsfully, that the majority of the members returned were ſtrongly attached to the hierarchy and the royal prerogative. The king, in his firſt ſpeech to both houſes, recommended two bills for confirming the act of indemnity, and made them acquainted with his intention to eſpouſe Donna Catharina, Infanta of Portugal, a match already concluded with the advice of his council.

The commons having choſen Sir Edward Turner, ſolicitor to the duke of York, ſpeaker, immediately proceeded to buſineſs. They paſſed an act for ſecurity of the king's perſon and government: 1. Making it treaſon during the life of his preſent majeſty, to intend or deviſe the king's impriſonment, bodily harm, or dethronement, or to make war againſt him. 2. To call him a papiſt or heretic, or to endeavour by ſpeech or writing to deprive him of the affection of his ſubjects, was declared to incapacitate the perſon ſo offending, from enjoying any employment in church or ſtate. 3. To maintain the indiſſoluble authority of the long parliament, or to affirm that either or both houſes, without the king, are poſſeſſed of a legiſlative power, or that the covenant is obligatory, ſubjected the offender to the penalty of a premunire. The covenant itſelf, together with the act for erecting the high court of juſtice that ſat on the late king and his friends; as alſo that for ſigning the engagement, and that for converting England into a commonwealth, were ordered to be burnt by the hands of the hangman. The cuſtom of petitioning having been ſo much abuſed in the courſe of the former reign, it was now decreed that no more than twenty hands ſhould be ſubſcribed to any petition, without the authority of three juſtices, or the majority of the grand jury; and that no petition ſhould be preſented to the king, or either houſe, by above twenty perſons. The violation of this law ſubjected the delinquent to a fine of an hundred pounds, and three months impriſonment.

On July 30, the king gave his aſſent to the above bills, as alſo to an act for reſtoring the biſhops to their ſeats in the houſe of peers; and to another, declaring the ſole right of the militia to be veſted in the king; and then his majeſty permitted the two houſes to adjourn to the 20th of November, after they had thus reſtored monarchy and epiſcopacy to their full ſplendor, which were now exalted to as great an height as they had ever before aſpired. This parliament was afterwards called the "penſionary parliament," becauſe it was known that many of the members had penſions from the king. How agreeable the proceedings of the parliament were to the court, appears by its long continuance, which was almoſt eighteen years.

The two houſes meeting according to their adjournment, on the 20th of November, petitioned the king to iſſue a proclamation, commanding all reduced officers and ſoldiers to retire to the diſtance of twenty miles from London; then the commons voted 1,200,000 l. for his majeſty's preſent occaſions.

Charles, though perfectly indifferent to all forms of religion, had been ſo rudely treated by the Scottiſh eccleſiaſtics, that he ever after entertained a violent prejudice againſt thoſe of their character and opinions. He was often heard to ſay, that preſbyterianiſm was not a religion fit for a gentleman. Not only the king, but the members of both both houſes, and eſpecially the earl of Clarendon, hated the preſbyterians, and wanted an opportunity to humble them, under the general term of nonconformiſts. With this view the earl of Clarendon, in a conference between the two houſes, poſitively affirmed that a conſpiracy had been formed ſince the month of March, to interrupt the peace of the nation. He named ſeveral perſons concerned in the plot, the particular circumſtances of which he explained; and ſaid, that although it had been defeated at London by the precaution taken with regard to the diſbanded officers and ſoldiers, it would nevertheleſs be proſecuted in different counties of England. The two houſes immediately appointed a committee to enquire into the affair, that meaſures might be taken to ſecure the peace of the kingdom. This pretended diſcovery was the foundation of the corporation act, which was now paſſed in parliament, ordaining all mayors, aldermen, counſellors, or officers of all corporations, to take an oath, importing, that they did not think it as lawful, on any pretence whatever, to take arms againſt the king; and that they abhorred the deteſtable maxim of arming againſt the king's perſon, under ſhadow of his authority, or even by oppoſing ſuch as acted by virtue of his commiſſion. This was a moſt ſcandalous conceſſion, by which the liberties of England were left at the mercy of regal power. The committee of both houſes proceeded on their enquiry into the nature of the conſpiracy, and the earl of Clarendon made an alarming report of a deſign to ſurprize Shrewſbury, Coventry, and Briſtol. But this plot ſeems to have been no other than a fiction of the miniſtry to pave the way for the act of uniformity; for that was no ſooner paſſed than the inquiry was laid aſide.

Elizabeth, electreſs-palatine, and queen of Bohemia, the king's aunt, and daughter of king James I. who reſided in England, died at London on the 13th of February, 1661-2. She had eight ſons and five daughters, of whom the youngeſt ſurviving, the princeſs Sophia, mother of king George I. was declared heir to the crown of Great Britain in 1701.

On the ſeventeenth of May, 1662, the king gave his aſſent to the act for eſtabliſhing uniformity in the public worſhip, and in the adminiſtration of ſacraments. By this ſtatute, which began to be in force on St. Bartholomew's day, every miniſter was obliged to conform to the worſhip of the Engliſh church, according to the book of Common-prayer, lately reviſed, and to ſign a declaration approving of that ritual, to take the oath of canonical obedience, abjure the ſolemn league and covenant, and acknowlege his deteſtation of the principle of taking up arms againſt the king, or thoſe acting under his commiſſion, on any pretence whatſoever. He was likewiſe reſtrained from adminiſtering the ſacraments, unleſs he had been previouſly ordained by the biſhop. By an act regulating the militia, all lords-lieutenants of counties, and their deputies, together with officers and ſoldiers, were obliged to declare upon oath, that they held it unlawful to take arms againſt the king, and thoſe acting by his commiſſion. As another inſtance of the parliament's devotion to the king, the commons voted an annual tax of two ſhillings upon every hearth to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors. This impoſition, joined to the tonnage and poundage, the exciſe, and duty upon merchandize, augmented his revenue to a much greater ſum than had ever been paid to any of his predeceſſors.

In conſequence of the act of uniformity, about two thouſand miniſters, moſtly preſbyterians, but ſome of other parties, for refuſing to conform to the ſaid act, were obliged to quit their livings in the church. Theſe and ſome other acts being paſſed, the parliament was prorogued to February 13, 1662-3.

Before the end of the ſeſſion, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catherine of Portugal, to whom the king was affianced, and who landed in the beginning of May at Portſmouth, where the king met her, and the marriage was ſolemnized. The queen-mother, who left England the year before, now came over to aſſiſt at the nuptial ceremonies, and after a ſtay of three years in England, returned again to France.

Charles's prodigality always kept him in want, notwithſtanding the ſupplies granted him far exceeded any thing that had been given by parliament to queen Elizabeth. His neceſſities put him upon a meaſure which has expoſed him to much cenſure, and is regarded as one of the greateſt blemiſhes of his reign, I mean the ſale of Dunkirk to the French. Clarendon and Southampton, tho' virtuous miniſters, were both concerned in this tranſaction; but in all probability the expedient was propoſed by Charles himſelf. The chancellor invited d'Eſtrades, the French miniſter at the Hague, to come over to London, which he did ſoon after the king's marriage, and negotiated his affairs; and the French king purchaſed Dunkirk, with all the artillery and ammunition in the place, for the conſideration of five millions of livres, or four hundred thouſand pounds ſterling.

We have already obſerved that Charles, during his exile, eſpecially while at the court of France, had been prevailed on to adopt the religion of the church of Rome, at leaſt in ſuch a degree as a man of his latitudinarian principles can be ſaid to adopt any religion: his brother the duke of York, of whom he was extremely fond, and who indeed directed almoſt all his actions, was an abſolute bigot in popery, and as ſuch could not fail to be alarmed at the late act of uniformity, which, though deſigned by the court to perſecute the preſbyterians, was found to bear equally hard upon every diſſenter from the church of England. James and his party therefore exerted all their endeavours to weaken the force of this act. It was now pretended that great danger was to be apprehended to the ſtate, from ſo numerous a body as the diſſenters connected together; and that there was a neceſſity of granting toleration to all nonconformiſts, in which the papiſts were conſequently to be included. The king readily adopted his brother's views, and in the month of January 1662-3, publiſhed a declaration under pretence of favouring the preſbyterians, by diſpenſing with their compliance with ſome articles in the act of Uniformity: but though in this declaration the king alledged in excuſe his ſolemn promiſes (in his declaration from Breda) of granting toleration to his ſubjects, and advanced ſeveral other ſpecious topics, the parliament, who ſtrongly ſuſpected that he had another, and a deeper deſign in view, determined to defeat the meaſure.

The avowed design of gratifying the dissenters, and the secret resolution of supporting the catholics, were equally disagreeable to them; and in these sentiments they were confirmed by the lord-chancellor Clarendon, without whose privity and concurrence this declaration had been issued, and who, as he hated the presbyterians, was no friend to the papists, and therefore from this time began to sink in his credit at court.

The parliament assembling on February 18, drew up a remonstrance against the late declaration of indulgence, which they presented to his majesty, and both houses joined in desiring him to issue out a proclamation against all popish priests and jesuits. To this request the king returned a very obliging answer; but in the proclamation afterwards issued, the terms were so artfully couched, as to render it of little or no effect *. This seeming compliance of the king, however deceitful, passed so well with the parliament, that upon his application they voted him a supply of four subsidies, and this was the last time that taxes were raised in this manner.

The opposition the lord-chancellor had made to the plan of toleration, had exposed him to all the hatred of the duke of York and the popish party, and all means were devised to get rid of him. Digby, earl of Bristol, who had, during his residence abroad, embraced the catholic religion; and as most converts are, was a great bigot to his new faith, undertook to attack this enemy of the holy mother-church. Clarendon and he had, during the exclusion of the royal party, been upon terms of intimate friendship; but the chancellor having refused his assent to certain grants which Bristol had sollicited for a court lady; this affront, as it was deemed by the latter nobleman, added to the motives of religion above-mentioned, determined him to attack the minister in the most violent manner; and on the tenth of July, 1663, he openly impeached him of high-treason before the house of peers; but the apparent malice of the charge, from the almost total deficiency of proofs to support it, occasioned the lords to throw it out with indignation; and Bristol himself was so ashamed of what he had done, that he went abroad, where he remained for some time. On the twenty-seventh of July, the parliament, after having settled the revenues of the post-office and wine-licence on the duke of York, was prorogued to the following spring †.

Gratitude was not one of Charles's shining virtues. The royalists, who had ventured so much, and suffered so deeply in his service, were after his restoration wholly neglected by him. When applications were made to him on this head, he used to answer, that those who were truly his friends would still remain so; and that if he was to bestow favour, it should be on his enemies, in order to win them over to his service. His parliament had more generosity. They took some notice of the poor cavaliers, and at one time distributed among them about sixty thousand pounds. Mrs. Lane likewise and the Pendrells had handsome presents and pensions assigned them for the great service they had been of, in preserving the king's person after the battle of Worcester.

Ever since the Restoration, the government had at different times been alarmed with the rumour of plots carrying on by the republicans; and this year one was discovered, which was said to be for a general insurrection; it was an idle scheme of some inconsiderable fanatics and disbanded soldiers, thirty of whom were taken and executed. It served Charles, however, as a pretext to demand of the parliament, when it next met again on the sixteenth of March, 1664, a repeal of the act for triennial parliaments, affirming that the kingdom was exposed to continual troubles, from the suggestions of a set of men, who gave out that this parliament was dissolved by virtue of that act. The parliament, who still continued to adhere to the principles of exalting monarchy, even beyond the bounds of reason and moderation, readily complied with the royal request. The act was repealed, and thus all the securities which the subject had against the illegal extension of court influence, were dissipated by a breath; and Charles failed not to make his own advantage of these concessions to shorten difficulties, and baffle opposition.

This parliament was not more servile in its compliance with the king, than it was rigorous and uncharitable with regard to its fellow-subjects; the true spirit of persecution seemed to actuate all its deliberations in religious matters; it seemed to forget that the like rigid maxims of intolerance adopted by Laud, had been one cause of the dreadful calamities from which the nation had been so lately delivered; for now, as if the penalties denounced in the act of Uniformity against dissenters of all denominations, were not sufficient, in May 1664, the famous Conventicle Act was passed, whereby it was enacted, that if any one should repair to conventicles (as the meetings of the nonconformists to religious worship were called) the first offence was to be punished with a fine of five pounds, or three months imprisonment, and ten pounds for a peer; the second offence ten pounds and six months imprisonment, and twenty pounds for a peer: but for the third offence, after a trial by a jury of the peers, according to the quality of the offender, the party convicted was to be transported to some foreign plantation, unless he commuted by the payment of one hundred pounds.

There was about this time a dispute between our court and the states of the United Provinces, in relation to commerce; and the royal African company in particular had been opposed by the Dutch, in establishing their settlements on the coast of Guinea. In the preceding year, sir Robert Holmes had been sent from England with a fleet of twenty-two ships to the coast of Africa, to protect our merchants and traders there, and expel the Dutch from some places they had seized

* The parliament had agreed, that all foreign priests belonging to the two queens should be excepted, and allowed without molestation to continue in England. In the proclamation, the word "foreign" was purposely left out; and the queens were, by that means, intitled to grant protection to as many English priests as they pleased. Burnet. Hume.

† In the course of this session, several laws were enacted relating to trade. Some rules were likewise established for putting the militia into better order; and it was decreed, that the king should not have the power of keeping them under arms above fourteen days in the year. See stat. 15 & 16 Car. II.

againſt the faith of treaties. Holmes executed his commiſſion with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs, after taking from the Dutch Cape Verd and the iſland of Goree, together with ſeveral of their trading ſhips on that coaſt; and ſailing to America, he made himſelf maſter of Nova Belgia, ſince known by the name of New-York, which had never been occupied by any but the Hollanders. The Dutch warmly remonſtrated againſt theſe hoſtilities, but receiving no real ſatisfaction, they reſolved to employ force againſt force, and diſpatched de Ruyter, one of their admirals, to the coaſt of Guinea, who in a ſhort time re-eſtabliſhed the Dutch in poſſeſſion of thoſe ſettlements of which they had been deprived, except Cape Corſe. He afterwards attacked Barbadoes, but without ſucceſs. Theſe acts, which were ſo many preludes to a rupture between the two nations, were by no means diſpleaſing to Charles, whoſe growing neceſſities, the natural conſequences of a blind prodigality, made him glad of any pretext to draw money from his parliament. The diſpoſition of this latter, indeed, was as favourable to this deſign as the king could wiſh; for the commons having taken the ſtate of the national trade into conſideration, they voted, "That the wrongs, diſhonours, and indignities offered to the Engliſh by the ſubjects of the United Provinces, had greatly interrupted the commerce of theſe kingdoms: that his majeſty ſhould be humbly requeſted to demand and obtain reparation for thoſe damages; and that in the proſecution of this affair, the houſe would aſſiſt him with their lives and fortunes againſt all oppoſitions whatſoever." This vote was deemed a ſufficient ſanction for thoſe vigorous meaſures which the court had now propoſed to adopt, and the parliament was prorogued till the month of November.

In the mean time, the naval preparations were carried on with uncommon diligence: the whole nation ſeemed to be inſpired with jealouſy and animoſity againſt the Dutch. The parliament having as yet granted no ſupplies, the city of London lent the king one hundred thouſand pounds, that no ſtop might be made to the armament. Charles himſelf viſited the arſenals and magazines in perſon, and in a ſhort time the Engliſh navy was put in a very formidable condition. Admiral Lawſon was ſent out in September, with orders to ſeize all Dutch ſhips he met with on his cruize; in which he had ſo much ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time one hundred and thirty-five of their merchant ſhips fell into the hands of the Engliſh: and the parliament meeting again on the twenty-fourth of November, granted two millions five hundred thouſand pounds for carrying on the intended war, the largeſt ſupply by far that had been granted to any Engliſh monarch *.

The king having had his hands thus ſtrengthened by his parliament, declared war againſt the States in the month of March, 1665, after having prorogued the parliament to Auguſt, and afterwards to October. In this ſeſſion the clergy gave up their right of taxing themſelves in convocation, and have ever ſince been taxed by the parliament in common with other ſubjects: from this time, indeed, the clergy had votes at elections for members of parliament, but, by parting with their importance as a diſtinct body of the ſtate, they have been held in very little public conſideration ſince.

The Dutch, alarmed at the great preparations making in England againſt them, had, towards the cloſe of the laſt year, ſent over an embaſſy, to endeavour if poſſible to compromiſe the quarrel in an amicable manner; but ſeeing all their application ſlighted, they ſet about all the neceſſary preparations for a vigorous defence: in the mean time they earneſtly importuned Lewis XIV. of France, who being then of age, and having taken the reins of government into his own hands, began to be conſidered as a warlike and politic prince, to declare againſt England, in conſequence of the laſt treaty concluded between the crown of France and the States General. Lewis was at the ſame time as warmly preſſed by Charles to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. In this conjuncture the French monarch was greatly divided in his ſentiments: he wiſhed to keep fair with Charles, leſt the latter ſhould throw himſelf into the arms of Spain; and on the other hand, it was his intereſt to ſupport the de Wit and Louveſtein party in Holland, againſt the prince of Orange, who naturally claimed the aſſiſtance of his uncle the king of England: in order to gain time, he ſent the duke de Verneuil at the head of a ſplendid embaſſy to London, with offers of mediating a peace between England and Holland; but, after a ſtay of ſeveral months, that nobleman's endeavours proved fruitleſs.

The man who at this time directed all the meaſures of the Dutch republic, and infuſed ſpirit into that phlegmatic community, was the famous John de Wit, a miniſter equally diſtinguiſhed for greatneſs of mind, for extent of capacity, and for integrity of manners: though modeſt in his private behaviour, he well knew how to ſupport in his public conduct that magnanimity which becomes the miniſter of a great ſtate. It was always his opinion, that no independent government ſhould ever make any mean or unreaſonable conceſſions to another; and that all ſuch compliances, inſtead of preventing war, ſerved only to invite farther inſults and indignities. By his management a ſpirit of harmony was preſerved in all the provinces; great ſums were raiſed, and a navy was prepared, conſiſting of larger ſhips than any which the Dutch had ever built before, and able to contend with the fleet of England *.

The Engliſh navy was already on ſo reſpectable a footing, that, by the eighteenth of May this year, the duke of York ſet ſail with a fleet of one hundred and fourteen ſail, excluſive of fire-ſhips and bomb-ketches, having under him prince Rupert and the gallant earl of Sandwich: this noble armament carried on board about twenty-two thouſand men. On the other hand, the provinces of Zealand and Holland having joined their ſquadrons, they compoſed a fleet of one hundred and twenty ſhips of war, beſides fire-ſhips, of which the command was given to Opdam, an experienced ſea-officer, and of an undaunted courage, who had orders to ſeize the firſt opportunity of giving battle to the enemy.

It was not long before the two fleets met, and on the third of June a remarkable engagement was fought between them, when the Dutch were beaten, having

having loſt a great many of their ſhips, though the number is variouſly related; according to the loweſt account they were about twenty: Opdam himſelf was blown up, together with his ſhip and all the men on board. The Engliſh loſt but four ſhips; but ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were killed. A day of thankſgiving was appointed in England for this victory, and ſeveral medals were ſtruck in honour of the duke of York: it is indeed confeſſed on all hands, that the duke diſplayed great courage and conduct during the whole engagement, being all the time engaged in the hotteſt of the fight, and expoſing himſelf like a common man.

Terror and diſmay ſeized on the Dutch, when they received the news of this defeat; and it required all the abilities and conſtancy of de Wit to revive the ſpirits of his drooping countrymen: he repaired in perſon on board their fleet, and quickly rectified all the diſorders occaſioned by the late misfortune. In the mean time the Dutch fleet of merchant ſhips from Turkey and the Eaſt Indies, having ſailed north-about in order to avoid the Engliſh cruiſers, anchored in the port of Bergen, in Norway, where they lay till de Ruyter ſhould come and convoy them to Holland. Sir Gilbert Talbot, the Engliſh envoy at Copenhagen, propoſed to the king of Denmark, that he ſhould ſeize all thoſe ſhips, which were richly laden, by way of revenge upon the Dutch, who, he ſaid, had involved his Daniſh majeſty in a troubleſome war with Sweden. The king was tempted by the richneſs of the prize, but obſerved he was not in a condition to execute ſuch a deſign: Talbot promiſed to procure the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh fleet, provided he would recompenſe the captors with one half of what they ſhould take; the bargain was ſtruck between the two monarchs, and Charles ordered the earl of Sandwich to ſail immediately to Bergen. The earl detached ſir Thomas Tiddeman with part of the fleet on that ſervice, and he attacked the Dutch with great impetuoſity; but the governor of Bergen, who had not yet received orders to remain paſſive, joined the Hollanders in giving him ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to quit the enterprize, after having received conſiderable damage. Charles was not a little chagrined at this diſappointment; and ſo diſpleaſed with the earl of Sandwich for having omitted to ſail thither in perſon, that he was deprived of his command, and ſent on an embaſſy to Madrid.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting abroad, the city of London was groaning beneath the moſt dreadful ſcourge of the plague, which broke out in the beginning of May this year, and in the ſpace of eleven months that it continued to rage, ſwept away in that ſingle city upwards of one hundred thouſand ſouls: the king, on its firſt appearance, withdrew to Hampton-court, but afterwards, to be at a greater diſtance, removed to Saliſbury.

The parliament, agreeable to its prorogation, aſſembled on the ninth of October, but held its ſeſſions at Oxford, on account of the plague, which, though it ſtill continued to depopulate the capital, did not ſo much affect the other part of the kingdom. The king having repreſented to them in his ſpeech, that the ſupply of two millions and an half, granted him towards the maintenance of the war, was nearly expended in fitting out the fleet, and paying ſome foreign powers, eſpecially the warlike biſhop of Munſter (Bernard Van Galen) for making a diverſion upon the frontiers of the ſtates; the commons, who appear to have been very zealous for the vigorous continuation of the war, quickly voted a ſecond ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds for that purpoſe, and at the ſame time made a preſent to the duke of York of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, as a reward for his eminent ſervices in the late ſea engagement with the Dutch. The independants, anabaptiſts, and republicans, had this year formed a deſign for an inſurrection, having been encouraged thereto by emiſſaries from the Dutch; but all their projects had proved abortive. However, this furniſhed the king and court, who naturally hated the preſbyterians, with a handle to bring them in under the general denomination of nonconformiſts, from whom the church and nation was repreſented to be in the utmoſt danger; tho' we cannot find any authority to charge the former with having been any way concerned in the practices or deſigns of the other fanatic ſects. Be that as it may, a bill was brought into the houſe this ſeſſions, and was paſſed without any difficulty; by which it was enacted, "That no nonconformiſt teacher, under what denomination ſoever, ſhall dwell or come, unleſs upon the road, within five miles of any corporation, or any other place where they had been miniſters, or had preached after the act of oblivion, unleſs they firſt took the following oath: "I do ſwear that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatſoever, to take arms againſt the king, and that I do abhor the traitorous poſition of taking arms againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him in purſuance of ſuch commiſſions: and that I will not at any time endeavour any alteration of government, either in church or ſtate."

This act has ſince been famous, under the name of The Five Mile Act; and the penalty denounced againſt every offender was forty pounds and ſix months impriſonment. It would not be doing juſtice to the character of the earl of Clarendon and his great friend the earl of Southampton, both of them the warmeſt adverſaries of the preſbyterians, if we did not obſerve, that the rigor of this act ſeemed ſo unjuſtifiable to them, that when it came into the houſe of lords, they oppoſed it with all their might. Nevertheleſs, it got through that houſe, and the king gave it the royal aſſent on the thirty-firſt of October, as he did at the ſame time to the money-bill, and ſome others; after which he prorogued the parliament to the twentieth of February, 1665-6.

This ſame year the council of Scotland diſcovered no leſs heat and animoſity againſt the preſbyterians, on pretence of ſome inſolence committed by a private miniſter, named Alexander Smith. A proclamation was publiſhed the twenty-fourth of December, ordering that all the ſilenced preſbyterian miniſters ſhould, within forty days, remove themſelves and their families from the places where they had been miniſters, and that they ſhould not reſide within twenty miles of the ſame, or within ſix miles of Edinburgh, or any cathedral church, or within three miles of any royal borough, nor ſhould be more than two together in the ſame pariſh, on pain of incurring the penalties of the law againſt movers of ſedition.. Every man of a charitable diſpoſition muſt confeſs, that this was a moſt cruel and unjuſtifiable rigor, eſpecially

when we reflect that the preſbyterians compoſed the bulk of the Scottiſh nation. The times were however now ſo thoroughly changed, that the very people who thought the ſhadow of royalty too great a conceſſion to grant their prince in the laſt reign, now thought no ſacrifice too great to be made to his will. The ill effects of ſuch a proceeding manifeſted themſelves ſhortly after, in an inſurrection of the ſufferers; but their numbers being inconſiderable (not exceeding fifteen hundred) they were ſoon defeated, three hundred being killed on the ſpot, and about one hundred taken priſoners, who were moſt of them executed.

By this time France had openly eſpouſed the cauſe of the Dutch, and reſolved to aſſiſt them with the utmoſt vigour. Lewis had ordered the duke of Beaufort, his admiral, to ſet ſail from Toulon with the French ſquadron, of above forty ſail, under his command. The ambaſſadors of France were recalled out of England; and on the nineteenth of January, 1665-6, Lewis publiſhed a declaration of war againſt us. The States likewiſe found means to gain over the king of Denmark, by an engagement to pay him yearly, during the continuance of the war, one million five hundred thouſand florins; for which he on his part engaged to keep a fleet of thirty ſail of ſhips of war for their ſervice. They likewiſe raiſed ſo many enemies againſt the biſhop of Munſter, that he quickly found himſelf under a neceſſity to diſband his forces, and make peace on the beſt terms he could obtain. The Dutch were wholly indebted for theſe favourable events to their penſionary de Wit, who diſcharged his truſt with equal care and ability. The utmoſt aſſiduity was employed in repairing their late loſs by ſea; and early in the ſpring the States had a well-manned fleet of ſeventy ſail ready for ſea. De Ruyter, their great admiral, returned from his expedition to Guinea, took the command of this fleet, and had under him, as ſecond in command, the famous Van Tromp.

The plague having ceaſed its ravages, Charles returned to London in the month of February, and immediately declared war againſt France. The command of the Engliſh fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy-four ſail, was given to Monk, duke of Albemarle, and prince Rupert, who put to ſea towards the end of May, 1666. Albemarle, who from the repeated defeats of the Dutch under the protectorſhip, had raſhly entertained too deſpicable an opinion of their courage, reſolved to detach prince Rupert, in order to intercept the French fleet, under the duke of Beaufort, who, it was ſaid, was now in the Channel, waiting to join the Dutch upon their putting to ſea, which they did: for after our fleet ſailed, thoſe who were acquainted with the courage and conduct of de Ruyter, remonſtrated againſt this diviſion of our force; but the duke of Albemarle continued obſtinate in his reſolution. The event ſhewed how unreaſonably he had given his orders.

The fleet of the States, commanded by de Ruyter, was come to an anchor between Newport and Dunkirk. Thither Albemarle, with thoſe ſhips he had retained with him, immediately ſailed, to compel the enemy to an action; who, on their ſide, upon his coming in ſight, cut their cables, to be in the greater readineſs to receive him. The battle which followed is one of the moſt remarkable that occurs in hiſtory, whether we conſider the length of its duration, or the obſtinacy with which it was fought. It would be equally tedious and unintereſting to relate every particular of this action, which began on the firſt of June, in the forenoon, and laſted, with very little intermiſſion, for four days, with aſtoniſhing valour on both ſides. In the courſe of the action, the Dutch were reinforced by ſixteen freſh ſhips. The Engliſh had ſuffered ſo ſeverely, that their fighting ſhips were reduced to twenty-eight, and they found it neceſſary to retire towards their own coaſts; which the Dutch perceiving, exerted all their efforts to cut off their retreat, and would probably have ſucceeded, had it not been for the fortunate junction of prince Rupert, who, after cruizing the Channel in vain in ſearch of the French ſquadron, who indeed had not yet entered it, now appeared in ſight to the ſouthward, advancing in full ſail towards the ſcene of action, and about the evening (of the third day) fell into his ſtation, aſtern the Dutch diviſion. The next morning Albemarle returned to the fight, which now became more furious than ever. Ship grappled ſhip, and the men fought hand to hand, as if on firm ground. A thick miſt at length put an end to the conflict; under the favour of which Albemarle with his fleet ſailed for the mouth of the Thames, leaving the watery field to de Ruyter and the Dutch.

In theſe four days of battle, the Engliſh loſt twenty-three capital ſhips, beſides ſeveral others of leſs note; ſix thouſand men killed, and two thouſand ſix hundred made priſoners. Amongſt the ſlain were ſir William Berkley, vice-admiral of the white ſquadron, and ſir Chriſtopher Mimins: ſir George Ayſcue, in a ſhip of an hundred guns, the largeſt in the fleet, ran aground; and his countrymen not being able to afford him any aſſiſtance, he was compelled to yield to the enemy. The loſs of the Dutch amounted to ſix ſhips, two thouſand eight hundred and eighty men, beſides the admirals Evertzen Van der Holſt, and Strekhoven, with ſome other officers. Though the Engliſh retired firſt to their harbours, and tho' it was generally believed by our officers and men who ſurvived, that their whole fleet might have been taken, ſunk, or burnt, if it had not been for prince Rupert's coming up as he did, yet we claimed the victory. The great penſionary de Wit was on board the Dutch fleet, and is ſaid to have invented chain-ſhot * on this occaſion, which did incredible damage to the rigging of our ſhips, and contributed not a little to the advantage the Dutch gained over us.

The two fleets were not long before they put to ſea again; for Beaufort, the French admiral, being now ready to enter the Channel, and join his allies, de Ruyter, after having refitted his ſhips, ſailed from the Texel, and poſted himſelf at the mouth of the river Thames, with a view to block up our fleet in the harbour. Such an inſult was not to be brooked by Engliſhmen; and therefore Albemarle and prince Rupert haſted out to attack him. The Engliſh fleet, now reinforced, conſiſted of an hundred ſail: that of the Hollanders amounted to eighty-eight ſhips of the line, beſides nineteen fire-ſhips. They met on the twenty-fourth of July, and the fight ſoon began with incredible fury, and was as obſtinately diſputed. At length the Dutch were beaten with conſiderable loſs; and it was chiefly by the bravery and conduct of de Ruyter that the Dutch were brought into their ports. De Ruyter, on his return to Holland, made great complaints of Van Tromp's conduct, who was thereupon put under arreſt, and diſmiſſed from his poſt. It ſeems he had attacked ſir Jeremy Smith, who commanded the blue ſquadron of the Engliſh fleet, and put that diviſion to rout; but purſuing the flying enemy too far, had never been able to rejoin his own fleet, and was very near being taken with all his ſhips.

Albemarle finding himſelf maſter of the ſea by the retreat of the Dutch fleet, detached admiral Holmes with twenty ſhips of war, to inſpect the coaſt of Holland; and that commander entering the road of Vlie, deſtroyed an hundred and forty merchant veſſels, and two ſhips of war; after which he burnt Briariſdon, a large and rich village on the coaſt. The French admiral, who was by this time in full ſail to join the Dutch upon the coaſt of England, received the news of its defeat, and that the ſhips were returned into port; whereupon he himſelf retired to Breſt with all expedition, having had the good fortune to eſcape the vigilance of the Engliſh, who waited for him off the Iſle of Wight. One French ſhip alone, the Ruby, was taken by our fleet.

On the ſecond of September this year, about one in the morning, a dreadful fire broke out in the city of London; it began in a baker's houſe near the bridge, and diffuſed itſelf on all ſides with ſuch rapidity, that nothing could reſiſt the progreſs of the flames. This dreadful conflagration laſted for three whole days; nor did it ſtop till it had laid the greateſt part of the capital in aſhes, conſuming eighty churches, ſeveral of the city gates, and four hundred ſtreets, containing thirteen thouſand two hundred dwelling-houſes. The ruins overſpread a ſpace of four hundred and twenty-ſix acres, from the Tower by Thames ſide to the Temple church, and from the north eaſt gate along the city-wall to Holborn-bridge; but though the fire was thus mercileſs to the eſtates and fortunes of the citizens, it was very favourable to their lives, few periſhing on this occaſion, in proportion to the extent of the calamity.

Various were the conjectures on the cauſe and authors of this fire, no one being inclined to think it caſual. Numbers would have it to be brought about by the malice of the Republicans; but moſt aſcribed it to the papiſts, according to the inſcription upon the famous Monument, erected in memory of this dreadful conflagration. Each of theſe ſuſpicions, however, ſeem to have had their riſe in the violent animoſities that poſſeſſed the minds of the different parties that ſwarmed at this period. Their poſterity, who behold this and other events of their time through the cooler medium of reaſon, ſee no cauſe to aſcribe this accident to treachery or malice. The ſtreets of London were then extremely narrow; the houſes were almoſt all built of timber, or of lath and plaiſter; the ſeaſon was remarkably dry; and a violent eaſt wind happened at that time to blow. To theſe cauſes, and to theſe only, the ſurprizing progreſs of the fire ought naturally to be aſcribed *.

But not all the miſeries his ſubjects had experienced from this dreadful accident and the preceding one of the plague, could make any impreſſion on the mind of Charles, or divert him from the proſecution of the ruinous war he had engaged in. Accordingly the parliament having reaſſembled, after ſome prorogations, on the firſt of September, the king, in a ſpeech to both houſes, magnified the happy ſucceſs of his arms, as if he had been always victorious; and concluded with aſſuring the commons, that the money granted for carrying on the war had proved deficient, and ſollicited a further ſupply. The commons ſtill retaining their liberal diſpoſition, freely voted him a ſupply of one million eight hundred thouſand pounds; which, together with what they had already given him, amounted to four millions four hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds. Nevertheleſs, the commons miſtruſting that the king was not ſo warmly attached to the proteſtant religion as they could wiſh, or he made profeſſions to be, preſented an addreſs, praying that the laws againſt jeſuits and popiſh prieſts might be put into execution, Charles, willing to ſhew them ſome complaiſance in return for having filled his coffers, cauſed a proclamation to be iſſued for baniſhing all popiſh prieſts and jeſuits out of the kingdom: but this proclamation, like thoſe of his father and grandfather on the ſame ſubject, was ſhamefully eluded by the connivance of the king and court. This conduct more than ever convinced the people that the king had ſome ſecret attachment to popery, which he was either aſhamed or afraid to own. Whether theſe ſuſpicions had leſſened the king's popularity, is uncertain; but it appears that the commons took very little notice about the diſpatch of the money-bill, which was not finiſhed till the cloſe of the year, notwithſtanding the king ſent ſeveral meſſages to the houſe to quicken the buſineſs.

At laſt, on the eighteenth of January, 1667, a bill paſſed both houſes for raiſing the above-mentioned ſum of one million eight hundred thouſand pounds, partly by a poll-tax, and partly by aſſeſſments; and about the middle of February, the king gave his aſſent to this and ſeveral other acts, promiſing at the ſame time that the money granted him ſhould be wholly applied to the uſe it was intended for; then he prorogued the parliament to the tenth of October. Among the acts paſſed in this ſeſſion, was one for rebuilding that part of the city demoliſhed by fire, which was finiſhed with more expedition than could be expected. The king, by a ſtretch of prerogative, regulated the plans of the new ſtreets, ſo as to render them more ſpacious and convenient than thoſe which had been burned; and he prohibited the uſe of lath and timber, as the materials for the conſtruction of houſes. In conſequence of this improvement, London became more healthy after the fire. The plague, which was wont to break out with great violence twice or thrice every century, and indeed was always lurking in ſome corner of the city, has entirely diſappeared ſince that calamity.

* Though ſeveral ſuſpected perſons were taken up on this account, it was never poſſible to diſcover or prove that the baker's houſe, where this dreadful calamity firſt broke out, was fired on purpoſe. Nevertheleſs, a French Huguenot, a native of Roan, and a lunatic, having owned himſelf guilty of this horrible action, was condemned and executed: but it appeared afterwards, by the teſtimony of the maſter of the ſhip who brought him out of France, that though he was landed at the time of the fire, yet he did not arrive in London till two days after it began. It is pretended likewiſe that a Dutch boy, ten years old, had confeſſed that his father and himſelf had thrown fire-balls into the baker's houſe, through a window that ſtood open. But beſides the objection that may be made to this teſtimony from the boy's age, there muſt have been ſome circumſtance in this narrative not agreeable to the fact, ſince it was never thought proper to make further enquiry. Rapin.

Charles, notwithſtanding the poſitive promiſes he had given on his part, no ſooner found himſelf ſure of a plentiful ſupply of money, than he became tired of the war, and bent his thoughts towards bringing about a peace. The Dutch had furniſhed him with a good pretence for this, by a letter which they had wrote him juſt before the breaking up of the parliament; to which he had returned no anſwer, as the money-bill was then depending; but that being now paſſed, Charles appeared more tractable. In fine, after ſeveral conſultations, a conference was appointed to be opened at Breda, on the tenth of May 1667, and the ſeveral powers concerned ſent thither their plenipotentiaries. Thoſe from England were the lord Holles, and Mr. Henry Coventry. From France, the count d'Eſtrades, and Mr. Courtin. From Denmark, Mr. Klengenberg and Caniſens; and from the States-General, Meſſieurs Beverrench, Hubert, and Yonſtall. From the king of Sweden came as mediators, meſſieurs Fleming and Coyet; but the laſt dying at Breda ſoon after his arrival, the count de Dohna, the Swediſh ambaſſador to the States, took his place. The conferences were however prolonged, by ſome punctilios which Charles inſiſted on, to ſave appearances with his people; becauſe, how trifling ſoever, they were almoſt the only things particularly alledged as the cauſe of the war. Holles and Coventry propoſed that a ceſſation of hoſtilities ſhould be immediately concluded, till the ſeveral points in diſpute could be happily concluded: but this propoſal was rejected by de Wit: that ſagacious and enterprizing miniſter had formed a reſolution of ſtriking a blow which he thought would have a greater effect in favour of his countrymen, than all the arguments that could be uſed in the congreſs.

Being well informed that Charles, depending upon the ſucceſs of the conference, and thinking that he had nothing to fear from the Dutch, had unmanned his fleet, and laid up all the large ſhips, in hopes of keeping to himſelf the greateſt part of the money granted him by his parliament; he ordered de Ruyter to ſail with a fleet of fifty ſhips, and ſurprize the Engliſh, lulled in their dangerous ſecurity. De Ruyter executed his commiſſion with equal conduct and ſucceſs. On the eighth of June he entered the mouth of the Thames, and filled the capital with terror and conſternation. He then diſpatched his vice-admiral, Van Ghent, with ſome ſhips into the river Medway, who, by the favour of a freſh eaſterly wind, broke the chain which defended the entrance of that harbour, and burnt three large ſhips, called the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth, all of them taken from the States this war. He alſo ſeized the hull of the Royal Charles, and then proceeding as far as Upnor caſtle, burned the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James, all capital ſhips. After which falling down the Medway again, he joined Ruyter, who lay ſtill at the Nore. Nothing leſs was now expected in London than that the enemy, improving their ſucceſs, would ſail up the river Thames, and deſtroy all the merchant ſhips lying there, if not inſult the city itſelf: wherefore thirteen ſhips were immediately ſunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall; platforms of cannon were raiſed on the banks of the river, and every precaution taken to reſiſt the threatened aſſault. But de Ruyter not chuſing to run too great hazards, weighed anchor from the Nore; and ſailing ſouthward, made an attempt to deſtroy the ſhipping at Portſmouth and Plymouth; from both which places he was repulſed with ſome loſs: then taking advantage of the wind, which ſeemed to veer about juſt as he wanted it, he came up the Channel again, and entered the Thames, advancing as far as Tilbury-fort: but he ſoon found the enemy too well prepared for his reception to hope for any ſucceſs. He made the beſt of his way to ſea again; but he kept the coaſt of England in continual alarms for near two months, that is, till he received the news of the concluſion of a peace, which was finally ratified about the latter end of July.

By this ratification Acadia was yielded to the French king, who agreed to reſtore St. Chriſtophers, and ſome other iſlands which he had taken in the Weſt Indies; and the two principal contracting parties retained the acquiſitions they had made. The colony of New-York was the only advantage which the Engliſh derived from the war, that had coſt the nation ſuch an immenſe ſum, and in which the folly, negligence, and avarice of their ſovereign had been in a ſingular manner diſplayed to all Europe.

The late glaring inſult, and the preſent inadequate peace, filled every Engliſh breaſt with grief and indignation, every mouth with complaints and reproaches. But Charles, as if born only for himſelf, being now freed from the troubles of the war, gave into every kind of licentiouſneſs, regardleſs of the ſufferings or cries of his people. His courtiers, following his example, ſeemed to vie with each other in libertiniſm and debauchery: irreligious wit and obſcene raillery triumphed in broad day, while decency, virtue, and morality, were obliged to hide their head. There was but one perſon about the court, who by his noble and virtuous qualities, and his great authority, ſeemed to be a check upon the growing evil, and him they took care to remove out of the way. This was the great earl of Clarendon; the moſt diſcerning and upright magiſtrate; the moſt capable and faithful miniſter England had for a long time ſeen. The wide difference between his principles and practice, and thoſe of the ſovereign and his followers, quickly brought him into diſgrace: but they did not dare openly to attack him, till they had firſt poiſoned the minds of the people with baſe inſinuations againſt him. The ſale of Dunkirk, the bad payment of the ſeamen, nay, the diſgrace at Chatham, and the ſhameful concluſion of the war, were by their emiſſaries imputed to the chancellor. The people, ever giddy and unthinking, and open to every prepoſſeſſion, ſwallowed the bait provided for them. The earl of Clarendon

Clarendon was now become the moſt obnoxious of miniſters in their eyes; and the parliament meeting on the tenth of October, the commons ſent up an impeachment againſt him to the houſe of lords, in which almoſt the only article that could admit of any proof, was that of the ſale of Dunkirk; but even this, the moſt exceptionable of all his counſels, was rather owing to a miſtake in judgment, than to any malignity of intention. The peers, when the charge was preſented to them, demurred for ſome time on the truth of the allegations preferred againſt the earl, and refuſed to order him into cuſtody. This highly affronted the commons, and begot ſeveral conferences between the two houſes. Clarendon in the mean time, ſeeing how he was purſued by the malice of his enemies, and knowing himſelf entirely given up by his ſovereign, whom he had ſo long and ſo faithfully ſerved, withdrew to Rouen in Normandy, where he lived under the protection of Lewis XIV. The French, more judicious and more humane than his own countrymen, knew the worth of the man, and received him with open arms and every mark of reſpect. This illuſtrious exile, who ſpent the reſt of his days in an eaſy retirement, employed his leiſure hours in compoſing that excellent hiſtory of the rebellion in England, which bears his name. He died at Rouen in 1674, leaving behind him the character of a nobleman of unblemiſhed virtue, an incorruptible judge, and an able miniſter, equally valuable for his attachment and integrity.

Upon Clarendon's withdrawing out of the kingdom, the ſeals were given to ſir Orlando Bridgeman, by the title of lord-keeper; and a bill paſſed both houſes for baniſhing him, to which the king gave his aſſent on the eighteenth of December. A little before the diſgrace of lord Clarendon, the king loſt another, and his only other, faithful counſellor, an intimate friend of the chancellor's, namely, the earl of Southampton, lord-treaſurer. After which the treaſury was put into the hands of commiſſioners, one of whom was ſir Richard Clifford, a declared papiſt; and ſir Henry Bennet, created earl of Arlington, a diſguiſed one, was made ſecretary of ſtate. Southampton dead, and Clarendon removed out of the way, the court abandoned itſelf to debauchery, without reſtraint.

The duke of Buckingham, a nobleman of ſpirit and humour, but of a moſt vicious and abandoned life, and Wilmot earl of Rocheſter, a ſhining wit, the moſt lewd and licentious poet of his age, were the king's chief favourites, and the miniſters of his pleaſures. With theſe and his miſtreſſes he ſpent almoſt his whole time. In ſhort, none but papiſts and men of no religion had any credit at the court of Charles II. *

While our Engliſh monarch was thus giving a looſe to pleaſures that diſgraced the exalted ſtation he bore, Lewis XIV. was diligently purſuing the extenſive deſigns he had formed. Philip IV. of Spain was lately dead. Lewis had, upon his marriage with the infanta of Spain, daughter to the deceaſed Philip, renounced all title of ſucceſſion to any part of the Spaniſh monarchy; but no ſooner was his father-in-law dead, than he retracted his renunciation, and now prepared to recover, by force of arms, what he called his natural rights to the Spaniſh Netherlands and the Franche Comte †. The States of the United Provinces, alarmed at the rapid progreſs of the French, and fearing it was only a prelude to an attack upon themſelves, who lay ſo near to the danger; ſet themſelves to concert with the courts of England and Sweden. That confederacy, which was afterwards ſo famous under the name of the Triple Alliance, in order to check the ambitious projects of the king of France. Charles, in liſtening to theſe overtures, and afterwards adopting the propoſed union, took a ſtep which is certainly worthy of praiſe, and is perhaps the only one during his whole reign that was any way conducive to the intereſt of England and of Europe; but he did not long continue in theſe prudent meaſures: and indeed we have but too many unqueſtionable authorities from the public and private hiſtory of his reign, to conclude, that his only deſign in adopting them, was only to amuſe the public, and that there was a ſecret underſtanding between him and Lewis at the ſame time.

No ſooner however was the peace concluded, than he ordered ſir William Temple (one of the moſt able negotiators of his time) his miniſter at Bruſſels, to repair ſecretly to the Hague, and conclude the propoſed league. This miniſter found means to perſuade de Wit, the penſionary, to detach himſelf from the intereſts of France, and thereby put a ſtop to the encroachments ſhe was daily making on the liberties of Europe. De Wit, who was equal in candour, generoſity, and ability, to the Engliſh miniſter. readily gave his aſſent. I ſhall not enter into the particulars of the negotiation, which is to be met with in the writings of ſir William Temple. I ſhall only obſerve, that by the addreſs and the dexterity of this envoy, the treaty of alliance between the king of England and the States was concluded in five days, and that de Wit had the ſpirit, for the ſake of public utility, to depart from the laws of the republic, and by his authority to perſuade the States-General to ſign and confirm the league in the beginning of the year 1668, without any communication of it to the particular provinces, which had never been practiſed before. Moreover, count

* In October this year, 1667, the king laid the firſt ſtone of the Royal Exchange, which was built in the room of the old one erected by ſir Thomas Greſham. Abraham Cowley the poet, and Dr. Jeremy Taylor, biſhop of Down and Connor in Ireland, died this year.

† This province, which borders upon Burgundy, is forty leagues long, and about twenty broad. It was called the Franche-Comté (or the free country) and was actually ſo; for the kings of Spain were rather its protectors than its maſters: and though this country was in the government of Flanders, yet it was very little dependent on it. The adminiſtration was divided and diſputed between the parliament and the governor of Franche-Comté. The people enjoyed many conſiderable privileges, which the court of Madrid were cautious of infringing, being deſirous to keep fair with a province that was ſo jealous of its rights, and ſo near a neighbour to France. Never did people live under a milder government, or were more attached to their ſovereign. They had preſerved an affection to the houſe of Auſtria for near two generations: this affection proceeded from their love of liberty. In a word, Franche-Comté was happy, though poor; but as it was a kind of republic, there were neceſſarily ſome factions among its inhabitants, of which Lewis took his advantage; for notwithſtanding what Peliſſon ſays, the French king did not confine himſelf merely to force on this occaſion. Volt. Age of Lewis XIV.

Dohna, the Swediſh ambaſſador, engaged for his maſter that he ſhould enter into the treaty; and ſoon after the king of Sweden ſent his ratification in form. Shortly after, the ſame ſir William Temple concluded a treaty of commerce with the States-General, and about the ſame time a treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal was happily effected under the guarantee of the king of England.

Charles, however, made the war againſt France the leaſt part of his ſtudy; he ſought only for means to draw an ample ſupply from his ſubjects. The new alliance, with which the whole kingdom was delighted, furniſhed him with the moſt plauſible pretext. For this purpoſe, in his ſpeech to the parliament, which met on the tenth of February, he boaſted of the league he had concluded, as a maſter-ſtroke of politics, and an inconteſtible proof of his firm attachment to his allies. The commons took all he ſaid for granted; and, overjoyed with the proſpect of humbling the French monarch, they voted the king three hundred and ten thouſand pounds, by an impoſition on wine and other liquors.

Philip IV. of Spain had been ſucceeded by his ſon Charles the Second, then a minor, under the regency of the queen his mother. The court of Spain by no means approved of the Triple Alliance, as by ſome of the articles it had been determined to compel that power to make certain conceſſions to France, which were very diſagreeable to the haughty ſpirit of the Spaniard, who declared himſelf ready to relinquiſh entirely the Low Countries, rather than agree to the terms impoſed by the contracting powers; but Temple and de Wit were not to be deceived by this bravado: they ſtill inſiſted on the terms of the Triple Alliance, and threatened Spain with war, in caſe of a refuſal. Spain at laſt finding it in vain to reſiſt, made choice of the alternative propoſed; and as by the triple league the remaining provinces were guarantied to her, and that ſhe had lately concluded a peace on equal terms with Portugal, ſhe thought herſelf in a condition to reſiſt the future attempts of her proud and ambitious rival.

Though the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, which was ſigned on the ſecond of May, 1668; and by which Spain and France were brought to make peace with each other, had conſiderably augmented the power of France, by giving it poſſeſſion of the places it had conquered during the war; the States-General believed, nevertheleſs, that they had done a great thing in ſtopping the career of the French arms, and preventing their further progreſs. They aſcribed to themſelves the whole glory and merit of this ſucceſs, though indeed the Triple Alliance had never come into their head, had it not been propoſed by the king of England. To immortalize their glory, they ſtruck a medal, on one ſide of which was ſeen Holland leaning againſt a trophy; and upon the reverſe, words to this effect; "That they had reſtored and ſecured the laws; amended and reformed religion; aſſiſted, defended, and reconciled kings; reſtored freedom to the ocean; procured by their arms a glorious peace; and eſtabliſhed the tranquility of all Europe." On the other hand, Joſhua Van Beuninghen, who had been employed in negotiating this peace, ſtruck a medal, and compared himſelf to Joſhua ſtopping the courſe of the ſun. As the king of France had taken the ſun for his device, the meaning of this medal could not be miſtaken. The French monarch was not a little incenſed, that a pitiful ſtate, like that of Holland, ſhould have preſumed to think of ſetting bounds to his conqueſts, and being the arbiter between crowned heads; and ſtill more ſo, that it was in a condition to do it. He was ſenſibly affected with the indignities put upon his greatneſs by the Dutch, which he was obliged to ſwallow for the preſent, but for which he from that inſtant meditated revenge.

In the month of March this year, Coſmo de Medicis, prince of Tuſcany, arrived in England in the courſe of his travels, and was received with all the honours due to his rank and prrticular merit. After his departure, the king was viſited by prince George of Denmark, who made but a very ſhort ſtay in England.

In July the Univerſity of Oxford opened the magnificent theatre built at the expence of Dr. Sheldon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, their chancellor, though he afterwards reſigned this dignity to the duke of Ormond.

This * ſummer the king diverted himſelf with making ſeveral progreſſes into the country, to view the ports and navy. He ſent a ſquadron into the Mediterranean, commanded by ſir Thomas Allen, who forced the Algerines to a peace, very advantageous to England. Nothing memorable beſides what has been taken notice of, happened during the reſt of the year, except ſome embaſſies, which the ſequel requires ſhould be mentioned. Sir William Godolphin was ſent to the court of Spain; Mr. Ralph Montague was firſt envoy, and ſoon after ambaſſador to France; the earl of Carliſle went ambaſſador to Stockholm, and ſir William Temple ambaſſador extraordinary to the States-General. On the other hand, monſieur Colbert was ſent from France to reſide at the Engliſh court.

Some changes were likewiſe made at court in the public employs. Sir Thomas Clifford was made treaſurer of the houſhold; the duke of Monmouth, the king's natural ſon, was made captain of his life-guard of horſe; ſir John Trevor, lately returned from France, where he had been envoy, was ſworn one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, on the reſignation of ſir William Morrice, to whom he had given ten thouſand pounds ſterling.

The year 1669 produced very few remarkable events in England, if we except a ſcheme which the king fell upon with regard to religion, which he ſeems to have adopted with a double view; firſt, to gain the preſbyterians, who were very numerous in the kingdom, over to his intereſt. Secondly, to attach the papiſts more ſtrongly to him, by procuring a remiſſion of the ſevere reſtrictions they lay under. To effect this, he propoſed to incorporate the preſbyterians with the church of England, and obtain a toleration for all the other ſects of nonconformiſts. The lord-keeper, ſir Orlando Bridgeman, was directed to procure a conference between ſome of the moſt eminent of the epiſcopal and the preſbyterian miniſters; and to make them propoſals for a comprehenſion of ſuch diſſenters as could be brought into communion with the church of England; and for procuring a toleration for the independants and other ſects. The epiſcopal divines, whether out of a ſpirit of chriſtian charity, or to make their court to the ſovereign, ſhewed themſelves very compliable on this occaſion, and even made large conceſſions; and nothing remained to put the final hand to an accommodation, but the point of re-ordination of the preſbyterian miniſters, which was at laſt ſettled by the conſent of both parties *. Matters being thus adjuſted, the lord chief-juſtice Hales undertook to draw up a bill of comprehenſion, and the lord-keeper engaged to ſupport it in parliament with his whole intereſt.

In the mean time, whether the ſecret of what paſſed in the conferences was not well kept, or the non-conformiſts, by encouragement from the court, aſſumed too much liberty, the archbiſhop of Canterbury reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to break their meaſures. For this purpoſe he writ to all the ſuffragan biſhops a circular letter, enjoining them to make exact enquiry into the conventicles held in their dioceſes. After he was provided with the neceſſary informations, he went to the king, and obtained from him a proclamation to put the laws againſt conventicles into execution, and particularly the act for reſtraining non-conformiſts from inhabiting in corporations. This proclamation was executed much in the ſame manner with others againſt papiſts: for about two months after, the king ordered the non-conformiſt miniſters to be told from him, that he was deſirous to make them eaſy; and if they thought fit to petition him, they would be favourably heard. A petition was accordingly drawn up, and preſented to the king at the earl of Arlington's lodgings, who received it graciouſly, and returned a favourable anſwer, importing, "That he would do his utmoſt to get them comprehended with the public eſtabliſhment."

This project, however neceſſary to the king's deſigns, was nevertheleſs directly contrary to the principles of the parliament, who were averſe to all condeſcenſion, ſo that it ended only in ſmoke: nay, further, when they met in October this year, purſuant to their prorogation, they addreſſed the king to thank him for his proclamation againſt conventicles; and, not contented with this ſtep, they appointed a committee to make exact enquiries concerning the conduct of the non-conformiſts. Theſe having received a great number of informations, reported, "That divers conventicles and ſeditious aſſemblies were held in the very neighbourhood of the parliament, ſo as to inſult the government, and endanger the peace of the kingdom." Hereupon the houſe immediately declared, "That they would adhere to his majeſty for the ſupport of the government in church and ſtate, againſt all ſorts of adverſaries." The meaning of the vote was eaſy to be underſtood.

During the latter part of the laſt ſeſſion, a great diſpute had fallen out between the commons and the lords, in relation to the caſe of one Skinner, and ſome tranſactions of the Eaſt India company, which was renewed with great acrimony; and their mutual animoſity daily increaſing, and the king knowing that he had nothing to expect in the way of ſupply, or other matters, from the commons till this affair was compromiſed, prorogued the parliament from the eleventh of December to the fourteenth of February following.

This year died in France queen Henrietta Maria, the king's mother; and in England, the famous George Monk, duke of Albemarle, the reſtorer of the royal family; as alſo Mr. Prynne, who was ſo ſeverely handled for writing againſt the court in the laſt reign. This man was an indefatigable writer, having been the author of no fewer than two hundred treatiſes, moſt of them indeed of little eſteem; but let it be remembered of him, that he was a conſiderable inſtrument in the Reſtoration, and upon that account was received into favour upon the change of government, and had the records of the Tower committed to his care, which he put into good order. He died a member of the preſent parliament.

The parliament of Scotland met about the ſame time with that of England, being convened by lord Lauderdale, as his majeſty's high commiſſioner. As this nobleman made ſo great a figure both in England and Scotland in the reign whoſe hiſtory I am now writing, I believe it will not be foreign to the purpoſe to take ſome notice of him.

Charles Maitland, earl (ſoon afterwards created duke) of Lauderdale, was a rigid preſbyterian, during the troubles in Scotland a zealous covenanter, and a diſtinguiſhed enemy to the royal authority. He nevertheleſs threw himſelf into the king's party in 1647, when duke Hamilton invaded England in ſupport of Charles the Firſt. From this time his country looked on him as a declared enemy; but after the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, and the compoſure of the differences in that kingdom, he followed the king into England, was taken priſoner at the battle of Worceſter; and by removals from one priſon to another, continued in confinement till the king's reſtoration. During his impriſonment, he had great impreſſions of religion on his mind; but after the king had received him into his favour and council, he ſo entirely wore them out, that hardly any trace of them was left. Whether from a knowlege of the ſecret ſentiments of the king and duke of York, with regard to religion, or only from a ſuſpicion of theirs, he was of opinion, that the beſt way to preſerve himſelf in their favour, was to enter into all the king's ſuppoſed views, and to labour to render him abſolute in both kingdoms. Upon the king's reſtoration, it was debated in council, whether epiſcopacy ſhould be reſtored in Scotland; the duke of Lauderdale oppoſed the motion with all his power, and gave this extraordinary reaſon for it; namely,

* It was ſettled, that all preſbyterian miniſters who had been already ordained, ſhould be admitted into the miniſtry of the church of England, with this form: —"Take thou legal authority to preach the word of God, and adminiſter the holy ſacraments, in any congregation of England, where thou ſhalt be lawfully appointed thereto." Rapin. Echard. Burnet.

That the Scots, if they were governed according to the grain of their own inclinations, would be always at the king's devotion on any occaſion of diſpute he might afterwards have with the parliament of England. This advice, though it was not complied with, was acceptable to the king, and riveted the duke in his favour. The reſolution to reſtore epiſcopacy having been executed, no perſon appeared more ardent againſt the preſbyterians, nor had they a more violent perſecutor. I ſhall have occaſion to ſay more of him afterwards, but this may ſuffice to give the reader ſome idea of his character.

It was by the intrigues and authority of this nobleman that the parliament, held this year in Scotland, paſſed an act which raiſed the king's ſupremacy in eccleſiaſtical matters higher than ever it had been carried before: as alſo another act concerning the militia, by which it was at the immediate ſervice of the king, ſhould he ever have occaſion to overawe his ſubjects in England; but at the ſame time, it might be ordered to march without his appearing to countenance its motions, ſo that he was enabled to diſown them with a better grace, ſhould an expedition of that ſort miſcarry.

The parliament meeting on the fourteenth of February, 1670, the king, in a ſpeech to both houſes, demanded a ſupply in the moſt preſſing terms, and concluded with earneſtly recommending to them, to conſider of a plan for uniting the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The commons readily acceded to the firſt part of his requeſt, and voted funds for the produce of one million ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, a ſum which however fell very ſhort of the king's neceſſities. The diſpute between the two houſes about the affair of Skinner and the Eaſt India company was ſtill undecided. The king, apprehenſive of a freſh rupture between them, perſuaded the peers to agree to a general razure of all the proceedings relating to that controverſy; the commons gave their aſſent to this procedure; and thus the matter dropt: but the poor nonconformiſts were pitched upon as the peace-offering on this occaſion: for no ſooner was the accommodation effected, than the two houſes, on the tenth of April, 1670, joined in paſſing an act, importing, "That if any perſon above the age of ſixteen ſhould be preſent at any meeting for religious exerciſes, in any other manner than according to the Liturgy of the church of England, where there were five perſons or more, beſides thoſe of the family, he ſhould pay five ſhillings for the firſt offence, and ten for the ſecond; the preachers in ſuch meetings to forfeit twenty pounds for the firſt, and forty pounds for the ſecond offence; and thoſe who ſuffered ſuch conventicles in their houſes, barns, yards, &c. to forfeit twenty pounds." The informers being very buſy on theſe occaſions, the diſſenters were exceedingly harraſſed. But the king put a ſtop to theſe ſeverities: and having paſſed the money-bill, with this and ſome other acts, adjourned the houſes to the twenty-fourth of October.

The money which this parliament had granted to Charles, had the ſame fate of moſt of the other ſupplies he had received from them. It was laviſhed upon his miſtreſſes and his favourites; and ſo far was he from thinking of making good his engagements with the States of Holland, that he was buſy in concerting meaſures for entering into a more ſtrict union than ever with France. Full of the idea of rendering himſelf abſolute, he ſaw no ſurer method to effect that deſign, than to ſecure the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Lewis XIV. To this chimerical project, he ſacrificed every ſentiment of honour, juſtice, and humanity. Charles, in his choice of counſellors, had ſelected ſuch perſons as he knew were moſt ſubſervient to his will, either through intereſt or a parity of principles. No wonder therefore if they encouraged him in all his favourite meaſures, how contrary ſoever to the intereſt of England, and the general good of all Europe; and willingly partook with him in the guilt of violating the moſt ſacred engagements, and abandoning thoſe who placed the moſt unlimited faith in his royal word. This council conſiſted of the five following perſons; Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Aſhley Cooper, and Lauderdale. It was nicknamed the CABAL, from the initial letters of their names. Their ſervile flattery, and the licentiouſneſs of their manners, were what chiefly recommended them to the favour and the confidence of their ſovereign, while by their pernicious counſels they had well nigh proved the ruin of both prince and people. In a word, it was by their advice that Charles now ſought an opportunity to break the treaty he had ſo lately concluded with the States, and to enter into another of a direct oppoſite tendency with the king of France.

The war with the States was to be renewed upon the ſlighteſt pretences; but it ſeems to be truly a part of the ſcheme that the king, or his brother the duke of York for him, had formed for overturning the proteſtant religion. The States were to be deſtroyed, to make way for the more eaſy introduction of arbitrary power and popery in England: but this French alliance was to be kept ſecret till the king had got what he could of his parliament, by plauſible pretences of the neceſſity of arming, for the ſecurity of the nation, againſt any foreign attempts, as France and Holland were both making great preparations.

The king, however, though extremely fond of the French alliance, ſeems never to have been fully determined, till the viſit which he received from his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Orleans, who came to England in May this year. Lewis XIV. well acquainted with the art and addreſs of that amiable princeſs, and the great aſcendant ſhe had acquired over her brother, had prevailed on her to exert all her intereſt, in order to draw off England from the triple league, which he was ſenſible had raiſed an invincible barrier to his ambition. This young princeſs then, who was only twenty-five years of age,

* If to the above five members of the Cabal are joined, as in reaſon they ought, the king and the duke of York, it will be found that all the ſeven were for an abſolute and arbitrary government; and that with regard to religion, four of the ſeven were papiſts, namely, the king, the duke, Arlington, and Clifford; and three without any religion, or at leaſt they conſidered it only as an engine of ſtate; theſe were, Buckingham, Aſhley, and Lauderdale. Rapin. Burnet.

age, was the plenipotentiary pitched upon to put the finiſhing ſtroke to this buſineſs. A viſit which the king of France was to make to his new acquired poſſeſſions of Dunkirk and Liſle, ſerved as a pretence for the ducheſs's journey over to England to ſee her brother, who being prepared for the occaſion, went as far as Dover to meet her, where they ſpent ten days together in great joy and feſtivity. In their conferences together, ſhe artfully inſinuated to him, that nothing was wanting to make him the moſt glorious monarch in the world, and to recompenſe him for all the misfortunes he had ſuffered in the firſt years of his reign, but to render himſelf as abſolute in England as other crowned heads were in their dominions. This glorious end, ſhe obſerved, he could never hope to compaſs, ſo long as his ſubjects had any proſpect of aſſiſtance from their brethren in republican principles, the Dutch; and therefore it behoved him to humble theſe latter, when he would find no difficulty in keeping his own people within the bounds of obedience; adding, that he might reſt aſſured the king of France would aſſiſt him with what aſſiſtance of men or money he ſhould think proper to require, in caſe of any commotions in England. Charles, blinded by the love he bore his ſiſter, and intoxicated with the proſpect of governing with unlimited authority, ſigned every thing that Lewis deſired, and laid a foundation for the ruin of his allies, in the midſt of feaſtings and diverſions.

Lewis, however, knowing the diſpoſition of Charles, and the natural inconſtancy of his temper, reſolved to bind him down to his engagements by the bands of pleaſure. For this purpoſe he ſent over with the princeſs Henrietta, mademoiſelle de Querouaille, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and accompliſhments, which inſtantly captivated the heart of Charles. She accompanied him to London, was created ducheſs of Portſmouth, and maintained her empire over him during the whole courſe of his life. She kept him to the connections with France, and continued to be the reigning favourite, while his former miſtreſs, lady Cleveland, was raiſed to the dignity of ducheſs, as a recompence for the influence ſhe had loſt.

The joy which Charles derived from his new alliance, was greatly damped by the loſs of his ſiſter *, who died in a ſudden and ſhocking manner, immediately after her return to France. This event made no alteration in what had been reſolved upon between the two kings. Charles diſpatched the duke of Buckingham to Paris (though on another pretence) to conclude and ſign the treaty; by which the ſpoils of the Dutch, devoted to deſtruction, were ſhared between the two powers, in the ſame manner as Flanders had been ſhared between the Dutch and the French in 1635.

Matters however could not be carried on ſo ſecretly, but that the rumour of this alliance, and the end it was deſigned for, began to ſpread abroad; but Europe liſtened to it without being ſtirred. The emperor taken up with ſeditions in Hungary, the Swede lulled aſleep with negotiations, and the Spaniſh monarchy ſtill weak, and ever irreſolute and ſlow in its determinations, left Lewis to follow the career of his ambition uninterrupted.

In September this year, he made an irruption into Lorraine by his general marſhal de Crequi. The duke, who was taken unawares, was obliged to fly, and leave his duchy a prey to the marſhal, who took poſſeſſion of it in the name of his maſter. The duke vainly hoped for the interpoſition of Charles to the king of France, in return for ſo much money lent and given him in his exile, and for the offer of his forces for his reſtoration. His envoy was anſwered, "That the king was ſorry for what had happened, and that the preſent violence, like the miſchiefs of a ſudden inundation, muſt be endured at this time."

The Dutch now began to apprehend ſome deſign againſt their ſafety; but to compleat their misfortunes, their country was at that time divided into two factions; the one compoſed of rigid republicans, to whom the leaſt ſhadow of abſolute authority ſeemed a monſter contrary to the laws of human ſociety; the other of republicans of a more moderate diſpoſition, who were deſirous of inveſting the young prince of Orange, afterwards the famous William III. with the poſts and dignities of his anceſtors. The grand penſionary John de Wit, and his brother Cornelius, were at the head of the rigid ſticklers for liberty; but the young prince's party began to gain ground. The republic was more attentive to its domeſtic diſſenſions, than to the danger which threatened it from without, and this contributed to its own ruin.

Lewis not only purchaſed the king of England, but he likewiſe brought over the elector of Cologne, and the famous Van Galen, biſhop of Munſter, who was greedy of war and plunder, and was naturally an enemy to the Dutch. Lewis had formerly aſſiſted them againſt this biſhop; he now joined with him for their deſtruction. The Swedes, who in 1668, had united with the republic to check the projects of a conqueror, who had then no deſigns againſt them, abandoned her as ſoon as they ſaw her threatened with ruin, and renewed their old connections with France, on condition of receiving the former ſubſidies.

It is ſomewhat ſingular and worthy of remark, that of all the enemies who were about to fall upon this petty ſtate, there was not one that could allege a lawful pretext for entering into the war. This was much ſuch an undertaking as the league between Lewis XII. and the emperor Maximilian, as king of Spain, who entered into a covenant to deſtroy the republic of Venice, only for being rich and haughty †. I have ſomewhat preadvanced the order of theſe events, and therefore muſt return back.

The parliament of England meeting on October 24, the king addreſſed them in a ſhort ſpeech, and then the lord-keeper by his orders repreſented the preſſing exigencies of the ſtate, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate ſupply: he told them, "That France and the States-general were powerfully arming by ſea and land, were building new

* The ducheſs of Orleans was, in conſequence of drinking a glaſs of ſuccory-water, ſuddenly ſeized with racking pains in her bowels, of which ſhe died within a few hours, on the nineteenth of June. ſhips, and filling their magazines with all ſorts of warlike ſtores and proviſions: that ſince the beginning of the laſt war with Holland, France had increaſed her maritime force above three times what it was before; and Holland alſo, ſince the concluſion of the peace, had been diligent in augmenting her fleets: that in ſuch a juncture, common prudence required that his majeſty ſhould make ſome ſuitable preparations: that he had therefore given orders for the fitting out fifty ſail of the greateſt ſhips againſt the ſpring, beſides thoſe which were to be for the ſecurity of trade, as foreſeeing if he ſhould neglect to put his navy on a reſpectable footing, ſuch neglect might be a temptation to thoſe who ſeem not now to intend it, to offer an affront, if not do an injury, to this nation." He then expatiated upon the ſeveral advantageous leagues his majeſty had entered into for the defence of his kingdom, and the benefit of commerce, particularly inſtancing the Triple Alliance with the Dutch and Swede, and the treaties concluded with Portugal and Denmark. Finally, he aſſured them that the king would prorogue the parliament at Chriſtmas, and deſired they would regulate their meaſures accordingly.

The commons were the dupes of this ſhameful prevarication of the king, and ignorant of, or at leaſt not crediting, the report of his engagements with France, voted him two millions and an half ſterling. Never had a larger ſupply been granted by the parliament, and never ſurely was it leſs deſerved by the meaſures of the king and his council, ſuch of them, I mean, as were concerned in the management of the late ſhameful negotiation with France. The ordinary council conſiſted of twenty-one perſons, but theſe were thought by no means proper to be entruſted with the conduct of this affair; indeed it was thought impoſſible to engage ſo many perſons of the firſt rank in ſuch a plot upon their country. To effect therefore this undertaking with the greater caution and ſafety, the king had eſtabliſhed a cabinet council of the five perſons we have already named, under the title of the CABAL, which was denominated the committee of council for foreign affairs; and prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, ſecretary Trevor, and even the lord-keeper Bridgman, men of incorruptible integrity, were never admitted to any of their deliberations.

The king having brought the commons to his lure, thought proper to adjourn the parliament till about the end of January. In the mean time, ſir William Temple, the Engliſh reſident at Holland, was recalled from thence, but on pretence that the king only wanted to confer with him about ſome private affairs, after which he ſhould be allowed to return. That miniſter had acquired ſo great a reputation for honour and integrity, that the Cabal were perſuaded no orders could prevail on him to promote or countenance meaſures which were deſtructive to the intereſt of his country. De Wit, who was an admirer of the great and good qualities of the Engliſh reſident, could not part with him without great regret. The flimſy artifice made uſe of to remove him from the Hague was clearly ſeen through, and the Dutch now began to be fully convinced of the inſincerity of Charles. Accordingly, they ordered their ambaſſador here to acquaint the king, that they ſhould regard the recall of ſir William Temple as an undoubted proof of a change of meaſures in the Engliſh court. *.

The parliament reſuming its ſeſſion the latter end of January, the king in February ſent a meſſage to haſten the money bills: but the commons, in conjunction with the lords, preſented to him a ſolemn addreſs upon the great growth of popery, repreſenting the cauſes and the remedies: one of which was, that no papiſt, or reputed papiſt, ſhould be capable of holding any office, civil or military. The king, according to cuſtom, ſet forth a proclamation againſt them, which was only matter of form, and without any manner of effect, as was all along the caſe, from the beginning of the reign of James I. to the end of Charles II.

When the firſt of the money-bills went up to the houſe of lords, the lord Lucas made a moſt ſevere ſpeech againſt the enormous grants made to the crown, and the ſhameful manner in which thoſe ſupplies had been ſquandered away. He concluded his ſpeech with theſe words: "While we are continually giving, and the king as continually craving, it is neceſſary to make ſome eſtimate for ourſelves. Would his majeſty be pleaſed to have a quarter of our eſtates, for my part, he ſhould have it. Would he be pleaſed to have the half; for my part, upon good occaſions, he ſhall have it: but then let us have ſome aſſurances of the quiet enjoyment of that reſidue, and know what we have to truſt to." The king had for ſome time made a practice of going to the houſe of peers without formality, on pretence of hearing the debates for his amuſement, though his real deſign was to influence their deliberations. This bold ſpeech of lord Lucas's gave his majeſty, who was then preſent, great umbrage; but he was incenſed beyond meaſure when he ſaw it ſoon afterwards printed and publiſhed, and iſſued an order to have it burned by the hands of the common executioner.

It had however made ſo great an impreſſion on the auguſt aſſembly in which it was delivered, that the lords began to make ſome alterations in the money-bill which had been tranſmitted by the commons. Theſe latter highly reſented this attempt, which they conſidered as an infringement on their undoubted right of regulating all money-bills. Conferences were held between the two houſes, in order to compromiſe the quarrel: but inſtead of coming to an amicable agreement, they carried the diſpute to ſuch an height, that the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament; and it was near two years before it ſat again. By this means, however, he loſt the money that had been voted him †.

Before we proceed, we muſt not forget to mention the death of Anne ducheſs of York, daughter to Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon. She deceaſed on the thirty-firſt of March, 1671. In the time of her indiſpoſition, which was very long, ſhe abjured the proteſtant religion. She left two daughters, Mary and Anne, both afterwards queens of England. That the duke of York himſelf was a papiſt before the king's reſtoration, is very certain, though we know not the preciſe time of his changing his religion. The thing was a ſecret for ſome time, but of late years it was become the public talk of the court and kingdom. At laſt, ſoon after the death of his ducheſs, he made a formal abjuration of the proteſtant faith, and from that time openly declared himſelf a member of the church of Rome.

A very extraordinary accident happened about this time: one Blood, a diſcarded officer of the late protector's, with two or three accomplices, found means to ſteal the crown and globe out of the Tower. Blood was a moſt daring villain: he had ſome time before made an attempt to aſſaſſinate the duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and had failed in his purpoſe, but eſcaped without diſcovery. He was detected in this ſecond villainy; but by a ſtrange lenity, or rather weakneſs in Charles, he not only pardoned him, but ſettled a penſion of five hundred pounds a year on him, in land in Ireland. It is ſaid the audacious ruffian had intimidated the king into compliance, by ſolemnly ſwearing that he belonged to a choſen band, who would not fail to revenge his death on Charles himſelf, and all his family, having taken ſuch meaſures for that purpoſe, as no human cunning or precaution could prevent.

No wonder that a conduct in the king, ſo big with error and abſurdity, ſhould fill the minds of the people with diſcontent and ill humour; and this ſpirit of diſſatisfaction was ſtill farther increaſed by another action of his, which evidently tended to the deſtruction of public credit. His profuſion was ſo great, that notwithſtanding the large ſums he had received from parliament, and ſeven hundred thouſand pounds he had touched from the French, viz. on entering into the late treaty with them againſt Holland, he was ſtill in want of money. Upon this the Cabal adviſed him to ſhut up the exchequer, which he actually did; and it continued ſhut for a year and ſome months, to the great diſtreſs and ruin of many families, who had lent their fortunes on government ſecurity. No king of England before Charles had ever dared to riſk the commiſſion of ſuch a flagrant act of injuſtice; and in any other times he himſelf might have fallen the victim of his own oppreſſion and folly. The whole kingdom reſounded with complaints. The moſt ſevere libels againſt the king and his court flew all over the nation; but Charles, regardleſs of thoſe unavailing marks of diſcontent, perſiſted in his own way, and forgot, in the arms of love and pleaſure, the reproaches he incurred by his avarice and injuſtice.

The next meaſure of the court was no leſs diſpleaſing to the nation in general, and was indeed an open violation of what the king promiſed to both houſes of parliament when they preſented the addreſs againſt papiſts. Charles (in virtue of his ſupreme power in eccleſiaſtical matters) iſſued a proclamation, ſuſpending the penal laws which had been made againſt all nonconformiſts and recuſants whatſoever, and granting to the proteſtant diſſenters, the public exerciſe of their religion, and to the catholics the exerciſe of it in their private houſes. At firſt ſight this act carries a plauſible, and even praiſe-worthy appearance; but the diſpoſitions of the king and court convinced every thinking man of thoſe times, that this was no other than a ſcheme for introducing by degrees the full and uninterrupted uſe of their religion to the catholics; or, in other words, to exalt popery above the eſtabliſhed faith of the kingdom. The event proves the truth of this conjecture. It is obſervable, that the lord-keeper Bridgman refuſed to put the ſeals to this edict for ſuſpending the penal laws, and was for that reaſon, though under different pretexts, deprived of his office. Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper was appointed chancellor in his place, and created earl of Shafteſbury. Soon after ſir Thomas Clifford was made lord Clifford and lord high-treaſurer, the lord Arlington an earl, and the earl of Lauderdale a duke. Thus did all the members of the infamous Cabal receive the wages of their iniquity. Theſe proceedings took up the greateſt part of the year 1671, and the beginning of 1672*: but a blow was now going to be ſtruck which the nation little expected, and which filled every honeſt mind with amazement, ſhame, and indignation.

In the preceding year the court of England had taken occaſion to pick a quarrel with the Dutch, on account of their fleet under the admiral Van Ghent having neglected to pay the honours due to the Engliſh flag, though at that time flying aboard a yacht only that had been ſent to bring the lady Temple over from Holland, and that the Dutch fleet was then riding in their own harbour. The Dutch offered to make any conceſſion agreeable with reaſon and juſtice; but the Cabal, bent upon the infamous war they had projected againſt the States, perſiſted in complaining of this as an unpardonable inſult, and declined to enter upon any compromiſe.

In the ſpring of this year it became generally known that the great naval preparations making by the court were deſtined againſt the States-General: but, previous to publiſhing the cauſe of this war, a perfidious attempt was made upon the Dutch Smyrna fleet, amounting to ſeventy ſail, and valued at a million and an half. The deſign however failed, after an engagement of three days, by the bravery of the Dutch admiral: and Charles, no longer able to keep on the maſk, declared war in form againſt the States-General on the ſeventeenth of March, 1672. Never ſurely were reaſons more abſurd and ridiculous, employed to ruffians in the ſtreet, and having his noſe ſlit. He was a member of parliament, and a great oppoſer of the money-bills; and when they were paſſed propoſed laying a tax upon the playhouſes, at the ſame time throwing out ſome indecent reflections againſt the king and his favourites. It is ſaid he was aſſaſſinated by perſons ſet on by the court for that purpoſe. In this ſeſſion the act of Navigation was repealed.

† In the courſe of this year, 1671, died two famous generals, diſtinguiſhed by their bravery and experience in the civil wars. The firſt was the lord Fairfax, the generaliſſimo; and the other Edward Montagu, earl of Mancheſter. I ſhall ſay no more of them, than what I have done in the reign of Charles I. excepting that both of them were very ſerviceable to the bringing about the reſtoration of his ſon.

cover a flagrant violation of treaty. Complaints were made of injuries offered to the East India company, which yet that company disowned. The detention of some English subjects in Surinam was alleged, tho' it was known that they had remained voluntarily in that island: the refusal of a Dutch fleet on their own coasts to pay the honours of the flag to an English yacht is represented as an unpardonable insult: and, to compleat the farce, mention was made of some abusive pictures, reflecting on the English nation *.

To clear up the meaning of this last article, it will be necessary to inform the reader, that after the destroying the English ships in the harbour of Chatham, Cornelius de Wit, brother to the great pensionary, who was then aboard the Dutch fleet, and performed considerable service, had caused his own portrait to be painted; on the back ground of which were represented some ships on fire in an harbour. The truth is, that de Wit had indulged himself in this trifling monument of his fame; but the picture itself was in a manner unknown. The English ministers, who had transmitted their master's pretended grievances in writing to the States-General, made mention of "certain abusive pictures." Now the Dutch, who always translate the memorials of foreign states into French, had rendered the term Abusive, by the French words fautifs, trompeurs, "False or Lying Pictures." Upon which they returned for answer, that they did not know what was meant by Lying Pictures. In short, they never once conceived that it related to this portrait of their fellow-citizen; nor could they imagine this to be a pretext for the war.

This declaration of war by the English was quickly followed by another on the part of the king of France, who had little else to allege for the reasons of this rupture but the affair of Van Beuninghen's medal, already spoken of.

All that the efforts of ambition and human foresight could devise for the destruction of a nation, was put in practice by Lewis XIV. for exterminating the wretched States of Holland. According to monsieur de Voltaire, no less than fifty millions of livres, worth ninety-seven millions of their present currency †, were expended in the most pompous preparations. Thirty men of war, of fifty guns each, joined the English fleet, which consisted of an hundred sail. The French monarch, accompanied by his brother the duke of Orleans, marched at the head of one hundred and twelve thousand men towards Maistrecht and Charleron, on the frontiers of Spanish Flanders and Holland. The bishop of Munster and the elector of Cologne had about twenty thousand men. The prince of Condé and marshal Turenne were the head generals of the French king's army, and the duke of Luxemburg commanded under them. The famous engineer Vauban was appointed to manage the sieges. Against such a formidable force, so many renowned generals, and immense treasures in money to bribe the fidelity of those who commanded garrisons; what had the republic of Holland to oppose? A young prince of a weak constitution, who had never seen a battle nor a siege, and about twenty-five thousand ill-trained soldiers, which were all the military force of the country. In a word, the destruction of the republic appeared inevitable.

The States-General, in the utmost consternation, wrote to the king of France, beseeching him in the humblest manner to let them know if the great preparations he was making were really destined against them, how they had offended him, or what satisfaction he required? To these submissions he returned for answer, "That he should employ his troops in such manner as became his dignity, for which he should be accountable to no one."

In May Lewis took the field, and soon made himself master of all Guelderland, and the towns upon the Yssel. The inhabitants of Utrecht sent the keys of their city to the conqueror, and the whole province of that name capitulated. Lewis made his entry into Utrecht on the twentieth of June in triumph. Only the provinces of Holland and Zealand remained free; and Amsterdam itself seemed but to wait the hour of its slavery or destruction. A little more diligence on the part of the king of France would have put this important fortress into his hands. This capital once taken, not only the republic itself must have fallen, but there would no longer have been such a state as Holland. Some of the richest families, and those who were zealous lovers of liberty, were preparing to fly their devoted country, and embark for Batavia. Nor were the Dutch thus distressed by land only; the combined fleets of England and France threatened the destruction of their maritime powers, and the annihilation of their navy. The States, however, had not been negligent in putting their fleet on a respectable footing; and de Ruyter, with a fleet of 90 ships, was sent in quest of the English and French fleets, which were commanded by the duke of York and the marshal d'Estrées, and were riding in Solebay harbour ‡ in a careless manner, as little expecting a vessel from an enemy that seemed to have so much work cut out for them at home. Cornelius de Wit was on board as deputy from the States. The English were very near being surprized; but recovering themselves, they slipt their cables, as did also the French, and stood out to meet the enemy, when there followed a most desperate engagement, in which the commanders and seamen on each side displayed the greatest conduct and courage imaginable. In short, after a most bloody dispute, in which the loss on both sides was very great, they separated with equal success. The ship on board of which the earl of Sandwich hoisted his flag as admiral of the blue squadron, was blown up, with himself and the whole crew, amounting to one thousand men; and on the side of the Dutch, rear-admiral Van Ghent was killed. The historians of the two parties equally pretend to the honour of the chasing of the enemy's fleet; but both the one and the other speak in a manner which discovers no great assurance: for it is not with engagements at sea as with those at land, where commonly he that remains upon the field of battle has a right to assume the honour of the victory: whereas in naval engagements, a fog, a calm, a wind either contrary or tempestuous, may force the fleet which has had the advantage to retreat the first. However, this be, bonfires were equally made at London and the Hague for the joy of this victory, though with very little reaſon on either ſide. The Engliſh complained that the French were wanting in their duty, and only fought at a diſtance, after they had ſeparated from the fleet. This conduct was aſcribed to ſecret orders given to count d'Eſtrées, not to expoſe too much his majeſty's ſhips, but to leave the Engliſh and Dutch fleets to effect their own deſtruction.

The Dutch were now in a moſt melancholy ſituation; and to add to their diſtreſſes, the ſtate was diſtracted by the diviſions which commonly ariſe among an unfortunate people, who impute to each other the public calamities. The grand penſionary John de Wit thought there was no other way left to ſave what remained of his wretched country, but by ſuing to the victors for peace. Full of a republican ſpirit, and jealous of his perſonal authority, he dreaded the aggrandiſement of the houſe of Orange ſtill more than the conqueſts of the French king. The prince of Orange, on his ſide, who had more ambition than de Wit, and was as much attached to his country, tried all means to obtain the ſtadtholderſhip, and oppoſed a peace with as much vehemence as de Wit promoted it. The States, however, came to a reſolution to ſue for peace; and deputies were ſent to the French camp to implore mercy in the name of a republic, who ſix months before looked upon itſelf as the arbiter of kings. Lewis received the deputies with an arrogance that was an inſult upon humanity; and when, after paſſing to and fro, he at length deigned to dictate the terms on which he would permit them to exiſt as a ſtate; his demands were little better than articles of ſlavery; and a peace on thoſe conditions appeared inſupportable. The haughtineſs of the conqueror inſpired the vanquiſhed with a deſperate courage, and it was unanimouſly reſolved to die fighting.

The province of Holland, to ſtop the progreſs of the invader, opened her ſluices, and laid the country under water. In this exigency the hearts and hopes of every one were turned to the prince of Orange. The populace grew furious againſt the grand penſionary, who had ſued for peace, and whom they called the betrayer of his country. The prince, by his politics and his party, increaſed the ferment. Cornelius de Wit, the penſionary's brother, was accuſed of a deſign to murder the prince. At length the two brothers were, on the twentieth of Auguſt, maſſacred at the Hague by the mad multitude, after one of them had governed the republic for upwards of nineteen years with the moſt unſpotted integrity; and the other had hazarded his life in fighting its battles. The moſt ſhocking cruelties which could enter the imagination of a furious populace, were exerciſed upon the dead bodies of the noble victims.

The murder of the de Wits extinguiſhed for the time the party diſſenſions; and all men, from fear or prudence, were unanimous in ſubmitting to the prince of Orange; the States alſo came to a reſolution to recall the edict which the penſionary had cauſed to be made in the year 1667, and by which they obliged themſelves never to admit the dignity of a ſtadtholder, and the prince of Orange was accordingly admitted to that office.

The combined princes perceiving they were likely to meet with a vigorous oppoſition, tried all means to corrupt the prince of Orange, then only twenty-two years old: but all in vain. They offered him the ſovereignty of Holland, with the united forces of France and England to ſupport him therein; but he rejected the propoſal with ſcorn: and when the deſperate condition of his country was urged as a reaſon for his compliance, he anſwered with a ſpirit that would have done honour to the moſt diſtinguiſhed heroes of liberty and patriotiſm that we read of in hiſtory: "I have yet one way left, replied he, not to be ſpectator of the final ruin of my country, and that is, to die in the laſt dyke." In fine, the actions of this young prince every way correſponded with the ſentiments he profeſſed. Being now inveſted with the full authority, he bent all his efforts againſt the common enemy. He overflowed all the paſſes by which the French could penetrate into the reſt of the country. By his prompt and ſecret negotiations, he rouſed the emperor, the empire, the Spaniſh council, and the government of Flanders, from their lethargy; he even diſpoſed the Engliſh court to liſten to peace. In a word, Lewis had entered Holland in May, and before September all Europe was in confederacy againſt him. Monterey, governor of Flanders, ſent a few regiments privately to the aſſiſtance of the United Provinces: the emperor Leopold likewiſe diſpatched Montecuculli at the head of twenty thouſand men; and the elector of Brandenburg took the field with twenty-five thouſand troops, whom he kept in his own pay.

The French king now quitted his army, as there were no more conqueſts to be made in a country that was overflowed. It was even dangerous to keep the provinces which had been conquered. Lewis, deſirous to ſecure the glory he had acquired, contented himſelf with having taken ſuch a number of towns in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time; and leaving Turenne and Luxembourg to finiſh the war, he returned to St. Germains, about the end of ſummer, to enjoy his triumphs. But while his ſubjects were every where erecting monuments of his conqueſt, the powers of Europe were at work to ſnatch them out of his hands, conſidering the reduction of Holland as the prelude to their own ſlavery; and having no hopes of being able to defend themſelves, ſhould the power of France, already exorbitant, be ſtill farther encreaſed by ſuch a mighty acceſſion.

It is now time to direct the reader's attention to the ſtate of affairs in England, of which I ſhall proceed to give a ſhort detail, confining myſelf only to the principal tranſactions.

Whilſt the nation was generally uneaſy at the late proceedings of the court, the king's exceſſive prodigality having rendered all the ſums he had received inſufficient for carrying on the war, the Cabal found it neceſſary at laſt to have recourſe to a parliament, which broke all their meaſures. Indeed they were hardly ſat down, which they did on the fourth of February, 1673, when it appeared that the Country Party, or rather that of the people, was become more powerful in the houſe of commons than the court party; and it was not till after a ſubmiſſion the moſt humiliating that a ſovereign could make, that Charles could obtain of them the ſupplies he demanded.

* See Voltaire's Age of Lewis XIV. to which I acknowlege myſelf indebted for great part of the narrative of this war.

I have already taken notice that the court, agreeable to the plan it had formed of reducing the nation to a ſtate of abſolute dependance on the crown, had iſſued a declaration for liberty of conſcience. The earl of Shafteſbury, lord chancellor, had been the principal promoter of this meaſure; and there is reaſon to believe that if the king had ſeconded what he had begun, with any degree of firmneſs and reſolution, as he had faithfully promiſed the Cabal he would do, he might have ſucceeded in this deſign, which, happily for the nation, was rendered for ever unattainable by his weakneſs and caprice. To make this more clear to the reader, it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that the Roman catholics being, in virtue of this declaration, rendered capable of enjoying poſts and offices in the ſtate, and having a ſeat in parliament, would ſoon have made a conſiderable number in the houſe, through the intrigues of the court at elections; and have carried any point they pleaſed againſt the proteſtant members. Hence a parliament, compoſed of a majority of papiſts, would in fact have been little better than a body blindly devoted to the court, if only from motives of gratitude to their patrons and benefactors. The earl of Shafteſbury, before he communicated this plan to the king, had reſolved with himſelf, in caſe Charles ſhould want reſolution in the proſecution of it, to quit the court party, and join the oppoſition; by that means, to ſecure himſelf from the perſecution which he foreſaw would befal him, as the adviſer, or at leaſt promoter, of ſo pernicious a ſtep, which threatened the ſubverſion of the eſtabliſhed ſyſtem of government both in church and ſtate. The example of the earl of Clarendon was as yet too recent to be forgotten, and he made not the leaſt doubt that his ſovereign would as readily ſacrifice him to the indignation of the parliament and the people, as he had done that faithful ſervant.

The event proved the truth of his ſuſpicions. Charles failed in his reſolution at the very time it behoved him to have maintained it with the greateſt firmneſs. He was diſtreſſed for money: he found he could not hope for a ſupply, unleſs he revoked his declaration of liberty of conſcience, againſt which the parliament, and the moſt reſpectable bodies of the kingdom, had preſented to him formal addreſſes. He tried indeed to break, or at leaſt weaken the oppoſition, by proroguing the parliament: but they reſumed their remonſtrances with their ſeſſion. The duke of York, and moſt of the Cabal, adviſed the king to ſupport his declaration. Charles, after wavering ſome time, preferred his intereſt to the engagements he had entered into with his party; and from a greedineſs of money only, not from any conviction of the badneſs of his former meaſures, he at laſt recalled his declaration. The Cabal and the popiſh party were exceedingly incenſed at this want of reſolution in the king; and the earl of Shafteſbury immediately quitting the court, came over to the Country Party, and was now the foremoſt in the houſe of lords againſt popery, the Dutch war, and the alliance with France.

The commons, not contented with this triumph over the court, ſoon after paſſed another bill, with the concurrence of the lords, entitled, "An act to prevent the dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants," commonly called The Teſt Act, whereby "all perſons enjoying any office, or place of truſt or profit, were required to take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and alſo to receive the communion (after the rites of the church of England) in ſome pariſh church, &c." They next preſented two petitions concerning grievances; and the king having promiſed to redreſs them, they paſſed the money-bill without mentioning any thing of the war, leſt they ſhould ſeem to approve of it: and moreover a proviſo was tacked to it, importing, "That no papiſt ſhould be capable of holding any public employment."

This bill and the Teſt Act was paſſed by the king on the twenty-ninth of March, 1673, and the parliament was then adjourned to October. The conſequence of the Teſt Act was, that the popiſh officers reſigned their places; and among the reſt the duke of York his poſt of lord high-admiral, and the lord Clifford his treaſurer's ſtaff, who died ſoon after. Sir Thomas Oſborne, created earl of Danby, ſucceeded him in the office of treaſurer; and Shafteſbury, whoſe revolt from the Cabal was now univerſally known, was deprived of the office of chancellor, and ſir Heneage Finch made keeper of the great ſeal.

The late mortification which the king met with from his parliament was not the only one by which he may be ſaid to have purchaſed the ſubſidy it granted him. His brother the duke of York, then a widower, had determined to contract a new engagement, and had fixed his eyes on Mary, ſiſter to the duke of Modena, a princeſs educated in the Romiſh faith. This alliance was warmly oppoſed by the parliament, who on the occaſion preſented an addreſs to the king, conceived in the ſtrongeſt terms, and expreſſive of their apprehenſions from ſuch a match. They were, however, very little regarded; and the duke of York, reſolved not to be contradicted in a point he thought ſo eſſential to the happineſs of his life, publicly eſpouſed that princeſs (who had arrived in England for that purpoſe) on the twenty-firſt of November this year, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the commons.

Charles in the mean time continued to proſecute the war againſt the Dutch by ſea with unremitting ardour. He beſtowed the chief command of the fleet on his couſin prince Rupert, in room of the duke of York. The prince having joined the French admiral, went in queſt of the Dutch, to force them to an engagement; and as theſe latter were far from declining the offer, they ſoon came to blows. The firſt engagement was fought on the eighth of June, and proved very obſtinate and bloody; but as neither ſide could claim the victory, the combat was renewed on the fourteenth, when, after a warm conteſt, the fortune of the day remained as doubtful as before. A third, which was fought on the eleventh day of Auguſt at the Texel, proved more deciſive. The combined fleets fell in with the Dutch, commanded by de Ruyter and Van Tromp, a ſon worthy the gallant father from whom he ſprung. When the action began, de Ruyter ſingled out prince Rupert; Tromp oppoſed himſelf to ſir Edward Spragg, the vice-admiral; and Brankert, the Dutch rear-admiral, bore up to the marſhal d'Eſtrees. The battle was fought with ſurpriſing emulation by the Engliſh and Dutch officers; but the French kept aloof, and left the Engliſh to ſuſtain all the fury of the fight. In vain did prince Rupert make a ſignal for d'Eſtrees to bear down to his aſſiſtance: the other regarded it not; and the majority of the Engliſh ſhips had been ſo roughly handled, that the prince could not purſue an advantage he had gained by means of his fire-ſhips; and which, if properly aſſiſted, would in all probability have obtained him a complete conqueſt. He therefore collected his ſtraggled ſhips, and hauled off to the Engliſh ſhore, leaving the victory undecided, or rather in favour of the Dutch, who gained all they could wiſh. A rich fleet which they expected from the Eaſt-Indies, arrived unmoleſted in their ports: they rendered abortive a deſcent that had been meditated on the coaſt of Zealand; and, which was ſtill a greater advantage to them, they brought the Engliſh nation to wiſh ardently the concluſion of a war that had exhauſted it of men and money, without the leaſt proſpect of honour or profit.

The Engliſh parliament met towards the end of October, and had a warm ſeſſion of only nine days, when they were again prorogued. They had found time, however, to paſs the following votes: That the evil counſellors about the king were a grievance, and that the duke of Lauderdale was a grievance, and not fit to be employed in any office. When they met again on the ſeventh day of January, 1674, agreeable to their prorogation, they went ſtill more earneſtly to work; and being by this time fully aware of the dangerous deſigns of Charles, they reſolved to prevent the execution of thoſe plans of arbitrary power which he had projected, and ſeriouſly debated on the grievances of the nation. They ſeem in the beginning of their ſeſſion to have copied the example of the parliament of 1640. Both houſes addreſſed for a general faſt, to implore the bleſſing of God's aſſiſtance againſt the dangerous efforts of popery; and the commons came to a reſolution to grant no more ſupplies till the grievances they enumerated were redreſſed, and the proteſtant religion, and their liberties and properties, fully ſecured. Both houſes voted by a great majority to addreſs the king for the removal of the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever. They examined the duke of Buckingham upon ſeveral queries which they prepared, in relation to ſome arbitrary ſteps of the government *; but not ſatisfied with his anſwers, they paſſed the ſame vote againſt him as they had done againſt Lauderdale. Arlington's turn came next; but he found means to clear up his conduct ſo much to the ſatisfaction of the houſe, that although an impeachment was prepared againſt him, they thought proper to drop the proſecution.

Charles was extremely ſhocked at theſe vigorous proceedings of the commons; and hearing that they had prepared a bill for a general faſt, to diſtinguiſh papiſts from proteſtants, and that they were entering more warmly than ever into the examination of grievances: finding alſo that it would be impoſſible to maintain the war, which was ſo diſagreeable to the parliament and nation in general, without money, which the former would not grant him; he began to liſten to the terms propoſed by the States-General for a ſeparate peace. In vain did the marquis de Rouvigny, ambaſſador from Lewis XIV. make him the moſt tempting offers to keep him firm to his engagements; in vain did he threaten him with the ſtoppage of the yearly ſtipend of one hundred thouſand pounds, which Lewis had been politic enough to give, and Charles mean enough to receive, for aſſiſting that ambitious prince in his projects of univerſal power. Promiſes and threats were now equally unavailing. Charles choſe rather to reconcile himſelf to his parliament and his people, by agreeing to a peace they ſo much deſired, than to truſt to the ſupport of France. Six commiſſioners, of whom the earl of Arlington was one, were appointed to confer with the like number ſent from the States of Holland, and in fifteen days the treaty was concluded. It was a renewal of the peace of Breda, with theſe additions: That the Dutch ſhould pay the compliment to the Engliſh of ſtriking to their flag, whether in large fleets or in a ſingle veſſel; and pay about three hundred thouſand pounds to Charles, towards defraying the expence of his armaments.

This peace with Holland, which was proclaimed on the twenty-eighth of February, 1674, was very near bringing on an alliance offenſive and defenſive between that republic and our court againſt the king of France. It was warmly ſollicited by almoſt all the European powers, who repreſented it as the only infallible means to put a ſtop to the alarming progreſs of the French monarch, and reſtore a laſting peace to the many countries that had been deſolated by the late cruel and inhuman war. The two houſes of parliament ſupported theſe remonſtrances with all their power. Their hatred to the French was ſo great, that they would gladly have relinquiſhed the enjoyments of the new peace for a time, to ſee their king armed againſt the common diſturber of the tranquility of Europe; and would have thought no ſupplies too great to enable him to proſecute a war that tended to the public good. Charles, however, paid no regard to their remonſtrances. Prompted equally by his hatred to the Dutch, and the hopes of ſtill receiving a powerful aſſiſtance from France, he refuſed to ſacrifice his ally to the reſentment of his enemies. In a word, he ſtill remained the

* He was required to give a diſtinct anſwer to the following queſtions which were propoſed to him: Whether any perſon had given him any ill advice againſt the liberties and privileges of the houſe of commons, or tending to alter the conſtitution? who were the perſons, and what was their advice? by whoſe advice was the army raiſed, and the command beſtowed upon count Schomberg? by whoſe advice was the army brought up to awe the debates and reſolutions of the houſe of commons? who made the triple alliance? who made the firſt treaty with France, by which that alliance was broken? by whoſe advice was the exchequer ſhut, and a ſtop put to the uſual payments? who adviſed the declaration of indulgence? who adviſed the attacking the Smyrna-fleet before the declaration of the war? by whoſe advice was the war begun during a prorogation of parliament, and that prorogation ſo long continued? by whoſe counſel was the parliament prorogued in November laſt? friend of Lewis, while his ſubjects more and more eſpouſed the intereſts of Holland, or rather of its ſtadtholder; an attachment which ſeems to have paved the way for that prince's afterwards aſcending the Engliſh throne. Though the parliament thanked the king for the peace which he had concluded with the Dutch, they ſtill continued to examine grievances; and in the courſe of their enquiries they attacked the court ſo briſkly, that Charles, apprehenſive of their going dangerous lengths, rendered their meaſures ineffectual, by an immediate prorogation; and having thus freed himſelf from all foreign and domeſtic diſputes, he reſumed his wonted life of indolence and debauchery *.

It was natural to think that Lewis would be highly incenſed at the mean manner in which his ally the king of England had abandoned him: on the contrary, he ſhewed no ſigns of reſentment, but readily accepted the mediation of Charles, which that monarch offered him towards bringing about a peace. The truth is, that the ſucceſs of the campaign had fallen ſhort of Lewis's hopes. The French were obliged to evacuate the three Dutch provinces with as much precipitation as they had conquered them, but not till they had made them pay dearly for their deliverance. The intendant Robert had raiſed in the ſingle province of Utrecht only, in one year, no leſs than ſixteen hundred and ſixty-eight florins. So great was their hurry to evacuate the country, which they had over-run with ſuch rapidity, that twenty-eight thouſand Dutch priſoners were reſtored at a crown a man. The triumphal arch of St. Lewis's gate, and the other monuments of Lewis's conqueſts, were hardly finiſhed when thoſe conqueſts were already abandoned. During the courſe of this invaſion, the Dutch had the honour of diſputing the empire of the ſea, and the dexterity to remove the theatre of the war out of their own country. Lewis was conſidered throughout Europe as one who had enjoyed the glory of a tranſient triumph with too much precipitation and pride. The fruits of the expedition were, that he had a bloody war to ſupport againſt the united forces of the empire, Spain, and Holland; ſaw himſelf abandoned by England, at length by the biſhop of Munſter, and even the elector of Cologne; and left the countries he had invaded, and was compelled to quit, more hated than admired †.

The allies were not equally ſucceſsful in other places. Lewis in a few weeks reconquered Franche-comté. In Alſace Turenne was able, with a much inferior force, to baffle all the attempts of the allied army. By a ſudden and unexpected march he attacked and defeated at Sintzheim the duke of Lorrain and Caprara, general of the Imperialiſts. Seventy thouſand Germans invaded Alſace, and took up their quarters in that province. Turenne, who had withdrawn into Lorraine, returned ſuddenly upon them. He attacked and routed a body of the enemy at Mulhauſen. He drove from Colmar the elector of Brandenbourg, who headed the German troops. He obtained a new victory at Turkheim: and having cleared the province entirely of the allies, he compelled them to repaſs the Rhine with great loſs and diſhonour.

Soon after the concluſion of the peace, ſir William Temple was again ſent ambaſſador to Holland, to aſſure the States-General of his Britannic majeſty's friendſhip, and to offer his mediation for putting an end to the war between the Dutch and the French: but the young prince of Orange had the command of the army; and propoſing to himſelf great advantages in the enſuing campaign, he found means to prevail with the States to wave their acceptance of the proffered mediation, on pretence that until a greater impreſſion could be made upon France, they had nothing to expect from negotiation.

During theſe tranſactions, the court of England underwent ſome alterations. Sir Joſeph Williamſon, who had been plenipotentiary at the court of Cologne, was appointed ſecretary of ſtate in the room of the earl of Arlington, who became lord high-chamberlain, though he aſpired at the office of treaſurer, which the king had beſtowed upon the new earl of Danby. This conteſt produced the moſt rancorous animoſity between thoſe two miniſters, who mutually exerted their utmoſt abilities for the ruin of each other. The duke of Buckingham was diſgraced, and loſt the dignity of chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, in which he was ſucceeded by the duke of Monmouth, who had ſignalized his courage in France, and began to be the minion of the people. Lauderdale ſtill kept his ground, by the moſt aſſiduous application to the king's paſſions, and the moſt devoted ſubſerviency to all his extravagant deſigns. Nevertheleſs, he was ſo much intimidated by the vote which had paſſed againſt him in the houſe of commons, that he affected openly to renounce the meaſures of the Cabal. He profeſſed uncommon zeal for the proteſtant religion, appeared conſtantly at church, was punctual in receiving the communion, and adviſed the king to put the laws vigorouſly in execution againſt the catholics.

All theſe arts, however, were incapable of appeaſing the reſentment of the commons; for at their meeting again, the thirteenth of April, 1675, after a receſs of fourteen months, the firſt thing they entered upon was a bill to prevent the growth of popery; wherein they declared, That the ſaying maſs ſhould be a ſufficient evidence of a perſon's being a popiſh prieſt; and inflicted penalties upon ſuch as heard maſs. After which they drew up an addreſs againſt the earl of Lauderdale, whoſe private converſation had been betrayed to them by Dr. Burnet, once a creature of the earl. In this addreſs they charged the duke with adviſing his majeſty to deprive his ſubjects of their rights and liberties; and particularly with ſaying in council, That his majeſty's edicts were equal to laws; and with procuring acts of parliament in Scotland to eſtabliſh a militia in that kingdom of twenty-two thouſand men, who were obliged to march into this kingdom for any ſervice his majeſty ſhould command, and to obey ſuch orders as they ſhould receive from the privy council there; by which general words they conceived this realm was liable to be invaded on any pretence whatſoever; and therefore deſire that his majeſty would remove the ſaid duke from his employments, and from his majeſty's preſence, as a perſon dangerous to the government. The king, however, did not think proper to grant this requeſt, and gave ſome reaſons for his refuſal, which were not ſatisfactory to the commons, who thereupon reſolved to prepare a ſecond attack againſt the duke *. In the mean while, they ſet on foot an enquiry into the conduct of the lord-treaſurer, Thomas Oſborne earl of Danby; but finding themſelves deficient in proofs againſt this miniſter, they thought proper to let the proſecution drop; however, that the king might not want a ſufficient inſtance of the little confidence they repoſed in his royal word, they drew up an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to recal the Engliſh forces in the French ſervice, and forbid his majeſty's ſubjects engaging in that ſervice for the future. To which his majeſty anſwered, that he would ſuffer no more of his ſubjects to engage for the future, but that he could not recal thoſe already engaged, without prejudice to his honour, and the peace of the kingdom. The commons appeared very little ſatisfied with this anſwer. A bill was framed, declaring it treaſon to levy money without authority of parliament; another vacating the ſeats of members who accepted of offices; and another ſecuring the liberty of the ſubjects, and to prevent the tranſporting them as priſoners to diſtant iſlands.

During theſe attacks of the Country Party, who were now headed and inſtigated to theſe warm proceedings by that political apoſtate Shafteſbury, the courtiers determined not to be idle. A bill for a new teſt was introduced into the houſe of peers by the earl of Lindſey (Bertie) for impoſing upon all perſons in eccleſiaſtical, civil, and military employments, as well as upon privy-counſellors and members of parliament, an oath renouncing the lawfulneſs of reſiſting the king, or thoſe acting under his commiſſion, on any pretence whatſoever, and declaring before God that they would never attempt to alter the government in church and ſtate. This oath had been firſt introduced in the Corporation Act, then in the Militia Act, and afterwards more fully in the Five Mile Act; but the times were now changed, and the meaſures of the court appeared ſuch, that it threatened no leſs than the total extinction of the liberty of the people to inveſt the miniſtry with ſuch an extenſive power of wreaking its revenge on any who ſhould oppoſe them. On the other hand, the ſpirited, or indeed over-zealous oppoſition of the commons to every ſtep of the king, and ſome of their late votes in particular, made the court party apprehenſive of a revival of the republican principles, which was therefore to be checked in time. This diverſity of opinions and views begat a very warm conteſt. Seventeen days were the debates continued with great zeal and animoſity; and all the rhetoric and reaſon of both parties were diſplayed on this remarkable occaſion. Shafteſbury ſignalized himſelf in a particular manner againſt the bill. He objected, that if arms might not be taken up againſt the king in any caſe, there was no diſtinction between an abſolute and a limited monarchy: "Neither our anceſtors, nor any other free people, had ever ſuffered their prince to have a mercenary ſtanding army, but wiſely provided that the ſovereign's ſafety ſhould be in them, as theirs was in him."

After all, this queſtion appears to be little better than a diſpute about words, and ſuch as it was abſolutely impoſſible preciſely to determine, ſince the merit or demerit, legality or unlawfulneſs of reſiſtance, muſt entirely depend upon the degrees of danger or oppoſition wherewith the people are threatened. The bill, notwithſtanding the great influence of the court, was only carried by two voices in the houſe of peers. All the popiſh lords, headed by the earl of Briſtol, voted againſt it. It was ſent down to the houſe of commons, where it was likely to meet with a ſtronger oppoſition; but a diſpute which happened between the two houſes prevented the paſſing of this, and of every other bill formed during the preſent ſeſſion.

One Dr. Shirley being caſt in a law-ſuit in chancery by ſir John Fagg, a member of the houſe of commons, preferred an appeal to the houſe of peers. The commons ordered Dr. Shirley to be taken into cuſtody of their ſerjeant at arms: but their warrant for taking the doctor into cuſtody was forcibly taken from the ſerjeant's deputy by lord Mohun. The commons having notice of it, ſent to demand juſtice of the houſe of peers againſt the lord Mohun; and being anſwered, that that lord had done nothing but his duty; they reſolved, That whoever ſhould appear at the bar of the houſe of lords, to proſecute a ſuit againſt any member of theirs, ſhould be deemed an infringer of the privileges of parliament. On the other hand, the houſe of peers reſolved, That it was the undoubted right of the lords in judicature to determine in time of parliament appeals from inferior courts, where the members of either houſe were concerned, that there might not be a failure of juſtice. The commons on the contrary voted, That it was an undoubted right of their houſe, that none of their members be ſummoned to attend the lords; and afterwards came to the extravagant reſolve, That there lay no appeal to the juriſdiction of the lords in parliament from courts of equity. They took into cuſtody ſerjeant Pemberton, and the reſt of the lawyers who were council in the caſe; and ſir John Fagg, their own member, was ſent to the Tower for ſubmitting to the lords.

Conferences paſſed upon this between the two houſes, but with ſo much rancour and animoſity, that the king, alarmed for the conſequences, came to the houſe of peers the ninth of June; and after reproaching the two houſes for carrying their differences to ſuch an indecent height, told them that he found no poſſible means of putting an end to them, and preſerving the peace of the kingdom, but by a prorogation. He accordingly prorogued them to the thirteenth of October.

In the mean time, the belligerant powers on the continent ſeeming inclinable to terminate their diſputes in an amicable way, Nimeguen † was pitched upon as the place for treating of a general peace. The miniſters of the ſeveral intereſted powers reſorted thither, but little progreſs was made in theſe negotiations the preſent year.

The French, as uſual, made themſelves maſters of ſeveral places before the confederates marched out of their winter quarters, particularly the towns of Dinart and Huy, which the Dutch ſay was occaſioned by the prince of Orange's falling ill of the ſmall-pox; but after that prince was recovered, and had aſſembled his army, we find he was obliged to be a witneſs of the taking of Limburgh alſo. The Imperialiſts had better ſucceſs upon the Rhine; for the French having loſt their celebrated general the marſhal Turenne, by a random ſhot, were obliged to repaſs that river; and the duke of Lorraine, who commanded upon the Moſelle, defeated the marſhal Crequi, and took the town of Triers. The Engliſh troops in the French ſervice at this time compoſed part of that army upon the Rhine; and Churchill, afterwards the great duke of Marlborough, learnt the firſt rudiments of war there, under the marſhal Turenne. The Engliſh alſo had ſome forces in the ſervice of the Dutch; but this was not eſteemed any breach of the neutrality they profeſſed.

The thirteenth of October the king opened the fifteenth ſeſſion of this parliament with a very ſhort ſpeech, in which, after having recommended union to the two houſes, and the intereſts of the church of England, for which he pretended himſelf a warm advocate; he demanded a ſupply of them that ſhould be ſufficient for building new ſhips, and clearing off the anticipations of his revenue. The commons abſolutely refuſed to grant any money for paying off the crown debts; but they voted three hundred thouſand pounds for the expence of building twenty ſhips of a certain rate*; and appropriated the tonnage and poundage † to the ſupport of the navy. They next took into conſideration the diſadvantages the nation lay under with relation to the trade with France; and it appeared that the ſilk and linen manufactories only imported from France, amounted to eight hundred thouſand pounds and upwards; and that the manufactories of wool and ſilk exported to France did not amount to eighty-five thouſand pounds: that all other commodities of the product and manufacture of England exported to France, did not amount to ninety thouſand pounds; whereas the wine, brandy, and other commodities of the product and manufacture of France imported hither, amounted to three hundred thouſand pounds and upwards, beſides an incredible value in toys, new apparel, point lace, &c. ſo that our imports exceeded our exports thither at leaſt a million ſterling annually.

Commerce and navigation thus attended to, the commons thought it neceſſary, in the next place, to ſet a diſtinguiſhing mark on all ſuch of their members, as, preferring their own private intereſt to the good of the public, had ſold themſelves as penſioners to the court, and were ready on any occaſion to throw their votes into the ſcale of miniſterial influence. With this view they prepared the following declaration or teſt for every member to take, by which they "proteſted before God and that houſe, that they had not, directly or indirectly, received any ſum, gratuity, place, or penſion, or the promiſe of any from the court, or any foreign miniſter, ſince the firſt of January, 1672, but what they then gave in writing to the houſe; nor did they know of any ſuit, gift, grant, or promiſe, to any member of the houſe but what they had ſo inſerted in writing, nor had given a vote in parliament for any reward or promiſe whatſoever.

In the houſe of peers the duke of Buckingham propoſed a bill for the eaſe of the proteſtant diſſenters; but this bill and all other buſineſs was ſuſpended by the revival of the diſpute between the two houſes, in the caſe of Shirley and Fagg. The commons were as reſolute and determined as ever in maintaining their privileges. The earl of Shafteſbury, who, ever ſince his defection from the court, had acted the part of an incendiary between the king and the parliament, endeavoured to ſpirit up the houſe of peers in a flaming ſpeech, which had ſuch an effect on his auditors, that it was moved to addreſs his majeſty to diſſolve the parliament, and call another. This however was carried in the negative, though by two votes only; fifty No's againſt forty-eight Ay's; but the king, not chuſing to give his enemies ſuch an handle at this time, contented himſelf with proroguing the parliament on the twenty-ſecond of November, to the fifteenth of February twelvemonth.

The prince of Newburgh, coming over to pay a viſit to the court of England this year, was moſt magnificently and affectionately received and entertained, none of the foreign princes having ſhewn Charles more reſpect and kindneſs during his exile. About the ſame time the king thought fit to advance ſeveral of his children to the title and dignity of Engliſh dukes. Charles duke of Lenox (by Louiſe Querouallle, ducheſs of Portſmouth) was created duke of Richmond on the ninth of Auguſt; Charles Fitz-Roy (by the ducheſs of Cleveland) was created duke of Southampton on the tenth of September; and Henry Fitzroy, another natural ſon by the ducheſs of Cleveland, was created duke of Grafton on the eleventh of September.

The ducheſs of Mazarine having a difference with her huſband, withdrew into England this year, where it is pretended ſhe would have ſupplanted the ducheſs of Portſmouth, had not an intrigue with a certain courtier been too ſoon diſcovered to the king. He failed not, however, to aſſign her an annual penſion of four thouſand pounds ſterling. Her houſe, to the day of her death, was the rendezvous of all the men of wit and quality; and St. Evremont, a refugee as well as herſelf, was one of her conſtant attendants. On the nineteenth of December, Heneage lord Finch, baron of Daventry, who had been only lord-keeper before, was made lord high-chancellor.

Doctor Lightfoot, the famous Rabbinical divine, died this year, as did alſo Bulſtrode Whitlock, Eſq; author of Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, a perſon of great judgment and temper, who filled ſome of the higheſt poſts under the Commonwealth. He was equally admired and valued for his humanity, candour, and ingenuity; and after having been twenty years upon the ſtage of public life, he paſſed the remainder of his days in a peaceful and happy retirement.

Notwithſtanding Turenne was dead, and the prince of Condé withdrawn from the army, the French king continued the war againſt the emperor, the Spaniards, and the Dutch, with ſome degree of ſucceſs. He had a number of officers who had been trained up under theſe great men; and the troops, by a long ſeries of victories, continued to think themſelves irreſiſtible. The beginning of the campaign, 1676, the French inveſted Condé, and took it in the preſence of the prince of Orange, and afterwards Bernheim: they alſo raiſed the ſiege of Maeſtricht, and obliged the prince to abandon it. Lewis had likewiſe put his marine upon a reſpectable footing: and now the French, who, when joined with the Engliſh, had not been able to gain any deciſive victory over the Dutch fleets, gained a victory alone over the combined fleets of Spain and Holland, on the eighth of July, 1676, off Meſſina in Sicily. In this engagement de Ruyter, the gallant admiral of the Dutch, was ſlain, to the irreparable loſs of his country. Theſe and ſome other ſucceſſes on the part of France, not that the allies were without their ſhare of good fortune, once more inſpired an inclination for peace; and the conferences for that purpoſe were reaſſumed at Nimeguen, under the mediation of the king of England, who in July this year ſent thither lord Berkley, ſir William Temple, and ſir Leoline Jenkins, in quality of mediating ambaſſadors; and there they found the plenipotentiaries of France and the States-General. Sweden was likewiſe very willing to treat, but the Imperialiſts, the Spaniards, and the elector of Brandenburg, protracted the time, in hopes of gaining further advantages, that might induce the French monarch to acquieſce in more equitable terms than they could expect from him in their preſent ſituation.

Lewis XIV. had now entirely laid aſide all ambitious views upon Holland. That republic had been ſo ſkilful, or ſo fortunate, to appear only as an auxiliary in a war which was begun for its deſtruction; while the empire and Spain, who were at firſt only auxiliaries, were at laſt become the principal parties. When the campaign was over, the hopes and expectations of all Europe were turned towards the negotiations at Nimeguen. It ſoon appeared that the deſign of France was only to divide the allies, and make a ſeparate peace with the States. The king of England was at this time placed in a ſituation which enabled him to act as the arbiter of Europe; and no terms which he would have dictated could have been ſafely refuſed by either party: but Charles, preferring his fatal prejudice in favour of France to the advancement of his own real intereſt, and the general benefit of Europe, joined Lewis in his deſign, and aſſiſted him therein to the utmoſt of his power. He ordered ſir William Temple to endeavour to bring the States and the prince of Orange to a ſeparate peace. The States ſeemed inclinable to adopt this party; but the prince of Orange would not liſten to any ſuch propoſal, which he ſaid would be no better than the betraying thoſe allies who had ſo generouſly interpoſed to ſave his country from ruin. However, to quicken the tardineſs of ſome of the confederacy, the Dutch declared, That if they delayed any longer ſending their plenipotentiaries to the congreſs, they would conclude a ſeparate treaty with France. Upon this, the ambaſſadors of the emperor and Spain at laſt made their appearance, but the negotiations went on very ſlowly. The truth is, the hopes the allies entertained that the court of England would at laſt open its eyes, and declare againſt France, was the greateſt obſtacle to the peace; but Charles took care to follow ſuch meaſures as were moſt likely to overturn all ſuch hopes, in order to bring them to a peace, ſuch as France deſired. With this view he iſſued a proclamation, prohibiting any of his ſubjects to take commiſſions from any foreign powers or ſtates in amity with his majeſty, or to ſerve as ſeamen in any ſhip or veſſel employed againſt any other prince or ſtate in amity with this crown.

Ever ſince the late peace with Holland, the French privateers had infeſted the Channel in ſuch a manner, that without any regard to the neutrality of England, they ſeized our ſhips, and, as if in open war, made prizes of them. At laſt, they carried their outrages and inſolence ſo far, that the commiſſioners of trade were obliged to repreſent the matter to the king, and pray him to interpoſe for the ſecurity of his ſubjects commerce. Hereupon orders were ſent to our ambaſſadors at the court of France to make complaints of this behaviour, and inſiſt upon ſatisfaction; but it all ended in nothing. The court of France was ſufficiently ſenſible that Charles would not break with them for trifles, ſo long as their monarch continued to make him the uſual remittances, and therefore took no notice of theſe complaints.

The remaining part of the year 1676, afforded nothing memorable beſides a proclamation publiſhed by the king againſt popiſh prieſts and jeſuits, and to prohibit his majeſty's ſubjects reſorting to popiſh chapels, on pain of proſecution. This was meant as a ſweetener to the parliament, which was to meet in the beginning of the following year. But before I cloſe my account of the preſent, I muſt take notice of an affair which, though of little conſequence in itſelf, ſerves ſtrongly to mark the character of the nation, and the ſpirit of Charles's adminiſtration. The freedom of the government, and the number as well as animoſity of the parties, had produced a propenſity for political diſputes: and as the coffee-houſes were the chief ſcenes where the meaſures of the king and his miniſters were examined with the greateſt ſeverity, a proclamation was publiſhed to ſuppreſs theſe places of rendezvous, for which the nation had long entertained a particular fondneſs.

Such an act of power, about ſeventy years before, would have been grounded entirely on the prerogative; and no difficulty would have been made in ſubmitting to that ſtretch of authority. But Charles, hearing that ſome exceptions were taken to his proclamation, applied to the judges, who furniſhed him with a quirk of law, and that too a very ridiculous one, by which he might vindicate his conduct.

The act which eſtabliſhed the exciſe, inveſted the king with a power to refuſe licences for retailing liquors to ſuch as could not give ſecurity for payment of the duties. But coffee was not an exciſeable liquor; and even this power of refuſing licences was very confined, and could not juſtly be ſtretched beyond the intention of the act. The king therefore, afraid of inflaming the reſentment of the people, complied with a petition of the coffee-men, who engaged for the future to prevent vent all ſeditious diſcourſe in their houſes; and the proclamation was recalled *.

This year died George Digby, earl of Briſtol, aged ſeventy-five, the ſame who negotiated the Spaniſh matters in the laſt reign, and whom we have ſo often had occaſion to mention in the courſe of this hiſtory.

The people of England, grieved at the evident partiality their ſovereign ſhewed for the intereſt of France, and incenſed by the inſolence and piracies of that nation, were eager to revenge the injuries they had received by an open war; and waited with impatience for the aſſembling of the parliament, from whom they expected a greater attention to the intereſts and honour of the kingdom than the king appeared diſpoſed to ſhew.

That auguſt aſſembly met on the fifteenth of February, 1677, the day they ſtood prorogued to, and was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, and another from the lord-chancellor Finch; the purport of both which was, to recommend unanimity, to ſet the king's conduct in the faireſt light, and to preſs a ſupply, aſſuring them that his majeſty was really neceſſitous, and concluding with promiſing, that he was ready to give them all poſſible ſatisfaction in regard to the ſecurity of their religion, liberties, and properties. The commons were no ſooner withdrawn from the houſe of lords, than the duke of Buckingham, ſtanding up, began a long and florid ſpeech, in which he undertook to prove that the parliament was diſſolved by the laſt prorogation, in conſequence of a ſtatute of Edward III. importing, "That a parliament ſhould be held once a year, or oftener if need be." From whence he inferred, that a prorogation for above a year (this had been near fifteen months) was void, and conſequently they could not act by virtue of ſuch prorogation, but a new parliament muſt be elected. This was the conſtant drift of the Country Party, who could not with any temper perceive the court poſſeſſed of ſo great a majority in both houſes. The duke was ſeconded by the earls of Shafteſbury, Saliſbury, and the lord Wharton. Their arguments produced violent debates; but as they tended towards an abolition of all that had been tranſacted in this parliament, and opened a door to ſedition and anarchy, thoſe four noblemen were ſent to the Tower, from whence they were releaſed ſoon after, on making their ſubmiſſions, and acknowleging their errors, except Shafteſbury, who remained in confinement above twelve months.

The parliament, at its firſt proceeding to buſineſs, acted as if it had laid aſide thoſe unhappy heats and animoſities which had troubled its debates, and infected its councils, for the two preceding ſeſſions. The commons voted his majeſty near ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the uſe of the navy, and a continuance of the additional exciſe upon ale and brandy for three years: in fine, every thing ſeemed to promiſe a happy union between the king and his parliament; but theſe halcyon days were not of long duration. The rapid progreſs which the French king continued to make on the continent, filled the parliament with the moſt juſt apprehenſions. Lewis had taken the field in the month of January this year, and inveſted Valenciennes, which he took by aſſault in a few days. His general Luxemburg had beaten the prince of Orange before St. Omers; which town, with Cambray, yielded to the victors.

It was evident to all Europe that Charles had it in his power to give it peace whenever he pleaſed, by declaring war againſt France, unleſs ſhe would lay down her arms and accept of reaſonable terms; and the allies were at once aſhamed and incenſed at the partiality with which he acted the part of a mediator. His own people were penetrated with the ſame ſentiments, and ſaw with regret their honour and their intereſt ſacrificed to motives of avarice and ill policy. The repreſentatives of the people, thinking they could not, conſiſtent with their duty, longer keep ſilence, drew up the following addreſs to the king:

"We your majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects do moſt humbly offer to your majeſty's conſideration, that the minds of your people are diſquieted with the manifeſt dangers ariſing to your majeſty by the growth and power of the French king; eſpecially by the acquiſitions already made, and the farther progreſs like to be made by him in the Spaniſh Netherlands; in the preſervation and ſecurity whereof, we humbly conceive the intereſt of your majeſty, and the ſafety of your people, are highly concerned: and therefore we humbly beſeech your majeſty to take the ſame into your royal care, and to ſtrengthen yourſelf with ſuch ſtricter alliance as may ſecure your majeſty's kingdoms, and ſecure and preſerve the ſaid Spaniſh Netherlands, and thereby to quiet the minds of your majeſty's people."

The king anſwering only in general terms, the commons reſolved to be more particular, and addreſſed his majeſty a ſecond time, beſeeching him, "That he would not delay to contract ſuch alliances as might be requiſite for ſtopping the progreſs of the French arms: and in caſe a war with France ſhould be the conſequence of his meaſures, they engaged to furniſh him with ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be neceſſary for maintaining the honour and intereſt of the nation."

Charles plainly perceived their drift, and was reſolved to make his own advantage of it. Accordingly, he ſent them a meſſage about ten days after, wherein he told them, That the beſt method for conſulting the ſafety of the kingdom, would be to enable him to put it in a proper poſture of defence; and for this purpoſe demanded a ſupply of ſix hundred thouſand pounds, without which, he ſaid, it would not be poſſible for him to ſpeak or act thoſe things which ſhould anſwer the end of their ſeveral addreſſes. The commons, however, excuſed themſelves from giving any more money at this time; but ſaid, if his majeſty would form alliances in the mean time, in purſuance of their former addreſſes, they would enable him to make them good at their next meeting. Whereupon the king came to the houſe on the ſixteenth of April; and after giving his aſſent to the money-bill and ſome others, adjourned the parliament to the twenty-fourth of May. The two houſes met on that day, and the commons ſtill refuſed to give money before ſome vigorous meaſures ſhould be ſet on foot againſt the French. They hoped, they ſaid, ſome alliances would have been formed for that purpoſe during their receſs, and then they would chearfully have granted ſupplies; they next took upon them to point out to his majeſty what alliances they thought the moſt proper for him to make, particularly inſtancing a league offenſive and defenſive with the States-General; and concluded with obſerving, that when theſe ſteps were taken, they would furniſh him from time to time with ſuch ſums as might preſerve the honour of the crown, and the ſafety of the people. Charles was (certainly not without reaſon) highly nettled at ſuch a barefaced encroachment on the royal prerogative of making peace and war, as dictating to him in ſo peremptory a manner what kind of alliances he ſhould make. He therefore ſent for the commons to the Banqueting-houſe; and after reprimanding them for the affront they had put on him, he ordered them to adjourn themſelves to the ſixteenth of July. In this diſpute between the king and the parliament, both ſides ſeem to have been in fault: the commons, by being wanting in that reſpect which ſhould ever be ſhewed to royal characters, the leaſt of whoſe acknowledged and lawful prerogatives are and ought to be held inviolably ſacred. On the other hand, it appears from the whole tenor of Charles's conduct, that he had at this time no other view than that of procuring a ſum of money: and as he was all along cajoled by the court of France, with promiſes of aſſiſtance to make himſelf abſolute, and change the eſtabliſhed religion; on this ſuppoſition, inſtead of being concerned to ſtop the progreſs of France, it could not but be his intereſt that ſhe ſhould grow more powerful; a ſcheme in which he too well ſucceeded, and muſt for ever, if not render his memory odious, at leaſt ſilence the tongues of his admirers.

All this time the negotiations were continued between France and Holland, and an eventual treaty was concluded; that is, all their differences were compromiſed, provided they could afterwards give ſatisfaction to their allies. But this work, tho' extremely difficult, ſeemed to be much facilitated by the farther loſſes of the confederates, and the great impotence of the Dutch, when an event happened which promiſed a more proſperous iſſue to the war with France, and an entire change in the Engliſh councils.

Charles, finding that the prince of Orange, in order to maintain himſelf in authority, and acquire opportunities of raiſing his military fame, ſtrongly oppoſed every ſtep towards a ſeparate peace, ſent for ſir William Temple from Nimeguen ſoon after the riſing of the parliament; and having complained to him of the uſage he received from the Country Party, who were for preſſing him into a war with France, he directed him to acquaint the prince of Orange from him, that he was extremely deſirous an end might be put to the war as ſoon as poſſible; with aſſurances that his majeſty would concur with the prince in inſiſting on ſuch terms as might be acceptable to Holland as well as England; and at the ſame time to invite the prince over to England, to put the finiſhing hand to the match which he had ſollicited for himſelf ſome time paſt with the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter of his royal highneſs the duke of York; for the completion of which, the king gave his royal word that he would exert all his influence and authority with his brother.

The prince, lulled by theſe flattering promiſes, came over to England in the beginning of October, and proſecuted his addreſſes with great warmth to the princeſs, then in the bloom of youth, about fifteen years of age, and a moſt agreeable young lady. The courtſhip was not of long duration, the marriage being celebrated on the fourth of November following, and ſoon after the prince embarked with his conſort for Holland.

During his ſtay here, every tentative was uſed to bring him into the ſcheme for a ſeparate peace; but he would not engage in any diſcourſe on that ſubject, alleging, that as the allies were like to have hard terms, they would be apt to think he had made his match at their coſt, and that he would never have it imputed to him that he had ſold his honour for a wife. The truth is, there was much more of policy than love in this match: nor is it improbable that the prince of Orange, finding the general bent of the nation againſt the ſucceſſion of a Roman catholic, might even at this time have a proſpect of mounting the throne of England. This much is certain, that the duke of York ſhewed great reluctance in giving his conſent to this match; not that he would deny the prince of Orange to be worthy of his alliance, as well on account of his deſcent from one of the moſt illuſtrious houſes in Europe, as of his own perſonal great qualities: but James had a certain foreboding of what would happen to him afterwards thro' his ſon-in-law, and in this he was more clear-ſighted than his brother Charles, who could not perceive in the phyſiognomy of his nephew aught that portended evil to him or his family. Happily he did not live to be convinced of his miſtake.

The French miniſtry, who had foreſeen the efforts their enemies would make to bring the Engliſh court to their intereſts, had not been negligent in providing againſt ſuch an event. They had for ſome time retained Charles and his courtiers as penſioners; the latter, dazzled by the ſhining metal, took care to encourage Charles in his partiality to their benefactor; ſo that Lewis XIV. at the ſame time that he humbled his enemies by the ſword, kept the Engliſh court in an abject ſubmiſſion to his will, by charming the eyes of its ſovereign with thoſe treaſures of which he was ſo fond, for no other purpoſe but to beſtow them on the miniſters of his riotous pleaſures. Lewis, however, ſenſible of the levity and inconſtancy of the Engliſh monarch, was afraid that ſooner or later he might have his eyes opened to his true intereſt, and, regardful of his honour, ſhake off the inglorious ſervitude he now kept him in, and vigorouſly join with the confederate powers to preſcribe limits to the ambition of France. He therefore endeavoured to perſuade him to diſmiſs part of the troops he kept in conſtant pay; and Mr. Barillon, who reſided here as ambaſſador from the French court, had orders to leave nothing undone to bring Charles to conſent to his ſcheme: and in order to diſpoſe him the more readily thereto, he was to offer a renewal of the former treaty between the two kings, without any other condition than that of Charles engaging to keep no more than eight thouſand troops in pay. Charles was not ſo blinded by his paſſions but that he felt all the infamy infamy of this propoſal: and when the ambaſſador delivered the meſſage, he was anſwered with great anger: "How! is it thus my brother of France means to deal by me? are theſe the fruits of all his mighty promiſes to make me abſolute in my kingdom? or does he think it is to be done by eight thouſand men?"

It is really difficult to comprehend how Charles, who was actually endowed with great penetration, and no ſmall ſhare of underſtanding; and his council, who paſſed for ſome of the ableſt heads in Europe, could have been ſo long the dupes of French fineſſe. Lewis knew and acknowledged that the penſion he paid the king of England was in itſelf but trifling; but he had prevailed on him to content himſelf for the preſent, till he could amply repay him for his forbearance, by rendering him abſolute over his ſubjects. Thus for a long time did Charles continue to depend upon airy promiſes; nor was he perfectly convinced of the inſincerity of them till after the peace of Nimeguen, when his dear friend and ally, having his arms at liberty, ſoon ſhewed himſelf as prompt in forgetting, as he had been warm in forming engagements.

The reader will excuſe this digreſſion, which the reflection on Charles's circumſtances and conduct inſenſibly led me into. I return:

Immediately after the concluſion of the prince of Orange's marriage, the king had entered into conferences with him concerning the plan of a general pacification, at which the earl of Danby and ſir William Temple aſſiſted. After ſome diſpute, it was agreed that Lewis ſhould reſtore all he had taken from the emperor and the duke of Lorraine; that there ſhould be a mutual reſtitution between France and Holland; and that Spain ſhould recover poſſeſſion of Aeth, Oudenarde, Charleroi, Courtray, Tournay, Condé, Valenciennes, Saint Guillain, and Binch. The prince propoſed that Franchecomté ſhould likewiſe be reſtored; but Charles repreſenting the impoſſibility of compelling Lewis to reſign Franchecomté, the prince thought proper to ſubmit, and even engaged to uſe his endeavours in perſuading the States to agree to theſe conditions; while Charles, on his part, undertook to procure the conſent of the French monarch, declaring at the ſame time, that he would never recede in the leaſt article from the ſcheme concerted, but proclaim war againſt Lewis if he refuſed it; and with this aſſurance the prince left England.

The earl of Feverſham, a creature of the duke of York, and a Frenchman by birth *, was ſent as ambaſſador to Paris with intimation of this agreement; which, tho' it muſt have been extremely diſagreeable to Lewis, he received with ſeeming complacency and contentment. He told Feverſham, that the king knew he might always command a peace; but ſome of the towns in Flanders it ſeemed very hard to demand, eſpecially Tournay, upon the fortifications of which he had expended large ſums of money: he hoped his brother would not break with him for one or two towns; and even with regard to theſe, he would ſend orders to his ambaſſador at London to treat with the king himſelf; thus the blow was artfully eluded †.

Charles, however, piqued at the inſincerity of the French court, reſolved to let Lewis ſee that he was not to be inſulted with impunity. The meeting of the parliament, which ſtood prorogued to May, was anticipated to the fifteenth of January, 1678; a very uncommon meaſure, and ſuch as gave no little alarm to Lewis. In the mean time Laurence Hyde, ſecond ſon to the late chancellor Clarendon, was ſent to Holland to conclude a treaty of alliance with the States, in the nature of the triple league, to compel both France and Spain to agree to the terms concerted.

When the Engliſh parliament met, the king told them in a ſpeech from the throne, That as he ſaw there was little probability of procuring a good peace by conferences and negotiations, he was determined to undertake a war for that purpoſe, but that it was neceſſary they granted him a ſupply adequate to the occaſion; aſſuring them, that they might depend on the money being appropriated to that end. The commons having taken the king's ſpeech into conſideration, agreed upon an addreſs to his majeſty; wherein they thanked him for his care and encouragement of the proteſtant religion, by marrying his niece to the prince of Orange, intreating him that he would conſent to no peace with France, but upon the Pyrenean treaty; and that neither England nor the confederates ſhould be ſuffered to trade with France during the war, promiſing his majeſty to aſſiſt him in the proſecution of it, when he ſhould impart to them his alliances with the confederates.

The king reſented this addreſs as a repetition of the encroachment they had made on the royal prerogative in the former ſeſſion, and ſent them a very ſharp anſwer. The commons, however, inſtead of replying to it, immediately went upon the ſupply, and reſolved on a poll-tax, appropriating the money to the ſervice of the French war; and added a clauſe, whereby all trade with France was prohibited for three years.

In the mean time, the French king taking the field early in the ſpring, reduced Ghent and Ypres, and diſtributed his troops in quarters of refreſhment. This progreſs alarmed the Dutch in ſuch a manner, that they reſolved to conclude a ſeparate peace. Lewis knowing his own advantage, and that he had nothing to fear from the king of England, talked in the ſtrain of a conqueror, and inſiſted upon terms very different from thoſe which had been planned by Charles and the prince of Orange. In April the chancellor told the two houſes in the king's name, That the Dutch certainly intended to conclude a ſeparate peace with France, and his majeſty demanded their advice on that ſubject. The commons exhorted him to declare war againſt France; then they voted the alliance with Holland not anſwerable to their addreſs, nor ſufficient for the ſecurity of the kingdom. Charles expreſſed his diſſatisfaction at this vote; notwithſtanding which, they preſented another addreſs, deſiring to know the reſolutions he had taken in conſequence of their advice; that he would pay more attention to their addreſſes; and that he would remove the duke of Lauderdale from his councils. The king replied, That he was ſurprized at the extravagance of their addreſs, to which at preſent he would not make the anſwer it deſerved. As they had already paſſed a poll-tax for the ſervice of the year, he began to make levies, which were carried on with ſuch ſurpriſing diligence and ſucceſs, that in ſix weeks time an army of thirty thouſand men was compleated. The duke of Monmouth was ſent over with three thouſand to garriſon Oſtend; a fleet was equipped; and the court breathed nothing but defiance againſt the French monarch.

The parliament meeting again on the twenty-ſeventh of May, after an adjournment of twelve days, began to give evident ſigns of their diſtruſting the king's ſincerity in the levies he had lately made, and came to the following reſolution: "That the houſe taking into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, and the expence occaſioned by the army, were humbly of opinion, that if his majeſty pleaſed to think fit to enter into the war againſt the French king, the houſe was and would be ready to aſſiſt him in that war; but if otherwiſe, they would proceed to the conſideration of providing for the ſpeedy diſbanding of the army."

The houſe further ordered, that the members of his majeſty's privy-council ſhould acquaint the king with this vote, and to pray his ſpeedy anſwer. The king anſwered, "That the French king having offered a ceſſation till the twenty-ſeventh of July, there was great likelihood that it would be accepted, and end in a general peace; but that it was his opinion the army ſhould not be diſbanded before that time." Upon this anſwer, the houſe voted, "That all forces raiſed ſince the twenty-ninth of September laſt (excepting thoſe tranſported to foreign plantations) be forthwith paid off and diſbanded, and that they would conſider of a ſupply for that purpoſe." Accordingly, the fourth of June, the houſe voted two hundred thouſand pounds for the diſbanding of the army by the end of the month; and the next day they voted the ſame ſum towards defraying the expences of the fleet.

Upon theſe votes, the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe, repreſenting the danger of taking ſuch a ſtep before the concluſion of the peace; and he aſked them, whether he could honourably abandon thoſe powers in Flanders which had put themſelves under his protection, and which at preſent depended ſolely on him for their ſafety? The commons then agreed to prolong the term with regard to the forces in Flanders to the twenty-ſeventh day of July.

The fifteenth of June the houſe reſolved, "That after the Tueſday following, no motion ſhould be made for any ſupply of money, till after the next receſs." As hitherto the houſe had experienced that the king only amuſed them, and aimed to get the money before he poſitively declared his intention, they now reſolved to put him under a neceſſity of declaring within three days, for fear of being ſtill amuſed by him till the opportunity was loſt.

On that very Tueſday, June 18, the king came to the houſe of peers; and ſending for the commons, made a ſpeech to both houſes; in which he told them, "That the peace between France, Spain, and Holland, was almoſt as good as concluded. He ſaid the Spaniards had poſitively declared they were not able to bear the expence of maintaining garriſons in Flanders, which muſt be left expoſed, unleſs England would undertake to ſupport the fortifications. He therefore obſerved, it would be neceſſary to keep a good fleet at ſea, and in particular to provide for the ſafety of Oſtend, where otherwiſe the French might maintain a fleet of forty ſhips of war exactly oppoſite to the mouth of the Thames. If they deſired he ſhould live in ſtrict union with his parliament, they would make an addition of three hundred thouſand pounds to his revenue: in which caſe, they might bring in a bill for appropriating fifty thouſand yearly to the ſupport of the fleets and artillery; and then he would be always ready to paſs whatever acts ſhould be propoſed for the benefit of the nation. Finally, he deſired they would remember that he had engaged to pay forty thouſand pounds for the portion of the princeſs Mary; that the firſt moiety was already due, and demanded by the prince of Orange."

By this ſpeech of Charles, one would be led to imagine that he had performed every thing for the nation that could be aſked of a ſovereign, anxious for the welfare of his people, and jealous of the honour and majeſty of his crown; but his parliament was too well accuſtomed to ſuch kind of ſpeeches to ſuffer this to make any impreſſion upon them. They were convinced that it was in the king's power to procure all that he ſhould think proper to demand of France; and they were as well convinced that he was linked in a fatal connection with that court, which would not ſuffer him to fulfil the wiſhes of the nation, and perhaps the dictates of his own reaſon. The commons indeed voted his majeſty their thanks for the gracious expreſſions in his ſpeech; but they would not grant him any additional revenue, or even make him ſatisfaction for the loſſes he had ſuſtained in the cuſtoms, by the prohibition of the French trade: and when the lords made an amendment to the bill for diſbanding the army, by enlarging the time a month longer, the commons would not conſent to it. Whereupon his majeſty came to the houſe on the fifteenth of July, and prorogued them to the firſt of Auguſt. *. Let us now return to the negotiations for peace abroad.

Van Beverning was the Dutch plenipotentiary at Nimeguen, a man of great ability and addreſs. The States General, convinced that there were little hopes of receiving any aſſiſtance from England, conſidering the diſpoſition of the king, and the jealouſies of the parliament, ordered their miniſter to repair to the French king at Ghent, and ſettle a ſeparate peace with him, on condition he agreed to reſtore the ſix following towns to the Spaniards, viz. Ghent, Aeth, Charleroi, Oudenard, Courtray, and Limburgh; but the French king poſitively refuſed to evacuate them till he ſaw an entire reſtitution made to his allies the Swedes, of all they had loſt in the war.

The ſtates immediately acquainted Charles with this refuſal of the French king; and he was ſo incenſed at this conduct of Lewis, that he ſent

Temple forthwith to Holland, in order to concert an effectual plan for oppoſing the ambition of France. In ſix days Temple concluded a treaty with the States to carry on the war jointly with them againſt France, if the aforeſaid towns were not evacuated within ſixteen days after the date of the treaty, which was ſigned on the twenty-ſixth of July; and the prince of Orange being joined by the Engliſh auxiliaries under the duke of Monmouth, marched to the relief of Mons, which was then blocked up by marſhal Luxemburg. This appearance of unuſual vigor on the part of the Engliſh court had ſuch an influence on the French miniſters, that on the morning of the critical day which was to determine peace or war for Europe, they waited on Van Beverning, and told him they were willing to agree to the reſtitution of the towns, and to conclude and ſign the peace. The articles were accordingly drawn and ſigned, juſt as the clock ſtruck twelve at night, by the miniſters of France and Holland. By this treaty, concluded the tenth of Auguſt, 1678, it was agreed, That each party ſhould retain what they were reſpectively poſſeſſed of, only the French were to reſtore Maeſtricht, with its dependencies, to the Dutch, which was all the French retained of their conqueſts in the United Provinces: and by a ſeparate article, all the territories belonging to the prince of Orange in France, Franchecomté, Charleroi, Flanders, &c. were reſtored to him.

The Spaniards, on their part, thought fit to accept of the conditions of peace the Engliſh and Dutch had procured for them, and their plenipotentiaries ſigned the treaty the latter end of September, as did the Germans the third of February following *. Thus all the confederates in a few months enjoyed the benefit of a pacification, except the duke of Lorraine, who was not reſtored to his dominions.

The prince of Orange, who was greatly diſſatisfied with this peace, took a very extraordinary ſtep, with a view to embroil matters again, if poſſible, or perhaps to expreſs his reſentment againſt Lewis, to whom he bore a particular hatred. Marſhal Luxemburg, who was then beſieging Mons, had lately received an account of the concluſion of the peace; upon which he lay lulled in full ſecurity in the village of St. Denis. The prince of Orange, with his whole army that had marched to the relief of Mons, attacking the marſhal's quarters and forces therein, a long and bloody engagement enſued, and the prince gained a conſiderable advantage over the marſhal, who could with great difficulty reſiſt the fury of this attack. The prince of Orange remained maſter of the field of battle; indeed he had the greateſt reaſon to expect the moſt complete victory: for he not only gave the attack, which is a great advantage, but he attacked an army which, depending on the faith of treaties, had grown remiſs in their military ſtrictneſs.

On this tranſaction a celebrated French writer † has the following judicious and elegant remark: "Did ambitious men pay any regard to their fellow-creatures, the prince of Orange would not have fought this battle. He certainly knew that the peace was already ſigned, or on the point of being ſo; he knew that this peace would prove advantageous to his country, and yet he hazarded his own life, and that of thouſands of men beſides, as the firſt-fruits of a general peace, which was then ſo far advanced, that had he even beat the French army, it would have made no alteration in the congreſs. This act, inhuman as it was glorious, and which at that time was more eſteemed than blamed, did not produce one ſingle additional article in the treaty; and the lives of two thouſand French, and as many of the enemy, were thrown away to no end."

This peace furniſhes us with a memorable inſtance how much projects are contradicted by events. Holland, againſt whom alone the war was undertaken, and whoſe deſtruction ſeemed inevitable, loſt nothing at all; on the contrary, ſhe gained a barrier, while every other power that had interpoſed to ſnatch her from deſtruction, ſaw themſelves conſiderable loſers, and were obliged to accept the terms preſented to them by France and Holland. It may, as Mr. Rapin very juſtly obſerves, be affirmed with great truth, that it was the king of England's fault alone that Europe had not a more advantageous peace, ſince the parliament was ready to grant plentifully all the neceſſary ſupplies, would Charles have acted agreeable either to the intereſts of Europe in general, or of England in particular. This conduct can only be aſcribed to his paſſion for executing his darling ſcheme of rendering himſelf abſolute maſter of his people. As for the other deſign with which he is charged by that writer and many others, of introducing the popiſh religion into England, I am far from being convinced in my own mind that he really entertained ſuch a thought. All religions were alike to Charles, and the conceſſions which he made in favour of the catholics, ſeem rather to have been the effect of his love for his brother, and ready compliance with any counſels which he adopted, than his own attachment to that particular mode of faith. As I have obſerved elſewhere, it was all one to him whether popery or proteſtantiſm were the religion of England, ſo that he could but enjoy his beloved eaſe and pleaſure.

This year, 1678, was diſtinguiſhed by the diſcovery of the famous conſpiracy in England, known by the name of the Popiſh Plot, which for a conſiderable time engroſſed the whole attention of the legiſlature, and has given occaſion to many politicians to exerciſe their talents in ſupporting the truth, or expoſing the falſity of it, as they were attached to one or the other party. The whole of this affair is indeed ſo replete with contradictions, that I ſhould puzzle my reader, as well as myſelf, was I to attempt the unravelling them. I ſhall

* By the treaty between France and Spain, dated the ſeventeenth of September, 1678, the French agreed to reſtore to the Spaniards, Charleroi, Aeth, Oudenard, and Courtray, the city and duchy of Limburgh, Ghent, the country of Waes, Lewe, St. Guillain, and Puicerda, and all the places they had taken in Sicily. On the other hand, it was agreed that the French ſhould retain the county of Burgundy, or Franchecomté, the towns of Valenciennes, Bouchain, Condé, Cambray, Tournay, Aire, St. Omers, Ypres, Warwick, Warneton, Poperinguen, Baillieul, Caſſel, Bava, and Maubeuſe, which they had conquered this war.

By the treaty concluded between the emperor and France on the third of February, 1679, France renounced all pretenſions to Philipſburg, but were to keep Friburg till an equivalent ſhould be given them.

there-

therefore content myſelf with a plain narrative of facts, as handed down to us by the beſt authorities, and leave every one to draw ſuch concluſions as he may think moſt agreeable to reaſon and ſound ſenſe.

It is ſaid then, that the deſign of this conſpiracy was to kill the king, to ſubvert the government, to extirpate the proteſtant religion, and eſtabliſh popery. The authors and promoters of it were ſaid to be the pope and cardinals, the Romiſh, French, Spaniſh, and Engliſh jeſuits, the ſeminary prieſts in England, who at this time came over in great numbers, and ſeveral popiſh lords *, and others of that party. The duke of York himſelf was deeply ſuſpected of being concerned in it, all but that part relating to killing the king; and, that point excepted, the king himſelf was ſuppoſed to have favoured it, out of revenge to the French king, who had ſo infamouſly deceived him; and as he found he could not any other way hurt Lewis, he thought to give him a ſenſible mortification, by encouraging a perſecution againſt thoſe of his faith, to which he knew he was a great bigot. The article of taking off the king ſeems to be only the project of a part of the conſpirators, to make way for the duke of York to aſcend the throne, who was more forward, active, and leſs fearful than the king, and conſequently more likely to bring the grand deſign of the conſpiracy, the changing the government and religion, to a ſpeedier concluſion.

The chief diſcoverer of this conſpiracy was Titus Oates †, who having been a clergyman of the church of England, reconciled himſelf to the church of Rome, or pretended at leaſt ſo to do, and entered into the number of the Engliſh ſeminariſts at St. Omer's. He alſo went into Spain, and was admitted to the councils of the jeſuits. By theſe means he is ſaid to have got acquainted with all the ſecret deſigns that were carrying on, in order to eſtabliſh popery in this nation; and then returning to England, he digeſted the ſeveral matters he had heard into a narrative, and by the means of Dr. Tonge ‡, a city divine, got a copy of it delivered to the king ||, who referred him to the lord-treaſurer Danby.

It is probable that the two informers thought to make their fortunes by their diſcoveries; but finding that the king did not take much notice of it, they reſolved to communicate it to the parliament; but firſt Oates went and made oath of the truth of the narrative before ſir Edmundſbury Godfrey, a juſtice of the peace, and left one copy of it with him, reſerving another for himſelf. And now the affair taking wind, it was reſolved to bring it before the council, who ſat twice a day for above a week together, to examine into it; and Tonge and Oates had lodgings aſſigned them in Whitehall, with a handſome proviſion to each for their maintenance, and a guard for the ſecurity of their perſons. Upon their informations, which they threw out by wholeſale, ſeveral perſons were apprehended, as, Wakeman, the queen's phyſician; Coleman, the duke of York's ſecretary; and eight prieſts or jeſuits. In Coleman's houſe were found ſeveral letters which ſeemed to concur with Oates's teſtimony, and gave great weight to what he advanced. This, with the murder of ſir Edmundſbury Godfrey ſoon after, who had ſworn Oates to his narrative, confirmed the people in their belief of the plot.

Godfrey had been remarkably active in his office againſt the papiſts, to whom his murder was immediately aſcribed; and the truth was confirmed beyond a poſſibility of doubt, in the opinion of the multitude, by the evidence of Bedloe § and Prance; the latter of whom depoſed that he, with Green, Berry, Hill, and ſome others, dogged the juſtice for ſome time, till they got him into Somerſet-Houſe, where they ſtrangled him with an handkerchief; that they afterwards carried the body, and laid it in a ditch near Primroſe-hill, after having thruſt his own ſword thro' it, in which condition they left him: and indeed when the body was found, it appeared plainly that he had been ſtrangled ¶. Green, Berry, and Hill, were afterwards condemned and executed for the murder, but denied the fact to the laſt.

* The lord viſcount Stafford, the lords Arundel, Bellaſis, and others.

† Echard gives us the following account of this man: "This Oates was the ſon of a ribband-weaver, who afterwards turning anabaptiſt-preacher, and being chaplain to a regiment of Cromwell's forces in Scotland, was there clapt up in priſon upon Overton's plot againſt that uſurper; but having the good fortune to eſcape upon the king's reſtoration, he conformed to the church, and got the living of Haſtings in Suſſex, where he continued till he thought fit to return to his former anabaptiſtical ſtation. This ſon of his had his firſt education in Merchant-Taylors ſchool in London, and next in the univerſity at Cambridge, where he was ſtudent in two colleges, Caius's and St. John's, and where he left no reputation behind him for his parts or learning, though he ſeemed diſtinguiſhed for a tenacious memory, a plodding induſtry, and an unparalleled aſſurance, beſides a particular canting way that appeared in his academical exerciſes. Removing thence, he ſtept into orders, and for a while officiated as curate for his father; after which he enjoyed a ſmall vicarage in Kent, from whence he removed to another in Suſſex; and after that for ſome time got into the duke of Norfolk's family, when he particularly ſided with the Socinians at London; ſo that he became very uncertain as to his principles and religion, and infamous as to his morals."

‡ The ſame author tells, "That Tonge was a man of letters, and a prolific head, filled with all the Romiſh plots and conſpiracies ſince the Reformation. This man was remarkable for his parts and great reading, but of a reſtleſs and humorous temper, full of variety of projects, and ſcarce ever without a pen in his hand, and a plot in his head."

|| On the twelfth of Auguſt (the day after ſigning the treaty of Nimeguen) Dr. Tonge applied himſelf to one Kirby, a chemiſt, that was for ſome time in the king's laboratory, and who had ſome intereſt at court, to deſire the king might be acquainted that he had an information to lay before him, of a plot carrying on againſt his perſon. Kirby took the opportunity of the king's walking in St. James's Park the very next day, to diſcharge his commiſſion, and was ordered to bring Tonge before him at eight that evening. Tonge was at Whitehall at the appointed hour, and put into the king's hand a writing or narrative, which in forty-three articles contained the particulars of a plot. The king, after a negligent peruſal of it, told Tonge that he was going to Windſor the next day, but would put the paper into the hands of the lord-treaſurer Danby, on whom he ordered him to wait the next morning. Rapin.

§ Bedloe was at firſt a menial ſervant to the lord Bellaſis; afterwards going abroad and ſerving in the wars, he aſſumed the title of captain; his character in general was bad. Prance was a goldſmith of London: he recanted his evidence two or three times.

¶ The biſhops Lloyd and Burnet went to view the body; and beſides the circumſtances above mentioned, obſerved that his ſhoes were clean, a mark round his neck an inch broad, his breaſt all over bruiſed, and his neck broken. There were many drops of white wax-light upon his breeches, which he never uſed himſelf: and ſince only perſons of quality and prieſts uſe thoſe lights, this made all people conclude in whoſe hands he muſt have been. Burnet.

The plot was firſt diſcovered in Auguſt, ſir Edmundſbury Godfrey was murdered in the beginning of October, and the parliament met on the twenty-firſt. It appears from the joint teſtimony of contemporary writers, that the king ſhewed great unwillingneſs to have the parliament take cognizance of the plot. He was obliged to take ſome notice of an affair which was the topic of every converſation, and had filled the minds of all ranks of people with fear and apprehenſion; but in his ſpeech to the two houſes at their meeting, he ſaid "he would forbear giving any opinion of the matter, leſt he ſhould ſay too much or too little, and that he would leave the diſcuſſion of it entirely to the law."

But Danby, either afraid of being called to an account, ſhould he conceal an affair of ſo much importance that had paſſed through his hands, or deſirous to ingratiate himſelf with the parliament, in which he had ſo many enemies, diſconcerted all the king's meaſures by opening the matter to the houſe of lords. The king afterwards reprimanded the treaſurer with great ſeverity for this haſty ſtep, which is a clear proof that it was contrary to his deſigns: poſſibly he thought he had already gone far enough in his revenge upon the French king, and was deſirous of ſtopping the proſecution againſt the catholics before it grew too violent.

The lords communicated the intelligence to the commons; and both houſes entered ſo warmly into the matter, that for ſeveral days they ſat from morning till night examining Oates and other witneſſes. At length, on the thirty-firſt of October, they reſolved nem. con. "That the lords and commons are of opinion, that there hath been, and ſtill is, a damnable and helliſh plot, contrived and carried on by popiſh recuſants, for aſſaſſinating and murdering the king, for ſubverting the government, and for rooting out and deſtroying the proteſtant religion."

It was about this time that Bedloe made his appearance as an evidence for the plot, and was examined by the lords. In the mean time, the commons ordered ſeveral perſons, whom Oates had ſworn againſt, to be apprehended; and among others the following noblemen, who were declared papiſts, the earl of Powis, the lord viſcount Stafford, and the lords Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Bellaſis, who were ſent to the Tower.

The depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe being publiſhed, excited ſuch a ferment in the nation, that the king was obliged to iſſue a proclamation, commanding all popiſh recuſants, under the ſevereſt penalties, to repair to their own houſes, and not to venture from thence, without a particular licence, to a greater diſtance than five miles. At the ſame time another proclamation was publiſhed, offering a reward to any one who ſhould diſcover or apprehend a Romiſh prieſt or jeſuit; and a bill, which had lately paſſed the two houſes, diſabling all papiſts from ſitting in parliament, received the royal aſſent. Not contented with this, the commons finding that ſir Joſeph Williamſon, ſecretary of Scotland, had counterſigned ſeveral commiſſions to popiſh recuſants, for this offence, as a member of the lower houſe, committed him to the Tower. The king was greatly incenſed at this commitment of his ſervant, without application firſt made to him, and he inſtantly ordered him to be releaſed: however, he revoked the commiſſions that had given offence, and there the affair dropt.

The late vigorous meaſures taken by the commons againſt the papiſts, were only preparatory to the execution of a project which they had already formed, of excluding the duke of York from the ſucceſſion, as appears by their permitting a debate to ariſe in the houſe for an addreſs to remove the ſaid duke from his majeſty's preſence and councils, which was put off to another day; and in the mean time the king came to the houſe, and in a ſpeech told them, that he would conſent to any bills for their ſecurity in the reign of his ſucceſſor, ſo that they tended not to impede the right of ſucceſſion, nor the deſcent of the crown in the true line; and Charles ſtuck to this on all the attempts that were afterwards made for a bill of excluſion.

The next object that engroſſed the attention of the public was the trial and condemnation of the conſpirators. Coleman, the duke's ſecretary, was the firſt that was tried. On the twenty-ſeventh of November he was brought to the bar of the King's Bench, before the lord chief-juſtice Scroggs, where, upon the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, and his own letters, he was found guilty of high-treaſon, and executed on the third of December. It muſt be confeſſed that Coleman's letters ſufficiently prove how much the king and duke were under a French and popiſh influence *. Other perſons executed for the plot the beginning of the following year and the year after, were, William Ireland and Thomas Pickering, both prieſts; John Grove, a lay-brother; Thomas Whitebread, provincial of the jeſuits in England (who, according to the ſtory of Oates and his party, was to have been created archbiſhop of Canterbury) and Harcourt, Fenwick, Gavan, and Turner, all jeſuits likewiſe, and Langhorne, a popiſh lawyer. Beſides Bedloe and Prance, one Dugdale was a witneſs

* Burnet ſays that Coleman had found leiſure to convey all his papers out of the way, only he forgot a drawer under the table, in which the papers relating to the years 1674, 1675, and part of 1676, were left; theſe, being ſeized, contained many extraordinary paſſages. In particular, he wrote to father la Chaiſe (the French king's confeſſor) "We have here a mighty work upon our hands, no leſs than the converſion of three kingdoms, and by that perhaps the utter ſubduing the peſtilent hereſy which has long domineered over a great part of this northern world. There were never ſuch hopes of ſucceſs, ſince the days of queen Mary, as in our days. God has given us a prince," meaning the duke, "who is become (may I ſay a miracle) zealous of being the author and inſtrument of ſo glorious a work; but the oppoſition we are ſure to meet with is alſo like to be great: ſo that it imports us to get all the aſſiſtance we can."

In another letter he ſaid, "I can ſcarce believe myſelf awake, or the thing real, when I think of a prince in ſuch an age as we live in, converted to ſuch a degree of zeal and piety, as not to regard any thing in compariſon of God Almighty's glory, the ſalvation of his own ſoul, and the converſion of our poor kingdom." In other paſſages, he repreſents the intereſts of England, thoſe of the French king, and thoſe of the catholic religion, as intimately connected. The duke is alſo ſaid to be unalterably attached to the intereſts of Lewis. The king himſelf, he aſſerts, is always diſpoſed to favour the catholics, when he may do it with ſafety. "Money," ſays he in another letter, "is able to perſuade the king to any thing. There is nothing it cannot make him do, were it ever ſo much to his prejudice. It hath ſuch an abſolute power over him, that he cannot reſiſt it. Logic in our court built upon money, has more powerful charms than any other ſort of argument." Burnet. Rapin. Hume.

againſt them; by whoſe evidence it appeared, that when they had killed the king, they were to lay it on the preſbyterians.

The ſame day that Coleman was tried, the king, at the requeſt of the lords, iſſued a proclamation, offering to any one who, before the twenty-fifth of December next, ſhould make any farther diſcovery of the late horrid deſign againſt his majeſty's perſon and government, a reward of two hundred pounds; and if the informer was even principal in the deſign, his majeſty's moſt gracious pardon. Whether from a deſire of gaining this reward, or from a conviction that they had good authority for what they advanced, Bedloe and one Grove had the boldneſs, before the king and council, to accuſe the queen herſelf of being concerned in a deſign to poiſon him, by means of ſir George Wakeman, his phyſician; but their depoſitions appearing vague and inconcluſive, and the king interpoſing his abſolute command to ſtop the proſecution of this affair, nothing farther came of it.

Thus much I have thought neceſſary to lay before my readers concerning this famous plot. Such of them as have leiſure or inclination for examining the minuter circumſtances of the ſeveral trials, with the weight of the evidences for and againſt the conſpirators, will find the whole matter at large in the hiſtories of Rapin, Burnet, and Echard, and the State Trials, from whence we have collected the above account. We are now to proceed to other matters.

Notwithſtanding the appearance of attachment to the proteſtant religion aſſumed by Charles at this time, the generality of the nation, and the parliament in particular, were greatly diſguſted with his conduct, both in civil and eccleſiaſtical affairs; and, wearied out with the continual breach of his promiſes, they reſolved to leave nothing undone to cramp his power of doing harm. They were confirmed in this reſolution by a tranſaction which tranſpired about this time, to the no ſmall mortification of the king, and increaſe of the diſtruſt the parliament had entertained of his principles.

It ſeems that Mr. Montagu, our ambaſſador in France, had aſpired to the office of ſecretary of ſtate, and was greatly incenſed at the lord-treaſurer Danby for having procured it for another. Montagu was ſenſible he had in his poſſeſſion papers that might ruin Danby, and he reſolved to make that uſe of them. With this view he wrote over to his friends here to get him elected for the county of Northampton, then vacant; and they having ſucceeded, he returned ſuddenly to England, without the knowledge or conſent of the king, and took his ſeat in the houſe of commons. Charles ſuſpecting his intention, gave orders for ſeizing his papers, under pretext of his having correſponded with the pope's nuncio while abroad; but Montagu had made ſure of one paper which he knew was alone ſufficient to anſwer his purpoſe: this he immediately produced in the houſe of commons. It was a letter from the treaſurer Danby to Montagu, concerning the baſe negotiations in which Charles had engaged for ſelling his neutrality to the French king, during the war between that monarch and the allies *.

The commons were ſo exaſperated, that they immediately impeached the earl of Danby of high treaſon, deſigning thereby to oblige him to plead the king's orders, who was more ſtruck at in this proceeding than the treaſurer. It is a juſtice done to the character of Danby to obſerve, that he was ſo unwilling to have any concern in this ſcandalous treaty, by which the intereſt of his country was ſacrificed to the views of its moſt dangerous rival and enemy; that, in order to ſecure him from all danger, the king had with his own hand written the following words at the bottom of the duplicate of the letter: "This letter is written by my order. C. R." When this tranſaction came to be diſcovered, and the treaſurer found the houſe had impeached him, he was in the utmoſt perplexity how to act. He did not chuſe to accuſe the king; and unleſs he pleaded his expreſs order for the writing that letter, he knew his head muſt pay the forfeit of his compliance with the royal command. Charles was in as great a dilemma as himſelf: he dreaded to have the ſecret divulged, and therefore aſſured the earl of a pardon if he would ſtand between him and the attacks of the parliament. Danby conſented to conceal his majeſty's orders, and to defend himſelf in the beſt manner he could. In ſhort, Danby exculpated himſelf ſo fully of having given any encouragement to the intrigues of the French miniſtry, as well as of other matters urged againſt him in the impeachment of the commons, that the lords refuſed to commit him to the Tower. The commons inſiſted upon his being taken into cuſtody: a conteſt enſued between the two houſes; and the king, dreading ſome fatal conſequence from the violence of the commons, came to the houſe on the thirtieth of December, and prorogued the parliament. On the twenty-fourth of January following he diſſolved it by proclamation, after it had ſat near eighteen years, and, from the great extent of court influence among its members, had acquired the name of the Penſionary Parliament †. Soon after, writs were iſſued out for the electing a new parliament on the ſixth of March.

Charles, to his great mortification, found that the enſuing parliament was likely to prove as little complaiſant as the laſt; for the elections ſeemed to run againſt the crown, ſuch perſons only being returned as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their oppoſition to popery, and the extent of the regal prerogative. In order therefore to ingratiate himſelf as much as poſſible with the new aſſembly, he prevailed

* It was conceived in the following terms: "In caſe the conditions of peace ſhall be accepted, the king expects ſix millions of livres for three years, from the time that this agreement ſhall be ſigned between his majeſty and the king of France; becauſe it will probably be two or three years before the parliament will be in a humour to give him any ſupplies after the making of any peace with France; and the ambaſſador here has always agreed to that ſum, but not for ſo long a time. If you find the peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the money at all; and all poſſible care muſt be taken to keep this whole negotiation as private as poſſible, for fear of giving offence at home, where for the moſt part we hear in ten days after of any thing that is communicated to the French miniſtry." Burnet. Rapin.

† A modern hiſtorian has the following remark on this parliament; "Such was the concluſion of a parliament, which, one year excepted, had ſat during the whole courſe of the preſent reign. The ſpirit which it had lately diſcovered was very different from that which it breathed in the beginning. Being elected during the joy and feſtivity of the Reſtoration, it was comvailed on his brother the duke of York to ſubmit to an order for his leaving England *. He took the treaſurer's ſtaff from Danby, and gave it to the earl of Lauderdale; but that the former might not, through reſentment or fear, be tempted to diſcover ſecrets which he wiſhed to have concealed, he granted him a free pardon under the great ſeal.

Theſe conceſſions on the part of the king, inſtead of ſoothing the new parliament, which met on the ſixth of March, 1679, rather encouraged them to freſh exertions of their power. The commons began by chuſing Edward Seymour, Eſq; for their ſpeaker; a perſon whom they knew to be a profeſſed enemy to the earl of Danby. The king knew it likewiſe, and refuſed his approbation to their choice, which occaſioned a diſpute between him and the commons, and a prorogation of a few days; when meeting again on the fifteenth, they choſe Mr. Gregory, ſerjeant at law, for their ſpeaker, who was approved of by the king. They preſently reſumed the affair of the earl of Danby, who choſe to abide by his pardon, and withdrew himſelf. Whereupon they paſſed a vote to require him "to ſurrender himſelf to juſtice, on or before the twenty-third day of April next enſuing, on pain of being ſubjected to an act of attainder." Rather than be condemned unheard, Danby ſurrendered himſelf before the day to the uſher of the black rod, and was committed to the Tower. A few days after he produced his pardon, and was remanded thither again. The commons declared this pardon to be illegal and void, and ſo he remained in the Tower till the year 1683.

The king, alarmed at the violence of the parliament, began to purſue ſuch meaſures as he thought moſt likely to charm down the ſpirit of oppoſition which ſo ſtrongly diſplayed itſelf. He offered ſir William Temple, who had been recalled from his foreign employments, the office of one of the ſecretaries of ſtate; but Temple, worn out with buſineſs, refuſed it; however, by his advice the king formed a new privy-council, into which were choſen ſeveral men of abilities, unconnected with the court, or ſuch who were poſſeſſed of the chief influence in both houſes †.

Charles aſſuredly thought that this alteration would have brought the commons into a more compliant humour; but he found himſelf grievouſly miſtaken. The earl of Shafteſbury, though made preſident of the council, finding that he had actually loſt the king's confidence, ſtill adhered to the oppoſition, and employed all his art and intrigue to keep up the flame of animoſity againſt the king and his brother. The houſe of one Bird being ſet on fire by his maid-ſervant, Elizabeth Oakley, ſhe confeſſed ſhe had been inſtigated to commit that crime by one Stubbs, a catholic; and he being queſtioned, owned that father Gifford, his confeſſor, had aſſured him there was no ſin in burning the houſes of heretics. He and Oakley declared, that the catholics in England intended to riſe in arms, and expected to be joined by an army of ſixty thouſand men from France. The commons immediately addreſſed the king for the execution of Pickering and the other condemned jeſuits. They even aſſembled on Sunday to concert meaſures for the preſervation of the king's perſon, and the proteſtant religion, againſt the attempts of the papiſts. They brought in a bill for baniſhing all Roman catholics from London; and on the twenty-ſeventh of April, 1679, they reſolved, "That the duke of York being a papiſt, and the hopes of his ſucceeding to the crown, has been the greateſt encouragement to the preſent conſpiracies, and deſigns of the papiſts, againſt the king and the proteſtant religion. This vote was ſent to the lords by the lord Ruſſel, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Bedford.

Hereupon the king, by the advice of his council, went to the houſe of peers, and propoſed ſuch limitations, in regard to the ſucceſſion of a popiſh prince, as he thought would remove all objections; but theſe limitations, though very conſiderable, were not ſufficient to ſatisfy the commons; and they reſolved to rid themſelves effectually of all their fears, by ſuch a ſtep as they thought could alone ſecure the liberties and religion of the nation. Accordingly, on the fifteenth of May, a bill was brought into the lower houſe, and there read for the firſt time, "To diſable the duke of York from inheriting the imperial crown of England." This bill was commonly called The Bill of Excluſion;" and as it was of ſo important a nature, I believe the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the ſubſtance of it here.

The preamble ſet forth, "That the pope's emiſſaries had ſeduced James duke of York, the preſumptive heir of the crown: that they had converted him to the catholic religion, and engaged him in ſeveral negotiations with the pope, his cardinals and nuncios, for the intereſt of that communion: that by his means they had increaſed the greatneſs of the French king, to the manifeſt danger of England: and that, by the acceſſion of a popiſh prince to the throne, ſupported by foreign alliances, they would in time be enabled to accompliſh their wicked purpoſe of deſtroying the liberty and religion of the kingdom."

compoſed almoſt entirely of royaliſts, who were diſpoſed to ſupport the crown with all the liberality which the habits of the age would permit.

"But many cauſes had ſince concurred to alienate their affections from his majeſty. His open alliance with France, which was ſo inconſiſtent with the intereſt of the nation; his ſecret connections with that crown, which were equally pernicious and diſhonourable; his two ſeveral Dutch wars, undertaken with the ſole view of deſtroying that republic, the chief ſupport of civil liberty; his dangerous deſigns, and even attempts, againſt the rights and privileges of his own ſubjects; his attachment to the catholic religion; his averſion to the proteſtants: theſe and many other circumſtances tended to withdraw their confidence from the king, and to make them oppoſe him in all his meaſures." Hume's Hiſt. of Great Britain. Charles II.

* The duke however required, that his brother ſhould ſatisfy him, as well as the nation, by a public declaration of the illegitimacy of the duke of Monmouth, a natural ſon of his majeſty by Lucy Walters, and born about ten years before the Reſtoration. Being gratified in this requeſt, he withdrew with his family to Bruſſels, where he took up his reſidence. Rapin. Hume.

† The names of the counſellors were, prince Rupert, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord Finch chancellor, the earl of Shafteſbury preſident, the earl of Angleſea privy-ſeal, the dukes of Albemarle, Monmouth, Newcaſtle, Lauderdale, Ormond, the marquiſſes of Winchester and Worceſter, the earls of Arlington, Saliſbury, Bridgewater, Sunderland, Eſſex, Bath, the viſcounts of Falconbridge and Hallifax, the biſhop of London, the lords Robarts, Hollis, Ruſſel, and Cavendiſh, ſecretary Coventry, ſir Francis North chief-juſtice, ſir Henry Capel, ſir John Erneley, ſir Thomas Chicheley, Edward Seymour, and Henry Powle. Temple accepted of a place therein, in order to aſſiſt his prince in the preſent emergency. Rapin. Hume.

The bill then ordained, "That James, duke of York, Albany, and Ulſter, ſhould be incapable of inheriting the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland: that, upon the death or reſignation of the king, the ſovereignty of theſe kingdoms ſhould devolve to the perſon next in ſucceſſion after the duke: that all acts of royalty which that prince ſhould afterwards perform, ſhould not only be void, but held treaſonable: that if he entered any of theſe dominions, he ſhould be deemed guilty of the ſame offence: and that all who ſupported his title ſhould be puniſhed as rebels and traitors."

This bill was read a ſecond time on the twenty-firſt; and the queſtion being put, Whether the bill ſhould be committed? it paſſed in the affirmative by a very great majority (Yea's two hundred and ſeven, No's one hundred and twenty-eight.)

Charles perceiving by theſe, and ſome ſubſequent proceedings of the commons, that they only ſought to drive things to extremity; and hearing, moreover, that they had a deſign to preſent to him a remonſtrance, not much unlike that preſented to the king his father in 1641, in order to inflame the nation againſt him, reſolved to cut ſhort their ſeſſion. Accordingly he went to the houſe of peers on the twenty-ſeventh of May, and, ſending for the commons, paſſed five bills; particularly one for the ſecuring the liberty of the ſubject, called the HABEAS CORPUS act *, and then prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of Auguſt. By this means the Excluſion Bill was dropped for a time.

The oppoſition to the court was not confined to England alone. Here indeed the king had been pretty warmly attacked by parliamentary addreſſes: but the Scots, who were filled with the like ſpirit of diſcontent, had recourſe to terms of a more efficacious kind. The earl of Lauderdale had governed them as high-commiſſioner for upwards of twelve years, during which time he had exerciſed a perfect tyranny over the people. He had been accuſed before the council of England by the duke of Hamilton, and ſeveral other noblemen, who brought unanſwerable proofs of his maladminiſtration; but the king, with whom he was in great favour, had ſtopped any rigorous proceedings againſt him, knowing that his age, and the infirmities conſequent thereupon, muſt very ſoon render it neceſſary for him to reſign; and his majeſty had already deſtined his natural ſon the duke of Monmouth for his ſucceſſor. The preſbyterians or covenanters, however, whom he had in a particular manner oppreſſed, loſt all patience; and, taking advantage of the diſtractions in England, reſolved to right themſelves by force of arms, and openly unfurled the enſigns of rebellion. Sharp, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, was marked out a ſacrifice to their firſt fury. If Burnet may be believed, he had been the foremoſt in the rank of their perſecutors, and what rendered him particularly culpable in their eyes, was his having been formerly one of their party, and even ſent as deputy by them to the Engliſh court at the Reſtoration, to take care of their intereſts there. He thought proper, however, whether from a motive of intereſt or conviction, to ſide with the court. On the removal of the epiſcopal order in Scotland, the archbiſhopric of St. Andrew's was beſtowed upon him, and he ever after proved a heavy ſcourge to the preſbyterians. They now thought the time was come to take full revenge on "this apoſtate, this betrayer of the godly, and perſecutor of Chriſt's church;" epithets they had for a conſiderable time conſtantly deſignated this prelate. Accordingly, a body of them way-layed him as he was returning from the council at Edinburgh; and on the third of May, between eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, attacked his coach near a little country village called Magus, two miles diſtant from St. Andrew's, dragged him out of the carriage, and, regardleſs of the prayers and interceſſions of his daughter, who happened to be with him, murdered him, with every imaginable circumſtance of ſhocking brutality.

This aſſaſſination was celebrated by the covenanters as an exploit worthy the true ſervants of God, and ſerved as a ſignal for their party to fly to arms; and on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month they began to aſſemble their forces, proclaimed the covenant at Rutherglen, ſurprized the city of Glaſgow, iſſued out a proclamation, commanding the magiſtrates to turn out all archbiſhops, biſhops, and curates, with their children and ſervants, within forty-eight hours; and inviting their brethren to join them, who readily eſpouſed the good cauſe, they fell to plundering the adjacent country. Fortunately the miniſtry in Scotland found means to provide for the ſafety of Edinburgh; and the king no ſooner heard of this inſurrection, than he ſent the duke of Monmouth, with a body of forces, into Scotland to ſuppreſs it. The duke being joined by the troops that had been raiſed in that kingdom to make head againſt the rebels, who were by this time ſeventeen thouſand ſtrong, marched incontinently to give them battle. He came up with them at Bothwell-bridge on the twenty-ſecond of June; and falling on them with incredible fury, ſoon gained a complete victory. Near a thouſand of the inſurgents were left dead on the field, and about twelve hundred were taken priſoners. Among the latter were ſeveral of thoſe concerned in the murder of the primate Sharpe, who were inſtantly hanged; a few more afterwards were tried and executed, and the reſt tranſported. Thoſe who eſcaped diſperſed of themſelves, and the public tranquility was perfectly reſtored.

Towards the latter end of Auguſt this year, the king was ſeized with ſo violent a fever, that in a very few days his life was by his phyſicians thought to be in danger. Hereupon it was reſolved by the council, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition of Shafteſbury, their preſident, and others of the country party at that board, to ſend for the duke of York from Bruſſels, who, making a diſpatch proportioned to the importance of the circumſtance, arrived at Whitehall on the ſecond of September; but by that time the king was pretty well recovered.

* This act ordained, that no perſon ſhould be ſent priſoner beyond ſea; that no judge, under the ſevereſt penalties, ſhall refuſe to any priſoner a writ of Habeas corpus, by which the goaler is to produce in court the body of the priſoner (whence the writ has its name) and to certify the cauſe of his commitment and detainer: that, if the jail lie within twenty miles of the judge, the writs be obeyed in three days; and ſo proportionably for greater diſtances: that every priſoner be indicted the firſt term after his commitment, and brought to trial in the ſubſequent term: and that no man, after being diſcharged by order of court, be committed anew for the ſame offence. See ſtat. 31 Car. II.

The duke of York, during his ſtay at court, employed all his influence over the king his brother to ſet him againſt the duke of Monmouth. That young prince, who was poſſeſſed of many amiable qualities, was become extremely popular, and Shafteſbury and the Country Party had already ſingled him out as a proper perſon to fill the place of York in the ſucceſſion to the crown, in caſe they could carry their favourite Excluſion Bill. Monmouth, elated with this flattering proſpect, had been rather too free in his cenſures on the court meaſures. He had not ſpared at ſeveral different times to intimate to his friends, that he was the true and lawful ſon of Charles, who, according to him, had been ſolemnly married to his mother, Mrs. Lucy Walters, daughter of a country gentleman of that name. In ſhort, his ſtrict connection with the party in the oppoſition, and the indiſcretion of his conduct and converſation, afforded but too plauſible a ſuppoſition that he aſpired to the crown. He was tenderly beloved by Charles; and it was not improbable that it was as much with a view to remove him out of the way of temptation, as from any compliance with the applications of his uncle, that the king, after taking from him his commiſſion, and depriving him of ſeveral other employments he held under the crown, ordered him to withdraw to the continent; whereupon he embarked for Holland. The duke of York ſoon after went over to Bruſſels; and Shafteſbury, whoſe projects were now univerſally known, was diſmiſſed from his place of preſident of the council. The duke of York did not remain long abroad; for thinking himſelf at too great a diſtance from the ſcene of his intereſts, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the king, wherein he repreſented to his majeſty, "That he conceived it, for many reaſons, more proper for him to be in his majeſty's dominions, rather than in thoſe of another prince; and therefore made it his humble requeſt to his majeſty, that he would grant him his royal permiſſion to go into Scotland." The king complied with his requeſt; and James leaving Bruſſels, came to London about the beginning of November; and, after having paid his devoirs to his royal brother, he ſet out with his family for Edinburgh, and arrived there on the fourth of December. During his ſtay in Scotland, he made himſelf many more enemies than friends.

The elections for the new parliament running all againſt the court, the king, fearful that they would renew their attack againſt his brother, and traverſe every meaſure he himſelf ſhould chuſe to adopt, determined to put off the ſeſſion for a whole year, and accordingly ſignified this his intention to the council. The members, ſurpriſed at this reſolution, and ſtill more ſo at the peremptory manner in which it was made known to them, reſolved to retire from court, nor longer fill the empty poſts of counſellors that might not counſel. Eſſex reſigned the office of treaſurer, which was beſtowed upon Lawrence Hyde, who, with Sunderland and Godolphin, became the king's chief counſellors. Lord Ruſſel, one of the moſt popular and virtuous men in the nation, quitted the board, ſir William Temple retired into the country, and Robert, earl of Radnor, was named preſident of the council.

Towards the latter end of October, about a fortnight after the parliament had been prorogued, a ſham-plot was diſcovered, contrived by the papiſts, to be revenged on their perſecutors, and to tranſlate the odium from themſelves to the preſbyterians. One Dangerfield, a fellow who had ſuffered almoſt every puniſhment that the law can inflict on the moſt abandoned miſcreant, and ſtood foremoſt in the chronicles of infamy, was tutored for the purpoſe. The catholic party releaſed him out of Newgate, where he was impriſoned for debt, and ſet him to work. He pretended to have been privy to a deſign for deſtroying the king and the royal family, and converting the government into a commonwealth. The king and his brother countenanced the tale, and rewarded him for his diſcovery with a ſum of money; but certain papers which he produced in evidence of his aſſertions, appearing upon examination to be forged by himſelf, he was put under arreſt. All his haunts were ordered to be ſearched; and in the houſe of one Mrs. Cellier, a midwife, a Roman catholic, and an intimate of his, was found the model of the pretended plot, wrote very fair, and neatly made up into a book, tied with a ribband, and concealed in a meal-tub; whence it acquired the name of the MEAL-TUB plot. Finding himſelf thus detected, the incendiary made a full confeſſion of the impoſture, which he ſaid had been contrived by the earl of Caſtlemain, the counteſs of Powis, and the five popiſh lords in the Tower, in order to invalidate the teſtimonies of Oates, Bedloe, and the reſt, againſt the papiſts; and that he was to have accuſed the dukes of Monmouth and Buckingham, the earls of Eſſex, Halifax, and others, with being concerned in a conſpiracy againſt the king and the duke of York. Upon this lord Caſtlemain and lady Powis were committed to the Tower; and the people did not ſpare to cenſure the king himſelf, as a promoter of this deſign againſt the lives and honours of thoſe perſons, who were well known to be obnoxious to him, but with what truth cannot now be determined by us.

Thus much, however, is certain, that the detection of this infamous juggle raiſed anew the ſtorm againſt the catholics. The moſt irritating libels were diſperſed thro' the kingdom: in London the mob, inſtigated, doubtleſs, by their ſuperiors, carried about in proceſſion the image of the murdered ſir Edmundſbury Godfrey, crying out, that ſuch would be the fate of every proteſtant, ſhould a papiſt be ſuffered to ſucceed to the crown. Shafteſbury was at the bottom of all this, and had concerted matters ſo with the duke of Monmouth, that the latter came over to England without the king's leave, and arrived in the city juſt as theſe tumultuous doings were at the higheſt. The frantic demonſtrations of joy that burſt from the populace on the firſt notice of his return, the ſeditious pamphlets that immediately flew about, and in which the duke was repreſented as the only man that could deliver the nation from popery and ſlavery, ſufficiently indicated a deſign to exclude the duke of York from the throne, and to ſet up Monmouth in his ſtead.

Such was the ſtate of domeſtic affairs in England at the cloſe of the year 1679. Many true lovers of their country beheld, with unſpeakable grief, that animoſity between the court and country parties, which ſeemed to threaten a renewal of the fatal year 1641: nor is it at all improbable that ſuch might have been the caſe, if the king's neceſſities had, like thoſe of his father, been ſo preſſing, as to oblige him to aſſemble the parliament, as that unfortunate prince had done; had the Scots not been ſo effectually enſlaved by a ſtanding army which the court kept among them, that they had not power to ſtir; and had not the biſhops and clergy, forgetting every other conſideration in the purſuit of their intereſt, attached themſelves ſo ſtrongly to the court, as to give it a ſuperiority over the oppoſition.

The nation by this time grew impatient at the long prorogation of the parliament. The country party took advantage of this, and by their emiſſaries procured a number of addreſſes to be ſent from different parts of the kingdom, petitioning his majeſty for the ſpeedy aſſembling of the great council of the kingdom. The city of London diſtinguiſhed itſelf on this occaſion: ſir Gilbert Gerard the lord-mayor, with ſeveral conſiderable citizens, went in a body to court, and preſented a petition to the king, praying that he would give orders for the immediate meeting of the parliament, and that the popiſh lords might be brought to their trials. His majeſty returned for anſwer, "That he looked upon himſelf to be the head of the government, and the only judge what was fit to be done in thoſe cauſes."

This reply, however it may have been repreſented by ſome hiſtorians, too much biaſſed by their own prejudices, was certainly well becoming the dignity and majeſty of a ſovereign: nor can we condemn Charles's conduct in this affair, when we reflect that numbers of the old rebel brood appeared at the head of the petitioners of the ſeveral counties.

The court party, however, thought it behoved them to uſe every precaution againſt this growing ſpirit of diſaffection and oppoſition. They found means to have a number of counter-addreſſes ſent up from the towns and boroughs in their intereſt, expreſſing the greateſt abhorrence of ſuch petitions, as an infringement upon the prerogative, which in their expreſſions they took care to advance as high as poſſible. Thus the nation came to be divided into Petitioners and Abhorrers, ſoon known by the names of Whigs and Tories, which both parties, by way of reproach, gave each other, and which have ſo long ſerved to characteriſe the different parties of this iſland *.

The king, however, thought fit to ſuffer the parliament to meet on the twenty-ſixth day of January, 1680, the day they ſtood prorogued to; when he told them, That the diſtractions and jealouſies of the kingdom were ſuch, and ſo heightened by the malice and induſtry of ill-deſigning men, "that he was of opinion, a longer interval of parliament would be abſolutely neceſſary for compoſing and quieting men's minds;" and therefore ordered them to be prorogued, at the ſame time giving them to underſtand, that it would be farther prorogued, unleſs the condition of his allies abroad required their immediate aſſiſtance.

And now the king determined to have the duke of York again near his perſon. Accordingly, he ſent for him out of Scotland, and he arrived at court on the twenty-fourth of February. The city, by a ſtrange inconſiſtent conduct, expreſſed the greateſt joy at his return; invited the king his brother and him to a grand entertainment; and every ſtreet blazed with bonfires, every houſe ſhone with illuminations.

The Whigs were not a little mortified at the duke's return; and the earl of Shafteſbury, who was at the head of that party, and who had for ſome time been making a progreſs thro' the kingdom with Monmouth, in order to acquire him a powerful party among the populace, now took a ſtep that bid fair to effectually ruin the duke of York, and eſtabliſh the intereſts of his patron and pupil Monmouth. He induſtriouſly circulated a report of that nobleman's legitimacy, pretending that the king had been actually married to Mrs. Lucy Walters, or Barlow, the duke's mother; and that the contract of marriage was in a black box entruſted to the care of ſir Gilbert Gerard. Such a report was of a nature not to be paſſed by on the part of the court and the duke of York. Sir Gilbert was examined before the council, and declared upon oath, that he never had ſuch a contract in his poſſeſſion, nor had ever heard that any ſuch writing exiſted. Whereupon the king iſſued a declaration, importing, that he never was contracted to Mrs. Lucy Walters, or Barlow, mother to the duke of Monmouth, nor to any other woman but his royal conſort queen Catherine. This declaration, atteſted by all the privy-counſellors, was regiſtered in the Court of Chancery.

In Eaſter term this year, 1680, the counteſs of Powis being indicted of treaſon upon the evidence of Dangerfield, the jury brought in the bill, Ignoramus: whereupon the lord Stafford, one of the five popiſh lords confined in the Tower, thinking the credit of the plot and its witneſſes began to decline, moved to be enlarged upon bail; but his ſuit was denied. In the ſummer, the earl of Caſtlemain and Cellier the midwife were tried on account of the Meal-Tub plot, and acquitted. The famous informer Bedloe died in Auguſt at Briſtol, having on his death-bed ſigned a depoſition before the lord chief-juſtice North, of the duke of York's being as much concerned in the popiſh plot as any one, excepting what related to the murder of the king.

Though the court party had of late gained ground, thoſe in the oppoſition made ſtrong efforts to retain their influence in the nation, in which they were not a little aſſiſted by the favour of the city of London; which, notwithſtanding the outward marks it had given of regard to the court, was in general averſe to the adminiſtration. An opportunity offered about this time of giving a convincing proof of its real ſentiments: ſir Robert Clayton the mayor had, as uſual, drank to a perſon, by way of nominating him ſheriff, who happened not to be agreeable to the popular leaders. The common-council rejected the nomination, and

* The court party reproached their antagoniſts with their reſemblance to the conventiclers in Scotland, who were commonly called Whigs; a name derived from a kind of buttermilk, upon which the covenanters were ſuppoſed to live: the country party diſcovered a ſimilitude between the courtiers and the popiſh banditti in Ireland, who were uſually diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of Tories; and ſuch was the origin of theſe fooliſh and ridiculous terms, which have ever ſince prevailed in England; and even at preſent ſeem not nearer their end than when they were firſt adopted. choſe the aldermen Bethel and Corniſh, two preſbyterians, for their ſheriffs. There was a great conteſt on the occaſion; but the country party carried their point, to the no ſmall mortification of the court.

All this time the duke of Monmouth, who had been forbid appearing in the king's preſence, upon his having returned to England without his majeſty's permiſſion, was labouring hard to get a party among the people: but the boldeſt ſtroke, and what alarmed the king and the whole court the moſt, was, his going publicly to the King's Bench bar at Weſtminſter, with his friends Shafteſbury, Ruſſel, Cavendiſh, and ten or a dozen more noblemen and perſons of diſtinction, to preſent the duke of York (his uncle) as a popiſh recuſant. The truth of this allegation was but too notorious: the whole kingdom was ſenſible of it; but till this time no perſon had the boldneſs to take ſuch a ſtep, which was regarded as a ſettled deſign to break all meaſures with the duke.

On the twenty-firſt of October the new parliament aſſembled; and it ſoon appeared that the majority of the houſe was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed againſt the meaſures of the court. The king opened the ſeſſion with an eloquent and ſpecious harangue. As he knew that both houſes had greatly at heart the protection of the proteſtant religion, he enlarged a great deal upon that head, and uſed all his endeavours to perſuade them, that he was zealouſly affected to the religion of the church of England, the preſervation of which he would ever make one of his principal cares. He recommended to them, in the warmeſt terms, to lay aſide thoſe party animoſities and diſſenſions, which had hitherto troubled their councils: he declared himſelf ready to join with them in the moſt perfect harmony and union for reſtoring domeſtic peace, by which alone the honour and intereſt of the nation could be effectually ſupported; with much more of the like tendency. But the houſe knew Charles too well to lay any greater ſtreſs upon thoſe profeſſions than they merited; nor could all his rhetoric mollify the diſguſt they had conceived at his conduct, and that of the perſons moſt in favour about him. Inſtead of appearing charmed with, and thankful for, theſe gracious declarations of the ſovereign, they openly cenſured the court for the notorious miſapplication of the generous ſupplies that had been granted to it by the parliament: they expoſed that profuſion, that prodigality of diſpoſition, which rendered the king for ever a beggar, while his people were continually giving with unbounded liberality: they went upon the popiſh plot: they expelled one of their members for having declared in public converſation, that he believed it all a forgery: they voted ſir George Jefferys, one of the king's ſerjeants, and ſir Francis Withens, high-ſteward of Weſtminſter, betrayers of their country, for being Abhorrers, that is, for having joined in counter-addreſſes againſt the petitions for the ſitting of the parliament. They next recommended Dr. Tonge, one of the diſcoverers of the popiſh plot, to the king, for the next eccleſiaſtical preferment that ſhould become vacant; and in all probability Charles would have been obliged to gratify them in this point, had not Tonge died ſoon after. They alſo gave great encouragement to Dangerfield, and indeed to every other perſon that had been in any manner inſtrumental in diſcovering the popiſh conſpiracy.

The maſter-blow, however, remained yet unſtruck; but on the twenty-ſixth of October, within leſs than a week after the meeting of the parliament, the lord Ruſſel, in direct terms, moved for excluding the duke of York from the ſucceſſion. He was ſeconded by ſir Henry Capel, brother to the earl of Eſſex, and ſeveral others joined in the ſaid motion. Whereupon the houſe of commons came to the following reſolution on the twenty-ſecond of November, viz. "That the duke of York's being a papiſt, and the hopes of his coming to the crown had given the greateſt countenance and encouragement to the preſent deſigns and conſpiracies againſt the king and the proteſtant religion; and that, in defence of the king's perſon, government, and the proteſtant religion, they would ſtand by his majeſty with their lives and fortunes; and that, if his majeſty ſhould come to any violent death, they would revenge it to the utmoſt on the papiſts." In conſequence of which vote, a bill was brought in on the fourth of November, "to diſable James, duke of York and Albany, from inheriting the imperial crown of this realm;" which occaſioned ſeveral warm debates. The moſt conciſe abſtract of theſe would fill up many pages; and as they are to be found at large in the printed Debates of the Houſe of Commons, and in almoſt all other hiſtorians, I ſhall omit them, and content myſelf with obſerving, that the bill having made its way thro' the lower houſe, was, on the fifteenth of November, ſent up to the lords, where, though it was carried for a ſecond reading by two voices, it was then thrown out by a majority of ſixty-three againſt thirty, all the biſhops preſent voting againſt it, and the king being alſo there during the whole time of the debate. The noblemen who chiefly diſtinguiſhed themſelves in oppoſing the Excluſion Bill in the houſe of peers, were the earls of Eſſex, Sunderland, and Halifax, who went by the name of the Triumvirate. It was not long, however, before they gave manifeſt proofs of a change of ſentiments.

The country party could not conceal their rage at the loſs of their favourite bill: the commons addreſſed the king to remove lord Halifax, and the other lords who had voted againſt it, from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever: they iſſued writs for apprehending ſeveral gentlemen of rank and fortune, who had been principally concerned, as formen of grand juries, in the abhorring addreſſes: they impeached the lord chief-juſtice North of high crimes and miſdemeanors, for having aſſiſted in the ſame; and the other lord chief-juſtice, Scroggs, of high-treaſon, for having browbeaten the evidences of the popiſh plot. On the thirtieth of November, the lord viſcount Stafford, one of the five popiſh lords in the Tower, was brought to his trial for being concerned in the ſaid plot; and being found guilty by his peers, he was condemned, and on the twenty-ninth of December beheaded on Tower-Hill, continuing to aſſert his innocence to his laſt moment. In a word, it is hard to ſay which is moſt deſerving the cenſure of candid poſterity, the unwarrantable arbitrary proceedings of the king in many former inſtances, or the preſent mad and undiſcerning reſentment of the parliament. Not content with ſhewing theſe marks of their extreme extreme diſpleaſure againſt the court, they paſſed the following votes: "That it is the opinion of this houſe, that there is no ſecurity or ſafety for the proteſtant religion, the king's life, and government of this nation, without paſſing a bill for diſabling James duke of York to inherit the imperial crown of this realm, &c. and to rely upon any other means and remedies, is not only inſufficient, but dangerous."

The king looking upon theſe proceedings as direct attacks upon his dignity and prerogative, and being apprehenſive that if he winked at them, they would ſoon be attended with more ſerious conſequences, reſolved to put a ſpeedy end to their ſeſſion. This coming to the knowledge of the commons, they met early in the morning of the tenth of January, 1681, the day on which the king was expected at the houſe to prorogue it; and came to a reſolution, "That whoever adviſed his majeſty to prorogue the parliament to any other purpoſe than in order to paſſing a bill for the excluſion of the duke of York, is a betrayer of the king, the proteſtant religion, and the kingdom; a promoter of the French intereſt, and a penſioner of France." They had ſome time before refuſed to grant the king any ſupply; and now, leſt he ſhould be able by other means to ſupport the government, and render himſelf independent, they paſſed another vote, importing, That whoever ſhould advance any money upon thoſe branches of the king's revenue ariſing from cuſtoms, exciſe, or hearth-money, ſhould be deemed an enemy to parliaments, and be anſwerable for the ſame in that aſſembly.

Theſe votes were ſcarce paſſed, when the uſher of the black rod came to require their attendance in the houſe of peers; when the king, after having given his conſent to ſeveral laws of real importance and utility to the nation, prorogued the parliament to the twentieth of January, and ſoon afterwards diſſolved it; at the ſame time he iſſued writs for calling another on the twenty-firſt of March, which was to meet at Oxford.

The king, in making choice of this city for holding his parliament, had in view to deprive the country party of the advantage their cloſe connection with the city of London had given them, and at the ſame time to puniſh that capital for the countenance and ſupport it had all along given to the violent councils of the parliament: but here Charles found himſelf deceived, and that he had taken his meaſures wrong. The members of the new parliament in the country intereſt were, almoſt to a man, the ſame as had been returned in the preceding parliament; and they brought with them the ſame reſentment, the ſame avowed ſpirit of oppoſition to all the king's meaſures, and ſeemed determined to be revenged for the indignity they thought had been put upon them, by his majeſty's having ſo ſuddenly, and with ſo high an hand, diſſolved their former ſeſſion.

The aſſembling of this parliament had indeed rather the appearance of thoſe in the diſtracted times of the ſecond, third, and ſixth Henry, at Clarendon, Oxford, and Coventry, than the peaceful and amicable meeting of a ſovereign and his people: each ſide came armed, and attended by their friends and adherents, as if confident of an immediate rupture. The city members (of London) in particular appeared in the midſt of a numerous body of horſemen, diſtinguiſhed by knots of ribbands, inſcribed, NO POPERY, NO SLAVERY. In ſhort, both parties endeavoured to make a diſplay of their ſtrength.

On this occaſion Charles ſhewed a vigor and firmneſs truly becoming a great prince, and ſuch as appeared the more ſurpriſing in him, who had hitherto been remarkable for his facility and irreſolution. On opening the ſeſſion he made a noble, and not inelegant ſpeech; in which, after complaining of the diſreſpectful proceedings of the laſt parliament, which were ſuch, he ſaid, as few princes beſides himſelf would have borne with equal patience; he gave them to underſtand, that as it was not his deſire or intention to exerciſe arbitrary power on them, ſo he would not allow it to be exerciſed over himſelf: and again inculcated to them the neceſſity of moderation in their debates, as that alone could anſwer the ends of the nation, who had deputed them as repreſentatives. He was willing, he ſaid, to give them every poſſible ſatisfaction in his power, in relation to their fears from a popiſh ſucceſſor, by joining with them to eſtabliſh any practicable ſcheme for putting the government entirely into proteſtant hands, during the reign of ſuch an one. In fine, that as on his part he had and would perform every thing that could reaſonably be expected from him, ſo he looked that they ſhould lay aſide their animoſities, and concur with him in that ſalutary end, nor, by a revival of their paſt irregularities, inſpire him with a diſguſt to parliaments.

The commons ſeemed equally indifferent to the menaces or ſoothings of the king: they elected the ſame ſpeaker who filled the chair in the laſt parliament, and they inſtantly adopted the ſame meaſures; the impeachment of Danby, the enquiry into the popiſh plot, and the Bill of excluſion. So bent were they upon carrying this laſt point, that they rejected every expedient offered by the court. In a word, the leaders of the oppoſition were reſolved to be diſſatisfied with every thing they could propoſe, in hopes of humbling them into a perfect compliance with their will. What other motive, for inſtance, can with any ſhadow of reaſon be aſcribed, for their rejecting the following expedient, offered by Ernely, one of the king's miniſters, to remove all their fears of a popiſh ſucceſſor, and which was read in the houſe on the twenty-ſixth of March.

He propoſed, "That the duke of York ſhould be baniſhed five hundred miles from the Britiſh dominions: that the government ſhould be wholly veſted in a regent: that this regent ſhould be the princeſs of Orange; and in caſe of her death, without iſſue or with iſſue (being a minor) her ſiſter the princeſs Anne: that if the duke ſhould have a ſon educated in the proteſtant religion, then the ſaid princeſſes reſpectively to ſucceed in the regency, during the minority of ſuch ſon, and no longer: that notwithſtanding theſe kingdoms, out of reſpect to the royal family, and for the ſake of preſerving the right of ſucceſſion, might be governed by the name of James II. yet no man ſhould take arms from him, or by virtue of his commiſſion, on pain of being capitally puniſhed: that all officers, civil or military, ſhall take an oath to obſerve this ſettlement of the government: that acts of the like nature ſhould paſs in the parliament of Scotland and Ireland: that the duke of York ſhould come into any of the three kingdoms, he ſhall be ipſo facto excluded, and the ſovereignty devolve to the regent: that all papiſts of any conſideration ſhould be baniſhed by name, and their children be educated in the proteſtant religion."

Theſe expedients, however rigorous, as indeed they came very little ſhort of an excluſion, if Mr. Echard, from whom this account is taken, has given us a true one, did not appear to the commons (or they would not think them) a ſufficient barrier againſt popery, though the duke of York and his party were ſo ſenſible of the force of them, that they declared themſelves more againſt the limitations than againſt the excluſion itſelf; and therefore they reſumed their favourite bill, and were proceeding to ſeveral violent reſolutions, when an event happened which created a quarrel between the two houſes, and ended in the breaking up of the ſeſſion.

One Fitz-Harris, an Iriſh papiſt, had been employed by the dutcheſs of Portſmouth, the king's favourite miſtreſs, and another Pompadour, in reſpect to intermeddling with ſtate affairs, in procuring intelligence of any libel wrote by the country party, or of any deſigns formed againſt her, or againſt the court. This man contracted an acquaintance with one Everard, a ſpy of the Excluſioniſts, to whom he propoſed to write a libel againſt the king and the duke of York, apparently with a view to have by this means ſuch a teſtimony in his hands, as might effectually ruin the Whigs in the opinion of the people. Everard was himſelf upon the catch, and came into Fitz-Harris's propoſals, only with an intent to reveal the whole affair to his patrons. They met by appointment; Everard had planted ſir William Waller, a juſtice of peace, where he might diſcover the whole of what paſſed. The heads of a ſeditious pamphlet were drawn up between the two ſpies. Fitz-Harris took the paper away in his pocket, was preſently purſued by the proper officer attending for that purpoſe, and was taken with the writing about him. The commons impeached him in the houſe of lords; but the latter rejected the impeachment, and ordered him to be proſecuted at common law, which occaſioned a difference between the two houſes: and the commons, with their uſual ſpirit, declared, that whatever inferior court ſhould preſume to try Fitz-Harris, or any one that lay under an impeachment, ſhould be deemed guilty of an high breach of privilege. In fine, the diſpute grew warmer and warmer. Charles beheld the quarrel between the two houſes as the moſt favourable pretext he could have wiſhed, for cutting ſhort a parliament which was determined to thwart him in all his meaſures; and by this ſtroke to ſpare his beloved brother from the mortification of farther inſults, and perhaps keep his right of ſucceſſion from being violated. Having fixed his reſolution, he carefully concealed it, even from his greateſt intimates; and going with the utmoſt privacy to the houſe on the twenty-eighth of March, 1681, the day the Excluſion Bill was to have a ſecond reading, he diſſolved the parliament before they had the leaſt intimation of his deſign: after which he took coach, and drove directly for London, where he publiſhed a declaration, containing his reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments; in which he taxed the commons with a deſign to wreſt the regal authority out of his hands, and ſubvert the conſtitution.

This unprecedented act of vigor and reſolution in the king was a thunder-ſtroke to the country party: they were confounded and abaſhed at being thus circumvented; and knowing not what meaſure to have recourſe to, they retired quietly every man to his habitation. Thus far Charles acted with a becoming ſpirit; thus far he ſhewed himſelf worthy of ſwaying the ſceptre of ſo great a kingdom: we wiſh that the ſubſequent part of his conduct was equally free from reprehenſion.

But Charles was a man, and, as ſuch, ſubject to the frailties of human nature: he did not enjoy his triumph with moderation, nor did he duly diſtinguiſh between the irregular attempts of a diſcontented faction to ingroſs all power to itſelf, and the noble efforts of a patriotic ſpirit to withſtand the encroachments of the crown on the undoubted liberties of the ſubject. His parliament had contradicted him; they had wounded him in the tendereſt part; and therefore he determined for the future to govern without them; and the reſt of his reign was ſpent in continual attempts to render himſelf abſolute, in which he ſucceeded but too far, when he grew as cruel and deſpotic as he before appeared mild and merciful.

What contributed chiefly to the eſtabliſhment of his arbitrary power, was the fierce animoſity which then prevailed between the two parties of Whigs and Tories, which the court carefully fomented. Charles applied himſelf particularly to the latter: he had frequent conferences with their leaders; to whom he was conſtantly repreſenting, that the late diſputes, and the diſſolution of two ſucceſſive parliaments, in conſequence thereof, had been entirely owing to the intrigues of the Whigs, who, under the appearance of an extraordinary zeal for the church and the proteſtant religion, concealed the moſt inveterate hatred to monarchy; and that their real deſign was to bring about its ſubverſion, and eſtabliſh a republican form of government upon its ruins; by the means of which, they hoped to get the firſt poſts in the kingdom into their own hands, and enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of a civil war, which might be the unavoidable reſult of their carrying their point: that epiſcopacy, and the liturgy of the church of England, were alike diſagreeable to them: in fine, that they were moſt of them in their hearts either rigid preſbyterians, or rebellious independents.

This artifice had the deſired effect; the epiſcopal party, and all the high-churchmen, took the alarm, and joined themſelves to the court, in order to oppoſe the deſigns of the Whigs: the clergy every where preached up paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, in the moſt ſlaviſh and abſolute ſenſe; and multitudes of flattering addreſſes flowed in from all parts of the kingdom, advancing the prerogative of the crown to the moſt extravagant height. The cry was now changed; the church indeed was ſtill repreſented to be in danger, but it was not from the papiſts now, but from the Whigs and the preſbyterians. In fine, the catholics uniting with the Tories and the common intereſt, they carried all they deſired, and the country party was obliged to bow beneath the power of their adverſaries. The duke of York was ſoon after recalled from Scotland, and reſumed his place at the council-board. Charles, who had an affection for, and confidence in him, that exceeded the bounds of reaſon and ſound policy, followed implicitly all the meaſures he propoſed, and in a manner committed the reins of government into his hands, that he himſelf might enjoy his pleaſures uncontrouled.

The effects of this prepoſterous conduct were ſoon felt by all who had rendered themſelves obnoxious to the court. Fitz Harris was, a little time after the diſſolution of the parliament, tried at the King's Bench bar, condemned, and executed; as was alſo one Oliver Plunket, the popiſh titular primate of Ireland, for a conſpiracy with the French court, in order to ſtir up an inſurrection in that iſland. The moſt remarkable ſacrifice to the reſentment of the court, was Stephen College, a joiner, of London, a man of ſome abilities, who had ſhewn himſelf particularly zealous againſt popery, and from thence had acquired the name of the Proteſtant Joiner. He attended the city members to Oxford, where, it is ſaid, he took ſome indecent liberties, both in ſpeaking and writing verſes, reflecting on the king and court. For this, a bill of indictment of high treaſon was preferred againſt him to the grand jury, but was by them thrown out: the court, however, was not to be thus baffled of its revenge; he was hurried down to Oxford, and methods taken which were not the moſt juſtifiable, to have the bill found there, upon which he was tried, condemned, and executed. On the ſame day that College ſuffered (Auguſt 31) Titus Oates was, by an order of council, turned out of his lodgings at Whitehall, with a prohibition to appear within the precincts of the court. Titus had done the buſineſs he was ſet upon; and indeed it ſhould ſeem he was thought to have overdone it: the popiſh plot was now made a matter of ridicule by the king and his courtiers; the preſbyterians were now become the only traitors.

The ruin of Shafteſbury yet remained to compleat the triumph of the court party. The duke, to whom he had in a particular manner rendered himſelf obnoxious, was fully bent to be revenged on him. He was ſent to the Tower for high treaſon, and his trial was to come on at the Old Bailey in November; but he luckily eſcaped, by the grand jury's not finding the bill of indictment againſt him: on which occaſion there were bonfires and illuminations throughout the city, and even a medal was ſtruck to commemorate the event. Various are the opinions of writers concerning the truth of the crimes alleged againſt the earl, which were nothing leſs than a deſign to ſeize the king at Oxford, to have brought him to London, and compelled him to have yielded to the demands of the parliament. It was ſworn that troops were actually raiſed in London and other places, beſides thoſe who went down with the members, and only waited for the earl of Shafteſbury's orders to march; but I refer to the State Trials for a further account of theſe proceedings.

The duke of York, who all this time governed Scotland as high-commiſſioner, carried every thing there according to the deſire of the court. He is accuſed of having acted in a moſt arbitrary, and even cruel manner, during his reſidence in that kingdom. The Scottiſh parliament was entirely at his devotion. They paſſed an act, acknowleging "That the crown of Scotland had, by an inherent right, by the nature of the monarchy, and the fundamental laws of the kingdom, always deſcended to the heir of blood, and that no law or conſideration could alter the ſucceſſion." They enacted another ſtatute for impoſing upon perſons in office a teſt oath, acknowleging the king's ſupremacy, renouncing the covenant, and eſpouſing the doctrine of paſſive obedience." A clauſe however was admitted in favour of the proteſtant religion, ratifying an old confeſſion of faith, in which the maxim of reſiſtance was inculcated: A ſtrange inconſiſtency! and which ſufficiently proved the whole to be the work of people of different parties, agreeing only in a ſervile ſubmiſſion to the will of their ruler. The earl of Argyle, a nobleman of unimpeached integrity, of the preſbyterian perſuaſion, who had adhered to the king in all his adverſity, refuſed to take this motley oath without an explanation; for which he was condemned to loſe his head, which he prevented, for the time, by eſcaping out of the caſtle of Edinburgh, and retiring into Holland. If we may believe Mr. Hume, and ſome other writers, who appear to be rather overheated with zeal, the duke of York, during his reſidence in Scotland, gave proofs of a ſavage cruelty that out-does any thing we read of to have been practiſed by the Spaniards upon the defenceleſs inhabitants of the new world. For the honour of humanity, we hope theſe reports are exaggerated: certain it is, that the Scottiſh fanatics omitted no opportunity of incenſing the government, by the moſt indecent and bitter invectives: they were actuated by two furious preachers, called Cameron and Cargill; the firſt of whom was ſlain in the act of open rebellion: the other fell by the hands of the executioner, though, after a ſummary trial, about fifteen other perſons ſuffered death, rather than ſay, God bleſs the King, the hardeſt conceſſion impoſed upon them. At length, the duke finding that their infatuation was ſuch, as to bid defiance to all ſeverity, and that they gloried in their ſufferings, ſtopped the hand of the executioner, and the delinquents were only condemned to hard labour for a time proportioned to the nature and degree of their offence. About the cloſe of the year the duke returned to the Engliſh court, where he continued his preſence and influence to the end of this reign. In the mean time, the king ordered the proteſtant diſſenters to be proſecuted with all the rigor of the law, on the ſtatute enacted againſt non-conformiſts in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Before I cloſe the tranſactions of this year, I think it neceſſary to inform the reader of a circumſtance which I omitted in its proper place; namely, that the commons in the laſt parliament aſſembled at Oxford, ordered their votes to be printed every day, that the public might be acquainted with the ſubject of their deliberations; which practice has been continued ever ſince.

The mutual animoſity of the two parties in the kingdom was now inflamed into rage and rancour; and Charles, who ought as a king to have conducted himſelf as the common parent of all his people, openly headed a faction. The city of London had hitherto preſerved its independence; and the Whig intereſt predominated there: but the court found means in the following year 1682, to get the lord-mayor and ſheriffs choſen from among the king's party: this was a great point gained by the Tories; and Shafteſbury was ſo ſenſible ſible of it, and how little favour he had to expect from a London jury under ſuch influence, that he thought fit to quit the kingdom, and take refuge in Holland, in that very country of whoſe ruin he had been the original promoter, and which he had urged in parliament with all that eloquence which he knew ſo well how to adapt to his own intereſt and the circumſtances of the times.

The duke of York, finding the city thus gained over, thought it a favourable opportunity to wreak his vengeance on ſome of its members who had, perhaps, too indecently reflected upon his character; the principal of theſe were, Pilkington, an alderman, whom he ſued in a writ of ſcandalum magnatum, and was caſt in damages to the amount of one hundred thouſand pounds, in direct violation of that excellent clauſe in Magna Charta, which ſays, "No one ſhall be amerced to his utter ruin." Sir Patience Ward, who had ſerved the office of lord-mayor, and gave evidence in behalf of the alderman, was ſued for perjury, and condemned to the pillory; which ignominious ſentence he underwent in that very city, and in the view of theſe very people over whom he had ſo lately ruled as ſupreme magiſtrate.

The year 1682 furniſhes us with few memorable events, except the triumph of the court and the Tories, the ruin of the Whig party, and the perſecution of the preſbyterians. Some things remain which perhaps the reader may not be diſpleaſed to find noticed. In the beginning of the year Thomas Thynne, Eſq; was aſſaſſinated in his coach in the open ſtreet, at the inſtigation of count Coningſmark, on a quarrel about a lady; for which three perſons, one of them the count's footman, was executed.

Two extraordinary embaſſies arrived in England this year, one from the emperor of Fez and Morocco, and the other from the king of Bantam, in the Eaſt-Indies.

On the twenty-ninth of November, this year, died prince Rupert, in the ſixty-third year of his age. He was duke of Cumberland, and earl of Holderneſs, in England; ſo created by his uncle king Charles I. in 1643. This prince was the third ſon of Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, daughter of king James I. and brother to the princeſs Sophia; on whoſe iſſue the crown of Great-Britain was ſettled by act of parliament, the laſt year of king William III. He made a diſtinguiſhed figure both by ſea and land, in this and the former reign; and died covered with military glory.

About the ſame time died John Maitland, duke of Lauderdale, earl of Guildford, in England, who had the adminiſtration of the affairs of Scotland in his hands great part of this reign; in which office he created himſelf innumerable enemies: his death was little regretted in either kingdom. Heneage Finch, lord chancellor, an eloquent ſpeaker, and an upright counſellor, who had been created earl of Nottingham, alſo left the world this year: nor muſt we forget to mention that the earl of Shafteſbury died in Holland, within three months of his arrival there, in the ſixty-ſecond year of his age.

There were ſeveral removals at court, and creations of nobility, the latter end of this year; the privy-ſeal was taken from the earl of Angleſea, and given to George Saville, earl of Halifax, who was thereupon created marquis of Halifax; the earl of Sunderland was again called to the council-board, and on the reſignation of lord Conway made ſecretary of ſtate again: among other creations we muſt not paſs unnoticed that of colonel John Churchill (afterwards the famous duke of Marlborough), who was made baron Churchill of Aymouth; the duke of Grafton, one of the king's natural ſons, was made vice-admiral of England, vacant by the death of prince Rupert.

The fore-part of the year 1683 was diſtinguiſhed by a memorable exertion of deſpotic power, on the part of the crown; I mean the diveſting the city of London of its charter. The laſt year there had been a very great riot raiſed by the Whig party, in which they had carried matters to ſuch an unwarrantable length, as to arreſt Sir William Pritchard, the lord-mayor, ſheriff North, and ſeveral other aldermen of the court party, in an action at the ſuit of Papillon and Dubois, under pretence of the damages theſe latter had received by not being returned ſheriffs. The lord-mayor and his brethren were kept in cuſtody till midnight, and then releaſed: the common-council, however, apprehenſive that the court would reſent this outrage on the ſupreme magiſtrate of the capital, and the reſt of their friends, publicly diſclaimed the action, by an order of common-council, declaring therein their diſavowal and diſapprobation of the ſame; and turned out one Broom, who had been particularly active in the riot, from his place of coroner, declaring him incapacitated to enjoy any place or preferment in the city for the future.

Soon after the election of ſheriffs coming on, the Whigs again raiſed a furious riot, in which they aſſaulted the lord-mayor, forced him upon his knees, threw off his hat, beat down the ſword that was carried before him, and continued the hall, in ſpite of his adjournment. For this and the former proceedings, it was determined to bring a Quo warranto againſt the city, to ſhew they had forfeited their charter by theſe tumultuous doings: in the mean time, on the eighth of May this year, the attorney-general, by order, laid an information againſt fourteen perſons concerned in the latter riot; theſe were the then ſheriffs Pilkington and Shute, now lord Grey of Werk, Sir Tho. Player, Corniſh Bethel, and others of inferior note, who were tried, convicted, and condemned in heavy fines. The city, in order to reconcile themſelves to the court, did about this time ſet up the ſtatue of king Charles I. in one of the niches of the Royal Exchange, and made ſeveral ſubmiſſions, but all in vain; for the court, glad of this opportunity to humble the capital, was reſolved not to let it ſlip.

Accordingly, on the twelfth of June, a writ of Quo warranto was brought by the king againſt the city, in the King's Bench of Weſtminſter, that is, an enquiry how it became a corporation, and "by what warrant" it enjoyed its privileges. On ſuch occaſions, the corporation againſt which the Quo warranto is iſſued, produces the charter of its privileges; and the queſtion is, Whether it has exactly obeyed the conditions and articles of its charter?

On this occaſion, excluſive of the late treaſonable inſurrections, as the court party affected to call the late riots, it was pretended that the city had forfeited all its privileges, and ought no longer to enjoy the rights of a corporation, by reaſon of two offences, which the court of aldermen and common-council had committed.

After

After the great fire in 1666, all the markets had been rebuilt, and had been furniſhed with many conveniences; and in order to defray the expences of theſe reparations, the magiſtrates had impoſed a ſmall toll on all thoſe who brought any goods to market. This was ſuppoſed to be an uſurpation of powers to which they had no title, and an encroachment on the prerogative of the king, and the privileges of the parliament, who alone had a right to impoſe taxes.

In the year 1679, the city had addreſſed the king againſt the prorogation of parliament, and had made uſe of the following expreſſion: "Your petitioners are greatly ſurprized at the late prorogation, whereby the proſecution of the public juſtice of the kingdom, and the making of neceſſary proviſions for the preſervation of your majeſty, and your Proteſtant ſubjects, have received interruption." Theſe words were conſtrued into a ſcandalous reflection on the king and his meaſures *.

The attorney and ſolicitor generals conducted the ſuit in behalf of the crown; the defence of the city was managed by Treby and Pollexfen, then eſteemed the two moſt eminent men in their profeſſion; the pleadings were drawn out to a very great length; for which I muſt again refer the reader to the State Trials: the reſult of the matter was, that the court gave judgment againſt the city, whoſe liberties and franchiſes were declared to be forfeited, and ſentence given that they ſhould be ſeized into the king's hands. Severe reflections were then, and ſtill are, made on this judgment, greatly to the diſhonour of the king and the court. However that may be, the citizens were ſtruck with the greateſt conſternation; and the common-council aſſembled to conſult what was to be done in this exigency. It was propoſed, by an entire ſubmiſſion to the will of the court, to deprecate its wrath; and thus prevent the recording the Quo warranto, and the total extinction of the liberties of the city: this propoſal was warmly combated by the Whig party; they repreſented the late action of the court as a moſt notorious violation of their rights and charters; to which, added they, we ſhall in ſome meaſure be acceſſary, if by a daſtardly ſubmiſſion we acknowlege their aſſumed authority. Fear, conjoined with intereſt, however, prevailed over that firmneſs and reſolution which might have been expected from the capital of the Engliſh nation. An humble deputation was ſent to his majeſty, requeſting the reſtoration of their charter: the king granted their petition, but not till they had made ſuch conceſſions as, in effect, annihilated even the ſhadow of liberty amongſt them †.

The city of London thus humbled, all the other corporations in the kingdom thought it would be in vain to ſtruggle with the court; and moſt of them tamely reſigned their charters into the hands of the king; nor could they obtain the reſtoration of them till they had paid conſiderable ſums; and even then all the places of power and profit were, like thoſe of the capital, left entirely at the diſpoſal of the crown. This was truly the triumph of deſpotiſm. The Engliſh were no longer that bold and reſolute people who had made their monarchs tremble on the throne, in defence of their ancient privileges; they were dwindled into daſtardly ſlaves, who courted the yoke of oppreſſion, and ſervilely licked the feet that trampled on their freedom.

We are now come to the diſcovery of the Proteſtant Plot, as it was called, though it is difficult to conceive the propriety of that term in a proteſtant country. It is commonly known by the name of the Rye-houſe Plot, from a houſe ſo called, in the road to New-market, poſſeſſed by Richard Rumbald, one of the conſpirators, where it is pretended a deſign was formed to aſſaſſinate the king and his brother. It is almoſt impoſſible for an hiſtorian who relates the events of theſe times, not to diſpleaſe ſome part of his readers, and incur the cenſure of partiality, if he goes about to determine the truth or futility of the facts advanced by either party. I ſhall therefore confine myſelf to the ſimple narrative of thoſe circumſtances that were acknowledged by both parties.

The firſt perſon who diſcovered this conſpiracy was Joſias Keeling, ſalter and citizen of London, who made and ſubſcribed his confeſſion on the twelfth day of June this year, before the earl of Dartmouth and Mr. ſecretary Jenkins; but reflecting that the depoſition of a ſingle witneſs would not be ſufficient, he prevailed upon Goodenough, under-ſheriff of London, and one of the conſpirators, to admit his brother John Keeling to the next meeting of thoſe concerned in the plot. This was done; and then Joſias Keeling taking his brother John with him to the ſecretary, they both gave their joint teſtimony upon oath, on the fourteenth of June. Upon the depoſitions of theſe two men, a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending colonel Rumſey, Rumbald maſter of the Rye-houſe, Nelthorpe, Wade, Goodenough, Walcot, Thompſon, Burton, and Home. Rumſey ſurrendered himſelf; and upon his confeſſion, which was confirmed by Weſt and Sheppard, two others of the conſpiracy, there was another proclamation iſſued for apprehending the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, and Robert Ferguſon. Shortly after, the lord Howard of Eſcrick came in; and upon his information warrants for high-treaſon were iſſued out againſt the earl of Eſſex, the lord Ruſſel, and others, who were accordingly apprehended.

The plot is ſaid to have conſiſted in the following particulars: To attack the king's guards, and ſeize the perſons of the king and his brother; and if that attempt ſhould miſcarry, to aſſaſſinate the king and the duke in a hollow way near the Rye-

* Rapin. Smollett. Hume.

† They were as follow: "That no mayor, or other officer of the commonalty, ſhould exerciſe his office, until his election ſhould be confirmed under the king's ſign manual: that in caſe his majeſty ſhould diſapprove of their choice of a mayor and ſheriffs, they ſhould proceed to a new election; and provided the ſecond election ſhould be diſagreeable to the king, they ſhould appoint perſons of his own nomination: that the mayor and court of aldermen ſhould be impowered to diveſt any alderman of his office by the king's permiſſion: that ſhould any alderman, after his election, be deemed incapable by the court of aldermen, the ward ſhould be obliged to chuſe another; and ſhould he prove unacceptable to the court, a third ſhould be elected by the court itſelf; and that the juſtices of the peace in London ſhould act only by the king's commiſſion."

houſe, in their return from Newmarket. This done, the conſpirators were to have repaired in all haſte to London, to join their brethren in the city, aſſemble their forces, and break out into open rebellion *. The priſoners were not kept long in confinement: Walcot was firſt brought to his trial on the twelfth of July. The evidences againſt him were Rumſey, Weſt, and one Bourne a brewer, who all concurred in depoſing that the priſoner had been at ſeveral meetings held the preceding year, on the buſineſs of the plot: that he was to have been an active perſon therein, being pitched upon to head thoſe who were to attack the king's guard. Walcot in his defence alleged, and offered to prove by undoubted teſtimony, that he was ill of the gout all the time the king was at Newmarket. The evidence againſt him was, however, greatly confirmed, by a letter wrote by the priſoner himſelf, while under confinement, to ſecretary Jenkins; wherein he promiſed to reveal all that he knew in either of the three kingdoms, relating to a plot againſt his majeſty, if he might be ſecured of the royal pardon. In concluſion, he was found guilty of high-treaſon by the jury. Home and Rouſe were likewiſe tried and condemned, and in a few days all three were executed at Tyburn.

The next perſon who was brought to his trial was the lord Ruſſel, ſon to the earl of Bedford. The witneſſes produced againſt him were Rumſey, Sheppard, and the lord Howard of Eſcrick, a man who had been his intimate friend. Tho' the evidence againſt this nobleman was, by every impartial perſon, held as ſlight and imperfect, yet he too was brought in guilty. His caſe was by moſt people thought very hard; for he was condemned only for words ſpoken by others in his preſence. Lord Howard was the chief evidence, and he was obliged to ſave his own life. By his conduct in this affair, he rendered himſelf ſo odious to every one, that not a man of character or reputation of either party would be afterwards ſeen in his company. The lord Ruſſel was a nobleman univerſally beloved, and many eminent perſons appeared for him, as, the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Angleſea, the lords Cavendiſh and Clifford, Dr. Tillotſon, and Dr. Burnet; but all to no purpoſe.

But what was ſuppoſed chiefly to have prejudiced the jury againſt lord Ruſſel was, an accident that happened during the trial: the earl of Eſſex that very morning was found dead in the Tower, with his throat cut in a ſhocking manner. The news of this was immediately carried to the Old Bailey, and ſerved to impreſs the minds of the judges, the council, and the jury, with a belief of the reality of the plot, ſince the earl of Eſſex, rather than ſtand his trial, had choſen to lay violent hands on himſelf. The king's council and the lord chief-juſtice made a ſuitable uſe of this incident in their charge to the jury; though it was afterwards induſtriouſly given out that the earl was murdered by other hands than his own, and even by order of the king and the duke, who had been in the Tower that very morning, where they had not been for many years before. This, however, to uſe the words of a modern hiſtorian †, "is a circumſtance which might naturally be interpreted in their favour; for had they really been concerned in ſuch an atrocious crime, they would have hardly appeared upon the ſcene; a ſtep which could not fail to raiſe the ſuſpicion of the public:" beſides, not to mention the atteſtation of Dr. Burnet, who had it from the earl's family, that he was not only ſubject to great fits of the ſpleen, but was a profeſſed advocate for ſuicide, it is our duty to take notice, that the counteſs of Eſſex, who had cauſed all imaginable enquiries to be made after the cauſe of this fatal end of her lord, did publicly declare herſelf ſatisfied that he had met with no foul play, and concurred in the verdict of the coroner, who declared the deceaſed felo de ſe. But to return:

After the condemnation of the lord Ruſſel, a petition was preſented to the king by his lady, daughter of the good earl of Southampton, for a pardon, which it ſeems probable would have been granted, had not the priſoner inſiſted to the laſt, that reſiſtance was lawful; a doctrine which the court, or rather the duke of York, who conducted all its determinations, held incompatible with the duty and loyalty of a ſubject. Moreover, the duke could never forgive Ruſſel for the zeal he had ſhewed in behalf of the Excluſion Bill: in fine, all intreaties to ſave him were ineffectual, and on the twenty-firſt of July, 1683, he was beheaded in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, whither he was attended by Dr. Tillotſon and Dr. Burnet. He died with the greateſt compoſure and reſignation, denying with his laſt breath his having been privy to any deſign againſt the king's perſon, or to alter the government: he profeſſed his entire belief in the popiſh plot, and his firm attachment to the proteſtant religion.

For a concluſion to this tragedy, I muſt mention the trial, condemnation, and execution of colonel Algernon Sydney, brother to the earl of Leiceſter, who was accuſed of being concerned in this plot to kill the king. This gentleman had been deeply engaged in ſupport of the republican ſchemes and form of government during the late troubles: he had even been nominated one of the late king's judges, but declined taking his ſeat on that infamous occaſion. He was, however, a ſworn foe to monarchy, on the reſtoration of which he withdrew into Holland; but deſirous of reviſiting his native country, he took the benefit of the act of indemnity, and in 1677 returned to England. He ſoon engaged in the country party, became a warm ſtickler for the Excluſion Bill; and, in a word, oppoſed with all his intereſt and eloquence, every deſign and meaſure of the court. Such a conduct could not fail to render him highly obnoxious to thoſe in power, and it was reſolved to ſtretch the law to the utmoſt in order to effect his ruin. In the month of November he was brought to his trial: the only witneſs who depoſed againſt him was lord Howard. In the courſe of his trial, he proved by the teſtimonies of the earls of Angleſea and Clare, Mr. Philip and Mr. Edward Howard, Dr. Burnet, and others, that the lord Howard had

* This conſpiracy, it ſeems, was firſt formed a little after Midſummer the preceding ſeſſion 1682, and every thing was in readineſs for the intended aſſaſſination, in the beginning of the ſpring of the year, when the king and duke were, as uſual, to go to the races at Newmarket; but a fire happening in that town on the twenty-ſecond of March, which burnt down the palace, his majeſty was obliged to return to London a week ſooner than was expected, and thus the deſign was fruſtrated. confeſſed, "That he could not get his pardon till he had done ſome other jobbs, and had gone thro' all the drudgery of ſwearing:" but no notice was taken of this; nay, although the law expreſly requires two witneſſes, the king's council had recourſe to a ſtrange expedient to ſupply this defect, and which, to the diſgrace of a court of judicature, was admitted as competent by Jefferies, lately made lord chief-juſtice of the King's Bench, who afterwards rendered himſelf ſo infamous in the ſucceeding reign. His houſe having been ſearched, among his papers was found a manuſcript on the Original and Forms of Government, which appeared to be an anſwer to a book written by ſir Robert Filmer, to prove that, by the laws of God and nature, kings, and particularly thoſe of England, were inveſted with abſolute and unlimited power. Sidney in his manuſcript Anſwer had aſſerted a doctrine the reverſe of this, and in terms that were equally extravagant; but this Anſwer had never been publiſhed, nor even printed, and intended only for his private uſe or amuſement: nevertheleſs, the council inſiſted that this book was equivalent to a ſecond witneſs, inaſmuch as it was a proof of his principles and intentions. Finch declared it an overt act, obſerving, ſcribere eſt agere, that writing is acting. Jefferies delivered it as law, and ſaid all the judges were of the ſame mind *. In ſhort, the jury brought him in guilty, and he ſuffered on the ſcaffold the ſeventh of December, the king having changed his ſentence of hanging to decapitation.

I ſhall not trouble my reader with the trials of the other accomplices in this plot, real or pretended, as they furniſh nothing worthy his notice, after what has been already delivered. I ſhall only obſerve, that ſome of them were moſt heavily fined, and others committed into the hands of the executioner. Sir Thomas Armſtrong, who was thought to have been the principal inſtrument in ſeducing the duke of Monmouth from his duty, was executed without trial, and his limbs diſperſed thro' the principal towns of the kingdom. Titus Oates was about this time accuſed of ſpeaking ſome diſreſpectful words of the duke, and condemned in a fine of one hundred thouſand pounds, and committed to priſon till he could pay it. A like fine was impoſed upon one Dutton Colt, for a like offence; and ſir Samuel Barnardiſton, who had incurred the diſpleaſure of the court, by having been foreman of that jury which rejected the bill againſt the earl of Shafteſbury, was amerced in ten thouſand pounds, becauſe in ſome private letters which had been intercepted, he had taken the liberty of cenſuring the public meaſures. I mention theſe trials, though they have no connection with the Ryehouſe Plot, in order to ſhew the temper of both judges and juries at this period, and the little ſecurity men had for the enjoyment of their lives or fortunes.

The duke of Monmouth, who had abſconded on the firſt diſcovery of the plot, now wrote two letters to the king, full of the moſt humble and ſubmiſſive expreſſions. Monmouth was the beloved ſon of Charles, who felt all his tenderneſs revive, accepted of the guilty youth's ſubmiſſions, and allowed him to come to court; nay, the king indulged him ſo far, as to promiſe he ſhould not be obliged to give public evidence againſt any one: he was, however, required to ſign a letter owning the plot in general, and tacitly juſtifying the evidence againſt thoſe who had ſuffered. This letter, which was actually ſigned by the duke, the reader will find in the note †. Monmouth in a few days repented of the ſtep he had taken, and with great earneſtneſs entreated the king to return him the paper. Charles was ſo highly incenſed at this behaviour, that he baniſhed Monmouth the court, who went over to Holland, where the king, notwithſtanding all that had paſſed, correſponded with him by letters, unknown to the duke of York, and privately made him remittances of money.

Whilſt the trials for the Ryehouſe Plot were depending, the univerſity of Oxford preſented their famous Decree to his majeſty; a ſervile piece of court flattery, more ſuitable to an abſolute monarchy than a limited one, ſuch as is that of England; and the Oxonians, in the overflowings of their loyalty, ſeemed to have held for nought the natural rights and liberties of mankind.

The diſcovery of the late plot had wrought greatly upon the people in favour of Charles; they ſtill had an affection for his perſon, and could not without horror reflect on any attempts levied at his life. The ſeverities lately practiſed were univerſally attributed to the duke of York, and that prince became daily more diſagreeable to the nation: his enemies omitted no opportunity to blacken his character, and we ſhall find that the hatred he had brought upon himſelf by his unpopular conduct, was the principal cauſe of his being ignominiouſly driven from the throne of his anceſtors, to which he had otherwiſe an indiſputable right. His brother Charles, deſirous to increaſe his own popularity by every poſſible expedient, and knowing the fear of popery to be the predominant paſſion in the minds of his people, thought proper to beſtow his niece Anne, daughter to the duke of York, on prince George, brother to the king of Denmark, a proteſtant. The nuptials were celebrated on the twenty-eighth of July this year, about the height of the aſſaſſination plot: but though he gratified his ſubjects in this inſtance, no conſideration could induce him to ſummon a parliament, or truſt the nation with the election of new repreſentatives, who might, in their collective capacity, become formidable to his newly-aſſumed deſpotic power. In this reſolution he was ſtrongly upheld by his brother York, who at the ſame time put him upon ſuch meaſures, and rendered it indeed unſafe to convene ſuch an aſſembly.

Tangier, on the coaſt of Barbary, part of queen Catherine's portion, was by the king's order de-

† "I have heard of ſome reports of me, as if I ſhould have leſſened the credit of the late plot, and endeavoured to weaken the evidence given againſt thoſe who have died by the hands of juſtice. Your majeſty and the duke know, how ingenuouſly I have owned the late conſpiracy; and though I was not conſcious of any deſign againſt your majeſty's life, I yet lament my having had ſo great a ſhare in the other parts of that conſpiracy. I have therefore, ſir, taken the liberty to put this into writing for my own vindication: I beſeech you to look forward, and endeavour to forget the faults you have forgiven me. I will take care, on my part, never to commit any more againſt you, or incur the danger of being miſled from my duty; but make it the ſtudy of my life to deſerve the pardon which your majeſty hath granted to your dutiful

moliſhed

moliſhed this year, as in his preſent diſpoſition not to call a parliament, he could not ſupport the expence of keeping it.

As the city of London had not formally acknowleged their acquieſcence in the decree iſſued againſt them, the king ordered the judgment on the Quo warranto to be recorded; then he ſeized the government of the city into his own hands, and ſent a commiſſion to ſir William Pritchard, continuing him in the office of lord-mayor during his pleaſure. He likewiſe confirmed the two ſheriffs under the ſame reſtriction, but diſmiſſed the recorder, and put another in his place.

Little happened abroad this year worthy our attention, unleſs the memorable ſiege of Vienna, the capital of the empire; before which Cara Muſtapha, the Turkiſh grand vizier, at the head of one hundred and thirty thouſand men, ſat down about the middle of July; and having reduced the place to the laſt extremity, was, on the twelfth of September, obliged to abandon his enterprize, by John Sobieſki king of Poland, and the duke of Lorraine, general of the Imperialiſts. On this occaſion the Turks received the greateſt defeat from the Chriſtians that is mentioned in hiſtory, it being computed that no leſs than ſeventy thouſand of the Infidels were killed at the ſiege and in the battle. Several Engliſh volunteers ſignalized themſelves in the defence of Vienna, and among them the lord Lanſdown, ſon to the earl of Bath; in conſideration of whoſe merit the emperor created him a count of the Roman empire.

In the beginning of the year 1684, the earl of Danby, who had remained ſeveral years a priſoner in the Tower, and had often, but in vain, moved to be admitted to bail, was brought to the King's Bench bar, and indulged with that privilege, on entering into a recognizance himſelf in ten thouſand pounds, and two of his friends five thouſand pounds each, for his appearance in the houſe of lords the next ſeſſion of parliament. The four popiſh lords remaining in the Tower were alſo admitted to bail on the ſame day (February 12): the lord Petre had died in that place about a month before. On his death-bed he had ſent a letter to the king, wherein he declared, by his hopes of ſalvation, that he was innocent of the plot with which he was charged.

The greateſt part of this year was taken up with proſecutions againſt diſaffected perſons, as they were called; that is, every one who offered to ſpeak or write againſt the worſe than Turkiſh deſpotiſm now exerciſed by the court. Among others was Mr. Samuel Johnſon, who had been the lord Ruſſel's chaplain, and was now fined in five hundred marks for writing a book, entitled, Julian the Apoſtate; in which he expoſed and confuted the prevailing notions of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance. A great many other perſons were tried for ſpeaking ill of the king, the duke, and the government, who were fined in large ſums, and ſome of them pilloried. Sir George Jefferies, chief-juſtice of the King's Bench, ſignalized himſelf in a particular manner on theſe occaſions: equally devoid of honour, humanity, and conſcience, he raiſed himſelf to that high poſt by the moſt ſervile complaiſance to the will of the duke of York and his party. During his holding aſſizes in the north, he ſo terrified the people by his arbitrary and unjuſt ſentences, that all the towns corporate, by way of conciliating the favour of the court, delivered up their charters, and threw themſelves entirely upon the mercy of the government. The king having thus obtained poſſeſſion of theſe invaluable pledges of the people's liberties, thought proper to publiſh a declaration, thanking his ſubjects in the moſt affectionate terms for having repoſed ſuch confidence in him their ſovereign, aſſuring them he would uſe it with moderation, and convince the moſt extravagant republicans, that as the crown was the origin of the people's rights, ſo it was the ſureſt ſupport of their liberties *.

In order however to engage the affections of a prince inveſted with ſuch power, the Hamburgh company thought proper to erect a marble ſtatue to him this year, in the midſt of the Royal Exchange, where it ſtill remains, with an inſcription on the pedeſtal flattering him as if he had been the greateſt and beſt of all kings; but alas! how vain, how empty are thoſe titles which ſervile adulation beſtows contrary to the general ſentiments of a nation, and how little capable of impoſing upon impartial poſterity!

In the midſt of all theſe triumphs of ill-acquired power, Charles ſecretly languiſhed beneath the conſcious guilt of being the oppreſſor of a free and generous people: he had been put upon meaſures, he had yielded to counſels that his own heart told him were not conſiſtent with his own honour, or the welfare of his people: by nature formed of a gentle diſpoſition, he had ſuffered arbitrary, and even cruel proceedings to receive the ſtamp of his royal authority: he ſaw, but he ſaw too late, that while he compelled his ſubjects to ſubmit to his deſires through fear, he had loſt the firmeſt hold a monarch can have over the millions ſubjected to his dominion, the maſtery over their hearts; and, if we may believe thoſe moſt converſant about the court at that time, he began to form a deſign of altering his conduct, of throwing himſelf upon his people, and renewing the true conſtitutional intercourſe between a Britiſh king and a Britiſh parliament.

In the mean time, however, his miſtaken maxims of domeſtic government had likewiſe influenced his conduct in regard to foreign affairs; and while he was intent on rendering himſelf abſolute at home, he had ſuffered the French monarch almoſt to enſlave the reſt of Europe. Lewis, notwithſtanding the peace of Nimeguen, continued to give laws to half the princes on the continent: he ſeized into his hands the antient and free town of Straſburg: on the pretence of a ſlight affront, he bombarded Genoa: the empire he inſulted in its head and principal members. Theſe arbitrary proceedings at length rouſed the court of Spain, and ſhe declared war againſt this general oppreſſor, weak as ſhe was, relying on the powers of Europe, who, according to the dictates of common reaſon and good policy, ſhould have flown to her aſſiſtance. The prince of Orange indeed, to his honour be it ſpoken, exerted his utmoſt endeavours to defeat the deſigns of Lewis; but Charles diſcovered not the leaſt jealouſy of the growing power of France; he rather ſeemed inclined to aid her ambitious monarch in his ſchemes of univerſal empire,

empire. Europe ſaw and trembled at this ſupineneſs in a prince, who by his ſituation had in his hands the balance of her liberties; tho' at length the repeated repreſentations of the ſeveral ambaſſadors of the reſpective courts concerned, opened the eyes of the long-deluded Charles: he beheld with amazement the deſtructive path he had ſo long been led in; he reſolved to retrace his ſteps, and by one bold act ſhake off the inglorious dependence in which he had hitherto been held: the headſtrong, imperious temper of the duke, who was continually engaging him in dangerous attempts, now began to fill Charles with fear and apprehenſion. He was one day overheard to ſay, "Brother, I am too old to go again to my travels; you may if you pleaſe."

In ſhort, he began to grow melancholy, and reſerved; he opened himſelf not with the uſual freedom to his brother; and he is ſaid to have formed a deſign, by the inſtigation of the ducheſs of Portſmouth, who ſaw that the preſent mode of government could not long ſubſiſt, to regain the good will and affection of his ſubjects, by convoking a free parliament, diſcarding all his unpopular miniſters, recalling Monmouth, and ſending the duke of York into Scotland: but the execution of theſe laudable deſigns, if really formed, were anticipated by the death of Charles, who was ſuddenly ſeized with an apoplectic fit, on Monday the ſecond of February, 1684, and his recovery looked upon as deſperate: and though upon bleeding he recovered his ſenſes again, yet it was only for a ſhort time; for four days after, February ſixth, he expired in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the thirty-ſeventh of his reign, if we reckon from the death of his father king Charles I. but in the twenty-fifth only computing from his own reſtoration. His death was attended with ſuch circumſtances as gave ſtrong ſuſpicion of his having been poiſoned, and the papiſts bore the odium of having perpetrated ſo execrable a deed, in order to prevent the reformation the king propoſed making in the government, which muſt end in their ruin; whereas they had every thing to hope for under the reign of his ſucceſſor, a blind bigot to their faith. There is, however, no certain proof of this, and the duke is acknowleged by all parties to have had no hand in it.

Dr. Burnet, in the Hiſtory of his own Times, gives us the following account of the manner in which the king paſſed his laſt moments: "He was conſtantly attended by biſhop Ken, who was more in his favour than any other prelate. This good man took all opportunities to fit and prepare the king for his approaching diſſolution; and when the ducheſs of Portſmouth, the favourite miſtreſs, came into the room, prevailed on his majeſty to command her abſence, and to ſend for the queen and aſk her pardon for the violation of her bed, which was readily complied with; and the biſhop apprehending his majeſty to be ſincerely penitent, propoſed his receiving the bleſſed ſacrament. The duke of York being appriſed of this, and finding the king not likely to live many hours, was deſirous that the Roman catholics might have the honour of his dying in their communion: he therefore ſent for and introduced to his majeſty, then hardly ſenſible, Father Huddleſton, a Benedictine monk, who had a great hand in ſaving the king's life after the fight of Worceſter: then all who were in the bed-chamber were ordered to withdraw, except the earls of Bath and Feverſham, and the door was double locked; then Huddleſton cauſed the king to go through ſome acts of contrition; and after ſuch a confeſſion as he could then make, he adminiſtered to him the three popiſh ſacraments of Penance, Extreme Unction, and the Euchariſt, the duke all the while aſſiſting with great fervency of devotion. The company was then re-admitted, and biſhop Ken preſſed the king ſix or ſeven times to receive the ſacrament according to the rites of the church of England; but his majeſty declared he was very weak. Soon after he died."

What we have ſaid of this prince in the beginning of his reign, and the relation of his conduct during the time he held the ſceptre, ſo ſtrongly mark his character, that there is hardly any neceſſity to retouch the portrait. Former hiſtorians have indeed exhauſted themſelves on this ſubject; and as they have been influenced by their connections with, or attachment to, different factions, have deſcribed Charles as the moſt odious, or the moſt amiable of princes. Some ſcruple not to compare him to the Roman emperor Tiberius for cruelty and deceit: others, while they allow him the common frailties incident to humanity, paint his good qualities in the moſt lively and agreeable colours. Mr. Hume, in his hiſtory of the Stuarts, ſeems to have ſummed up Charles's character in a more impartial and concile manner than any writer who has gone before him: I ſhall therefore give it the reader nearly in that author's own words:

"In the duties of private life, his conduct, though not altogether free from faults, was, in the main, commendable. A generous lover, an obliging huſband, a friendly brother, an indulgent father, a good-natured maſter: had he been born in an inferior ſtation, he would probably have paſſed through the world with the affection of ſome, and without incurring the hatred of any: but, placed as he was in a high ſphere, for which he was altogether unqualified, he drew upon himſelf, by his indolent temper, the contempt not only of the neighbouring potentates, but even of his own ſubjects. Negligent of the intereſts of the nation, regardleſs of its glory, averſe to its religion, jealous of its liberty, laviſh of its treaſures, ſparing only of its blood, he expoſed it, by his raſh and pernicious meaſures, to the danger of a furious civil war, and even to the diſgrace of a foreign conqueſt."

Charles II. was in his perſon tall and ſwarthy, and his countenance marked with ſtrong harſh lineaments: his penetration was keen, his judgment clear, his underſtanding extenſive, his converſation lively and entertaining; "his wit, to uſe the expreſſion of the marquis of Halifax, could not be ſaid ſo much to be very refined or elevated, qualities apt to beget jealouſy and envy in company, as to be a plain, gaining, well bred, recommending kind of wit; and tho' perhaps he talked more than the ſtrict rules of politeneſs might permit, men were ſo pleaſed with the eaſy and affable deportment of the monarch, that they always went away contented, both with him and with themſelves."

It would be doing injuſtice to this king, did we omit to mention, that few princes ever paſſed more acts of parliament for the benefit of the ſubject. Trade and manufacture flouriſhed more in this reign than at any other æra of the Engliſh monarchy. The arts and ſciences were cultivated with good ſucceſs, though not greatly encouraged by the ſovereign, who, tho' he had himſelf made ſome proficiency in mechanics and chemiſtry, and was no bad judge of genius; yet was ſo beſet by miſtreſſes and craving courtiers, that he had neither money nor attention for literary merit. In the firſt year of this reign, a few philoſophers, who had eſtabliſhed conferences for the mutual communication of their diſcoveries in phyſics and geometry, procured a patent; and having enlarged their number, were denominated the Royal Society. This inſtitution began to ſoften the manners by improving the underſtandings of men: the principal members who firſt compoſed this ſociety, were lord Brouncker, ſir Robert Murray, Dr. Wilkins biſhop of Cheſter, Mr. Robert Boyle, who had made a great progreſs in natural philoſophy, and Dr. Ward, afterwards biſhop of Exeter, a profeſſed mathematician.

To this period the learned world was indebted for the illuſtrious Newton, who inveſtigated the firſt principles of the general ſyſtem of the univerſe, which till then had remained hidden. All that the enquiries of paſt ages had effected in natural philoſophy, was nothing in compariſon with the ſingle diſcovery of the nature of light. In a word, the works of this great man will reflect eternal honour on the nation that gave him birth. Stillingfleet, Tillotſon, Tenniſon, Patrick, and Lloyd, were ſhining lights in divinity: the practice of medicine was greatly improved by the judicious Sydenham: the belles-lettres were making daily advances towards perfection: Dryden held the chief rank in poetry, though his writings are juſtly cenſurable, as well for their incorrectneſs, as for the vein of licentiouſneſs which runs through the greateſt part of them; the depravity of the public taſte, and the preſſing neceſſities of the writer, may however be pleaded in excuſe for theſe faults. His Ode on St. Cecilia's day ſtands unrivalled in the Engliſh language. Wycherley, as a comic writer, and Otway in his tragedies, had both great merit: the latter, however, received ſo little encouragement, that he died almoſt deſtitute of the common neceſſaries of life. The love of literature in this age inſpired the breaſts even of the higheſt perſonages: the court itſelf became emulous of the bays. The duke of Buckingham's Rehearſal ſtill ſhines diſtinguiſhed in the rank of comic ſatire: the earl of Rocheſter, vicious as his ſentiments were, poſſeſſed ſuch a ſtrange power of pleaſing, that while we condemn his morals, we cannot but be enchanted with the muſic of his numbers. The earls of Dorſet, Roſcommon, and Mulgrave, wrote with eaſe and ſpirit, and with that pleaſing negligence which is ſo peculiar to the gentleman writer. The marquis of Halifax is deſervedly diſtinguiſhed for his refined genius; and had he not been a principal perſonage in the ſtate, he would have claimed the firſt rank in literature: but buſineſs ſpoiled the writer. Of all the authors of this age, ſir William Temple is the moſt entertaining and inſtructive *. In fine, to cloſe the character of this reign, we may ſay, that the genius of the nation acquired immortal reputation under Charles II. though the adminiſtration did not.

The nuptial bed of this prince was not bleſſed with any iſſue; but he left a numerous progeny the fruits of his illicit love.

By Mrs. Lucy Walters, daughter of Richard Walters, eſq. James duke of Monmouth, born in 1646, married to Anne Scot, daughter and heireſs of Francis earl of Buccleugh in Scotland, and executed on Tower-hill, 1685.

By Mrs. Elizabeth Killegrew, viſcounteſs Shannon, daughter of ſir William Killegrew, Charlot-Jemima-Henrietta-Maria Fitzroy, married firſt to James Howard, and afterwards to the earl of Yarmouth.

By Mrs. Catherine Peg, daughter of Thomas Peg, eſq. Charles Fitz-Charles, earl of Plymouth, commonly called Don Carlos, born in 1658, married to lady Bridget Oſborne, daughter of the duke of Leeds, and killed at Tangiers in 1680.

By Mrs. Barbara Villiers, heireſs of William viſcount Grandiſon in Ireland, and wife of Roger earl of Caſtlemain, created lady Nonſuch, counteſs of Southampton, and ducheſs of Cleveland, three ſons, and as many daughters, viz. Charles Fitzroy, created duke of Southampton, and after his mother's death, duke of Cleveland; Henry Fitzroy, duke of Grafton; and George Fitzroy, duke of Northumberland; Anne Fitzroy, married to the earl of Suſſex; Charlotte Fitzroy, married to the earl of Litchfield; and Barbara, who became a nun at Pontoiſe in France.

By Louiſe de Querouaille, ducheſs of Portſmouth, Charles Lennox, duke of Richmond.

By Mrs. Eleanor Gwynn (commonly called Nell Gwynn) an actreſs, Charles Beauclerk, duke of St. Albans: And,

By Mrs. Mary Davis, a lady of the ſame profeſſion, Mary Tudor, married to the earl of Derwentwater.

Remarkable Occurrences.

The moſt remarkable things which happened in this reign, beſides the terrible fire of London in 1666, already mentioned, were,

The plague in the year 1665, of which ſeventy thouſand died in London, beſides thirty thouſand that died of other diſtempers. This is the laſt plague that ever we had in England.

Several comets appeared in this reign; the moſt remarkable whereof was ſeen at Falmouth on the twenty-ſecond of November, and for ſeven days ſucceſſively, two hours every morning before ſun-riſe, and about as long after ſun-ſet, having a fiery tail, extended to a very great length, and was ſeen the next month in ſeveral other parts of England and Ireland.

In the year 1683 was one of the longeſt and hardeſt froſts that till then had happened in England. It began about the middle of December, and continued till the fifth of February: a fair was kept on the Thames, and oxen roaſted on the ice: the coaches drove from the Temple to Weſtminſter-hall on the river as frequently as in the ſtreets.

* We muſt not paſs over unnoticed the witty doggreliſt Butler, who by his poem of Hudibras contributed more than any other perſon to expoſe the fanaticiſm and falſe pretences of the old republicans. The advantage which the royal cauſe received from this work was prodigious; yet the king allowed the author, who was a man of probity and virtue, to live in obſcurity, and die in want.

JAMES II. the fourth King of ENGLAND of the Name of STUART. A. D. 1685.

NOTWITHSTANDING the vigorous attempts made by the two laſt parliaments of the preceding reign to exclude this prince from the ſucceſſion, on account of his religion, his brother Charles had no ſooner paid the debt of nature than he was proclaimed king, without the leaſt appearance of oppoſition on the part of his ſubjects; not but that they had apprehenſions, and thoſe of the moſt alarming kind: but James, who could not but judge this to be the caſe, took a very prudent ſtep at his firſt acceſſion, to quiet the minds, and gain the confidence and affection of his people; and indeed, had he made good his profeſſions, the nation would have had no cauſe of uneaſineſs. Immediately upon the deceaſe of his brother, he aſſembled the privy-council, when, after lamenting the loſs himſelf and the public had ſuſtained by this melancholy event, he declared to them in a ſpeech, that he was determined to do his utmoſt to preſerve the government both in church and ſtate, as it was then eſtabliſhed by law; and that however he had been repreſented as a man of arbitrary principles, it was his firm reſolution to ſupport his ſubjects in the uninterrupted enjoyment of all their religious and civil privileges; and that as he would never invade any man's property, ſo he would never depart from the juſt rights and prerogatives of his crown. He likewiſe intimated an intention of preſerving the balance of power in Europe, and freeing the nation from that ſtate of dependence, or rather vaſſalage, in which it had hitherto been held by its ambitious neighbours. James had diſtinguiſhed himſelf, while in France, in a military capacity; and the commendation given his valour by the prince of Condé and mareſchal Turenne, thoſe two great maſters of the art of war, had eſtabliſhed his character as a ſoldier: the Engliſh had ſeen repeated proofs of his abilities and courage as a ſea commander, and few perſons in Europe were thought to excel him in the knowlege of maritime affairs: the people therefore entertained the moſt pleaſing hopes from this declaration of their new ſovereign; and his friends the Tories were not wanting in ſetting forth the extreme probity and good faith of James, who, they ſaid, never was known to falſify his word as a private man, and much leſs could be ſuſpected ſo to do now that he was inveſted with the ſacred dignity of king. The populace eaſily believed all they heard, becauſe it was all they wiſhed. His ſpeech was printed, and read with great applauſe. Addreſſes were poured in from all quarters, filled with the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty and affection. James himſelf was the dupe of his own artifice: he thought the voice of a part of his ſubjects the ſentiments of the whole kingdom.

But the thinking part of the nation, and thoſe who were the beſt acquainted with the character of the king, were not to be impoſed on by his ſpecious aſſurances: indeed it was a kind of infatuation to ſuppoſe that he really entertained the ſentiments he profeſſed. They had known him, while duke of York, to be a bigot to popery, and a zealous oppoſer of the proteſtant religion: they had been witneſſes to the frequent inſtances he gave of a mercileſs and cruel diſpoſition, and of a total diſregard to the liberties of the people, and the eſtabliſhed form of government: they knew him to have been the principal adviſer and promoter of all the unpopular and arbitrary meaſures which his brother purſued in the latter part of his reign, and that he himſelf was the ſworn friend of Lewis XIV. whoſe ambition all Europe dreaded, and, like that monarch, a profeſſed enemy to all heretics; and was it likely that he ſhould cheriſh ſuch ſentiments leſs when he came to be king? James was ſenſible, penetrating, and enterpriſing; but then he was headſtrong, violent, and arbitrary, and his judgment was not clear. How could it be expected that a king with this ſtrange mixture of good and bad qualities, could ever render his people happy?

James did not long keep his ſubjects in ſuſpence concerning his real ſentiments and intentions. The firſt Sunday after his acceſſion he went publicly to maſs: this, however, was looked upon as nothing ſtrange, conſidering how many years he had openly profeſſed the popiſh religion: but the people were more alarmed when, ſome time after, he iſſued a proclamation for continuing the cuſtoms and duties granted to the late king. This was a direct violation of the conſtitution, by which no impoſts can be levied upon the ſubject but by act of parliament, and a plain indication what regard he had to the liberties of the nation: but what every body the moſt wondered at, and which indeed is an action there is no poſſibility of accounting for, but from his blind zeal for his religon, is his expoſing, without any neceſſity, the inſincerity of his brother in his repeated aſſurances of his attachment to the proteſtant religion, by ordering Huddleſton to publiſh an account of Charles's dying in the Roman catholic faith, and his producing two papers which had been found in that king's cloſet, written in his own hand, in defence of popery.

James, however, in diſpoſing of public employments, and ſettling the officers of his houſhold, did not yet think fit to ſhew much partiality to thoſe of his own communion. All thoſe who poſſeſſed poſts under the late king were continued in their reſpective offices by proclamation *: this was a politic ſtep in the new monarch.

* The duke of Ormond was continued lord-ſteward of the houſhold; the earl of Arlington, lord-chamberlain; the lord viſcount Newport, treaſurer; the lord Maynard, comptroller; and Henry Saville, eſq. vice chamberlain of the houſhold. Soon after, Lawrence Hyde, preſident of the council, and the king's brother-in-law, was conſtituted lord high-treaſurer of England; the earl of Clarendon, his other brother-in-law, was made lord privy-ſeal; the marquis of Halifax, lord-preſident of the privy-council; the duke of Beaufort, lord-preſident of Wales; the lord Godolphin, chancellor to the queen; and Henry Bulkeley, eſq. was made maſter of the king's houſhold.

The late king having been interred privately, and at a very little expence (a poor return for the tenderneſs he had ſhewn to his brother all his life-time) James and his queen were crowned by archbiſhop Sancroft on St. George's day (April 23) 1685. The king would not receive the ſacrament, but all the reſt of the ceremony was performed according to the form of the church of England. His prieſts, doubtleſs, diſpenſed with his compliance in this reſpect, as well as with the coronation oath.

King James now thought fit to ſhew his reſentment againſt the witneſſes for the popiſh plot. The famous Titus Oates was, on the eighth and ninth days of May, tried before the lord chief-juſtice Jefferies on two indictments for perjury: the one for ſwearing that he himſelf, and ſeveral other jeſuits, were at a treaſonable conſultation in London, on the twenty-fourth of April, 1678; whereas it was clearly proved by a multitude of witneſſes, both proteſtants and papiſts, that he was at that time at St. Omer's in Flanders. He was therefore found guilty; as he likewiſe was of the ſecond indictment, for ſwearing that William Ireland the jeſuit, executed in the late reign, was in London on a certain day, when he was, upon the fulleſt evidence, proved to have been one hundred miles diſtant from London. Whereupon Oates was ſentenced to pay one thouſand marks upon each indictment, to be ſtripped of his canonical habit, to ſtand twice in the pillory, and five times a year afterwards as long as he lived; to be impriſoned for life, and to be whipped, firſt from Aldgate to Newgate, and the next day but one from Newgate to Tyburn, which was executed with great ſeverity, ſo that he ſwooned away ſeveral times; and it was aſtoniſhing that he eſcaped with his life.

Dangerfield, another of the plot diſcoverers, was tried ſoon after, for having formerly written a ſeditious libel, reflecting on the late king and the government; of which being convicted, he was ſentenced to ſtand twice in the pillory, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn another, and to pay a fine of five hundred pounds. As he was returning in a coach from his ſecond whipping, he was inſulted by one Francis, a barriſter of Gray's-Inn; to whom the other making a warm reply, and ſpitting in his face, Francis in a rage puſhed his cane in his face, which unfortunately running into his eye, Dangerfield died in great torment a few hours afterwards. Francis was immediately apprehended; and the court very prudently, as well as juſtly, rejected all application for his pardon, and he was deſervedly hanged.

The ſame day Dangerfield was tried (May 30) Richard Baxter, the famous preſbyterian preacher, who had bore a great ſhare in ſpiriting up the people againſt the government in the reign of Charles I. was brought to his trial in the King's-Bench for a work of his, intitled, A Paraphraſe on the New Teſtament; in which were ſeveral paſſages groſly reflecting upon epiſcopal government in general, and on the biſhops of the church of England in particular. He was fined five hundred marks, and obliged to find ſureties for his good behaviour for ſeven years.

As to the proceedings on theſe trials, the credit of the evidence produced, and the validity of the defence made by the priſoners, I would adviſe my reader to have recourſe to the State Trials, and not to truſt to the partial repreſentations on either ſide. I ſhall only obſerve, that it appears ſomewhat extraordinary that the chief-juſtice Jefferies ſhould have behaved with ſo great paſſion and partiality as he is on all hands allowed to have done on theſe occaſions. In regard to Oates's affair in particular, it is very certain that Jefferies had been one of the moſt ſtrenuous of the late king's council, in ſupporting that man's evidence in the popiſh plot, againſt the very witneſs on whoſe depoſition he was now condemned. It may naturally be ſuppoſed that king James was not diſpleaſed with an opportunity of puniſhing thoſe who had endeavoured to bring ſuch a load of infamy on the religion he profeſſed, and even on his own character: but then, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that Oates was a man of a moſt infamous character, and had undoubtedly been the inſtrument of taking away ſome innocent lives, by unpardonable prevarications, or rather falſifications, in regard to times and places.

The parliament of Scotland met on the day of the coronation, being aſſembled by the duke of Queenſberry, who repreſented the king's perſon as lord high-commiſſioner. His grace made known to them his majeſty's gracious declaration in council, and aſſured them that they were equally included therein with their brethren of England: at the ſame time he cauſed a letter to be read from James to the Scottiſh parliament; in which he inveighed againſt the fanatics, or rigid preſbyterians, whom he called horrid murderers and aſſaſſins, and deſired the ſtates would take proper meaſures to ſecure the kingdom againſt their intrigues. The parliament on this occaſion ſhewed the moſt abject ſubmiſſion to the royal will in every act of its ſeſſion: a fawning and humble addreſs was ſent to the king on his acceſſion: they confirmed the act of the preceding reign for maintaining the eſtabliſhed religion: they annexed the exciſe to the crown: they enacted a ſtatute, making it high-treaſon to give, take, or defend the national, or, as it was called, the ſolemn league and covenant; and another againſt houſe and field conventicles, ordering, that ſuch who ſhould hereafter preach at ſuch conventicles, or be preſent at field conventicles, ſhould be puniſhed with death: and in a vote which they called an offer of duty, they profeſſed their abhorrence of all principles and poſitions that any wiſe tended to derogate "from the king's ſacred, ſupreme, ſovereign, abſolute authority and power."

In England the parliament, the only one in this reign, met on May 19. The court had employed every art to influence the elections, and had ſucceeded ſo far, that the new houſe of commons conſiſted almoſt entirely of Tories: the king therefore had no reaſon to fear an oppoſition to any meaſures he might think proper to purſue, provided he kept within the bounds of common prudence. His ſpeech on meeting them, however, was rather in the ſtile of a prince who knew how to make himſelf feared, than one who wiſhed to unite himſelf to his people by the moſt ſecure of all ties, thoſe of mutual affection and confidence. He did indeed renew in the moſt ſolemn manner, the promiſes he had made before the privy-council; but at the ſame time he told them, that he expected they ſhould ſettle his revenue, and that during his life, as in the time of his brother; and concluded with theſe remarkable words: "Some men," ſaid he, "may object, that, by feeding me from time to time with ſuch ſupplies as they deem ſufficient, they will better ſecure frequent meetings of parliament: but as this is the firſt time I ſpeak to you from the throne, I muſt plainly tell you, that ſuch a method would be very improper to employ with me, and the beſt way to engage me to meet you often, is always to uſe me well."

The drift of this ſpeech was clearly comprehended, and it occaſioned many learned debates on both ſides the queſtion; but the court party prevailing, the houſe granted him all that he deſired, which enabled him afterwards to govern without a parliament. As a farther inſtance of their regard for the king, the houſe of peers, upon the petition of the lords who had been bailed out of the Tower, thought fit to diſcharge their bail, and to diſmiſs them. A bill alſo paſſed that houſe for revoking the attainder of the lord viſcount Stafford; but it was dropped in the lower houſe, after it had received a ſecond reading. We muſt not omit to mention, that the two houſes joined in an addreſs of thanks to the king for his ſpeech, and promiſed to ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes. This obliging diſpoſition in the Engliſh parliament, and the ſervile compliance of that of Scotland, gave James the higheſt ſatisfaction, who flattered himſelf with the hopes of a peaceful and happy reign.

The calm, however, did not laſt long: the earl of Argyle, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland in the late reign, on being accuſed of having been concerned with the duke of Monmouth in a ſcheme for raiſing a rebellion in that kingdom, thought the time was now come when he might ſucceſsfully ſtir up his countrymen againſt James, whom he looked upon as the author of his diſgrace and misfortunes. He imparted his deſign to Monmouth, who was, like himſelf, an exile in Holland; and this giddy young man gave readily into the project. They hired a few ſhips of the Dutch, and got together about two or three hundred of the Engliſh exiles in Flanders, men of deſperate fortunes, and who had no view of retrieving their affairs but by a change of government at home: this was all the reſource the duke and earl had to depend upon, except their hopes of being joined by a conſiderable number of the Whig party, in caſe they could effect a ſucceſsful landing in England or Scotland.

Having concerted their meaſures, the two chiefs of the malcontents ſeparated, in order to follow each his plan of operations. The earl of Argyle, with a ſmall company, but arms for five thouſand men, ſailed from Holland the beginning of May, and made a deſcent upon Scotland. He ſoon found himſelf deceived in his notion of being joined by a conſiderable number of his friends; they came not in as he expected: he made a ſhift indeed to get together about two thouſand men, chiefly of his own clan, in the Highlands: but the government having received advice of his intended enterprize, were prepared for his reception. A conſiderable body of troops were ſent againſt him ſoon after his landing; upon which he, by the help of his ſhipping, tranſported his men from place to place, till two or three of the king's ſhips of war arrived in thoſe parts, and then he was compelled to quit the ſea-coaſts, and march into the country, where he was hotly purſued by the royal army; and after flying for ſome time before them, his followers abandoned him, and he himſelf running into a water up to the neck to eſcape his purſuers, was taken by a countryman, who ran in after him and knocked him down. Being thus ſeized, he was ſent under a ſtrong guard to Edinburgh, where his head was cut off, and ſet upon the Tolbooth. Rumbold, the old maſter of the Rye-houſe, who had fled for that plot, and ſome others who had now come over again with the earl, were alſo taken and executed: the earl's father had ſuffered the like fate on the ſame occaſion. It is ſurprizing that his tragical end had not proved a warning to his ſon, not to engage in ſuch perilous enterprizes, where the ſucceſsful are at beſt but deemed fortunate traitors.

Monmouth was no leſs unſucceſsful in his attempt: that nobleman ſailed out of the Texel on the twenty-fourth of May; and after having been detained nineteen days at ſea by contrary winds, landed at Lyme in Dorſetſhire, on the eleventh of June, with about eighty followers, but with arms for a much greater number. Some of his officers diſperſed themſelves about the country, in order to engage the gentry and the common people to take up arms and join them; in which they ſo far ſucceeded, that the duke's little party was increaſed to two thouſand men, moſtly from the adjacent counties. On his firſt landing he had publiſhed a kind of manifeſto or declaration, in which he ſet forth the cauſe of his coming over, which he ſaid was for the recovery of his natural right (aſſerting the validity of the late king's marriage with his mother) and to free the nation from the tyranny of the duke of York, whom he accuſed as the author of the dreadful conflagration that had reduced the greateſt part of the capital to aſhes; of the late popiſh plot for taking away the life of the king, and for the ſubverſion of the proteſtant religion; of the murder of the earl of Eſſex in the Tower; and of having poiſoned the king his brother. Laſtly, he repreſented that his very religion incapacitated him from ſwaying the ſceptre of this kingdom, which muſt never hope for eaſe or ſafety while a papiſt and a tyrant ſat on the throne.

This declaration, which upon the whole was fuller of invective than ſound reaſoning, produced very little effect in the duke's favour: few perſons of any diſtinction joined his ſtandard; his army conſiſted chiefly of a rude undiſciplined rabble: in ſhort, the whole affair was as ill conducted as it had been raſhly undertaken. About a week after his landing at Lyme, he marched to Taunton, where he took upon him the title of king, and was proclaimed in that town, on the twentieth, by the name of James II. By this time his army, ſuch as it was, amounted to about five thouſand men: but the duke, inſtead of marching directly to Briſtol, the taking of which would have given great credit to his cauſe, and been of effectual ſervice, by furniſhing his army with refreſhments, waſted his time in the ridiculous pageantry of his proclamation at Taunton; and this gave the king time to aſſemble an army, which was now in full march againſt him, under the command of the duke of Albemarle.

Monmouth began now to be ſenſible of the temerity of his project: he ſaw that nothing was left for him but to fight and conquer; he therefore reſolved to prevent the king's forces in their deſign to ſurprize him, and ſet forward to meet them, in hopes of taking them unprepared for an attack; but herein, as in all the reſt, he was diſappointed. When he came in ſight of the royaliſts, he found them drawn up in excellent order, at Sedgeley-moor, near Bridgewater. Early the next morning (July 6) the fight began; Monmouth's horſe fled at the firſt charge, which was thought to be owing to the inexperience, cowardice, or treachery of the lord Grey, who commanded them; and who being taken, readily obtained the king's pardon. The foot was not ſo eaſily routed: they maintained their ground with great reſolution for ſome time; but being deſerted by the horſe, and expoſed to a moſt dreadful fire from the artillery of the king's army, they at length gave way, when a moſt dreadful ſlaughter enſued amongſt them; three hundred were killed on the ſpot, one thouſand in the purſuit, and as many made priſoners.

The unfortunate duke of Monmouth, after having endeavoured in vain to retrieve the fortune of the day by the moſt noble efforts of perſonal courage, and ſeeing all loſt, took to flight. He now ſaw his aſſumed ſovereignty vaniſhed in air, and all his mighty proſpects appeared like a dream that paſſes away, and is no longer remembered. He fled as far as his horſe would carry him, being attended only by a German ſervant, who had come over with him from Holland, when his beaſt dropped under him with fatigue. He was obliged to purſue his forlorn way a-foot till he came to a poor cottage, where having changed cloaths with the peaſant who occupied it, he continued his flight, till, unable longer to walk, he laid himſelf down in a ditch thick-covered with fern. Unfortunately, however, a party of the king's forces paſſing by the cottage the next day, knew the duke's cloaths upon the countryman's back, who being ſeized, told them which road the duke had taken; and after ſtrict ſearch, he was the next morning found in his hiding-place, with his pocket full of green peaſe; the only food he could find to keep off the attacks of hunger. He was immediately conducted to London, and lodged in the Tower.

Monmouth, brave as he was in arms, was not proof againſt this cruel reverſe of fortune. On his arrival in London, he wrote to the king in the moſt abject terms, humbly imploring his pardon, and proteſting by the moſt ſolemn aſſeverations, that if his majeſty would graciouſly pleaſe to overlook his former errors, he would endeavour by his future conduct to render himſelf worthy of ſo great a favour. All theſe ſubmiſſions availed him nought; James was inexorable: the duke ſued for an interview; James granted it; but it was only with a view to make his own advantages of it. He thought his wretched priſoner might be induced, through fear of death and hope of pardon, to impeach ſome of his principal accomplices; but no ſuch infamy dwelt in the heart of Monmouth: culpable and miſtaken as he was, he refuſed to purchaſe life at the expence of honour. He reſigned himſelf to his fate; and James, forgetful of the blood from whence he ſprung, and regardleſs of his brother's dying recommendation of this unhappy youth to his favour, ordered him for immediate execution. The duke's conduct in his laſt moments proved that his abject behaviour, on his firſt being apprehended, was the mere effect of human nature, oppreſſed by great calamity. He met his death in a manner that became his rank and character. On the fifteenth of July he was brought to his execution, which was attended with a ſhocking circumſtance: the executioner was ſeized with ſuch a trepidation juſt as he was about to execute his office, that he ſtruck the unfortunate duke five ſtrokes with the ax before he could ſever the head from the body. Thus died James, duke of Monmouth, whoſe character in many reſpects was truly amiable: he was brave, gentle, generous, ſincere; but too open to flattery, and too warmly addicted to pleaſure, the effects of his education in a court which was the emporium of debauchery. He was the darling of the people; the conſciouſneſs of which, and the allurement of ambition, had engaged him in enterprizes for which he was of all men the leaſt qualified, and which in the end coſt him his life.

This victory, gained in the very beginning of his reign, ſeemed to eſtabliſh the king's power and authority on the firmeſt baſis; but by the cruel uſe he made of it, and the deſpair into which his ſubjects were driven, it proved one of the principal cauſes of his ruin. Jefferies, the lord chief-juſtice, was, ſoon after the execution of Monmouth, ſent into the Weſt, to try the unhappy perſons who had been any ways concerned in the late raſh and ill-concerted rebellion. Colonel Kirk, a ſoldier of fortune, who had long ſerved at Tangiers, and, from his intercourſe with the Moors, had contracted an inhumanity totally unknown in European countries, attended him with a body of troops, to keep the people in awe. The bare recital of the barbarities committed by theſe two inhuman fiends in the ſhape of men, muſt fill every reader with horror. They hanged up numbers in the moſt inſulting manner, many without form of trial. Kirk cauſed thirty to be executed at once in ſight of himſelf and officers at dinner. Obſerving them to quiver in the agonies of death, he ſaid that he would give them muſic to their dancing, and immediately ordered the drums to beat, and the trumpets to ſound. Ten of theſe unhappy wretches were turned off with a health to the king, ten with a health to the queen, and the other ten with a health to Jefferies. The lady Liſle, widow of one of the regicides, but herſelf a loyaliſt, and now deeply ſtricken in years, was beheaded for harbouring a preſbyterian miniſter of Monmouth's party, though not one of the perſons mentioned in the proclamation. The jury thrice refuſed to find a verdict againſt her; they were as often ſent back with menaces and reproaches by the brutal Jefferies, and were at laſt compelled to bring her in guilty. Many other inſtances are given of the brutiſh cruelty of this judge and his military aſſiſtant *. In ſhort, ſome hundreds were executed, and

* One execution was attended with ſuch circumſtances of treachery, as well as barbarity, as to merit a more particular relation. A young maid implored the pardon of her father ‖, and threw herſelf at Kirk's feet, armed with all the charms which beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could poſſibly beſtow. The tyrant was fired with luſt, not ſoftened into love or clemency. He agreed to grant her requeſt, provided that ſhe, on her part, would condeſcend to gratify him.

‖ Some ſay ſhe was a young married woman, and that it was for the life of her huſband that ſhe ſued.

and the Weſt became like a ſhambles, by their quarters being fixed up in the roads and public places. The infernal monſter Kirk triumphed in his barbarous ingenuity; he cauſed the whole country to be ravaged by his ſoldiers, whom he allowed to live on free quarters; and Kirk's Lambs, as he, by way of pleaſantry, affected to have them called, is an appellation remembered with horror to this day in the weſtern counties. Jefferies boaſted on this occaſion, "That he had hanged more than all the judges ſince William the Conqueror:" and ſo acceptable had he made himſelf to his maſter by this bloody work, that, at his return, he was created a baron, and rewarded with the office of lord high-chancellor, upon the death of the lord-keeper.

Numberleſs were the other inſtances of ſeverity exerciſed in London, and different parts of the kingdom, upon the proteſtant party, on pretence either of the Rye-houſe plot, or of their having favoured Monmouth's deſign; in which revenge, and the ſcheme for eſtabliſhing popery in theſe kingdoms, appear to have had an equal influence. This had been the favourite plan of James whilſt duke of York, but was never openly attempted till now, when, being freed from Monmouth's rebellion, he thought himſelf in a ſtate of perfect tranquility. He began in Ireland, where he diſſolved the privy-council, and appointed a new one, the majority of them papiſts: the proteſtants of that kingdom were every where diſarmed, whilſt means were found of keeping on foot a ſtanding army of catholics. Colonel Richard Talbot, afterwards earl of Tyrconnel, by caſhiering ſuch officers and ſoldiers as he thought proper, and putting others in their ſtead, ſoon modelled it to the purpoſes it was intended for.

The ſituation of James was at this time as proſperous as any ſovereign could deſire. He ſaw a ſtanding army at his beck; he had a parliament which he knew was ready to prevent him in all his deſires: paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance were inculcated as articles in the Engliſh creed: foreign ſtates ſeemed to vie with each other in courting the favour of a monarch, who confeſſedly held the balance of Europe in his hands. Theſe advantages, however, inſtead of inſpiring James with a deſire to preſerve them by a prudent conduct, which would in no wiſe have impaired his power, only ſerved to intoxicate him; he thought he had no longer any occaſion to diſguiſe his ſentiments, or ſuffer reſtraint in his actions; and he began to diſcover his arbitrary principles in a manner not to be miſtaken. The parliament meeting on the ninth of November, after a prorogation, he opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which, after congratulating them on the happy ſuppreſſion of the late rebellion, he took notice, that the great head the rebels had got to before they were quelled, had been entirely owing to the want of a regular force being at hand to oppoſe them at their firſt inſurrection: the houſe, he ſaid, muſt be ſenſible that the militia was very inſufficient for the defence of the kingdom on ſuch exigencies; and therefore plainly told them, that he was determined to ſupport thoſe regular forces which he had raiſed, and now increaſed to fifteen thouſand men, and demanded a ſupply for their maintenance: at the ſame time, he deſired that the parliament would not take exceptions that he had admitted ſome catholic officers into his army, and that he had in their favour diſpenſed with the law commanding the teſt to be taken by every one who enjoyed any public office. "They are moſt of them known to me, added he, and have ſerved me faithfully in the late commotions: and I will deal plainly with you, that, after having the benefit of their ſervice in ſuch a time of need and danger, I will neither expoſe them to diſgrace, nor myſelf to the want of them."

This parliament had, ever ſince its exiſtence, ſhewed the greateſt approbation of the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, and given ſignal proofs of its attachment to the king's perſon, particularly in the caſe of the rebellion, when it granted ſubſidies exceeding even what he could have aſked. It had increaſed his annual revenue, and made it perpetual: was it probable then that a parliament ſo generous and complying, would have made any difficulty of ſetting aſide ſuch a trifling law as the Teſt Act? Thus James thought, but he found himſelf miſtaken. This pliant, this ſubmiſſive parliament ſtill remembered there was ſuch a thing as liberty entailed on the people of this happy land, and that they were ſworn conſervators of that ineſtimable treaſure, in behalf of the people. They would have gone any decent lengths rather than come to a rupture with the king, or incur his diſpleaſure; but this open declaration on his part to govern without the laws, or rather to act in open defiance of them, opened their eyes; and ſome who had been the warmeſt againſt the Excluſion Bill, began to be alarmed at the king's large ſtrides towards arbitrary power. In the houſe of lords, the motion for an addreſs of thanks to the king for his ſpeech met with great oppoſition; and though it paſſed by a ſmall majority, the houſe reſolved to take the ſpeech into further conſideration: but it was otherwiſe in the houſe of commons; for when the lord Middleton, ſecretary of ſtate, made a motion that they ſhould immediately return his majeſty thanks for his ſpeech from the throne, ſeveral of the members refuſed it; and a motion being made for an addreſs to the king againſt employing popiſh officers in the army, contrary to the known laws of the land, it was carried in the affirmative, and the addreſs was accordingly preſented, at which his majeſty was highly offended. In the mean time, the commons granted a ſupply of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds: nevertheleſs, the king ſent them a ſharp reprimand for the liberty they had taken with him in their addreſs, and peremptorily told them, that he was fixed in his reſolution, both in regard to keeping up a ſtanding army, and employing catholic officers. The commons, who appear to have been terrified into ſubmiſſion by this haughty meſſage,

The ſtruggle was hard and ſevere, to loſe her father, or to part with her honour. At laſt the force of filial affection overcame all ſelfiſh regards. The maid ſubmitted to the conditions: but after ſhe had paſſed the night with him, the inhuman ruffian, next morning, ſhewed her from the window her father, the darling object for whom ſhe had ſacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he privately cauſed to be there erected for his execution. This ſhocking and unexpected ſight ſtruck her with ſuch a ſudden ſurprize, that ſhe was inſtantly ſeized with a phrenzy, and never after recovered her ſenſes. Hume.

offered to indemnify the officers already employed, and to paſs a new act, qualifying a certain number whom the king ſhould name; yet rather than have his diſpenſing power conteſted, he, on the twentieth of November, prorogued the parliament, by which he loſt the ſupply the commons had voted, and which happily had not paſſed into a law, otherwiſe the conſtitution had been expoſed to the moſt imminent danger, as James would then have been enabled to carry his deſign into execution, without demanding any further ſupplies from his parliament; for they had gone ſo far as to vote that three hundred thouſand pounds of the ſum mentioned ſhould be annually levied for nine years and an half to come.

In Ireland and Scotland the king carried on his deſigns with greater ſucceſs than he had as yet been able to do in England. The duke of Ormond was, in the beginning of 1686, removed from his poſt of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, notwithſtanding his many ſervices, and inviolable attachment to the royal family: and colonel Talbot being made earl of Tyrconnel, was put in his place, who ſoon got the Teſt Act repealed in that kingdom. In Scotland the earl of Moray, who in complaiſance to the king had changed his religion, found means to ſupplant the duke of Queenſberry; and being made high-commiſſioner, convoked the parliament, to whoſe care and humanity he recommended, in his majeſty's name, his poor catholic ſubjects, for indulgence in the exerciſe of their religion. A bill was accordingly brought in for permitting papiſts the private exerciſe of their religion; but it was warmly oppoſed, and deferred to further conſideration: then the king ordered the commiſſioner to prorogue the parliament, and by virtue of his own prerogative eſtabliſhed liberty of conſcience through the whole kingdom. From this time the catholics got into moſt of the offices of truſt or profit, as well civil as military, in both theſe kingdoms, to the no ſmall ſatisfaction of James, who hoped, by means of the influence they would neceſſarily acquire, to complete the ſcheme he had formed of introducing popery and arbitrary power throughout his dominions.

By this time the earl of Arlington was dead, and his place of chamberlain was beſtowed upon the earl of Mulgrave, who had acquired a great ſhare of the king's favour. Sunderland was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, and became in effect prime miniſter.

Encouraged by the ſucceſs he had met with in Ireland and Scotland, James now ſet himſelf to work to carry his point in England likewiſe: the firſt ſtep he took for this purpoſe was to get the judges to declare their opinion in favour of the diſpenſing power. He ſent for them one by one, and had private conferences with them in his cloſet, whence the odious term of Cloſeting firſt took its riſe; but he met with a reſiſtance from ſome of that venerable order, which gave him a good deal of uneaſineſs. Sir Thomas Jones, lord chief-juſtice of the Common Pleas; Montagu, lord chief-baron of the Exchequer; ſir Robert Charlton, one of the juſtices of the Common Pleas; and baron Nevil, openly declared againſt the diſpenſing power, as ſubverſive of the laws of the land. For this they were turned out of their places, and others put into them, who were known to be creatures of the court. Amongſt thoſe, to the indignation of every proteſtant, one Mr. Milton, a profeſſed catholic, was made a baron of the Exchequer. The king then proceeded with his council as he had done with his courts of law: he warmly ſollicited the nobles about his perſon to oblige him, by changing their religion, and embracing the Roman catholic faith. This very modeſt and conſtitutional demand was rejected by many with the contempt it deſerved *. The earl of Sunderland was ſo baſe as to purchaſe favour at this price: Rocheſter the treaſurer, though the king's brother-in-law, was deprived of his office, for refuſing to give this inſtance of complaiſance: the treaſury was put in commiſſion; and lord Bellaſis, who had been ſo long impriſoned for the popiſh plot, was appointed firſt lord of that board. Clarendon, keeper of the privy-ſeal, was likewiſe diſplaced for his refuſal, and his office beſtowed upon lord Arundel of Wardour, another of the five popiſh lords: at the ſame time the lord Dover and the earl of Tyrconnel, both outrageous catholics, were ſworn into the privy-council.

And now the king having new-modelled his council and his bench of judges, it was neceſſary in the next place to ſtrike ſome ſtroke that might impreſs the minds of the people with a notion of the legality of the diſpenſing power in the ſovereign. For this purpoſe, one Godwin, a coachman belonging to ſir Edward Hales, a gentleman who, to pleaſe the court, had changed his religion, was deſired to bring an action againſt his maſter, for exerciſing the office of governor of Dover-caſtle, not having qualified himſelf by law by taking the teſt, &c. This cauſe was heard with great ſolemnity before the judges. Sir Edward pleaded the king's diſpenſing power; when, after abundance of learned arguments on both ſides, the judges, as had been preconcerted, gave it as their opinion, "That the diſpenſing power was a prerogative inſeparable from the kings of England." Thus all the fences to the conſtitution were at once thrown down, and all the reſt of James's reign was wholly employed in taking meaſures to render himſelf abſolute, and eſtabliſh popery. The papiſts, emboldened by the countenance of the ſovereign, and ſtill more by this deciſion of the judges, began every-where to ſet up the public exerciſe of their religion: the jeſuits erected colleges and ſeminaries in all the principal towns; four popiſh biſhops were publicly conſecrated in the king's chapel, and ſent into ſeveral parts of England to exerciſe epiſcopal juriſdiction over thoſe of their own communion. Monks and friars were now to be ſeen in all public places, habited in the veſtments of their reſpective orders. Lieutenancies of counties were beſtowed on declared papiſts, nor was it long before popiſh juſtices of the peace, and other popiſh magiſtrates, ſwarmed all over England. All places of honour and profit were ſhared among catholics, or perſons popiſhly in-

* The king even condeſcended to exhort Kirk to become a convert. The barbarian told him, that he would have been extremely willing to gratify his majeſty in this particular, but that he was unhappily pre-engaged, having already given his promiſe to the king of Morocco, that, if ever he changed his religion, he would turn Muſſulman. clined, clined, to the prejudice of proteſtants, many of whom were diſplaced to make room for thoſe new intruders.

James was encouraged in theſe violent attempts againſt the conſtitution by Lewis XIV. his own queen, who was a bigotted Papiſt, and the Jeſuits; which latter never ceaſed perſuading him to perſevere in reſtoring their religion, and with it their credit. Father Peters, his confeſſor, was admitted into the privy-council: in a word, the king acted with ſo little diſcretion, that the cardinals at Rome uſed to ſay of him, by way of jeſt, that he deſerved excommunication, as a perſon who was going about to deſtroy the ſmall remains of the catholic religion that ſtill exiſted in England. Pope Innocent XI. conceived ſuch indifferent hopes of James's projects, that he never would grant a cardinal's hat to Peters, though warmly ſollicited to it by the king. This Peters was a Jeſuit, a hot-headed, intriguing man, who, mad with the ambition of becoming a cardinal and primate of England, was the chief perſon who puſhed the miſguided king on to the precipice from which he afterwards fell. Taking advantage of his ſovereign's blind zeal, he put him upon ſending the earl of Caſtlemain this year on a ſolemn embaſſy to the court of Rome, with inſtructions to make his holineſs the moſt ſolemn aſſurances, in the king's name, of his entire devotion to the holy ſee, and requeſting him to ſend over a legate a latere to reconcile the long ſchiſmatic church of England to the apoſtolic communion; but the pope was a perſon of too much diſcernment to be ſeduced by this dazzling offer: he judged better than James of the little likelihood there was of ſucceeding ſuddenly in ſuch a ſcheme, which demanded the utmoſt prudence and caution, and could alone be the work of time: he tried all means to evade giving the ambaſſador an audience, till the earl preſſed it in ſuch a manner, that decency would no longer permit the pope to refuſe this mark of reſpect to the repreſentative of ſo great a prince; but when he at length admitted his excellency to an audience, the good pontiff was ſeized with ſuch an opportune fit of coughing, as interrupted the earl's ſpeech, and obliged him to retire. The earl made ſeveral new attempts to deliver his meſſage; but the pope ſtill happened to labour under the ſame malady, which ſo piqued the ambaſſador, that he threatened to return. The pope, with great coolneſs, made anſwer, that, ſince his excellency was reſolved to go, he would adviſe him, while he travelled, to ſet out early in the morning, and repoſe himſelf during the heat of the day, otherwiſe the climate of Italy might prove dangerous to his health. Innocent, however, thought proper to return the king's compliment by having a nuncio at London, and he inveſted with that character Ferdinando Doda, an Italian Jeſuit, who had been about the king's perſon ever ſince his acceſſion.

The late flagrant breaches of the king's promiſes to maintain the proteſtant religion filled the greateſt part of the nation with the moſt melancholy apprehenſions. On this occaſion, to their immortal honour, the clergy of the church of England exerted their talents to the greateſt advantage in defence of their religion againſt the errors of popery, which thoſe of that communion were every day maintaining in pamphlets and other writings with the moſt unparalleled audacity. Upon this the court iſſued an order prohibiting the inferior clergy preaching on controverted points of religion: but this order was little regarded; our divines continued their laudable efforts; Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Tenniſon, Patrick, Sharp, and ſome others, ſhone with diſtinguiſhed luſtre on this occaſion.

This honeſt boldneſs greatly irritated the king and his popiſh council, and they reſolved to make uſe of ſome expedient whereby they might effectually reſtrain the clergy from thus oppoſing their deſigns. After much conſultation on this ſubject, it was determined to erect a commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs. This court, known by the name of the High Commiſſion Court, had, together with the Star-chamber, another inſtrument of arbitrary power, been aboliſhed in the reign of Charles I. by act of parliament; to which a clauſe was added, prohibiting the re-eſtabliſhment of theſe courts, or any other of the like nature: but James now held all laws at defiance. The commiſſion was iſſued, and Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury (who would never act in it) with Crow and Sprat, biſhops of Durham and Rocheſter; the earls of Rocheſter and Sunderland, chancellor Jefferies, and lord chief-juſtice Herbert, were appointed commiſſioners: on Sancroft's peremptory refuſal to take up his commiſſion, the biſhop of Cheſter was put into his place. Theſe commiſſioners were veſted with the ſame inquiſitorial powers which had been poſſeſſed by the former court of High Commiſſion *; and the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, with all its dependencies, was ſubject to the arbitrary determinations of theſe commiſſioners.

Shortly after the commiſſion was opened, Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, and dean of Norwich, had preached a ſermon, wherein he had inveighed againſt popery, and expreſſed his apprehenſion of the danger that then threatened the eſtabliſhed church. This ſermon had given great offence at court, and the king himſelf wrote to Dr. Compton, biſhop of London, ordering him to ſuſpend Sharp from his clerical function, till he ſhould have given ſatisfaction, and his farther pleaſure was known therein. On receipt of the order, Compton wrote a letter to the earl of Sunderland, principal ſecretary of ſtate, which he deſired might be communicated to the king, repreſenting, that he the biſhop could not, according to law, and as a judge, proceed to condemn a man before he had knowlege of the cauſe, and had cited the party to anſwer for himſelf. The furious James was all in a flame at this inſolent dallying with his authority, as he termed it; and the biſhop was called before the new court on the ninth of Auguſt this year, and by a majority both himſelf and the doctor were ſuſpended.

* Their commiſſion empowered them, or any three of them, of whom the lord-chancellor was to be one, "to exerciſe all manner of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, to viſit, reform, correct, amend, and puniſh all offences whatever againſt the eccleſiaſtical laws, by ſuſpenſion, deprivation, cenſures of the church, &c. The commiſſioners (or any five of them, of whom the lord-chancellor was to be one) were alſo authoriſed to viſit the univerſities, cathedral and collegiate churches, colleges, grammar ſchools, and other eccleſiaſtical corporations; to examine their ſtatutes, rules, ordinances, letters-patents, and writings, and the ſame to alter, correct, and amend, at their pleaſure." Burnet. Rapin. Salmon.

Not content with thus impetuouſly following his popiſh proceedings, he reſolved to ſhew his people what they muſt expect if they preſumed to diſpute his will. Though it was now a time of profound peace, he cauſed a camp to be formed at Hounſlow of fifteen thouſand men, the ſtanding army he had, in ſpite of the parliament, kept on foot, and gave the command to the earl of Feverſham: in this camp was a public chapel, where maſs was ſaid every day. James fondly imagined that this ſtanding military force, officered by Roman catholics devoted to his ſervice, would enable him, like ſome of his arbitrary neighbours, to carry every point he pleaſed in this kingdom: but he did not reflect that this army was compoſed of Engliſhmen, who would be the firſt to abandon him, whenever they ſhould be made ſenſible that he intended to uſe them for the deſtruction of their own and their fellow-ſubjects liberties.

The keeping on foot this ſtanding army, and the abolition of the Teſt Act, or what came to the ſame end, the diſpenſing with the penalties it had decreed againſt thoſe who ſhould refuſe to take it; together with the obſtinate refuſal of the king to join in the meaſures which the other powers of Europe were taking to ſecure themſelves againſt the ambitious deſigns of France; theſe proceedings, I ſay, filled the people with a thouſand melancholy apprehenſions. Some thought James had, after the example of his brother, entered into a ſecret treaty with Lewis XIV. and had adopted that monarch's plan of government. In ſhort, it was not doubted that the king would even ſend for an auxiliary force over from his good neighbour, in caſe his preſent forces were not thought ſufficient for eſtabliſhing his arbitrary projects. At this time the dock-yards were inceſſantly at work in repairing and fitting out ſhips of war: this proceeding, at a time when the nation was in profound peace, increaſed its alarms and ſuſpicions. The oppoſers of the government gave out, that this fleet was intended to act againſt the Dutch, with whom the court were about to come to a rupture, in order from thence to find a pretext for excluding the prince of Orange for ever from the ſucceſſion, as, unleſs ſuch excluſion could take place, whatever had been, or was to be done for the eſtabliſhment of the Roman catholic religion, would be rendered fruitleſs. Theſe ſuſpicions, which were not without the appearance of probability, and which the Whigs circulated with great aſſiduity, compleatly ruined the king in the affections of his people.

The murmurs againſt the government became every day more loud. A miniſter, whoſe name was Johnſton, publiſhed a paper, addreſſed to the officers and ſoldiers in the camp at Hounſlow, repreſenting the guilt, baſeneſs, and infamy, of ſerving as inſtruments to deſtroy the religion and conſtitution of their country. For this affair having been ſolemnly degraded, he was ſet twice in the pillory, was whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, and fined five hundred marks: but this writing being diſperſed in the army, made ſuch an impreſſion as was thought to have contributed not a little to the defection that happened in it afterwards.

About the ſame time Miles Prance the goldſmith, who had been a witneſs againſt the perſons tried for the murder of St. Edmundſbury Godfrey, was brought to his trial for perjury; and pleading guilty, was fined one hundred pounds, and ordered to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. Some will have it, that, terrified by the ſeverity he had ſeen exerciſed on Titus Oates, he pleaded guilty merely to eſcape his puniſhment. We ſhall not pretend to decide on this point: in ſuch caſes, every man is at liberty to form his own conjectures.

Neither the ill ſucceſs of his late negotiation at the court of Rome, the continual complaints of his own ſubjects, nor even the remonſtrances of ſome of the moſt ſenſible and prudent of his popiſh counſellors, who were fearful their ſovereign was running too great lengths, and intreated him to moderate his zeal, could divert James one moment from the purſuit of his darling purpoſe, the advancement of the catholic faith in theſe kingdoms. Deaf to all ſober advice, he liſtened only to the ſuggeſtions of his own blind ſuperſtition. Knowing himſelf deſerted by the church party, he affected to careſs the preſbyterians. In the beginning of the year 1687, he ſent his declaration into Scotland, ſuſpending, by virtue "of his ſovereign authority, prerogative-royal, and abſolute power," (the expreſs words of the declaration) all oaths, teſts, &c. impoſed upon non-conformiſts, profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion. In this declaration, "firſt, he allows the moderate preſbyterians to meet in their private houſes only, but forbids all field-conventicles, under the moſt rigorous penalties. In like manner, he tolerates quakers to meet and exerciſe in their form, in any place or places appointed for their worſhip." Then the declaration proceeds to include the catholics, who, after a long encomium on their loyalty and integrity, are declared relieved from all acts of parliament made or executed againſt thoſe of their faith. In the ſame paper, however, the king reiterates his former promiſes of maintaining the proteſtant religion, as by law eſtabliſhed, and its biſhops and regular clergy in the full enjoyment of their rights, liberties, privileges, &c. &c.

On the fourth of April the king publiſhed the like declaration for liberty of conſcience in England, only not quite in ſo high a ſtile. It is not to be wondered at, that the ſeveral ſects of proteſtant diſſenters ſhould at firſt look upon this declaration as an inſtance of great indulgence in the crown to tender conſciences. Accordingly, addreſſes of thanks were crouded in to the throne from all denominations of nonconformiſts, wherein they flattered the king in the moſt fulſome manner: the anabaptiſts led the way; the quakers followed: next came the independants; and laſtly the preſbyterians. It is remarkable that the greateſt part of theſe addreſſers, ſpeaking of the royal power, exalted it beyond all meaſure; in particular, the preſbyterians; thoſe very people who had firſt ſet the example in the reign of Charles I. to the reſt of the nation, to preſcribe the ſtricteſt limits to the exerciſe of the royal authority. Human nature is always the ſame: the diſſenters thought themſelves unkindly uſed by that monarch: they thought James treated them like a tender parent. It was not long, however, before they diſcovered that this act of the king's was at beſt but a ſnare laid for the whole proteſtant intereſt in the kingdom, and they readily joined with the church of England in combating the deſtructive doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance.

James did not think this ſtep for the intereſt of the popiſh religion ſufficient, unleſs he could procure greater advantages for its profeſſors. Hitherto the papiſts had not been able to procure any preferments in either of the univerſities, which they paſſionately deſired. This point therefore was the next to be carried; and as the king had already introduced the catholics into the adminiſtration of court affairs, he reſolved to procure them a ſhare in the government of the church. An order was ſent by the king and council to the univerſity of Cambridge to admit Father Francis, a Benedictine monk, to the degree of maſter of arts, without adminiſtering to him the uſual oaths. The univerſity had the ſpirit to refuſe its compliance, and petitioned the king to recal his mandate: upon which they were ſummoned before the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, to anſwer for this act of diſobedience. The vice-chancellor was ſuſpended; the ſenate alſo were reprimanded, and ordered to ſend up copies of their ſtatutes: but as the univerſity choſe Dr. Balderſon, maſter of Emanuel-college, a man of ſpirit, to ſucceed in that office, the king thought proper to deſiſt from his purpoſe.

Having failed in this attempt, he reſolved to try his influence with the univerſity of Oxford, never ſuppoſing that they, who had been the foremoſt to eſtabliſh by their famous decree the doctrine of paſſive obedience, would make the leaſt heſitation to put their principles in practice, when ſolicited thereto by a power they had ſo highly exalted. It happened that the preſidentſhip of Magdalen-college became vacant, and a day was appointed for the election of another preſident; but before that day came, the king ſent down his mandate to the vice-preſident and fellows, requiring them to elect one Anthony Farmer, a man of a very indifferent character, who had promiſed to declare himſelf a catholic, into that office. The college refuſed to comply, as being contrary to their ſtatutes, and actually made choice of Dr. Hough; for which they were ſummoned before the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners at Whitehall, who ſuſpended the vice-preſident, and deprived the new-elected preſident: but as the univerſity had proved the character of Farmer to be notoriouſly bad, the king ſent them a ſecond mandate to elect Dr. Parker, biſhop of Oxford, a tool of the court, and a reputed papiſt. The fellows, abiding by their choice, would not obey this mandate any more than the former: they cited the ſtatutes and oaths they were obliged to obſerve, or elſe deliberately perjure themſelves: they ſhewed that the biſhop of Oxford was no better qualified than Mr. Farmer, having never been fellow either of Magdalen or New-college, and therefore not to be elected.

The king, incenſed at their refractory behaviour, and hoping to conquer their obſtinacy by his preſence, repaired in perſon to Oxford, under pretence of a ſummer's jaunt or progreſs; and having ſummoned the fellows before him, he reproached them in the moſt virulent terms for their diſloyalty, arrogance, and preſumption, as he called it; and commanded them forthwith to elect the biſhop of Oxford, or prepare to feel the weight of his diſpleaſure; but all his threats were thrown away: the fellows remained firm; and the king having expoſed himſelf to the contempt of the whole nation, returned with ſhame and confuſion to London. The eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, however, were let looſe againſt them, and the preſident and twenty-five fellows were expelled. Dr. Hough refuſing to put the biſhop of Oxford in poſſeſſion of his lodgings, the doors were broke open, Parker was eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of his office, and the deprived fellows had their places ſupplied by papiſts.

Of all the violences committed during this reign, this may be ſaid to be the moſt openly illegal and unjuſt: accordingly, the nation was now perfectly convinced that the king had nothing leſs in view than to reduce it to the moſt abject ſtate of ſubmiſſion. The moſt bitter reflections, the moſt pathetic remonſtrances, and the loudeſt complaints againſt the court, now filled every mouth, or made the ſubject of almoſt every publication. James on his ſide, to ſhow his ſupreme contempt of all theſe murmurs of the people, gave a ſolemn audience to Dada, who had the preceding year been appointed the pope's nuncio in England. He made his public entry as a foreign ambaſſador at Windſor (where the court then was) on the twenty-third day of July, with all the formality of a popiſh proceſſion, being preceded by a croſs-bearer, carrying his croſs erect, and attended by crowds of popiſh prieſts and monks in their reſpective habits. The duke of Somerſet, who was at that time in waiting as lord of the bed-chamber, was appointed to introduce the apoſtolical nuncio to his audience of the king, but refuſed; alleging as an excuſe, that it was high-treaſon by the laws for any one to aſſume that character in England. For this refuſal the duke was turned out of his poſt in the bed-chamber, and loſt the command of a regiment of dragoons. The nuncio continued to reſide at London during the whole of this reign.

It was about this time that father Petre, or Peters, the king's confeſſor, a ſhallow bigot, was publicly admitted as a member of the council-board, contrary to the advice of all the leading men among the catholics.

James intended to call a new parliament, and therefore exerted all his influence to get ſuch perſons choſen as he thought would prove the moſt compliant with his meaſures. He renewed his practice of cloſeting, in which no arguments, threats, or promiſes, were omitted to induce them to conſent to a formal repeal of the teſt and other penal laws. The deputy-lieutenants, judges, and juſtices, in different parts of the kingdom, were ſet to work to bias the minds of the electors; and thoſe corporations which ſhewed themſelves refractory, were perſecuted into compliance by Quo warrantos, new-modelling them, and a thouſand other illegal acts of oppreſſion: but after all, ſuch was the diſpoſition of the nation in general, and ſo great an averſion the people ſhewed to popery and arbitrary power, that the king, fearing his endeavours would prove ineffectual, would not venture to call another parliament.

It is very obſervable, that while James was thus labouring to introduce popery, he received into protection, and very charitably relieved, multitudes of French proteſtants, whom perſecution had obliged to fly their native country.

Henry IV. of France had, about a century before, granted an edict, commonly called the Edict of Nantes; ſecuring the proteſtants in the free exercise of their religion. This edict, which had often been declared irrevocable, and which, during the experience of so long a period, had been productive of no bad consequences, was now revoked by Lewis XIV. who persecuted these unhappy religionists with such rigour and severity, that above half a million of the most useful and industrious subjects deserted France, and carried with them, besides an immense sum of money, those arts and manufactures which had chiefly tended hitherto to enrich that kingdom.

The king, fully sensible of the great popularity the prince of Orange possessed in England, especially amongst the dissenting party; and that the princess his consort was in general revered as the presumptive heir of the crown, was greatly desirous to know their opinion concerning the penal laws and test, not doubting, if he could procure their concurrence to a repeal, it would have great weight with the nation. This matter was at first managed with great secrecy by one Mr. Stuart, who by the king's private direction wrote to Fagel, the pensionary of Amsterdam, to sound the prince and princess on this subject. The answers proved far from agreeable to the court. However, it was confidently given out that the prince and princess had declared their approbation of the repeal. This report reaching the ear of their royal highnesses, Fagel was directed to draw up a letter to the court of England, that might rectify all mistakes, and declare to the world their true opinions. In this letter, dated November 1687, the pensionary declares, that "although their royal highnesses were for a full liberty of conscience, and wished not that any one should be persecuted or punished for differing from the established religion; yet they could by no means consent to the repeal of the test and the other penal laws, which tended to the security of the protestant religion, especially as those laws could not be said to carry in them any severity against the Roman catholics on account of their consciences, being only provisions for qualifying persons for a seat in parliament, or the enjoyment of public offices." The publication of this letter afforded matter of great satisfaction to the nation; but to the king it gave the severest mortification, as it convinced the world how contrary the sentiments of the prince and princess were to those of their father.

Hitherto the protestants had submitted to the violent attacks made upon their civil and religious liberties, from the hope that the king, who was now in his fifty-fifth year, would ere long pay the tribute to nature; and that the princess of Orange, like another Elizabeth, would resettle things on their antient foundation when she should ascend the throne; but their hopes seemed quite extinguished, when a proclamation was published in the Gazette of January 2, 1688, declaring the queen to be with child, and ordering a thanksgiving on that account. The extravagant joy of the papists on this occasion, the sanguine expressions of the jesuits, who gave out that this conception was miraculous, and the effect of a pilgrimage made by her majesty's mother (the duchess of Modena) to the chapel of our Lady of Loretto, and that their queen would certainly have a prince, made the generality of the protestants, whose all was now at stake, entertain suspicions of this pregnancy, as a scheme of the papists to establish their religion in England, by imposing an heir on the kingdom. From this time the protestants seem to have banished their forbearing principles, and to have taken up a resolution to oppose the baleful designs of the king and his ministry; nor is it improbable that they now turned their eyes on the prince of Orange, as the only person to whom they could apply to head them in the stand they proposed to make in defence of their liberties and religion.

However this might be, the king was so elevated with this prospect of male issue, that he seemed to set the prince of Orange at defiance, endeavoured by every slight and insult to provoke the Dutch into a war, and at length went so far as to publish a proclamation, recalling all his majesty's subjects that were in the service of the States-General. The prince of Orange, on his side, offered passports to such English or Scottish officers as desired to quit the service, and by this expedient purged the troops of those individuals, of whose attachment and fidelity he was doubtful.

James, still burning with frantic zeal, and a thirst for confirming his despotic power, seemed determined no longer to keep any measures with his subjects. On the twenty-seventh of April, 1688, came out a second declaration for liberty of conscience, almost in the same terms with the former; and an order from the king was subjoined, commanding the clergy, immediately after divine service, to read it in their churches. This was such an insult upon the pastors of the established religion, as could be meant only to drive them to extremities, and then to take advantage of their non-compliance with the royal mandate. Some few of the court-clergy and bishops obeyed, but the far greater number of prelates and ministers unanimously refused obedience. Six bishops, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Ken of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, and Trelawny of Bristol, assembled privately at the archbishop of Canterbury's (Sancroft) palace, and drew up a petition to the king, and, with the primate, went to present it to him on their knees*.

James,

* The petition was couched in the following terms: "To the king's most excellent majesty; the humble petition of William archbishop of Canterbury, and divers of the suffragan bishops of that province now present with him, in behalf of themselves, and others of their absent brethren, and of the inferior clergy of their respective dioceses, humbly sheweth,

"That the great averseness they find in themselves to the distributing and publishing in all their churches your majesty's declaration for liberty of conscience, proceeds neither from want of duty and obedience to your majesty (our holy mother the church of England being both in her principles and constant practice unquestionably loyal, and having to her great honour been more than once publicly acknowledged to be so by your gracious majesty) nor yet from any want of tenderness to dissenters; in relation to whom we are willing to come to such a temper as shall be thought fit, when the matter shall be considered and settled in parliament and convocation: but, among many other considerations, from this especially, because that declaration is founded upon such a dispensing power as hath been often declared illegal in parliament, particularly in the years 1662 and 1672, and in the beginning of your majesty's reign; and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in church and state, that your petitioners cannot in prudence, honour, or conscience,

so

James, impatient of controul, and diſtinguiſhed for obſtinacy, which court-ſycophants are ever ready to dignify with the name of conſtancy, reſented this oppoſition to his will in the higheſt manner: he diſmiſſed the biſhops from his preſence with a ſharp reprimand, telling them, that if they had forgotten he was the ſupreme head of the church, he knew how to make himſelf acknowledged as ſuch. Soon after the delivery of the petition, the biſhops were ſummoned before the council: the paper they had delivered was ſhown to them, and they were required to declare whether or not they were inclinable to own it. This queſtion, which appeared to be intended as a ſnare, at firſt ſtartled the biſhops: they were ſilent for a ſhort time; at length the archbiſhop of Canterbury acknowleged that it had been written by him, and the reſt declared they had ſigned it. The lord-chancellor Jefferies inſulted the reverend fathers with his uſual brutality: he repreſented their petition as an attempt to demoliſh the king's authority, and to diſturb the peace of the kingdom; concluding with aſking them, if they would give bail to appear in the court of King's-Bench, and anſwer to the charge which ſhould be brought againſt them for this libel. The biſhops knew too well their own dignity to be thus entrapped: they replied, that their privilege as peers exempted them from the neceſſity of giving ſecurity, on being charged with a miſdemeanor; and that they were bound by oath to maintain the rights of the peerage, as well as the rights of the church. Jefferies in a fury told them, that unleſs they inſtantly retracted their aſſertions, and withdrew their petition, he would ſend them to the Tower. They anſwered, "That they ſubmitted to his majeſty's pleaſure, whatever it ſhould be; that their own conſciences told them they had acted nothing but what was agreeable to the laws, and the ſacred character with which they were inveſted; and that they depended on the King of kings to be their protector:" whereupon a warrant was iſſued for their commitment to the Tower, the charge againſt them being, "For contriving, making, and publiſhing a ſeditious libel againſt his majeſty and his government."

No pen can deſcribe the conſternation that ſeized on all ranks of people, when they found theſe fathers of the church, theſe noble oppoſers of tyranny and oppreſſion, were to be dragged away to confinement. The court was aware of the diſagreeable conſequences ſuch a ſight might produce on the part of the populace, and had taken the precaution of ordering the prelates to be conveyed to the Tower from Whitehall by water, in a private manner; but the alarm was gone abroad, and the ſhore was lined with innumerable ſpectators, who with one voice deplored their fate, and on their knees intreated their bleſſing. The good biſhops on this occaſion increaſed by their conduct the love their ſufferings had begotten; they checked the tranſports of the multitude; they charged them to continue to fear God, to honour the king, and by no raſh act to impeach their loyalty. In this manner they were conveyed to the place of their confinement, where even the ſoldiers who were appointed to guard them, moved by the ſympathy of example, fell on their knees to aſk their benediction, and expreſſed themſelves in the bitterſt terms of reſentment againſt their perſecutors. The king hearing of this, ordered ſome other companies to march into the Tower, in whom he had more confidence.

On the tenth of June, two days after the commitment of the biſhops, the queen was ſaid to be delivered of a prince, who was baptized by the name of James, and who was very lately alive at Rome, under the name of the Chevalier de St. George, but beſt known in England by the name of the Pretender. This event, the moſt joyous that could happen for the catholic party, was notified by public proclamation, and a thankſgiving ordered to be obſerved throughout the kingdom. However, the people in general were prepoſſeſſed with a notion that this was only a trick of the papiſts to cut off the princeſs of Orange from the ſucceſſion; and they were the rather confirmed in this opinion by certain myſterious circumſtances, both in reſpect to the pregnancy and the lying-in; and the management of the court was ſuch as tended rather to increaſe than remove theſe ſuppoſitions. At the time of the queen's delivery, the princeſs Anne of Denmark was at Bath, whither ſhe had gone ſome few weeks before, at the earneſt intreaty, if not command, of her father; the archbiſhop of Canterbury was in the Tower; and the Dutch ambaſſador, who ſhould have been preſent as a witneſs in behalf of the prince and princeſs of Orange, was not called to the labour. In ſhort, the birth of this child, which, according to the common rule of things, ought to have proved the bond of union between the king and his people, had the very contrary effect. Both parties, proteſtants and catholics, laboured under ſuch violent prejudices at this time, as could not fail to influence their judgments. No wonder, therefore, if we ſtill find the one ſtrenuouſly aſſerting the legitimacy of this child, the other aſſerting the whole affair to be an impoſture. Dr. Burnet tells us, that he had it from the mouth of one of the queen's phyſicians, that ſhe had miſcarried in the month of April preceding; and though he does not abſolutely aſſert that this delivery was a trick, yet he talks of it in ſuch a manner, as leaves us very little room to doubt that he thought ſo, as indeed many others then did, and ſtill continue to do; though this has been carried ſo far as to pretend, that there were three ſuppoſititious children palmed upon the public, one after another, the two former having died in a very few days after each other. The only method to account for this proceeding is, to ſuppoſe that ſeveral big-bellied women had been brought together, who were each of them alike near their time, in order to have a ſufficient ſupply of children to carry on the impoſture. I acknowlege myſelf wholly at a loſs to account for this affair, and therefore ſhall only obſerve, that circumſtances which at any other time would be thought to have little or nothing in them, in caſe of a general ſuſpicion, are uſually applied to confirm that ſuſpicion: but indeed this queſtion is now become a matter of mere curioſity. Beſides, allowing the prince of Wales, as he was called, to have been the real and genuine ſon of the king and queen, yet the ſolemn excluſion of his father, for his attachment to the catholic religion, and his own education in thoſe principles, have as effectually diſqualified him from any claim upon the crown of theſe kingdoms, as if his illegitimacy had been ever ſo clearly proved. But to return:

The ſeven impriſoned biſhops, after about a week's confinement, demanded the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act, which the court either could not, or did not chuſe to deny them. They were releaſed from the Tower on the ſeventeenth of June, being bailed in their own recognizances, the archbiſhop in two hundred pounds, and the other biſhops in one hundred pounds each. Their trial came on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, when an infinite croud of people of all ranks attended at Weſtminſter-hall: the cauſe continued ten hours. Two of the judges, Wright and Allebone, gave their opinion that the petition was a libel; and the two others, Holloway and Powel, that it was not. The jury ſtaid ſo long out, that the court was adjourned, and the foreman brought in the verdict next morning, that the defendants were Not Guilty: at which words the whole hall reſounded with ſhouts of joy: the news flew inſtantly through all quarters of the city: bells were rung all day; and the night began and ended with bonfires and illuminations, as if the nation had gained ſome great and ſignal victory: a glorious one indeed it was for the proteſtant religion and the church of England, whoſe biſhops now enjoyed a greater triumph than they had known ſince the Reformation. The nation ſeemed deſirous to make them amends for the cruel inſults it had offered them, when, ſeduced by the artifices of Cromwell and his party, not quite fifty years before, it had driven them from all rank and dignity in the ſtate, and loaded them with the moſt bitter contumely, for having obſerved the ſame conduct as they did on this occaſion.

The rejoicings for the delivery of the perſecuted prelates were not confined to the metropolis alone; they reached the camp on Hounſlow-heath. The ſoldiers no ſooner received the news of the verdict given by the jury, than, without paying any regard to the preſence of the king, who was then dining with lord Feverſham in his tent, they burſt forth into the moſt extravagant marks of tumultuous joy. When the king was made acquainted with the reaſon, he could not conceal his diſpleaſure: he had hitherto fixed his chief dependence on the ſubmiſſion of his army to his will. This incident awakened in his mind ſeveral uneaſy ſuſpicions: he reſolved to be fully ſatisfied, by putting their attachment to an infallible teſt; but here he received the greateſt mortification of all: for beginning with the lord Litchfield's regiment, which he ordered to be drawn up in his preſence, he commanded ſuch officers and ſoldiers as would not contribute to the repeal of the teſt and penal laws, to ground their arms; when, to the king's great ſurprize, the whole regiment, except two captains, and ſome few popiſh ſoldiers, laid down their firelocks; at which he was ſo aſtoniſhed, that he ſtood ſpeechleſs for ſome minutes; then bidding them take up their arms, he told them with a ſullen air, "That for the future he would not do them the honour to aſk their advice." He ſaw now that it would only be expoſing himſelf to contempt to try the reſt of his forces, and therefore had recourſe to another method, ſuch as he thought would effectually anſwer his end: this was, to diſcard the greateſt part of the officers and ſoldiers who were proteſtants, and ſubſtitute catholics in their place; a ſcheme which, to the unſpeakable happineſs of this nation, he had not time to accompliſh, though he began it in part, by new-modelling the regiment commanded by his own natural ſon the duke of Berwick; but this only ſerved to diſguſt the army the more. The navy ſhewed itſelf as little diſpoſed to favour the views of the king as the military had done: for vice-admiral Strickland having ordered maſs to be ſaid on board his ſhip in the Downs, the ſailors were enraged to ſuch a degree, that it was with great difficulty they could be hindered from ſeizing the prieſts, and throwing them overboard. James, however, ſtill continued obſtinate in his purpoſe; and as he ſaw that his deſign of new-modelling the army would be liable to conſiderable obſtructions and delays, he ſent for ſix regiments over from Ireland, the greateſt part of them compoſed of papiſts in whom he could entirely confide, and ordered three thouſand men to advance out of Scotland.

Such was the ſituation of affairs, when the nation, now fully convinced of the king's deſigns to ſubvert the conſtitution both in church and ſtate, began in earneſt to think of means for preſerving their religion and liberties from being utterly deſtroyed; and many perſons of eminence and intereſt in the kingdom, as well clergy as laity, who had gone very great lengths in ſupport of the kingly authority, thought it was better to retract their doctrine of non-reſiſtance and paſſive obedience, than bring their country to the brink of ruin by an obſtinate adherence to it; and entered into a ſtrict union with the non-conformiſts for their mutual ſecurity, and to take meaſures for inviting over the prince of Orange, in order to put him at the head of the party againſt the king. The prince no ſooner received an intimation of this diſpoſition in the Engliſh to ſhake off the yoke of his father-in-law's government, than he adroitly ſet himſelf to work to make his own advantage of it. He had ſent over Zuyleſtein, one of his gentlemen of the bed-chamber, to congratulate James on the birth of his ſon. This miniſter had orders to ſound ſome of the principal perſons of the kingdom on this great ſubject. Zuyleſtein ſoon informed him that the conjuncture was entirely favourable to his views; that the whole nation were ready to riſe, and only wanted a chief to head them. Several of the nobility and gentry going abroad on various pretences *, waited on the prince at the Hague, and con-confirmed this intelligence. As a frequent correſpondence paſſed between England and Holland, the prince of Orange and the Engliſh proteſtants kept up a mutual intercourſe, and by letters and meſſages concerted that plan, which at length was maturated, to the happy deliverance of this nation from a papal yoke.

The ſituation of affairs in Europe at this time contributed not a little to the ſucceſs of this deſign. The manifeſt partiality of James in favour of the ambitious views of Lewis XIV. had alarmed not only the proteſtants, but the Roman catholic powers likewiſe, and they dreaded nothing ſo much as a firm coalition between the two courts of England and France: they ſaw no hopes of ſafety for themſelves but in a revolution in this kingdom. Innocent XI. who was known by the name of the Proteſtant Pope, only on account of the wiſe diſregard he had ſhewn to the mad attempts of James to introduce popery into England, was, if we may believe contemporary hiſtorians, far from being averſe to the intended reformation in our government. The deſign, however, was managed with great ſecrecy at firſt, both at London and at the Hague; but when it came to be known, was approved by the whole nation, nay indeed by all Europe, France only excepted. The prince of Orange, however, would not engage in this matter till he had received a formal invitation from ſuch perſons whom he knew to have every thing to riſque in caſe of their enterprize miſcarrying. This invitation was brought over by Zuyleſtein on his return from his embaſſy, and then the prince readily accepted of the proffer made him, to undertake the defence of the nation againſt the machinations of their ſovereign. Would it be a treſpaſs on the regard we owe to William III. to ſay, that perhaps ſelf-intereſt, and the deſire of reigning over ſo great a kingdom, contributed as much as his love for liberty and the proteſtant religion, to induce him to accept of the proffered chieftainſhip over the diſcontented Engliſh?

It is certain that he could not have choſen a more fortunate time for his enterprize, as the people were then extremely incenſed by the impriſonment of the biſhops, which was juſtly conſidered as a glaring inſult, not only to the church, but even to all the proteſtants in the kingdom.

The leading men who had joined in the invitation of the prince of Orange, diſperſed themſelves in their different counties, in order to gain the populace in their party, and ripen them into a diſpoſition for a general revolt. All this time, neither the king nor his council ſeem to have had the leaſt ſuſpicion of what was tranſacting. William, on his ſide, conducted the neceſſary preparations with admirable prudence and policy. Under pretext of interfering in the diſpute then on foot between prince Clement of Bavaria, and the cardinal of Furſtemberg, about the election of an archbiſhop of Cologne, he formed an army of nine thouſand men, which was encamped near Nimeguen; a fleet of fifty men of war, and a ſufficient number of tranſports, were by degrees aſſembled in the Dutch harbours, and waited only for orders to take on board the troops deſigned for the landing in England. All this was tranſacted with a circumſpection and addreſs, that ſufficiently evidence the great capacity and abilities of the prince of Orange, who could conceal theſe public preparations under ſuch pretences, that no one could as yet diſcover his intentions. Doubtleſs he was greatly indebted to the complaiſance of the States, who on this occaſion heartily concurred with him in all his meaſures. The prince, after he had determined to put himſelf at the head of the malecontent party in England, had deſired the Engliſh lords at the Hague to demand aſſiſtance of the States in the name of all England. Their High Mightineſſes did not want much perſuaſion to yield to a requeſt of this kind: they were equally concerned in the affair with the Engliſh themſelves, as the ruin of Holland would doubtleſs have ſoon followed the ſlavery of England, conſidering the deſigns of Lewis XIV. and his cloſe union with James. Nor was it from his own countrymen only that the prince of Orange received countenance and aſſiſtance in this enterprize; many of the neighbouring princes, the electors of Brandenbourg and Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the whole houſe of Lunenburg, agreed to aſſemble their forces, and protect the United Provinces, during the abſence of their Stadtholder.

It was a conſiderable time before king James would believe that his ſon-in-law had conceived any deſign againſt him, or that the forces the prince was aſſembling were deſtined to invade England. Lewis, however, having received intelligence from the count d'Avaux, his ambaſſador at the Hague, of what was likely to be the event of theſe great preparations, tranſmitted the information to James, and at the ſame time made him an offer of any number of troops he ſhould think proper for his defence; or that he would immediately ſend over fifteen thouſand men, if the king of England would put Portſmouth into their hands, in order to preſerve to them a free communication with France. Theſe affairs were laid before the council; but the earl of Sunderland, who was prime miniſter, and is, not without reaſon, ſuppoſed to have already entered into a correſpondence with the prince of Orange, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the accepting them. He alleged in ſupport of his opinion, that a ſmall body of foreign troops would do more hurt than good, as they would be ſufficient to excite the murmurs of the people, but not to keep them in ſubjection. The Engliſh ſoldiers, he ſaid, naturally averſe to be commanded by, or even act in concert with, foreigners, would take every opportunity to deſert: that, on the other hand, it would require no leſs than forty thouſand men to prevent or quell the oppoſition of the diſcontented part of the nation: that ſuch an army would naturally receive all its orders from the court of France; and while it kept the Engliſh under awe, would reduce the king himſelf to little better than a viceroy to Lewis XIV. Theſe arguments, though dictated by perfidy, carried with them an appearance of ſound reaſoning: the council ſubſcribed to the miniſter's opinion, and James refuſed, though with many expreſſions of gratitude, this important offer.

Still Lewis was loth to forſake his friend and ally, in whoſe welfare he conſidered himſelf as deeply intereſted. He ſent orders to d'Avaux to remonſtrate to the States in his name, againſt the preparations which they ſeemed to be making for a deſcent upon England. The ſtrict friendſhip and alliance, ſaid the French miniſter, which ſubſiſts between the two monarchs, will make Lewis conſider every attempt againſt his ally as an act of hoſtility againſt himſelf. This remonſtrance, far from intimidating, ſerved only to incenſe the States. They demanded, with great vehemence, What was the purport of the late alliance between France and England, which had been ſo ſecretly concluded? Whether it was of the ſame nature with the former; intended for the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion? If it was, it then behoved them inſtantly to provide for their ſafety, and to defeat thoſe projects which were formed againſt them *. James himſelf was vexed with Lewis for taking this raſh ſtep; and finding that he had been adviſed to it by Skelton, the Engliſh envoy at the Hague, he ſent for that miniſter home, and committed him to the Tower, at the ſame time publicly diſclaiming all alliance with France, and his having any knowlege of the memorial. Whatever truth there might be in this aſſertion, neither the States nor his own ſubjects gave credit to it: the Engliſh in particular were more incenſed than ever againſt their ſovereign, whom they firmly believed to have entered into a plan with the French king for reducing them to entire ſlavery.

While the unhappy James, diſtracted by a thouſand uneaſy apprehenſions, was conſidering how beſt he might retrieve his affairs, he received, towards the end of September, certain advice of the prince of Orange's deſign, and that he might ſoon expect to ſee the Dutch fleet upon his coaſts, with a land army on board, accompanied by ſeveral Engliſh noblemen and gentlemen of diſtinction, who had hitherto concealed themſelves there. James was perfectly thunderſtruck at receiving this news: neither himſelf nor his council could propoſe any poſſible means of reſiſting the invaſion. The proteſtants, who compoſed the bulk of the nation, he knew, looked upon themſelves as victims devoted to ruin, and would therefore naturally join the prince in their own defence: nay, it was more than probable he was coming over upon their expreſs invitation. Both the fleet and land forces had ſufficiently diſcovered their little inclination to ſupport the king in the execution of his deſigns, or rather their reſolution to oppoſe him to the utmoſt. What then was to be done? There was little time for deliberation: the ſtorm was driving ſwiftly on, and it behoved him to have immediate recourſe to ſome ſhelter againſt its fury. James then reſolved to throw himſelf upon the church of England, and by revoking ſeveral of his late unpopular acts, endeavour to retrieve the good will and affection of his ſubjects. With this view he conſulted immediately with the biſhops then in London, aboliſhed the commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs, took off the biſhop of London's ſuſpenſion, reſtored the city to its charter, removed popiſh magiſtrates and put proteſtants in their room, and took ſome other ſteps towards the redreſs of grievances. Theſe however had not the deſired effect: they came too late, and were generally looked upon as the reſult of fear, rather than of inclination or a real change of ſentiments. James ſeems to have been at ſome pains to confirm his people in this opinion; for notwithſtanding the preſent tickliſh ſituation of his affairs, he had the madneſs to name the pope to be one of the godfathers to his new-born ſon.

Meanwhile the prince of Orange laboured inceſſantly at the compleating of his armament; and when all things were in readineſs, he publiſhed a manifeſto, explaining the true motives of his undertaking. Copies of this paper were ſent over here, and diſtributed all over the kingdom. In this declaration the prince ſolemnly diſclaimed all thoughts of conqueſt, or of diſturbing the king, his father in-law, in the enjoyment of his ſovereignty, declaring that his deſign was only to maintain the proteſtant laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms, which had been ſo openly violated, and to procure the aſſembling of a free and lawful parliament, that might at once ſettle all the rights of the ſubject, and the prerogatives of the crown, on a firm and unalterable baſis; and to this, he ſaid, he had been invited "by a great many lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and other ſubjects of all ranks."

At the ſame time, the States-General publiſhed a paper, containing the reaſons which had induced them to lend their ſhips and men to the prince of Orange. Theſe were, the invitations his highneſs had received from the nobility, gentry, and clergy of England, and the apprehenſions that king James, after he ſhould have ſubjected his own kingdom to his arbitrary will, would join with the French monarch in reducing the United Provinces to ſlavery, and totally extirpating the proteſtant religion.

On the twenty-firſt of October, the prince of Orange ſet ſail for England with the Dutch fleet, conſiſting of about fifty men of war of the line, twenty-five frigates, as many fire-ſhips, and between three and four hundred victuallers and tranſports, having on board four thouſand horſe and nine thouſand foot, and accompanied by the Engliſh nobility and gentry already mentioned, and others; with count Naſſau, general of the horſe; count Solmes, colonel of the foot-guards; count Stirum; Mynheer Bentinck; Mynheer Overquerque; and Mynheer Zuyleſtein: as alſo the famous marſhal Schomberg, and a great number of French officers, who had left their native country, and taken refuge in Holland on account of religion. Admiral Herbert, who had gone over to the prince from England, led the van of the fleet: the prince commanded in the center, with a flag flying at his main-maſt-head, on which were diſplayed his own arms, and thoſe of his conſort, ſurrounded with this motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION, AND THE LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND: underneath, the words JE MAINTIENDRAI, the device of the houſe of Naſſau. This fleet had ſailed but a few leagues when the wind came about to the weſt, and blew ſo violent a ſtorm, that in a very few hours there were not four ſhips to be ſeen together. The ſcattered veſſels made ſome for one port, ſome for another. Happily not one was loſt; but upon the news of this diſaſter arriving here, the court party immediately ſet their hirelings to work, to repreſent the fleet as ſo miſerably diſabled, that it could not poſſibly be in a condition to put to ſea again till the latter end of the ſpring. On this occaſion James acted as if he had really believed the fiction of his own raiſing; for he inſtantly began to recal ſome of his late popular acts, and thereby diſcovered what was to be expected from him, if once he ſhould find himſelf freed from the preſent danger. Much about this time the king appears to have diſcovered that the earl of Sunderland had played him falſe, by holding a correſpondence with the prince of Orange; for in this month of October that nobleman was diſmiſſed from his two employments of ſecretary of ſtate and preſident of the council. The earl thought proper, ſome time afterwards, to publiſh an apology for his conduct.

James had been not a little alarmed at that expreſſion in the prince's manifeſto, where he ſays, "He was earneſtly invited over by ſeveral of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and others:" and thereupon ſending for the archbiſhop, and as many of the prelates as could be aſſembled, he demanded of them, If that part of the prince's declaration was true? The biſhops were a little confounded: however, they replied by many general profeſſions of duty and affection to his majeſty. The king then aſked them, if they would ſign an abhorrence of the intended invaſion? adding, that this would be the moſt convincing proof they could give him of their loyalty, and of eminent ſervice to him in the preſent poſture of affairs, by the effect it would have on the minds of his enemies, both within and without doors. A declaration againſt the prince of Orange, he ſaid, was then in the preſs, and nothing retarded the publication but waiting for their paper of abhorrence to be annexed to it. He then diſmiſſed them from his preſence, after having aſſigned them a ſhort day for giving in their anſwer. On the day appointed the biſhops again waited on the king at Whitehall, when, upon their entering the preſence, "Well, my lords, aſked his majeſty with ſome impatience, Where is your paper?" "We humbly beg of your majeſty, replied they, to hold us excuſed from writing any thing of the nature your majeſty was pleaſed to mention to us, or for making a particular defence to a general accuſation, leſt we ſhould thereby give the firſt precedent of that kind againſt the privilege of peers: moreover, we humbly conceive, that our profeſſion being to promote peace, it belongeth not to us to declare war, eſpecially againſt a prince ſo nearly allied to the crown." This anſwer threw the king into a violent tranſport of rage; and finding that the prelates continued firm to their reſolution, in ſpite of menaces or ſoothings, he ordered them to withdraw, not without ſenſible marks of his diſpleaſure. But to return to the prince of Orange.

The damage the ſcattered fleet ſuſtained was ſo ſmall, that the prince was ſoon in a condition to put to ſea again, which he did on November 1, and ſtood to the northward, intending to land in ſome part of Yorkſhire, near the mouth of the Humber; but the wind blowing ſtrong at eaſt, they put before it, and made to the weſtward; and on the third of November the fleet entered the Channel, and lay by between Calais and Dover: the king's fleet, under the earl of Dartmouth, lay at anchor at the Gunfleet; but the wind blew ſo hard, that they could not get under way to aſſail the enemy. Indeed, it is more than probable that the admiral, knowing the diſpoſition of the ſeamen in general to be averſe to the court and its meaſures, was apprehenſive of putting all upon a ſtake by a precipitate engagement. Be that as it may, the prince, making ſail again, came off the Iſle of Wight in the evening; and orders were given not to over-run Dartmouth in the night. The next morning, however, to their great mortification, they found the wind and current, for which they had not made proper allowances, had carried them paſt both Dartmouth and Torbay. They gave all over now for loſt, as they ſaw nothing left but to winter at Plymouth, or ſome of the more weſterly ports, which would give the king time to provide for his defence in ſuch a manner as might overturn all their projects. In the midſt of theſe diſagreeable reflections, the wind, on a ſudden flew about to the ſouth, and carried the whole fleet in leſs than four hours into Torbay. The infantry was landed that evening; and their debarkation was hardly completed, when the wind, ſhifting again, blew a ſtorm from the weſt, which prevented the Lord Dartmouth's purſuing them. The Dutch fleet lay ſo land-locked, that the gale had no effect upon it: the Engliſh, on the contrary, unable to keep the ſea, were obliged to run into harbour for ſafety. This is the ſubſtance of Dr. Burnet's account of this expedition, who was on board the fleet in quality of prince's chaplain *.

The prince, having refreſhed his troops, put them in march, and advanced to Exeter, which city he entered on the 8th of November. He remained there till the 15th, without being joined by any perſon of condition, inſomuch that his ſpirit again began to flag; and it was actually debated in the council, whether they ſhould not reimbark, and return to Holland. But at length Sir Edward Seymour, Major Barrington, and ſeveral other gentlemen of the county of Devon and Somerſet, made their appearance at his highneſs's quarters with tenders of their aſſiſtance. The prince received them with the greateſt politeneſs and cordiality. Soon after he had the ſatisfaction of finding himſelf joined by the earl of Abington, the Lord Ruſſel (ſon to the earl of Wharton), Mr. Godfrey, and Mr. Howe; and to hear, that the Lord Delamere had taken arms for him in Cheſhire; that the earl of Danby had ſecured York, and with the earl of

* This right reverend father tells us, that going to the prince's quarters after landing, his highneſs took him by the hand, and aſked him, if he did not believe in predeſtination? To which the doctor replied, "He could never forget that providence which had appeared ſo ſignally for them." Burnet.

This circumſtance of the ſame wind being favourable to the Dutch, and unfavourale to the king's fleet, gave occaſion to apply the two famous lines of Claudian to the prince of Orange:

"O! nimium dilecte Deo, cui militat æther,
"Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti."

Which may be thus rendered:

O youth! high favour'd of indulgent heaven,
To whom the winds for miniſters are given!

Bath, governor of that city, had declared in his favour. The earl of Devonshire did the same in Derby. In fine, every day furnished fresh instances of the attachment of the nation to a prince whom they now looked upon as their deliverer from popery and arbitrary power. Sir Edward Seymour, upon his first coming in, had drawn up an association, in the name of himself and friends, to stand by the prince and one another in the cause they had engaged in, which was afterwards signed by great numbers of all ranks throughout the kingdom.

Upon the first news of the prince's landing, the two archbishops, with five other prelates; the dukes of Grafton and Ormond; the earls of Dorset, Clare, Clarendon, Rochester, Burlington, and Anglesey; the lords Newport, Paget, Chandois, and Ossulston, all of them then residing in London, drew up a petition to his Majesty; "intreating him to call with all speed a free parliament, and to take some measures for satisfying the prince of Orange, and for preventing the effusion of Christian blood." This petition was presented on the 17th of November by the two archbishops and the bishops of Ely and Rochester. The king returned an answer, in which he assured them, that there was nothing he more passionately desired than to have a free parliament; and that, as soon as the prince of Orange should have quitted the realm, he would convoke such an one; but could not think of doing it while an enemy was in the heart of the kingdom, and could command so many returns.

The same day the king set out for Salisbury, where his army had its head-quarters, with a view to oppose the prince. On his arrival in the camp, he had the mortification to hear, that the Lord Cornbury, son to the earl of Clarendon, and colonel of the dragoons, had carried with him his own regiment and three others to the prince at Exeter. The other principal officers of the army gave his majesty to understand by their general, the earl of Feversham, that though they were ready to stand by his majesty to the last drop of their blood on any other occasion, they could not answer to their consciences to fight against a prince who was come over to secure to them the enjoyment of their religion and properties. Soon after the duke of Grafton, and several other officers of distinction, went over to the prince; and James finding that there was no relying upon his troops, and probably apprehensive that they might deliver him up to his son-in-law, set out for London, after having published a proclamation, promising pardon to all his subjects who had taken up arms, if they would return to their duty. On his way back to his capital, he was deserted by the prince of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, and, what was still more extraordinary, by the Lord Churchill, who had owed his whole fortune to the king's bounty, by whom he had been raised from the rank of a page to an high command in the army, and had afterwards been created a peer. This ingratitude was deeply felt by James, but a more severe blow awaited him; for when he arrived at Whitehall, he understood that his daughter, Anne princess of Denmark, had left the town the night before, and, with the bishop of London, was gone to join the prince. The wretched king was no way prepared for so astonishing an event. He burst into tears when he received the affecting news; and, in the distress of his heart, he exclaimed, "God help me! my own children have forsaken me."

The prince of Orange, having received advice of the king's return to London, advanced with his army to Sherborn, and from thence to Salisbury, where he made a triumphant entry, the king's forces having before retired to Reading. In this distress the king assembled all the Protestant peers about town, and desired their advice*, who proposed the calling a free parliament, and to send commissioners to treat with the prince. This the king readily complied with; the lord chancellor was directed to issue out writs accordingly; Papists were removed from the posts and offices they held about the court; Sir Edward Hales, lieutenant of the Tower, who was one of that communion, was displaced, and succeeded by Sir Bevil Skelton; and father Peters, the king's confessor, seeing the storm rise so high, wisely consulted his safety by an escape into France.

The marquis of Halifax, the earl of Northampton, and the Lord Godolphin, were sent to treat with the prince, who delivered to them a paper containing certain proposals, the substance whereof was, that a free parliament should be called; that all Papists should be disarmed, and dispossessed of all employments they enjoyed; that all proclamations against himself should be recalled; that the command of the Tower should be put into the hands of the lord-mayor; that if the king should think proper to reside in London during the time of the session of parliament, the prince should likewise reside in the same place with an equal number of guards, or that the king and he should reside at an equal distance from London; that each army should be removed thirty miles from the city, and that no new forces should be brought into the kingdom; that Tilbury-fort should be put into the hands of the city magistrates; that, until the parliament should meet, part of the revenue should be assigned for the maintenance of the prince's army; and that, in order to prevent an invasion from abroad, Portsmouth should be committed to the charge of some person equally agreeable to the king and the prince.

When these proposals were presented to James, he affected to think them as moderate, or even more so than he could have expected in the present posture of his affairs; but in all probability his real sentiments were otherwise, and that finding himself attacked and pursued by one of his sons-in-law, abandoned by the other, deserted by his own daughters and bosom friends, and hated by his subjects, he looked upon his fortune as desperate, and therefore resolved upon flight, the last resource of a vanquished prince. It is said he was chiefly instigated to this resolution by his popish counsellors, who dreaded nothing so much as the meeting of a parliament, where they were conſcious they ſhould be rendered incapable of ever having any ſhare in the adminiſtration again, and perhaps puniſhed for their attempts to ſubvert the government and the eſtabliſhed religion.

* We are told, that on this occasion the king, addressing himself to the earl of Bedford, "My lord, said he, you are a good man, have great influence, and can do me signal service." "Alas! replied the earl, I am a feeble old man, very incapable of performing any considerable service; but I had a son, he added with a sigh, who, if now alive, could serve your majesty in a more effectual manner." He alluded to Lord Russel, who, towards the end of the late reign, had fallen a sacrifice to the king's (then duke of York's) vengeance. James was so thunderstruck with this answer, that he remained for some time speechless. Burnet. Hume.

By whatever motives James was actuated, it is certain, that while every thing ſeemed to tend to an accommodation, and that the nobility were ordered to aſſemble to agree upon meaſures for re-eſtabliſhing the peace of the kingdom; the king, having ſent away the queen and the prince privately to Graveſend, from whence they took ſhipping, and paſſed over to France, on the eleventh of December diſappeared himſelf in the night-time, accompanied only by Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Labadie. He left a letter behind him for his general, the earl of Feverſham, wherein he ſays, "if he could have relied upon all his troops, he ſhould not have been driven to this extremity, and would at leaſt have hazarded one battle for the maintenance of his crown and dignity; but as matters ſtood with the army, he thought it madneſs to venture himſelf at their head againſt the prince of Orange: he thanked the general and all the officers that had been true to him; deſired them not to hazard their lives and fortunes by an unavailing oppoſition; only cautioning them not to enter into an aſſociation againſt him."

Nothing could equal the ſurprize which ſeized the city, the court, and the kingdom, upon the diſcovery of the king's flight. The more effectually to increaſe the confuſion which James knew muſt be the natural conſequence of his taking ſuch a ſtep, he named not any one who ſhould in his abſence conduct the affairs of the public: he threw the great ſeal into the river; he burned all the writs which had been made out for the election of a new parliament; and cauſed a caveat to be entered againſt making uſe of thoſe that were actually iſſued. Feverſham was no ſooner informed of his majeſty's retreat, than he diſbanded the troops which were in the neighbourhood; and, without either paying or diſarming them, let them looſe to pillage and plunder at pleaſure. The London mob now drew together, and pulled down the maſs-houſes; and the houſes of ſome foreign ambaſſadors did not eſcape their fury, from a notion that many rich Catholics had depoſited their moſt valuable effects there. Jefferies, the chancellor, who had hid himſelf in diſguiſe at a houſe in Wapping, waiting for a ſhip to carry him over to France, was diſcovered and ſeized by them, and treated ſo ſeverely, that the lord-mayor ſent him to the Tower to prevent his being pulled in pieces. There he died ſhortly after of the bruiſes he had received, and ſo eſcaped the exemplary puniſhment he had ſo notoriouſly deſerved. What ſtill increaſed the confuſion, was a report that prevailed, at one and the ſame inſtant, all over England, on the 12th of December, that the diſbanded Iriſh ſoldiers of Feverſham's army were burning of towns and cutting of throats every-where, and that nothing leſs than a general maſſacre of the Proteſtants was expected: the people were at their wits end; the city was illuminated, that the enemy might not take the advantage of the darkneſs to ſurprize it; and every man was in arms, to defend his family from the inſults of the cruel Iriſh. But the next day diſcovering the falſity of the report, the people recovered from their conſternation. It is generally ſuppoſed this was a ſtratagem made uſe of to create in the people a dread of popery and of King James's adminiſtration. If ſo, it certainly anſwered all the ends of the contrivers; and did more towards preventing that king's reſtoration, than the prince of Orange's troops.

In this public exigency the lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, then in London, together with ſome perſons of diſtinction, held a conſultation in Guild-hall with the lord-mayor and aldermen. They reſolved to adhere to the prince of Orange, and ſent deputies to him with this reſolution, ſubſcribed by all the members of the aſſembly. They then took the keys of the Tower from Skelton, and appointed the Lord Lucas governor of that fortreſs till the prince's pleaſure ſhould be known. They alſo publiſhed a proclamation, as did likewiſe the prince of Orange, requiring the officers of the army to re-aſſemble the diſbanded troops, and wait in quarters for further orders; the day after which, viz. on the 14th of December, his royal highneſs the prince arrived at Windſor in his way to London to ſettle with the lords, by whom he was expected, the affairs of the nation, on a ſuppoſition that the king had gone over to the continent, and entirely reſigned the reins of government; but to the no ſmall ſurprize and indeed mortification of the prince of Orange, news ſuddenly arrived, that his majeſty had been diſcovered at Feverſham, in Kent, on board a ſhip in which he was waiting for a fair wind to carry him over to France; and that after ſuffering ſeveral indignities from the populace of the place, who, not knowing his perſon, had miſtaken him for ſome Papiſt of quality making his eſcape, he was brought on ſhore, and lodged in the town. The peers, hearing his majeſty was ſtill in his dominions, ſent down four of their number, viz. the earls of Middleton, Ayleſbury, Yarmouth, and Feverſham, with a detachment of the guards, to attend his majeſty to London, whither he returned on the 16th of December. The populace, touched with compaſſion for his unhappy fate, received him with ſhouts and acclamations of joy. An expreſs was immediately diſpatched to the prince of Orange, to acquaint him with the return of his majeſty to his capital. How little agreeable this intelligence was to his highneſs, may be gathered from his actually ſending Mynheer Zuyleſtein to deſire the king would approach no nearer than Rocheſter; but the meſſage arrived too late. Indeed, Dr. Burnet ſcruples not to aſſure us, "That the prince of Orange had much rather his father-in-law had met with no interruption in his intended voyage."

The king, being come to Whitehall, began to reſume his former authority; and the ſame night cauſed an order of council to be publiſhed for ſuppreſſing tumults, and preventing the demoliſhing and plundering of houſes, and other kinds of outrages. The next day he ſent an invitation to the prince by the earl of Feverſham to come to St. James's Palace with what number of guards he ſhould think proper, that they might confer together for the redreſs of the grievances complained of. The only anſwer his highneſs returned to this meſſage, was the detaining the bearer, the earl of Feverſham, priſoner. The Dutch guards were ordered to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall, and to turn out all the Engliſh; the lords Halifax, Shrewſbury, and Delamere, were ſent, in the prince's name, name, at midnight, requeſting him to remove early in the morning to Ham, a ſeat of the ducheſs of Lauderdale's. The wretched James had by this time loſt all remains of ſpirit or reſolution: he patiently ſubmitted to the ignominious treatment offered him (for ſuch it certainly was, however partial prejudice may have varniſhed it over), and contented himſelf with requeſting that he might be allowed to remove to Rocheſter inſtead of Ham. This was readily granted: it was indeed the very thing the ruling powers deſigned to bring about: they had readily foreſeen, that by convincing him he was no longer regarded as a ſovereign, and even alarming him with fears for his perſonal ſafety, they urged him into that meaſure which was moſt ſuitable for anſwering their purpoſes, a ſecond flight. It is plain that the ſtratagem ſucceeded; for the king, after loitering a few days at Rocheſter under the protection of a Dutch guard, and ſeeing no likelihood of being invited to keep poſſeſſion of the throne, privately embarked, on the 23d of December, on board a frigate in the river, which, after a ſhort paſſage, landed him ſafely at Ambleteuſe in Picardy, from whence he repaired to St. Germains, where he was received by the French monarch with the greateſt marks of friendſhip and eſteem.

King James left a paper behind him, containing his reaſons for withdrawing a ſecond time; wherein he ſays, "The world could not wonder at his conduct, after the prince of Orange had made the earl of Feverſham priſoner, whom he ſent to treat in a friendly manner with him, and commanding his own guards to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall at eleven at night, without acquainting him with it; and even ſending him an order at midnight, when he was a-bed, to be gone. After this, he had little to hope for from one who had invaded his kingdom, and called the legitimacy of his ſon in queſtion, appealing to all that knew him, and even to the prince himſelf, if they could believe him guilty of ſo unnatural a villainy. He ſaid he was born free, and deſired to remain ſo; and for that reaſon had withdrawn himſelf again, but ſo as to be within call, whenever the nation's eyes ſhould be open, to ſee how they had been abuſed and impoſed upon by the ſpecious pretences of religion and property *."

Such was the farewel which James II. took of his ſubjects, after having governed them three years, nine months, and eleven days; and here we may properly fix the period of this unfortunate monarch's reign, which might have been as happy as any of his predeceſſors, had not his miſtaken notions of prerogative, his exceſſive bigotry to the religion of Rome, and an inflexible ſeverity of temper, hurried him into meaſures which rendered his government intolerable to a free and generous people, who could no longer ſubmit to a prince, whom they ſaw altogether guided by the violent counſels of a popiſh jeſuitical faction, and blindly adopting their enſlaving ſuperſtition.

Of fourteen children this king had by his two wives, Anne Hyde, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and Maria d'Eſte, daughter to the duke of Modena, three only ſurvived him, viz.

Mary, his eldeſt daughter, born the thirtieth of April, 1662, and married to William-Henry of Naſſau, prince of Orange, afterwards king of England.

Anne, his ſecond daughter, both by his firſt wife, born the ſixth day of February, 1664, and married to his royal highneſs George prince of Denmark, ſecond ſon to Frederick III. king of Denmark, afterwards queen of England.

By his ſecond queen he had one ſon;

James Francis Edward (whoſe birth was diſputed) known commonly by the title of the Chevalier de St. George, and in England by the name of the Pretender, who fixed his reſidence at Rome, where he died in the month of February of this preſent year 1766, aged ſeventy-eight.

King James the Second's natural iſſue was as follows:

By Mrs. Arabella Churchill, ſiſter of John duke of Marlborough, afterwards married to colonel Godfrey, he had, 1. James Fitz-James, grandee of Spain, mareſchal of France, knight of the Golden Fleece, commonly called duke of Berwick, outlawed in 1695.

2. Henry Fitz-James, commonly called the Grand Prior, born 1673, outlawed in 1695; lieutenant-general and admiral of the French gallies. He died in France, December 7, 1702.

3. Henrietta, born 1670, who married Henry lord Waldegrave, 1683.

By Mrs. Catherine Sedley, daughter of ſir Charles Sedley, baronet, created baroneſs of Darlington, and counteſs of Dorcheſter, afterwards married to Collier, earl of Portmore, he had Catherine Darnley, born 1681. She married, firſt, James Anneſley, earl of Angleſey, in October 1699; and after his death, ſecondly, John Sheffield duke of Buckinghamſhire and Normandy, March 1, 1705; by whom ſhe had Edmund duke of Buckingham, born January 11, 1716, who died in 1742.

INTERREGNUM, or rather the Prince of ORANGE's ADMINISTRATION.

AS ſoon as king James had thus left the kingdom, the lords took upon themſelves the government, and meeting in their houſe, choſe lord Halifax their ſpeaker. On the twenty-fifth of December, they agreed to addreſs the prince of Orange to take upon him the adminiſtration of all public affairs till a convention ſhould meet; for which they deſired him to iſſue out letters to the ſeveral counties, cities, or boroughs, directing them to chuſe ſuch a number of perſons to repreſent them as were of right to be ſent to parliament. They alſo iſſued an order for all papiſts to depart ten miles from the city of London, and not to remove above five miles from their habitations in the country. In order to give the greater weight to the proceedings of the lords, the prince of Orange publiſhed an order, deſiring all ſuch perſons as had been members in any of king Charles II's parliaments, and alſo the lord-mayor and aldermen, with fifty of the common-council of the city of London, to meet him at St. James's on the twenty-ſixth of December, which they accordingly did (there being about one hundred and ſixty of the old members) and repairing to the commons houſe, his highneſs made a ſpeech to them, deſiring their advice likewiſe as to the calling a free parliament, and the ſettlement of the nation. Whereupon this aſſembly reſolved upon the like addreſſes for calling a convention, and requeſting the prince to take upon him the adminiſtration of the government, as the lords had done. The prince returned an anſwer ſeverally to the lords and commons, ſignifying his compliance with their requeſt; and then the executive power was lodged in the hands of his highneſs, by the unanimous conſent of the great aſſembly of the nation.

His firſt acts of authority were, the iſſuing a declaration for the better collecting the public revenue, for withdrawing the Dutch troops out of their reſpective quarters to have the elections free, and another order, prohibiting all ſoldiers quartering in private houſes, without the owners conſent. He ſent orders to Mr. Barillon, the French ambaſſador, to depart the kingdom in twenty-four hours; and on the thirty-firſt of December publiſhed a proclamation, authorizing all juſtices of the peace, and other officers (not being papiſts) to act in their reſpective places till the meeting of the convention, or orders to the contrary. He borrowed 200,000 l. of the city of London to pay the forces that had been diſbanded by the earl of Feverſham, and re-aſſembled again; and he ſummoned the Scottiſh gentry and nobility about town to attend at St. James's the ſeventh of January, which they did, to the number of one hundred and ten, and joined in the like addreſs to his highneſs, with regard to the adminiſtration of all public affairs in Scotland, as the nobility and gentry of England had done with reſpect to their country; at the ſame time requeſting that his highneſs would be pleaſed to ſummon a general meeting of the ſtates for the fourteenth of March next enſuing. The prince returned them an anſwer, as he had done to the Engliſh: and at the ſame time, in compliance with one part of the addreſs of the lords and commons, he directed his attention towards the ſtate of affairs in Ireland, and ſent a ſummons to the earl of Tyrconnel, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, to ſubmit to the preſent adminiſtration; but that nobleman, preferring his fidelity to his lawful ſovereign to all other conſiderations, paid no regard to this citation.

In the mean time, the elections for members to compoſe the enſuing convention, went on rapidly in favour of the prince of Orange's party, though it muſt be allowed that the general diſpoſition of the nation operated wholly in this choice, there not being the leaſt ſhadow of reſtraint uſed for that purpoſe; and on the twenty-ſecond of January, 1689, that aſſembly met. The lords again choſe the marquis of Halifax for their ſpeaker, and the commons put Mr. Powle into their chair. To the two houſes thus aſſembled, the prince of Orange ſent ſeverally the following letter:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have endeavoured to the utmoſt of my power to perform what was deſired from me, in order to the public peace and ſafety, and I do not know that any thing hath been omitted ſince the adminiſtration of affairs was put into my hands: it now lieth upon you to lay a foundation for the firm ſecurity of your religion, your laws, and your liberties. I do not doubt that by ſuch a full and free repreſentative of the nation as is now met, the ends of my declaration will be attained; and ſince it hath pleaſed God hitherto to bleſs my good intentions with ſo great ſucceſs, I truſt in him that he will compleat his whole work, by ſending a ſpirit of peace and union to influence our councils, that no interruption may be given to a happy and laſting ſettlement.

"The dangerous condition of the proteſtants in Ireland requiring a large and ſpeedy ſuccour, and the preſent ſtate of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the danger of unſeaſonable diviſions among yourſelves, nothing can be ſo fatal as too great a delay in your conſultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to ſecure this nation, may ſuddenly feel the ill effects of it, both by being too long deprived of the ſervice of their troops which are now here, and of your early aſſiſtance againſt a powerful enemy, who hath declared a war againſt them. And as England is by treaty already engaged to help them upon ſuch exigences, ſo I am confident that their chearful concurrence to preſerve this kingdom, with ſo much hazard to themſelves, will meet with all the returns of friendſhip and aſſiſtance which may be expected from you as proteſtants and Engliſhmen, whenever their condition will require it.

Given at St. James's, the twenty-ſecond day of January, 1689." *

This letter being read, both houſes joined in an addreſs to the prince, acknowleging him, under God, the deliverer of the nation, approving of his taking the adminiſtration of the government, and praying him to continue it. They then appointed a general thankſgiving, for the late happy deliverance from popery and ſlavery, and ordered a particular prayer to be inſerted therein for the prince of Orange.

In the mean time, the fugitive king, who with his queen and ſon were moſt generouſly treated by Lewis XIV. behaved in ſuch a manner as rendered him the object of contempt to all Europe. He kept no company but with jeſuits: he made them daily viſits at their college in St. Anthony's-ſtreet in Paris: he told them that he was one of their fraternity, and as ſuch deſired their prayers; and, what is ſtill more extraordinary, he ſaid the truth. He had got himſelf admitted into this order with certain ceremonies, by four Engliſh jeſuits, when duke of York. This weakneſs of mind in a prince, joined to the manner in which he had, or at leaſt was likely to loſe his crown, rendered him ſo deſpicable, that the French courtiers diverted themſelves with making ſongs and lampoons on him; nor did his being a Catholic, and having ſacrificed his all for that faith, gain him the more eſteem. The archbiſhop of Rheims, brother of Louvois the miniſter, ſaid openly in James's anti-chamber at St. Germain's, "Is not this a pious man to give up three kingdoms for a maſs*?"

In the midſt of theſe humiliations, Lewis endeavoured to buoy up his ſpirits by his immenſe liberality, and the noble preparations which he made for reſtoring him to his throne. James, ſomewhat rouſed from his lethargy by this generous and ſpirited conduct of his old friend and ally, or perhaps ſenſible of the prejudice his flight had done him, endeavoured to prevent the conſequences, and, if poſſible, recal his ſubjects to a ſenſe of their duty, and of the royal character he ſtill bore, by writing two letters to the houſes of the convention, nearly to the purport of that he had left behind him at Rocheſter, only adding a promiſe, on the word of a king, that he would, on his return to England, call a free parliament: he required their advice "what was fit to be done by him towards his returning;" and concluded with aſſurances of a pardon and act of oblivion to all his ſubjects who had departed from their allegiance, ſome few only excepted. Theſe letters, however, were returned unopened by each of the houſes. Whether or not theſe propoſals from a king, who, great as might be his demerits, had not as yet been legally depoſed, deſerved ſome degree of notice from his ſubjects, I leave others to determine. A doubt of James's ſincerity, and their fears for the Proteſtant religion, probably got the better of all regard to decorum on this occaſion, as the reſolutions they ſoon after came to ſeem to evince.

The commons having for ſome days diſcontinued their ſitting, met not again till the 28th of January, to give time to ſome of the members, then on the road, to come up to London. On that day Mr. Dolben made a long ſpeech to prove the vacancy of the throne by the voluntary deſertion of king James, when, after a debate of four or five hours, the houſe paſſed this memorable vote:

"That king James II. having endeavoured to ſubvert the conſtitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jeſuits and other wicked perſons, having violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, hath abdicated the government; and that the throne is thereby become vacant."

The next day the commons farther voted, "That it hath been found by experience to be inconſiſtent with this proteſtant kingdom to be governed by a popiſh prince."

In the upper houſe, however, things did not go on quite ſo ſmoothly. There was a ſtrong party for a regency, among whom the earl of Nottingham was the chief. After great debates, it was carried to put the word "deſerted" in the room of "abdicated," and to leave out the words "and that the throne is thereby become vacant." This occaſioned a moſt memorable conference between the two houſes. After many long and learned arguments on each ſide, a new ſovereign was preferred to a regent, by a majority of two voices only (51 to 49). Twelve biſhops were for a regency, and two only on the other ſide the queſtion; Dr. Compton, biſhop of London, and ſir Jonathan Trelawny, biſhop of Briſtol. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was a timorous man, abſented himſelf from the houſe, that he might not be obliged to give his opinion on the ſubject. In fine, the lords concurred with the votes of the commons, "That king James had abdicated the government, and thereby the throne was become vacant;" and thereupon the convention were determined to declare the princeſs of Orange, the next Proteſtant heireſs, queen. But Dr. Burnet informs us, that "the earl of Danby ſending over to the princeſs, to give her an account of their debates, and to let her know, if ſhe deſired it, he did not doubt they ſhould be able to ſet her alone upon the throne; ſhe returned for anſwer, that ſhe was the prince's wife, and would never be other than what ſhe ſhould be in conjunction with him and under him; and ſhould take it very unkindly of any one that ſhould endeavour to ſeparate their intereſts." The doctor adds, "that ſhe ſent the lord Danby's letter and her anſwer to the prince, who, being now aſſured of the conſent of the princeſs under her hand, ſent for the earl of Danby, together with the marquis of Halifax and the earl of Shrewſbury; and gave them to underſtand, that, though ſome were for putting the princeſs on the throne ſingly, he would neither think of holding it by apron-ſtrings, nor would he take any ſhare in the government, unleſs it was lodged in his own perſon for term of life; though he would conſent that the iſſue of the princeſs Anne ſhould ſucceed before the iſſue he might have by any other wife but the princeſs."

This reſolution of his highneſs, according to the doctor, put an end to all the debates in the convention; and the two houſes at laſt agreed, and each voted apart, that the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould reign jointly as king and queen of England; and that the adminiſtration ſhould be in the hands of the prince alone. This vote, according to Dr. Burnet, was not carried without a great oppoſition. Echard ſays it paſſed by twenty voices, ſixty-five againſt forty-five.

On the 12th day of February the princeſs of Orange (who had been ſent for over by her huſband) arrived in London from Holland; and the next day both prince and princeſs, being ſeated on two large chairs under a canopy of ſtate in the Banquetting-houſe, both houſes of the convention waited on them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read, in the names of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, "a declaration of their rights *," which had been violated by king James; which declaration concluded thus:

"Having therefore an entire confidence that his ſaid highneſs the prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance ſo far advanced by him, and will ſtill preſerve them from the violation of their rights, which they have here aſſerted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, do reſolve, That William and Mary, prince and princeſs of Orange, be, and be declared king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdoms and dominions to them the ſaid prince and princeſs during their lives, and the life of the ſurvivor of them; and that the ſole and full exerciſe of the royal power be only in, and executed by, the ſaid prince of Orange, in the names of the ſaid prince and princeſs, during their joint lives; and after their deceaſe the ſaid crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdom and dominions to be to the heir of the body of the ſaid princeſs; and for default of ſuch iſſue, to the princeſs Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for the default of ſuch iſſue, to the heirs of the body of the ſaid prince of Orange."

This declaration being read, the marquis of Halifax, as ſpeaker of the upper houſe, made a ſolemn tender of the crown to their highneſſes, in the name of the peers and commons of England, which was accepted in a moſt obliging manner by their highneſſes; and the ſame day they were proclaimed by the names of William and Mary, king and queen of England †.

Of RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

SEVERAL eccleſiaſtical matters having been purpoſely omitted, that the narration of civil affairs might not be interrupted, it will now be requiſite to relate the progreſs of the reformed religion among us from the death of queen Elizabeth, where we laſt reviewed it; and to give ſome ſhort account of the religious differences in the church, from that period to the time when the prince of Orange, at the inſtance of the nobility and people, deſerted by their king, took upon himſelf the government of this realm.

church of England were ſummoned on the one ſide, and four of the principal divines of the diſſenters on the other *.

The conferences were opened on the fourteenth day of January 1604, when his majeſty ſignified to the miniſters the cauſe of his calling them together, and deſired the diſſenters to produce their objections againſt the preſent government of the church; whereupon Dr. Reynolds, who was their ſpokeſman, gave in a paper containing the following heads:

1. That the doctrine of the church might be preſerved in purity, according to God's word.
2. That good paſtors might be planted in all churches to preach the ſame.
3. That the church government might be ſincerely adminiſtered, according to the word of God.
4. That the book of Common Prayer might be fitted more to the increaſe of piety.

Out of theſe heads he framed ſeveral points, which he inſiſted on as neceſſary for the furtherance of true religion, and perfecting a laſting union among the members of the proteſtant faith. In the firſt place, he moved, that confirmation might not be confined to biſhops alone; but that any miniſter might confirm in his own pariſh. This was thought to circumſcribe too much the epiſcopal juriſdiction, and to be a ſtep towards bringing in preſbyterian government, which James of all things diſliked; and the biſhop of Wincheſter challenged Dr. Reynolds to produce one inſtance of confirmation having been ever conferred, either in antient or modern times, by any other of the clergy than biſhops.

Dr. Reynolds then made another motion, viz. "That there might be a new tranſlation of the Bible; alledging, that the preſent verſion was very corrupt, and in many places directly contradictory to the ſacred original." Of this he brought many ſtriking examples, which proved ſo ſatisfactory to the whole convocation, that it was generally agreed to have a new tranſlation, which was ſoon after carried into execution under the eye of the king himſelf, and is the ſame that we now uſe.

After ſeveral other points moved by Dr. Reynolds, but not of ſufficient importance to demand a place here, he came at laſt to ſubſcription; requeſting that it might not be exacted as heretofore; many good men, he ſaid, not being able to comply with it for certain reaſons; the principal of which was, becauſe the apocryphal books are appointed to be read by the Common-prayer book, notwithſtanding that in ſome of them are manifeſt errors, and ſuch as are directly repugnant to the Scriptures, which are the word of faith. To this the king himſelf anſwered, That as he would not wiſh all canonical books to be read in the church, unleſs there was ſome learned perſon to interpret their true ſenſe and meaning to the hearers, ſo he was not for enforcing the lecture of any apocryphal ones, in which there was any notorious error; but, at the ſame time, he declared, that as there were ſome of them that were clear and correſpondent to the Scriptures, and ſerved to illuſtrate ſeveral paſſages only ſlightly touched upon by the inſpired writers, he thought it proper to admit them; but under ſuch reſtrictions as the biſhop or clergyman ſhould, at the time of reading, think proper to point out to the people.

Another ſcruple brought by Dr. Reynolds was concerning the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm. The doctor acknowledged the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm to have been conſtantly in uſe, ſince the apoſtles time, at entering and going out of the church, and at prayers and benedictions; but doubted of the antient uſe of it in baptiſm. To this objection the biſhop of Wincheſter replied, that in Conſtantine's time it was uſed in baptiſm; and the dean of Weſtminſter ſhewed out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, and others, that in their time it was uſed "in immortali lavacro," which could be nothing but baptiſm. The king declared, that he thought this antiquity ſufficient to warrant the continuance of it ſtill.

At length Mr. Knewſtubbs moved how far an ordinance of the church was to bind them, without impeachment of their Chriſtian liberty. The king was greatly offended with this poſtulatum: he told Mr. Knewſtubbs, that he would not condeſcend to argue that point with him, and wondered how he could preſume to doubt him; for he was bound to obey what the church had once ordained. Dr. Reynolds added, that the ſign of the croſs ought to be laid aſide, if for no other reaſon than the great abuſe that had been made of it in the time of popery, to the raiſing a ſpirit of ſuperſtition in weak minds. He was anſwered by the king, that the very reaſon he alledged for the laying aſide this ceremony, was the ſtrongeſt imaginable in favour of its being retained; for if, added his majeſty, it was, as you ſay, abuſed to the purpoſes of ſuperſtition in the time of popery, this plainly implies that it was rightly uſed in its primitive ordination.

The next thing objected was the wearing of the ſurplice. To this it was anſwered, that as it appears, from the earlieſt authorities of the Chriſtian church, that in the celebration of divine ſervice the miniſters wore, by way of diſtinction, a different habit than at other times; and that this habit was of white linen; there was no reaſon, were it only for the ſake of decency and order, that it might not be continued. The managers for the diſſenters, however, continued to enforce their objections; and requeſted, that, in regard of ſome tender conſciences, the ſurplice and the croſs in baptiſm might not be urged: but the king remained inflexible on that head; telling them, that he was afraid their refuſal proceeded rather from obſtinacy than tenderneſs of conſcience; and therefore, if they continued refractory, they muſt take the conſequences.

Many other points were handled, as about predeſtination, abſolution, and remiſſion of ſins; baptiſing by women; about the words in marriage, "with my body I thee worſhip;" the oath "ex officio;" the high commiſſion, and others; in all which the king's deciſion went clearly againſt the diſſenters, who, finding they had as little chance in this conference as the proteſtants had in thoſe held by queen Mary, or the papiſts under Elizabeth, retired with an appearance of ſubmiſſion.

James, to ſecure their obedience, did ſoon after, in concert with his convocation, eſtabliſh the canons of the Engliſh church. Theſe canons decreed, that all perſons ſhould ſtand, "ipſo facto," excommunicated who ſhould affirm the church of England not to be a true or apoſtolical church, or the liturgy corrupt, or the rites and ceremonies thereof to be anti-chriſtian; as alſo any ſuch perſon who ſhould ſeparate from the church, or ſhould pretend that any ſect of miniſters and lay-perſons may make rules, orders, and conſtitutions, without the king's authority. This was a moſt ſevere blow upon all recuſants and diſſenters from the eſtabliſhed church, many of whom ſuffered the greateſt hardſhips, rather than comply with the injunctions laid on them, or ſubſcribe to terms which in their conſciences they thought erroneous. Two perſons were burnt for hereſy in king James's reign; one was Bartholomew Legat, an Arian, with whom the king himſelf, and ſome biſhops, held a conference, but without being able to convince him of his errors; whereupon he was declared an obdurate heretic, and delivered over to the ſecular power, who ſentenced him to the flames; and he was burnt in Smithfield on the 18th of March, 1613. The next month one Edward Wightman, of Burton upon Trent, was convicted of hereſy, and ſuffered death at the ſtake with great reſolution. In 1622 one John Traſk was condemned to the like puniſhment; but the conſtancy of the two former ſufferers had made ſuch an impreſſion on the ſpectators, that it was thought not adviſable to repeat executions of that horrible kind; and the poor wretch, by a mercy that had more of policy than humanity in it, was permitted to linger out a miſerable life in the cells of Newgate *.

Towards the latter end of this reign, the Arminian or Remonſtrant tenets began to ſpead in England. As Arminianiſm, by its doctrine, tended to exalt the prerogative above law, no wonder that the court eſpouſed its cauſe; but all thoſe who adhered to the cauſe of liberty powerfully oppoſed it; whereupon all ſuch, though ever ſo good churchmen, were branded by the court with the name of Puritans. Hence the diſtinction of State or Doctrinal Puritans, and Diſcipline Puritans or Diſciplinarians. By this means the Puritans acquired great ſtrength for the bulk of the people, and the clergy were at once confounded with them. At the head of the Arminians was Laud; the chief of the Doctrinal Puritans was archbiſhop Abbot.

In the firſt year of the reign of Charles I. the church was exalted to the higheſt degree of ſplendor. Epiſcopacy was declared to be of apoſtolical, and conſequently of divine, inſtitution; and the preſbyterian government, though challenging the title of Chriſt's kingdom and ordinance, was declared to have no foundation in ſcripture, nor in the practice of the church, for one thouſand five hundred years. The clergy were all obliged, on pain of deprivation, to ſwear, that "they approved the doctrine and diſcipline of the church, and would never conſent to alter the government of it by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, and archdeacons, &c." This oath was framed and enjoined in a convocation in this king's thirteenth year, 1637, which was authoriſed by the great ſeal of England, to ſit as a ſynod, a month after the parliament was diſſolved. The proceedings of this ynod were generally condemned as illegally paſſed, to the prejudice of the fundamental liberty of the ſubject; but againſt the oath many exceptions were made, ſome of which we ſhall inſert.

Firſt, Becauſe the &c. left the oath too looſe, inſomuch that neither the makers nor the takers rightly underſtood the ſame.

Secondly, The words "we will never conſent to alter the government of the church," were diſliked, as if the ſame tended to abridge the liberty of the king and ſtate in future parliaments and convocations. Goodman, biſhop of Glouceſter, the day before the ending of the ſynod, went to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and acquainted him, that he could not in his conſcience ſubſcribe the canons enacted by the convocation, while all of them tended to exalt the royal prerogative beyond the juſt limits; upon which he was committed for ſome time priſoner to the Gate-houſe.

Archbiſhop Laud, inſtead of indulging the puritans, widened the breach between them and the church, by introducing many new and pompous ceremonies into the public worſhip; the churches were adorned with paintings, images, altar-pieces, &c. and inſtead of communion-tables, altars were ſet up, and bowings to them and the ſacramental elements enjoined, and the doctrines of Arminianiſm were encouraged and propagated. Theſe innovations were loudly complained of by the Puritans, who taxed the authors of them with a deſign to introduce popery. Their oppoſition, however, only brought perſecution upon them: an implicit conformity was enforced with all the terrors of the High-commmiſſion court, to the ruin of many families, and the raiſing dangerous diſturbances in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. Upon theſe proceedings, great numbers tranſplanted themſelves and families into America, and gave birth to a ſecond colony in New-England, that of Maſſachuſet's Bay.

According to Bates and Dugdale, there were eight ſail of ſhips at once in the river of Thames filled with Puritan families leaving England, among whom were the famous Oliver Cromwell, afterwards protector; John Hampden, eſq. the celebrated oppoſer of the ſhip-money tax; and Mr. Arthur Haſelrig: but the ſhip was ſtopped by an order of council, and a proclamation iſſued, prohibiting all maſters and owners of ſhips to carry any paſſengers to New-England, without a ſpecial licence from the privy-council: but the more ſeverely the diſſenters were uſed, the more they increaſed, both in number and oppoſition, till the meeting of the Long Parliament in 1640, when the affairs of religion took a new turn.

We muſt not forget, that in the early part of this king's reign, the controverſy about keeping the Sabbath was revived by one Theophilus Bradbone, a miniſter of Suffolk, who aſſerted, "That the commandment of ſanctifying every ſeventh day, as in the Moſaical decalogue, is moral and perpetual; and that no kind of work, buſineſs, employment, or recreation, even of the moſt innocent kind, was to be allowed on that day, nor ſo much as any diſcourſe or mention to be made or held of pleaſures, or any worldly matter." This doctrine was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the High-church party, as tending to gall men's necks with a Jewiſh yoke, againſt the liberty of Chriſtians, and giving the emiſſaries of the church of Rome an handle to pervert people to popery, by perſuading them that the proteſtant religion was ſo rigorous, that no lawful liberty was allowed therein: and further, it was urged that Chriſt, as lord of the Sabbath, had mitigated the rigor thereof, and allowed the indulging in decent and lawful recreations; and that this ſtrict obſervance was ſet up merely from a principle of diſſenſion, and in order to brand with the character of Libertines all who did not comply therewith. The books written on this ſubject were all called in; and Bradbone being cited before the High commiſſion-court, thought proper to retract his opinions. Soon after, the king following the example of his father, as related in the civil hiſtory of that reign, iſſued a declaration, allowing his ſubjects, eſpecially the common people, to have ſports on the Lord's day, at ſuch times as they were not exerciſed in their public devotion at church.

We have in the foregoing part of this hiſtory taken notice of the ſending over the Liturgy, or Book of Common Prayer, to the church of Scotland, and the commotion it occaſioned there. Charles about this time thought it neceſſary, in order to quell the diſturbances in that kingdom, to raiſe an army, to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to obedience, which gave riſe to all the calamities which enſued in church and ſtate, in the few remaining years of this unhappy reign. The liturgy, and ſhortly after epiſcopacy itſelf, were both abrogated by thoſe who uſurped the government of the kingdom; and it is with concern we find that many miniſters of the goſpel here in England, who were reputed learned and pious men, and had conformed to the doctrine and diſcipline of the church, did, to the great ſcandal of religion, join with thoſe that oppoſed the king's juſt authority, and the laws of their country; and by their preachings and writings excited the people to an unlawful and unnatural war, on pretence of reformation of religion.

The diſcipline of the church being ſet aſide, no other was created in its room till ſeveral years afterwards. In this interval, the clergy were permitted to read more or leſs of the Liturgy, as they pleaſed, and to govern their pariſhes according to their diſcipline. The veſtments were left indifferent. As ſoon as the preſbyterians got the upper hand, they peremptorily refuſed that indulgence to others which they themſelves had ſo warmly pleaded for during the time of epiſcopacy: and ſo rigid were they in point of uniformity, that in the treaty of the Iſle of Wight, they would not indulge the king with the liberty of having a Common-prayer book to read privately in his family; and when they had deſtroyed the hierarchy, and got all the beſt livings in their own hands, yet they were ſtill diſſatisfied, for want of church power to cruſh the ſectaries, as they termed all who diſſented from them. Of theſe the independents were the chief, whoſe opinion it was, that every congregation had power to chuſe and ordain their paſtor, and jointly with him to manage their religious concerns, without claſſical or ſynodical aſſemblies, and conſequently were for univerſal toleration. This the preſbyterians would by no means allow them: not content with having their form of church government made the natural eſtabliſhment, they were continually ſolliciting the parliament for a coercive power, in order to proſecute all thoſe who differed from them in opinion. Upon which the army, which conſiſted chiefly of independents, by Cromwell's new-modelling of it, and whoſe favourite point was liberty of conſcience, became violently incenſed againſt them, and betook itſelf to the deſperate meaſures of aſſuming the ſovereign power, bringing the king to juſtice, ſetting aſide the covenant, and erecting a commonwealth, and at laſt became ſo far maſters, as to hold the preſbyterians in a ſort of ſubjection.

The preſbyterians finding the tables thus turned upon them, and that they had no longer any thing more than the ſhadow of authority in the ſtate, began to think of reſtoring Charles II. In this ſentiment they were greatly confirmed by that prince's declaration from Breda, in which he granted liberty to tender conſciences, and promiſed that no man ſhould be diſquieted or called in queſtion for difference of opinion, which did not diſturb the peace of the kingdom. Upon this declaration, they heartily joined the epiſcopalians in effecting the reſtoration of the royal family, which was accompliſhed in the year 1660, in the manner related in its place.

With monarchy, the antient church government was alſo reſtored, and the preſbyterians ſoon found themſelves reduced to the neceſſity of pleading for that indulgence they had denied to others. After ſeveral fruitleſs tentatives to get themſelves admitted to a ſhare of church government and civil employs, without being obliged to ſubmit to thoſe terms of union exacted by our canons, they were finally cruſhed by the epiſcopal act of uniformity in the year 1662; by which all who did not conform to the Liturgy by a certain day, were deprived of all eccleſiaſtical benefits, without the king's having any diſcretional power to mitigate the execution of this rigorous law, or any proviſion being made for the maintenance of the deprived. All who had not epiſcopal ordination, were made incapable of holding any benefice, and the next year the conventicle act was paſſed, as was that called the Five Mile Act, in 1665.

After ſtruggling many years under theſe difficulties, the diſſenters had a little reſpite, by the king's declaration in 1672, for ſuſpending the execution of the penal laws, as well againſt nonconformiſts as papiſts: but this indulgence did not laſt long; the parliament conſidering it as an alarming ſtep in favour of popery, annulled this declaration, and paſſed the famous Teſt Act; by which it was enacted, that no man ſhould bear any office or place who did not take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and receive the ſacrament according to the uſage of the church of England. Preſbyterianiſm was now humbled in the duſt, and continued to be ſo all the reſt of the reign of Charles II.

The ſteps taken by James II. to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed religion of this nation, and introduce popery in its ſtead, have been ſo fully related in the hiſtory of that reign of errors, that it would be equally needleſs as tedious to recapitulate the particulars here. Suffice it to obſerve, that the church party, perceiving the king's intentions, and that their all was at ſtake, thought proper to lay aſide their reſentment, and join the diſſenters in promoting the Revolution; and theſe latter once more entertained the hopes of coming into play. King William indeed exerted his utmoſt endeavours to obtain a comprehenſion for them, by a removal of the ſacramental teſt; but in this he was vigorouſly oppoſed by his parliament, and all that the diſſenters could obtain was the Act of Indulgence, whereby they were excuſed from all penalties for their not coming to church, and for going to ſeparate meetings. This however was a valuable privilege, and to this act they are indebted for that happy liberty of conſcience which they enjoy at this day.

The ſtate of learning, arts, and ſciences, during the government of the Stuarts, we have occaſionally touched upon at the end of each reign; and have alſo given ſome account of the moſt celebrated perſons in arts, arms, or literature, who flouriſhed during that period. Little then remains for us to add in this article: we ſhall therefore, agreeable to our plan, proceed to give an account of the moſt remarkable ſtatutes (and ſuch only) that were enacted by the ſeveral parliaments from the acceſſion of James I. to the Revolution, with the taxes or ſubſidies granted to them for the ſupport of government; a ſhort ſketch of the public revenues before and at the Revolution; and, by way of concluſion, ſhall add ſome remarks on the ſtate of commerce during that æra.

LAWS.

JAMES I.

THE ſtatutes of the greateſt importance that paſſed in this reign were,

1 Jacob. I. An act diſabling biſhops from alienating or transferring crown lands and revenues to the crown.

An act, depriving criminals of their clergy, who are guilty of ſtabbing.

An act, making it felony in a perſon to marry a ſecond huſband or wife, the firſt being alive, unleſs when the huſband or wife remains ſeven years beyond ſea, or are abſent in the king's dominions, the one not knowing the other to be living.

An act, making witchcraft (the notion of which prevailed greatly in thoſe days) felony, without benefit of clergy: and if any perſon ſhall take upon them to tell or declare by witchcraft, charm, or ſorcery, where any treaſure of gold or ſilver may be found, or goods loſt be recovered, they are to ſuffer one year's impriſonment, and be ſet in the pillory every three months during that year.

3 Jac. I. An act to prevent dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants, wherein ſuch perſons are diſabled to execute any office in the government, and are diſabled to ſue, &c. as perſons excommunicated. A recuſant forfeits one hundred pounds who ſends his child beyond ſea; and ſuch child remaining a recuſant after eighteen years of age, is rendered incapable of inheriting or enjoying lands or goods transferred, or deſcending to him; and the diſpoſal of livings in his gift is given to the univerſities.

An act for cutting the New River, and bringing its water to London.

7 Jac. I. An act for the founding Chelſea-college, which recites, That whereas his majeſty, for the refuting of errors and hereſies, had founded a college at Chelſea, and therein placed certain divines, incorporated by the name of The Provoſt and Fellows of the College of King James in Chelſea, near London: that it ſhould be lawful for the ſaid provoſt and fellows to cut a trench or channel, for bringing water from the river Lee in Hackney-Marſh to the city of London, for the perpetual maintenance of the ſaid provoſt and fellows, and their ſucceſſors, by the rent to be made of the ſaid waters.

21 Jac. I. An act, declaring all unlawful monopolies and diſpenſations with penal laws void; as alſo all compoſitions for the forfeitures on the breach of any penal ſtatute before judgment.

An act, called the Statute of Limitation, where by actions perſonal are to be brought within a certain limited time.

An act againſt prophane ſwearing and curſing.

An act, making it murder to conceal a dead baſtard child.

An act for making the river Thames navigable from Oxford.

TAXES of JAMES I.

In the firſt year of this king, the houſe of commons granted him for life, a ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage for the guard of the ſeas. Tonnage duty was three ſhillings for every ton of wine, and one ſhilling for an aum of Rhenith wine. The poundage was one ſhilling for every twenty ſhillings value of goods exported and imported, woollen cloths exported excepted; as alſo fiſh exported, taken by Engliſh ſubjects.

In his ſecond year he ſent privy-ſeals to the wealthieſt of the citizens of London, to borrow money of them; and ſoon after the cuſtoms of merchandizes, both outward and inward, were raiſed, and let out to farm.

In a parliament holden at Weſtminſter, the third year of his reign, there were given him three entire ſubſidies, and ſix fifteenths by the temporality, and by the clergy four entire ſubſidies.

In his ſeventh year he had aid throughout England for making his eldeſt ſon prince Henry knight, which brought in great ſums of money.

In his eighteenth year the temporality gave him two ſubſidies, and the clergy three; and in the year 1623, the temporality gave him three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, and the clergy four ſubſidies. Beſides theſe ſubſidies, he iſſued many great privy-ſeals, and had alſo a benevolence throughout the realm.

CHARLES I.

THE ſtatutes of any moment that paſſed in this reign, were the following:

1 Car. I. An act forbidding all unlawful ſports on Sundays, ſuch as bear and bull-baitings, interludes, common plays, and other paſtimes, on pain of three ſhillings and four-pence, to be paid by the aggreſſor, or to ſuffer the puniſhment of the ſtocks.

In the ſtatute-book, before the acts made in the third of Charles I. we meet with the petition containing a declaration of the rights and privileges of the people, preſented by both houſes of parliament ment to the king; to which he gave the royal aſſent.

3 Car. I. An act prohibiting the going or ſending any perſon to a popiſh ſeminary: it is alſo enacted, That any one who contributes to the maintenance of any convent or ſeminary, ſhall forfeit all his goods and his lands for life, and be diſabled to proſecute any ſuit to receive a gift or legacy, &c. as a perſon excommunicated; provided that if any one ſo educated conforms to the church of England within ſix months after his return, he ſhall not incur the penalties in this act.

17 Car. I. An act providing, That whereas Michaelmas Term till then began in the octaves of St. Michael, or a week after Michaelmas-day, it ſhould not for the future begin till three weeks after Michaelmas.

An act for making the parliament perpetual, enacting, That the parliament then aſſembled ſhould not be diſſolved, prorogued, or adjourned, but by act of parliament, which contributed as much as any thing to the ruin of king Charles and the conſtitution; and therefore by the act of the 12 Car. II. which was made in the year 1660, immediately after the reſtoration, that parliament is declared and enacted to be diſſolved and determined.

An act diſſolving the court of Star-chamber, and enacting, That a writ of habeas corpus ſhall be allowed on commitments by the council.

An act repealing the act for eſtabliſhing the High-commiſſion Court. By the ſame ſtatute it is enacted, That the eccleſiaſtical courts ſhall inflict no penalty on offenders.

An act declaring the tax of ſhip-money illegal, and aboliſhing the ſame, with all the judgments and proceedings conſequent thereupon.

An act for reſtraining the incroachments and oppreſſions of the ſtannary courts.

An act aſcertaining the metes and bounds of foreſts, and appointing commiſſioners to ſettle the ſame.

An act for regulating weights and meaſures, and the office of the clerk of the market; whereby it is enacted, That there ſhall be but one weight and meaſure throughout the kingdom; and that whoever uſes any other, ſhall forfeit five ſhillings for every offence.

Taxes of Charles I.

King James at his death left his ſon a large dominion but a poor exchequer, which was the occaſion that his taxations were more frequent than in his father's reign.

In the firſt year the parliament, at their firſt ſeſſion, granted him two ſubſidies from proteſtants and four from popiſh recuſants, and from the clergy three; and till the parliament provided other means, he continued to levy, as in his father's time, tonnage, poundage, and other ſums, by way of impoſt, upon merchandiſe imported and exported.

In his ſecond year he raiſed near 200,000l. by way of loan, for the war with France, and the relief of Rochelle.

In his third year the parliament gave him five ſubſidies. In the ſixth year he revived an antient cuſtom or uſage *, by which all that were qualified by the law for knighthood were to take upon them that order, or to make fine for reſpite of the ſame, whereby 100,000l. was brought into the Exchequer.

In his ninth year he iſſued writs, under the great ſeal of England, for the charging of the ports, towns, cities, boroughs, and counties of this realm reſpectively, with providing and furniſhing ſhips for the defence of the king and kingdom; whereby great ſums were raiſed. This tax was commonly known by the name of ſhip-money, and was the principal cauſe of all the troubles that afterwards befel this unfortunate prince, and ended but with the ſacrifice of his life.

In a parliament holden in Ireland the ſame year, the deputy or lord-lieutenant obtained ſome ſubſidies for the payment of the army of that realm, and the over-rate of his majeſty's revenue there.

In his ſixteenth year the earl of Strafford, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, obtained of the Iriſh parliament the grant of four ſubſidies; and the convocation of biſhops in England gave him an ample benevolence of four ſhillings in the pound for ſix years, to be aſſeſſed on all the clergy in England, towards the carrying on of the war then begun with Scotland.

And in the ſame year the Engliſh parliament, then aſſembled, granted him four entire ſubſidies for the relief of the army then raiſed againſt the Scots, and for relief of the northern parts of the kingdom, then much burthened by an army of Scots quartering in thoſe parts, who impoſed great taxes on the inhabitants for their maintenance.

In his ſeventeenth year the ſame parliament granted two ſubſidies for the further relief of his majeſty's army, and the northern parts of the kingdom; and likewiſe a ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, and other ſums of money payable upon merchandiſe exported and imported, from the 25th of May to the 15th of July following; and when that act was on the point of expiring, they granted another for the ſame duties, from the 15th of July, to the 10th of Auguſt following; and by five other ſubſequent acts, the parliament granted the like ſubſidy and impoſt upon merchandiſe to the 3d of May, 1642.

And in the ſaid 17th year ſeveral ſums of money were by act of parliament charged upon perſons according to their ranks, dignities, offices, callings, eſtates, and quality, by way of poll, for the ſpeedy diſbanding two armies then in the bowels of the kingdom.

This year alſo a contribution, or loan, was granted for the relief of Ireland, where a bloody rebellion had broken forth the preceding year.

And in his 18th year an act paſſed for raiſing and levying of monies for the neceſſary defence, and great affairs of the kingdoms of England and Ireland; and for the payment of debts undertaken by the parliament.

Theſe were all the taxations, either by loan or otherwiſe, raiſed by royal authority during this reign: but the war which the parliament raiſed, without his authority, and againſt it, was ſupported and maintained, by prodigious ſums of money illegally levied on the ſubject, by contribution, aſſeſſment, and exciſe, which cannot be properly inſerted here; and it is to be wiſhed the memory of ſuch unjuſt proceedings might be for ever effaced.

* See Coke's ſecond book of Inſtitutes, fol. 593. ſtatute De Militibus.

CHARLES

CHARLES II.

THE ſtatutes of moſt conſequence that paſſed in this reign were,

An act of the 12th (that is, the firſt from the Reſtoration) Car. II. for diſſolving the Long Parliament, and making the convention a parliament.

An act for reducing the intereſt of money from eight to ſix per cent.

Ships loading in the plantations to give ſecurity to bring their cargoes to England, or to ſome Britiſh plantation, and not to carry them to any foreign country.

No goods of the growth of Muſcovy ſhall be imported but in Engliſh ſhips, navigated as aforeſaid.

Nor any goods from the Turkiſh empire, unleſs in veſſels belonging to the port or place from which ſuch goods come.

No wines of the growth of France or Germany ſhall be imported in any but in Engliſh veſſels; and all maſts, and other naval ſtores, raiſins, figs, prunes, olive oils, corn, grain, ſugar, pot-aſhes, brandy, or ſpirits; wines of the growth of Spain, the Canaries, Portugal, the Madeiras; all goods of the growth of Ruſſia, currants, and Turkiſh commodities, imported in any Engliſh ſhipping, navigated as above, ſhall be deemed aliens goods. See an additional act, 15 Car. II. cap. 7. for encouragement of trade.

In this ſame twelfth year of Charles II. was paſſed the firſt legal act for laying an exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors. This act was firſt ſet on foot during the protectorſhip of Cromwell.

An act for taking away court of wards, knights ſervice, &c. and ſettling a revenue on the crown in lieu thereof.

An act for appointing the thirtieth of January to be obſerved annually as a faſt.

13 Car. II. An act declaring the command of the militia by ſea and land to be ſolely in the king, and that neither both, or either of the houſes of parliament, have any pretence to the ſame, nor can lawfully levy any war, offenſive or defenſive, againſt the crown.

An act, containing articles for the better government of the royal navy and ſhips of war.

An act, reſtoring eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction to the biſhops and ſpiritual courts.

An act (called the Corporation Act) for the better governing of corporations, whereby all officers are obliged to declare, "That it is not lawful, on any pretence whatſoever, to take up arms againſt the king, &c. to renounce the ſolemn league and covenant, &c.

14 Car. II. An act, decreeing that quakers, and others, refuſing to take an oath before a magiſtrate when required, or perſuading others not to take ſuch oath, and quakers aſſembling in conventicles, to forfeit five pounds for the firſt offence, ten pounds for the ſecond, and for the third offence to abjure or quit the realm.

An act to eſtabliſh the uniformity of public prayer, and the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, and of conſecrating biſhops, prieſts, and deacons, after the manner of the church of England.

An act prohibiting the printing of impious, heretical, ſeditious, or ſchiſmatical books. By this act all books are prohibited to be printed that are not entered in Stationers-Hall, and duly licenſed; and the printing-preſſes are regulated, and three copies are reſerved for the king's library, and the two univerſities.

15 Car. II. An act for the encouragement of trade, navigation, the plantation, and Fiſheries. See 12 Car. II. cap. 18.

An act, called the Conventicle Act, of which we have given an account in the hiſtory of this reign.

An act condemning ſeamen who refuſe to fight and defend merchant ſhips againſt pirates, to loſe their pay; and if they do fight, and ſave the ſhip, declaring them entitled to be rewarded out of the cargo, and at a rate not exceeding two per cent.

16 Car. II. Perſons cheating at play to forfeit treble the value of what they win; and all ſecurities for money won at play, exceeding one hundred pounds at any one time, to be void.

19 Car. II. An act to redreſs inconveniencies for want of proof of perſons deaths beyond ſeas, or abſenting themſelves, upon whoſe lives eſtates depend.

22 Car. II. An act allowing the exportation of corn, oxen, horſes, &c.

22 and 23 Car. II. An act againſt maiming, &c. commonly called the Coventry Act, making it felony, without benefit of clergy, maliciouſly to cut out or diſable the tongue, put out an eye, ſlit the noſe, cut off the noſe or lip, or diſable any limb or member of any of his majeſty's ſubjects.

An act againſt maliciouſly burning ricks or ſtacks of corn, hay, &c. killing of cattle, or maiming them, or deſtroying trees or fences in the night.

An act enacting how inteſtates eſtates ſhall be adminiſtered and diſtributed. By this act, ordinaries, &c. upon granting adminiſtrations are required to take bonds, with two ſureties for the due adminiſtration of the inteſtate's goods; and the ſurpluſage, after debts and funeral charges paid, ſhall be diſtributed in the manner following, viz. one third to the wife of the inteſtate, and the reſidue among his children, and ſuch as legally repreſent them, other than ſuch children (not heirs at law) who ſhall have any eſtate by ſettlement of the inteſtate in his life-time, equal to the other ſhares. And where any ſuch children ſhall have been advanced by ſettlements or portions not equal to the other ſhares, he or they ſhall have ſo much of the ſurpluſage as ſhall make the eſtate of all to be equal; but the heir at law ſhall have an equal part in the diſtribution with the other children, without any conſideration of what he hath by deſcent, or otherwiſe, from the inteſtate.

If there be no children nor legal repreſentatives of them, one moiety, or half, ſhall be allotted to the wife, and the reſidue agreeably to the next of kindred to the inteſtate, in equal degrees, and to thoſe who repreſent them.

No repreſentatives to be admitted among collaterals, after brothers and ſiſters children. If there be no wife, all ſhall be diſtributed among the children; and if no child, to the next of kin to the inteſtate in equal degree, and their repreſentatives. No ſuch diſtribution ſhall be made till one year after the inteſtate's death; and every one who has a ſhare in it ſhall give bond, with ſureties, that if debts afterwards appear, he ſhall return a rateable part.

An act to regulate the weights and meaſures of corn and ſalt.

By an act of the ſame year, none may keep dogs, nets, guns, or any other engine or inſtrument for taking or deſtroying the game, but he who hath lands of inheritance of one hundred pounds per annum, or for life, in his own or his wife's right, or a leaſe of ninety-nine years of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum, unleſs the heir of an eſquire, or other perſon of higher degree: and perſons fiſhing in any private waters or rivers, ſhall pay treble damages to the party aggrieved, and a ſum not exceeding ten ſhillings, to the poor. N. B. By this act none are deemed eſquires under the degree of knights ſons.

29 Car. II. An act to prevent frauds and perjuries, &c. By this act it is declared, That all leaſes, eſtates, intereſts of freehold, or term of years, or any uncertain intereſts in lands, &c. not put in writing, and ſigned by the contracting parties, ſhall have no greater effect than eſtates at will, except leaſes not exceeding three years, whereof the rent ſhall be two-thirds of the value.

No action ſhall be brought to charge a defendant, upon any promiſe to anſwer for the debt or miſcarriage of another, or upon any agreement in conſideration of marriage, or upon any contract or ſale of lands, &c. or any intereſt concerning them, or on any agreement not to be performed within a year, unleſs ſuch agreement, or a note thereof, be in writing, and ſigned by the party to be charged, or ſome other authorized by him.

All deviſes of lands or tenements ſhall be in writing, and ſigned by the teſtator, or ſome other, in his preſence, and by his direction, and ſubſcribed in his preſence by three or four witneſſes, or elſe they ſhall be void.

No writ of execution ſhall bind the property of goods but from the time of its delivery to the ſheriff.

No contract for the ſale of goods, of the value of ten pounds or upwards, ſhall be good, unleſs the buyer receive part of them, or give ſomething in earneſt, or ſome note thereof in writing, to be ſigned by the parties to be charged, or their agents.

No nuncupative (or verbal) will ſhall be good, where the eſtate bequeathed exceeds thirty pounds, unleſs it be proved by three witneſſes preſent at the making thereof, nor unleſs the teſtator bid them bear witneſs that ſuch is his will, nor unleſs it be made in the laſt ſickneſs of the deceaſed, in his dwelling-houſe, unleſs he be ſurprized, and die before his return; and after ſix months, no teſtimony ſhall be received of ſuch nuncupative will, unleſs the ſaid teſtimony were put into writing within ſix days after making ſuch will.

No will in writing of any perſonal eſtate ſhall be repealed by words only, except the ſame be in the life-time of the teſtator committed to writing, read to him, appointed by him, and this atteſted by three witneſſes.

An act aboliſhing the writ De Heretico Comburendo, or for burning heretics; with all proceedings therein, and all puniſhments by death, in conſequence of eccleſiaſtical cenſures.

31 Car. II. was paſſed the famous HABEAS CORPUS act. It is enacted by this ſtatute, That upon the ſervice of the Habeas Corpus on a jailor or his ſervants, or upon any other perſon having a priſoner in his cuſtody, the priſoner, within three days after, upon paying or tendering twelve pence per mile for the removal of him, ſhall be brought up, and the writ returned, and the cauſe of his impriſonment certified: and officers refuſing to make their returns, or bring the priſoner up, &c. as aforeſaid, ſhall forfeit one hundred pounds for the firſt offence, and two hundred pounds for the ſecond.

If any perſon committed to priſon for treaſon or felony, expreſſed in the warrant, ſhall, the firſt week of the term or day of the ſeſſions of Oyer and Terminer, pray to be brought to his trial, if he be not indicted the next term of Oyer and Terminer: after ſuch commitment he ſhall upon motion, the laſt day of ſuch term or ſeſſions, be admitted to bail.

Priſoners may obtain their Habeas Corpus from any judge, or out of the Chancery: and if the lord-chancellor, keeper, or any other judge, ſhall deny ſuch Habeas Corpus, he ſhall forfeit five hundred pounds to the party aggrieved.

We muſt here repeat an obſervation we have elſewhere made, that few of our Engliſh monarchs ever paſſed a greater number of acts of parliament for the benefit of the ſubject than this king.

TAXES of CHARLES II.

Immediately after his reſtoration (called the twelfth year of his reign) the parliament preſented a bill "for a ſpeedy proviſion of money to pay off and diſband all the forces of this kingdom, both by ſea and land. This was to be done by poll, and was a very great tax, becauſe many orders of men were included in it, which had never been mentioned in any former act of the like kind. The reader perhaps will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the aſſeſſments of the ſeveral degrees, as they are rated in the ſaid act.

"1. Every duke of England, Scotland, and Ireland, inhabiting and reſiding in this kingdom, was to pay one hundred pounds; every marquis, eighty pounds; every earl, ſixty pounds; a viſcount, fifty pounds; a baronet, forty pounds; the eldeſt ſon of a duke of twenty-one years of age, ſixty pounds; of a marquis, fifty pounds; of an earl, forty pounds; of a viſcount, thirty-five pounds; of a baron, thirty pounds; a baronet of any of the three kingdoms, or Nova Scotia, thirty pounds; a knight of the Bath, thirty pounds; a knight bachelor, twenty pounds; a ſerjeant at law, twenty pounds; an eſquire, ten pounds; and every widow, according to her huſband's degree, a third part what her huſband was to pay.

2. "Every parſon or vicar poſſeſſed of a parſonage or vicarage, or other eſtate of one hundred pounds, forty ſhillings; every doctor of the civil or common-law, five pounds; every advocate, five pounds; a judge or commiſſioner in the Court of Admiralty, twenty pounds; a prætor, five pounds; a doctor of phyſic, ten pounds.

3. "The lord-mayor of London, forty pounds; every ſheriff, alderman, or who hath fined for alderman, twenty pounds; every deputy-alderman, ten pounds; the town-clerk of London, twenty pounds; every common councilman, five pounds; every maſter of the firſt twelve companies, ten pounds; every warden thereof, ſix pounds thirteen ſhillings and four-pence; every liveryman of thoſe companies, five pounds; every one who had been maſter of any of the companies of dyers, brewers, leatherſellers, girdlers, ſtationers, woodmongers, upholſterers, apothecaries, pewterers, tallow-chandlers, armourers, or ſadlers, ſix pounds; every warden of any of thoſe companies, five pounds; every liveryman of them, three pounds; every of the yeomanry, one pound; every maſter of the company of barber-chirurgeons, white-bakers, wax-chandlers, cutlers, butchers, carpenters, painters, cordwainers, coopers, ſcriveners, brown-bakers, turners, or innholders, three pounds; every one who had been warden of any of thoſe companies, two pounds; every liveryman thereof, one pound; every perſon who had been maſter of the company of founders, cutlers, maſons, bricklayers, joiners, plaiſterers, weavers, fruiterers, marblers, embroiderers, poulterers, cooks, or plummers, one pound; every warden of thoſe companies, fifteen ſhillings; and every one of the livery, ten ſhillings; every perſon who hath been of the livery of either company of bowyers, fletchers, blackſmiths, bottle makers, wool-packers, farriers, paviers, loreiners *, glaſiers, clerks, or watermen, five ſhillings; every freeman of any company within the city of London, twelve-pence; every keeper of one or more hackney-coaches and two horſes, ten ſhillings; every merchant-ſtranger, if a knight, forty pounds; if below that degree, and trading to ſea, ten pounds; if trading within the land, five pounds: every alien uſing trade within any city or corporation, if a houſe-keeper, ten ſhillings; every Engliſh merchant in or about London, not a freeman, ten pounds; every factor in the city, two pounds; every perſon that hath been alderman in any city within the kingdom, under the degree of a knight or eſquire, five pounds.

4. "The prothonotary of the King's-Bench, one hundred pounds; clerk of the Crown of the ſame, twenty pounds; Cuſtos Brevium of the ſame, forty pounds; marſhal of the ſame, fifty ſhillings; maſter of the Rolls, ſixty pounds; clerk of the Crown in Chancery, forty pounds; clerk of the Rules and in the King's Bench, ten pounds; maſter of the Subpœna Office, forty pounds; warden of the Fleet, fifty pounds; clerk of the hanaper, fifty pounds; clerk of the Inrolment, each ten pounds; each of the ſix clerks in Chancery, forty pounds; every curſitor of the ſame, ten pounds; uſher of the ſame, ten pounds; every clerk of the pettybagg, five pounds; every examiner, ten pounds; chief regiſter of the ſame, twenty pounds; every under regiſter, ten pounds; every clerk in the office of the Six Clerks in Chancery, eight pounds; each of the clerks of the Chapel of the Rolls, three pounds; every prothonotary of the Common-Pleas, fifty pounds; Cuſtos Brevium of the ſame, eighty pounds; every philazer of the ſame, ten pounds; clerk of the Outlawries, twenty pounds; clerk of the Statutes, twenty pounds; clerk of the Treaſury, ten pounds; exigenter of London, forty pounds; every other exigenter, five pounds; the king's remembrancer of the Exchequer, forty pounds; every teller of the ſame court, twenty pounds; the treaſurer's remembrancer, ten pounds; every attorney of the office of the king's remembrancer, ten pounds; every attorney of the office of Pleas, ten pounds; the remembrancer of the Firſt-fruits, twenty pounds; clerk of the Eſtreats, twenty pounds; clerk of the Pleas, thirty pounds; the auditor of the receipts in the Exchequer, forty pounds; clerk of the Pel in the Receipt, thirty pounds; uſher of the Court of Exchequer, twenty pounds; every attorney in the Office of Pleas there, ten pounds; every auditor of the ſame, ten pounds; every clerk of the court of the Duchy of Lancaſter, ten pounds; every auditor of the ſame, ten pounds; every clerk of the Privy-ſeal, ten pounds; every clerk of the Signet, ten pounds; every attorney in any of the courts at Weſtminſter, or within the courts of Law or Equity, or in the counties palatine of Cheſter, Lancaſter, Durham, and the marches of Wales, three pounds; every perſon in any office or place under the king (except his houſhold ſervants in ordinary) ten pounds; the lieutenant of the Tower of London, fifty pounds; every one that could ſpend in lands, leaſes, monies, or ſtock, one hundred pounds per annum, forty ſhillings; and ſo for a greater or leſſer eſtate: every ſingle perſon above the age of ſixteen years, twelve-pence; every ſingle perſon not rated nor receiving alms, above ſixteen years of age, ſix-pence."

In his ſaid firſt year the parliament alſo granted him a ſubſidy on tonnage and poundage, and other ſums of money payable upon merchandize exported and imported. The duties of exciſe on malt liquors, cyder, perry, mead, ſpirits or ſtrong waters, coffee, tea, ſherbet, and chocolate, were alſo ſettled on him during life, by way of additional revenue to the tonnage and poundage. This was granted by way of recompenſing the crown for the emoluments it loſt by the taking away the courts of ward, and liveries and tenures in capite or by knights-ſervice. By this means the royal revenues were raiſed to twelve hundred thouſand pounds per annum, which was more than any king of England ever enjoyed, except Henry VIII.

The following year the commons granted the king a ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds for his preſent occaſions, to be levied by a monthly tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds for eighteen months; a perpetual and annual tax of two ſhillings on every chimney-hearth in each houſe, alms-houſes excepted, was alſo laid on by the commons, who at the ſame time impowered his majeſty to levy the ſeventy thouſand pounds per month for three years.

In the year 1663, the commons granted him four entire ſubſidies; and the clergy in convocation, following their example, did the like. This was the laſt aid the ſpirituality gave; for it was reſolved on hereafter to tax the church benefits as temporal eſtates were taxed.

The following year the parliament granted the king a ſupply of two millions and an half towards the maintenance of a war againſt the Dutch.

In 1665 the commons voted the king a new ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds to continue the war, and one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds to the duke of York, for the great ſervices he had done to the nation; and purſuing this their prodigious liberality, they voted in the following year a further ſupply of one million eight hundred thouſand pounds.

In 1668 they granted the ſum of three hundred and ten thouſand pounds, by an impoſition on wines and other liquors.

For the other taxes impoſed in this king's reign, as alſo for thoſe in the following one of his brother James II. we refer the reader to the hiſtory of thoſe reigns, where he will find them noticed as they occurred.

JAMES II.

THERE being but one parliament in this reign, which did not ſit much above two months, very few laws were made. The principal of them were,

An act prohibiting the importation of gun-powder, arms, ammunition, or utenſils of war, without licence, on pain of forfeiture.

An act appropriating a duty laid upon coals, to the finiſhing the cathedral of St. Paul's.

An act concerning adminiſtrators and inteſtates perſonal eſtate. This enacts, That no adminiſtrator ſhall be cited to render an account of the perſonal eſtate of his inteſtate, otherwiſe than by inventory thereof, unleſs at the inſtance of ſome perſon in behalf of a minor, or of one having a demand out of ſuch eſtate as a creditor, or next of kin.

If after the death of a father any of his children ſhall die inteſtate, without wife, or iſſue, in the life-time of the mother, every brother and ſiſter, and their repreſentatives, ſhall have an equal ſhare with her.

COMMERCE.

THE late Mr. Anderſon, in his excellent Treatiſe on the Origin of Commerce *, obſerves, that the ſeventeenth century may be truly ſaid, from its very commencement, to approach to a reſemblance of modern times, whether conſidered in a commercial or a political light. Navigation, the arts, mechanical, mathematical, manufactural, and nautical; agriculture, architecture, and plantations, were amazingly improved; almoſt all the commercial, banking, and metallic companies of Europe, eſtabliſhed nearly as at preſent ſubſiſting; the great and principal increaſe of the commerce of England and Holland effected, who alſo got into their hands the trade of the famous Hanſe-Towns, now on their decline. Many new inventions and projects were ſet on foot; the great increaſe of trade begot the enlargement and embelliſhment of the city of London and its ſuburbs. Many excellent new productions were introduced among us, and here naturalized. New Engliſh plantations were formed in America, and the old ones greatly improved. In a word, commercial liberty was legally and firmly eſtabliſhed in England. In general, it will be ſeen, that towards the cloſe of this century, commerce gradually advanced to almoſt its very growth of perfection; and almoſt every part of Chriſtendom endeavoured to puſh into trade and manufacture, whilſt at the ſame time England's commerce and ſhipping continued viſibly to proſper and increaſe.

We ſhall from the above-named author briefly point out ſome of the principal ſteps in this happy progreſs, at leaſt ſo far as relates to the period at preſent under our conſideration.

King James I. having, at his acceſſion to the crown of England, called in all his own ſhips of war, as well as our then numerous privateers, which, though they had greatly annoyed the enemy, had done infinite damage to the commerce of the nation; he thereby put an end to the warlike expeditions he had been engaged in, and declared himſelf to be at peace with all the world. This pacific diſpoſition in the king, ſo often (and in great meaſure with juſtice) termed puſillanimous, did however give a breathing-time to our mercantile and coloniſing adventurers to plant, and gradually improve the colonies of Virginia, New-England, Bermudas, and Newfoundland; as alſo to make a conſiderable progreſs in the Eaſt India trade. At the opening of his firſt parliament, James ſpoke ſtrongly againſt monopolies, but he afterwards gave great encouragement to them. Our own woollen manufacture being now become ſo very conſiderable, and ſo much of it ſent abroad as to work up all, or near all, our own wool at home, it was thought high time to prohibit the exportation of it, which James did by proclamation in the year 1604, the ſecond of his reign.

By a ſtatute of this ſame year, when wheat is not above one pound ſix ſhillings and eight pence per quarter; rye, peaſe, and beans, fifteen ſhillings; and barley and meal fourteen ſhillings per quarter;

* Anderſon's Origin of Commerce, vol. I. p. 451. et alibi.

quarter; they may be exported in Engliſh ſhips, paying cuſtom, two ſhillings per quarter for wheat, and one ſhilling and four-pence for the other kinds.

The Engliſh Eaſt-India company ſent out their ſecond voyage thither in the ſame year 1604, with four ſhips under ſir Henry Middleton; two of which he loaded with pepper at Bantam, and ſent the other two to the iſles of Banda, famous for the trade of nutmegs and mace. At Antigua he laded a good quantity of cloves, with which that place abounded, and returned in 1606, having the misfortune to loſe one of his ſhips at ſea. In the year 1605, the preſent Levant, or Fiſhery Company, was erected, by the deſignation of The Merchants of England trading to the Levant Seas. Thus a moſt profitable trade to England was eſtabliſhed in perpetuity, whereby great quantities of our woollen manufactures, and of later times much other merchandize, as watches, jewels, &c. have been annually exported thither: beſides, the immenſe quantities of raw ſilks brought from thence, have been the means of raiſing our ſilk manufacture to its preſent height, and of greatly advancing many other ſorts of manufactures.

In the year 1607, James granted an excluſive charter or licence to Richard Pinkwell, eſq. and his colleagues, for the ſole diſcovery of a north-weſt paſſage to China, Cathay, the Moluccas, and other parts of the Eaſt-Indies, incorporating them by the peculiar name of The Colleagues of the Fellowſhip for the Diſcovery of the North-Weſt Paſſage: but this, like moſt of the former attempts of this kind, came to nothing. Captain Henry Hudſon, however, ſailed this ſame year as far north as eighty degrees and a half in queſt of the ſaid paſſage; and he made the like attempt the following year, 1608, to as little purpoſe, after having in vain tried a north-eaſt paſſage by Nova Zembla. The ſame year, however, he diſcovered and gave his name to the vaſt bay called, after him, Hudſon's Bay.

The Engliſh Eaſt-India Company now ſent out their third voyage with three ſhips thither: it would however afford the reader as little inſtruction as pleaſure, to relate particulars that are to be found in ſo many works. It will therefore be ſufficient to obſerve, that the ſuperior induſtry of the Dutch in India had already been beforehand with us in the ſpice iſlands, of which they ſoon after this made themſelves ſovereigns, and ſuch remain to this day.

The manufacture of allum was this year, 1608, firſt invented, and ſucceſsfully practiſed in England, being encouraged and carried on in Yorkſhire by the lord Sheffield, ſir John Bourchier, and other landed gentlemen of that county, to the very great benefit of this nation in general, and to the ſingular emolument of the proprietors thereof, to this preſent time.

King James endeavoured to effect the propagation of ſilk in England, and for that purpoſe enjoined and encouraged the planters of mulberry-trees; but experience has ſhewn that ſilk is not to be propagated in any degree north of the river Loire, in the ſouth of France.

In 1609 the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company made their fifth voyage thither, but with one ſhip only, which they ſent to Bantam, and thence to the iſles of Banda, &c. but the Hollanders being abſolute lords there, refuſed them admittance to traffic. Although the fifteen years excluſive trade granted by queen Elizabeth's charter to the Eaſt-India Company, was not to expire till 1615, yet king James, on the thirty-firſt of May, in the year 1610, was prevailed on to grant the company a renewal of their charter, and to render the company perpetual, with the uſual power of making by-laws, of having a common ſeal, and the other powers in the former charter. The merchants engaged in this trade were ſo encouraged by this grant, that they now built the largeſt merchant ſhip that England ever had, being upwards of one thouſand tons burthen, named The Trade's Increaſe, and with three others made their ſixth voyage to India. The king alſo at this time built the fineſt ſhip that had been ever conſtructed in this country: ſhe was of the burden of one thouſand four hundred tons, carried ſixty-four cannons, and was named The Prince. By theſe gradual ſteps did the Navy-Royal of England arrive at its preſent magnitude and grandeur.

In this ſame year, 1610, the ſpirit of adventuring on new plantations ſtill prevailing, king James made a grant to a certain number of merchants of Briſtol, of part of Newfoundland, lying between Cape Bonaviſta and Cape St. Mary's; and a colony was accordingly ſent thither: but they have never been able to this day to make a more cultivable and uſeful plantation there than is neceſſary for the famous fiſhery on its banks, its ſituation in reſpect to our continent colonies, and to the French North-American dominions, and for ſhelter and relief of our own ſhipping. About this time the London adventurers to Virginia were made a corporation; and the next year the Ruſſian Company for the firſt time ſent two ſhips to Greenland, for the killing of whales, carrying with them ſix Biſcayners expert in that fiſhery; but they loſt both their ſhips.

In the year 1612, the cluſter of ſmall and very rocky iſlands, ſituate between Europe and America, named the Bermuda's, or Somers's Iſles, in thirty-two degrees and an half north latitude, five hundred miles eaſt from Carolina, was firſt planted by the Engliſh. They had been diſcovered almoſt an hundred years before, by one Bermuda, a Spaniard, but were never planted by any before this time. Sir George Somers and ſir Thomas Yates, in their voyage to Virginia, anno 1609, were ſhipwrecked there, and lived nine months on theſe iſlands; in which time they built a ſhip of the cedar-wood growing there, and ſailed in her to Virginia, leaving two men behind them in the largeſt of the iſlands, who were found alive in 1612, when the colony was firſt planted. From ſir George Somers, theſe iſlands got the name of Somer's Iſles, now corrupted to Summer Iſlands, though the juſt name of Bermudas is moſtly uſed. Sir George Somers was, it ſeems, a ſecond time drove on thoſe iſlands, and died there; but thoſe who were with him, on their arrival in England, made ſo favourable a report of the beauty and fertility of them, that the Virginia Company, who, as firſt diſcoverers, claimed the property, ſold them to about one hundred and twenty perſons, to whom king James granted a charter; and in 1612 they planted, with one hundred and ſixty perſons, one of the largeſt of them, named St. George's Iſle, and ſent afterwards five hundred people more thither anno 1619; whereupon they inſtituted an aſſembly, with a governor and council. Some have reckoned theſe iſlands four hundred in number, but moſt of them too ſmall to have any name, they being all circumſcribed within the compaſs of little more than forty-ſeven leagues. St. George's, the largeſt, is naturally fortified almoſt quite round with rocks; and where there is any landing-place, they have forts and batteries; and the harbour, there being only one, extremely well fortified. Theſe iſlands produce very few ſtaple commodities fit for exportation, excepting their cedar ſloops, with which they trade, and ſell them at the Weſt Indies, and ſome proviſions; with the gain of which trade they are enabled to pay England for all the neceſſaries they are conſtantly ſupplied with. This colony was afterwards, like Virginia, made a regal government, and ſo it ſtill continues. The Bermudians have two misfortunes attending them; a want of freſh water, and frequent attacks of furious winds, thunder, lightnings, &c. At their principal iſland of St. George, large ſhips may ſafely enter and be ſecure, under ſhelter of the fortifications, from any attacks of an enemy; and this is probably the reaſon why we ſtill keep thoſe otherwiſe unprofitable iſlands, there being no productions there but what may be had in our other plantations. They grow ſome tobacco, but it is not equal in goodneſs to that of Virginia *.

In the year 1613, the Engliſh Ruſſia Company procured an excluſive charter for their whale-fiſhery; and they obliged certain French ſhips which they had permitted to fiſh there, to pay them a tribute of eight whales. In the ſame year captain Saris, in our Eaſt-India Company's ſervice, arrived the firſt of any of our nation at the port of Firando, in the iſle of Bungo or Ximo, a part of the empire of Japan. Our Company continued ſome years to trade there, but were afterwards excluded all reſort thither, with all other Europeans, the Dutch only excepted.

Edward Miſſelden, eſq. an eminent merchant, in his treatiſe, entitled The Circle of Commerce, gives us the following ſtate of the exports and imports of all England in this year 16 3.

	l.	s.	d.
1. Exported to all the world between Chriſtmas 1612, and Chriſtmas 1613, to the value of	2,090,640	11	8
2. The cuſtoms on theſe goods	86,794	16	2
3 Impoſt paid outwards on woollen goods, tin, lead, and pewter	10,000	0	0
4. The merchants gains, freight, and other petty charges	300,000	0	0
Total exports l.	2,487,435	7	10
Imported during that time in ſilks, Venice gold and ſilver ſtuffs, Spaniſh wines, linen, and other merchandize, with all the cuſtoms thereon	2,141,151	10	0
Balance gained this year to the nation	346,283	17	10

On which Mr. Anderſon very pertinently and juſtly obſerves, that tho' this balance ſeems larger than that exhibited under the year 1354 (the twenty-eighth of Edward III.) yet the ſilver money of that balance being thrice the weight or quantity of our's, amounted to no leſs than 765,644 l. 1s. of our money: and he remarks further, that the total of the imports then was not one-ſeventh part of the exports.

The ingenious gentleman firſt mentioned has likewiſe given us the total amount of the cuſtoms of England for this year 1613, viz.

		l.	s.	d.
At the port of London—outwards,		61,322	16	7
inwards,		48,250	1	9
Total cuſtom of the port of London		109,572	18	4
At all the out-ports -	outw. 25,471 19 7 / inw. 13,030 9 9	38,502	9	4
Total account of the cuſtoms of Engl.		148,075	7	8

By this account it appears that London, in 1613, paid then very near thrice as much for cuſtoms as all the reſt of England together.

The year 1614 produced the diſcovery of a new ſpecies of woollen manufacture in England, namely, the making of mixtures dyed in the wool. This has ever ſince got the appellation of Medley Cloth, all woollen cloth before this time being only of one ſingle colour dyed in the cloth.

In this year alſo the fine iſland of Barbadoes in the Weſt-Indies is ſaid to have been diſcovered and ſettled on by ſome Engliſh people. It is the mother of all our Weſt-India ſugar-iſlands, and the chief of the Caribbees. It has proved of the greateſt advantage to this nation, by its excellent productions. The Eaſt India Company now began to trade on the joint ſtock account, no voyages being from henceforth allowed on ſeparate ſtocks. The following is a liſt of the Engliſh company's factories at the time we are now ſpeaking of in India, viz. Bantam, Jacatra (ſince called Batavia), Surat, Amadavar, Agra, Aſmere, Brampore, Calcutta (from whence the cloth called Calico took its name) Maſulipatam, Siam, Benjar, Soccadania, Macaſſar, Acheen, Jambi, Tecoo, Bandar, and at Firando in Japan: from many of which places our Company have withdrawn their factories, and from ſome others the Dutch have not long ſince wormed us out. In the year 1616, one Le Maire, a merchant of Amſterdam, diſcovered a paſſage to India by the ſouth-weſt round Cape Horn, through a new ſtreight ſouth of the Magellanic Streights, to which he gave his name, which it ſtill retains: it is much ſafer of navigation than the other. About this time one of our ſhips ſailed to Mocha in the Red Sea, and ſettled a factory there for the firſt time, by the permiſſion of the Turkiſh aga.

In the following year we find, for the firſt time, mention of fins of whales being brought home with the blubber of oil; but the very next year our Engliſh adventurers having met with great loſſes and diſcouragements, relinquiſhed that fiſhery; and ſo it remained till the reign of Charles II. King James now granted new charters of powers to the Eaſt-India Company.

* Anderſon, vol. I. p. 486, 487.

The colony of Virginia went on increaſing, and had by this time conſiderable quantities of tobacco planted there, which now began to be well taken off at home. Sir Samuel Argall, the then governor, finding this colony in a thriving way, began to have his eye on the French, who had croſſed the river St. Lawrence, and had a ſettlement in the colony then named Acadia (a part of that province called Nova Scotia) and alſo farther ſouthward, a part of what is now called New England. But he drove the French from Port-Royal, ſince named Annapolis-Royal; ſome of whom went home to France, and others of them ſailing up the river St. Lawrence, ſettled in Canada. "We are here to obſerve (ſays Mr. Anderſon *) that the Engliſh, from their very firſt ſettling on the continent of America, had ever deemed Nova Scotia to be a part of North-Virginia; for at this time all the country north of Cape Henry was known by the ſole name of Virginia, which, being the mother Engliſh colony on that continent, and its patent extending to the northernmoſt parts in America, all the country north of what was at this time planted in Virginia, had the appellation of North-Virginia." It is a juſtice due to the managers of the Virginia Company to obſerve, that even ſo early as the year 1618, they had formed a deſign to erect a college, for the converſion of the Indians to Chriſtianity, altho' it proved afterwards abortive. In this ſame year, 1618, the firſt Engliſh African Company was erected by charter, but ſoon after diſſolved, on not anſwering the expectations either of the adventurers or of the government.

In the year 1620, the Engliſh Company trading to the Eaſt-Indies obtained leave of the king of Golconda to ſettle at Madras-Patan, on the coaſt of Coromandel, where they were permitted to build the fort called St. George; which place has ever ſince been the Company's general factory for their trade in that country.

In the ſame year our people firſt planted the country ſince called New-England. Captain John Smith having ſurveyed the inland country, and preſented a map of it to Charles prince of Wales, (afterwards king Charles I.) that prince gave it the name of New-England, which was afterwards further peopled, and conſiderably improved by the emigration of numbers of puritans from the mother-country, on account of the perſecution raiſed againſt them here for their religious tenets. The colony is at this day the nobleſt of all our North-American continent provinces: they take off from Great-Britain to the value of three hundred thouſand pounds and upwards annually, in Britiſh products and manufactures.

According to Mr. Miſſelden, in his Circle of Commerce, p. 121. the general balance of our foreign trade for the year 1622, was as follows:

	l.	s.	d.
The total amount of exportations	2,320,436	12	10
The total imports - -	2,619,315	0	0
Balance loſt to England this year by her foreign commerce	298,878	7	2

The ſame accurate author gives us the total amount of the cuſtoms of England, both outward and inward, for the ſaid year 1622, viz. 168,222 l. 15 s. 11 d.

In this ſame year, 1662, ſir William Alexander, afterwards earl of Sterling, having obtained a patent ſome time before from king James, as king of Scotland, for ſettling that country called by him Nova Scotia; and having got ſundry noblemen and gentlemen of Scotland to be ſharers with him in it, ſent a colony of Scots thither, who named the peninſula on the eaſt ſide of the Bay of Fundy, Nova Caledonia, and the other part on the north ſide Nova Alexandria †: and for the better enabling him to ſettle that plantation, king James granted him a Scots patent for advancing a number of perſons to the hereditary dignity of baronets of Nova Scotia: yet, after conſiderable pains, and labour and expence, this colony came to nothing.

As the making of rivers navigable is of great benefit to commerce, we cannot paſs by unnoticed, an act of parliament paſſed in the twenty-firſt year of king James I's reign (1624) for making the river Thames navigable for barges, lighters, and boats, from London to Oxford.

In the year 1625, the firſt of Charles I. we find a navy-board for England appointed to be managed by twelve commiſſioners. Theſe ſeem to have been moſtly ſtationed as at preſent, into diſtinct branches, ſuch as a comptroller, a ſurveyor, a clerk of the navy, &c. This board alſo, as at preſent, was to be ſubordinate to the lord high-admiral, or the admiralty-board, from whom the ſaid commiſſioners were to receive directions and orders of maritime affairs ‡.

In the ſame year the Virginia Company was diſſolved, and that valuable colony ſettled as at preſent, under regal government. It will not be amiſs to inſert here the ſtate of our Newfoundland fiſhery, as it ſtood about this time. It appears then that the ports of Devonſhire annually employed one hundred and fifty ſhips, and carried their fiſh to Spain and Italy. This fiſhery maintained eight thouſand perſons for ſix months in Newfoundland, and ſupported many thouſands of families at home in preparing nets, caſks, proviſions, &c. and repairing the ſhips for the voyage §.

About this time alſo the ſugar-trade of England had its riſe in the firſt ſettlement of the iſland of Barbadoes, the mother of all the ſugar colonies, which was diſcovered by ſir William Courteen, ſome time before the death of James I. In the year 1627, king Charles granted Barbadoes and the other Caribbee iſles to James Ley, earl of Marlborough, and lord-treaſurer; but at the reſtoration of king Charles II. it was determined by the king and council, that out of the revenue of Barbadoes, then greatly improved, three hundred pounds a year for his life ſhould be granted to the earl of Marlborough, who had diſpoſed of his patent for that ſum to the earl of Carliſle; and that the earl of Kinnoul, who claimed under the earl of Carliſle, ſhould be paid one thouſand pounds on ſurrendering lord Carliſle's Charter: and thus Barbadoes and all the other Caribbee iſles came under the immediate government of the Crown, and ſo have remained ever ſince.

In year 1628, ſir David Kirk and his aſſociates poſſeſſed themſelves of Canada, which then only conſiſted of the country on the north ſide of the great river of St. Lawrence, together with the caſtle of Quebec, of which the ſaid ſir David's ſon was appointed governor. The French hereupon agreed to recognize our king's property in all Nova Scotia, and to pay ſir David Kirk fifty thouſand pounds for his quitting the forts which he had poſſeſſed himſelf of in Canada; which ſum however was never paid.

King Charles I. in the fourth year of his reign, incorporated that beſt planted, and moſt populous province of New-England, called the Maſſachuſets Bay, of which Boſton is the capital town. In this ſame year Carolana, now called Carolina, was firſt planted by ſir Robert Heath, the king's attorney-general, in virtue of a patent granted by Charles to him and his heirs for that purpoſe. Sir Robert afterwards conveyed this province to the earl of Arundel, who was at the expence of planting ſundry parts of it; but the ſubſequent civil war in England prevented that nobleman's farther progreſs therein. The Five Nations of the Indian Iroquois, ſo long the voluntary vaſſals of the Engliſh crown, made a ſurrender and ſale of all their conqueſts in that country, which reached as far as the Miſſiſſippi, to the governor of New-York, in king James II's reign *. The Iſle of Providence, the chief of all the Bahama Iſles, was alſo firſt planted by the Engliſh in this year, who likewiſe claimed the reſt of thoſe iſlands as the firſt occupiers.

In the Fœdera (vol. xix. fol. 335.) we find a proclamation of king Charles relating to the trade of the Eaſt-India Company, in which is the following catalogue of the wares and merchandizes licenſed to be exported to India, and to be imported from thence, viz.

Goods allowed to be exported to India, perpetuana's and drapery, pewter, ſaffron, woollen ſtockings, ſilk ſtockings and garters, ribband roſes edged with gold lace, beaver-hats with gold and ſilver bands, felt hats, ſtrong waters, knives, Spaniſh leather ſhoes, iron, and looking-glaſſes.

Goods which might be imported from India; long pepper, white pepper, white powder, ſugar, preſerved nutmegs and ginger, preſerved mirabolans, bezoar ſtones, drugs of all ſorts, agate heads, blood ſtones, muſk, aloes ſuccotrina, ambergris, rich Perſian carpets, quilts of ſatin, taffaty, painted callicoes, damaſks, ſatins and taffaties of China, quilts of China embroidered with gold, ſugar-canes, china diſhes and puſlanes (that is, porcelane) of all ſorts.

By this catalogue (greatly differing from our modern India cargoes) we may learn, ſays Mr. Anderſon, that many rich and uſeful commodities were then imported from India, and that china-ware or porcelain was come into uſe in Europe, altho' this is the firſt authentic mention thereof we meet with; but neither tea nor coffee were as yet brought home by our India ſhips. The Eaſt-India Company, however, ſeem as yet to have made but very little profit to their adventurers there, whoſe gains amounting in fifteen years time to no more than twelve and a half per cent.

The year 1632 gave birth to the fine and now proſperous colony of Maryland, being a part of what was then reckoned Virginia. Sir George Calvert, ſecretary to king James I. firſt diſcovered this tract of land; and finding its commodiouſneſs for trade, obtained a promiſe of the king's grant of the ſaid unplanted country; but he dying before the grant was made out, his ſon Cæcilius, created lord Baltimore in Ireland, took it out in his own name on the twentieth of June, 1632. The iſle of Montſerrat, in the Weſt-Indies, was alſo planted by the Engliſh this year, who likewiſe ſettled on the iſle of Antigua, but ſoon abandoned it, on account of its having no freſh-water brooks, or ſcarce any other but rain water.

In the year 1637, king Charles erected a ſeparate Eaſt-India Company for a trade to China and Japan. The ſcheme of this new Eaſt-India Company was, as Mr. Anderſon very juſtly obſerves, an iniquitous one againſt the old Company, whoſe charter was, doubtleſs, entirely excluſive of all others, and the king was probably put upon it by his miniſters, on the plauſible pretext of great profit to himſelf.

Towards the cloſe of the year 1642, the war between king Charles and his parliament commenced, to the no ſmall interruption of commerce and manufactures: the trade of the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company in particular ſeems to have been at this time almoſt quite ſunk, or at leaſt greatly decayed. The Dutch Eaſt-India Company, however, abandoning the ſettlement they had on the iſland of St. Helena, in 1651, our Company took poſſeſſion of that iſle. It is ſituated in the Atlantic Ocean: it conſiſts of one ſteep and lofty rock, reſembling a caſtle, in the ſea, and acceſſible only in one place, defended now by a platform of forty guns, beyond which is a fort where the governor reſides. This iſland is twenty-ſeven miles in circuit, and the rock has only a foot of vegetable ſoil, producing grapes, fruits, and garden-ſtuffs of all kinds, but no corn comes to perfection. The Eaſt India ſhips always touch here on their return home.

In the year 1652, one Mr. Edwards, an Engliſh Turky merchant, brought home with him a Greek ſervant, who firſt introduced the roaſting and making of coffee, till then unknown in England. This ſervant was the firſt who ſold coffee, and kept a houſe for that purpoſe in Holland.

Cromwell, in 1654, concluded a treaty of peace and alliance with John IV. king of Portugal, wherein were ſundry articles advantageous to the trade of England, both with reſpect to our ſubjects freely trading to Braſil, &c. much more than ſince; as alſo for the ſecurity of the goods of the Engliſh dying in Portugal. Theſe articles were in part confirmed by ſubſequent and more legal treaties.

In the following year, 1655, Cromwell diſſolved the Eaſt-India company, and laid that trade open for three years; but the infinite damage accruing to our commerce from that ſtep, obliged the protector to reinſtate the Company at the expiration of that time. Having nothing further to add of the times preceding the reſtoration of Charles II. we muſt do the Rump Parliament and Cromwell, with all their faults, the juſtice to remark, that they made ſundry and very good regulations and laws for the improvement of our commerce and ſhipping, moſt of which were adopted, and legally enacted by the parliament, immediately after the conſtitution reverted to its true form of government.

The

The firſt matter relating to the ſubject of commerce after the return of Charles II. to the throne of his anceſtors, is the famous act (of navigation ſo called) paſſed for the encouragement and increaſe of ſhipping and navigation, "wherein (ſaith the preamble to that act) under the good providence and protection of God, the wealth, ſafety, and ſtrength of this kingdom, are ſo much concerned." Having already given the principal enacting clauſes of this ſtatute, whereby not only the trade to and from our American plantations was ſecured to ourſelves alone, but likewiſe our mercantile ſhipping was conſiderably increaſed, as alſo the number of our ſailors, and all trades depending on ſea affairs, we ſhall not enlarge any farther thereupon, but only obſerve, that by the means of this act, the moſt important in commerce that ever was enacted in this or any other nation, we are at length become, in great meaſure, what the Dutch once were, the great carriers of Europe, eſpecially within the Mediterranean ſea.

In this ſame year, 1660 (the twelfth of Charles II's reign, reckoning from his father's murder and the firſt of his own reſtoration) ſir Thomas Modyford, an eminent planter in the iſland of Barbadoes, having acquired a prodigious fortune there, choſe to remove and ſettle in Jamaica, where he inſtructed the young Engliſh planters who went over in Cromwell's time, to cultivate the ſugar canes; for which, and his other improvements, he was afterwards appointed governor of that iſland. We muſt not forget, that in this year an act of parliament paſſed in favour of the Dutch or Flemings at Colcheſter in Eſſex, who had firſt brought into England the manufacture of baize.

After the reſtoration of king Charles II. the Engliſh Eaſt India Company being ſuppoſed, notwithſtanding the diſorders in it of late years, ſtill to exiſt as eſtabliſhed by queen Elizabeth, king James I. and king Charles I. obtained of his majeſty a new excluſive charter, dated the third of April, 1661, by the old name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the Eaſt-Indies.

About this time the worſted manufacture eſtabliſhed in Norwich and Norfolk was prodigiouſly increaſed, and the ſilk manufacture in London had made vaſt progreſs, inſomuch as to employ above forty thouſand men, women and children. After this time we find divers acts of parliament, in this and ſucceeding reigns, for regulating the ſilk manufacture at home, and the importation of raw and thrown ſilk from foreign parts. At this time Charles II. ſhamefully delivered up to France the country of Nova Scotia, and ſuch part of Canada as was held by our people.

The town, port, and iſland of Bombay, being part of the portion which Charles had with his wife the princeſs Catherine, daughter to Alphonſo VI. king of Portugal, in 1661, was by him granted, in 1688, in full property for ever to our Eaſt-India Company, to hold it in free common ſoccage of his imperial crown, under an annual rent of ten pounds in gold, to be paid on September 30 yearly at the cuſtom-houſe in London. It has been ſince greatly improved both in ſtrength and commerce.

In the year 1662 the Engliſh, from their colonies on the north continent of America, firſt began to cut down the logwood-trees, growing in infinite quantities on the uninhabited coaſts of the province of Jucatan, and more eſpecially in the Bay of Campeachy, where they firſt made a ſettlement for that end, as it was not near any Spaniſh ſettlement or inhabitants. In proceſs of time, however, the Spaniards became ſo uneaſy at that ſettlement, and our logwood-cutting, that they actually made prize of all Engliſh veſſels they met with in the American ſeas which had logwood in them. This gave riſe to many warm diſputes between that nation and us, and it is to be feared will ſtill occaſion much altercation.

Connecticut in New-England, and Carolina, were about this time firſt made royal colonies.

By a report of ſir Charles D'Avenant, inſpector-general of the cuſtoms in the reigns of king William and queen Anne, it appears that our imports in the year 1662 amounted to 4,016,019 l. and our exports to 2,022,812 l. conſequently the balance againſt us was no leſs than 1,993,207 l.

In 1664 king Charles, on making war with the Dutch, undertook to drive that people out of New-Nedderland (ſince named New-York) where, as alſo in the country ſince called New-Jerſey (by the Dutch Nova Belgia) they had got footing, and greatly improved.

In the year 1666 the iſland of Antigua (or Antego) was finally ſettled by the Engliſh, who had deſerted it after a former attempt in 1632. This is now the beſt Engliſh colony of the Caribbees, after Barbadoes and St. Chriſtophers. It is noted for the beſt harbours in all theſe iſlands: it is much troubled with hurricanes, which do great damage both on ſhore and at ſea. It is now well fortified; and by means of tanks or ciſterns, they make a tolerable ſhift to ſupply themſelves with rain water, when their wells fail. They raiſe and ſend home to Britain great quantities of ſugar, rum, and molaſſes. In the ſaid year, 1666, captain Sayle, of the new colony of Carolina, being driven in a ſtorm on the Iſle of Providence, the chief of the Bahama Iſles, on his return to England made a report of the condition of thoſe iſles; on which Charles II. granted patent to the lords proprietors of Carolina of the ſaid iſles. The iſland of Providence lies on the eaſt ſide of the Gulph of Florida, and two hundred and ſix miles from the continent of that name, in twenty-five degrees fifteen minutes north latitude, and is about twenty-eight miles in length, and eleven in breadth. It came in time to be neglected, and was the reſort only of pirates till the reign of king George I. when captain Woodes Rogers was ſent regal governor there, to whom the pirates for the moſt part ſubmitted, and accepted of the king's pardon: it has ever ſince remained a regal colony. In 1745 two well-deſigned forts were erected there, ſo that the iſland is now in a good poſture of defence againſt an enemy. Beſides this principal iſland of Providence, there are ſeveral Britiſh ſettlements on Harbour Iſland and Eleuthera. The Bahama Iſlands abound with many ſorts of good, and ſome very uncommon timber, and with plenty of ſtones and loam. On Exuma there is excellent ſalt, and they have made ſome trials to rear ſugar-canes. About this time the dying and dreſſing of fine white woollen cloths, which had long been unſucceſsfully attempted, was at length brought to perfection in England.

The general balance of trade of England for the year 1668 was moſt grievouſly to our loſs; for the imports exceeded the exports 2,132,864 l. 18 s. "This great national loſs, ſays an ingenious author, in his treatiſe called the Britiſh Merchant, was owing to our having a full or uncircumſcribed trade with France; which trade being afterwards prohibited, the general balance in 1699 was got to be ſo far in our favour as 1,147,660 l. 10 s. 9 d. Total gained by us from having no trade with France, 3,280,525 l. 8 s. 9 d. which balance in the year 1703, was ſo conſiderably increaſed, as to be no leſs than 2,117,523 l. 3 s. 10 ½ d. being a gain from the year 1668 of 4,250,388 l. 1 s. 10 ½ d.

in

In the year 1670, the wear of muſlins was firſt introduced from India; before which time we made uſe of the more ſubſtantial cambricks, Sileſia lawns, and ſuch kind of fine flaxen linen from Flanders and Germany, in return for our woollen manufactures of various kinds exported to thoſe countries in very conſiderable quantities.

In the ſame year was made the famous treaty of peace between England and Spain, commonly called the American Treaty; by which Charles II. of Spain recognized all our rights to the American dominions we were poſſeſſed of at that time. This year alſo the Hudſon's-Bay Company was eſtabliſhed by charter, dated the ſecond of May 1670. This company have three or four forts in different parts of Hudſon's-Bay, in which they have in all about one hundred and twenty perſons, who for nine months in the year live in a manner ſhut up within theſe forts in low houſes, ſo built as to defend them from the piercing cold, ſnow, and rains. Three or four ſhips are annually ſent from England, laden with coarſe woollen goods, guns, powder and ſhot, ſpirits, edge tools, and ſundry other utenſils. In return for which, the natives ſell them all kinds of furs, gooſe quills, caſtorum, whale fins and oil, bed feathers, &c. and they make a handſome annual dividend to their proprietors.

It was in or about the year 1676 that the printing of callicoes was firſt ſet on foot in London. At the ſame time was alſo brought into uſe from Holland the weavers loom engine, then called the Dutch loom engine.

Mr. Anderſon tells us, that in a manuſcript account of Newfoundland in his poſſeſſion, written anno 1677, it appears, that in the year 1676 there went thither from England one hundred and two ſhips for the cod-fiſhery there, each ſhip having twenty guns, and carrying eighteen boats, and for each boat five men; in the whole one hundred and eighty men. The total value of the fiſh and oil they made there in that year was computed at 386,400 l. a clear proof how great a nurſery this fiſhery muſt be for Engliſh ſailors, and how beneficial for the employment of ſhip-building, &c.

The year 1680 gave riſe to the noble Engliſh colony of Penſylvania in North-America, between forty and forty-three degrees north latitude. Mr. William Penn, an eminent quaker, had it granted him at this time, having purpoſed to make it a retreat for the people of his perſuaſion, who were diſturbed here on account of their religious tenets. He carried over a great number of theſe people with him, who were ſoon afterwards joined by many more from Great Britain and Ireland. At his firſt arrival in the country he found many Engliſh families there, and a conſiderable number of Dutch and Swedes, who all readily ſubmitted to his wiſe and excellent regulations, which, with his gentle and generous conduct, ſoon endeared him to the planters, and ſo widely ſpread his fame, and that of his infant government, that numbers flocked over from all parts of Europe to ſettle in Penſylvania, for ſo he called this colony, after his own own name. Mr. Penn's beautiful and ſuperb plan of his capital city of Philadelphia, ſtill ſtrictly adhered to, and drawing conſtantly nearer to perfection, may ſerve for a pattern to the richeſt country on earth. At that city they build and employ many good ſhips: thoſe of five hundred tons and upwards may lie cloſe to the quay. They trade to our ſugar colonies with their corn, peaſe, flour, biſcuit, beef, pork, fiſh, pipe-ſtaves, peltry or furs, lumber, horſes, &c. in exchange for ſugar, rum, molaſſes, ginger, pimento, and foreign ſilver, as dollars, &c. They alſo employ themſelves in raiſing hemp, flax, and other materials for our Britiſh manufactures, as drugs for dyers, &c. iron, and copper; they even carry their corn, fiſh, pipe-ſtaves, &c. as far as Italy; and going from thence to Britain, they here lade woollen, ſilk, linen, and ſundry other neceſſaries wanted in their colony. They alſo carry on a clandeſtine trade with the Spaniſh main for ſilver, and their logwood trade, which they import into England, helps to pay for the commodities they carry away from hence *. Thus has the ſpirit of intolerance and perſecution, the moſt abſurd of all political meaſures, given exiſtence to the fineſt province of Britiſh America.

The Turkey Company was now in a flouriſhing condition; they exported great quantities of woollen manufactures, and other Engliſh wares, to the great enriching this nation. In or about the year 1681, they exported to the value of half a million ſterling yearly; in return for which they brought home raw ſilks, grogram, yarns, galls, drugs, cotton, &c. all which being manufactured in England, afford bread to the poor of the kingdom.

In the year 1682, our Eaſt India Company loſt Bantam, one of the beſt factories they had ever poſſeſſed in India, occaſioned by a quarrel between the old king of Bantam and his ſon. Our Company ſided with the father; the Dutch aſſiſted the ſon, whoſe arms prevailing, the old king was made priſoner, and ſhut up the reſt of his days; and the young king gave his friends the Dutch the poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Bantam, who ſoon drove out the Engliſh Company's factors and ſervants, and have ever ſince remained in poſſeſſion of the place. Our Company however got poſſeſſion this ſame year of Bencoolen, in the great iſland of Sumatra; by which important ſettlement they have preſerved to England the pepper trade, which otherwiſe would have been loſt to us by their expulſion from Bantam.

The year 1685, the firſt of king James II. was diſtinguiſhed by the famous revocation of what was before deemed the perpetual and irrevocable edict of Nantes; by which edict the proteſtants in France enjoyed the free and public toleration and exerciſe of their religion in France. This revolution, tho' infinitely diſtreſsful to many thouſands of individuals in that kingdom, was productive of much good to almoſt all the proteſtant countries of Europe, but more eſpecially to this nation. That part of the ſuburbs of London called Spitalfields, was peopled entirely with French manufacturers in ſilk; ſome thouſands of other artiſts helped to people and increaſe the ſuburbs of Soho and St. Giles's; others of them brought over the art of making chryſtal in perfection, which was thereby loſt for a time in France. Above fifty thouſand of theſe refugees ſettled here, and have proved a great and manifeſt advantage to us, by improving our arts and manufactures, and likewiſe by introducing ſundry new ones; and ſuppoſing, at the loweſt computation, that theſe fifty thouſand people, one with another, coming into Great Britain, brought ſixty pounds each only in money and effects, they muſt have brought three millions ſterling to the wealth of this nation.

In this ſame year king James granted the Eaſt-India Company a new charter, being their ſixth ſince the Reſtoration; wherein he prohibits any of his ſubjects to ſend out ſhips, or trade within the limits of the ſaid Company, as had been done by ſeveral adventurers, to the Company's great damage, and deſtruction of that trade. He certifies all the preceding charters in their favour for ever, and in their fulleſt extent; he inveſts them with the power of exerciſing martial law, to extend as far as the iſland of St. Helena, and to their fort of Peyanian, on the weſt coaſt of Sumatra, as well as to their other limits. He alſo grants full power to the Company to appoint admirals, vice-admirals, and other ſea officers; and to raiſe and muſter ſeamen and ſoldiers, and to equip their ſhips in a warlike manner, for attack and defence againſt any enemy, or any ſhips carrying on an illicit trade within their limits. The Company may alſo coin money in any of their forts, of the ſpecie uſually coined by the princes of thoſe countries only, which money ſhall be current every-where within the Company's limits, &c. &c. *

Having thus gone through the moſt material tranſactions relating to commerce during this period, I ſhall cloſe this article with a ſhort view of the gradual increaſe of our wealth, trade, ſhipping, and revenue, during this period, extracted from the moſt approved writers on this ſubject.

We have an eminent inſtance of the great increaſe of our commerce and ſhipping in only twenty-two years ſpace, from Dr. D'Avenant's diſcoveries on the public revenues and trade of England; and from Comber's Hiſtory of Engliſh naval affairs, we find that the tonnage of the merchant ſhips in England at the Revolution (anno 1688) was near double to the tonnage in 1666.

Alſo that the tonnage of the navy-royal, which in the year 1660, the firſt of the Reſtoration, was only 62,594 tons, was in this year, 1688, increaſed to 101,032 tons.

D'Avenant, who, as inſpector-general of the cuſtoms, muſt have been perfectly maſter of this ſubject, informs us, that "in the year 1666 the farm of the cuſtom of England was but 390,000 l. yearly; yet from Michaelmas 1671, to Michaelmas 1688, being ſeventeen years, the cuſtoms yielded net to the Crown 9,447,799 l. which at a medium was 555,752 l. per annum."

The laſt quoted author gives us alſo a view of the gradual increaſe of the general rental of England, occaſioned by the increaſe of our commerce, and the great improvements made in agriculture.

"The general rental of England, ſays he, for land, houſes, or mines, about the year 1600, did not exceed ſix millions per annum; which general rental, ſoon after the Revolution, was reckoned at about fourteen millions The above ſix millions, in 1600, at twelve years purchaſe (the common price of lands at that period) was worth but ſeventy-two millions; but the lands, &c. of England, at the rental of fourteen millions, and worth eighteen years purchaſe, in 1688, amounted to two hundred and fifty two millions." How amazing an alteration in the ſpace of leſs than one century!
